BELIEVING that his brother William is defrauding him of his rights, John Jones, stingy Scotchman migrates with his wife and twin sons to the United States to seek his fortune. The time is the last quarter of the nineteenth century and in Wisconsin John finds work as a rural postman. His appearance in a horse drawn cart evokes gales of mirth, but the little Scotsman stubbornly plies his route, and belabors his sons for all real and fancied misdoings. In his disappointment at not amassing a quick fortune, Father Jones becomes irascible, while the twins have their own troubles, having both fallen in love with the same girl, Helen Hendricks. Bernard, hard working, has little time to plead his suit, but Lawrence hangs about and Helen, feeling that Bernard does not care about her, seems to favor Lawrence. When Bernard comes to call, he is left to the unwelcome attentions of Helen's spinster Aunt Ida. Ida pursues Bernard so diligently that she upsets the lamp and before they can stop the flames the house is burned to the ground. In pity for the two weeping women, Bernard and Lawrence invite them to stay at the Jones home.

Meanwhile Father Jones has been attacked by wolves who have killed his horse. Badly shaken up by his own narrow escape, Jones is given a bottle of whiskey by a sympathetic watcher, and under the influence of the powerful stimulant his troubles begin to disappear. With the money he has received for his services, Jones staggers in, waves broadly to his family, and tells them he is through. Before they can stop him, he leaves for Chicago. There he buys an expensive gold watch, a brand new hat, and swaggers through the streets. In search of shelter, he enters a saloon and becoming more drunk, proclaims that he is very wealthy indeed. The chorus girls lead him a dizzy pace, which ends in the morning when Jones finds himself robbed and minus his watch and hat. The wailing he sets up brings the police and he is locked up. The girls claim they have never seen him before and Jones finds himself under suspicion.

Meanwhile, Jones' brother William comes from Scotland with his adopted daughter Edith. The Jones, unwilling to tell about John's desertion, pretend they expect him back any mment. Helen realizing that Bernard loves her as much as she loves him, responds to his love and Lawrence is utterly dejected. Aunt Ida turns her attentions to Lawrence who impatiently dismisses her. However, Edith provides a ready sympathy and just as William is beginning to grow suspicious, the prodigal John returns flanked by a policeman. The policeman, sizing up the situation pretends he is offering an honored escort. John learns that William has come to bring him his share of their property sale, and also that the government has set aside a new cart and horse for him, so that he can go back to work. And while the youngsters Bernard and Helen are married, Edith and Lawrence pair off, and the indomitable Ida turns her attentions to the sheepish William.

BACKSTAGE

Melvina Bennight Drama File No. 10781

BEFORE the cracked little mirror in the squalid hut, Jessie Stillwell declaims scenes from Shakespeare. Looking up she sees her mother's lined face smiling at her tenderly, and as she throws her arms about her, her mother brings forth one hundred dollars and tells Jessie it is for her college education. Later that night, Jessie confides to Paul Lane she is getting away from all this, from the sound of her father's drunken snoring and her brother's lawlessness. She is going into the world—perhaps to be a great actress. And Paul, who loves her, understands, because he too, wants to be a writer instead of a farmer.

Arrived at the college, Jessie thinks that she is in Paradise. But soon she is to learn that the well dressed girls jeer at her home spun clothes, and snub her because her father is a Kentucky moonshiner. Only to her mother does Jessie write that she is having a glorious time, to her mother and to Paul whose arms she aches for. Her one friend at school is her room mate, a girl from a wealthy family, who helps Jessie keep up the illusion of happiness when her mother comes to visit. At last, graduated, Jessie faces the world. Knowing in her heart that she has the makings of a great actress, and inspired by her mother's faith in her, Jessie applies at all the agencies for a job, and finally manages to get work in a vaudeville act. Paid a mere pittance, she is driven almost crazy by the demands of theater managers, and one night stands weary her. But to her mother she writes that she is a great success, and her mother tells Paul. Then, one day Paul sends his novel to a publisher, and it is acclaimed. He comes to the city to see about the movie rights, and as he drops into a vaudeville show to kill a few hours, he is startled to see Jessie. She is so exhausted and hungry, that she drops the balls she is supposed to throw to the juggler, and while the audience laughs loudly, Jessie is summarily fired. Backstage, Paul rushes to meet her, and as she sees him, she burst into tears. Gently he draws her into a restaurant sees that she has some hot food, and then asks why she made him believe she was doing so well that he dared not ask her to marry him. Under Paul's guidance, Jessie gets herself some new clothes and when Paul goes to see the producer, he refuses to allow the sale of his book unless Jessie plays a leading role in the film. The producer tell him he is crazy, but when he sees Jessie's beauty, he reconsiders and reluctantly agrees to give her a screen test. Encouraged by Paul throughout, Jessie makes good and when Paul's picture is released it features as star Jessie Stillwell. Jessie returns to bring her mother with her to Hollywood. Back home her father and brothers strut as they take credit for her success, but Jessie doesn't care, for she has her mother and Paul. And with them———happiness.

STARS IN MY SKY

Helen L. Brown Drama File No. 10800

SENSITIVE, idealistic. Elena receives a severe shock when her father dies and subsequent events prove that he has not only squandered the family fortune but has left his wife and daughter with little save their large home. Realizing that the sale of the home would yield little in these troubled times, Elena and her mother keep it up, taking in boarders to help defray expenses. Soon, through Church-going, Elena is able to find comfort and she becomes a devout believer. One day she rents a room to one Hugh Powell. Although they rarely see their boarders except when the rent is being paid, Elena finds her mother laughing one day over a long story Hugh is telling and she is called in to join in the fun. Long after her mother has gone, Hugh and Elena remain talking, and Hugh comments on the fact that she never seems to go to parties and dances like other girls. He is surprised to learn of her strong religious beliefs and when he tells her he has never been able to believe, she earnestly sets about converting him. At first he teases her for wanting to save his soul, but then, just to be near her, he lets her talk of faith. Then one day he turns from her with a groan Surprised, she sees him walk toward the window and clench and unclench his fists. At length, unable to stand it longer he tells her he is married. Elena cries out in dismay, realizing in the same moment that she loves Hugh and that he is forever lost to her. He explains that his mother had always idolized his younger brother Paul, and tolerated Hugh. Then one day Paul was killed in an automobile accident. The girl with Paul had escaped almost unscathed, but upon recovering she had come to Hugh and told him that she was bearing Paul's child. Hugh had tried to quiet her, and realizing what the effect of this revelation would have upon his mother who revered Paul's memory as something holy. Hugh had at length offered her his name. When Hugh finishes his story, Elena's eyes are wet with tears, but although Hugh tells her he has never loved or even cared for the girl who is his wife, Elena maintains they have no right to think of going together. Hugh tries to persuade her that all that matters is their love for each other, but Elena, reminds him that her religion does not permit divorce, and once having sworn to keep the girl, his duty is to her. At length Hugh yields, and presses her cold little hands to his lips he leaves to go back to Alice in her hour of need. Elena never knows how long it is that she sits stonily at the window, watching the man she loves walk out of her life. But the conviction comes over her that what she has done is wrong. She has ruined Hugh's life as well as her own. Mechanically she goes about her duties. A few days later, she hears a familiar walk up the drive and as, incredulously she opens the door, Hugh folds her in his arms, and holding her close tells her quietly that Alice died in childbirth. And a great peace comes over Elena as she realizes that now at last, there is nothing to separate her longer from her Hugh.

COURAGEOUS WOMAN

Mary Linehan Drama File No. 10759

"BUT, John," Irene had pleaded, "I can go on working." And so at last, because they had waited so long and were so terribly in love, John had agreed to let Irene work for two years after their marriage. Those first few years had been unmitigated bliss, but at their end, John had been adamant about Irene giving up working. He was well able to take care of her, now, he insisted, and could even buy a little car besides. So Irene had given up her position, but her heart sang, for she had saved up, by means of bringing her own sandwiches to business each day, and other little economies, enough money to buy a lot in Westchester for the house they had always dreamed about. So, through Mr. Willis, the handsome realty agent, Irene had bought her lot and made arrangements with John to drive up on the twenty-first to Westchester. Irene scurried to her diary, and John's laugh boomed out at her economy in using a last year's diary because she could get one with a key for the price of an ordinary paper covered one of this year's model.

But the long days at home with nothing to do but clean up the tiny apartment and wait for John's return began to pall on Irene and the long hours alone gave her time to brood. For instance there was Rose, her best friend. Rose was chic, unmarried, and terribly attractive. And since Rosa drove a car so expertly, Irene insisted on learning to drive. John had promised to get a learner's permit for her, but so far she had learned only the theory of driving. Then Sunday came. To Irene's dismay he seemed to have forgotten all about Westchester, and when, in their new car he drove out to Long Island to see a duck farm, Irene remained grimly unentertained. Far be it from her, she thought to reprove John, and for all his efforts to find out why she was so cold, she remained set and unyielding.

By Monday morning the rift had widened until Irene was certain John no longer cared for her. What's more, she felt, he had fallen in love with Rose. So calling up her friend, she cattily remarked she was going to drive up to Westchester to see the lot where she and John were going to live. Calling Mr. Willis, Irene told him she was coming and reassured him on the score of her driving ability. But on the roads, Irene repented her rashness many times, and after a particularly narrow escape, she stopped her car and rested only to discover that now she couldn't start it again. In desperation she bent her head and wept and it was thus that Mr. and Mrs. Willis found her and drove her home. After a silent supper, John asked gently why she couldn't have waited until next Sunday, as they had planned, to go to Westchester and why she had risked her life driving up. After stormy moments of accusing first the Willises and then Rose of having betrayed her confidence, Irene learned that Rose had anxiously called up John about Irene's proposed drive, and John had called the Willises to rescue her. Moreover a trip to her diary proved that she and not John had been mistaken about the date of the Westchester drive, and held close in John's arms while he told her how wonderful she was for buying the lot, Irene knew that he loved her after all.

HIS IDEAL WIFE

Mary Clouse Drama File No. 10744

THE moment Carew sees Amelia he knows that she is the incarnation of his ideals. After a whirlwind courtship he wins her as his bride and the two travel on the continent on their honeymoon. While abroad they meet Ida, who has long been in love with Carew. Dismayed at finding he has married, her opportunity comes when Carew is hurriedly summoned home to see his father before his death. Since Amelia is with child and unable to endure the long trip, Carew goes on, promising to return immediately for her. However, his father lingers between life and death for several weeks and Carew is distracted by Amelia's failure to answer any of his letters. At last, Carew returns only to discover that the doctor to whom he has entrusted hise wife has been killed in an automobile accident together with a lady who is supposed to have been Amelia. Carew is distrait, but he refuses to accept the sympathy of Ida who has not only intercepted all of Carew's letters to his wife, but after the birth of Amelia's daughter has convinced Amelia that Carew has already tired of his marriage and is trying to rid himself of her. At last, loving Carew too much to be a burden to him, Amelia disappeared with her child.

Years pass. Carew, after traveling to the most obscure corners of the earth in a vain attempt to forget Amelia returns to the home he has inherited from his father. There Ida awaits him, and when she runs across Claire, Aemlia's daughter, in an attempt to make Carew suffer as she has suffered, introduces the lovely girl to her own father. Carew sees in the girl the same elusive loveliness that was once Amelia's and is attracted to her. However, as her trump card, Ida arranges to appear compromised with Carew and he is honor bound to offer her the protection of marriage. Disillusioned by her taste of high society life, Claire returns home to her mother, but Amelia is appalled when she learns that Ida has married Carew. However, believing that Carew had long since stopped loving her, Amelia keeps her identity a secret, and from her daughter learns that Ida is already being courted in secret by a young Captain Harved. Soon after, Ida is found murdered and her husband, who had quarreled with his wife when he learned of her part in separating him from Amelia, is held for the murder. Everything points at Carew's guilt. But Amelia alone has faith in him. She contrives to meet Captain Harved, and openly flirting with him induces him to remain on in town. Then one day she comes to his apartment and with distended eyes begs him to take her away since she has killed a man. With a bravado fortified by too much champagne, the Captain assures her he will protect her and growing bolder confesses he killed a woman. Whereupon Amelia calls in the detectives she has waiting and the record of the Captain's confession, preserved by the secretly installed dictaphone aids in securing a complete vindication for Carew. It is a happy man who finds Amelia still loves him, and while Claire finds romance with the lawyer who has helped release her father, Amelia and Carew find again the happiness of their first month of marriage.

TIMES SQUARE

Margaret Carber Melodrama File No. 10639

WHILE restless crowds hurry past, a sight seeing bus, stationed at the corner of Times Square's busiest intersection, is filled with a group of young women and driven away, under the suspicious scrutiny of police. Jack Leeds, friend of Bill Kemp, the driver, watches this proceeding as he waits impatiently for San Lee, until Frank Faber darts across the street in his taxi, advising Bill to go to Twenty Third Street. Here he enters an old frame building, ostensibly an employment agency, after questioning the policeman on duty and discovering that he knows nothing of the true nature of the place. Inside, San tells him that he could not meet him, as he recognized an officer who had previously arrested him. Dan Perkins and Doc Long, leaders of the gang, have commissioned San to disguise himself as a woman. Accompanied by Jack, San is to feign illness at the subway station, so that when Mary Smith, a young dancer, passes, Jack will suggest that she help San to his apartment, believing, of course, that she is aiding another woman. Kitty Farrel, Dan's girl, listens to this plan. Dan also announces that he has arranged for another troup of girls from Barney Saunder's Dance Studio to accept "hostess" postions in Atlantic City.

Charlie Rosen, one of Doc's gang, finds Kitty talking to Dan Howe, a detective, in a speakeasy on Sixth Avenue. She introduces Dan as an old friend, but Charlie's suspicion are aroused and he notifies Doc. Informing the police of Doc's plan, Kitty instructs them to hide in an apartment building, where they watch the attempted abduction of Mary White, but at the last minute, Jack refuses to go through with it, and disappears, hastily, in the crowd. With this evidence, police close in on the gang's headquarters at Twenty Third Street, concealing tear bombs until the attack begins. The entire gang is taken, and Dopey Joe, half Chinese nephew of Bill, confesses that girls have been promised positions as hostesses in Atlantic City, through this agency. Then pressure has been brought to bear upon them to marry wealthy Chinese. A series of unexplained deaths have occured to these unfortunate young women, and the agency has claimed their insurance money through contracts they have unwittingly signed at the time of employment.

Two of the girls confirm these statements, as Joe dies. Mary White identifies San Lee as the imposter she encountered at the subway, but on viewing Jack's picture, recognizes him as her half brother, and hurries to the hospital, here he tells her that he entered the gang only to avenge his wife, one of its victims, and receives Mary's forgiveness as he, too, dies. Doc Long, still uncaptured, attempts to shoot Kitty, whom he knows now to be a policewoman, but he is shot first by Dan. Going to Dan's arms, Kitty promises to leave the detective business to him in the future, subject to her suggestions, which she will be privileged to give, as his wife.

VOCATION

Hildo Dejardin Drama File No. 10460

LAID-OFF—the cry of the Depression! In a few short months Samuel Nelson had changed from a salaried respected business man to a hollow-eyed wreck, drinking to forget the hungry eyes of his children and his wife. Despair mounted. In a crescendo of utter hopelessness Samuel ended his life, leaving Virginia to struggle along for a short while and then to follow, broken by the uneven battle. Wide-eyed the youngsters heard the relief committee discuss what was to become of them, then, small hands clasped, ran away. In the depths of a railroad box car they met Charcoal, little runaway negro lad, who shared with them his stolen food and taught them the best ways of eluding the police. It was Charcoal who stole a suit of boy's clothes for Emma and for weeks the two white children and the little black crossed the country together riding the rails, and stealing provender. Then at last they were caught by a watchful train agent. As the huge railroad man shook Emma, Charcoal's fist shot up, and the youngsters hailed before a judge were separated. Charcoal was sent back South to his family and the two little Nelsons were committed to the bleak walls of an orphanage. Months of utter loneliness followed and then Emma was seen by Ralph Vincent, famous impressario and given her opportunity to have her splendid voice cultivated abroad, while the alert, spirited Charley was adopted by the millionaire Fairfields and educated along legal lines. Graduated, Charley found his career already created for him as a Corporation Counsel, and despite his long cherished ideals of defending the poor and oppressed, found the snobbishness of his adopted parents holding him down inexorably.

Years passed. Emma returned to New York for her first concert and was welcomed by Ralph Vincent who stared transfixed at the vibrant young beauty of his protegee. Embarrassed by the girl's warm embrace and expressions of gratitude, Ralph held her off and assured her his reward would come when her voice was heard in the great Metropolitan Opera House. In the days that followed Emma trained constantly for her first concert, and Ralph was always near with suggestions and encouragement. Charley coming to visit his sister found in Ralph a staunch friend and the one man who could sympathize with his restlessness. To Charley this business of matching wits against the acquisitive brains of large Corporations was a bootless pursuit, and Ralph, whose life was now wrapped up in the development of Emma's career, alone understood. Then came the day of Emma's debut. Alone on the great stage the young girl stood and as her voice swelled with rapture a hushed silence fell over the audience. Then a burst of tumultuous applause. In her dressing room, Emma received the congratulations of friends who assured her she would be signed up for the Metropolitan. Only Ralph remained in the background, glowing with pride. But when at last Charley came it was to report he had not heard the concert. Puzzled Emma questioned him and learned that Charcoal was being held in the South on the grave charge of having raped a white girl. Charley had reached an open break with The Fairfields who warned him if he insisted on defending the negro they would disown him. Suddenly Emma rose and to the consternation of her admirers, the rising young star pledged herself to the support of the negro lad. While Charley and Emma aroused public opinion in sympathy for Charcoal the papers hinted at dark scandal in the life of the rising young concert star. The case excited national interest. Charley won an aquittal for Charcoal but for Emma the Metropolitan contract never arrived. Only Ralph came, Ralph who understood all. And in his love Emma found happiness.

THAT RAFFLES WOMAN

Hildo Dejardin Drama File No. 10564

WINNER of a great beauty contest, Violet Martin, High School student, incurs the jealousy of Arline Smith, a defeated contestant who, under the guise of friendship, introduces Violet to Don Servando Palacios, gambler and notorious roue. Don Servando makes love to Violet who shoots the gambler with his own gun. However, although she is innocent of any wrong doing, Violet finds the notoriety causes her to be expelled from school and disowned by her parents. Realizing that if Don Servando dies, she will be convicted of murder, Violet flees and is given a lift by a man who turns out to be a police officer hunting for O'Neill, the Wolf, famous gangster. Shaken by the thought that she might have been recognized and seized, Violet continues hiking and when two men ride by and offer her a lift, she refuses. However, they seize her and forcing her into the car, drive her to their retreat in the mountains. As the girl is seen by the desperate men who for two months have been in hiding, cut off from civilization and the sight of women, a fight is started and just as one of the men is overpowering Violet, the Wolf, himself, leader of the outlaws, appears. He realizes how valuable her beauty may be to them and offers his protection if she will ally herself with his gang and pose as a come-on for them.

Given clothes and money, Violet assumes the role of a duchess, adopting a pseudo-Spanish accent, and claiming lineage from a distinguished Castillian family. With the aid of The Wolf, Violet makes a series of rich hauls and when Madame La Forge, a French noblewoman arrives, Violet befriends her and while she decries the pretenders about, succeeds in getting away with the entire fortune in gems of her "dear friend."

The gang moves from Miami to New York where Violet poses as a newspaper woman and pretending to be a foreign correspondent contacts Don Carlos Aquiles, a romantic and wealthy Latin. Violet accepts his invitation to come to his hotel room and while Don Carlos leaves to prepare drinks, Violet attempts to steal his bonds. Don Carlos catches her red handed but instead of phoning the police sends for more champagne and admits that he has fallen in love with her. Violet promises she will quit this life for him, but the next day she is caught by another hotel guest, stealing gems. The Lady phones the police and among the curious throng comes Don Carlos who explains to the police that Violet had doubtlessly mistaken this room for his where he had left some jewels for her. Violet is freed and accepts Don Carlos' invitation to walk in the park. There she admits to him that she dares not leave with him, fearing the Wolf who would kill them both. Don Carlos assures her, however, that she has a right to happiness and in sensuous words describes the glamorous and beautiful island of Porto Rico and his father's vast sugar plantation. At last Violet promises to sail with him and they take passage on the S. S. The Tropical. When the Wolf discovers that Violet has betrayed him, he and his gang board an English ship and at the point of guns force the Captain to sail. The radio operator, however, wires the Tropical which in turns sends for help from the Air Police Force, six heavily armed planes. The Wolf opens fire and is answered by a volley from the Tropical. The Air Squadron arrives and the gangsters at last surrender. The wedding of Violet and Don Carlos is celebrated on the high seas and the young pair find peace and happiness in Porto Rico.

THE ROAD TO LOVE

Iva Marks Drama File No. 10814

IT is with the belief that her Southern father will soon forgive her for her elopement with Roy Manning, a Northerner, that Clara gets married. However, her father is irreconilable, and the little bride goes North with her husband and finds a small furnished cottage at the edge of the town. There for a while they live happily until Roy's employer becomes very interested in one of his inventions and Roy spends his nights at the office. Left alone to brood, Clara writes letter after letter to her father but they are all returned to her unopened, and Roy becomes thoroughly annoyed at seeing her sadness. One morning Roy goes off without kissing her and Clara, unable to endure the thought that he is angry at her, dresses in her prettiest clothes and calling a taxi, goes down to meet Roy at his office. To her utter dismay she sees him step out of the roadster of a beautiful girl. It is five in the morning before Roy comes home and then it is to ask for a divorce. Aghast, Clara tries to plead her love for him but they are interrupted by the ringing of the bell and at the door is a telegraph messenger with the message that Clara's father has died with her name on his lips. Clara returns South and remains inconsolable for many months. She pays no heed to the surprisingly large inheritance her father has willed her until a neighbor pities her, and learning the whole story of how Clara has loved and lost Roy, Mrs. Hill suggests that Clara give herself into the hands of competent beauticians and win back Roy. A month later, curled and gowned, Clara sweeps back to the small town, and takes a beautiful apartment. Roy stares at her incredulously but Clara pretends that now it is she who wants the divorce to marry someone else. Refusing all Roy's attempts to make a date with her, Clara's heart sings at the success of her scheme. She even wins the friendship of Mr. Ware, father of Roy's Helen. One day, the pretty shallow Helen surprises Clara with the intensity with which she asks if Clara really loves Roy. And as Helen explains that Roy has been trying in vain to see Clara to arrange about the divorce, Clara realizes she has been living in a Fool's Paradise. Bitterly unhappy, she arranges for a divorce and returns to the South. Days drag by. One day near the lake she discovers a man who has attempted suicide. Through her efforts he is saved, and she offers him a position as overseer on her estate. Until she hears Dick's story she thinks she is the most unhappy person in the world, but Dick had been a practicing physician, who had performed an illegal operation to save a girl from disgrace. The girl had died and Dick had been imprisoned. At last released, he had come South and after a vain search for work had ended up as Clara had found him. Time passes. Clara and Dick fall deeply in love and he applies for a doctor's license again so they can be married. One day Roy comes back, pale, suffering, to tell that he knew now he loved Clara, but Clara realizes her old love for him is dead. And two weeks later, Dick returns bringing his license with him; and in the little Church where her father and mother were married thirty years before, Clara is married to Richard.

FROM HEAVEN TO HELL

Mrs. John Merrill Drama File No. 10771

IT was at the dance given in honor of her engagement to Henry Grey, that Janet had met for the first time Stephen Ford. "Dear," Henry had said, "I want you to meet a man whom I respect and honor." Stephen had laughed a little at the solemnity of Henry's introduction, but as his eyes bent to Janet's, and lingered, drawn magnetically, the words etched into his memory. In the days before Janet was to marry Henry, Stephen was to fall deeply in love with his friend's fiancee, and Janet, held close to Henry's wildly beating heart, shivered a little as Henry murmured, "I love you so, dearest, that I'm terrified that something will take you from me." And, knowing Henry's need of her, his trust of them both, Janet had turned a little when at length Stephen had, unable to keep the words back longer told her of his love. Because Stephen had money, friends, everything, Janet felt he could go on without her, while Henry would be broken if she left him now. So Janet had come to Henry, and as his lips pressed adoringly to hers, she pledged herself to make this good man happy. With Janet at his side, Henry rose to the position of Superintendent of Schools, and highly respected in his community, murmured each night he was happier than any mortal had a right to be. His only fear was that some day, somehow he might lose Janet, and whenever other men looked on her, a chill gripped his heart. Despite Janet's pleas that he was spending too much money, Henry lavished gifts and clothes upon her, anticipating her slightest desires, dreading the hours when she should want something he couldn't give her, when she might want another man. . . . Then had come financial difficulties, and Henry, against all Janet's advice and pleading had invested in the stock market. To gain her respect, he came home each night with wild stories of how much he was winning. Then one night he came in with dragging feet. Concerned, Janet hovered over him, begged him to rest, urged him to give up this money madness and remove to humbler surroundings, but Henry only stared at her blankly. Thereafter he was a changed man, irritable, slovenly, and Janet begged him to tell her what was wrong. One day, rising early, he kissed her goodbye. Later they phoned that Henry's body had been found——a suicide. Only when the insurance company had declared that no insurance would be paid for a suicide did the crowning blow fall. For it was discovered that for several months Henry had been misappropriating school funds to use in his losing speculations. Penniless, cast violently out of that Heaven in which she had been residing, Janet pledged herself to pay back all the thousands, but as she sought for work and saw the children's unhappy faces, her heart contracted within her. Then Stephen had come, offering employment to Janet. And while Janet found peace in the knowledge that she was little by little paying off Henry's debts, Stephen waited, understanding that Time heals all, and that some day he might have the right to tell Janet again of his love.

ROSE OF SHARON

Hannah Hemphill Coleman Drama File No. 10786

DAUGHTER of an evangelist, the earliest impressions Rose retains are of the public confessions of sins in the little Church of which her father is preacher. The piety of her home is genuine and the children are early taught to speak in Biblical quotations. Until she is twelve she never knows that there is a life different from the secluded one they live in the Blue Ridge mountains. Then a hotel is built several miles away. Rose's mother supplies it with butter and eggs and one day the proprietor asks if one of the girls cannot come to act as maid for a guest. Only after long debate do the Walshes agree to send Rose, but when she returns she is forbidden to wear any of the lovely clothes that have been given her as a gift.

The following year a new management takes over the hotel and when one of the waitresses becomes ill, Rose is sent for as a substitute. For the first time, in conversation with the other waitresses and looking on at the guests, Rose really begins to live. However, while she is waiting on the guests of Philip Lane, a wealthy bachelor, one of the tipsy guests attempts to embrace Rose and she flees trembling. Philip follows to apologize, and as he realizes the utter innocence of this girl, he is touched. After his guests have gone, Philip asks Rose to serve him regularly, and amused by her quaint lapses into biblical quotation, he encourages her to continue talking thus. At last he too quotes from the Book, but his lines come always from the Song of Songs, and Rose replies faintly, "Get thee behind me, Satan." Both laugh and soon Philip falls in love with Rose. One day as she is running down for a swim, he kisses her and asks her to marry him and, trembling, for no man before has ever kissed her, Rose accepts.

Delighted with Rose's purity and utter lack of worldliness Philip takes Rose into his own world. Surrounded by gay sophisticates, given luxuries and comforts beyond her wildest dreams, Rose feels lost, but when she begs her husband to take her back to her own people, he laughs. Soon Philip tires of the Bible, and gives Rose Confucius, Voltaire, and Rabelais to read. She feels all her props tottering, and of all Philip's friends only his young cousin Paul, young and idealistic, understands the bewildered girl. It is he to whom she can come with her troubles and before she realizes what is happening, Paul is making love to her. Once his arms tighten about her, and long after he has gone Rose stares unhappily into the darkness. Paul goes away and in time Rose's baby is born. Philip is delighted, having given up hope of ever having a child of her own, but when the baby is a few days old, he is taken deathly ill. Rose's father, summoned for the christening, prays long at the child's side, but Rose, unable to restrain herself, remembers the scenes of her youth and with streaming eyes confesses before all her sin. Philip is stunned, and for a moment is silent. Then turning to the doctor he explains his wife is over-strained and hysterical. As Rose lays her head on Philip's shoulder and his arms go about her protectively, the nurse says, "The baby is dead." But Philip's arm tightens and Rose knows the peace of forgiveness.

THE BETTER MAN

Howard H. Giltner Drama File No. 10745

AT medical school Paul Von Donhur, a German student is obsessed with the idea that he can increase the size of any individual through a glandular operation. Arnold Monroe, his friend looks over Paul's experiments with interest, but upon graduation he goes back to England to practice and Paul stays on intent on completing his work upon this theory. At last Paul secures a subject and performs the operation. For several weeks he watches the nineteen year old Hugh Jamison for signs of change, but is forced to concede at length that his work has had no effect.

Several months later all England is aroused by a series of attacks upon women and children. According to the accounts of the hysterical victims, the assailant is a huge, stoop shouldered man. The police arrest a hermit and the aroused populace moves upon the prison with the intention of lynching the unfortunate man. However, Dr. Arnold, who is himself a brother of one of the girls badly frightened by the embrace of the maniac, refuses to believe the hermit is guilty and holds back the lynching party. Determined to investigate before the trial, Arnold questions Julia Westmore, the latest victim, and finds her the most coherent of the girls. Julia reports that the huge man encircled her in his arms but aside from frightening her, did her no harm. In the course of his investigations Arnold sends several telegrams to Germany and receives one in return. He sends for two detectives and watches the servants' quarters of the Westmore home. Soon the gardener, a tall stoop shouldered young man steals out, followed closely by Arnold and the two detectives. Suddenly there is heard the cry of a child, and the three stalkers rush forward in time to see the tall gardener holding and trying to reassure a terrified, screaming child. The gardener turns dazed eyes upon the three men who quickly overpower him and lead him off to jail.

Excitement runs high as the case is brought to court. The high position of the victims lends interest and as the evidence is produced, the young gardener looks in astonishment at the hostile faces of the jury and spectators. Then Arnold mounts the stand. To the amazement of the court he pleads for the release of the madman and as a low murmur of disapproval sweeps the court, testifies that some time ago a German doctor had experimented upon one Hugh Jamison. The experiment had apparently produced no effect, but after Hugh's return to England, he began to grow rapidly. An injury to his vertebrate sustained while at school had, as a result of the sudden rapid growth, pressed upon Hugh's spinal cord and produced a temporary insanity. His love for children and respect for young women with whom he had always been timid before, had changed under this pressure to a dangerous abnormality. However, Arnold had operated on the man's spine and relieved the pressure. The state, Arnold pleads, would be committing a grave crime if it demanded this man's life. His only offense had been to unwittingly frighten his victims and public hysteria had made him appear a fiend. Dr. Donhur, arrives from Germany, elated over the success of his experiment, and willing to do anything to secure the release of the boy, and the court finally discharges the prisoner. Arnold eventually marries Julia, and their most faithful servant is the grateful Hugh Jamison, now entirely normal.

LOVE'S CHAIN

George G. Freeman Drama File No. 10792

BECAUSE she is uncertain of her love for Tommie, and because she wants more of life than to live always in the isolation of the mountains, Opal refuses Tommie's proposal of marriage, and goes to Chicago. There she finds life not so easy as she had imagined. For weeks she is unable to find a position, but at last she is employed. Her luck seems to turn for she meets Raymond Jackson, a visitor from Los Angeles. Raymond is immediately attracted to Opal and decides upon a plan to break down her resistance to him. One morning he comes up in his car just as Opal is leaving her boarding house, and Opal accepts his invitation to ride down with him. However, Raymond purposely stalls his car in traffic and when Opal comes in late, she is fired and told that other girls will be glad enough to have her position these days. Brokenly she returns home. When Raymond hears of her plight, he pretends to be aghast and insists that it was his fault. He assures her that he can find another for her, and writing a friend Robert, at home, makes arrangements to pay Opal's salary. After a few days of unsuccessful job hunting, Opal agrees to take the position in Los Angeles. Meanwhile her letters to Tommie have overflowed with enthusiasm for city life and the educational advantages of travel. More and more hurt, Tommie finally rebels when she writes pages about the kindness of Raymond and when at last he warns her against the fellow, Opal writes back a sarcastic letter and their correspondence ends. Almost immediately, Tommie is overcome with remorse and at last decides to give up everything, come to Chicago and study electrical engineering, and so be near Opal. However, when he arrives he finds she has gone on to Los Angeles with Raymond.

Meanwhile in Los Angeles, Robert laughs at Raymond for all his trouble to get one girl. Shortly after, Raymond takes Opal in his car, and in his usual ruthless fashion runs the battered Ford of a sailor off the road. Opal protests, but soon Raymond is to stop in a deserted place and pull her into his arms. Fighting off his strong arms, Opal calls for help but he assures her no one can hear her and no one knows she has come with him so she'd better yield. The sailor, hearing her outcries, comes up, enjoys himself beating Raymond up, and takes Opal back. When she sobs out her story, the sailor urges her to return home, and impulsively writes to Tommie urging him to marry Opal who loves him. Opal returns home where for the first time she learns of Tommie's trip to Chicago. Meanwhile, Raymond, mercilessly taunted by Robert for having lost the girl after all his planning, decides that he will not let Opal escape. On the road, coming home, Tommie's car is passed by Raymond's powerfully motored limousine. Raymond tries to force Opal to come with him, but Tommie, arriving, begins a long and fierce fight with Raymond and finally leaves Opal's disturber outstretched upon the ground. That evening Opal walks to the brook where first she and Tommie had been so happy. To her surprise Tommie is waiting there and as she hesitates, his arms open to her and with a little cry she comes into them.

LOVERS AT MIDNIGHT

Edna L. Yaeger Drama File No. 10751

TO Janice Brian's grasping, selfish mother, the news that Gary Hale was heir to a large fortune acted as a spur. Cajolery, threats, stormy scenes and crocodile tears were her weapons to force Janice into marriage, and Gary, at first wary, soon capitulated. Shortly after the engagement, Mrs. Brian saw Gary lunching with Jil Davies, blonde and ultra-sophisticated, but biting her lip, the mother hurried Janice out before her daughter should suspect the return of her fiance to a notorious armour, and Janice, assured by Gary that Jil meant nothing to him, now, and that he had not seen her since his first meeting with Janice, went on with the marriage. For a while, under Janice's earnest efforts to make a success of her husband, Gary began working seriously. Dick Stafford, Gary's old friend, invited to dinner, complimented Janice on her reforms and exclaimed that he had never seen Gary being so useful and seeming to enjoy it so. Even Gary's father who had long despaired of ever developing Gary into anything but a wastrel, approved of his daughter-in-law's successes and when a son was born to Janice, Gary's father beamed with pride. As for Janice's mother, she borrowed large sums of money and intimated that when Gary's father died, Janice wouldn't have to worry about finances. Exhausted, Janice closed her eyes after her mother's departure, but not long afterward, Gary's folks were lost at sea while cruising about the world, and Gary came into his father's money. To Janice's relief, Gary seemed to work harder than ever, and when she came to his office to call for him and learned he was out, she commented happily to Dick about how wonderfully Gary was taking command of the business. Dick changed the subject rapidly, and remained silent when Janice, disturbed by his actions tried to question him. Only when Gary reeled in one night drunk, waving Jil's chiffon handkerchief, and reciting mechanically his tale of a director's meeting, did Janice begin to suspect. Dismayed, she began to see the truth. Thereafter, she was to see Gary with Jil frequently, was to wince at the gossip that always began as she passed, and Dick, knowing now he loved his friend's wife, suffered for her. Only when Janice's mother appeared to wheedle more money, and informed her daughter that she should wink at Gary's affair, did Janice realizes how callous her mother was. That night when Gary came in reeking of liquor, Janice evaded his clumsy embrace and told him she was getting a separation. Gary waved his hand wildly in a gesture of resignation and Janice moved out with her baby. In a cottage near the seashore, she remained, visted at long intervals by Dick who found it more and more difficult ot keep from telling of his love. Meanwhile Jil, having spent Gary's money extravagantly, introduced him to a new gambling club where Gary in a short time lost his fortune and Jil received a handsome percentage. Broke, Gary maudlinly asserted, "I have you, anyhow." But Jil burlesqued his drunkness and indifferently advised him to go back to his wife. "My wife," mumbled Gary thickly and draining a bottle of gin, he speeded through the night to the cottage where Dick was waiting outside with Janice and the doctor assured the anxious mother that her baby had safely passed the pneumonia crisis. Melodramatically Gary entered, and to Janice's horror fired point blank at Dick and as everything grew blurred before his eyes, ran, unhindered to his car. In the morning Gary's body was found beneath the twisted wreckage of his car, while Janice bent over Dick's and smoothed his forehead gently, reassured by the doctor that Dick would be good as new in a few days.

DETECTIVE BUREAU

Rosario Rapisand Drama File No. 10805

THE whole town is scandalized by the recent daring robberies. Jerry Dugan, young detective enters a door marked Detective Bureau and as the big hoss asks, "Any luck?" Jerry replies he thinks he's on the right trail now. The boss looks pleased and assigns Jerry to the task of guarding the Singer jewels to-night at their big party. "O. K." Jerry asserts and strolls out nonchalantly. Again he goes to the speakeasy where he belives the gang hangs out. At a booth, Tony Laslo is giving his benchman, Squint instructions "Get another guy," he says, "for this job. Don't let him suspect." Some minutes later, Jerry almost chokes on his cocktail as Squint, with an attempt at subtlety asks him how he'd like to pick up a few dollars and proceeds to inform Jerry all he has to do is crash the Singer party with him, to-night. Jerry solemnly accepts the money to hire a dress suit and promises to meet Squint at seven. Meanwhile he decides to stroll down to the Singer mansion and get an idea of the layout. On the way he sees a girl struggling over a flat tire. He offers his assistance and after some moments has the car fixed as good as new. Suddenly she starts laughing and taking out her compact mirror shows Jerry the smudge on his nose. With her small handkerchief she removes it and they laugh together. However, Jerry gasps when she invites him to a party to-night and tells him her name is Doris Singer. Jerry is not so sure this isn't going to be the most interesting job he has ever handled.

That night Jerry is assigned the task of keeping Doris occupied until the time of the robbery. He watches Squint and sees that everything is all right, meanwhile having such a good time, he overlooks the fact that he is here to watch the jewels. However, Mrs. Singer discovers they are missing and in her excitement she comes upon Doris and Jerry. Doris introduces them and at the name Mrs. Singer starts violently and asks, "Aren't you the young man from the detective bureau?" Learning that through his negligence the jewels have been carried off, Jerry seeks out Squint and finds him agreeably plastered. Shaking him he asks what about the jewels, and Squint informs him Tony has escaped with them. Squint, realizing the game is up, exits, and Jerry, forcibly detained by the infuriated Mrs. Singer, dashes out of her grasp and taking Mr. Singer's car pursues Squint. Squint, as he expects, proceeds directly to Tony's hideout and finds him about to decamp with the loot. He demands his share and Tony calmly plugs him through the heart. Jerry bursts in and Tony's next shot hits Jerry in the left arm. As Tony is escaping, Jerry shoots and drops to the floor. Wounded, Tony falls twenty floors to the street, while the Singers following their "stolen" car find their way to the room where Jerry is lying on the floor. Doris rushes to him. The Singers recover their jewels. Jerry is promoted, and as his most precious reward wins the heart of the lovely Doris Singer.

SECRETS OF WOMEN

Carrie Chambers Drama File No. 10703

AS a child, Mary dreamed of becoming a nurse when she grew older, practicing her profession upon dolls, injured animals and playmates, who filled her "hospital." When he mother was taken ill, during Mary's tenth year, this game became a reality. Hurrying home from school, the child cared tenderly for her mother, managing the household as well, with only the occasional help of a married sister. After a lingering illness, Mary's mother summoned her daughter to her bedside, counselling her that she would soon be alone in the world. She must always shun the company of people whose ideals were not high as her own, do her best in all things, and trust in God. Leaving her eleven thousand dollars, to be spent for educational purposes, Mary's mother died. With tears in her eyes, the little girl returned to the house, after the funeral, feeling that she had lost her only friend. Mary's father moved to the home of his elder daughter, and it became the younger girl's duty to care for her little nieces and nephews. Violating the trust placed in him, Mary's father invested her money, at the suggestion of unscrupulous friends, losing it. Unhappy and unwanted in this environment, Mary accepted a position in the home of neighbors when only fourteen. Three years later, she met Harvey Jackson, a personable young man who wished to marry her, but as he drank and gambled frequently, Mary remembered her mother's counsel and refused him.

While helping a cousin who owned a boarding house, Mary became acquainted with James Chambers, a railroad foreman, and later married him. Wishing to change his employment James secured work on a ranch, and it was here that May, their first child, was born. Securing a similar position on the farm owned by a Mr. Harlow, James selected a home for his little family, and in the years that followed, seven healthy children were born to them. Ignoring the hard work, Mary managed the household competently, finding true joy in meeting the demands of her boys and girls. In order to supplement the family income, she raised poultry, selling eggs at a small profit. Although ill herself, she capably nursed the two little girls during sickness. Mary's first deep sorrow came when one of them, in spite of her expert care, did not recover. Her mother's heart torn with grief, she hid her sorrow for the sake of her other children. Unable to care for them during her illness, Mary engaged the services of Blanche as housekeeper, believing her to be her friend. To her horror and shame, Mary discovered that James had given Blanche the four hundred dollars she had so carefully saved from the sale of of the poultry. As James was unwilling to provide for Mary and the children, she was forced to take a position as housekeeper at Scarsdale, boarding the younger members of her brood with a family at White Plains

War! and Mary saw the boys she had loved so dearly go overseas. Almost frantic with worry, she carried on, for the sake of the three younger children who still remained with her. Gradually, they all married and moved away, except for one daughter, who died the following year. Not wishing to be a burden on her ohildren, Mary assured them that she was happy with their father, to whom she had returned, but in reality she faced life alone, her money gone her health broken. After James' death, Mary discovered that her children had sent her money which he had taken. When her daughter, Mildred, welcomed her into her home, and her sons flocked to her, well deserved happiness at last came to this brave mother.

TWILIGHT RANGE

Richard Wong Short Subject File No. 10557

AS twilight creeps over the West, it silhouettes a little cabin in the hills. Within, the light cast by the hearth fire illumines a man writing a letter. As the embers glow fainter and fainter, he holds the letter lightly to his lips and sighs.

It is morning. The rising sun gilds the figure of a man holding a plow. The horses follow the furrows and the man's voice is raised in collegiate songs, reminiscent of his student days and the girl he left behind. The hours fly. The morning passes into afternoon and John, wearied of his plowing, seeks the shelter of a large shady tree. His eyes close and sleep overtakes him. Once again he sees the campus, and his Mary coming out of the college building. He runs to her and arm in arm they saunter down the college lane. From his pocket, John takes forth a letter from his father telling him the ranch is in dire straits and John's help is needed. Mary clings to John as he bids her farewell and with wet eyes she agrees to come to him as soon as he is able to send for her. In his dream John can see again the weary months of hard labor before the ranch has yielded profits. He can see the wrinkles ironed from the forehead of his father, and his mother's anxious look giving away to contented smiles. Then comes the day when the mortgage on the ranch is at last lifted and the letter is dispatched sending for Mary. Through his sleep, John can hear the insistent honking of an automobile horn. It is no dream. Mary is coming. Jumping to his feet, John runs to meet her. As she steps from the car, John's arms go about her eagerly, and his mother and father come forward to greet their son's future wife. The cowboys unsaddle their horses and supper is served. Twilight is now descending about the prairie and John and Mary linger by the side of a rippling brook. Nearby the cowboys light a little camp fire. A guitar is struck and while the voices ring in the songs of the range, Mary and John linger in the dusk. At last they return to the house. Stepping over the threshold, they see Mr. and Mrs. Alden asleep near the fire, and tip toeing to a large arm chair, Mary nestles into John's waiting arms. Quietly they listen to the songs of the cowboys growing softer and softer in the distance. The night breezes sigh with the music, Mr. and Mrs. Alden see the lovers together before the fire, and the old man's arms tightens about his wife's beloved shoulders. The guitar and voices drift away. The fire slowly fades out, and the dusk fades before the coming night. So through the years shall these two find rest from the cares of the day as their parents have done before them, for theirs is a heritage of love and contentment with the simple things of life.

MARRIAGE OF CONVENIENCE

M. Maude Harrison Drama File No. 10783

ONE of the thousands of screen struck girls who every year come to Hollywood in the hope that their beauty will win stardom for them, Madge soon learns the despair of the jobless. Day after day she makes her hopeless round of the studios, until one day an assistant director calls her out of line and exclaims, "A dead ringer for the Duane woman!" So Madge finds herself stand-in for Carre Duane, the famous star, and although she never appears on the screen, at least she is assured of a salary. Then one day Riley Baird, the director, notices her. The svelte lines of the girl's body and her lovely young face appeal to him. As she leaves the set he corners her and Madge turns frightened eyes to his eager ones. "I can." he says, "further your career, if you are a wise girl" Suddenly Carre Duane sweeps by and her voice rings with contempt as she sees what Baird is proposing. Hastily he squares himself with the tempermental star, and with her head aching, Madge returns to her own room. The next day, however, she shivers as Carre's green eyes fix icily on her. Twice Carre finds objections to Madge's work, and finally she demands a better stand-in. "You're fired," Madge hears and as she walks slowly off the set, she sees Riley Baird beside her. On a scrap of paper he writes his telephone and address and with a significant glance tells her he will be waiting for her. Madge hurries out, but in the days that follow she is unable to find work any where and at last, utterly discouraged, she calls Baird's home, and his man servant promises to have a car waiting at the station for her. With her hat pulled down low, Madge boards the train and on the windy station a chaffeur greets her and shows her the way to the car. Only when she is inside does she learns that he thinks that she is Carre Duane, and has been expecting her. From his talk, Madge learns that one Rob Lewis, Duane's fiance, has been gravely injured in a crash, and that he has been calling constantly for Carre who has refused to come even when told that it is a matter of life and death. Realizing that the disappointment of not having Carre come may cause the death of the young man, Madge decides to act as Carre. Her presence causes the wildly tossing Rob to relax happily, and tightly holding, "Carre's" hand, Rob begs, "Marry me now." Madge hesitates but as the doctor whispers, "It's the only way to save his life," she agrees. When Rob's family discover Madge is an imposter, they turn her out, and remembering where she was going, Madge proceeds on to Baird's home, only to find him with Carre Duane. Blindly, she runs away. But when she reaches the station she is overtaken by Rob's chauffeur who pleads with her to come back, that Rob has been calling for her. Through the days that follow, Madge remains on, pretending to the stricken Rob that she is Carre. Then the newspapers headline the sensational marriage of the real Carre Duane and her director, Riley Baird. When Rob is well enough, Madge tells him she is an imposter, but holding fast to her hand he whispers, "I know. But I love you and I was afraid you'd go away if I said anything," And as their lips meet, Carre is forever forgotten.

TRANS-ATLANTIC LINER

H. G. Meskus Drama File No. 10646

EMPLOYED as a shipping clerk with the firm of Messrs. De Moya, Hijo and Company, young Jim Simms is eager to make good on his first job. Francine De Moya, daughter of the senior member of his firm, is a further incentive for his desire to advance in his trade, and he eagerly approaches the captains of the various sailing vessels, enthusiatically soliciting their trade, and later relating his experiences to Francine, who smiles with favor on this ambitious young man. As many of the sailors are from foreign ports, Jim becomes conversant in several languages, and is well liked wherever he goes for his friendly, aggresive manner. When a new liner named the Albaro docks at Sanchez, Jim goes to the cabin of the captain, and is informed that he must wait, as that gentleman is dressing. Annoyed at his intrusion, the captain orders sailors to throw the young man out, and lock the door on him. As he is on the deck, the pilot approaches Jim, and says that the Albaro should be moved closer to short; seeing the captain, Jim relays this information to him, and he loses control of his temper when he discovers that a mere shipping clerk is giving him suggestions on methods of docking his vessel. Later, the captain of the Albaro is required to apply at the American Consulate for a bill of health, and since this position is temporarily held by Jim, the two meet again, much to the former's annoyance. Again, while applying for a bill from the Dutch Consulate, the Captain encounters Jim, who is substituting in that post, and, in a fit of temper, cancels his business with Jim's firm.

As a result of this, Jim loses his position, and Francine announces her engagement to a banker's son, in spite of the fact that Jim tells her he loves her, and will some day be in a position to care for her. Discouraged and heartbroken, Jim wanders about the waterfront, in search of work, but feeling that nothing matters. Louise Derricks is swimming one day when she overestimates the distance from shore, and becoming tired, calls for help. Plunging into the bay, Jim rescues her, at peril of his own life, as the tide is treacherous, and later takes the girl to her home. He refuses a reward, but accepts a position with another shipping firm which the girl is able to secure for him through friends. He calls at her home, and once more feels that there is reason for him to make good. Working diligently at his profession, and tactfully avoiding the mistakes of the past, Jim rapidly wins promotion; as he is walking through the park with Louise he asks her to marry him. The girls accepts, but says that as her uncle, the Rev. James, is very ill in a town a few miles away, the ceremony cannot be performed at once, much as she wishes to become his wife. A few days later, Louise informs Jim that her uncle has died, and she must go to his home for the funeral. Tenderly, he consoles her, and tells her he will await her return anxiously.

While she is gone, a steamer docks, and as Jim is soliciting trade aboard, a woman asks him to carry a message to Louise. Unwittingly, he informs the woman that Louise is a friend and has gone to attend the funeral of her uncle; upon hearing this the woman collapses. Jim learns, too late, that the woman is the widow of Louise's uncle, and that the news of her husband's death had been kept from her as she is in delicate health, and it was feared the shock might prove fatal. However, a few days later, the Rev. Mears, her friend, calls upon Jim and tells him that his blunt recital of this news proved a kindness, since the shook was lessened, as she was able to attend her husband's funeral in time, and prevent an unscrupulous lawyer from cheating her out of part of her estate. His apprehensions gone, Jim turns to Louise, whose love has proved enduring through trial.

THE ADORABLE ROGUE

Salie W. Brandt Drama File No. 10706

AS a graduation present, Dixie Emerson is given a trip to the Britsh Isles, accompanied by her mother and sister, Mary Louise. Waving farewell to her friends, the southern girl sails away on the S. S. Chicago, exclaiming happily that her dearest wish has always been to visit these romantic shores, since reading Walter Scott's immortal stories, as a very young girl. John Clark, a linen manufacturer from Dublin and James Dumfries, engaged in a similar business in Glasgow, watch Dixie and Louise as they play shuffle board, wagering among themselves as to what part of the states the girls are from. When Dixie uses the expression "over yonder," John wins, as he had decided she was a southerner, and this incident serves as an introduction. In the days that follow, the four play deck games and dance together. It is an open secret that John has fallen in love with Dixie, and on the night before he is to leave the boat at Queenstown, the two steal away together on the upper deck, watching the stars as they are reflected in the calm blue of the ocean. John steals a few kisses, while Dixie laughingly protests, but does not draw away. Unwilling to ask Dixie to marry him until he is sure he can take care of her, John resolves to wait until his present business venture is concluded, but exacts a promise that she will see him again in London.

Astorm arises and the boat is thrown against the rocks off the coast of Ireland. John and Dixie are rescued in the same life boat, later finding Mrs. Emerson, Mary Louise and James safely landed with other passengers. Acting as an interpreter, John discovers that the Gaellic inhabitants of the barren district will not sell firewood or fuel to the rescued passengers, as there is a scarcity of both. Leaving James, who is tubercular, to take care of the women, John tramps to the nearest town, many miles away. Although unable to obtain supplies, he sends a telegram to James' father, who owns a yacht, asking him to come to their aid. Purchasing a little food from a villager, Dixie unselfishly divides among those present, thus subsisting until the yacht picks them up. In performing his duty as a host, James scarcely leaves John and Dixie alone for a moment. As Dixie is about to retire to her stateroom, James tells her that he loves her and wishes to marry her; in sympathy, Dixie places her arm about him, as she gently replies that she does not care for him in that way. John accidently witnesses this scene, and as he has just heard that his business venture will probably fail, he concludes that Dixie will be happier with James, misinterpreting her affection for him. The next day he leaves without bidding the girl farewell.

After thanking their rescuers, Dixie and her family continue their tour of the historical islands. Eventually they reach Inversnaid. In romantic mood, Dixie steals away to read Wordsworth's poem, Highland Mary written at this beautiful spot in the glen and then, impulsively goes alone, to Rob Roy's cave, ferried across by a small boy. While exploring it, the girl falls from the narrow path onto a soft pile of dirt some thirty feet below. Recoiling in fright when she sees a huge rat, she later decides to make friends with the animal, and follows it to an opening, barred by a stone. Prying away the obstruction, Dixie finds herself free, on a high plateau, overlooking the lake. The rat leads her to a few meager provisions hidden under a brick, and, sharing her meal with the little beast, she anxiously awaits help, kindling a fire with two stones.

After a frantic search for her sister, impulsively, Mary Louise writes to both James and John, who come at once. Remembering that Dixie was reading Rob Roy on shipboard, John intuitively, rows to the cave. Following a guide bearing a torch he finds the place from which she fell, and, tracing it, at last discovers the girl lying upon the ground, unconscious. Anxiously, he takes her in his arms, and his heart beats wildly when she murmurs: "John, I love you." Shortly after this, James appears, and, with difficulty John descends the steep incline, carrying Dixie. Restored to her family, and fast regaining health, Dixie explains the whole situation. His business venture a success, John asks Dixie to marry him, and when she consents, James offers his best wishes, leaving these two to find their happiness in the romantic Inversnaid country of Bonnie Scotland.

HONEYMOON INN

Catherine Weinhold Drama File No. 10782

JANE, the cook, laughs when pretty Mary Lee, maid in the Lord household, blushes, as the older woman teasingly remarks that Spencer, the son of the house, cannot take his eyes away from the girl. As she is hastening to change her uniform, Mary Lee slips on the polished floor, and is caught in Spencer's strong arms. When she murmurs, "Thank you, sir," he exacts a promise that she will call him Spencer in the future. During the evening meal, Mary Lee's hand trembles a little as she passes the cream to Spencer, who smiles at her; Naomi, a guest, and Clarabelle, Spencer's step mother, notice this bit of by play with an angry tightening of the lips, but make no comment. Lowering her shade at night, Mary Lee observes Spencer watching her, as he stands in the garden. Stella, Spencer's only sister, regards Mary Lee as a personal friend; when she discovers that her brother, who usually avoids women, is attracted to this cultured but impoverished girl, she arranges for Mary to accompany them to the beach. Spencer's closest friend, Tony, accompanies the trio, and a happy days is spent in swimming, riding the merry go round and other youthful pleasures. As they are returning, the boys announce that they have purchased tickets for the theatre; after the girls change into attractive evening dresses at the hotel, the four make their way up Broadway. Naomi and Sammy Long, who is infatuated with Stella, observe them.

At the suggestion of Mr. Lord, Spencer drives to his stable in the country to inspect one of his fine horses, Spencer, accompanied by Mary Lee. While returning, Spencer drives to a log cabin, tastefully furnished, which he has purchased in order to have a little time alone with Mary Lee, and she is delighted with the place. Socially ambitious for her children, Clarabelle invites Sammy Long to tea, hoping to promote a romance between him and Stella, but as the girl hates this worthless scion of a prominent family she visits Mabel, a friend in a neighboring city, when she learns of her mother's plans through Mary Lee. Spencer and Tony entertain Mr. Lord with a speedy ride in a motor boat. Wandering alone in the garden, Mary Lee is confronted with Spencer who has been searching for her. When he takes her in his arms and kisses her passionately, she returns his embrace, then breaks away, saying that she can never be his, since their positions in life are too far apart. Spencer reassures her that she is the only girl in the world for him, and will be welcomed by all his family save Clarabelle. They resolve to keep the engagement a secret until Spencer returns from a short business trip. The next morning he leaves by airplane with Tony.

Immediately upon his return, Spencer presents Mary Lee to his father as his fiancee. The elder Mr. Lord is delighted that his son is to marry this fine girl, and presents her to a group of his friends at dinner. Small, engraved cards, attached to white ribbons, are opened at the conclusion of the meal, announcing the happy event; all join in congratulations save Mrs. Lord and Naomi, who leave the room. The next morning Mrs. Lord announces that Mary Lee has attempted to poison her when bringing her a cup of hot milk, but Tony and Spencer see Clarabelle place the poison vial in Mary Lee's room, and they remove it. Police discovers that Mrs. Lord had planted a copperhead snake in the girl's bed, and when she faints at the table they realize she had been drugged, but for Spencer's sake, Mary Lee will not file charges. Dressed in white, she becomes Spencer's bride at a quiet ceremony, and leaves with him for a cabin in the mountains. Fearing that her step mother will force her to marry Sammy, Stella joins them accompanied by Tony. The four spend happy days "roughing it" in the pine woods until Stella is summoned to return so that Clarabelle may announce her engagement. Tony asks Stella to elope with him instead, saying he has always loved her, but could not give her many material advantages. Accepting joyfully, another bride and groom take up their residence in the next cabin. The four nickname the place "Honeymoon Inn," as happiness begins for them in this peaceful spot.

SINNERS' REPENTANCE

Elmer G. Pitts Drama File No. 10793

"THE money-to-burn-boy," that's what they called Jack Gordon, son of the noted financier. Never having earned a dollar of his own, Jack spent money wildly and got himself into a succession of scrapes, until his father at last disowned him. Whereupon, with twenty-five hundred dollars left to his name, Jack proceeded unconcernedly to get drunk. In a disreputable night club, he ordered drinks and smiled fatuously as a girl was brought to him. Bobby looked at him pityingly and sat down. "Have a drink," he hiccoughed, then after several moments he leaned over confidentially and assured her if she stuck close to him he'd make it worth her while. As he waved his billfold, Bobby sharply snapped, "Put that money away before someone sees it." For hours Jack drank steadily while Bobby tried in vain to get him to stop. At the next table one of the girls was quarreling with a patron. Suddenly the lights went out and a shot was fired. In the excitement, Bobby half dragged Jack from the place and when he opened his eyes and groaned from the effects of his drinking, he saw Bobby looking concernedly down at him. "What happened?" he asked. She handed him the morning's newspaper with the account of the shooting. Since everybody offered air tight alibis except one girl known as Bobby who disappeared shortly after the shorting, the police were searching for her. "But why did you go?" Jack asked, and as he realized she had involved herself to help him escape without having his family name mentioned in the sordid affair, Jack called for another drink. At length he suggested since he wasn't wanted in town, and she had no better place to go, that they travel together. However, when Jack continued to drink steadily and pity himself in spite of all Bobby's efforts to stop him, she told him one morning she was leaving. In amazement, he told her she couldn't go, but she showed him a newspaper stating that the wounded man had recovered sufficiently to clear Bobby of any connection with the shooting. Realizing she was walking out of his life, Jack begged her to stay on—as his wife. Startled, Bobby asked if he meant that in spite of knowing where he had found her, and Jack assured her that he did. Finally it was with the promise that Jack would earnestly try to get a job and hold it, that Bobby agreed to stay on. Months passed, months during which Jack realized that one could actually enjoy hard work. As he returned home one day to the hot supper Bobby had prepared he reminded her that he had asked her to marry him. For the first time then, Bobby told him who she was. She had been Mary Turner, daughter of the well known judge. Believing she had fallen in love, she had eloped with a man who later proved he never intended to marry her. Mary had run away from him, but hunger had driven her to the place where Jack had found her. And when at last Mr. and Mrs. Jack returned to their families, the two wanderers were received with rejoicing, and from their parents who believed they had eloped together, they kept forever the knowledge of that sordid chapter in their pasts.

THE WAY OF LOVE

Juanita P. McDermott Drama File No. 10780

EIGHTEEN, lovely, Elizabeth Lee reared on a cotton plantation in Georgia which has been the home of Lees for generations is adored by everyone. Among her admirers is Charles Dunlap, a young law student. At the invitation of her very wealthy cousin Eloise, Elizabeth goes to New York and gets her first taste of smart social life. She meets an Englismman, Sir John Martin Sills, some fourteen years older than she. Sills is captivated by her extreme innocence and joie de vivre, and sweeps her off her feet. Soon they are married and go to England to live. They have a London town house, and a charming country estate. Although Elizabeth is somewhat dazzled by the whirl of gay life, she adapts herself readily to it and is admired by several of her husband's friends, among them his cousin, Ronald.

The World War comes on. Ronald leaves for the front and Sills becomes very active diplomatically. It is a strange new existence for Elizabeth with her husband gone for weeks at a time. Ronald returns for a brief visit, having been shell shocked. Shortly after, Elizabeth is to be horrified one night by finding her husband lying dead upon the floor. Evidence is found in the house to indicate that he was a spy and that he had committed suicide when threatened with detection. Elizabeth refuses to believe that the fine, sensitive man whom she admired so deeply could ever betray his country, but when she discovers that her own life is in danger and that she is suspected of having been in collusion with Sills, she is forced to flee. Unwilling to return to her own people under the shadow of being followed, she takes work in a hospital as a nurse. There she meets Dr. Harry Young and falls deeply in love with him. He promises to marry her, and in the hysteria of war time she yields to his importunities, only to discover that he has never intended to keep his promise and that she is just an episode to him. The shock almost unnerves her, but as her days are filled with nursing and everywhere she sees young people maimed and bruised by life she remembers her mother's belief that all things are for the best. When the war ends, she adopts a war orphan who has captured her heart, and with the little one returns to her home in Georgia. Back home, she gives herself unstintingly to community affairs and for several years lives a life of quiet humanitarianism. Then the Depression sets in. Cotton prices drop. Banks fail. Her father is on the verge of losing the plantation, her doctor brother grows poorer and kinder, and her older brother is found dead shot in exactly the same position as Sills. The effect on Elizabeth is disastrous. Only when her husband's shell shocked cousin Ronald turn up, his obsequiousness rapidly turning to threats, does Elizabeth realize that the war has turned Ronald into an insane man, and that Ronald has been responsible for the deaths of her husband and brother. And at last it is Charles Dunlap, now a prominent attorney who rescues Elizabeth from the insane passion of Ronald who kills himself rather than go to an insane asylum. Moreover, it is with Charlie Dunlap who has loved her through all the years, that Elizabeth is at last to find peace and happiness.

THE SHRINE

Clinton Strong Melodrama File No. 10784

GUESTS of Mrs. Gretchen Schelper, Arthur Grayson, a young novelist, and Jim Trent, an artist, stroll off the spacious grounds of her ranch in the southwest, observing colorful strings of pepper hung against grey adobe walls, and reflecting upon the primitive customs of the district. Inadvertently, they come upon Raymond, the son of the house, embracing Juanita, the beautiful daughter of one of the Mexican servants; Arthur is amazed when Jim tells him that these two are soon to be wed, with the full consent of Mrs. Schelper. In explaining the situation, Jim conducts his friend to a broken down adobe hut; inside, they discover a shrine, with a beautiful figure of the Madonna and Child, softly lighted with candles. After leaving the sanctified spot, Jim relates the story of the shrine to Arthur.

Years ago, the adobe hut contained two rooms and was used as a tool shed. Here Juan, husband of old Manuelita, who now takes care of the shrine, jealousy guarded his lawn mower and other tools. When he discovered that some of them had been stolen, he reported the matter to Otto Schelper, Gretchen's husband. The hot headed German took the law into his own hands, and instead of repairing the lock on the hut, placed a gun inside, in such a position that anyone opening the door would discharge it. Robberies ceased, but one stormy night, Senora Ramona Lucero and her infant son, not knowing of the arrangement, sought shelter. Ramona was fatally wounded, and Mrs. Schelper found her, at the point of death, as she was returning to the ranch house.

Overcome with grief, Otto protested that he did not believe the gun was really loaded, as he had only spread this story to frighten the peons. After a long and mysterious conversation with Juan, Otto promised to adopt the infant son of Ramona, Raymond, bringing him up as his own. Charges against him were not pressed, but Otto was forced to spend a number of years in prison as the result of having accidently caused the death of Senora Lucero. At first, Gretchen's pride rebelled against caring for the son of her servants, but as she was childless, little Raymond soon came to fill an important place in her heart, especially as he grew into a handsome and intelligent lad. In accordance with Juan's demands, the old tool shed was converted into a shrine, carefully watched over by Ramona's mother, but avoided by everyone except Raymond. Here one day he discovered Juanita, timidly peering in the door, and their love first came to life at this altar. Fearing his mother's disapproval, Raymond avoided confessing this, but when at last he faced her with the truth, he was delighted at her unexpected consent, and she, in turn, felt that their love had solved an ancient injury.

At the conclusion of this story, Arthur says that it is amazing that Raymond believes himself to be Otto's son, after all these years, except for the fact that he closely resembles the old German in temperment, brilliance and appearance. Smiling cryptically as he lights his cigarette, Jim replies: "There is no mystery, for of course, he is Otto Schelper's son——" which explains everything.

FOREIGN DIPLOMAT

Gilberta H. Snow Drama File No. 10823

THREE hours after Ned Wagner becomes engaged to Kathleen Summers he receives an appointment to go to China to superintend some mining operations there. Bravely Kathleen waves to him as his ship pulls out and he promises to return in four months to make her his bride. The voyage is dreary without Kathleen but arriving in Pekin, Ned is immediately taken in hand by Gladys Peterson, the beautiful daughter of the American Consul. At the dinner table she chatters happily, delighted at seeing so personable a fellow countryman. However, when her pursuit of him becomes painfully obvious, Ned manages to inform her that he is engaged to a girl at home. Gladys surveys her slim body in her tall mirror that night and decides Ned is worth fighting for.

Meanwhile Ned waits for his ricksha to take him to his temporary residence. Chang, a Chinaman half crazed by opium and drink and suspicious of all foreigners, had eavesdropped on the dinner conversation, and realizing that Ned was interested in mining the moutain sacred to the Honorable Spirits of his ancestors, wields a heavy club and strikes Ned on the back of the head. Thinking he has killed Ned, Chang flees. Ned's body is found outside the Peterson residence and carried in. A doctor examines him and diagnoses temporary blindness caused by a blood clot on the brain. Gladys loses no opportunity to care for Ned, reading to him and walking with him in the garden. Following the news of the accident Kathleen writes a heartbroken letter pleading with him to come home at once so they can be married and she can care for him. However, Gladys, reading it aloud pretends that it is a regretful release from the engagement. Hurt, Ned dictates cooler letters to Kathleen and when, three months later the blood clot is absorbed and vision returns, Ned decides to try to put the faithless Kathleen out of his life. Gladys is beautiful, eager, and at length he promises to marry her. An hour before the wedding, he finds himself holding Kathleen's old letters tight, but Gladys phones to remind him there is only one more hour and then they will belong to each other.

Then an aged servant of the Legation who has grown very fond of Ned, appears and begs Ned to take his ricksha instead of the one waiting. To his surprise Ned finds himself literally abducted. The ricksha speeds off in the direction of the train, pushing hurriedly down the narrow winding streets and market places and arriving just before the train pulls out. Ned protests that Gladys is waiting at the Legation but John Fu urges him to get aboard then tells Ned that to-day a telegram had come to him and Gladys had torn it up. John had managed to get a copy from the telegraph office and found it was from Kathleen saying she was arriving in Shanghai to-morrow morning, convinced that John's coolness is a result of his blindness. Also, John gives Ned a package of letters which his son had taken from Miss Peterson's waste basket, to help him study English. Realizing for the first time how nearly he has lost Kathleen, Ned grows white with anger, then begins chuckling. And when Kathleen arrives, Ned is at the boat to meet her, and so they are married—by the Captain.

RED HEAD

Lou Errion Drama File No. 10819

J. S. MILLS whistled appreciatively as Mrs. Dustin approached him in his realty office and explained she wished to rent a home in Craggsville. Each place he showed the comely widow failed to meet with her approval until, as a last resort, he took her to the place opposite grouchy old man Winters. Immediately she voiced her enthusiasm and leased it for herself and her son and daughter. Mill's eyes popped as he looked upon the widow's shining golden hair and all Craggsville began to notice that since the coming of the widow, bachelor Mills began taking greater care of his appearance. Meanwhile, speculation was rife about how long it would take cranky old Winters to drive the Dustins away as he had their predecessors. A few days later, Winters shouted with rage as he beheld a red headed young fellow in his garden. Lem calmly explained that the Winter's plums were delicious and offered to pay for those he had eaten. Winters' fury turned him apoplectic.

The next day Lem struck up a friendship with one of the village lads and while playing ball, pitched it through old man Winters' basement window. Against the dire warnings of the other fellows, Lem Dustin climbed into the basement to search for the ball, and fifteen minutes later emerged—without it. The next day when Winters discovered the broken window, his wrath rocked the countryside. He issued a warning that any trespassers on his propetry would be torn to pieces by his dogs. Saturday morning Lem Dustin took a trip to Boston to buy a suit. That evening J. S. Mills took Mrs. Dustin, Polly and Lem to a clam bake on the beach. They all had a fine time and by this time everyone knew that J. S. Mills was completely infatuated with the coy widow.

Before dawn the next morning, the town was to rock with excitement. Each window and door of the Winters' house was guarded by uniformed cops. One Jack demanded that old man Winters give himself up. From inside came muttered curses followed by a volley of shots which just missed Jack's red head. Suddenly there was three shots and a low whistle from the rear and at this signal all the guards charged in and captured the badly wounded Winters. Later, while the captors rejoiced, someone asked what happened to the dogs, and the laughing answer came that Jack coaxed them over to his house with a nice juicy steak. Said he did that several times when the old man was gone. Under heavy guard, Winters was transported to a Federal prison to await sentence. When the details were printed in the evening papers, all Craggsville recognized the hero Jack, as their new neighhor Lem Dustin. However, the great shock came when the widow Dustin's picture was printed, and beside it the explanation that "she" was Jimmy Wade, an old college friend of Jack's, who had played the female lead in the varsity show. Polly, it transpired, was Jimmy's sister and Jack's fiancee. But what amazed Craggsville was to learn that old man Winters was a notorious dope smuggler who had used his Craggsville home as a storing place for his contraband. He had had it delivered to him from a plane which had picked up supposed mailbags from a sea going lugger. Jack and Ann were married in Craggsville with Jimmy, as best man. But conspicuously missing among the guests was J. S. Mills who took an extended vacation from town until his wooing of "the widow Dustin" should be completely forgotten.

MEMORY DRIVEN

Annie Penn Proctor Drama File No. 10804

"BUT I love you, Philip," Lydia Crawford was saying," and even after I marry Stanley Parker, we can see each other." Philip stared at her. This was the woman he loved, the woman who was going to marry a dissolute old millionaire. Philip turned and hurried out into the street. He filled his lungs with cool gasps of air. The woman he loved was selling herself to another man.

Throwing up his work, his friends, Philip became a wanderer and for months roved the country trying to escape his own thoughts. At last he landed at the plantation of Colonel Baker and found there in the fragrance of the honeysuckle and magnolia. employment and relief from his own tortured memories Women, Philip hated. And when he was to be thrown more and more frequently in the company of Millie Baker, the vivacious and lovely daughter of Colonel Baker, it was with some dim desire to hurt someone as Lydia had hurt him, that Philip encouraged that softness that came into her eyes when he was around. Six months passed. Philip had forgotten Lydia, and his days were filled with the wonder of Millie. Together they made the rounds of the plantation. Together they rode, and Philip's eyes glowed as he saw Millie's superb riding of her spirited horse Silver. They were in the rose arbor when he kissed her. The night seemed close around them and the garden breathed the perfume of many flowers. . . . .

A month later Philip became again the wanderer. 'You'll be coming back, Philip?" Millie pleaded. All women, Philip tried to remind himself were the same. But as he saw her trembling lips and melting eyes, he nodded. "Soon," he promised, and rode away. But soon he realized that he couldn't forget Millie's poignant sweetness. He dared not ask her to share his shattered life now, but he could go back home, pick up his old life where he had left it, and return for Millie. The day he came back, Lydia came to see him. Philip felt his body tense then relax as he realized that Lydia had lost her power to hurt him. As she moved close to him and told him what a mistake she had made and how she wanted him, Philip asked her to go. Incredulous of the change in him, she put her arms about his neck, and as he strove to free himself, her husband entered, took in the equivocal situation and fired point blank at Philip, the only one of his wife's long succession of lovers he had been able to catch.

For months Philip toss with fever. In his delirium he cried out for Millie whose life he had ruined, and when at last he had recovered, he proceeded directly South. On the plantation there was the wailing and lamenting of negroes, and beside himself with grief, Philip learned that Millie had been thrown by her horse Silver, and killed. In her little diary which none had ever known of save Philip, he was to find the real reason for her death. The secret she had kept from all lest she dishonor her family and her lover. And Philip again became a wanderer. And the memory of a girl who had died with his child beneath her heart drove him on and on, until he should have crossed the border past which there is no parting.

THE GOLDEN TOUCH

K. Gilmour Coggin Short Subject File No. 10811

IN a faraway land of the long ago lived King Midas, capitalist extraordinary. In the king line he was a real "go-getter" and his oppressed subjects bowed under the weight of his birth tax, infancy tax, income tax, outgo tax, amusement tax, and even sighted at the invention of thumb tacks. But when his soothsayer visioned for him a mighty man of the future whose horseless chariots would outstrip even those of King Midas himself, a man whose coffers overflowed with the profits from these chariots, King Midas became fiercely jealous of the yet unborn Henry Ford, and thereupon set himself to the task of wishing a great wish, so that even this Henry of the future, for all his amassed wealth, could not beat him. Going down to his money vaults, Midas locked all the doors and slowly let his pieces of gold chink through his fingers. Like rivers of sunlight they flowed and, flowed; as he pondered over what wish he could devise that would insure his everlasting insuperability, he looked up to behold a radiant creature before him to do his bidding. "Gold!" cried King Midas, "Gold, everywhere, whatever I touch. Gold!" The stranger's mouth twisted in pity.

When King Midas awoke in the morning it was with a new wisdom. Gold was a matter of touch, he knew now. Many of his subjects, Midas touched for gold. And none dared refuse. Some there were who waxed hard of heart and turned to graven images when they felt the touch of the king upon them. No more rang the throne room with the sound of the harp, the psaltery and the saxaphone, but only the clink of one golden coin upon another made music for the court. No more did the antichamber boom with the deeper problems of the kingdom, now instead there was a sibilant lisping about percents and price on call.

Then behold one day Midas came upon a fair daughter of the realm Her hair held beams of coppery gold more pleasing than any of the coins in the treasure chests of the king. The lady walked in her garden. Midas plucked the rose she had kissed, but a thorn pierced him so cruelly he dropped the rose in the dust where it lay, bruised to a golden yellow. Midas drew the maid to his side and royally claimed her for his bride. Gold, gold, gold, he heaped on her. Gold for her fingers and gold for her hair, until she appeared a gilded statue.

The days hurried by. One day there passed a Knight of the Open Road. Through the gilded casings he beheld the queen; and, plucking a wayside flower, he cast it at her feet. Gaily he sang of the joys of the free, and a quiver passed over the queen. As she raised the flower to her lips, the magic of its touch dissolved the film of gold that enshrouded her, and she passed through the door of the golden palace and out to the Knight of the Open Road. Some say the merry fellow had wings upon his sandals and his hat, and thus he carried her off.

When Midas missed his queen he was taken with a deep melancholy. Even his food seemed like chunks of gold, and he put the court cooks to the torture. Finally, he decided to be rid of his golden touch, and far and wide, he sent for its donor. But the Radiant one was nowhere to be found, and only one gypsy fellow told of peering in to a garden and seeing a lovely lady pelt a merry madcap with rose-leaves. The gypsy fellow thought he saw tiny wings upon the feet of the madcap as he laughed and swung his legs over an apple tree bough; but it may only have been the flitting of butterflies, for the garden was full of them.

EASY MONEY

Martin L. Rust Drama File No. 10858

EVER since she was a child, Selma Parry had rebelled against her father's treatment of her mother. As the years passed, Sam, lamed now by an accident, grew more cruel to his wife and daughter until, one day, Fred McCoy, moonshiner, realized that Selma had grown up into a very personable young lady. When Selma fled from McCoy in loathing, McCoy determined to have her. Accordingly the next time Parry came begging for drink, McCoy amazed him by giving it to him without too many refusals. Gulping the fiery liquid, Parry listened to McCoy's proposition and his eyes burned. That night, staggering in drunk, Parry stated that he had promised to give Selma in marriage to McCoy. The girl cried out and as her father shouted at her, a look of despair came over her face. Outside she could hear the heavy footsteps of McCoy, coming to claim her, and before Parry realized what she was doing, she turned and fled toward the town, seeking shelter with Sheriff Williams and his wife. However, when Selma's mother tried to prevent Parry from following Selma, her husband gave her a mighty blow and as she fell she struck her head against the rough hewn table. McCoy entering, raged as he discovered that Selma had eluded him, but bending to the prostrate form of Mrs. Parry, McCoy realized that her injury would prove fatal. Parry collapsed as he realized that he had killed his wife, but McCoy set about building up a case to free him, and in court swore that Parry was innocent of the murder and that Mrs. Parry had fainted. Through McCoy's sworn testimony, Parry was freed, and Selma wept as she realized her mother's murderer was escaping scot free. Parry demanded that his daughter come home with him, but Selma refused and at the insistence of the kindly Williams remained on to help Mrs. Williams with her work. Many times Parry tried to claim his daughter, but the sheriff warned him of the consequences should he make any further attempts. Then one day Paul Williams returned from college to visit his parents. Surprised to see the beautiful Selma in his home, he soon fell deeply in love with her and the two young people planned to be married.

Meanwhile, McCoy, tired of waiting for Selma, determined to make a last effort to get her. Going over to the wretched Parry, he found him hunched over a table, parched for a drink. Contemptuously McCoy regarded him and as Parry begged him for some whiskey. McCoy promised it on one condition. He would give Parry all he wanted to drink, if Parry killed Paul Williams. At that even Parry hung back, in refusal. But thrusting his face close to the sweating face of the drunken Parry, McCoy reminded him that if Parry refused, the whole story about the death of his wife would come out, and Parry would be lynched in any case. Moreover, he would give Parry five hundred dollars the morning after the murder. Accordingly, well plied with liquor, Parry took out his truck and prepared to drive along the highway toward the Williams' home. However, on the way he crashed and the car hurtled down an embankment, catching fire. Paul and Selma, the first to hurry to the spot, drew out the charred figure of Parry, but McCoy's body was burned beyond aid. Pleading for forgiveness, Parry died soon after, and Paul, taking Selma in his arms, promised to make her forget all but the present and the future.

SIN GIRL

Ida Hignett Drama File No. 10301

WHILE at a dance with Gary, Gloria's eyes meet those of Don Gordon who has just entered. In a moment, Don has cut in on the dance and before he releases her to Gary he has found out who she is and promised to call. On the way home Gary speaks bitterly about that fellow who cut in, but Gloria's eyes are dreamy. In Don's car, Gloria listens happily to his protestations of having fallen in love with her at first sight and within a few months they are married and go to live with Don's aunt, upon whom he is dependent for spending money. From the first the woman takes a dislike to Gloria and does everything she can to disrupt the happiness of the newly-weds. When she tells Don that Gloria is going out with other men, Don stoutly defends Gloria, but in his heart little doubts begin to enter and when at length he and Gloria quarrel, both are miserable for hours. At length Don begs Gloria for forgiveness and as he holds her tightly in his arms and tells her he was a fool for believing lies about her, he promises they will take an apartment of their own. To Don who has been accustomed to the liberal allowance his aunt had given him, the new conditions are unbearable. Gloria cheerfully washes their clothes and prepares dinners, but Don rebels against his small salary in the factory and at last turns to bootlegging for easy money. In vain Gloria pleads with him to give up his illegal business, but Don brings her home jewelry and expensive clothes and proudly asks if they aren't much happier now. But more and more Don's work keeps him out nights, getting new shipments of rum and Gloria's unhappiness grows. Then one day instead of the usual laundryman, Gary comes and after the first shock of surprise Gary explains that he is now running a string of laundries and is taking the place of one of his drivers who has just injured in an accident today. Gary discerns immediately that Gloria isn't happy although she protests that she is, and as he comforts her and wistfully tells her that she is the only woman he has ever loved, tears come to Gloria's eyes. Gary comes again and again, and when Don abruptly leaves for a week trip to arrange about opening a new speakeasy, Gary coming to comfort, remains to plead his love and need of Gloria, and for one night she yields to his pleas.. Realization of what she has done, however, quickly brings remorse and she begs Gary to go. When her baby is born, Gloria is filled with shame as she sees Don's excitement over the child and as he tells her how much he has always wanted a baby, Gloria, seeing only too clearly the child's resemblance to Gary, confesses the child is not Don's. Gloria cowers under his vituperation, but when she pleads she loves only Don, he rushes from the house demanding to know what her kind of woman can know of love and saying his aunt was right all along.

The weeks that follow are a nightmare to Gloria. But when Don recklessly refuses to pay for any further protection, claiming he's not afraid of anyone, his former associates blow up his speakeasy and Don is gravely injured. Gloria runs to him aid through anxious days nurses him back to health, and as he opens his eyes he reaches out to her and tells her weakly they'll start all over again—from scratch.

TROUBLE'S BORDER

Ralph C. Haywood Mystery File No. 9741

IN the early days of the California gold rush, Ronald Wilkes, and his wife, lured by the hope of finding great riches, journeyed westward, making friends, en route with John Blackwell, a shrewd young prospector. In Arizona, Mrs. Wilkes learned that she was to be a mother, and too weary to go further, the couple settled there, staking a claim, and building a modest dwelling. A few days after the birth of Juanita, Ronald, still hoping to find gold, struck a rich vein in the eastern part of his land, and deciding to hide his discovery from his claim-jumping neighbors, he returned to the small study of his home. Cautioning his wife not to admit anyone, he closeted himself in his study, writing the location of the ore in the family enoyclopedia under X. Unknown to Ronald a stranger watched him intently through the window, and seeing Ronald return the book to the shelves, he slipped through the window, struck Ronald a fatal blow and fled without the book, for the noise had awakened the household.

Twenty years later, Juanita Wilkes, a capable young woman, knowing nothing of the gold on her father's property, was sole owner of the Diamond W ranch, famous for its fine cattle. Although two decades had passed, Juanita still anxious to discover her father's murderer, confided her hope to Jimmy Cornell, her new foreman and his assistant Kerby Moran. The Diamond W. was often visited by John Blackwell, who had just returned from a long stay in California. Although liked by the Wilkes, Jimmy and Kerby distrusted his suave manners.

A week after Blackwell's reappearance, Kerby, tossing restlessly in his bed at midnight, heard noises in the house, and traced them to the library where he grappled with a tall figure. The two men rolled out into the hall, and when the intruder shot Kerby and eluded capture, Jimmy found Kerby dying, his last words being, "I found him in the library. He——." His voice trailed away, and Jimmy resolved to avenge his friend's death. Several days later, Juanita, superintending the construction of an additional wing to the house, broke through her father's bedroom wall, to discover an old diary, naming the part of the land containing gold, and stating that more specific details were in the X volume of the encyclopedia. When Jimmy, to whom she had revealed her discovery, found that the volume was missing, he understood why Kerby's murderer had gone to the library. Suspecting Blackwell, who was over anxious to buy the ranch, he devised a scheme whereby Juanita, inviting Blackwell to her home, told him tearfully, that because of financial difficulties, she would have to sell part of the ranch. Blackwell, unsuspecting, generously offered to buy the eastern seotion of Diamond W. Jimmy, who with the sheriff had been listening in the next room, knew that Blackwell was Kerby's murderer, for only the stranger who had stolen the book from the library, would have known the location of the gold. Trapped, Blackwell, refused to admit his guilt, but when Jimmy found in Blackwell's room the book and the gun that killed Kerby, he was sentenced for life, and broke down and confessed the murder of Ronald Wilkes. A month later, the Diamond W. mine was opened, under the joint ownership of Juanita and Jimmy Cornell.

THE KENTUCKY HOME

Perry D. Plain Drama File No. 10074

IN the late summer of 1880, Colonel John Blakeman is preparing to accompany his twin sons, John and Jerry, to Boston where they will enter law school. His wife, Sarah, and their adopted daughter, Beth, decide to leave the Blakeman estate and drive as far as Frankfort, Kentucky, a few hours' journey, with them, when Dick Barry, a close friend of the Blakeman boys and Beth since childhood, calls to see the colonel. He tells him that he and Beth wish to be married, and asks his permission, the colonel is angered that he has not been consulted first, and replies that Beth is too young to marry and that when she does he hopes it will be to his son John. In no case, he adds, will he sanction her marriage to Dick, when he orders away from the plantation. Bidding farewell to the colonel and the boys, Mrs. Blakeman and Beth remain in Frankfort as their train leaves for Boston. Before morning, the train passes over a bridge which has been partially washed away by a recent flood. The first two cars are submerged in the water, before the train can be stopped. Colonel Blakeman and his sons, in the rear car, are uninjured, but Jerry immediately tries to save passengers thrown in the river. As he is standing on one of the partially submerged cars, a piece of timber strikes him, knocking him unconscious. He falls into the river, and before he ean be rescued, is borne away by the swift current of the Ohio. All during the next day, a thorough search is made, to no avail. Jerry floats down the stream, and is picked up by a house-boat party of smugglers, led by Red Girty and Cal Gentry, members of the Dalton gang. He does not remember what has happened or who he is.

Beth receives a note from Dick on her return from Frankfort, and elopes with him that evening; the following day her mother discovers that she has lost both a daughter and a son, as Beth leaves word with a servant that she has gone to Chicago as Dick's wife, and Jerry's accident is described to her when the colonel and John return. She is in a state of collapse, but the doctor tells her that it is possible that Jerry is still alive, as he may have regained consciousness and been picked up. As soon as his mother is out of danger, John goes back to the scene of the accident, and follows the course of the Ohio river in search of his brother. Jerry, meanwhile, is used as a tool by Red and Cal; he is instructed to hold up the paymaster of a coal mine for them, and not realizing what he is doing as he is a victim of aphasia, he complies, turning the money over to Red. The gang then leave for Chicago, taking Jerry. John is identified as the robber and convicted, although he tells the jury he is only here to find his twin brother. He is sentenced to four years in prison. When John does not return, Mrs. Blakeman's condition is again critical, and the colonel hires Felix Barrington, a detective, to trace him.

Following her elopement, Beth writes to her father, but her letters are returned unopened. He does not hear of the little daughter that is born to her the next year. She is happy with Dick, until one afternoon when they are driving, a truck crashes into their car and Dick is killed. Beth takes a position as companion to Mrs. Field; one night at a dinner she recognizes Jerry, who has been sent to the Field home by Red to secure a plan of the house. He does not know her when she speaks, but police identify him as a member of Red's gang and arrest him, taking her into custody as they see her talking to him. She tells the whole story of Jerry's disapearance, which coincides with Felix Barrington's report, and the innocence of both Jerry and John is established. John is released from prison, and an operation is performed on Jerry which restores his memory. Colonel Blakeman is persuaded by his wife to forgive Beth and welcome her home with his little grand-daughter. The re-united family plan for the wedding of John and Beth, to which she has consented.

DOUBLE CROSSED

Victor Giacolone Drama File No. 10747

GIOVANNI LORETTO, recently arrived from Italy, secures a position in a steel mill through his cousin, Carlo Brussini. Becoming accustomed to the shorter working hours of the United States, the young Sicilian attends his first dance in New York City; although he is unable to speak a word of English, he is delighted with the young women of this country. Two years later, he asks one of them to marry him, and he receives his first disappointment when she breaks the engagement at the end of six months. While driving home during a storm he picks up pretty Janet O'Brien, and, after a brief courtship, they are married. At her request, they move to another city. Returning home one night, Giovanni hears a man threatening his wife; finding the door bolted he call the police, but before they can break in four shots are heard, and both the man and Janet are found, dead! Heartbroken, Giovanni returns to his cousin, and attempts to forget this tragedy in a round of pleasure. He meets many women, but loves none. As he is planning to visit his parents in Italy, Margaret, one of the girls with whom he has been associated, forces him to marry her, theatening to file charges for a breach of promise suit against him, if he refuses. Two children are born to them during the next seven years. When Margaret neglects her duties, Giovanni strikes her, and is sentenced to a short term in jail. At last he consents to serve a sentence of one year for brutality, in order to secure a divorce, for the sake of his children. In remorse, Margaret kills herself and the children; Giovanni is freed.

Now thoroughly disillusioned, he finds employment in a shoe factory, avoiding all women. When Rose, daughter of the factory owner, becomes attracted to him, he does not respond. Her fiance John Londo, and the girl's father, who are business partners, give Giovanni a sum of money to leave the city, but Rose follows him. "Where is your daughter?" John asks. Advising the girl to return to John, Giovanni writes to him, telling him of her visit. Shortly after this he is arrested for the murder of one George Standon, whom he has never seen before. Although protesting his innocence, he is convicted and sentenced to death by electrocution, since his finger prints correspond with those found on the door of Mr. Standon's room, at the time of the murder. His parents write to him, heartbroken over this turn of affairs, but he is helpless to comfort them. While awaiting his doom, Giovanni is visited by Rose, who tells him that she has engaged a new attorney, Mr. Edward, for him, and will do all in her power to aid him, certain that the man she loves has been double crossed. When Mr. Edward asks Giovanni if he would marry Rose if he were free he refuses at first, feeling that she is the cause of this present disgrace, and women are to blame for all his unhappiness. Then he realizes he must forgive Rose, and appreciates her devotion.

Returning to the factory, Rose agrees to become John's bride, but, bursting into tears on their wedding night asks him to help her release Giovanni. He then confesses that he "framed" Giovanni, stealing his door knob and placing it on George Standon's room, first forcing him to touch it also. Then intending only to wound Mr. Standon so that Giovanni would be sentenced and Rose would forget him, he shot and killed him. John arranges to forge this confession, so that another man will be sentenced, while both he and Giovanni are free, but Rose repeats this to the district attorney the next day, revealing that she is not John's wife, since she had married Giovanni the previous week. John is convicted and Giovanni released, free at last to enjoy his happiness with a loyal and loving wife.

THE DEATH PENALTY

Edgar Willis MacDonald Drama File No. 10810

SEVEN years after Larry Wye has captured the gang responsible for the theft of the priceless Diamond Crescent, and has married Lola, the heiress to whom it had belonged, he sits behind the managing editor's desk on the Missouri Journal. The door opens and Lola enters with Larry Junior who flings himself into his proud father's arms. Lola reports Junior's latest bright saying and they both laugh. The phone rings and Larry is reminded that the board of directors is waiting for him. With a hasty kiss to Lola and the youngster, Larry dashes off.

Meanwhile in the prison shoe shop, the three Diamond Crescent thieves, Bert, Joe, and Bill are anticipating their release on parole. A week later, in a massive old house in the country, old man Hainy, ex-convict is reading aloud from a newspaper about the release of the Diamond Crescent gang. In the attic, his housekeeper, the weazened, witch-like Molly is hobbling about on a cane. Suddenly she hears stealthy footsteps, and calling out sharply, she takes a gun out of her pocket and fires. There is a scrambling down the stairs and three breathless men dash into Hainy's room and ask what the Devil the shooting is for. Hainy takes one look at them and bursts out into a roar of laughter, as he calls out to Molly to put her shooting aside, and come down and meet the boys. Shortly afterwards, the newspapers all over the country run extras about the kidnapping of a well known banker. Larry Wye begins agitating for the death penalty for kidnappers and arranges a hearing with the governor.

It is three in the morning. Three men slip into the Wye residence and emerge carrying a bundle. The chauffeur, awakened by the noise of an automobile pulling away, arouses the household and it is discovered that the Wye baby has been stolen. Larry comforts his distracted wife and a wide police drag net is spread. Meanwhile, Larry sees the governor and with an eloquence born of his own agony convinces the executive to extend capital punishment to kidnappers. Meanwhile, Lola mechanically dresses herself, but when she reaches into her powder box she discovers a note from the kidnappers giving her directions to bring the Diamond Crescent to them and, if she tells no one, her baby will be delivered to her unharmed. Beside herself with anxiety, Lola decides to carry out her instructions. However, her maid, distressed by Lola's illy concealed excitement phones Larry that she is worried about what Lola may do to herself. Larry dashes down and sees her car turn up a lane. Suspecting why she may come here, Larry gets the police to accompany him, and while Lola is delivering up the crescent, the police drive around and completely block the return of the kidnappers. The suddenly flashed on bright lights and gun play dazzles the criminals who are easily captured. Larry returns home to his wife and baby, and the kidnappers are given the death penalty.

And in the Wye home a touching scene is enacted, as Lola wears the diamond crescent on her evening dress, and together she and Larry tiptoe into the baby's room to kiss their little one goodnight.

THE VOW

Erich H. Kusche Drama File No. 10649

WHEN all loyal sons of the Fatherland answered the call to war, little Erich and Elsie were left alone with their mother in a small village near Berlin. In order to support her babies, their mother was forced to leave them alone all day, and returning home at night, often found them playing war. Elsie tied securely to the bed post, while Erich gloated over his captured soldier. Restoring order to the house, Elsie's mother realized that some harm might come to the children if left to their own resources, and took them to the home of their grandmother, on a tiny farm. One day, word was received that their father had given his life for his country; unwilling longer to impose upon the slender resources of the aged grandmother, and the children's mother wrote to the government for aid in caring for them. A few days later, a beautiful car was driven to the farm, and the occupants, a young married couple of excellent position and character, informed the mother that they had been told of her need, and wished to adopt one of the children, preferably the boy. When she told them that she could not part with him, they agreed to take the little girl, and drove away with her, while her mother assured Erich that his sister would be given the best of care, and quieted his tears, while holding back her own.

Erich's mother cared for three small children, whose own mother had died, receiving recompense from their father at the front; later, she became his wife. In spite of his step father's kind treatment, Erich longed for his own father, and dreamed continually of his baby sister. However, the boy's mother told him that she had given her word she would never attempt to trace Elsie. When Erich's mother was dying some years later she asked her son to find Elsie, regardless of the vow, and see that she was well cared for, which he promised to do. Shortly after the mother was laid to rest, Erich sought his grandmother, who gave him a picture of the baby sister, and informed him that she had been adopted by a family in Alt-Wesser in the Silesian Mountains. Securing employment as a salesman for a perfume company, Erich gained entrance into the house where Elsie had been adopted, and upon suggesting that the daughter of the house might be interested in his wares, was told that she had married and gone to America to live. Professing interest in the country, Erich was shown postal cards of Elsie's home, near San Francisco, and in this way discovered her address, memorizing it silently. Although in love with Trina, Erich told her that he could not marry until he had found his sister, and with Fred, a friend and member of his athletic club, sailed for America.

After many weary months of search, Erich despaired of finding his sister, since her address had been stolen with his suitcase. Fred returned to Germany. One day Erich saw a car on fire, and saved the occupant, a young woman. Gratefully, her husband's relatives took him to her home, and there he saw the picture of his baby sister. Elsie! Upon questioning, Erich discovered that his search was ended, but agreed not to reveal this to Elsie, since she knew nothing of her adoption, and the shock might prove detrimental in her weakened condition, caused by the accident. Happy in the knowledge that his sister was well situated, Erich returned to his sweetheart, feeling that he had fulfilled his vow, and, someday, Elsie would know.

THE SINISTER WATCH

J. Harold Behymer Drama File No. 10691

WHILE dining at the home of Leonard Parker, a young scientist who has recently returned from an expedition in South America, Eve Standish and her father listen breathlessly to his accounts of the many poisonous reptiles which have almost caused his death. As they are enjoying coffee, he shows them pictures of this deadly serpents, and later displays a giant rattlesnake which he keeps in captivity in his apartment. Repelled, yet fascinated, Eve watches the sinuous movements of the snake, as Leonard tells her that the poison from his bite would mean almost instant death. Jestingly, Mr. Standish remarks that almost as much danger lurks in the heart of a big city since gangsters have come into power. As he is the owner of a large jewelry store he lives in constant danger of being robbed, since most of the others in his business have recently suffered that experience. A master burglar has relieved them of many of their most valuable gems, in spite of protection afforded by detectives and electrical devices. Receiving a commission to start on another expedition, Leonard asks Eve to accompany him, as his wife, and she replies, laughing, that if he can guarantee to protect a valuable collection of diamonds which her father is exhibiting, she will consider him capable of caring for her in the wilds or South America.

Accepting the bet, Leonard secretly prepares to win his reward. With Mr. Standish, the young couple view the collection of exquisite stones, and agree that when they can be removed from the vaults. the following day, it will be a welcome relief from responsibility. Eve and Leonard part early that evening, in order that he may carry out his plans, while Mr. Standish attends a banquet of the jewelers' convention. Discovering that she has left the keys to the apartment in the store, Eve hastens back. Just as she is recovering them, she feels a strong hand firmly grasping her by the throat, and the sweetish odor of choloform blots out consciousness. When she awakens, Eve sees a light darting amidst the gloom of the jewelry store. With an involuntary cry, she gives herself away, and the light flashes on her. Joe Spette, master safe cracker, glares at the girl focused in the ray of his flashlight, and approaches her with a blackjack, preparing to strike a fatal blow, and commanding her not to make a sound if she values her life. When he is only a few feet away, he feels a sharp, stinging pain just above his right knee, and crumples to the ground. Again focusing the light straight in front of him, Joe sees a hugh rattlesnake, and realizes that he has received its poison in his veins. Eve's cries of terror, as she lies, unable to move, attract the attention of Al Henry, a policeman. Seeing the jimmied second story window through which Joe entered the jewelry store, he follows suit; Joe is about to shoot him when a bullet strikes his own wrist, causing him to drop his gun and collapse.

Lights are turned on, and Leonard, who shot the gun from Joe's hand, hastens to Eve, taking her in his arms. He then confesses that he planted the snake to safeguard her father's jewels, and returned to see how successful his plan had been, little dreaming that Eve would be endangered. Silencing him with a kiss, Eve replies: "You're won, dear," and Joe Spette's body is carried away as the lovers plan their trip.

HE GOES COURTING

Mary E. Bowen Comedy File No. 10582

HAVING come to the age of thirty, Joshua Crane, a country lad decides that it behooves him to secure a wife. For many years he has been fed on a steady diet of Western stories, and in his innocence he believes he can go about getting a wife in a rip snorting manner. However, his first adventure with an awkward country maiden, one Minty Dowell comes to an abrupt end when Josh, wooing her in a gallant manner is suddenly surprised by Minty's powerful father. The young hero is unceremoniously attacked with a spade and escaping, Josh runs into a billy goat who tosses the lanky lad to the top of a hog shed. The enraged sow, thereupon snaps the seat of Josh's over-alls and for several days the lad rests, albeit uncomfortably.

Recuperated, Josh once more looks about and chooses Millie one of the twins daughters of neighbor Homer Stone. Millie's sister Nellie, however, takes mischievous delight in impersonating her twin to the confusion of the ardent young suitor. At last, however, Josh asks Millie's hand in marriage, and happily ventures to town where he purchases a second hand flivver and with no end of difficulty manages to learn the fundamentals of driving. On the way to town he meets Nellie and invites her in. Thinking she is Millie, however, he tries to induce her to elope and when she refuses, makes violent love to her, forgetting to look where he is steering. The car drives up a telephone pole and the scandalized Millie refuses to have anything further to do with her sister's attacker.

Josh, to forget, goes west. On the ranch he finds the cowboys interested in a matrimonial sheet, and unable to resist, answers the ad of one Jessie Cowl. However, Jessie's jealous sweetheart hears her describing how she is to dress so that Josh can recognize her, and he bribes a colored girl to appear in Jessie's outfit. Dismayed by the hearty greeting by the lady of color, Josh hops right back on the train. On the way home, he stops at a farm house and falls desperately in love with a red headed widow who has a two year old son. Following a whirlwind courtship, Josh drives her into the city. However the youngster delays them and they arrive after the city hall is closed. Retiring to separate hotels they plan to meet next morning. However, during the night Josh's trousers are stolen and grabbing a sheet he races down the street shouting, "Stop thief!" A kindly policeman lends Josh a pair of pants many sizes too large and Josh leaves his bride for a moment to fetch a minister. On the way he sees a little pickaninny wearing his stolen pants, and forgetting his errand gives chase. Meanwhile his fiancee becomes uneasy and accompanied by her Maid of Honor goes out to look for her errant Josh. She sees him dodging into an alley and believing he is trying to elude her calls the police. The chase is on with the negro lad in the lead. Josh catches him stripping off the stolen pants. He reaches a revolving door at the same instant as his fiancee and around and around they go. At last the police arrive and take the whole party to the police station where explanations are made. The police summon a minister and the now reconciled couple are united in the bonds of holy matrimony.

THE GREATER LOVE

Mary Rizzo Drama File No. 10417

WHEN Helen Baker's friend, Marion, is killed in a train wreck Helen adopts Constance, Marion's baby daughter, as a companion for her own little son, Joe, who is almost three. Wishing to make the child feel that this is her home, Helen and Jimmy, her husband, decide not to tell Constance that she is adopted, and bring her up as a sister to Joe. The little boy watches over the baby tenderly, and, as she grows older, gives all his choicest toys to this little sister. In the evening, Jimmy joins Helen in a romp with the youngsters, and tells them stories before the lights are extinguished in the nursey. Their happiness is complete until Jimmy is presented to Rose at a party which Helen does not attend as she is caring for Constance during a brief illness. Fascinated by this beautiful woman, whose sophistication and urbanity are so unlike his wife's naivete and natural charm, Jimmy finds himself strangely attracted, and when Rose returns his emotion, he yields to her magnetism. She persuades him that he needs the stimulus of city life and that his present domesticity is dulling his mind. At last he goes to Helen, confessing frankly the situation, but feeling that this is only infatuation, she refuses to grant him a divorce. For the first time in his life he quarrels with her, but she refuses to continue the discussion, and makes no reply to his unkind remarks. Finally Jimmy yields to Rose's pleas to accompany her to New York, but, unable to leave the son he loves so deeply, takes the child with him while Helen is sleeping. She searches desperately for Joe, but is unable to find any trace of him, and at last goes to her mother's home in a distant city, leaving word that all communications from Jimmy must be forwarded to her at once. Rose is unkind to the little boy and soon tires of Jimmy, leaving them both. The repentant husband writes to his wife, pleading with her to give him another chance, but Helen's mother destoys the letter before her daughter sees it, feeling that both Jimmy and his son will only oause the young wife further unhappiness. Eventually both Jimmy and Helen believe that they will never meet again; she finds her only solace in Constance, who grows into a beautiful girl. Wishing to atone in every possible way for the wrong he has done his son, Jimmy works hard to provide for his son's education, but the boy often speaks of his mother and sister, wistfully.

When Constance is eighteen, Helen sends her to an eastern university to complete her education. Here she meets Joe, at a fraternity dance and the two fall in love. Inviting him to visit at their summer camp, Constance presents the boy to her mother, a month later. Helen at once feels a surge of emotion, and when she questions the boy, tells him that he is her own son. Wiring to his father to come at once, the story is told to the two young people when Jimmy arrives, but Joe cannot believe that Constance is his own sister. When Helen tells him that she is adopted, he takes her in his arms, and wins the permission of both parents to marry her, after graduation. Constance and Joe plead with their parents to become reconciled, and as each confesses that the other is the only one in the world, Helen and Jimmy thank their children for again bringing them together.

TYRANT FATE

Thomas J. Troxell Drama File No. 10733

WITH tears in his eyes, three year old Frank kisses Marie, his sister, two years his senior, a sad farewell, and she is taken away from the state orphanage by the family who have just filed papers for her adoption. Lonely and miserable, Frank dreams of the time when he will be a big boy and can visit Marie, as he sits alone in the yard of the institution. A few years later, he is adopted by a family living on a small farm; the owner, Sam is a brutal, domineering individual who swears at the little boy if he fails to perform a task with a skill his youthful hands cannot command. Bill, the owner's brother, drinks heavily and likewise attempts to dominate the boy. Four sisters, two married and two single, also make their home at this bleak farmhouse, but they are too occupied with household and field duties to give the youngster the affection he is starving for, although Betty, the youngest, is kind to him. As he grows older, Frank exchanges letters with his sister, and both plan for the day when they can once more be together. At last, when he is sixteen, Frank saves a little money earned from chores he has performed for neighbors, and boards a train for Chester, Pennsylvania, where his sister is employed as a factory worker in a clothing mill, leaving a note saying that he will not return. Joyfully, he embraces Marie, but his eyes cloud with sorrow when he learns that she is forced to give all her earnings to her foster parents, who treat her unkindly. Frank resolves to return to the community where he has lived and secure employment on the farm of some friendly neighbors, in order that he may send for his sister.

As he is again boarding the train to return it starts into motion while he is standing on the steps, throwing him against the high depot. Wedged helpless between the steps and entrance of the depot, Frank is suddenly released and thrown involuntarily to the ground, prostrate. As the oncoming train approaches him he feels a burning pain, and loses consciousness. When next he opens his eyes, he finds himself in the emergency hospital, his spine broken in two places, cutting into his side, his right arm completely cut off by the wheels of the train, and the muscles of his lower limbs atrophied. In addition, he has received severe internal injuries, causing agonizing pain. As the accident is clearly the fault of the railroad company, they offer to pay eight hundred dollars in damages, which Frank refuses, but as he is a minor, Bill is appointed as his guardian. Little interested in the boy's welfare, and prevailed upon by his attorney, Bill accepts this small recompense, keeping it for himself, and refusing to pay for a brace which Frank orders to help his spinal trouble. Long, weary days pass while Frank lies a charity patient at the hospital; the only bright spot in his existence is the letters he receives from Marie, and the money she sends from her earnings to pay for his brace Bravely, he does not mention his suffering to her. At length these oheerful messages stop, and Frank learns that the only true friend he has ever had in the world is dead; he is not able to be present to bid her a last farewell. After Betty's death, Bill mistreats Frank and turns him out of his home.

Overcome with bitterness, Frank longs to die, but in reading a newspaper is attracted by an advertisement, inviting all those who are lonely to join a Pen Club for shut-ins. Impulsively, he sends in his name, and forms many pleasant contacts. A cultured and charming widow, Ethel, corresponds with him, later coming to see him. She encourages him to attempt to use his atrophied muscles, and gradually regains control of them, until he is able to walk with the help of a cane. Through her instigation, Frank opens a line of merchandise which he markets, building up a substantial mail order business in the course of time. Ethel then persuades Frank to try his hand at writing, and he discovers that this gift has been latent in him all these years. But it is not until Frank learns that Ethel returns the great love he has for her that he feels fate has recompensed him for its tyranny. Facing the future bravely, Ethel and Frank plan for the happy day when they will have their own home, a bulwark against the world.

June Wynne Drama File No. 10698

A BLACK cat dashes across the sidewalk as Jean and Ken are on their way to the local motion picture theatre. Drawing his sister back in dismay, he commands her to follow his example, as he walks backward in order to break the spell, but she only laughs at his fears. Later, as the two are watching a technicolor film, "Glorifying the American Girl," Jean notices that Ken's forehead is wrinkled in a frown and his attention is not centered on the screen. "Is it the black cat that's worrying you?" she teases. "That——and business," he confesses. Tenderly, the girls slips her hand into his, and when the film shows a young woman who marries for money, to save her family from need, Jean's eyes grow thoughtful. Attempting to cheer her brother, Jean prepares coffee, and serves it with fluffy angel food cake when the two reach the sanctuary of their apartment. Ken then tells her that all his investments in the stock market have failed; tomorrow he is turning the last of his savings over to Graham Murray, a speculator whom one of his friends has recommended, since funds are needed to meet the mortgage payments on their property in Conneticut. If this business venture fails, they will be penniless, but he feels certain it will be a success, although a black cat has always brought bad luck before. Cheering him, Jean lightly replies that Arthur Grosvenor, a wealthy bachelor, wishes to marry her, and, as she loves him, she has decided to accept. Their conversation is interrupted by a messenger with a telegram. Tearing it open they read that the father of their friend, Edythe Winslow, is dead. Funeral services are to be held tomorrow at the neighboring town of Monett.

Urging her brother to try to sleep, Jean makes plans to catch the early train, the following day. After preparing breakfast, she calls Ken, refreshed as the result of his sleep, while she is tired and wan, having dreamt of Arthur, black cats, and glorified American girls all night. The two hasten to the railroad station when Ken stops to purchase a funeral wreath, while Jean buys the tickets. It is almost time for the train to pull out; desperately, she implores the engineer to wait for her brother, but he cannot. Just as the train leaves, Jean sees Ken, wreath in hand, board it, but is unable to do this herself. She dashes across the tracks to the tourist car, also bound for Monett, and catches her ankle in one of the rails, falling in front of an approaching train. Two strong arms lift her to safety; then all becomes black. Regaining consciousness, Jean finds herself seated beside her rescuer on the tourist car, bound for Monett. She explains the cause of her haste, and encouraged by the friendly interest in his eyes, finds herself telling all her troubles to this kindly, young stranger. When she confides that her brother must be at home in time to close his deal with Graham Murray, the stranger's eyes narrow with conoern, and he asks her to repeat this. Introducing himself as Melvin Taylor, he tells Jean that he has information in which her brother will be interested.

Arriving at Monett, Jean finds the funeral has been delayed on her account. Ken is on the point of leaving, when Melvin discloses that he is a detective, on the trail of Graham Murray for misappropiation of investments. Together, the two men arrest Murray, and Melvin secures a position for Ken. Confessing that she never really loved Arthur, Jean eagerly consents to allow Melvin to call, choosing the black cat as her good luck symbol.

THE SILENT TRAIL

Nick Harvilak Drama File No. 10750

A MAP of Canada spread out before them, Jack and his younger brother, Ed, eagerly pick out the "Silent Trail" which they will soon follow through the northwestern wilderness, having recently won their father's permission to become trappers. After a trip up Canadian rivers, they find themselves in the isolated spot which they have decided upon, and here erect a cabin. Following a winter of hardship and loneliness, colored with adventure, the boys spring their traps, collecting pelts of otter, sable and mink, whioh they sell at the trading post. Two thieves rob them of this hard earned money on the return trip, and they discover that their cabin has been ransacked; their two foxes, which they intended to sell, killed. Upon reading that Red Bones, notorious fur thief, is wanted by the Northwest Mounted Police, the boys resolve to capture him and collect the reward of one thousand dollars, convinced that he is responsible for the loss of their furs. Discovering two abandoned sled dogs, Jack and Ed follow the trail of the robbers, coming upon Cy and Davis, whom they tie seourely, after a battle. With their stolen pelts, they start homeward, passing through the Haunted Valley, where mysterious shots barely miss them, although they see no one. Stopping at a deserted cabin, they discover the bodies of Joscph Barlow and Spade Fortes, murdered years before; a luminous watch is fastened upon the wrist of Spade's skeleton.

A wolf attacks Ed, but a shot from Jack's rifle saves him in the nick of time. Then a pack of wolves ascend, but their leader turns out to be three parts sheep dog, and, going to the men in friendliness, prevents an attack. Later, without their leader, the animals circle close. Firing all their shots, the boys hold them at bay for a time; pursued by one of the animals, Ed flees into the woods, losing the trail. When the wolves at last disperse, Jack, with the dog whom he names Arrow, search for Ed. They come upon Red Bones, whom Jack is forced to kill in self defense. Jack discovers a map in Red Bones' pocket, describing the location of his cache of gold; he also comes upon a skeleton hanging to a tree. When Ed's shots lead Jack to him the two decide to make known their discovery, going to Snow Pack Trading Post. Here they discover Cy washing dishes behind the bar, and by means of a photograph of Red Bones which he owns, identify him as a partner of the dangerous criminal. Mr. Tippey, proprietor of the hotel, rewards them, upon discovering that Cy is responsible for the theft of his safe, but Sergeant Booker of the Northwest Mounted Police, envious of their capture of Red Bones, ridicules them for their youth, discrediting their story. Upon returning once more to their cabin, a mystery man, clad in a red cloak, attempts vainly to take the map away from the boys.

The following summer the boys again go through the Haunted Valley, in search of the gold. Discovering the mystery man in the cabin, they hide in a cave, later overpowering him. He confesses that he was forced to attempt to kill them by Red Bones who captured him when he was attempting to find his lost brother, Charles Spade Fortes. Assuring him of Red Bones' death, and informing him of the sad news of his own brother, Jack and Ed welcome Davis Fortes as a friend. He reveals Mr. Tippey's stolen money to them, and declaring that Red Bones' map was purposely false, offers to conduot them to the gold the following spring. In gratitude, Mr. Tippey promises his daughter, Jeanne, as a reward ,although both boys smile at this jesting offer. Booker follows them when they make the trip, at last securing the gold. Arrow, who has been lost, rejoins the party, saving Booker from wolves, and all emnity is forgotten. Much valuable trapping is accomplished on the return trip. Going without Ed, Jack calls at Mr. Tippey's, where he is presented to Jeanne, and decides to claim his reward, after all, with her permission. First he returns to Ed, saving him from a wolverine. Many perilous encounters with wild life occur before the boys, Jeanne, and Arrow, return to their home, cherishing priceless memories of the Canadian Northwest.

THE UNHOLY MARRIAGE

Medora I. Lake Drama File No. 10821

WHEN Mary's mother cuts her wrist while canning peaches, the entire responsibility of the household falls upon the little girl's shoulders, during Mrs. Truax's convalescense. With pride, she bakes and sweeps, caring for the poultry in her spare moments, and earning the praise of her five brothers and sisters for her capability. Two years later, shortly after her fourteenth birthday, Mary finds employment in a factory, making her home with a married sister. Eager for the pleasure of youth, Mary accepts an invitation of Eugene, a young man from a neighboring farm, to attend the theatre. As they are returning home, the innocent girl yields to his embraces, carried away by the overpowering emotion of first love. When the doctor at the factory, who cares for Mary when she suddenly loses consciousness while at work, tells her that she is soon to become a mother, she confides this fact to Eugene. Reluotantly, he marries her, not sharing her joy in anticipation of the coming child, and when little Robert is at last laid in her arms, Eugene's only comment is that he wishes the baby had never been born. Going to the Orphan's Home, he asks the sister's to adopt the little fellow, although he is able to provide for him, but Mary firmly refuses to permit this. In a fit of temper, Eugene slaps the baby, annoyed by his crying, and strikes Mary when she interferes. From that moment on, her love for her husband is dead, but she carries on the work of the farm, assisting him in the fields whenever necessary.

In order to augment the family income, Mary assists the neighbors with their tasks, but Eugene always collects the money earned in this method, refusing Mary a sufficient sum for her household expenses, and criticizing her for her extravagance, although she economizes in every possible way. His brutality causes the death of other children, whom the young mother hopes for, realizing that Robert needs their companionship. When Robert, her little "Sonny," develops epileptic seizures, inherited from his father, Mary realizes that her marriage cannot be dissolved, for her son's sake. Tenderly, she cares for him during his illnesses, shielding him from his father's anger. As he grows older, the boy is placed in a hospital and training school; here Mary visits him, pleading with Eugene to accompany her, and concealing her unhappiness from the boy. Neighbors, too, believe that the couple are happy, since Eugene assumes a courteous, kindly attitude toward his wife when strangers are present, and Mary's pride will not allow her to make known her sorrow.

Eugene takes a position as caretaker on a farm near Brewster, New York, and Mary soon realizes that he is infatuated with Rose, housekeeper for Mr. Sweet, the bachelor owner of the estate. Arising early one morning to attend to a new allotment of baby chickens, Mary discovers her husband leaving Rose's farm house. In the days that follow, he oftens takes Rose for long rides on Sunday afternoon, neglecting Mary. The day comes when Rose asks Mary to grant her husband a divorce, but both for his own sake and Sonny's, she refuses. Angrily, Eugene threatens to kill Mary, telling her he will poison her food, and chasing her with a razor one evening. Overcome with fear and overwork, she is at the point of nervous breakdown, but conceals her trouble, fearing it may injure Robert's health if he hears of it. When Eugene's leg is broken by the tractor, Mary gently cares for his every need, striving to rekindle his affection, but a casual visit from Rose proves to her the futility of all this, as the two openly make love before her. Mr. Sweet offers his help to Mary, calling frequently and performing little services for the brave wife. Once recovered, Rose and Eugene run away together, but both are killed when their car crashes into another speeding automobile. As Mr. Sweet consoles Mary, he tells her that he loves her, and discovers that she cares for him, although concealing her emotion for Sonny's sake. Safe in his arms, Mary at last receives the happiness which she has denied herself for the sake of her boy.

SMUGGLED FORTUNES

John A. Miller Melodrama File No. 10818

FOUR retired business and professional men are enjoying a game of bridge at their exclusive club when Ted Browning, a younger man, approaches Pete Mayce, one of the group, and formerly a police detective of national renown. In the course of the conversation, Ted, who has recently returned from an extended tour of India and Africa, remarks that Kalvay, an oriental mystic who returned on the boat with him, is now residing in the city. Continuing the conversation as the group dine together at Mayce's home, in company with Julia and Arthur, the son and daughter of the house, Ted states that Kalvay exerts a powerful spell over his clientele, almost putting them in a deep trance, before telling their fortunes. Interested, Mayce and two of his companions decide to call upon Kalvay. Julia going into the garden with Ted, laughingly teases her father, and Ted warns him against the plan, but, ignoring them, he determines to carry it out. The next day, the three companions go to the address given them by Ted. A chinese butler, gaily costumed, receives them and ushers them into the presence of the mystic, in a room draped heavily with dark velvet. Mayce becomes angry when, during the course of the seance, Kalvay informs him that his son will die. As he leaves, he stumbles over the butler, and feels a faint pin prick in his arm. As the three are seated in a restaurant, one of Mayce's companions falls over, deep in slumber, from which they arouse him with the utmost difficulty.

Police officials request Mayce to emerge from his retirement in order to help them apprehend criminals engaged in selling dope, which he consents to do. Ted, recently appointed as a detective, works with Mayce. To his horror, he discovers that Arthur has been seen in company with members of the ring. Confronting him directly with this evidence, Ted asks his friend for an explanation, but is curtly told to mind his own affairs. Deeply concerned, Ted goes to Julia, to whom he has recently become engaged, and endeavors to enlist her assistance, but she indignantly denies that her brother can be involved in such proceedings. When Ted tells her that he may be forced to arrest Arthur, in line of duty, Julia breaks her engagement. Disguised as a habitue of the waterfront, Mayce aimlessly sits by a deserted wharf, accepting a cigarette from a stranger, and entering a restaurant to smoke it. In the next booth, he overhears a conversation regarding opium smuggling, and recognizes, with horror, the voices of Kalvay and his own son! Torn between filial devotion and duty, Mayce becomes a nervous wreck, at last resorting to the cigarettes he secures at the waterfront. Under the influence of drug, he smashes his son's picture, and when the noise awakens Arthur, he shoots the boy, in a fierce struggle. Coming to his senses, he sends for a doctor, but the boy is dead.

Half crazed with grief, Mayce kills Kalvay, searching him out at his lair. During the trail, Ted, who has been called out of town, arrives in time to make known the whole stragic story, and Mayce is acquitted, but a member of the opium ring fatally shoots him as he leaves the court. In dying, he is consoled by the fact that he has rid the city of a menace, as he commends Julia to Ted's care.

THE AFTER YEARS

Louise D. Kohlhof Drama File No. 10742

LONG subservient to his father's autocratic wishes, George Ranger marries the girl of his father's choice and keeps up the pretense of marital contentment until his wife dies in childbirth. Then, when an opportunity presents itself, George leaves for an extended tour to the continent. In a little Swiss chalet, he finds relief from the cares of home and some months pass before he is aware of the melting glances of Leona, a Swiss girl. In her ready understanding, George finds a companionship he has never known before and one day, on an impulse marries her. Soon after the wedding, however, George is called back home by his father's doctor, and realizing the moment is not propitious to bring home his wife, leaves with the promise that he will return shortly. However, his father lingers for a long time between life and death and finally dies, providing in his will that George is to be disinherited if he marries within two years. George secretly telegraphs Leona the circumstances and advises that they keep their marriage secret for that period. However, before many months have passed, he realizes that money or no money, he wants Leona and he goes abroad to get her, only to discover that she has vanished after the birth of her child. George is overcome with remorse but despite all his efforts to find Leona, he is unsuccessful. He returns to the States and devotes himself to the rearing of his child Howard, son of his first marriage. Howard is a likeable but profligate youngster who falls in love with June Wilkinson, an utterly charming young lady.

Meanwhile Leona's son Victor grows up and upon reaching his majority, is informed who his father really is. Leona tells of his father's desertion but admits she never had the full story from him and that perhaps she was a bit hasty in running away with the vow that she would never see him again. Victor becomes desirous of seeing his father and learning the truth, and forthwith embarks for America. He locates his father's house and arrives late one night. Undecided whether or not to make his presence known, he sees a young man drive a long roadster into the garage and come out to the house. Just as the young man is going up the walk, a thug hits him over the head and prepares to rob him. Victor flings himself upon the gunman, disarms him, and the fellow flees. Howard is grateful to him and asks his Samaritan to help him inside, feeling faint from the blow on his head. Thinking rapidly, Victor decides his best opportunity to find out the truth is to pretend to be a stranger. Whereupon, being questioned, he asserts he is out of a job. Howard immediately induces his father to take on the young man as a secretary but complications set in when, for the first time, Victor sees Howard's fiancee, June, and falls in love with her. June, too, is curiously attracted to the young man, and when she dances with Howard, her eyes follow Victor. Feeling he has precipitated an impossible situation, Victor says nothing to June, feeling he has no right to spoil Howard's happiness. Hurt by Victor's silence, June allows plans for the wedding to continue and she bites her lip at sight of Victor's agonized eyes as she leaves with her bridegroom. However, having had too much to drink, Howard wrecks his car before he has gone far. He is instantly killed and June badly hurt. Then, and not until then, Victor reveals his love, and sends for his mother who is reconciled to George, as explanations are made all around.

THE WINDS OF CHANCE

De Angelo Drama File No. 10758

FROM the day Paul Fulton alighted from the Midsville Daily Passenger to practice medicine in his home town, his success was assured. The fairer sex flocked to his office, and Doc had never shown himself to be indifferent to a pretty face from the time he had suffered the throes of puppy love for pig-tailed Ann Parks, sister of his friend Syd. One midsummer afternoon, some years after he had added the cherished M. D. to his name, as he chatted on the porch with Syd Parks and Bill Turner, the conversation turned to the town mystery, the lady who had purchased the hunting lodge on lonely Lake Lubbay, and transformed in into Silver Snows. The Midsvillities had all presented cards at Silver Snows, but none had passed the threshold. Now, however, Bill was teasing Syd about having been seen in the vicinity and, under pressure, Syd, embarrassed, admitted he had been called, but in his official capacity as a mason. While the others roared with mirth at the implausible explanation, a professional call came for Doc—from Silver Snows. Triumphantly he reached for his bag and left. Ten minutes later an elderly servant conducted him through a dimly lighted room to a couch upon which reclined the most beautiful woman he had ever seen. Long after Doc learned that she had called to consult him about an unimportant item of diet, he remained on talking. Dusk had fallen before he left and as he rose he was uncomfortably conscious of an eye peering at him from behind the drapes. All the next day Doc's mind reverted to the other women he had known, and he realized how vastly superior Angela, as he called her, was. Three days later he mustered up enough courage to call again, only to start violently at sight of a red ink warning to stay away from Silver Snows. As he pulled up valiantly in front of the lodge, he groaned at sight of the Adonis-like Syd slipping out of a side door. In the garden, however, Angela awaited him and in her glamourous presence Doc forgot everything else. On the way home the sight of a cross burning by the wayside recalled disquieting rumors that Angela had a husband in the offering. Moreover, a hypothetical case about a mismated husband and wife, served to elicit from Angela the information that she had decided scruples against divorce. Doc was thoroughly unhappy! The same day Doc found another sinister warning pasted on his windshield, he received a telephone call to a patient living beyond Silver Snows. Realizing his peril, he defiantly stopped to exchange a few words with Angela. Suddenly his path was blocked by several cowled and sheeted figures who seized and carried him off. And then Angela appeared on the scene remonstrating that the joke had gone far enough. The figures darted off, but Doc managed to pull the sheet from the grinning face of his erstwhile friend, Syd Parks! When he turned, Angela had gone too.

Days later, Doc appeared again at Silver Snows and after minutes of irrelevant chatter admitted he had attributed the warnings to her husband. Then as Angela explained that her erring husband had been killed in Mexico five years ago, Doc drew a deep breath and like a schoolboy stammered out a proposal of marriage. As Doc held her close, Angela whispered that she was Ann Parks, Syd's little sister grown up, and as Doc bent to her lips in wonder and happiness, a score of white figures rose from the shrubbery and filed past the porch in solemn procession before fading into the night.

SCANDAL

James R. Hauberck Drama File No. 10851

"LET'S go home," Gilbert Weiser suggested wearily. But his three companions, determined to bury Gilbert's bachelorhood in style protested vehemently, and swaggering down the quiet street looked about speculatively for some suitable place of entertainment. At last they stood before a door surmounted by a sign announcing Eden. One of the men cocked his head reflectively at the full size poster of the dancer Elaine, imported from the music halls of Paris, and their decision was made. Inside, they found Elaine had just finished her routine, but with a little urging, she was persuaded to dance again for them. At the conclusion of her number, the woman came to their table. Listlessly she seated herself, and with an almost indefinable expression in her world wise eyes, she listened to their laughing confidence that in fifteen days Gilbert would be married. The dancer turned to look upon Gilbert and her eyes narrowed imperceptibly while she encouraged the others to talk of Gilbert's family and rating. One of the men ogled the girl but she ignored him utterly and while Gilbert accepted the champagne they urged on him, she regarded him closely. At last they danced. Gilbedt could feel the warmth of her almost naked body against him. "Your friends are tiresome," she said meaningly. Realizing the invitation in her words, Gilbert returned to the table and emptied a glass with one draught.

In the morning Gilbert awoke with a splitting headache and at sight of the woman in the cheap room, he hastily prepared to leave. Suddenly she awoke and called to him. Determined to pay her off and be done with her, Gilbert found himself yielding for one kiss more, and intoxicated with her ardor, remained on. It was a painful meeting his next with Doreen. Impatienty he avoided her questioning and lied about how he had spent the evening. But despite himself he found himself drawn more and more frequently back to Eden and Elaine's kisses. When Elaine danced, Gilbert was wildly jealous of the other men's eyes upon her, while at home his parents and Doreen became concerned over his paleness and nervousness. It was a strang double life, but try as he would Gilbert could not get away. Then one night as he sat down to a dinner prepared by Doreen he received a note. Agitated he excused himself and fled. Entering Eden, he watched with cynical eyes Elaine rise and begin her dance. Suddenly she swayed, and breaking through the crowd, Gilbert ran to her and pleaded with her to live.

Meanwhile Doreen found the crumpled suicide note from Elaine bidding farewell to Gilbert, and dashing out wildly to the street followed the ambulance to Eden. There seeing Gilbert holding the dancer's body while the doctor sneeringly explained she was like the others hadn't taken enough veronal to do any permanent harm, she fled. At home, she faced her anxious parents and fainted, but Gilbert's father, followed to the Eden. Elaine looked at them both narrowly then as the senior Weiser tried to induce his son to leave, she turned on him and told how it had all been a scheme to hurt Gilbert as his father had hurt her many years ago when he had deserted her and their baby in Paris, because in his career there was no place for a dancer-wife. And when at last Gilbert married Doreen, in the back of the Church kneeled Elaine who knew now, as she looked on Gilbert, that her scheme to hurt him had been a boomerang.

ONE MARRIAGE

Ben Wade Drama File No. 10707

AS a little girl, Bell Rand's favorite past time was always to pretend she was the mother of a large family, caring for her babies tenderly while Rose Grey, her closest friend, scornfully told her that such a large family would only mean hard work. Jerry John and Hallie Stine often joined the girls in their games, attending meetings at the Quaker church in their little Indiana town when the four grew older. Quiet and studious, Jerry gathered herbs and took up the study of medicine even as a boy, while gay, spirited Rose teased him for his shyness. A gypsy girl from a wandering circus taught Jerry a sensational trick in which she impersonated a Tartar princess which he captured on his favorite horse, Gypsy; later, performing this stunt at a Hallowe'en party, Jerry was inadvertently carried into Bell's yard, but she evaded his boyish, half-jesting attempts at love-making. Attracted by his daring, Rose becomes fascinated with Jerry, and persuades him to teach her to ride, appearing for her lesson clad in knickers, gaily ignoring the conventions of the day. Fascinated by the boyish splendor of her body, Jerry consents, admiring her skill and courage, but feeling, guiltily, that he has no right to instruct her in this masculine art. In order to win a wager, Rose recklessly marries a young professor at the academy which she attends, keeping the affair a secret, and returning to her home, as she realizes her mistake immediately after the ceremony has been performed.

Jerry loves Bell, but realizing that she cares for Hallie, refrains from mentioning this. Attracted by Rose's vivid charm, he asks her to become his wife; she refuses, but persuades him to join a circus with her where they soon win applause with the sensational daring of their horsemanship, presenting the pantomime of the Tartar princess. Rose comes to his room one night, and he takes her in his arms, but when she still refuses to become his wife, resists her appeal. Teasingly, she summons him to her bedroom, saying that she believes someone is concealed in the closet; then, switching off the light, she turns to him, and he yields to her at last. Without explanation, Rose leaves Jerry a few months later, returning to her husband, who has now become an artist. For a short time, she shares his bohemian life, but when her father's death leaves her a guaranteed income, she returns to her old home. Hallie eventually makes Bell his wife, after an understanding of several years, but his health has been so dissipated by the reckless living of his bachelor days that there can be no children in their marriage. When he brings a wax baby doll to Bell, as a gift, and sees how tenderly she dresses it, he realizes that her tender maternal nature is longing for expression. Explaining the whole situation to Jerry, and adding that he cannot live without Bell, Hallie asks his friend to enable the young woman to gratify her desire for a child; Jerry, however, cannot become reconciled to this idea, but when he is thrown from his carriage and taken to the Stine home to recover, as he cannot be moved, he confesses his love to Bell. Carried away by their mutual passion, their desire is consummated. As soon as he is able to leave, Jerry rejoins the circus, but when Bell gives birth to a daughter the next spring, he knows that the child is his.

After a winter in Europe with her husband, Rose returns to Jerry, and vainly attempts to rekindle the flames of their former passion. Although refusing her, Jerry cares for Rose in her illness, brought on by dissipation, and when at last her colorful, unhappy life is ended, it is he who sees that she is taken to her final resting place. In spite of Bell's protests, Hallie joins friends in an engineering company in France, and is killed during an explosion. Free at last to find their happiness, Jerry and Bell marry, and, moving to a new community, begin a new life, with their small daughter.

HE COULDN'T FORGET

Denny Kaye Drama File No. 10794

TO the sensitive, cultured David Lane, the heady kisses of Katherine Blake were strangely affecting . Until his meeting with Katherine, David had been the rather over-indulged son of the wealthy Lanes. From childhood his career in his father's business has been set aside for him, and reaching his majority he had drifted naturally into an engagement with Norma Walton, as well brought up as himself. But with Katherine life had begun to change for him. Katherine had never stepped into a fashionable drawing room. Her life had been spent on a farm and her passions were as primitive as Nature itself. Attracted by David's resistance to her, she had deliberately set out to capture him, and murmuring, "Don't leave me, David," she had finally won him. Returning home, David had realized that Katherine held him enthralled. As long as possible he had avoided Norma, but when at last she had lifted cool lips to him and spoken with restrained enthusiasm of the plans for the wedding and of the invitations already sent out, David had groaned. He had tried again and again to tell her of Katherine, but when, one day, with greater feeling than he had ever seen her display, she had told him how wonderful it was they loved each other David dared not say the words that would mean that Norma Walton had been jilted. At length he had told Katherine they'd have to part. With her arms about his neck, she had cried that she wanted him, and didn't care if he had a wife, they could go on. It was with the sincere thought that he had put Katherine out of his life, that David went through with the wedding, but soon he was to want Katherine madly. Restless, unhappy, he was to drink to forget, and then Katherine had come to him. With a cry, he had strained her to him, thoughts of Norma, his parents, his friends, vanishing in that fierce rapture of having her close. But with the knowledge that Norma was going to have a child, his child, despair had overtaken him. Now he couldn't leave her. Drinking, dissipating, David had kept up the pretence in front of Norma's friends that they were happy. Katherine's excesses were driving him to madness but he couldn't free himself of her power. At length, unable to stand it longer, he had gone away for a trip to escape for a while his tortured emotions. But even in the quiet of the mountains he could find no rest, and at last returning, he began quietly packing his things. In the doorway, Norma regarded him with dimmed eyes. "You're going to her?" she asked softly. He whirled, then as he realized what it would mean to her, he rose and said, "No." Burying her face against his shoulder, she wept unrestrainedly.

Katherine learning she had lost, shouted and snarled. Only when she hurled abuse at the woman who had kept David from her, did he turn from her in disgust. And with Norma and the baby, David was to find at last peace from turbulent passions. Soon Katherine was to be forgotten utterly, and in place of the physical love was to come a deep respect and admiration for the lovely Norma.

THE MYSTERY SHIP

H. Louis Layton Drama File No. 10791

FROM the shore of an island in the South Seas, the natives watch silently while a full rigged sailing ship, the only type of sailing vessel known then, early in the Nineteenth Century, drifts slowly toward land. At last, unable to restrain their curiosity, the natives clamor aboard and find, to their complete astonishment, the only passenger is a fair haired child, guarded by a white Newfoundland dog.

In the year 1836 Dr. W. S. Jamesison, prominent physician of Salem, Mass. decided to buy a ship and satisfy his life long ambition to explore the South Sea Islands. Months of carefree cruising followed, with his beloved wife and infant child. Then one day a terrific hurricane blew up. The little boat tossed and pitched. Darkness fell. Water piled high, sweeping over the decks and bringing the unspeakable horror of a swarm of octopi. The devil fish crawled over the decks, slipping off with struggling men in their death clutches. Mrs. Jamesison, seeing her husband dragged overboard, gave one last despairing cry as she ran blindly to help him, and felt too late the crushing, horrible tentacle drag her slowly overboard. The ship helplessly drifted on, until the winds suddenly subsided, and from shore was seen by the natives, who rescued the little girl and brought her up as one of their own. In Eden-like surroundings little Pua Lilia, as she was called, grew up, versed in the skills of the natives. Taught English by a temporarily visiting missionary, Pua Lilia found herself adored by all. Then one day, looking out to sea she saw a ship flying an American flag. On deck she could see a handsome officer giving orders. Even as she looked eagerly, his sailors stole up behind him, and tried to overpower him. Mutiny! Jumping into her canoe, with dextrous strokes, Pua Lilia cut through the waters just as the body of the young officer was hurled overboard. Realizing the waters were shark infested, Pua Lilia dove deeply into the waters, and as she located the limp form, she saw a shark making straight for the body . With one lightning stroke she dove her dagger deep into the monster and while the waters slowly crimsoned she brought the American to the surface. Followed days of wonder for the two young people, days of growing love. Then one day, close by her hut, Pua Lilia found a locket with a beautiful woman's picture in it. That day she met Paul as usual and as they walked, heedless of their surroundings, they found themselves on the mountain side. Finding an unusual arrangement covering the mouth of a cave, the young people pushed on only to discover a skeleton surrounded by fine raiment and jewels. Pua Lilia gasped and turned to flee, while Paul following, picked up a shiny object she dropped. Catching up with her at length, he learned from her that the natives put to death any who discovered the sacred hiding place of their king. Paul reassured her, and opening the locket, recognized the face of the beautiful lady who was the mother of his best friend, Stephen. Familiar with the story of the Jamesisons, whose picture Stephen wore in a similar locket, Paul knew he had found the sister of his best friend. And pursued by the natives who had discovered the violation of their dead monarch's resting place Paul and Pua Lilia were to escape toward civilization and a new life—together.

THE TRIUMPH OF RIGHT

Emmett D. Nichols Drama File No. 10726

WHILE returning home on a lonely road, John Howland is robbed and cold bloodedly shot down . A policeman in the distance gives chase and succeeds in wounding the murderer who is brought to the hospital under heavy guard. Fitzpatrick immediately sends for a mouthpiece and refuses to talk except under the advice of his attorney, Butler. Meanwhile, Rees, only daughter of the murdered man is left destitute by his untimely death and appears, a figure of tragedy in the court where her father's murderer is to be tried for his life. Butler asks that the charge be dismissed on the technicality that according to the evidence the alleged crime was committed on a public highway whereas the body was found on a private road . To the everlasting shame of Judge Ashton, political pawn, the indictment is squashed and subsequently Fitzpatrick is freed on the technicality that the charge was brought against one Fitz Patrick and not Fitzpatrick. Dazed at the gross miscarriage of justice, Rees accepts the sympathy of the young District Attorney, Richard Osgood, and walks out of the court. Forced to leave school and find employment, Rees soon finds herself in the army of those unable to get a position, and when finally she is employed by William McCormack she discovers her employer expects her to accept his advances. When she resents them she is summarily fired. In despair she contemplates suicide, but she meets Richard Osgood who, sympathizing with her dire circumstances finds employment for her. Grateful to him, Rees shyly promises she will report to him about her progress. While working Rees registers for courses at the local college.

Meanwhile Richard is running for Judge, opposing the reelection of Judge Ashton. At the college one night a talk is scheduled by Judge Ashton, and Rees, remembering his mishandling of justice while on the bench listens with growing ire to his smooth review of his record and his pre-election promises. Then, rising to interrupt, Rees mentions several important cases the Judge sat upon and asks what sort of justice he dispensed in those. The judge is covered with confusion, but the faculty hastily quiets Rees and she is suspended for her temerity. The newspapers write up her action and when Rees learns that she can aid considerably Richard's campaign opposing Ashton by speaking on the stump, she pledges her aid. The night she is scheduled to appear there is a rush of spectators, but on her way down to the town hall, Rees' tires are shot and she is kidnapped. Realizing that Ashton has arranged the abduction, Rees trickily turns upon her kidnappers and digging her gun into their backs, orders them to drive to the town hall. Fearing the gun held in the hands of a hysterical woman, the gangsters comply and pull up in front of the building. Rees fires her gun into the ground so that everyone comes running out .Then in an impassioned speech she exposes Ashton. The result is that Osgood is landslided into office. In her own room Rees hears the results broadcasted over the radio and tears of happiness well in her eyes for Richard with whom she has fallen in love. Minutes later there is an imperative rapping and as she opens the door, Richard sweeps her into his arms, and with his lips against her hair tells her he was waiting the results of the election before telling her of his love. And with a little cry of happiness, Rees gives Richard her lips.

THE WORLD REGAINED

John R. McClenahan Drama File No. 10857

PRESIDENT of a leading bank, Richard McLaughlin is informed by his physician that unless he takes a complete rest, advisably somewhere in the west, his health will break down. Accordingly with his wife Hazel, he leaves for Oklahoma City, writing to his son Howard at Harvard, in explanation. However, the McLaughlins soon discovers that the thriving city is not as restful as they had expected and one day McLaughlin sees a farmer who has come into town to sell his produce. McLaughlin and his wife arrange with him to come to the farm to stay, and packing their grips they climb aboard Mr. Jones' democratic wagon and lumber slowly over rough roads in back of the slowest mules in harness. Past the small town post office they ride and at last pull up before the Jones home where they are greeted by Mrs. Jones, a lovable woman who immediately sets up savoury coffee and bacon and eggs for them. Captivated by the natural beauties of the valley, the McLaughlins walk about the farm and returning, look up to see a lad of fourteen lead in a beautiful girl. Only after several seconds do the McLaughlins realize the girl is blind. Mary and Mrs. McLaughlin become friends instantaneously and together they take long strolls through the fields, while Mr. McLaughlin learns the rudiments of farming and feels younger than he has for years. Then Howard comes to visit, and at his suggestion the McLaughlins and Mary go to a traveling circus. Mary is captivated by the bands, the gaiety, the smells and Howard points out and explains everything to her. It is Howard who pleads with his father to bring Mary to an eye specialist in the East, and having gained the permission of the Jones, Mary sets off with them. Never having been on a train, never having visited a city before, Mary is beside herself with excitement, and holds tightly to Howard's hands.

Three months later, the doctor removes at last, the bandages from Mary's eyes and she cries out in joy as she perceives her first glimmer of light. Gradually she makes out faces and with dark glasses on, after several days of compresses and treatment, she is able to look out the window and see the world as others see it. She cries out with the wonder of it and as she see Howard for the first time, tears spring to her eyes. Follow several months of adjustment, regaining the world, seeing new marvels every minute. Then, suddenly there is the music of the circus band. Mary starts happily and her eyes widen as she sees the parade riding by. The clown calls out, "Hello Beauty" and throws her a false face kiss, the calliope strikes up, and as Mary clings to Howard's arm the circus rides by. Suddenly Howard draws her to him, and her lips turn up for his kiss. And, at last, with the whole world wishing them well, the Mary whose rich contralto voice is now nation-famous, is married to her Howard who had faith in her.

BROKEN PROMISE

Edna Gehrke Drama File No. 10820

IF there was one woman in all the world whom Susan envied, it was Mrs. Henry Hereford, wife of her employer. Long in love with Henry, Susan winced as the imperious woman swept into the office with Henry's two beautiful children. Months passed; months during which Susan told herself a thousand times that it would be better for her to leave her position with Henry altogether. But the thought of never seeing him again was unbearable, and as long as no one else knew, it was all right, she felt, to continue. Then for a while Henry began to look worried. Susan longed to smooth the wrinkles from his forehead, hold him close, but she maintained an imperturable expression. Then one day it happened. Henry buzzed for her, and as she sat, notebook poised, he swept her into his arms and told her he loved her. Shocked, Susan reminded him of his wife and children, but Henry insisted he would get a divorce. Meanwhile, he whispered with his lips against her hair, they could get an apartment and be close to each other. Susan protested but gradually Henry's insistence and her own love silenced her. Some nights later, as they dined at the Park Casino, Susan looked up at the eager cry of her name. Frowna little she introduced Walter to Henry. When Walter asked her to dance, Susan turned to Henry for permission and it was this more than anything else that made Walter rage. He loved her, he whispered hoarsely. He had a right to tell her that she was ruining her life with a married man. Abruptly Susan demanded that he take her back to her table, and her dismissal was obvious. With drawn face, Walter sat watching them until Henry and Susan left. Henry protested jealously, but Susan assured him that Walter was just someone she had known all her life and his outburst didn't matter. Two nights later, Henry was found shot and hurried to the hospital. When Susan came to see him she was informed his condition was critical and he could see no one. Sleeplessly she waited in her room for the call from the hospital. At last it came and she was directed to Ward 218, only to find not Henry, but Walter, who had been brought to the same hospital after trying to kill himself. In his delirium he had called constantly for her. Susan soothed him and several days later is permitted to see Henry who is recovering. During his convalescence, Mrs. Hereford never once comes to see her husband, while Susan, during Henry's absence from his office takes charge and sees that business goes on as smoothly as though Henry were there in charge. One day soon after Henry's return, Susan feels faint and Henry advises her to take the afternoon off. Susan has been worried over his coolnes of late, but when the doctor tells her she is going to have a child, she feels that now Henry will hurry through the divorce. However, Henry informs her that he has been reconciled to his wife, and offers her money. Utterly disillusioned, Susan leaves. Some time later, she is to meet Walter again. His face is drawn, but on seeing her it lights up. As he grasps her arm eagerly, he explains he has just been released from prison for his attempted murder of Henry Hereford. But when he asks her to marry him, Susan explains she is the mother of Henry's child, That, Walter tells her, doesn't matter any more. Nothing does, except that he loves her.

THE GOVERNOR

V. O. Wallingford Drama File No. 10760

WILD cheering and applause break forth as Brant Murphy, twenty sixth governor of the western state of Colzona, concludes his inaugural speech. At last the people have chosen a leader, a man who meets with almost unanimous approval from all citizens, regardless of party affiliations! Following his message to the legislature, the governor goes to his office, alone for a few moments of relaxation. Closing his eyes, he sees again the campus of the mid-western college to which he came, years ago, as a freshman. Eager for social prestige, and in spite of the fact that he helped earn his own way by waiting tables at a boarding house, Brant accepted a bid from a prominent fraternity, feeling that he had attained his dearest ambition. Neglecting his studies completely, he entered into the round of activities, paying court to Lola Carver. At the end of the semester, when he failed in his studies, the fraternity rejected him. Embittered, he confided to Anne Mason, a quiet, studious little girl who worked in the book store, that the campus was composed of a bunch of snobs. When she replied that he had only himself to blame, and would never amount to anything with that attitude, he noticed for the first time how pretty she was, and determined to make her change her mind. Discharged from college, he became a hobo, travelling west in a box car, and camping with others of his kind. Becoming the confidante of these underprivileged men, Brant gained a comprehension of their outlook, and the determination to aid them was born.

Arriving at a small western mining town, Brant became first a waiter, then a clerk in a small store. Winning a large sum at Faro, he was enabled to purchase the store, but when Anne, who taught a few miles away, reprimanded him for gambling, he agreed that "never again" would he seek to gain his ends by this method. A friend and counseller of all men who sought a chance, Brant became respected far and wide in the community, and, at the people's insistence, ran on their ticket for mayor, carrying the election by a large majority. At the same time, Anne became his wife. Twice the unanimous choice of the party for this office, Brant's next honor was for the Legislature. After serving two terms, he gained a thorough knowledge of corrupt methods by which votes are traded, bills railroaded, men forced out of office. Needed reforms came to his attention, and he resolved that if ever he became governor these things should be effected, without compromise. Visiting the prisons of his state, he determined that conditions should be made as humane as possible for every inmate, deciding on similar changes in other public institutions. Those employed in these duties were too often chosen for political or personal reasons; under his rule, merit alone would determine appointment.

Once more in his own home, Brant became a leading merchant, banker and counseller, openly charging corruption where he had discover it. Nominated for governor, he campaigned fearlessly, openly declaring what he would do. Excitement was high in newspaper offices when he carried the state by an overwhelming majority, and his townspeople jubilant as he was given a public reception.

Following the brilliant inaugural ball, Brant confesses his one regret is the stake won at gambling, as Anne, smiling, reminds him that is has been used only for the good of the people.

INSEPARABLE during their four years at college, Jerry Davidson and Dick Murdock are nicknamed Damon and Pythias. Shortly before graduation, Jerry is severely injured on the gridiron, apparently the victim of a spike heel. He sustains cuts on his arm and hip, splintering a piece of bone which will not mend satisfactorily. Returning home, Jerry enjoys a brief vacation, swimming and dancing with Landa Jorden, his fiancee, while Dick, Rilla, his sister, and Ester, his sweetheart, join the two. In spite of minor quarrels occaisioned because Jerry refuses to play bridge, he is very happy; Rilla, who also loves him, looks on wistfully. All too soon he leaves for Northern Canada to take up a position as assistant civil engineer, helping to build a railroad across the wilderness. Bob Sturt, his employer, meets him at Toronto, and the two become fast friends as they journey to their lonely cabin. At the dances which Bob finally persuades Jerry to attend, held at the nearest trading post, the young man is a tremendous social success, due to his pleasing appearance and urbanity, although he at first makes the mistake of dressing for them, although hastily changing to the rough woolen shirts and trousers of the district. As Bob and Jerry make their way across the swamp land which they are surveying, they encounter two men in search of Gold Dust Jack, a thief. A snow storm stalls their truck, but they proceed on dog sleds, purchased from the strangers.

The old pain returning in his hip, Jerry becomes sullen and taciturn, as he tries desperately to keep up. Bob searches for liquor, not understanding the change in his friend, and the two men quarrel. At last, lagging behind the crew, Jerry, on snow shoes, loses his way. Ian, another member of the party, and Bob, search frantically, but no trace of him can be found. After wandering blindly, almost overcome with exhaustion, Jerry comes upon a deserted cabin, and finding biscuits, coffee and matches within, is able to sustain himself. Landa, receiving no letters from Jerry, believes herself to be neglected and is seen frequently in the company of Leonard Stalker. When Rilla chides her with being untrue to Jerry, Landa replies that she must be in love with him herself. Landa tries to forget Jerry, in a round of pleasure, but when she reads that an unnamed young man has been lost from a surveying party in Jerry's district, she steals away from the merry crowd, and burst into tears, sitting alone on a park bench. Here Dick finds her; upon learning the cause of her distress, he resolves to travel to Canada in search of his pal. Dick's parents and Ester accompany him on this trip, remaining in Toronto while he starts on Jerry's trail, with Bob.

Almost dead as the result of the hardships he has endured, Jerry is about to give up when the two strangers in search of Gold Dust Jack find him, and, not recognizing him, so greatly has he changed, they believe they have discovered their victim. Caring for him well, that they may collect their reward, they travel back to Toronto with him. Hearing of this Bob and Dick give up their search, hastening to the hospital, where they identify their friend, as he lies in the consulting room. Both are overjoyed at finding him, but deeply grieved when they learn that he may be crippled for life. Ester quarrels with Dick when he will not accompany her home, but remains with Jerry. Heartbroken, Jerry reads of Landa's marriage to Leonard, but when he returns to his home, and she greets him warmly, he learns that it was her cousin who became Stalker's bride. Certain now of her love for him regardless of his physical condition, Landa plans an early wedding, while his family approve. An operation restores Jerry to perfect physical condition, and, with Landa, he faces the future happily. Ester and Dick forget their quarrel; Bob and Rilla fall in love with one another. As the group celebrate at a dinner given by Jerry's parents, wedding plans are joyously contemplated, and the terrors of Canada's bleak wilderness forgotten.

DARKNESS BEFORE DAWN

William H. Pearce Drama File No. 10644

EACH day, returning promptly from school while her sister, Laura and brother, George remained talking to their classmates, Pearl set the house in order and watched for the return of her father from his work on the railroad. And each evening while Pearl served dinner, Mr. Douglas and his wife would plan the careers of their children who would have every advantage they missed. George, bored by the conversation, would leave the table as soon as possible while Laura winked across at him. Then one day, dustcloth in hand, Pearl heard the doorbell ring, and to her consternation the body of her father was brought in by his fellow employees who explained, haltingly, the railroad accident. During the long months while Mrs. Douglas slowly convalesced, Pearl gave up school that she might properly care for her father, and over again she assured the pain-wracked old man that the other two would carry on and realize all his plans for them. Only when Mr. Douglas was assured that George was studying engineering and some day would be a great Civil Engineer did he rest easily. Laura, too, went to college leaving the full burden upon Pearl's slender shoulders. Starting out fairly well, George soon began to feel that it was too long and hard a grind to become an Engineer and when one of the boys of the fast set with which he had fallen in, assured George he could get a position in a shop and begin earning money immediately, George gave up his profession and sported about town in flashy clothes. The blow caused Mr. Douglas a severe relapse but George was determined to have his own way. Then, the bankrutpcy of the railroad stopped all further compensation damages to Mr. Douglas, and Laura ran off with a millionaire, washing her hands of her struggling family. In despair, Pearl sought for a position and after several weeks of application secured work as a secretary. At last their troubles seemed in some measure alleviated and with the help of kindly neighbors, Pearl managed. Then one day George appeared, eyes haunted. Frightened, Pearl questioned him and learn that George's employer was preferring charges against him for stealing a thousand dollars from the firm. Realizing this final revelation would kill her father, Pearl visited George's employer and begged him to withdraw charges. Karl Worth, sympathetic to the anxious sister, refused, however, to let George go free until Pearl pledged a large part of her own salary weekly toward replacing the stolen money and George, badly frightened, groveled for mercy. Ignoring contemptuously George's pleas, Karl promised for Pearl's sake to drop charges. Each month, Pearl appeared with the promised sum, and Karl found his heart going out to this courageous girl. The last payment, however, Pearl was late, and when palely she arrived, Karl shook her hand for what she had done. Breaking into sobs, Pearl confessed that her father had died that week, never knowing of George's guilt. Suddenly, Pearl slipped to the ground. Gently Karl picked her up and there began a romance which was soon to culminate in marriage. And in the after years when Laura was to be discarded by her husband and George was to be tied to a humdrum job, it was Pearl who found that greatest of all happinesses with the man she loved.

POISONED MINDS

HER blue eyes sparkling with pleasure, nine year old Rebecca arranges wild flowers she has picked for Amelka, the maid, who is her closest friend. To her, Amelka represents the grown up world, for has she not seen her in the arms of her lover at night, as they sit in the garden? And has not Amelka, now seventeen, told the little girl that someday, she, too, will have a sweetheart? On other occasions, this pretty young girl who has grown up with Rebecca has told her fairy tales when her mother was away from home, or listened to her childish confidences. Eager to surprise Amelka, Rebecca hurries to the kitchen, but when she hears Marie talking in low tones to the maid she stops to listen, horrified at the conversation. Advising her friend that the Jewish religion requires its followers to prepare matzos from the blood of Gentiles, Marie warns Amelka that two recent murders in the community have been obviously committed for this reason. In terror, Rebecca burst into the room, demanding to know why this concerns Amelka. To quiet her, Marie informs her that her parents are Jewish and therefore must practice this custom, since their ancestors crucified Christ. When Rebecca sees that Marie and Amelka are not joking she runs from the room, sobbing hysterically. Seeking comfort, as her mother is visiting her grandmother, Rebecca goes to her one faithful friend, Jeook, her dog. Climbing into his kennel, the miserable little girl sleeps with her head on his shaggy mane, stealing back to her own room before morning.

Confronting her mother, Rebecca relates the terrible experience of the previous day, scarcely daring to question its truth. Her eyes flashing with anger, Rebecca's mother tells the little girl that Christ himself was a Jew, crucified by the Romans. For centuries the Jewish religion has represented compassion and tolerance, in spite of the cruel persecutions to which its followers have been subjected. Her fears allayed, a deep pride fills Rebecca's heart. From that moment on she divides the world into Jews and Gentiles, scorning those who do not follow her religion, the childish simplicity and faith gone. Her curly, golden head held high, she avoids her playmate, Ivan Bogdanoff, the next morning, offering no explanation.

Years pass, and Rebecca grows into a lovely young girl, her intolerance softened and subdued, but still a dominating factor in her life. Ivan returns from military academy as a young lieutenant, and the two meet at a dance given by the exclusive, private girls' school Rebecca attends. Renewing their childhood association, they laugh together over the games of former years. Rebecca allows Ivan to call, and one day when he tells her he loves her she trembles with delight as she goes to his arms. The next moment she releases herself, informing him that the difference in their religions and race make marriage an impossibility. After Ivan leaves, deeply wounded by her attitude, Rebecca sobs, but true to her resolve, marries a young Jewish doctor the following spring, going with him to Germany where they make their home.

Unable to forget Rebecca, Ivan does not marry, and when he goes to Germany on his vacation two years later, he looks forward to seeing her. At this time, Hitler's persecutions against the Jewish people begin. During an attack of violence, Rebecca's husband is killed in attempting to oppose an outrageous edict of the Nazi government. Ivan, hastening to Rebecca, finds that she is in grave danger, and, hurrying with her through the terror-ridden streets, he manages to smuggle her across the border. Once more safely at home, Ivan takes Rebecca in his arms, pouring out his love, and she confesses that he is the only man she ever really cared for. With a new tolerance, they plan to marry, promising one another that their children's minds shall never be poisoned with the hateful venom of racial and religious prejudice.

SHATTERED GLASS

Frances E. Barnette Drama File No. 10186

EXAMINING the lovely, delicate features of her mother's picture by the light of an oil lamp, Maureen remarks to the Widow Jones, who has taken care of her since babyhood, that she would give anything to know who her parents were, and asks why she was never shown this picture before. The widow replies that she has kept it, so that it would not be harmed when Maureen grew up, and adds that she was given a slip of paper with the name of the girl's father on it, but it was lost. They are interrupted with Jim and John, the widow's younger sons, entering with arm-loads of wood. Tom, the eldest, follows them shortly, and taking Maureen in his arms, tells her that he has sent word for the parson to come, to perform their wedding. Struggling, the girl tells him she will not marry him, at which he threatens to have her sent to reform school. Inasmuch as he distills liquor for Mr. Smith, a judge, Mrs. Jones warns Maureen that he could probably persuade this official to sign the necessary papers. Suddenly, the widow falls to the floor; Jim rushes to her, and they prepare to summon a doctor, when John, feeling her pulse, discovers she is dead. Although hating to leave at this time, Maureen takes the opportunity of escaping from Tom while the house is filled with funeral guests.

Making her way through the plum thicket, the girl crosses a perilous foot-log and finally reaches the highway, just as a severe storm is breaking. Finding a car, the occupants of which are hunting, she climbs inside for refuge, and falls asleep. She is awakened by Tom's voice, and sees him, standing with a lantern. Hiding beneath the motor robe of the car, she remains concealed while the owner of the car drives away. Maureen feels a heavy blow on her forehead, and loses consciousness. The next morning, Robert Wainsworth is interviewing a negro who applies for the temporary position of chaffeur, during the illness of their regular man. Hiring him, he commissions him to overlook the car, and the frightened Rastus announces that there is a dead person in it. The "dead person" proves to be Maureen, who was struck by a wrench which Robert threw in the back of the car, the night before. Summoning his housekeeper to bring her refreshments, Robert hears the girl's story, and asks the housekeeper to find her a position as her assistant. In the days that follow, Maureen and Robert become friends.

Lyles Wainsworth, Robert's sister, tells a group of friends who gather for bridge that while her brother remained at home during the family's trip to Honolulu, he became infatuated with Maureen, a servant in their home, which she considers a scandal. Over-hearing this conversation, Maureen decides she must leave and, writing a note which says that she does not wish to be a burden, the girl packs her things and goes. When Mr. and Mrs. Wainsworth and Robert discover this they are very sorry, and censure Lyles severely for her unwarranted criticism. Robert searches the city, and at last discovers Maureen, dancing gracefully in a public hall. Recognizing this, she faints, regaining consciousness in his arms. Robert tells her he loves her, and she consents to become his wife. Attending a ball together after their marriage, they are seen by Lyles, who angrily hurls Maureen's picture of her mother downstairs, when she finds it in the dressing room. The glass shatters at the feet of Benjamin Crawford, a retired steel magnet. Picking it up, he shows it to his wife, and both declare it is the portrait of their dead daughter, and the girl's birth certificate and mother's inform her she must be their long sought granddaughter, and the girl's birth certificate and mother's marriage license which Robert finds behind the frame, confirm this happy fact.

THE STOLEN DIAMONDS

Mae Trevillyan Drama File No. 10754

AS her finances slowly dwindle, Irene Marshall places her little brother Jimmy in a children's school, and, writing to her cousin Myra that she is accepting her invitation to come to New York, boards a train. Fields and towns fly by and Irene stares wistfully from the windows. Suddenly the train lurches and a small valise swings from the rack overhead and crashes down on her head. For a moment Irene is stunned, but the gentleman in the seat opposite her, hastily brings water and bathing Irene's forehead apologizes for the carelessness of the porter. On their arrival in New York a few moments later, Irene rises but the gentleman seeing her sway slightly, takes her bags and asks if he may help her home. She allows him to call a taxi for her and he tells her that he is Ralph Newton.

Irene finds Myra a slangy, untidy girl who gestures widely and exclaims, "The dump's yours." Despite Myra's slovenliness and easy acceptances of life, there is something likeable about her and Irene, after straightening out the apartment and preparing dinner, listens to Myra's philosophy about having a good time in New York. A few days later, Irene manages to find employment in a jewelry store. Tired from long hours at work, Irene listens to Myra's rapturous description of Fred Mitchel, the man she met in the Hotel Astor lobby when her own date failed to show up on time. The following day, Fred and Myra come to call at Irene's store and Myra excitedly explains that Fred has lost a bet and as a penalty has to buy a rhinestone clip for her. While Myra lingers over the tray of clips, Fred's attention is caught by a well dressed dowager who purchases a valuable diamond necklace and orders it sent to her apartment. While the jeweler's attention is momentarily distracted, Fred appropriates the necklace and turning suavely to Myra, aids her in her selection of a cheap clip and leaves with her. The jeweler, returning, places the necklace case in his safe, unaware that the diamonds have been lifted. However, when, subsequently he removes them to have them sent to the purchaser, he discovers his loss and almost frantic, sends for the police and accuses Irene of the theft. The police hold Irene while her apartment is searched for the jewels. Fred and Myra, about to leave when the police arrive are detained and the former, fearing that the police are on his trail, hastily drops the necklace into a drawer. They are found and Irene is sentenced to a year in prison. Seven weeks later, Irene learns her little brother Jimmy is seriously ill, and fearing delay will be fatal prevails upon the warden's wife to allow her to hurry to his bedside. Jimmy recovers and Irene returns to finish out her sentence. The kindly Mrs. Smith, impressed, works ceaselessly to parole Irene and finally induces her brother, whose picture Irene has been startled to notice in the warden's home, to employ the girl. Timidly Irene proceeds with her letter of introduction only to discover her prospective employer, Mrs. Smith's brother, and the gentleman of the train are the same man. Learning her story, Ralph Newton promises to find the guilty person and at last forces Fred Mitchell who has almost killed Myra for threatening to expose his latest crime, to confess. Fred is convicted, and Ralph and Irene leave for a happy honeymoon.

Eleanor D. Eldridge Drama File No. 10588

HEADS together as they sat quietly together on a tree stump, Sally Ann and Billy McGuire watched the sun set behind the hills. Suddenly the piercing voice of Sally Ann's mother made them start apart, and blowing a kiss to Billy, Sally Ann raced toward the house. Vainly she tried to explain the glory of the sunset, but her mother's voice shrill and pleading cut in to tell her that Billy would never be anything but an impractical farmer. Rebellion died on Sally's lips as her mother went on to dream about Sally's future. All Mrs. Warbell's life, she had planned to send her daughter to college, giving her clothes and advantages so that she might marry a wealthy man. Knowing how her mother had denied herself comforts, Sally dared not explain that she didn't want money, that she would be content to spend her life with Billy, and when at last the time came for her to leave, Sally looked at the shining new luggage and a lump came in her thoat as she saw her mother's shining eyes. "Goodbye, Sally Ann," Billy said softly and disappeared over the hill as the train pulled out.

At college, Sally Ann found a new life. Her letters home were gay and cheerful and as she read her mother's happy answers, tears filled the lonely girl's eyes. Then at college Sally Ann met Allen Harding, scion of one of the wealthiest families in New York. Easily influenced, wealthy, Allen fell in love with Sally Ann and invited her to fraternity dances and parties. Sally Ann's letters to Billy became more and more vague, and then one day Allen asked her to marry him. In his roadster, telling her of his beautiful home and aristocratic parents, Allen painted their future together while Sally Ann, realizing that here at last was the fulfillment of all her mother's dreams for her, at last consented. Two weeks that followed, Sally Ann returned home to plan for her wedding and her mother, sewing clothes, and looking forward to Sally Ann's living in a great house, chattered happily. Once Sally Ann saw Billy and as she saw the misery in his eyes as he hoped she would be very happy, she longed to stop all this. But at last the great day arrived. The Hardings were frigidly polite to their son's bride and Mrs. Warbell winced at their coldness to her, but the thought that at last Sally Ann would have everything she wanted conquered her misgivings. Returning from her honeymoon, Sally Ann found her mother-in-law coldly critical of everything she did. Allen, at first very much in love with Sally Ann, began to see her faults as his mother pointed them out, and too weak to withstand the subtle attack, began to drink to dull his senses. Sally Ann fought a losing battle to make her marriage a success and when Mrs. Warbell paid a surprise visit, and Allen was openly insulting, Sally Ann rose to the defense of her mother. In a burning speech, she told her husband she knew he wanted to be rid of her, and she was going. For a moment, realizing he was losing her forever, Allen tried to stop her, but a word from his mother, made him change his mind, and he told her he would settle a large sum of money on her for the divorce. Refusing to accept any money, Sally Ann placed arms about her mother's shoulders, and together they went home. Breathing once more the air of the hills, unpolluted by alcohol and cigarette fumes, Sally Ann threw her head back happily, and as the sun began to set, she saw, coming toward her, the slender, lanky figure of Billy McGuire.

DESTINY

Mildred Card Drama File No. 10739

WITHa smothered exclamation of surprise, Gary Trent listens while his friend, Bruce Calvert, confides that he was married six years ago, while a young soldier at training camp. Following the death of his father's closest friend, Mr .Calvert, senior, had adopted his daughter, Mayna. A few months after this, the elder Mr. Calvert had developed a fatal illness, and, true to his promise to see that his seventeen year old ward was not without protection, he had requested Bruce to marry the child. Unwilling to refuse his father's wishes, the young man knelt by his bedside, holding the hand of his promised bride, still deep in mourning for her father, while the village priest performed the ceremony in the room, dimly lighted by candles. After a brief kiss Bruce had left his bride to return to camp. The next week he had sailed for service, and following the war, his health had been so broken that he had not wished to return to Mayna, in their London home, feeling that he would burden her. He had sailed for New York, renewing his friendship with Gary, and almost forgetting the strange marriage until this day, when he had received a letter from his wife, asking him to sail for England if possible, in order to settle affairs relating to their joint estate. At the conclusion of this conversation, Gary relates that he, too, has been a man without a family. Following his mother's death, his father, never in sympathy with his undisciplined, carefree son, took his little sister to France, leaving Gary in school. Since then he had heard that both were dead.

Calling at the beautiful London home, Bruce is greeted by his wife, nervous and apprehensive over this meeting. Their mutual shyness soon disappears, and they agree to let matters stand for the present, with no thought of divorce Accepting Mayna Calvert's returned husband because of his obvious charm and breeding, her friends welcome him into London's most selected social circles Among themselves, they speculate on this strange marriage, which has never been fully explained to them, but all agree that Mayna and Bruce are ideally suited to one another. Brennon Foster, an ardent admirer of Mayna, alone dislikes Bruce. When the three are guests at a fox hunt, he insists upon escorting Mayna, and, feeling that he has no real claim upon her, Bruce consents. Mayna believes this indicates that he wishes they were not married. When "Bren" proposes to her after an impetuous courtship, she consents, feeling that he, at last, really cares for her, and attracted by his charm. Meanwhile, Bruce has fallen in love with his own wife, as he confides to Gary, who comes to London on a visit, but as she cares for another man, he feels it is only fair to her to release her, so that she may marry again. However, still responsible for her happiness, he has engaged detectives to investigate Foster's record.

The next day, Bruce is informed at his office that Foster is a married man with two children. With Gary, he hastens home to inform Mayna, but servants tell him that she has gone to Foster's apartment after receiving a telephone message that Bruce was there, injured in an accident. Gary and Bruce break into the apartment, as Foster is forcing his attentions upon Mayna. While Bruce settles with him, Gary discovers that Mayna is nis sister! All misunderstandings swept away, Bruce and Mayna decide to make their marriage a reality, while Gary gives his blessing to the happy couple.

THE WOMAN IN THE CASE

Anthony Bryan Drama File No. 10215

WHEN Mr. Travis, a banker, introduces Betty Bright, his pretty secretary to his son, Jack, and informs her that he will be her employer during his father's vacation, she senses danger. Her intuition proves correct, for on the first day that Jack is in charge he summons the girl, and presses his attentions upon her. Resisting, she tells him that she loves someone else, but she dares not give away to her anger for fear that he will discharge her. Jimmie Moore, a young lawyer, calls at Betty's apartment that evening, and takes her to a night club. As they are dancing to the strains of a melodious waltz, he asks Betty to marry him, and she consents. Driving home in the warm, spring night, both confess they have never before been so happy. The next day Betty tells Jack that she wishes to resign at the end of the week, as she is to be married. His eyes widen in surprise at this news, but he assents, adding that he has some important papers which he wishes her to go over tonight, and will bring them to her apartment that evening.

Jim telephones Betty, inviting her to the theatre, but she declines, asking him to call later. When Jack arrives she invites him to be seated, and accepts a cigarette from his case. In a few minutes the girl feels an overpowering sense of weariness, and loses consciousness. Calling a few minutes later, Jim glances toward the window, and sees her, unresisting, in the arms of Jack. He turns away, disillusioned, but Jack, noticing that they have been observed, leaves hastily. Writing her a brief note, Jim breaks their engagement, saying she could not be true to him. Betty, who found herself alone when she regained consciousness, cannot understand, and telephones Jim, asking him to explain, but he refuses to see her again, under any conditions. Wounded by his distrust, she replies that if he cannot have faith in her it is well they did not marry, and sadly she returns to her work at the office. While Betty is walking alone one evening, she decides to visit her friend, Polly Graham, a typist in the office, and goes to her apartment. Hearing Polly calling for help in a muffled voice, she pushes at the door, and finds it open. Inside, she discovers Jack Travis holding Polly in his arms, while the girl weakly attempts to resist him. Betty orders Jack to release her friend, and when he will not, seizes a revolver which is lying on the table, and shoots, killing him. Polly falls to the floor, unconscious, and Betty, after summoning police, revives her.

At the investigation which follows it is discovered that Jack carried cigarettes laden with dope which he had offered to the two girls, in order to seduce them. Defending his sweetheart in a brilliant address to the jury, Jim wins her acquittal, and Betty again promises to marry him.

GYPSY LOVE

Alice M. Hammer Drama File No. 10762

HIS hat rakishly tilted over one eyebrow, George Whitcomb reels into his father's house singing at the top of his voice. "George!" his father snaps, and calling him into the library delivers a scathing lecture ending with, "If you don't get married and settle down, I'll cut you off without a cent." With a philosophic shrug of his shoulders, George turns toward the door, gets into his car, and goes out to get another drink. It is morning when he rides up a street in the slums. On the sidewalk a lovely gypsy girl, Antissa is whirling in a graceful dance. Jack Martin, a sailor, coming up the street with his arms about two urchins nibbling at the licorice he has bought them, stops in admiration of the girl's dance. George toots the horn impatiently to clear the street, but as his eyes rivet on the girl's lovely body he stares in fascination for several moments, then gets out. Finding the girl's father, an illiterate fruit dealer, George presses some money into his hand, and when he leaves a frightened Antissa sits beside him in his flashy roadster. Returning to his father's home, George opens the door, and exclaims grandly, "This is my wife." For a moment the Senior Whitcomb stares in disgust, then turns away. George laughs uproariously and as the gypsy girl moves bewilderedly toward the door, John Whitcomb, pitying her, extends his arms to her. With a little cry, she comes to him and while he murmurs, "Poor child," Antissa twists the narrow gold band on her fourth finger.

So begins married life for Antissa. In a year a child, Nancy, is born to her and John Whitcomb, dying, destroys the will leaving his money to charity, and because of Antissa and Nancy, bequeaths his fortune to his son and daughter-in-law. However, once the money is in his own hands, George proves that his reform was just a ruse, and with renewed profligacy, he proceeds to paint the town red. When Antissa rebels against his shamelessness, he orders her back to her people, advising her, however, that he will bring up Nancy in luxury. Rather than expose her child to the rigors of gypsy life, Antissa gives up Nancy, secure in the knowledge that the child is brought up in the best schools.

Then George leaves for the continent with Nancy. Aboard the ship the child weeps for loneliness and is found and comforted by Jack, the seaman, who has always loved children. When the boat is wrecked, Jack saves Nancy and together they are picked up by a fishing boat ofter torturous hours on the open sea. Meanwhile, George's unscrupulous attorney prepares to appropriate the Whitcomb fortune to his own ends, and has only the grasping butler to reckon with. When Jack enters with little Nancy, the attorney quickly asserts that he is the child's guardian, but Jack, leaving, meets Antissa, and together they return to fight the battle that wins for them their rightful fortune and happiness at last for Antissa, Jack, and little Nancy.

THE MAIDEN RESTORED

Stuart Osamu Tokunaga Melodrama File No. 10112

WHILE driving his wife and two daughters to the Palace by the Shore, a summer resort, John Crondel Gaynor turns pale with anger when the youngest girl, Berthy, confides that she loves Donald Samson, Jr. He tells her never to mention that name again, and changing the subject, lightly conceals his anger by saying, in jest, that her oldest sister, Beau, must be married first; when she was a child he had selected the son of David O'Malley, his closest friend, for this mission. After Mr. O'Malley died, presumably as the result of a heart attack brought on by financial ruin, the family had moved away.

Beau then confides that she has recently met an attractive stranger at the library. Meanwhile, Ishmael Meads, a young author, takes his mother to the Palace for a vacation; Beau recognizes him as the stranger, and they renew their friendship. Samson Jr. follows Berthy, accompanied by his father, and the two meet secretly. When Ishmael discovers them together he warns Beau that his sister is in dangerous company, and asks his friends Joe, Smacky, Smite, Nancy, Henna, Smith and Ella to help protect the girl, when they come to visit him.

Ishmael tells Beau that he has been the sole support of his mother since his father's death, as his brothers refused to help. His unscrupulous sister-in-law, Lorra, particularly monopolized her husband's earnings and insulted Ishmael when he called at their home. Ishmael entered the ring as a fighter where he met Joe and Smacky.

Secretly, Berthy steals away with Samson, Jr. on his yacht and is discovered, drowned, the next morning. He states that the girl fell overboard and he nearly lost his own life in attempting to save her, but Ishmael accuses him of murder. At the same time, Lorra's husband commits suicide, and a double funeral is held by Father Gregor, the village priest. Secretly, Ishmael has another autopsy performed on the body of the dead girl, stealing her ashes.

After revealing that his true name is David O'Malley, Ishmael accuses Samson Jr. of Berthy's murder, and Samson Sr. of the death of his father. The Gaynors corrobate this statement of identity, warmly greeting the boy and his mother, whom they recognize, while the Samsons file suit for libel

In fighting Ishmael's murder charges, the Samson's state that during the young man's career as a fighter he once accepted a bribe to stop at the end of the fourth round, feigning injuries. Father Gregor and "Old Jack the Spoiled," Ishmael's friends, testify that his character is upright; Jack adds that both the boy and his father bestowed many kindnesses upon him. However, as he has no proof, the trial goes against him. Released on bail, he disguises himself and slips into Samson's room, where he overhears father and son admit their guilt.

When Beau sees the masked figure she screams, but he takes her to his room and reveals his identity, confssing his love. She remains with him, and secretly steals to his room, enjoying nights of happiness. Beau discovers that he has many electrical devices and instruments of television by which he hopes to apprehend the criminals.

Ishmael's friends force the coroner to confess that he lied; Berthy had been assaulted and poisoned, dying before she drowned. Finding witnesses in the Samson Sr. case who will tell the truth, it develops that he and John Gaynor were partners in a fruit cannery. Samson Sr. embezzled funds, ruining the others; when O'Malley discovered this, Samson gave him an overdose of medicine and threatened him at the point of a gun, causing a fatal heart attack. The nurse confirms this, and both Samsons are convicted of murder: justice triumphs at last.

Ishmael, or David, divides his business interests among his friends, when a second novel brings him success, Smith and Ella, Nancy and Smite, have found romance during the course of the adventure. Free at last to go to his love, David weds Beau, and in her marriage and the child she is expecting, the girl finds happiness restored.

WHEN WOMEN MARRY

William G. Webb Drama File No. 10802

THE ballroom is filled with men and women dancing, drinking, and enjoying the soft music. Jimmy Cagel, known to his friends as "Gentleman Jim" slides onto the floor with his partner, one of the girls from his office whom he has promised to take to the dance. On the crowded floor, Jimmy bumps into another couple and as he turns to apologize, his eyes meet those of the girl of his dreams. Through the rest of the dance, Jimmy is in a daze and later, when a friend introduces him to Jean Perkins, he is overwhelmed, and after several dances together receives permission to call her at her home. From then on Jimmy's every thought is of Jean and at last they become engaged. However, an incipient eye malady begins to give him further trouble and finally, he goes to see a doctor, who informs him he may never see from his right eye again and his left eye is pitifully weak. Unwillingly to tell Jean, who, he is certain, will marry him out of pity, Jim hastily leaves town. Arriving in Chicago, he is tormented by the pain of his eye and as he thinks of the happiness he is being denied, he turns into a madman, who doesn't care what happens to him. He rams his fist through a window, then turns and runs out into the street. Pain and anger cause him to commit a crime and he is sent to prison to serve a five year term. He doesn't mind because now he is a tough criminal. Everything, he proclaims, is nuts to him. The warden, however, takes an interest in the boy and the prison doctor examines him. An eye specialist is called in and with delicate operation restores Jim's sight. In a few days the bandage is removed from his eyes and he is overjoyed. However, his hopes are dashed when he is reminded that he has five years to serve.

During the next two years Jim's conduct is exemplary. Then he save the lives of two prisoners at the risk of his own life. The Governor hearing of this, checks up on Jim's career and in a short time grants a pardon.

Returning to his own town, Jim hurries to Jean's house where a party is in order. To his dismay he hears the announcement of the engagement of Jean to Donald Green, a wealthy chap whom her mother thoroughly approves of. Brokenly he turns to leave just as Jean, entering the kitchen to refill the sweet dish, enters. Jim notices she is weeping, and in his indecision whether to go or stay, he knocks over a bowl. "Jim!" Jean cries and flings herself into his arms. "I knew you'd come back." The others, hearing the crash, knock at the door and inquire if everything is all right, and from the depths of Jim's embrace, Jean calls out happily, "Never better." The music starts up in the next room. Donald is surrounded by pretty girls, but Jean and Jim are leaving through the back door on their way to happiness.

STORM IN EDEN

Elsie Rankin Drama File No. 10849

EMPLOYED as secretary to Dennis Hurley, a well known writer, Linda falls deeply in love with him and lives with him as his wife. When Dennis returns home to his people, Linda goes with him in her role as secretary. Dennis' younger brother Ethan, falls madly in love with Linda, and suspecting her relationship to his brother, pleads with the girl to marry him. Linda gently but firmly refuses him but she is appalled at Ethan's sudden burst of violence as he assures her that if she refuses him he will commit suicide. Dennis comes upon the scene, and divining something from Ethan's strained expression, warns Linda that Ethan has, as a child, been hurt in an accident and that he is subject to fits of manic depression. Realizing that in his warning there is no hint that he loves her and is thus trying to save her, Linda broods over her own unrequited emotions and when Ethan hurls himself at her feet and sobs out his great love and need of her, Linda decides, out of pity for poor, weak Ethan, to marry him. Dennis blames himself for bringing about their meeting but it is now too late to do anything. Out of the greatness of her heart, Linda treats Ethan like some frail child, and he worships her for her kindness to him. For a while all goes well. Then Linda learns she is going to have a baby. At first Ethan is beside himself with joy, but one day he sees Linda discussing Dennis' newest novel with him, and a terrible suspicion comes over Ethan that the baby isn't his but Dennis'. When he imparts his suspicions to Linda, she tries to reason him out of it, but he becomes more and more violent, shouting that it is true, isn't it that Linda lived with Dennis before she married Ethan, and as Linda tries to calm him, he shouts madly, what is to prevent her from having lived with him since. Unable to restrain himself, Ethan strikes Linda a terrible blow so that she falls unconscious to the floor and her baby is born dead. At the same time, Ethan, raving now, is removed to an asylum where after several months he is released as cured . He proceeds directly to Linda, and seizes her eagerly in his arms, telling her how he has missed her. She strains away from him and he shakes her, demanding to know if he isn't her husband. Suddenly he remembers the baby, and asks about him. Linda stares at him speechlessly. "What is it?" Ethan demands hoarsely, but Linda closes her eyes and sits very still, a figure of tragedy. Running from the house, Ethan proceeds to the home of the family doctor and demands to know what has happened. With his hands on the boy's shoulder, the doctor tells Ethan the fate of Linda's baby. Shame and remorse seize Ethan, and laboriously composing a note wishing Linda every happiness and trusting that she and Dennis will carry on the name of the family, since he has no right to, Ethan commits suicide. Linda is grief-stricken, but in the end it is Dennis who comforts her, and after many months dares to tell her how he had realized, immediately after her wedding, that he had loved her all along. And so at last, Dennis and Linda face a new to-morrow.

W. M. Mehaffey Drama File No. 10879

ONE of the foremost members of the Church led by the Reverend Neil Thomas, John Williams falls in love and marries Mary, whose lovely voice makes the choir famous throughout the nation. For several years all goes well, and then the Depression sets in. John loses his position and months follow with no prospect of a job in view. At last, realizing that Mary and their baby are starving, he appeals to the wealthy Reverend for help, but is turned away after hearing a telephone conversation which leads him to suspect that the honorable Reverend is involved with a group of racketeers. Deciding that one can get nowhere in the world through honesty, John goes into the speakeasy business and soon is making enough to give Mary and the baby the luxuries they deserve. However, the Reverend, who has long been attracted to Mary, suspects and gives a tip-off to Mike, a gang leader who demands that John buy liquor from him at exorbitant prices. A gang war starts. Mike, given to suspect that Thomas is double-crossing him, determines to kill the Reverend, but is shot first. Whereupon the Reverend brings the body to John's garage and tips off the police. John is held for murder and convicted. Mary, with all the resources at her command fights for John's freedom but he is convicted. However, at length Mary induces the Governor to commute the sentence to a life term and when the Reverend, having failed to break down Mary's morale, at last gets his desserts, he confesses that he and not John is guilty of the murder of Mike. Freed at last, John discovers that his prison pallor and unhappy look militate against his obtaining a job and after weeks of discouragement, he is at last offered a position as a gambler in a casino. Mary tries in vain to stop John from drinking, but through his disillusion at the hands of the Reverend Thomas, and the prison sentence he was forced to serve, John has become hardened. When, however, one night he stumbles in drunk, and unwittingly closes the door so that the baby falls down the steps, he becomes painfully sobered. Although the fault is not directly his, when the baby dies after a lingering fight for life, John's spirit is shattered utterly. Mary defends him against any suspicion of being responisble for the death ,but when they are alone, she withdraws from his arms and tells him to go. With his coat collar turned up, John walks out of his house and Mary goes back to her parents.

The thought of the casino is abhorrent, but John cannot get a position elsewhere. Like a man obsessed he wanders through the streets. Then one day he passes the Church formerly presided over by the Reverend Neil Thomas. Hsi lips twist in bitterness, but from inside comes the clear pure notes of Mary's voice. Almost unconsciously he is drawn inside. His shabbiness is in strange contrast with the rich clothes of the other Church-goers, but as he joins his voice in song, he regains once more that old faith in the ultimate rightness of things. From her place in the choir, Mary smiles at him reassuringly and as the services end, she comes to him and together they walk out into the light of a new day.

SOUL MATES

Blanche Badger Drama File No. 10736

MIRIAM LEIGH is informed by her guardian, Mr. Hudson, that due to an unwise investment which her father made shortly before his death, an ancient castle, practically in ruins, is her only inheritance. Bravely concealing her disappointment, the eighteen year old heiress prepares to make her home in this decadent estate, which has been a posession of the Leigh family for over three hundred years. Arriving there immediately after her graduation from an exclusive school, Miriam spends many unhappy hours in the lonely castle, but she refuses to sell it, feeling that in some way it is her responsibility to regain the lost Leight fortunes. She discovers the ancient burial ground, over run with weeds, where the first Leighs were interred. With the help of servants, Miriam establishes her workshop in the ball room of the castle, restoring the beauty of the old furniture and tapestries. While cataloguing the treasures of her ancestors, Miriam discovers a life sized picture of a girl who resembles her almost identically; underneath is the inscription, "Miriam Leigh, December 24, 1720," and beside this, another life sized portrait of Rexton Leigh. Discovering a marble bust of the same young man, Miriam has it placed in her study, while she wonders who these two ancestors might have been.

In searching her father's secretary, Miriam accidently opens a secret drawer, and discovers an oblong bronze box which she cannot unlock. Upon reading legal documents contained in an ancient folder in the drawer, Miriam finds that the first James Leigh took up his residence here in 1717, with his wife, two small sons, and sister, Miriam. Upon the morning of her wedding day to Rexton Leigh, Miriam was found dead in the garden, the victim of hereditary heart disease; overcome by grief, Rexton died the same day. Another document discloses that James Leigh the second bequeathed the bronze box to his son, James, giving a similar legacy to Alfred, with the instructions that the two boys were to exchange keys and open the boxes, simultaneously, twenty years later. Since Alfred was unable to state where he had disposed of his box, this wish had never been fulfilled, and was left to be accomplished by the descendants of these two. As the only survivor of the Leigh family, Miriam realizes that the task is hers, and falls into a troubled sleep. She hears a voice softly whisper: "Come, Miriam, I am waiting under the old apple tree," and, dressed in the romantic costume of the first Miriam, sees herself conducted to her lover and distant kinsman, Rexton, when she awakens.

Hastening to the apple tree in the ancient burial ground, Miriam is confronted by a young man, closely resembling the portrait of Rexton, but dressed in modern attire. "You called, Miriam, and I have come," he tells her, simply, and she impulsively flies to his arms. Their lips meet in a passionate kiss; then they draw away, astonished. The stranger explains that he is Rexton Leigh, a distant cousin from the United States, who had come to visit his kinsman. Miriam relates her dream, and together they uncover the grave of the first James Leigh, finding the other casket beside it. Upon opening both boxes, Miriam discovers them filled with precious gems. Shortly after this, Miriam and Rexton are wed; Leigh castle regains its former glory, and the new master and mistress often steal away to stand before the portraits of those two whose broken romance they seem to be fulfilling.

THE GLAMOROUS ADVENTURE

Bertha L. Printz Drama File No. 10855

A DELICATE child, little Josie is given special privileges not accorded to her brothers, James and Ralph or her elder sister, Grace. At the parochial school which she attends, the little girl often impudently contradicts the sisters who teach her; instead of being reprimanded for this naughtiness she is praised, as her anxious parents are happy to see these indications of michievous spirit. The choicest toys, delicacies at the table and other treats are accorded to her without comment. As a result, she grows into a headstrong, independent young girl, refusing to listen to the advice of those who love her. Becoming infatuated with Billy, a young man of doubtful reputation, Josie accepts his invitations to spend gay week ends in his company, little thinking that she is destroying her future happiness. Paul, her brother's closest friend, tells Josie that he loves her and wishes to marry her, but she carelessly replies that marriage as an institution does not appeal to her. When James discovers that Billy is married he goes to him, commanding him never to see his sister again. Derisively, Billy drives James about town, pointing out various hotels where he and Josie have been together. Later, in Billy's apartment, blinded by rage, the loyal brother knocks his sister's lover to the ground, unconscious. When he regains consciousness, Billy attacks James with a knife given to him by Josie as a Christmas present, scarring him parmanently, and wounding him.

Going to Grace's home, where Josie and Billy often meet, James' father finds the young couple. He openly accuses Billy of attacking his son brutally; Billy replies with a careless laugh, but later tells Josie that her brother threatened his life, even after he told him that he loved Josie. He was forced to stab in self defense. Believing him, Josie testifies against her own brother at the trial, and when Billy is freed, goes away with him, living with her lover and his mother. Refusing to marry her, Billy subjects the girl to brutal treatment, forcing her to care for his drunken mother, and providing her with an inadequate supply of the necessities of life. Seeing him at last for what he is, she leaves him, but is too proud to return to her family. In desperation, she is forced to ask for money, and is arrested for soliciting on the city streets. Heartbroken at the disgrace that has come to his adored little sister, James - throws himself from the window of Ralph's home. He is taken to the hospital, and Josie, hearing of this, rushes to him to beg his forgiveness, but before she arrives he dies.

Overcome with grief, Josie, too, is on the point of suicide when she remembers that James always urged her to seriously take up the study of music, knowing that she possessed a great gift. Believing that she can in some way atone for her injustice to her brother by carrying out this wish, she secures a position in a store, studying far into the night. Both parents die, leaving her entirely alone, and with the small amount of money that she inherits, Josie continues her studies. Jaul accuses Josie bitterly for her treatment of James, but when she weeps, he takes her in his arms, telling her he loves her and still wishes to marry her. She explains her motive in studying when she refuses him. Years later, Josie attains an eminent position as a concert pianist, and then only does she consent to become Paul's wife, believing that her brother has forgiven her.

BETWEEN OURSELVES

Clara Sawyer Drama File No. 10761

WHEN lovely young Lady Betty Edwards receives word that she must sail for England a week earlier than she had anticipated, she confides in her companion, Miss Della North, that she believes her father wishes to separate her from Vance Sneeve, son of her father's worst enemy, but replies that since Mr. Edwards has recently inherited an estate and the title of Sir Elroy, his new duties probably required his immediate presence. Alone with her father, a wall street broker, Betty pleads once more for Vance's cause, urging him to give his consent when the young man asks for her hand in marriage. Sir Elroy replies that Vance's father, a noted brain specialist, was called in when Viola, Betty's mother, had contracted blood poisoning. He left for the hospital, and was so long in returning that the delay proved fatal. Convinced that no excuse could justify such action, he had never spoken to Dr. Sneeve again. Going alone to Dr. Sneeve's office, Betty learns that he was forcibly held to attend a woman injured in a street accident upon that fatal day, but when her father refuses to listen to her account of this conversation, Betty secretly marries Vance. Upon learning of this, Mr. Edwards disinherits his daughter, sailing for Englang without her. He is greeted by his nephews, Francis, next in line, and Dick, who soon learns that Lady Betty is to be considered as one who has died. Her pictures are removed from the ancestral hall, and her name never mentioned. Francis returns her mail, secretly reading it first, and discovering that Vance has been killed and Betty is at the point of death. When Sir Elroy relents, and asks for her letter, Franics falsely states that none have come.

In America, Betty is under the watchful care of Della and Dr. Emerson; through the latter she meets Count Berdet Estell, who becomes a warm friend and admirer. Della marries Dr. Emerson, but shortly afterwards, these two are taken in the influenza epidemic. Before sailing for France, where his father lies critically ill, Berdet wins Betty's consent to become his wife, the grief over her uncommsumated love for Vance allayel by the deep, overpowering emotion she feels for the Count. Not realizing that she is a titled lady, Berdet tells his family of his love for this girl in America; believing she is socially not his son's equal, Berdet's father destroys all letters the count receives or sends to his fiancee. In bewilderment, Betty goes to San Francisco, to seek employment. Registering at the Mark Hopkins Hotel, as Viola Walker she is introduced to Lillian Long, one of the guests, and through her becomes acquainted with Horton Wallace and Donald Valade. The four enjoy tennis and dancing, until Lillian is instrumental in securing a position as governess for Betty, for little Dorothy Horton, a friend. Mr. Horton is charmed with this attractive young woman, who teaches his child so successively, but Mrs. Horton and Bell, her daughter, subjcct her to many insults, envious of her beauty. When she accompanies Daniel Blair, a lawyer, to his apartment on a business errand for Mr. Horton, Bell and Mrs. Horton evolve a scandal from this innocent episode, further claiming that she wishes to marry Bob, the son of the house. Angrily, Bob and Mr. Blair inform her that they both wished to marry this splendid girl, whom she has unjustly accused. Unable to find work because of Mrs. Horton, Betty leaves for Los Angeles with Lillian, later securing a position as companion and secretary to Audrey Lee, charming young authoress. Betty is injured in an automobile accident while Audrey is in New York, and is sent to the same city, a victim of amnesia, to be placed under the care of Dr. Sneeve, who is Audrey's brother-in-law. Meanwhile, Count Berdet, through a chance meeting with Dick Edwards, his school chum, discovers Betty's real identity, and traces her, through Donald and Bob, to her present position. Through Audrey, he learns that she is in Dr. Sneeve's care, and the three hasten to her. Now thoroughly recovered, Betty confesses her entire history to all. Dick sends for her father, who is overjoyed at seeing his daughter again, and at last asks Dr. Sneeve for his forgiveness in misjudging him. Pardoning Mrs. Horton and Bell, who come to Betty when she returns to Los Angeles, Betty prepares to sail for England, all misunderstanding and unhappiness swept away. As she is arranging for her wedding, Betty is delighted to know that Dick and Audrey are engaged, and plans are made for a double ceremony. Even Francis is forgiven for his cruel deception as the old castle echoes the joyous celebration of this happy event.

DARK CLOUDS

Gladys S. Bell Drama File No. 10757

AS Lila's husband Ray, pastor of a small but aristocratic Church in Long Beach, carries her grips into the train, he collides with a tall young man. Both apologize and pass on. After several hours of riding, Lila retires to her berth. Outside a terrific storm rages and the train creeps along at a snail's pace. After hours of delay, the train begins to gather mometum and just as Lila is snuggling down in her blankets, there is a gurgling sound, and as the train crashes over the bridge and into the river, Lila gasps with the shock. A man drags her through the flooded train and as a huge log comes lumbering down the stream, both of them seize it. For hours they pitch and toss on the turbulent waters, until at last they hit a bank and clamor to land. In the freezing cold, clad only in night clothes, the pair make their way up the mountain in search of shelter and finally locate an unoccupied tent. Wrapped in blankets Lila begins chattering so over the hot coffee that Bob Myers of Los Angeles, business, the manufacture of X-Ray equipment, wraps her in warm clothes and puts her to bed. Lila awakens to hear the gruff old gold miner explaining to an ambitious young reporter that, returning from a prospecting trip, he had found an entirely unclad pair tossing with fever in his hut. The reporter explains about the wreck and adds that this pair are not, as the miner believed, man and wife but excellent human interest copy. Accordingly after several weeks in the hospital, Lila emerges well again, to discover that her adventure has been front page news for days. Bob Myers has returned home, but when she goes back to her husband's parish, she finds the small town gossips eyeing her curiously. Although Ray defends her, the situation becomes unbearable and at last Ray is forced to resign the charge he has given five years of tireless work and devotion. Finally they take a poorly paid parish in a small lumber camp. Ray gives himself unstintingly to the needy, illiterate members and when the "flu" breaks out, after days of sleeplessness while he administers to others, Ray himself falls a victim with too little resistance to be able to combat the ravages of the disease. Widowed, Lila suddenly finds herself penniless. There is little she can do about the camp, so she goes to Los Angeles and soon finds a position. Ray and his work have been such a large part of her life, that now she finds only darkness and loneliness. She tries to lose herself in work but when the Company merges with a larger corporation she is released and another long and discouraging search for work begins. At last she sees an attractive ad in the paper, but her heart sinks as she realizes it is from Bob Myers' firm. At length, however, she answers it, and after the friendly switchboard operator warns her not to get a crush on her boss like her predecessors, Lila discovers that she is going to work for Bob Myers, himself. In a few months she realizes she is hopelessly in love with him, and pride causes her to look for another position. However, as she is finishing her work, there is an explosion in the X-Ray laboratory and the deadly gas causes her to collapse. It is Bob who saves her and as he holds her tightly in his arms, he tells her how he has never ceased to love her, although that night ,seven years ago, he had learned from her delirious talking that she was the wife of another, and too fond of Ray ever to leave him. Now, at last Lila and Bob find happiness together—as man and wife.

THE PRODIGAL

J. C. Leissler Drama File No. 10816

RECENTLY appointed chief of police, Larry O'Day celebrates with a gay party at which liquor flows freely, if secretly. Molly, his devoted wife, looks on sadly, and recalls the days when Larry was just a "copper," proudly showing her his bright, blue unifrom, and telling her that he meant to fulfill his duties to the best of his ability, a serious note creeping into his voice. With moist eyes, she remembers how proudly their little son, Danny, would dress up in his daddy's uniform, announcing that he, too, would someday be a great policeman like his father. Success and promotion had followed all too fast for Larry. At last able to buy the things he desired for his wife and child, he had become arrogant, and acquired a sophisticated point of view, winking at some of the minor offences in the city, although still recognized as a leader against organized crime. When prohibition became a national law, Larry announced that he had no intention of arresting people for enjoying a good glass of beer, since he liked it himself. Unmindful of the menace of the bootlegger, he had ignored the growing hold they were gaining in the city.

After the party, Molly urges her husband not to indulge in such revelry, since Danny, just seventeen, is at an impressionable age. Kissing her tenderly, Larry tells her not to worry; he will see that his son behaves himself.

As he walks home from high school with Constance, his sweetheart Danny complains that his parents are too strict with him, not allowing him the freedom he should have. Constance scolds him gently for rebelling against two people who have done so much for him, and have his best interests at heart; angrily, he quarrels with her, and the girl leaves him, in tears. Still rebellious, Danny accepts the invitation of two other boys to drive to New York. They persuade him to try his first drink of "bootleg" whiskey, and, although he remembers a promise to his mother that he will never touch it, he breaks the vow. With little money or friends, he wanders the streets in search of work and is picked up by an officer while in an intoxicated condition, but upon offering the policeman a bribe of five dollars, is released, and returns to the street corner. Two men offer him work as a truck driver, which he gladly accepts. When officers attempt to stop the truck, the men hastily dismount, and Danny discovers that he is delivering liquor. Before his employers can reach the officers, one of them shoots, wounding Danny. The two men pay a substantial sum to the policemen, who agree to leave and say nothing about the matter. Driving the truck hastily away, they abandon Danny near a country road, and here he is found, seriously wounded, by a passing motorist. Rushing him to the hospital, the man who saved his life sends at once for his parents, who arrive just as the boy is undergoing an operation. As he waits anxiously, Larry resolves that he will hereafter enforce the prohibition law to the limit and rid the city of gangsters for the sake of other boys like his son.

When he recovers, Danny asks Constance to forgive him, which she gladly does, and Molly smiles proudly as she realizes that her two men have learned their lesson, while the whole city cheers the era of gangster reform launched by their chief of police.

FLANDERS FIELD

Harry W. Zander Drama File No. 10699

ON the eve of his engagement to Alice, Mark hears newsboys selling extras which announce the dread declaration of war, while Roger, recently married to Alice's sister, Louise, realizes that he must leave his bride. The two boys discuss the situation with Mother Lawson, their landlady, as Harry Zander, a close friend, announces that, he, too will enlist. Claude, son of a local banker, seeks protection by joining the Home Guards. In a drenching rain, the boys leave for their training camp, while Alice, Louise, and their younger brother Joe try to smile a brave farewell. The strict routine of the camp is relieved by the comedy that youthful hearts can always provide, even in the face of danger. Roger forces a negro recruit to salute him with the threat that he is chairman of the sunrise squad, and, as they become experienced, the boys assign the latest arrivals to various impossible tasks. Louise, a trained nurse, enlists for foreign service. In spite of his precaution, Claude is drafted, but later claims exemption on the ground of physical disability, due to leg injuries. Zander is appointed Prove Sergeant, in charge of the guard house; he soon cures a prisoner of the belief that his religion will not allow him to carry a gun. After months of training in various camps, the boys embark on a cattle boat for foreign shores, amid the cheers of all America.

Loaded in box cars, eventually they arrive at a Brtish camp at the outskirts of Calais, where they first learn the suffering that inadequate provisions and water supply can cause. As they march toward the French front, they hear church bells drowned out by the sound of exploding shells, and realize that this beautiful country is very near the war zone. Again travelling in box cars, they are unloaded between Chateau Thierry and Paris, where the blaze from the front lights the surrounding territory. Zander, finding to his delight that Louise is stationed at the Red Cross Hospital here, learns from her that Roger and Mark are both with the aviation corps. An observation balloon is riddled by enemy bullets, and a plane brought down; at first, it is believed that Mark piloted it, but he is discovered by Zander, safely writing letters. As the company is assigned to bury the dead killed a short distance away, the appalling waste and horror of war is conclusively brought home. The chaplain attempts to identfy bodies of those who lost their tag, while huge holes are dug for their final resting place. While Zander is on guard duty, he sees a star shell burst, illuminating the land for miles around. Red, a buddy, who has seen service and is now in the hospital, describes how he lay on the ground, almost dead, while a terrific hand to hand struggle went on around him, during one of the encounters near the City of Nine Battles.

At dinner time, an attack begins, and the American troops are led into a counter attack. The enemy opens fire, following this with gas; those who are left seek protection from an air raid under a culvert. On September first, the famous drive on St. Mihiel is begun; the men are dumped from their trucks in the midst of a storm. Exposed to the horrors of the Billion Dollar Barrage during the Battle of the Argonne, in support of the famous Lost Battalion, Zander is wounded and gassed. In a base hospital, he learns that Roger was killed while defending Mark from two enemy planes, and Mark has been captured by the enemy. Partially recovered, he prepares to join his buddies in another terrific drive, when the news of peace reaches the incredulous soldiers. Determined to continue with them, in spite of his shattered health, Zander secures permission to cross into Germany, where they are kindly received.

One year later, Zander returns to a world that has forgotten the sacrifices of soldiers, unwilling to give them work or pensions for disabilities incurred in protecting America. Bitterly, he learns that Medical Opinion, subject to graft, determines whether or not a widow shall receive compensation, or a man, unable to support his family because of war injuries, shall be given his just due. As case after case of inadequate care, false examination and special privilege comes to his mind, Zander determines to make his life work an expose of the useless extravagance and criminal negligence caused by Medical Opinion in the Veteran's Bureau. Meanwhile, Louise, in love with Mark's German cousin whom she met while he was a prisoner, forgets war's insane prejudices and consents to become his wife when he comes to America. Alice, married to Claude, and widowed, becomes Mark's wife when her child dies of infantile paralysis. And as Zander continues the work of pleading his buddies' just cause by direct charges against injustice, life goes on, while thousands sleep, in Flanders Field, who gave their lives for peace.

THE WANDERER

Oswald A. Herley Drama File No. 10865

IMBUED with the feeling that his mission on earth is to relieve the suffering, Jacob is tormented by the scorn of his wife, Wilma. Cruelly she laughs at his religious fervor, and when she learns that Jacob is actually planning to give his fortune to the poor of the neighborhood, she calls in an unscrupulous doctor, and has Jacob declared irresponsible. Entirely sane, Jacob is driven beyond endurance by the doubts of his friends, as Wilma carefully gives out reports of his irrational behavior. At last Jacob begins trying to defend himself, but everywhere he sees heads wagging pityingly and at last, to insure for herself Jacob's fortune, Wilma. has him take a trip to Alaska accompanied by a supposed doctor who is handsomely paid to watch Jacob closely. On board the boat, Jacob begins actually to fear he is losing his sanity as everyone regards him as demented. Then one night there is a terrific storm. The boat flounders and sinks. Jacob's guardian leaps into an already overcrowded boat and sinks it, while Jacob hit by a falling spar, falls heavily into a lifeboat and drifts for several days. At last, more dead than alive, he is sighted by some fisherfolk and taken to a tiny isolated village. There he is cared for by Emma, daughter of one of the fishermen. When at last Jacob recovers, he looks up into the kindly eyes of Emma and a great peace comes over him. Weak as he is, he tries to remember how he came here, but he is unable to recapture a single memory of the past. At first he is too ill to care, but gradually the realiation comes to him that his entire past is a blank. Under Emma's sympathy and tenderness, Jacob begins to take an interest in this strange new life. Everywhere he sees simple fisherfolk living in extreme poverty. Emotions aroused, he determines to devote himself to helping them, and beginning with Emma who can neither read nor write he begins educating these people. Snatches of the Bible come to his mind and these he passes along. He shows the grateful villagers many things they have never heard of in their primitve isolated country, but a great sadness comes over him as he tries in vain to remember who he is. Emma's devotion to him is unfailing, but cut off, as he is, he dares not take her as his wife, feeling, in his infrequent flashes of memory that he has no right to her. Emma grieves, and Jacob tries until exhausted to reconstruct his past . At last, one day, while he is aiding in fishing, a whale is sighted, and in the excitement of harpooning it, Jacob is struck on the head. Recovering, he is amazed at the restoration of his memory, but as he thinks, he remembers Wilma, and despair seizes him as he realizes he was right, he cannot have Emma as long as he is married to Wilma. So it is with the feeling that he will somehow free himself from Wilma that Jacob returns to his own people. His home town seems strange to him and the faces of people greedy and warped after the simple honesty of the fisher folk. Soon he is to learn that Wilma has been murdered by a jealous lover and with the realization that he is free, he returns to claim the adoring Emma for his wife and to live forever among the kindly fisherpeople.

INTERRUPTED ROMANCE

Mabel P. Trull Drama File No. 10918

WHILE recuperating in a hospital from an operation she has kept secret from her adopted son, Jeff, lest she worry him unduly, Mrs. Hugh Richards finds time hanging heavily on her hands. One day her nurse wheels her about the wards and she becomes interested in a very pretty blonde patient weeping over a letter. Learning that Mildred Dexter has collapsed from over-work and has been fired, Mrs. Richards induces her to accompany her home as a paid companion.

The two women get along admirably together until the day Jeff arrives from the West. As he is introduced to Mildred both flush painfully and reveal they have met before in Ohio at the home of Fay, Jeff's cousin-by-adoption . As soon as possible Mildred makes an excuse to return to her own room and at dinner that night she is very pale. When at last Jeff manages to corner her and ask why she left without a word, he finds her reluctant to speak. Finally he learns that while he was away on a business trip, Fay had informed her that it was she, Fay, whom Jeff loved. Bewildered, Mildred had gone on to New York, but although she was in constant correspondence with Fay, when Jeff returned, unable to account for Mildred's disappearance, Fay only shrugged her shapely shoulders and asserted she had no idea where Mildred had gone or why.

Explaining that the whole situation was absurd and just a product of Fay's machinations, Jeff tries to induce Mildred to marry him, but remembering one of Fay's disclosures, Mildred refuses and asserts that she is leaving to look for another position. Both Mrs. Richard and Jeff join in protests against so unnecessary a step and realizing that she will have extreme difficulty in finding other employment, and assured that Jeff is leaving for a construction job in Arizona in a week, Mildred agrees to remain on.

Then comes a letter from Fay saying she is on her way to visit Mrs. Richards. Protesting, Jeff goes to the station to meet her, Fay recovers quickly from the shock of finding Mildred here and hypocritically exclaims about how glad she is to see her. However, while riding in Jeff's roadster the first afternoon, Fay wrecks the car, and badly cut, is brought to a hospital. The young interne who bandages her face exclaims in pity at the thought of so lovely a girl disfigured so, and when Mildred and Jeff come they are moved similarly. Jeff leaves for Arizona, and Mildred remains at Fay's bedside, comforting her when she despairs over the possible scars that will mar her beauty forever.

Meanwhile Jeff runs into difficulties with his dam. Men strike. Fever, sets in. And on the eve of its completion, Jeff comes down with an alarming temperature. Mrs. Richards and Mildred board a plane and come to him and days later he regains consciousness to recognize Mildred. This time when he asks her to marry him, she accepts and explains that during Fay's convalescence they had become quite friendly. The young interne had fallen in love with Fay, and was going to marry her, and Fay had admitted that the story that Jeff had lived with her was a lie. It was the thought of that that had kept Mildred from him before, but now, bending swiftly, her lips meet Jeff's.

RED LIGHT ON THE MOON

Orville Anson Wilson Drama File No. 10541

IN a temperamental mood. Lord Yhndee, last member of a family whose proud ancestry dates back eight thousand years, strides up and down his spacious laboratory. When a valuable Persian cat belonging to Clara, his adopted daughter, crosses his path, he angrily kicks the animal, sending it through the doorway where it strikes Chloe Varllee, the Lord's secertary. She enters the room with the injured animal, and informs Lord Yhndee that Tri Strouse, brilliant young inventor and Yale graduate, who is to be the Lord's assistant, is waiting in the reception room. After greeting the inventor, and informing him that he may start with his experiments on the morrow. Lord Yhndee testily orders him to kill the injured cat, as his first duty, which he respectfully obeys. Later, he drives to town with Chloe to select a casket for the pedigreed pet, since it was a favorite with Clara, and, returning to the castle by the wrong drive, encounters the young mistress as she is leaving in her machine. Graciously, Clara alights and welcomes the inventor and scientist, although she is upset over the death of her pet. In the weeks that follow, Tri occasionally sees the beautiful heiress at social gatherings, while his work throws him in daily contact with Chloe, and both women feel an attraction to him. Lord Yhndee is delighted when he perfects the Treadzipper, a machine resembling a huge crawfish, which can move in any direction and fly through the air with remarkable speed, entirely through lever action. Secretly, the Lord wills his laboratory to Tri, as a reward.

Alone with Clara after escorting her home from a ball, Tri frankly tells her that she is immature and vain, when she upbraids him for the death of her cat. Following his advice, she tries to correct these faults, and develops her innate lovable and womanly qualities. One evening, she finds him with a bunch of artificial cherries; through these, he has developed a powerful red ray which casts its reflection on the moon. In wonder and terror, she watches the reflection of the red ball of fire in the water, while he explains the incorporation of radium and other elements in the cherries, producing this strange light on the moon. Lord Yhndee finds them, and is delighted with these marvellous achievment. After he leaves, the two swim together, and Tri takes Clara in his arms, pouring out his love, at last. They take out a license, and plan to marry in the morning. When he is alone, Tri feels that his imaginative, free soul will only make Clara unhappy, and remembering that he is supposedly an illegitimate child, he believes doubly this wedding should not take place, and drives away swiftly in a car. Preparations for the wedding are well in hand when Clara discovers his absence, and breaks down hysterically. When the car is found, wrecked, with articles of Tri's clothing in the stream, it is concluded that he has been drowned. However, Lady Pearl Ovster, former governess to Clara, promises the girl, whom she loves as a daughter, that she will search for Tri. Assuming the name of Lady Strous, Clara attempts to carry on Tri's work in the laboratory. Attempts are made to rob the laboratory, and Clara accuses Lord Hoe, since fourteen of his men were burned, during an explosion which followed. As a result, he kidnaps her.

At last, Lady Ovster finds Tri, and by means of a radio he has constructed from horns, this news is communicated to the castle. At Tri's command, Chloe sails down in the Treadzipper, and, with bombs, he rescues Clara from Hoe's den, as he sails above with Chloe. Returning for Lady Ovster, they find her with Walter, her husband, who came to her when he heard of her disappearance. He confesses that Tri is their son, whom he stole from the nursery, and brought up, after he deserted his wife and lived with another woman. The old priest of the village, whose happy, carefree people have come to love the scientist, marries Tri and Clara. All return to Lord Yhndee, where Tri takes up again his brilliant, creative work, and the Lord marries Chloe. Once more, Tri's inventions benefit humanity.

ROMANCE IN THE RAIN

Dorothy E. King Comedy Drama File No. 10914

FOR years now Judge Blodgett had planned his daughter Betty's marriage to the nephew of the Courtneys, at whose home for twenty-five years now, the Blodgetts had been playing cards on Wednesday evenings. Not that he had seen the nephew since the lad's fourth birthday, but there seemed no other young man in Columbia worthy of Betty's hand, and Betty had long ago voiced her utter disinterestedness in the local swains. Meanwhile Betty had grown up into a very lovely and desirable young lady who was finding life in Columbia, at best, unutterably dull. Today she frowned as she donned her stunning new beige outfit and set out for Junior League meeting. However, as she crossed Main Street she, gasped in dismay as the Heavens suddenly darkened and poured forth a deluge. The large hat hung floppily. The suede shoes began to gape. Vainly she looked for a taxi, and suddenly a very tall young man in white flannels stood beside her ."Too wet for dancing, and not quite wet enough for swimming," he remarked cheerfully. Betty glared. He watched her venture forth one foot as she contemplated the prospect of sinking her suede shoes in the mud. Suddenly she felt herself lifted bodily in a pair of strong arms, and thus was she crossing the street when a flashy roadster went by splashing them both and brushing them both to the ground. The driver, pausing to grin, smacked into the curb and brought his ride temporarily to a close. With jaw set, the flannel-trousered young man picked himself up from the muddy street, strode over to the roadster, and by the scruff of the neck, lifted the driver onto the street, placed the astonished Betty beside him in the car and drove off. Assuring her he wasn't trying to kidnap her, he drove her home via a short cut and as she stood looking after him, he called out he was bringing the car back to its owner. However, before he could drive out of the Blodgett driveway, a motorcycle cop drove up with sirens screaming. Realizing that any explanation of his conduct would bring unsavory publicity to the name of Betty Blodgett, the young man maintained a stoic silence even in the face of charges of assault, battery, and car stealing.

In the court room, Judge Blodgett mopped a perspiring brow and as the prisoner refused to defend himself in any manner or means, even withholding his name and residence, the Judge withheld sentence until Friday, hoping that in the three days interim the keen-eyed young man would agree to some defense.

Meanwhile Betty was keeping a discouraged vigil at the side of the telephone. It was over dinner, however, when the Judge refused to eat and finally revealed that he hated to convict the young man that Betty began to see light and learned his case was coming up on Friday. Similarly, while the Judge was playing bridge at the Courtneys, and his wife excused his preoccupations by mentioning briefly the case of the young prisoner, Mrs. Courtney shifted uneasily. Then Friday came. In the court room Betty and Mrs. Courtney regarded each other with surprise. But when the young man's case came up both Betty and Mrs. Courtney became hysterical. Patty Courtney revealed he was her nephew about whom she had seen nor hide nor hair since he reached town, and Betty told the whole story, adding that Larry Randolph's silence was just a manifestation of his gallantry in keeping her name out of it. The case was dismissed and thus, with the approval of the Blodgetts and the Courtneys was to begin a lifelong romance between Betty and Larry.

BACHELOR FATHER

Frieda Capodece Drama File No. 10911

THE modernistic living room of the Bernard home presents a scene of wild disorder. Gin bottles, cigarette butts and on a chair a girl's garter give evidence of the wild party last night. At 8 A. M. the butler, the maid, and the housekeeper gather disapprovingly and after shocked exclamations decide to quit the "house of sin." At the breakfast table, Charles Bernard roars in disapproval as he receives their resignations, and his son, shaking his head sadly, leaves for the office of Nathan Wickers, arriving an hour and a half late. His employer regards him seriously and tells Bunny that he wants to see him get ahead, but these late parties that his father gives are ruining Bunny. Arriving home that evening after a hard day of work, Bunny finds new servants installed. The butler and the new maid, Miss Adams, a pretty girl, have been sent up by an agency, but as Bunny sees the new housekeeper, Ella Munroe, and notes her air of familiarity his jaw tightens and later his suspicions are borne out when he learns that Ella has been recommended by, and is the mistress of Julian, his father's dissolute friend .Bunny resents Ella and almost quarrels with Julian for sending for her, but his father insists on Ella remaining and that night Charles Bernard plans a party for the girls of the new "Highflier" show. Charles tries to induce his son to give up work, and at last Bunny compromises, keeping his position and agreeing to attend the party his father is giving Saturday night. Later Bunny knocks Julian down for pressing unwelcome attentions on the new maid, Miss Adams. Bunny apologizes for his father's friend, and assures the girl it won't happen again. On Saturday night the party reaches a new high in vulgarity, noise, and hilarity. Bunny's father and a golddigger retire to another room and come out, a half hour later embracing each other, while Julian and Ella retire to the housekeeper's room. Bunny is helping his intoxicated father to bed, when Miss Adams appears ready to begin her days work. Shamefacedly, Bunny stops to speak to her and learning that she is going to spend her day off with her sister in the country, Bunny at last induces her to let him drive her there. When he asks for the day off from Wickers, explaining his reason, Wickers, who has always treated Bunny as his own son, comments approvingly and assures Bunny there is nothing shameful in having fallen in love with a servant. However, when Charles suspects his son's interest in the servant he warns him to play around as much as he wants but not to be trapped into marriage. Scorning his father's advice, Bunny rebukes him for the life they have been leading. Charles only laughs at his son, certain that he has too much sense to be taking a woman seriously. Meanwhile Bunny is falling deeply in love with Margaret Adams and at last asks her to marry him. After hesitating because of what Bunny's friends and father would say, Margaret finally promises, agreeing to give up her position immediately. However, before she can say anything, the elder Bernard fires her. Infuriated, Bunny defends the girl he loves against his father's charges and inviting his father to disinherit him, walks out. The elder Bernard, shaking with rage, pours himself a stiff drink and that night there is a wilder party than ever at the Bernard home. But in taking one of the girls home, Charles leans over for a kiss and wrecks the car.

At the urgent call to the hospital, Bunny drops his work and rushes over to find his father congratulating him for having the backbone to make a man of himself instead of a drifter .Bernard dies and at the reading of the will, Bunny learns his father never has disinherited him. Margaret comforts him in his genuine grief for his father and together they face a new future.

DAUGHTERS OF THE POOR

Mrs. Everett Gidley Drama File No. 10934

"OH, D——, another female!" had been her father's recation to Claire's birth. As she grew up in the large family of children, Claire was to learn the tortures of poverty. She was to see her sister Neva die because there wasn't money enough in the house to call a doctor, and she was to see her father spend every cent he managed to make on drink. One night as she and her sister Christine stared wide-eyed in the dark while from her parents' room came her mother's voice pleading it wasn't fair to bring more children into this poverty, and the sound of her sobs were to continue for hours, Christine bent over and made each of the children swear they wouldn't marry a poor man. Most earnest in that oath was little Claire, the memory of her mother's explanation that she had married the brutish John for love and that they would have been happy if it hadn't been for poverty and drink, fresh in her mind. Then her mother died in childbirth and her father, soon after, after making the neighborhood start as he died, writhing in the throes of a delirium tremens produced by drink, went to his rest. Christine married a rich restaurant owner and sent for Claire to give her a position as a waitress. It was thus she met young Bob Caroway, who came in for a sandwich and coffee. As he flashed a boyish grin of pleasure at seeing her, she felt something happen to her heart. That night Christine told her a friend of her husband's, wealthy Dick Ridge was coming over. Claire said she wasn't interested, but Christine, gripping her by the shoulders asked, "You havn't fallen in love with somebody?" "What if I have?" Claire retorted, and Christine, learning that Bob had no money, stormed and reminded Claire of the life of their own mother and father. Claire met Dick and he became immediately captivated by her. The next day Bob was at her table. Claire ignored him and rebuked him sharply as he tried to arrange to see her after she was through for the day. When Dick came in, Claire hurried to him and made it very clear to Bob she was interested only in Dick. In love with her, Bob pleaded over and over for a chance, but Claire, remembering how her mother had said she was in love when she married, turned resolutely from his blue eyes. At last, unable to stand it longer, she decided that she would marry Bob in spite of everything, only to come home and find Christine reading with red eyes a letter from their sister Olive who had married a boy back home and was pleading for money. That night Claire went out with Dick, prepared to accept his proposal. However, after trying in vain to induce Claire to drink some of his liquor, Dick drained the contents of the bottle himself, and as Claire fought against his clinging hands, all her regard for him turned to loathing. Running to Bob, she told him she was his, if he still wanted her, and so they were married. The first year was to be a hard struggle, and then one day Christine was to come to them, sobbing out the story of her divorce from her wealthy husband, and at last when Christine was to fall in love for the first time, with Bob's brother, she was to be able to understand that for each woman there is just one man in the world who can make her happy—the man she loves.

MOON MADNESS

Richard Kent Drama File No. 10779

IN love with Nance Reed, Jack Gardner promises to give up his inherited vice of drinking for her. After a month of total abstinence, a month that has been torturous for him, he returns to Nance. That night a party of her friends drop in on them, among them Babe and Bob, an amusing pair of youngsters who are always fighting and making up afterward, and Lawrence Scott, who wants Nance as his wife. Lawrence instill doubts in Nance's mind that Jack can really have overcome his weakness and when Jack begs her to marry him, Nance postpones the date. Self pity seizes Jack but although the others urge him to stop looking so gloomy, and Bob and Babe offer him a drink of liquor, Jack holds out. It is only when Jack sees Nance dancing in Lawrence's arms, and the others urge him to drink a toast, that Jack finally yields. Lawrence brings Nance on the scene and when she turns in contempt, he staggers from the house, determined to show them all.

Retiring to his cabin in the mountains, Jack begins drinking home brew until he is a hollow-eyed wreck. One day he hears a woman crying for help, but believes it is the figment of one of his liquor dreams. Only when Babe rushes in and begs him to get Bob from under the wreckage of his car, does Jack rush out to aid. He learns that Bob and Babe have come to see him, and in his drunken madness he tells them he doesn't want their pity. However, when a few minutes later Nance arrives driven up by Lawrence, who has been trying to dissuade her, Jack turns upon the whole crowd whom he holds responsible for his downfall. Brandishing a bottle of moonshine, he shouts that he is going to kill them all. However, Bob hits Jack on the head with the butt of his gun, and Jack sinks heavily to the floor. The others hurriedly leave, but Nance determines to stay, convinced that Jack's denunciation was justified and that her place is at his side.

For a week she remains with him at the cabin, caring for him. Jack's gratitude is touching and although he urges her to leave him, she stays on. Then the others come. Bob and Babe have just been married, but they are even more violent in their trivial quarrels than ever. They are immediately captivated by the place and profess to see now why Nance wanted to stay here. They ask Nance to show them the trout stream, while Lawrence remains on speaking to Jack. He pretends that he sympathizes with him and assures Jack that he can, by means of hypnotism, cure him of all desire for drink. However, once he has Jack under his spell, he orders him to drain the contents of a bottle of whiskey and to say he found the bottle under a stone. Nance returns with the newly weds. She is surprised to find Jack gone but a few moments later Jack come in reeling. In disgust, Nance asks Lawrence to take her home, wearily promising she will marry him. Bob and Babe try to make her reconsider, but Jack turns on Lawrence and scathingly denounces him for his scheme. As he talks he explains that he never trusted Lawrence's scheme and had only pretended to be hypnotized. Lawrence leaves and Bob and Babe follow tactfully. Alone together, Jack and Nance find each other's arms and this time there is to be no more parting.

THE EAGLE FEATHER

Frederick Osius Drama File No. 10921

BROUGHT up on the Island of Java, Gabriela meets few white people besides her father, a physician who is dedicating his life to the natives. From him Gabriela learns something of the great world beyond the Ocean. One day an around-the-world plane develops engine trouble while flying over Java and is forced to land. The plane cracks up slightly in hitting the ground and the pilot pulls out the unconscious body of his mechanic, Oscar Hansen. Meanwhile Gabriela has been summoned to attend the sick baby of one of the native women. She is returning, surrounded by her ever-faithful bodyguard of "brownies," her native friends, when she starts in amazement at sight of the new comers to the island. The others flee in panic, but return fearfully as Gabriela steps bravely forward. Seeing the white faced man lying on the ground, Gabriela sends one of the natives for her father who brings Oscar to the hospital. When Oscar regains consciousness, he looks with wonder at the large brown eyes of Gabriela and induces his pilot to go on without him, advising him to pick up another mechanic at the next landing. The plane takes off, minor repairs having been effected, and Gabriela applies herself to nursing Oscar.

Meanwhile, the Antoanette, a merchant vessel stopping for a cargo in Java, sails into the bay, having noticed the airplane winging overhead one day when out at sea. There are some sick men aboard and the Captain details, Gustav Borden, blond giant, to take them to the shore hospital conducted by Gabriela's father. Gustav, captivated by the tiny brown babies gamboling on the island swings them up in his arms. Gabriela comes up, and misunderstanding, scolds him soundly and disappears before he can frame an adequate response. Amazed at sight of so lovely a girl, Gustav seeks her out and finds her, arms full of flowers for the patients. She forgives him graciously and tells him of another American, who arrived recently. At sight of Oscar, Gustav cries out in his ringing voice and the two men reveal that they have met as children in Sweden when Gustav rescued Oscar from drowning and learned that Oscar was bound for America. Together they had gone to the new land and for several years had conducted a ranch together in Montana only to be separated during the World War.

Soon Gustav realizes both of them love Gabriela, but seeing the girl's gentleness in nursing Oscar, he holds his counsel. One day a native rushes up with news that the superintendent of the sugar factory has been caught up in the machinery. It is Gustav who rescues the badly hurt man and takes his place in the plant. Oscar is a little jealous of Gabriela's tearful gratitude for the rescue of her old friend. The Javanese Prince, owner of the factory, visits and invites them all to a native fete. Oscar, finds an opportunity to ask Gabriela to marry him, but as she refuses an eagle feather drops to the ground and Gabriela tells him that eagles mate but once, and if anything happens to their mate, they pine their lives away alone. Oscar quietly pockets the feather. That evening, Gustav rescues Gabriela from grave danger, and unconsciously reveals his love, only to realize that she loves him too. Later, a plane lands and Oscar cries out gladly as he recognizes his pilot returning for him. Gustav accepts a permanent position at the factory, and as Oscar flies off in the plane, a lone Eagle feather floats down to the embracing Gabriela and Gustav.

EASY STREET

Morgan W. Waters Drama File No. 10882

AFTER the unhappy termination of her romance with Jock Whitney, an artist, Rena goes away for the summer to forget. At the quiet little hotel where she is staying she meets Lane, who, like herself has come to forget the world. Each finds the other sympathetic, and Rena exclaims unhappily that she never wants to meet an artist again. Lane hastily changes the subject, and diving off the raft, calls to Rena to swim with him back to shore. Before two weeks have passed, the two young people realize that they are deeply in love. Although they know practically nothing about each other, they have a marriage ceremony performed by the local Justice of the Peace, and return to town to live. From the first they find idyllic happiness together. Lane works like a beaver to make enough money for their occasional trips to the movies and aside from the matter of horse-racing they have no quarrel. But if Lane has one fault it is his love of horses. Sometimes Rena is driven to distraction by his long discourses about thoroughbreds, and remembering how her father has gambled away his savings on horses, she has reason to fear that Lane too will yield to the blandishments of the races.

On their first anniversary they arrange to celebrate. Rena finishes her housekeeping early and meets Lane down town. As she waits, however, she jumps at sight of a huge poster announcing horse racing in Adam's Park. When Lane arrives, Rena tries in every way to keep him from seeing the poster, but just as they are crossing the street a young man leans out of a roadster and pointing to the right asks Lane if he noticed the poster. "Thanks, Drake," Lane shouts and Rena's eyes drop as she sees Lane study the poster enthusiastically. At last she asks if he will promise her one thing, that he will not bet on the races, and when he promises, she adds, and that he will not talk "horses" until after the races are over. They continue on their way, but suddenly Rena realizes that for a few seconds Lane hasn't heard a word she has been saying. She sees that he is looking at a picture of the actress Savilla Bane, and reluctantly,

Rena admits she is a beauitful woman. They purchase tickets for her latest movie, but all through the performance Rena is troubled by Lane's rapt expression and his occasional jottings in his notebook. As they are coming out, Hal Drake stops them and informs Lane that Savilla Bane is coming to town for a personal appearance. Rena notices her husband's quick glance at her, then clearing his thoat, Lane announces, "Hal I want you to meet my wife." Certain now that her husband is in love with this actress, Rena becomes sullen and ill-tempered and her fears are further borne out when she comes upon her husband's letter to Savilla Bane. However, Lane snatches it from her without apology and mails it. Rena decides to leave her husband. Eyes smarting with unshed tears, she packs her things and prepares to go. The postman gives her two letters for Lane, one from Savilla Bane. Just then Lane comes rushing the drive, calling loudly are there any letters. Rena gives him the two and walks out. Suddenly Lane calls excitedly for her, and waves a check from Savilla Bane. To Rena's astonishment he explains that he had taken a course in commercial art, the other letter bearing his diploma, and it was he who had painted the poster for the races. The model for his painting had been the horse named for and owned by Savilla Bane, and she had just sent him a check for his services. The only reason Lane had kept it secret from Rena, was Rena's reiterated statement that she had no use for artists. With a little sob, Rena suddenly discovers there is one artist she happens to love very much and his name is Lane.

THE TEMPERAMENTAL TODDS

Charlotte S. Allen Comedy Drama File No. 10909

WITH a thoughtful frown Jerry Todd read aloud the letter informing him his sister Marcella was about to pay them a visit. Then, as his wife Mary, seated opposite him at the breakfast table, failed to show the expected enthusiasm, Jerry reminded her of the honor conferred by a visit from a Todd. He was painstakingly pointing out the superiority of the Todd temperament, when suddenly he noticed the girls had not yet come down to breakfast. Grateful for the change of subject, Mary explained that Natalie and Valerie had come home very late from the dance. However, when Mary confided that she was worried about the girls travelling with such a fast crowd, Jerry scoffed at her old fashioned ideas and told her the Todds would always know how to handle themselves, and besides no Todd should ever be in any manner repressed. Later the girls came down. Valerie blonde and languorous raged at her evening being spoiled by her horrid green dress and when her mother reminded her she had already overdrawn her allowance Valerie pouted that only her father could understand her spiritual needs. The prospect of a visit from an aunt, even one only twent-five years old, disturbed Valerie and when Marcella, vivacious and quick witted arrived, there was an explosion as Jerry's temperament ignited at finding a despised purple tie had not been thrown out, Valerie was sulking because Richard Knapp had danced with Natalie more frequently than with her; and Marcella herself capped the climax with a flare of temperament at having such trivialities mar her reception.

Soon Marcella was to observe with increasing dismay that the so-called temperatment of the Todds, Jerry and Valerie, was nothing more than boorishness and pitying Mary and Natalie she began a little lesson of correction. That day the entire household was startled when Marcella after a colorful condemnation of Valerie's Chinese vase as an atrocity, deliberately smashed the cherished bric-a-brac on the floor. Even Valarie stared speechlessly for a moment. Then pandemonium! Meanwhile Jerry, between outbursts over offending foods, shirts, newspaper articles, and business transactions, swaggered about in anticipation of the contract James Overstreet, an admirer of Marcella's was going to give him. However, all Jerry's dreams tumbled when Marcella informed him she had sent Overstreet away because she didn't like the way he parted his hair and besides she didn't think their temperaments would harmonize. After his first outburst telling her what he thought of her "temperament," Jerry realized he was repudiating all he had ever stood for. Then Natalie, eloped with Richard Knapp, whose father was a business rival of Jerry's. Valerie, who had fancied herself in love with Richard, went out on a wild party and arrived home in a shamefully intoxicated condition. The shock cured Jerry of his last regard for the Todd temperament. Valerie herself, remorseful over the pain she had caused her parents, became more tractable, and when the telephone rang for Marcella, she came away with shining eyes as she announced "James Overstreet is coming for me in half an hour," and as Mary wished her every happiness, Marcella added turning to Jerry, "And he's bringing over that contract for you to sign, Jerry."

DIANA WEST

Margaret Eldredge Drama File No. 10957

BORN in an isolated mountain town, lovely little Diana West early distinguishes herself from the other children of the vicinity by her brightness and growing beauty. In love with Milton Green, the most popular lad in those parts, nobody doubts but that Diana will spend her life as her mother and grandmother did before her, sheltered from all contacts with the outer world. However, graduated from the local schools, Diana pleads for an opportunity to go to a high school in a nearby town, and at last her parents yield. Milton stands off silently among the many people who come to the station, but Diana, catching sight of him, runs to him and promises affectionately that she will write to him regularly. At school she supports herself by singing in choirs and at entertainments, and her necessarily cheap homespun clothes makes the other girls regard her as an inferior. However, one day she sings at an entertainment sponsored by one of the Woman's Clubs. On the same program there is a dancer, and as she sits, breathlessly watching the pirouettings of the graceful figure tears stream down her cheeks as she realizes that this is her destiny. Although her people have countenanced her singing, Diana realizes that to them dancing is the Devil's own device, and her lessons are taken in secret. Her teacher's enthusiasm at her progress is unbounded and so fine is her talent, that he writes to a producer friend in New York about her, and learns that if Diana comes to New York she can have a chorus job in a show about to be produced. Overwhelmed with happiness she writes to her people that she is coming home and almost the entire village comes to meet her at the station. However, when she confides to her mother and father that she is going to New York as a dancer, they regard her with unmitigated horror and refuse to advance the fare she requires. Only Milton, patiently studying law at home, sympathizes with her ambitions and presses upon her his entire life savings so that she can come to New York in style.

With a letter of introduction from her local teacher, the shy young girl arrives in the metropolis and manages to impress the producer more than he lets her know. She is given a single specialty number, but when the show opens receives encore after encore and finally becomes the star of the show. Orchids, jewels, favors are showed on her, and soon she returns the money Milton has sent to her, together with her press notices. Hurt by his cool little note of congratulation, she goes out recklessly with her new admirers and soon she is spending a season in London as a music hall favorite. While her elated manager is trying to get her signature for a triumphant tour, Diana receives a telegram telling her her father is dying. She rushes back home and in the little cabin finds him desperately ill. The great Diana West tends him as she would have many years ago and soon he takes a turn for the better and slowly begins to improve. Then one day Milton Green comes back, but it is a very different Milton who has inherited money and used it to further his legal education and to acquire the manner of a man of the world. And soon all the veneer drops from both of them and once more they are Diana and Milton, a boy and a girl in love. And when the great Diana West resumes her world tour, she is accompanied by her adoring and well loved husband, Milton.

POLICY KINGS

Michael Ashwood Musical Drama File No. 10917

HARLEM! Rhythm, rhythm, rhythm! Flashes into crowded rooms where bodies sway in barbaric dance. Tense faces watch the rolling of two small cubes. Despair, ecstacy! Crowded hours of love, madness and passion! The scene is a Harlem street. Small Fry breathlessly seeks out Buddy, a collector and warns him that the papers are full of the Oceanbury investigation of the policy racket. There has been an expose of the huge sums collected on the number racket, and the police are out to catch all runners, bankers, and players. Nervously Buddy asks what they are going to do, and Small Fry advises they make a big killing and get away. As Small Fry goes on to warn Barracuda, their banker, Buddy is stopped by an inquisitive cop. He manages to escape by sly answers and hurries on to the cabaret where Barracuda, huge banker, caresses the dusky dancer Santa Clara and scoffs at the report that any bull can ever outsmart him. Buddy comes running in frightened, but as he tries to get Barracuda's attention, the Big Shot, hurls the little fellow violently from him. Santa Clara remonstrates, and as Barracuda explains she doesn't have to be concerned, Buddy works for him and is used to such treatment, the dancers's eyes narrow to slits and from a nearby table, a spectator turns to his companion and exults, "Now watch that gal take Barracuda over the rocks." Meanwhile Small Fry learns that Barracuda is playing around with Santa Clara, whom Small Fry has long wanted as his own. Realizing that Barracuda is what he has always believed him to be, a double-crosser, Small Fry gets the gang together and arranges to get his pickings before Barracuda is caught. Meanwhile in the cabaret Santa Clara does her number, and Barracuda's beady eyes glisten. The chorus of high yellows swings into its dance and Buddy and his wife do a specialty number. Barracuda is warned the cops are coming. He attempts to flee but learning that the cops are already outside, he seizes Buddy and orders him to impersonate him. Realizing what will happen to him if he refuses, Buddy quakingly accepts and when the cops break in, Buddy pretends to be Barracuda and while he is hustled off to prison, Barracuda escapes scot free. When Buddy finally reveals the cops have gotten the wrong man, he returns to find that Barracuda has used his absence to try to make love to his wife, Susie, who is acting as Barracuda's secretary. His last scruple removed, Buddy joins the others in their scheme to haul Barracuda over the coals. Small Fry quarrels violently with Santa Clara, but she assures him she is just separating Barracuda from a little of his money, and with Santa Clara's arms about him, Small Fry forgets his resentment. The cops are due to raid at ten thirty, Barracuda collects the money for the numbers, suspecting each of his runners. Small Fry, however, outwits him by signalling the winning number as Barracuda hears it over the phone. Buddy's wife and the others hastily fill in the blank spaces. Barracuda, learning how much money he has to pay, tries to reneg, but the others force him to pay and leave through the window, while Barracuda remains to fall into the hands of the raiding police. In her cabaret, Santa Clara raises her voice in song while Small Fry watches her eagerly. In a back room tense faces watch the rolling of two small cubes. Money changes hands. Music, rhythm, Harlem!

TWO KINDS OF LOVE

Anna S. Rand Drama File No. 10867

FREDERICK MARSHALL, young travelling salesman found shelter for a young woman during the San Francisco earthquake, 1906. Later, when her mother and brothers returned from Los Angeles they maintained that he had compromised the girl and insisted upon an immediate marriage. A few weeks later, returning home unexpectedly, Fred found her in the arms of a lover but on the pleas of the girl's family agreed to procure the divorce on the grounds of incompatibility rather than adultery. By request he secured a transfer to St. Louis where he led a lonely existence until one day he assisted a young woman whose packages dropped from her arms in the hotel elevator. Learning that her apartment was next to his, Fred accepted her invitation to remain for coffee with Wanda and many subsequent meetings followed. It was while he was vacationing with his parents in Atlantic City that summer that Fred met Violet Thurston, and for the first time in his life feel in love. Fred experienced such happiness as he had never known before, and having secured the permission of Violet's father for their marriage, Fred returned to St. Louis to sever his business connections so that he could go into business with his father. While there he met again Wanda, but when he refused to resume their old friendship because of his coming marriage, Wanda's eyes narrowed to slits.

When he returned for Violet, he was met at the station by an enraged Mr. Thurston who thrust a letter in his hands and forbade him to enter his house again. Dumfounded, Fred read Wanda's malicious letter saying that Fred was a married man who wanted to marry Violet only for her money. Violet refused, however, to believe the charges and aserting her faith, she promised to write him regularly.

Fred worked diligently but at last yielded to his fellow workers' insistence that he come with them to the beach for a few hours respite. It didn't occur to him when a photographer snapped his picture as he saved a woman from drowning, that the picture would be shown to Violet by the detectives Mr. Thurston had engaged to follow him, and Fred was stunned to receive a copy of the picture and a letter from Violet saying she wouldn't have believed the stories Wanda told unless she were shown such proof. Fred wrote letter after letter of explanation but all were returned unopened and he learned that yielding to her parents' wishes, Violet had married the man of her father's choice and gone to Europe. Thereafter life held nothing for Fred. Blindly he walked through the streets, heedless of wind and rain, until he came down with a fever. At last, grateful to the nurse who pulled him through, he married her only to learn that she was a gold digger, extravagant and caring nothing for him.

Two years passed. Then came news from Violet that her parents and her husband had been killed in an automobile accident. Crying that she wanted to live now the life God had given her, Violet begged Fred to come with her now. But with the wisdom of long suffering, Fred urged that they wait now until the last obstacles in their path could be smoothed away so that, at last, they could attain the happiness so long denied them.

COYOTES

T. L. McCormack Western File No. 10083

AT the end of his sophomore year at Harvard, George Holmes is requested to leave, following a riotous party at his apartment. The dean informs his father that the young man has done consistently poor work in all his studies. Returning home, George is put to work as an assistant advertising manager in the large department store owned by his father, but he soon tires of this work. In despair, his father decides to send the boy to his uncle's ranch in Texas, advising him that he must try to make good in this environment. Arriving at the Graybar Ranch, George is met by his uncle who is surprised to learn that the young man cannot ride or shoot. George attends a local dance, wearing a tuxedo, while the rest of the men are dressed in cowboy regalia. He is the object of much ridicule until Eleanor Hunter, an attractive girl from a neighboring ranch, comes to his rescue and dances with him. She gives him permission to call at her home, where she lives with her aunt and eleven-year-old brother, Bobby. Returning home, George persuades Clem Lewis, a cowboy, to teach him to ride. He is taken to the corral for his first lesson, and hangs on desperately, to the amusement of the men seated on the fence. One evening George's uncle tells him that coyotes are stealing the sheep from the ranches. With more enthusiasm than he has ever shown for his studies at Harvard, the young man proposes to organize an expedition to kill these scavengers, and spends many hours learning to handle a rifle. Calling on Eleanor a few days later, he is told that Bobby has not returned from riding in the hills. George goes off at once in search of the little boy.

He discovers Bobby, thrown from his horse into a ravine, his leg broken. As night falls, a pack of coyotes approaches and circle around him. One of them advances close, just as George reaches him. Dismounting, he shoots the coyote, then grasps the animal by its throat and throws it several feet away. He hastily builds a fire with dried pieces of wood at hand to keep the other coyotes at bay. Hearing the pistol shots, a searching party finds them and Bobby is taken safely home. George then tells the men that this is their oportunity to rid the country of coyotes. Together the group ride all night, shooting and killing the entire pack before morning. When Eleanor thanks George for saving her little brother, he asks her to reward him by promising to become his wife, and she gladly consents.

Proud of his son's bravery, George's father pays a visit to the Graybar Ranch, and congratulates the boy's uncle on the change that he has made in him, but he is told that part of the credit belongs to Eleanor, whom he meets. His father asks George if he wishes to return to the city, but, disclosing his engagement, the boy replies that the west is the only place for him. Mr. Holmes welcomes Eleanor to the family, and gives the young couple a ranch as a wedding present.

THE FIDDLER COLLECTS

Theodore Arnheiter Drama File No. 11008

DEEPLY moved by the beauty and strangeness of the world, Theodore, walking through deep, white snow, and listening to the peaceful strains of Silent Night, wishes that the law of polarity might be proven to him that he might probe deeper into the mystery of life. No sooner is this wish expressed than a ghostly form appears, and, advising him that he will learn how the Fiddler collects, releases Theodore's spirit from his body. Endowed with the power to make this transference at will, Theodore journeys to the home of Mr. Harvey Williams, and enters, invisible to the master of the house, whome he finds in hs study, surrounded by his many splendid paintings by American artists. Theodore then observes the entrance of Florence, Mr. Williams' daughter, who, radiant and lovely in her youthful purity, smooths away her father's troubled frown with a kiss. As these two talk, Florence is impressed with a poetic, philosophic quality in her adored father which she had never before discovered. Their conversation is interrupted by Harvey, Jr., raucously singing "On the Road to Mandalay," when the youth advises his father that a short life and a merry one is his desire, and lightly comments on the physical attractions of women, the older man remonstrates with him, leaving the room in well controlled anger. Mrs. Williams joins the two children, and, with characteristic sympathy and understanding, quiets her impetuous son when he plans revenge upon Mr. Citrus Forrest for injustices against Mr. Vogel, his vocal instructor.

A pathetic looking elderly man, very shabbily dressed, calls upon Mr. Williams, who is deeply embarrased when Harvey, upon being presented to Mr. Neeborg, refuses to shake hands with him. Mrs. Williams and Florence greet this unfortunate old friend with the courtesy of true breeding, however, and Harvey is ashamed of his conduct. Mr. Williams requests his friend to tell Harvey his life story, and, falteringly, he relates a pitiable account of youthful dissipation with the wrong sort of women which destroyed his health and chance to fulfill his life. That night, when father and son are together in the library, Mr. Williams, deeply moved, confesses that he, too, once yielded to the charms of a dancer and was saved from Neeborg's unhappy life only by the sympathy of his wife. Reading from the Rubaiyat, Mr. Williams, his voice trembling, pronounces the words: "Thou thyself art Heaven and Hell," while Harvey listens, his flippant, careless mood forever gone. The next morning, Mr. Williams is discovered in his final sleep. Controlling their deep grief because they believe he is in a better world, the family dispense with the usual gloom attendant upon funerals, as they bid him farewell, and carry on the responsibilities of life, as he would have them.

A few months later, Theodore watches Florence in the garden with three of her young friends who tease her about the interest Jack, son of a millionaire, is displaying in her charm, but she replies that she will marry only for love. When Rudolf, a poor young man of excellent character, asks Mrs. Williams permission to marry her daughter it is readily granted, and later, in the garden, these two young people plight their troth. A changed man since his father's death, Harvy remonstrates with his college chums who seek casual pleasures, pointing out to them the unfortunate record of those who have pursued this course.

Some force sends Theodore's released spirit to a basement restaurant in the East Sixties, where he observes a charming, radiant girl upholding the merits of free love in a spirited conversation with two other members of her sex. Returning again to the Williams' home, troubled by this last vision, Theodore sees Harvey deep in prayer. Shortly after this Theodore loses his power, and his chain of memories is shattered, but all returns to him when he returns a wallet he finds on a railroad platform to Harvey, and in his earthly form, becomes a fast friend of the young man as the two journey together on the train. Accepting an invitation to visit him, Theodore is presented to Eleanor, Harvey's lovely wife, whom he recognizes as the girl he saw months before in the restaurant. Again, his spirit released, Theodore sees Eleanor's doctor attempt to embrace her when she consults him regarding her health; breaking away, she slaps him, and hurries home in a state of hysteria. The doctor sails for London, advising Harvey that his wife is suffering from mental disorder, in order to cover his own guilt. Anxious to help his friend, Theodore remains on with him, at his urgent request, while Eleanor slowly regains her health. When Miss Emerson, her pretty nurse, advocates the philosophy of momentary pleasure, Eleanor warns her that sooner or later she must pay the Fiddler, and Harvey quotes the Rubaiyat, awakening a slumbering conscience in the young woman. With tears in her eyes, she confesses, half humorously, this new disturbance to husband and wife, who listen sympathetically.

On Christmas Eve, Harvey comes home laden with gifts for his little son, while Florence and Rudolf likewise bring contributions of toys, but Eleanor's present is a delicate set of figures of the Holy Family in the Manger. The little fellow is more impressed with this than with the delights of Santa Claus and his pack, while all share his happiness in the day.

A few days later, Molly and Anne, the servants, discuss a scene between their beloved mistress and the minister when the latter was accused of wantonly destroying innocence and ordered from the house. That night, Eleanor paces the room anxiously, and takes the bullets from a revolver in the library table drawer. Just as the new year is being ushered in, Eleanor confronts her husband in the library, telling him of a nightmare in which his father led her past aisles of snakes to a high plateau from which she jumped into a pit of misery. Thoroughly alarmed, Harvey tries to quiet his wife, but she continues hysterically, confessing that the cause for this dream was her own guilt. Before her marriage to Harvey she hed believed in free love, and practiced it. Overcome with an uncontrollable fit of anger, Harvey attempts to shoot Eleanor, and this failing, seizes a red hot poker, but the apparition of his father, repeating the words: "Thou Thyself Art Heaven and Hell," saves him from this madness, and he takes his wife in his arms as she collapses. Forgiven, she dies, and for her sake Harvey devotes his life to helping the unfortunate and warning youth that the Fiddler collects. When Miss Emerson becomes among his most ardent disciples, he knows that he will not be alone in his battle, as daily he becomes more and more like his father. Alone in his library after a day devoted to charity work and adjustment of conditions in his factory, he repeats the words: "Thou Art Thyself Heaven and Hell," while Theodore's spirit watches, and smiles in approval, the theory of polarity tested to his complete satisfaction. As he leaves he sees Miss Emerson and Harvey's little son join the devoted father.

BECAUSE THEY LOVED

Al Brooks Drama File No. 10872

WHEN their fatber's business fails and he loses all interest in providing for his family, Edith, the oldest of the Bennett girls finds employment out of town, and sends the larger part of her earnings home regularly. At the same time, Anita, the prettiest of them all, decides to go out and get work of her own. Although she soon obtains work, she is dissatisfied, and convinced that she is worth more than she is getting, she begins looking about for a better position . Thus, while applying, she meets Stephen Parker. He is unable to find an opening for her, but Anita does not hesitate to use all her charms to interest him. At length Stephen introduces her to a friend who can give her a position. When Stephen tries to leave, however, Anita throws her arms about his neck and kisses him. After a moment's hesitation, he returns her kisses.

Anita spends as much as she makes, and when her family begins to need more than Edith can send them, Edith decides to return to town and thus save the expense of board. She manages to get transferred to an office near home, and just as Stephen is driving Anita home in his car, Edith comes along. Anita introduces her sister to Stephen, and frowns as she notices their instant interest in each other. Stephen accepts an invitation to come inside and soon he and Edith are in love with each other. However, when, soon after, Edith announces over the dinner table that she is to be married to Stephen Parker, Anita blanches and leaves the table. Disturbed Edith follows her to her room, and lifts the tear stained face. At last Anita admits she is going to have Stephen's child. It is an appalling situation. Stephen loves Edith more than life, whereas Anita has never been anything to him but a passing adventure. But Edith will not listen to anything save that Stephen marry Anita, and at last, feeling only pity for the frightened girl, Stephen marries her. Anita brightens immediately and even admits that she wanted this to happen, that she hoped she would have a baby to trap Stephen. The next few months are torture for Edith and for Stephen. Seeking solace in her work, Edith turns every dollar she makes over to her family, but nothing brings relief from the thought that she and Stephen can never be anything to each other any more. Meanwhile Anita, spends money extravagantly and deplores the fact that the coming of the baby will curtail her social activities. At last the baby is born, but Anita's unwillingness to heed the advice of her physician and her husband takes its toll, and she dies as her baby comes into the world. Only the soft reassuring voice of Edith serves to comfort Anita at the end, and as she sees Stephen and Edith standing at her bedside, she cries a little at the realization of how she has kept them apart, and makes them promise they will both look after her child.

And some weeks later, Stephen and Edith are to be married and tightly in her arms, Edith is to hold her sister's child whom she is to love as her own.

LITTLE GIRL

Emily Cornew Drama File No. 10653

AT the close of the nineteenth century the Wrights move to South Africa. While they are getting settled on their farm, Jackie, playing outside, sets up a shout that a wagon is approaching with a lot of people in it. The Wrights come to the door and find that Mr. and Mr. Nels, Dutch farmers and neighbors have come to pay an introductory visit. While the older people fraternize, Jackie shows Katrina, the little Nels girl, about and fancying that she is paying more attention to his sister than to him, he tugs violently at her two ginger pigtails. Tears come to Katrina's eyes and Jackie, repentant, only blusters the more. When the Wrights come to visit the Nels, Katrina, shyly shows her great admiration for Jackie, but he scorns her and when she offers him a biscuit she has baked, he pretends that it is too hard to bite and with a great show of comtempt takes down a huge knife to cut it. However, in his zeal, the knife slips and he cuts his finger badly. Bravely Jackie holds back his cries, while Katrina smoothes his hair and tells him again and again how sorry she is.

Meanwhile the reports of the gold rush in Johannesburg cause Mr. Wright to decide to try his fortune. After days of preparation, the Wrights set forth in a donkey wagon and while Jackie's eyes are fixed impatiently on the horizon, Katrina wistfully waves her handkerchief at the departing Wrights. Within a month after they have settled in the gold country, however, Mr. Wright is killed in a mine accident and his little family left stranded. Jackie, faced with responsibility for the first time in his life, shares the burden nobly while Mrs. Wright opens a small boarding house with Jackie's help. Soon they are managing fairly and Jackie, attracting the attention of the Engineer is offered an apprenticeship. Excitedly he begins studying Engineering and through his zeal and application, he distinguishes himself. After several years, Jackie is sent to England on business, but a few days before he is to leave, a call comes from a farm plant in Pietersburg which has bought some machinery from his company. Jackie volunteers to drop off and inspect the supplies before proceeding hurriedly on to the Coast. A few minutes are left before his train pulls out. One of the farmer's wives puts some coffee up for him, and looking up into the lovely face of the girl who brings it to him, Jackie stares at her transfixed. Then rising, he takes her hand and at the whistle of his train blows, he whispers, "I'll come back." Dazed, Katrina stares after him, vainly trying to remember where she has seen his scarred hand before and suddenly, "Jackie," she calls, but he is out of hearing, then weakly, "He didn't know me." At last, through inquiries from the company, Katrina learns where Jackie has come from, and at last she manages to visit some relatives who live nearby. Tremulously Katrina visits Jackie's mother, who peers short sightedly at her lovely visitor, then seeing the coiled ginger braids cries, "Katrina." Jackie's letters home are filled with references to the girl he has met and fallen in love with, although he couldn't stop to get her name, and Mrs. Wright smiles. However, while going down to her box to get one of Jackie's letters, Mrs. Wright is stricken with influenza from exposure, and Katrina arranges to stay on as her nurse. Slowly Mrs. Wright begins to recover, and Jackie, returning home, embraces Katrina, hair plaited in the two pigtails of her his mother then looks up toward the door where youth, stands. Rushing to her, Jackie seizes her hands and as full comprehension of who she is comes to him, he tilts her face and brushing back the lovely hair, kisses her tenderly.

MAN AND WIFE

Altha C. Duncan Drama File No. 10808

AFTER ten years of marriage, Helen Norton realizes that her dearest wish is to be granted, as she happily sews on tiny garments and furnishes a dainty nursery. Charles, her husband, tells her that his happiness is complete. when he smiles at her and their baby daughter, Bess, is born a few months later. The child grows up into a lovely girl. At sixteen, she shares her basket with John Taylor at a church social, escaping for a few stolen moments of innocent pleasure from her aunt's strict chaperonage. The two fall in love, and plan to marry when they are older. At nineteen, Bess experiences her first tragedy when her mother is thrown from her horse and killed as she is racing with her daughter. The bond of affection between Bess and her father grows even stronger in the sad days that follow; loyally, the girls resolves never to marry as long as her father needs her. Two years later, John returns from school, having attained an appointment as a private detective, and accidentally come into a small fortune when oil was discovered on his father's property. Charles Norton, recognizing the young man from his picture, prepares to meet him at the train and conduct him to Bess, who waits anxiously, selecting her most becoming dress. On the way, Fred Moressa, a stranger, asks Mr. Norton if he may see his famous stable of racing horses, and is given an affirmative reply.

Moressa then enters an old rooming house, where a party is in progress and, dismissing the women, informs his colleague, Duke, that Art, stable boy for Mr. Norton's farm, has informed him that Norton is to sell horses valued at forty thousand dollars to a Mr. Van Buren in Chicago. They must kidnap Norton at Jerry Junction, steal his papers, and conclude the sale themselves. Hattie, Fred's sweetheart, listens to this, concealed in a room with a secret panel, and plans revenge. Meanwhile, John and Bess find their love as ardent as it was five years ago. As they are seated on the divan before the fire, Hattie burst in upon them, and relates Fred's plans, adding that she is in reality his daughter, although he does not know this. Fred so cruelly mistreated his wife that she died, leaving Hattie, only ten, to shift for herself. Mr. Norton, years ago, had seen the child weeping at her mother's grave, and given her money with which to reach the home of relatives who had cared for her. Upon reaching maturity she had attracted the admiration of her own father at a dance, and encouraged his attentions in order that she might someday reward Mr. Norton for his kindness and revenge herself upon Fred for cruelty to her mother.

Taking Charles into confidence, John plans for him to leave a telegram stating that Mr. Van Buren will call at the Palmer House and signed, Van Buren. This he does, and Duke, reading it, invites Norton to his room for a drink, kidnapping him at Jerry Junction, and turning him over to Art, who has confessed everything to John, saying that he was bribed with dope to spy for Fred. Assuming the name of Mr. Norton, Fred calls at the hotel, believeing he is seeing Van Buren, but actually dealing with John. When he forces him to give up his check, Whitney, one of four detectives assisting John, enters the room with the others, disguised as a Jewish merchant, and arrests Moressa. Confession is obtained from all the gang, when Art and Burns, another detective who have made a comical trip on horseback, arrive. Hattie kills her father and herself, denouncing him. The deal satisfactorily completed, John is free to turn to Bess, and soon they become man and wife, while Mr. Norton smiles his approval.

GOLD COAST

Emal Drama File No. 10763

DESPITE the reports he is receiving that his mine workers are desperately in want, Arthur Gibson orders another cut in wages. Ominous rumblings are heard, and the pinched-faced miners gather unhappily in the hope of forcing a reconsideration . However, when Gibson offers them the alternative of lowered wages or no jobs at all, the men, goaded beyond all endurance, kidnap Gibson's only son . Far from yielding to them, Gibson orders detectives and police to investigate, only to realize at last he has failed. At last he promises to comply with all demands if his son is restored, but it is now too late. Nobody will dare produce the lad and harried by remorse, Gibson collapses and after several years of blaming himself, Gibson dies. His wife, deeply suffering, continues to believe her boy still lives, and the estate of her husband remains unsettled until such time as young Arthur should either be found, or proof of his death be produced. Meanwhile, throughout the years, the resources of the estate are employed in advertising for the return of the boy .

All this time, Arthur lives. Upon being kidnapped, he has been delivered into the hands of Julian, a moonshiner, who keeps the boy, roars with laughter when the lad is overcome by the fumes of the liquor, and beats the youngster for his own amusement. However, when Julian discovers that the authorities are on his trail, he turns the boy over to one Santos, who, after a gambling game with Indians, loses everything and finally bets Arthur against his lost pony. The Indians, winning the boy, dye his face and find him unusually useful as a worker. One old squaw protects the lad. Meanwhile Arthur awaits his chance to escape, and finally, one morning when the Indians are exhausted from their tribal dances, Arthur escapes on a trusty little pony. He is pursued, but escapes unhurt until his brave little pony stumbles and Arthur, hurled over the animal's head, is knocked unconscious. His body is discovered by Sam Hawkins, once a wealthy Easterner who had lost his entire fortune in unfortunate mine speculations. With his daughter Honey, Hawkins takes up the boy and nurses him through his fever. One day, however, Hawkins is overtaken by his old friend. Andrews, who bears the welcome news that the mine in which Hawkins had his largest holdings, has been liquidated and is now paying back eighty cents on the dollar. Moreover, in an old newspaper Andrew brings, Arthur reads the ad asking for information about him. He writes to his mother and receives a tear stained letter in reply. Forthwith, he returns home, promising to return immediately to make Honey his bride. At the station Mrs. Gibson meets every train in the pathetic hope that her boy will return to her, and when at last she holds him to her, the porters and conductors witnessing the touching reunion turn away with a suspicious moisture in their eyes. Arthur is held up by the estate and when no answers come to him from Honey he is beside himself with worry. Together with his mother he journeys out to meet her only to discover that she and her father have gone on. He follows her trail until he hears two strangers discussing a pony they wished to buy and how the girl had refused to give it up despite the man's willingness. From them, Arthur learns where the Hawkins are and in the dining room of a fashionable hotel, hardly recognizing each other in city clothes, Arthur and Honey meet again. And Mr. Hawkins and Mrs. Gibson too find in each other's companionship some measure of their lost youth.

MISS NOBODY

Mabel Bowler Drama File No. 10676

AT the laughing insistence of the other girls in the office, Myrtle buys a gay dress and promises for once to go with them to a dance. When she returns home, however, her sterned faced aunt sets her jaw firmly when she notices the money missing from the girl's pay envelope, and when Myrtle brings out the dress and tries to explain that there isn't any harm in wanting to have fun like the other girls, her aunt tears the dress grimly and snaps that she is through trying to keep Myrtle decent. The girl picks up the remains of the dress she has so longed wanted and unhappily packs her few old fashioned clothes in a Gladstone. Downstairs, however, she tries to reconcile her aunt, only to be turned away by the hard, set face. With tears in her eyes, Myrtle boards a train out of town.

On the West Coast she tries in vain to get a position . Her dowdy appearance in the clothes her aunt has approved of her loses opportunty after opportunity for her, and at last, she winces as she hears some girls laughing at her. However, one smartly dressed girl, slangily approaches and tells her she'll never land a job in that rig. As Myrtle shrugs disconsolately, Rita is moved by the girl's unhappiness, and remembering her own struggles, offers to aid. With makeup skillfully applied by Rita, and beautiful in the dress whose lengthening Rita has supervised, Myrtle applies for a position in Rita's store and gets it . Grateful, she tries to show her appreciation to Rita who advises her curtly to "Cut it." Several weeks later, while Rita is entertaining a group of friends in her apartment, she and the others laugh at Edgar Lindsay, wealthy Eastern visitor, who stands apart from the gaiety. Suddenly Rita remembers Myrtle, and dashing down the hall she brings the shy girl in. Myrtle colors in embarrassment, and Edgar, who has taken the teasing good naturedly, is moved by her distress. He leads her to a chair in the corner and soon has her at ease. For the first time Myrtle finds herself enjoying herself and thereafter her friendship with Edgar grows. One night she is riding with him while Rita and a friend, a movie comedian, are gaily drinking in the back seat. As her head falls tiredly on his shoulder, his arms tightens protectively about her. That night he kisses her for the first time in a haze of happiness as he tells her about his family, Myrtle decides to return to her aunt and win her forgiveness. At the train, Edgar holds her hand for a long moment as he tells her he'll have something important to ask when she returns . However, Myrtle's aunt takes one look at her smart clothes, and before giving the girl a chance to say anything, the bitter old lady shouts she might have known Myrtle would follow in her mother's footsteps. The dazed girl learns for the first time that her mother was never married, and as the train wheels pound, she hears her aunt calling, "Nobody, Nobody." Unwilling to saddle Edgar with a nameless wife, Myrtle pretends upon her return that she was just playing with Edgar's affections and when, appalled, he leaves her, she joins Rita's crowd and drinks and smokes in an effort to disgust Edgar. However, one night as she struts on the table and falls drunkenly into grasping hands, Edgar strides forward, catches her, and carries her outside. Alone he smoothes her tousled hair, and as she weeps the reason for her masquerade, he kisses her gently and tells her what her mother did is no concern of his, all that matters to him is that he loves her—and she loves him!

THE CROSS OF THE ARMORER

Charles Poe Costume Drama File No. 10905

WHEN the mighty Emperor Barbarossa is attacked by a band of roving knights, one of his party, Conrad, son of the Count of Weissen seizes the royal purple plaid, and is mistaken for Barbarossa himself. The Emperor and others escape, while Conrad bravely holds his ground until reinforcements arrive and capture the knights who too late realize they have been trying to kill the wrong man. Gravely wounded, Conrad is carried to Teck, where the youthful Count Edelbert tends Conrad and nurses his wounds. Barbarossa, out of gratitude for Conrad's bravery, dubs him knight. On his return to Weissen, Conrad halts, near his own castle, to look after the most beautiful girl he has ever seen. Learning that she is Siglinda, daughter of the armorer, Conrad stops to order a hunting knife, in the hope that thus he can meet the fair Siglinda. However, beyond a brief glimpse of her he is disappointed. He returns home to his anxious parents and is received with all gladness and ceremony. Upon the first opportunity, however, Conrad sets out once more to get the hunting knife he has ordered. As he comes to the turn of the path, he hears a woman's cry of distress. Enraged at sight of a tall bearded knight forcing unwelcome attentions upon a struggling girl, Conrad catches the assaulter on the neck with his mailed fist. The green knight sinks to the ground, and as Conrad turns to the girl, he gasps at sight of Siglinda. Her eyes meet his and as strength leaves her body she swoons. Conrad catches her and smoothing her hair he murmurs broken phrases of love. Her eyes open and she tries to rise but the struggle has robbed her of all strength. At last she recovers. Conrad ties up the green knight, Egon, and taking the lovely Siglinda by the hand, brings her safely home . When her father learns of Conrad's service, he presents him with a golden cross of simple but exquisite workmanship. Speechless with gratitude, Conrad places his own rosary about the beautiful neck of Siglinda and soon after takes his leave. Egon is brought to the castle awaiting execution, but the following morning a messenger arrives from the Emperor ordering the Count and his son Conrad to a Council of War. Entrusting Egon to the castellon, the warriors set forth and find the Emperor exceedingly wroth over an order from the Pope ordering greater haste in getting the Army of Crusaders under way. Although the Emperor is past his 80th year and wants peace and rest rather than warfare, he dares not refuse the papal edict. After a week of parley Conrad and his father return home. Wrapped in thoughts of Siglinda, Conrad turns suddenly at hearing a low moan from his father who has been riding beside him. Leaping from his horse, the young warrior catches his father who has fallen from his saddle, and with infinite care, draws from the shoulder of the aged Count, a dagger. Looking up, Conrad beholds the vanishing form of Egon of Steinen, and realizes the dagger was intended for him not his father. Entrusting the wounded man to the sorrowful attendants, Conrad proceeds after the ambusher and at last catches up with him. For terrible minutes the two armored knights strike at each other, and Egon strikes a mighty blow which appears deflected from Conrads's breast. In his moment of astonishment, Egon leaves an opening, and with one blow, Conrad stretches him lifeless upon the ground. Returning to his father, Conrad rejoices to find him still breathing, and his men carry the stricken warrior to the village. At last, forced to call a halt, they take refuge in the home of the armorer, and Conrad looks on while the deft hands of Siglinda bandage the gaping wound. Alone in his room, Conrad discovers the cross broken in twain, and realizes that it was this which saved his life against Egon's thrust. The Countess arrives to care for her husband, and in the days that follow Conrad and Siglinda fall more deeply in love than ever. The Countess, observing, mentions it to her husband, but the Count laughs and advises her to let Conrad sow his wild oats. However, when the Count learns that Conrad contemplates marriage to the lowly born daughter of the Armorer, terrible is his wrath. In stentorian tones he declares that never has one of his line profaned the fair name of Weissen by marriage to a village girl. Conrad, however, remains adamant. Weeks pass. The Count's eyes sinks deeply into his head in grief. One day he calls Conrad to him and holding out a letter received from the Emperor advises the lad to go with the Crusaders to the Holy Lands. If he returns safely, the Count will raise no further objections to his marriage with Siglinda. The lovers part tenderly and at the side of young Edelbert, Count of Teck, and Edelbert's faithful old Castellon, Cuno. Young Conrad marches off to the wars. After many battles, one day, Conrad, Edelbert, and Cuno are attacked by Turks whom they beat off. Dying, Cuno confesses that when a daughter was born to the already middle-aged Countess of Teck, the Countess, realizing how disappointed her husband would be, agreed to substitute for the child, a son born to the wife of, an Armorer. Thus Siglinda, rightful heiress of Teck was brought up in obscurity, while Edelbert took her place in Teck. For days thereafter, outside his tent, Edelbert broods . Then one day, while storming the enemy, Edelbert falls. Conrad fighting at his side, draws him out of line and places him on the ground, but with a grasp of his friend's hand, Edelbert passes to the Great Beyond. Shortly after, Conrad is wounded and his Emperor, in recognition of his faithful services, sends him home to recover the use of his lame hand. One beautiful Spring morning, Conrad dismounts in front of Siglinda's house and while the entire village gathers in welcome, Conrad takes the fair Siglinda into his arms. A letter from the Emperor himself, bears out the confession of the Castellon, and all obstactles removed, Conrad and Siglinda, are joined in the bonds of holy wedlock to reign in triumph over the combined lands of Weissen and Teck.

RANSOM MONEY

Leo Ballman Drama File No. 10675

UNAWARE of the fact that her recently acquired friend, Frederick Stuart has negotiated with gangsters to kidnap her and hold her for ransom, Frances Thomas changes her plans of meeting him, thus unwittingly avoiding the ambush set for her, dresses in men's clothing, and in the interest of securing material for a book she is writing, hops a box car and pretends to be a hobo. As she passes the town where her father's factories are running behind schedule she sees a young man dart after the train which is already in motion. The wind whips his hat off his head, Frances catches it as Jack Lehman swings himself aboard the train now moving at a fast rate, Frances admiringly hands him his cap. He thanks her elaborately for rescuing his prized chapeau and a friendship is begun between the two young travelers. Frances, calling her herself

Billy, reveals that she is traveling in search of material, and the other sighs deeply and begins a long and amazing tale of his adventures, telling how he was jilted by his childhood sweetheart and in his disillusion had given up the Frozen Custard business which he had turned into a great industry. Disillusioned, Frozen Custard, as he asked to be called, had travelled all over the world in search of a woman to love. Frances is embarrassed not realizing that from the first moment Jack has realized she is a woman and has made up the whole story on the spot. They part, promising to meet in the Jungle, and Frozen Custard, thinking Frances has slipped away from him is disconsolate. However, she turns up and together they have an opportunity to observe first hand the deplorable state of men who had once earned fine salaries. Sharing their food with the accepted comaraderie of the road their friendship grows and Jack changes his itinerary so he can continue on with Frances. However, realising she is falling in love with her utterly charming companion, Frances decides to run away and sitting astride the head end of the engine prepares to go on alone. However Jack joins her and while she looks stonily ahead he scolds her for the great risk she is running. It rains and the two hoboes are miserable but the worst is yet to come when they see ahead of them an old Ford which the young ruffians of a town have placed on the track. Frances buries her head in Jack's shoulder as the train rams into the car, but Jack, instantly sizing up the situation, pretends to the anxious engineer and passengers that he and Frances, his young bride, were driving in the wrecked car. Solicitiously they are accepted in the train and together in the drawing room placed at their disposal, Frances pouts at Jack's story. He tells her he loves her but just as they settle back felicitously the conductor brings them a paper and Frances starts as she reads that her father has paid $50,000 to kidnappers in ransom for her. Learning the details Jack immediately proceeds to the home of Frederick Stuart, the go between, and after a terrific battle recovers the $50,000 from the would be kidnapper. Returning the money to Frances' grateful father, Jack reveals he was a worker in the Thomas factories who had been fired by the unscruplous foreman because of his valuable ideas. The foreman is released, Jack is given an opportunity to put the Thomas factories on a paying basis again and Frances wins as a bridegroom the daring and whimsical Jack Lehman.

GYPSY BLOOD

Gertrude B. Weeden Drama File No. 10815

THERE sbe stood, between the parted curtains, in riding clothes. Rain dripping from her radiant face, she acknowledged the strained greetings of her husband's dinner guests, and with an apology, she ran upstairs. Minutes later, her loveliness enhanced by her perfectly cut dinner gown, Eloise descended the stairs to take her place as hostess. The conversation was strained. She tried to explain how she had been riding in the rain and had lost all sense of time, but the guests accepted her explanation awkwardly, and as soon as possible after dinner, left. Eloise was left alone with her husand. She shivered as she saw his fine strong face drawn with displeasure. He had given her three years, he said, to curb her emotionalism. He was the joke of his clubs, his family, because of her absurd rain revels. And as he ended by saying they could only be thankful there wasn't a child to suffer from her outburst Eloise shuddered, and turning slowly, climbed the stairs to her own room.

In her own room, Eloise realized Calvert was right. She had sauntered into a formal teas in sports clotbes, her hair all windblown. Even when a bride, she had left her room at dawn and came in as Calvert was sipping his coffee. He had called her "gypsy" then but felt soon she would soon become molded to fit into his precise carefully planned life. She had tried, but some wild call always drew her into the open. She must blow with the wind, wash up with the surf. It was the blood she had inherited from her gypsy grandmother.

The next afternoon without even seeing her husband, she had sought the quiet of Calvert's lodge. Taking with her supplies sufficient for a few days, she had hired a city car so that no questions would be asked. The way was little used and slippery with deep mud. The driver exclaimed over the hard going, but when they reached the lodge, he had carried in her crate of provisions then standing his ground had called her to him. Realizing suddenly the danger of her position, Eloise had fled, stumbling into the woods. The man waited. Rain pelted down. Suddenly with the peace and strength that always came to her outdoors, she returned, cheerily set about putting up coffee and with a poise that abashed the driver explained that she had come here to be alone because sbe was unhappy. Suddenly inflated that tbis woman should talk to him like this, the driver, Jo, he called himself, promised his protection. He would stay, he decided at length, and sleep outside in his car. The next morning Eloise prepared breakfast. Slangily assured, Jo decided to go trout fishing, and heart jumping at the thought of fishing in the rain, Eloise had gone too. It was almost dusk when they returned. There were voices. Calvert's and his lawyers. Calvert turned to go, but suddenly Jo cut in. "Wait," he cried, "you and I are not fit to—to—to—not—fit—to speak to her. This lawyer person and I are leaving so you can find it out for yourself." Eloise swayed and dropped silently to the floor. When she recovered, Calvert was kissing her. "When I saw you sway and lie there, helpless—I knew," he said. Eloise smiled happily. Calvert's lips were on hers reverently.

DISCIPLINE IS VERY IMPORTANT

Ted Dykes Drama File No. 10956

FROM the day Tom Jenkins had knocked out the front tooth of Wesley G. Jordan for forcing a kiss on the trembling lips of Helena Parry, the two boys had been enemies. That night it rankled sandy-haired young Tom to be warned by his own father not to have any more trouble with the Jordan boy because his father was a big man in town and it wouldn't do to antagonize him.

Then had come high school. With Helena watching from the grand stand, Tom had been forced by the coach to run interference for Jordan. He saw the two hundred pound captain of the oppossing team ready to drag Wesley to an ignominious tumble, but, gritting his teeth, Tom had hurled himself directly in the way of the steam roller opposition and Wesley had run the ball through a clear field for a touch down. The cheering section had, "Yea Jordan!" while Tom had limped off the field with a sprained ankle. The sports writers' praise of Wesley's ball carrying abilities, inflated his ego almost to the bursting point.

Meanwhile Tom was falling more deeply in love than ever with Helena, while Wesley quietly baited his trap with his millions. At first Helena tried to stave off her family's choice of Wesley, but at last, when she saw her father lose everything and it became a matter of accepting Wesley or seeing her family starve she became Wesley's wife. She was never to forget the look of anguish on Tom's face as she came out of the Church in her bridal gown. And in the months to follow Jordan was to drive her to the verge of madness with his jealousy of Tom and his constant suspicion that if he didn't watch her so closely she'd have a liason with her former lover.

Then with the outbreak of war, Tom enlisted. Through his political influence, Wesley was to get a commission as an officer in the same regiment and there was no humiliation he spared Tom. "Discipline," Wesley was snapping, "is very important," then turning to Tom, he shouted, "This means you!" Next morning at one a motorcycle orderly brought news to the Colonel. Sleepy soldiers stumbled along the roads. In a hastily constructed trench, the regiment was given final directions and Company G. went over the top. As Tom lay spread-eagled in a hastily scraped depression for fifteen minutes his nerves began to crack. As the machine guns of the enemy let up for five seconds reloading, Tom made for a large hole and landed beside another figure in a shell hole. To his surprise he saw Lieutenant Jordan! For a moment neither spoke then with a pistol thrust against Tom's side, Jordan ordered Tom to wipe out the machine gun nest with a hand grenade. When Tom protested that the moment he raised his head he'd be killed, Jordan grinned. Tom crept forward. The attention of the enemy was on a Spad diving with full gun. Meanwhile the plane swerved sharply. The first egg went short blowing up the hole where Jordan lay. The second landed in the German machine gun nest, destroyed a moment ago by Tom's grenade. Decorated as a hero, Tom returned from the war to find Jordan's widow, Helena, awaiting for him.

PINK ORCHIDS

Virginia Bragg Tyson Drama File No. 10912

CYNTHIA WATKINS sat at her Sheraton dressing table giving the finishing touches to her immaculate toilette. The mirror reflected her bronze hair and svelte lines of her body clothed in eggshell satin . Fastening a corsage of pink orchids on her shoulder she started downstairs. In the reception hall her husband, Dr. Cary Watkins waited, holding her ermine wrap on his arm. His eyes followed her with mute admiration as he helped her with her wrap and summoned their car. Stopping before the Metropolitan Opera House, the Watkins moved toward their choice seats. Cynthia noticed two evil-faced men nodding in their direction and shuddered slightly. During the intermission of the last act, Cynthia drew closer to Cary as she saw the two men again, but Cary reassured her and in the beauty of the music, Cynthia forgot her fears.

In their private car, the Watkins were riding toward home when a black car suddenly cut in front of them forcing them to the curve. Almost before they knew what had happened, the Watkins' chauffeur, Thompson, had been overpowered and two men forced them at the points of guns to precede them into the other car. Through the deserted streets the pair were driven to a florist shop in a sinister looking neighborhood and ordered out. Handcuffed as Cary was, he tried to trip one of the men only to receive a crushing blow on the jaw and to be shoved inside. Behind the camouflaged front of the shop was a speakeasy, ready for business. Pushed violently into two straight backed chairs, the Watkins were informed that they were going to be held for fifty grand. Cary pleaded with them to let his wife go for the money, but his request was laughed at and when he was told he could go for it and his wife remain as surety, he gritted. "Never!" However ,when they were told it meant "the spot" for both of them, Cynthia urged him to go since it was the only way.

The gangsters withdrew. Cynthia saw a door in the rear and rushed to it only to cry sadly, "It's locked!" Directing Cynthia to take some poison capsules from his pocket, and use them if things became unbearable, Cary submitted to being separated from his wife.

During his absence Cynthia remained alone with her thoughts. After hours that seemed like months she heard footsteps and swinging around looked into the flashing eyes of Silvio Cardoni who informed her the boys called him Chief. Cynthia noticed the jagged scar on his wrist as he slowly lit a cigarette and watched her silently. At last Cardoni smiled ironically and informed her she would be more comfortable in his apartment upstairs. Desperately sparring for time, Cynthia parried and encouraged Cardoni to boast about his importance. At last he said, "Lady, with someone like you to sway the high hats and Church folks this game would be a cinch." He moved toward her. Cynthia fingered the capsules but sighed wanly as Cary burst in with the money. To the amazement of the Watkins, Cardoni remarked magnanimously, "I'll let you off with forty-seven grand instead of fifty."

The next morning at breakfast, Cynthia received pink orchids without card or note; remembering Cardoni's fingering of her flowers the night before, she shivered. That day as sbe walked down Fifth Avenue a young lady asked for directions to the Library, and as Cynthia gave them whispered, "Cardoni wants to see you." Then came Cardoni's baritone over the telephone. Cynthia played along with him, even agreeing to meet him at eight at the Little Club. That night Cardoni kept his appointment but this time it was with the Secret Service men, while Dr. and Mrs. Cary Watkins started out for the Opera.

A WOMAN TO LOVE

Mrs. M. R. Wooley Drama File No. 10769

AMONG the victims of the crash of '29 were the Knowltons. While Mr. Knowlton, discouraged by the loss of a comfortable business, began a long and half-hearted search for work, the responsibility of caring for her mother and father fell on the slim shoulders of Patricia Knowlton. Patricia was in love with Martin Williams, but Mrs. Knowlton did not approve. For that matter Mrs. Knowlton had never approved of any of the succession of young men who had come to marry her daughter. But this was different. Again and again Martin tried to persuade Patricia to elope with him, but Patricia, mindful of the fact that her firm didn't employ married women, refused. "But I can support you," Martin pleaded. "But," Patricia explained softly. "You can't take care of my mother and father too. And if I left tbem they would have nothing." So they continued to snatch meetings while Mrs. Knowlton voiced her disapproval of Martin, bandied gossip about The Fenner girl who was always hanging around Martin, and finally forbade the boy her daughter loved, her house. Fearing her mother's nagging might at last endanger their happiness, Martin begged Patricia to get out of that house, but she only replied unhappily that she couldn't leave them now. "If father would only find work," Patricia murmured. "He's not looking, and you know it." "Martin!" And so they had quarreled, until realizing how hopelessly entangled they were getting, they had run back to each other's arms, and at last when Martin suggested at least they could be married secretly, Patricia accepted. So Pat kept her position, and at night, alone in her room, she would slip on the ring tbat proclaimed that she Martin's wife. Then at last vacation time arrived. Like two conspirators, each told stories of going away, and at a station a few miles from town, Pat got off the train and Martin met her in his car. The week together was a Heaven of bliss, and then, returning, they ran into people from home. Caugbt, they pretended they had met by chance, but on their return to town, gossip stalked them. Martin, offered an opportunity in a branh office, pleaded with Pat to tell the truth about their marriage and to come with him, but that evening Mr. Knowlton's shabby overcoat caught Pat's eye and realizing things would be worse for him if she left, she quarreled with Martin and he went on alone, telling her if ever she wanted to come to him he'd be waiting.

Meanwhile Muriel Fenner, learning of the gossip about Martin for whom she had set her jeweled cap, urged her father to do something about it. Consequently Pat was sent for by her employers and told that since Fenner was the firm's most valuable client, and he had called to their attention what was being said about her, Pat would have to go. Discouraged, tired, Pat returned home, but her mother awaited her there. Silently Pat listened to her mother's outburst about what a disgrace she was to the family, how Mrs. Knowlton had tried to bring Pat up decently, and so on. Then turning upon her mother, Pat cried, "All my life you've been telling me what to do. Now listen to me. Martin and I were married nearly two years ago. We kept it quiet so I could work and help you and Dad. I let him go away and almost lost him. Now I'm going to him. Goodbye! Sobbing a little from happiness, Pat rushed into Martin's welcoming arms, while at home Mr. Knowlton, driven to it, found himself a job and Mrs. Knowlton dabbed at her tears with a filmy handkerchief.

RANCH GIRL

Louis Fell Western File No. 9820

ON a visit to his uncle's ranch in Colorado, young Ted gets off the train and looking about the strange surroundings walks toward the main street. He sees a rough looking man stagger out of a saloon and attempt to kiss a pretty girl who happens to be passing. The girl struggles and Ted hastily intervenes. The big fellow sneers at Ted's eastern dress and claps his hand to his pistol holster but before the ruffian can draw, Ted's uppercut connects with the point of his chin and the big fellow is outstretched upon the ground. Helping the girl to her horse, Ted remembers that he hasn't asked her name but she is already gone in a cloud of dust. Having no horse of his own to follow her, Ted is forced to give up his search and from a rancher who warns Ted he has bucked against a mighty bad man and had better watch his step, Ted learns the direction of his uncle's ranch.

Ted is given a great welcome by his uncle but he soon learns that his arrival is coincident with the disappearance of great numbers of his uncle's cattle. Upon the ranch Ted is not unaware that some of the cowboys are looking upon him with suspicion. Once out riding he sees some horsemen walking their horses slowly away from a tree and to his horror sees that a rope attached to a man's neck is hanging the victim. Aroused, Ted further notes that one of the hangmen is the man he knocked out in front of the saloon and without a moment's hesitation, he fires at the rope, sees the victim fall to the ground unhurt, and shoots at the bandits who rush to cover.

Two nights later, on guard at his uncle's range, Ted sees rustlers at work and follow them. His shots frighten them off but as he follows them he is himself shot and at last falls from his horse and loses consciousness. When he opens his eyes he is lying upon a cot tended by the man whom he saved from hanging. Moreover Fran's sister is Helen, the girl whom he rescued from the drunkard. Under Helen's skillful fingers Ted's wound are soon bound up and the hours he spends with her sees the awakening of love between them. When Ted insists on going on in search of the bandits, Helen begs him not to risk his life but Ted stops only long enough to kiss her and ride on.

As he passes a clump of bushes a lasso descends over his shoulders and to his dismay, helplessly he looks into the leering face of his enemy. Bound, tortured by the tight ropes, Ted is thrown into a dark cave and left there with the mockery that here is one placed from which he cannot escape to make trouble. For two days Ted saws futilely against his bonds, hugry, thirsty, and faint from his wound, but no one comes. Then a light appears down at the edge of the cave and with a cry of joy Ted calls, "Helen!" Unfastening his bonds she tells him how worried she was when he didn't return and how she had induced her brother to get up a posse to follow the trail Ted had taken. With Ted directing, the rustlers are all captured and Ted returns East with his bride—Helen.

CONFESSIONS OF A MODEL

Alvin Williams Drama File No. 10916

RODNEY SYLVESTER, the artist son of a millionaire corporation lawyer, puts the finishing touches on his nude, "Woodland Nymph," and dismisses his model. With a shrewd glance at him, Mitzy De Foren pretends to faint, and contrition seizes Rodney for having kept her posing so long. In a boyish effort to make amends, he asks her to go to dinner with him that evening, and Mitzy congratulates herself on having passed the first milestone on the road to becoming Mrs. Rodney Sylvester. At home John Quinby, a stage door Johnny who loves her and wants her to marry him, awaits Mitzy, complaining that she been giving him too little of her time lately. Mitzy promises that she will come to his party to-night although she has promised to visit a showgirl friend who sprained her ankle . That night she calls John and explains she can't get away, then stepping out of the phone booth, rejoins Rodney at their nightclub table. ,

That weekend on his father's Long Island estate, Rodney realizes for the first time how beauitful Martha Van Curen, whom he has know all his life, is. He takes her and his friends, Harry and Marjorie, newly-weds, aboard his father's newly purchased yacht. They are about to go for a trial eruise, when word comes that the elder Sylvester has just been injured in an automobile accident. Rodney hurries home. Mitzy, reading of the accident, comes to visit, pretending to have been passing by, Relieved at his father's quick convalescence and noticing that Mitzy is over-heated, Rodney suggests a little swim and on the beach Harry throws sand at them before realizing that Rodney's companion is not Martha, but Rodney's model, Mitzy De Foren. Later Harry tells the story as a good joke on himself, but Martha, who has always loved Rodney, bites her lip, and Frank, another friend, remembers that Mitzy De Foren is the name of the girl who upset John Quinby so, by not coming to his party Saturday night.

Mitzy invites Rodney to a party and the next morning, having been given knockout drops, Rodney awakens to find Mitzy lying beside him, tearful because she has been compromised. Disgusted, Rodney calls her bluff, but when all else falls, Mitzy admits she loves Rodney and unless he marries her she will make a laughing stock of him. The elder Sylvester, having warned his son repeatedly against Mitzy, tries to buy the girl off, but she wants marriage only. At last Sylvester urges Rodney to promise to marry Mitzy, and Rodney, who has, meanwhile discovered simultaneously that he loves Martha, and that he will not drag her into the unsavory mess, consents unhappily.

Rodney's father invites him and Mitzy on a yacht cruise, and Mitzy gets a shock to learn that among the other passengers are John Quinby and Martha Van Curen. Aboard Sylvester has a consultation with his handsome young engineer, Angus McTavish, whom, years before, Sylvester had found and sent through college to study engineering . Subsequently, there is a fire aboard the yacht, Mitzy is rescued by Angus and finds herself with John and the engineer cast up on a desert island. While John tries to force his attentions on her, Mitzy finds herself falling in love with Angus, and when the yacht comes for them and Mr. Sylvester triumphantly explains that it was all a ruse, Angus astounds him by refusing to testify that Mitzy compromised herself with Quinby. However, Angus asks a regenerated Mitzy to marry him, and Rodney is free to marry Martha.

HERBERT RALVEY, M. D.

Hans Albers Drama File No. 10881

AT the graduation dance given by his Medical School, happy-go-lucky, Herbert Ralvey stepped on the hem of a black lace and satin dress worn by the vivacious Judith Pommer. For a moment there was consternation as the dress ripped, but Herbert offered his arm to Judith, and in the same spirit of insouciance she danced out on the floor with him. So they met and so, ideally suited in gaiety and love of fun, they married. With his interneship behind him, Herbert went into practice with his father, a Park Avenue physician. However, unwilling to give up the gay social whirl which he and Judith were enjoying so, Herbert more and more frequently turned his patients over to his father, encroaching on the older man's leisure and overworking him. Then one night, in the midst of a hilarious celebration of the opening of a new play, Herbert was called to the phone to learn that his father, returning from one of Herbert's cases had collapsed. With Judith, Herbert dashed home only to realize after a brief examination that his father's heart had stopped beating. Thereafter Herbert was a changed man. Soon Judith began accepting invitations again, insisting that we all die some day. But for Herbert, try as he would, the old life had lost its savor. One night Judith found him gloomily withdrawn from the gaiety of a party. Vainly she tried to restore him to humor but as he explained that he is overcome by the conviction that his father wants to tell him something, direct him to something, she concurred with his mood and agreed to leave with him. On the way home, there was a yell, a grinding of brakes, and a crowd gathered around. Directing his chauffeur to stop, Herbert got out to examine the limp victim of the accident. As he pronounced the man dead, a girl sobbed that her father had always been so healthy, so happy couldn't the doctor do something to make his heart beat again? That night was a terror to Herbert. Sleep would not come as he felt that he could learn in time to make a dead heart function again. Judith maintained it was absurd, but setting up a laboratory, Herert found a kindred spirit in old Dr. Moser who was experimenting with an X-Ray that could, on a principle similar to a fluoroscope, reveal the travel of blood through the body. Together they worked, while Judith drifted farther and farther apart from this disinterested man of science who had once been her carefree companion. Slowly Herbert began to make progress with his study of the heart and by a delicate operation on the heart of a dog dead of pneumonia, he was at last able to restore it to life. There was pandemonium among the watching surgeons and a reporter, learning of the phenomenon played up as front page news that Dr. Ralvey could bring the dead to life In vain Herbert tried to assure an excited public that he had not found a cure-all, that one case was not irrefuable proof and that he was helpless if the patient's skull was fractured. Meanwhile Dr. Moser too, found reward for his patient labors. After twelve years of application one day he hits on the right light rays and weeks more of experimentation convinced him he had hit upon the solution. In the excitement of bringing his labors scientifically to a reality he overstrained himself and as he assembled all the physicians to demonstrate his work, he collapsed and died before help could reach him. In the meantime, the Ralveys had reached the end of their tether. Judith, driven beyond endurance by the constant need for appearing in public without her husband, went to a party in a dangerously gay humor, and consented to leave to go to an inn for dancing with James Gerol, a young polo player. Herbert, summoned to the hospital, learned that his old friend Dr. Moser had died of heart failure. Before a breathless audience, Herbert applied his theories to the body before him—and slowly life came back! Thinking only of communicating with Judith so she could share his triumph. Herbert learned she had been killed in an automobile accident, her skull hopelessly crushed—the one case in which he was helpless. Overcome by the realization that for all his triumphs he could not save the woman he loved, Herbert returned alone to his empty house. Everywhere Judith's spirit beckoned. He felt he was losing his sanity. Dashing through the house he tried to snatch at one of the darting shadows, lost his balance, screamed, and fell. In the morning while the newspapers proclaimed Dr. Ralvey the greatest surgeon of the century, his butler discovered his body in a pool of blood that had oozed all night from the crushed skull of Herbert Ralvey.

Gentlemen:

I believe your literary staff is a great help to the writer who needs someone to improve his style and imaginative resources, and to give him encouragement, — the spur of success. I believe you are the answer to the novice's prayers. I feel confident that through your help my stories will not encounter the usual troubles that pave the road to literary fame.

Sincerely,
H. DEJARDIN

Mr. Dejardin is a composer of note as well as the author of "THE ENCHANTED GARDEN," PRIMITIVE SOULS," and "DARK REVENGE." He is planning to write a musical photoplay with music and lyrics by himself.

Antrim Coast Drama File No. 10980

UPON Martin, last of the splendid, adventurous Milns of Cornwall, falls the responsibilty of preserving the Miln line. En route to America he meets Lois, who loving him completely, desires above all else to bear his child. One year of marriage follows and then Lois dies giving birth to Martin's son. Resisting the wanderlust in his blood, Martin remains on year after year for the sake of his son Richard, becoming absorbed meanwhile in the development of the Miln Mills. When Richard reaches college age, Martin falls in love with the magnificent Rella Mortimer, whom many men before him have loved unrequitedly, for, bruised by the discorndant marriage of her parents and others about her, Rella has built up an emotional barrier to marriage. In vain Martin tries to break through her coldness, encouraged by her evident regard. On a business trip he realizes his need of her is immediate and painfully acute. But when he returns he finds only a curt note telling him she will be back in several weeks or so. Martin, bitter in the belief that he is merely one of the many men the heartless, beauitful Rella Mortimer has humbled, enlists in the World War in 1914.

Meanwhile, Rella, having gone to Montana where her only aunt has died, finds her bereaved cousin Goldie, an immature but lovable youngster, and takes her to her heart. On their journey homeward, Rella realizes for the first time that she is no longer afraid of marriage that she loves and wants Martin Miln. The train is wrecked and it is Martin's son Richard who gives his blood for the transfusion that saves Rella's life. But when Rella recovers they can no longer conceal from her the communication telling that Martin has been killed in the war. When Rella discovers that Rickie is madly in love with her, in the belief that thus alone can she atone for having denied herself to Martin, she consents to marry him. However, reckless, impulsive Goldie, loving Rickie, reveals to him that Rella is sacrificing herself, and despite his anguish, Rickie revolts at taking what is not given gladly. The unnatural marriage is climaxed when Martin returns, not having been killed, but willing to let the rumor stand until convinced that his lapses of sanity are but a temporary condition. Goldie sees that Rella loves Martin, and throwing caution, training, everything to the winds, offers herself to Rickie, until at last, in a passion of tenderness for his wife's cousin, Rickie finds himself loving her. But Goldie soon realizes that deeper than all else to Rickie and to Rella is their scruple against divorce, and she leaves with a poignant note of farewell. Rickie is distrait, but Martin is the one who finds Goldie, his clue her cable from Paris.

Meanwhile an epidemic breaks out. Rickie, tireless in his efforts to help the stricken, himself falls a victim and the message of his death comes to Martin in the moment that he has found Goldie and learned that Rickie's child is already beneath her heart. At the utter helplessness of Goldie, herself little more than a child. Martin takes the only possible step, and with the realization that through Goldie's child the Miln line will be carried on, Martin himself gives her and her son the protection of the Miln name. His tenderness to her, makes her, at length, need him and thus, trapped characters all, stoicely suffering, Martin and Goldie, with the infant named Rickie, returns to Miln Mills. There Rella, Rickie's widow, but never emotionally Rickie's wife, suffers the agonies of the damned as she sees the man she loves, the man who loves her, married to the mother of Rickie's child. And for one brief hour she gives herself to Martin who has so long hungered for her, so that the memory of those moments together shall sustain them both in the cruel years of waiting and wanting.

TO OUR PRODUCER AND WRITER-FRIENDS THROUGHOUT UNITED STATES AND FOREIGN COUNTRIES

NEW YORK CITY negotiates by far the majority of all stories utilized in Talking Pictures today, and our new department thus enables adequate representation in this field.

We maintain a staff of experts who are second to none. Whether it be work of synopses, technical working continuity, criticism, revision or typing, you may rely upon work of integrity at all times.

The necessity for legal protection through copyright is very evident. Proof of this is demonstrated almost daily in newspapers throughout the country. The Library of Congress at Washington is maintained for that purpose. Reliance upon the common law is unwise. No honorable author or producer desires to become involved in burdensome litigation, and copyright protection is protective insurance, by registration, against that substantial expense. The producer is thus protected against any unfounded claims of authorship, as well as the author himself.

TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE reaches only the producers and our clients. It is not on public sale. No advertisements are accepted, it being our purpose to keep it a strictly professional magazine.

Our offices are available for those producers who do not depend upon staff continuity writers. Our rates for this work are reasonable and are subject to contract.

In addition to synopses herein printed, complete script is submitted to suitable producers where in our judgment such submission is advisable.

Free copy of publication is sent to each author whose story appears herein.

Producers will find it extremely useful to retain TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE in their files for a future emergency, in event that their present needs are supplied.

Talking Picture Magazine is not available to the general public. DANIEL O'MALLEY CO., INC., *United States Post Office Bldg., 20 West 60th Street, New York, Publishers; Daniel S. DARK HORIZONS

Jacinto Valladares Drama File No. 11026

PENNILESS son of peones on the Puerto Rican hacienda of Don Rafael Olivares, young Miguel Rodriguez cherishes dreams of one day becoming a great seaman. Only in the lovely daughter of Don Rafael, Maria Luisa, does Miguel find one who understands his dreams, and between the two young people a great love is kindled. When, through one of his miserable aides, Don Rafael finds out that Miguel has dared to speak to his daughter, he is beside himself with fury. However, his plan to kill Miguel is halted by the disclosure that his daughter is about to have a child. Immediately Don Rafael ships the unhappy girl to Spain and after the birth of her son, Juan, she is cloistered in a convent, while the lad is brought up as an orphan. Then Don Rafael plans what he calls a beautiful revenge upon Miguel. In dead of night he has his henchmen set fire to Miguel's hut. However, Miguel is out at the time and when he returns he is appalled to discover his parents have been cremated in the blaze. Suspecting Don Rafael, his heart contracts with bitterness, but he works himself across on a ship to Spain in the hope that he can find Maria Luisa. Once in Spain, however, he find his quest futile, since Maria has changed her name on being admitted to the convent. Penniless he is forced to give up his search and in a waterfront tavern, Miguel is seen by Captain Juarez, an old buccaneer who has been forced to retire because of his age. Needing someone he can trust, he starts teaching Miguel all about ships. Some years later Miguel starts on the expedition. Heading a crew of rough pirates, Captain Miguel of the "Devil" sets sail. Before him looms the dark horizon, but he feels brave and defiant. A storm buffets the ship. The crew starts to mutiny, but he quiets them and at last they reach the island. To their dismay they find the treasure has already been looted. Instead there are skulls and wild insects. Fever abounds on the island and everyone contracts it. Almost dying they board the ship. Miguel is just a ghost guiding a ghost ship. Death . . More Dark Horizons. When the "Devil" reaches the seaport of Mayaguez, Miguel is the only one alive. Delirious he is carried off his ship by the anxious Captain Juarez, who nurses him through his illness. A sister of Mercy passes, and the Captain calls her to his patient. Miguel, opening his eyes sees Maria Luisa. With a cry he draws her to him, but she gently disengages herself and tells him she belongs to a divine husband now. Miguel learns that Maria's father has repented and he too has tried to bring her home with him. Learning his arch enemy is here, Miguel rises and goes forth with the intent of murdering Don Rafael. However, he finds him a spent and broken old man who, dying, puts his fortune at the disposal of young Juan, if he can be found. Miguel drops the hand raised to kill, and Don Rafael breathes his last. At last Miguel finds his son, and together they board another ship. Once more they face the horizon, leaving behind Maria, the one woman Miguel can ever love.

DARK CLOUDS

Gladys S. Bell Drama File No. 10757

WHEN lovely young Lady Betty Edwards receives word that she must sail for England a week earlier than she had anticipated, she confides in her companion, Miss Della North, that she believes her father wishes to separate her from Vance Sneeve, son of her father's worst enemy, but Della replies that since Mr. Edwards has recently inherited an estate and the title of Sir Elroy, his new duties probably require his immediate presence. Alone with her father, a wall street broker, Betty pleads once more for Vance's cause, urging him to give his consent when the young man asks for her hand in marriage. Sir Elroy replies that Vance's father, a noted brain specialist, was called in when Viola, Betty's mother, had contracted blood poisoning. He left for the hospital, and was so long in returning that the delay proved fatal. Convinced that no excuse could justify such action, he had never spoken to Dr. Sneeve again. Going alone to Dr. Sneeve's office, Betty learned that he was forcibly held to attend a woman injured in a street accident upon that fatal day, but when her father refuses to listen to her account of this conversation, Betty secretly marries Vance. Upon learning of this, Mr. Edwards disinherits his daughter, sailing for England without her. He is greeted by his nephews, Frances, next in line, and Dick, who soon learn that Lady Betty is to be considered as one who has died. Her pictures are removed from the ancestral hall, and her name never mentioned. Frances returns her mail, secretly reading it first, and discovering that Vance has been killed and Betty is at the point of death. When Sir Elroy relents, and asks for her letter, Frances falsely states that none have come.

In America, Betty is under the watchful care of Della and Dr. Emerson; through the latter she meets Count Berdet Estell, who becomes a warm friend and admirer. Della marries Dr. Emerson, but shortly afterwards, these two are taken in the influenza epidemic. Before sailing for France, where his father lies critically ill, Berdet wins Betty's consent to become his wife, the grief over her unconsumated love for Vance allayed by the deep, overpowering emotion she feels for the Count. Not realizing that she is a titled lady, Berdet tells his family of his love for this girl in America; believing she is socially not his son's equal, Berdet's father destroys all letters the count receives or sends to his fiancee. In bewilderment, Betty goes to San Francisco, to seek employment. Registering at the Mark Hopkins Hotel as Viola Walker, she is introduced to Lillian Long, one of the guests, and through her becomes acquainted with Horton Wallace and Donald Valade. The four enjoy tennis and dancing, until Lillian is instrumental in securing a position as governess for Betty, for little Dorothy Horton, a freind. Mr. Horton is charmed with this attractive young woman, who teaches his child so successively, but Mrs. Horton and Bell, her daughter, subject her to many insults, envious of her beauty. When she accompanies Daniel Blair, a lawyer, to his apartment on a business errand for Mr. Horton, Bell and Mrs. Horton evolve a scandal from this innocent episode, further claiming that she wishes to marry Bob, the son of the house. Angrily, Bob and Mr. Blair inform her that they both wished to marry this splendid girl, whom sh ehas unjustly accused. Unable to find work because of Mrs. Horton, Betty leaves for Los Angeles with Lillian, later securing a position as companion and secretary to Audrey Lee, charming young authoress. Betty is injured in an automobile accident while Audrey is in New York, and is sent to the same city, a victim of amnesia, to be placed under the care of Dr. Sneeve, who is Audrey's brother-in-law Meanwhile, Count Berdet, through a chance meeting with Dick Edwards, his school chum, discovers Betty's real identity, and traces her, through Donald and Bob, to her present position. Through Audrey, he learns that she is in Dr. Sneeves care, and the three hasten to her. Now thoroughly recovered, Betty confesses her entire history to all. Dick sends for her father, who is overjoyed at seeing his daughter again, and at last asks Dr. Sneeve for his forgiveness in misjudging him. Pardoning Mrs. Horton and Bell, who come to Betty when she returns to Los Angeles, Betty prepares to sail for England, all misunderstanding and unhappiness swept away. As she is arranging for her wedding, Betty is delighted to know that Dick and Audrey are engaged, and plans are made for a double ceremony. Even Frances is forgiven for his cruel deception as the old castle echoes the joyous celebration of this happy event.

THE ETERNAL DOUBT

Nino C. Vanni Drama File No. 11142

IN one of the squalid taverns in London, an unshaven man sprawls at a wooden table. A sailor enters, taps him on the shoulder, and showing Giorgio Wilna, nicknamed "The Poet" a letter from his sweetheart, asks for an answer. Well pleased with the reply, the sailor throws a shilling on the table, and Giorgio orders another whiskey. An old man and a little girl, beggars, enter. Giorgio drinks heavily, then as he rises to go, the waiter protests that the shilling isn't enough. There is a fight and the girl gives the additional shilling to the boss and hurries out with the old man to join Giorgio. Meanwhile an American and an Englishman, sightseers, have been watching the proceedings with interest. They ask about Giorgio and learn that he was a gentleman of great learning whose sweetheart had proven false. He had come to the tavern, and in whiskey, paid for by the letters and verses he wrote for the sailors and other habitues, had found forgetfulness. When the pair learn that Giorgio is writing a novel which seems to be great, they follow to his den. There the girl Nina, and the old man have prepared a hot supper for Giorgio and put him to bed. Nina is studying dancing in training for the Opero and she and the unkempt, drunken Giorgio become great ends. The American, Frank Livier, deeply desirous of glory presuades Giorgio to let him read his book manuscript, The Eternal Doubt, and trembles as he realizes it is a work of genius. Pressing a hundred dollars in Giorgio's hands, he gives him a receipt for reading the work, and vanishes, taking the book to America where he publishes it under his own name. Livier is hailed as a genius and makes a fortune from the proceeds.

Meanwhile Nina persuades Giorgio to shave and wash, and as he stands before her, only a few years older than she, she trembles. Her grandfather dies and Nina achieves fame as a dancer. She receives a contract to go to the United States where she becomes a star on Broadway and is sought after by all the young blades. Frank Livier, proposes marriage, and anxious for the security of his wealth, Nina allows him to take her about town.

Meanwhile Giorgio has been trying to adhere to Nina's teachings and to stay away from drink. One day he passes a bookshop and sees a sign advertising the American masterpiece, The Eternal Doubt. He looks at the book and realizes it is his own stolen manuscript. Brooding he goes to the waterfront, takes work on a liner as an oil stoker and thus crosses the ocean. In New York he gets employment as a waiter. One evening Nina enters the restaurant, escorted by Frank Livier. Giorgio leaps at Livier's throat and the two go down, struggling Giorgio is locked up, but Nina bails him out and he tells her of the fraud. With the receipt in his possession he enters Livier's room, and tells him he is going to expose him before the entire world. Livier draws a gun, but Giorgio closes with him. They rain blows on each other. Giorgio finally leaves his antagonist badly battered on the floor. Giorgio leaves and is met by Nina, who at sight of him safe, kisses him passionately. A shot is heard. They rush back to Livier's room and find that, unable to endure the thought of disgrace, he has killed himself. The door closes, and Nina and Giorgio walk toward the street.

Salie Wilbur Brandt Drama File No. 10856

PURCHASING an estate on deserted Amelia Island, off the coast of Florida, Daniel and Sarah Allyn Cope establish a beautiful plantation where they make their permanent home after leaving New London, Connecticut. Here, among the luxurious foliage and delightful climate of the region, their children grow strong and healthy, carefully instructed by the best tutors, but free to enjoy the pagan loveliness that surrounds them. Learning the Indian language, one of the boys makes friends with the natives who are their only neighbors, and discovers, with a dark skinned companion, a piece of a fallen meteor, as the two ramble over the countryside together. When Sarah's sister dies, leaving a little girl, Margery, she is adopted into the household as a daughter, soon becoming accustomed to the adventurous spirit of her young cousins. With them she learns to climb trees, swim in the cold waters, shoot and ride, with all the agility and freedom of a boy; although her aunt sees to it that she is also versed in feminine arts and graces of the day. At seventeen, Margery combines all the alluring charms of womanhood, with a freedom and independence of spirit seldom known to her sex at that time. She is the belle of the elaborate hunting parties and banquets given by her foster parents to the Spanish gentry. When Ralph Crandall, son of a friend of Daniel's in New England, comes to visit he falls instantly in love with the girl, and, returning his affection, she promises to become his bride.

Observing his overseer, Jack Kendall, mistreating one of the slaves, Daniel throws the man to the ground, in a fit of temper, and strikes him with his whip, warning him that if this ever happens again he will discharge him. Later, he sends Kendall to the mainland to purchase another slave, and is amazed when he returns with Cato, a hulking, silent African savage, recently brought from his native soil, and unable to speak English. But as Cato turns out to be a good worker, and causes no trouble, retiring alone to his cabin, Daniel has no complaint to offer; although he remarks that it is strange the African never mingles with the others. Ralph, who has travelled with his father in Africa when a child, becomes interested in Cato and attempts to converse with him in his own language. He returns, much alarmed, warning Daniel that his new slave belongs to a cannibal tribe and should be sent away at once, as he is dangerous. Laughing, Daniel refuses to take this seriously and Ralph, equally hot tempered, tells his uncle that he has no right to endanger the lives of his family by his own stubborness. Overhearing the two men quarrel, Margery takes sides with her adored uncle, breaking her engagement to Ralph, who plans to leave the following Monday. For the sake of Sarah, who is expecting another child, nothing is said about the quarrel as the family drive to church on the mainland, leaving Carter, the two year old son, in the care of his faithful black nurse. After a brief period of play with the colored children, the little fellow is tucked away in his crib in the nursey and left alone to enjoy a brief nap. Returning a short while later, his nurse screams with terror as she finds the baby is gone. Frantically, she tells the returning family. Daniel and Ralph at once begin a search, leaving Sarah in Margery's care. When the older woman has fallen asleep, as the result of a sedative given to her, Margery follows the searching party.

Frantically, they go through the house and gardens, finding no trace of the youngster. His blood frozen with horror, Ralph informs the anxious father that Cato must have stolen his child. The two men dash to his cabin where they see the native preparing a kettle of boiling water. Gripping his cousin's arm, Daniel points to a pile of baby curls on the floor. At once, Ralph breaks into the room, but finds that the child is still alive, although tied and ready for the cannibal's plans. No reason is given to Sarah for Kendall's dismissal or Cato's shipment back to Africa, nor is the truth of the episode ever revealed, but when Margery goes to Ralph's arms, he realizes that she understands, as he holds her close to him.

COMPENSATION

Sophie Naldrett Drama File No. 10919

WHILE her husband, Harold, is away from home on a business trip, Lucy Smith goes to a dance and carries on a little flirtation with Al Rogers. He is driving her home when the car swerves off the road and Lucy is hurled against the windshield. Al hurries her to his home in the city and when Lucy regains consciousness, head throbbing painfully, she finds herself amid luxurious surroundings. Al persuades her to remain on until morning and Lucy, believing Harold is away in any case, wearily accepts. The next day, however, when she arrives at her home she finds that Harold has come home the night before and is almost frantic with fear for her. When Lucy tells him where she has been, Harold for the first time loses his temper, and rushes from the house. Lucy thinks he has left her, and throwing herself upon the bed cries until she falls asleep. Awakened by the sound of a horn, she goes to the window and sees Al's car outside. When she opens the door, her face still shows traces of tears and she sobs out the whole story. Being very sympathetic, and a smooth talker, Al finally persuades Lucy to go home with him.

Harold returns expecting to find Lucy waiting for him. In despair, he tries vainly to locate Al and a month later, still unsuccessful in his efforts to locate Lucy, becomes a nervous wreck unable to hold his position. His physician advises him to go abroad. Much refreshed from his ocean voyage, Harold arrives in England but he is unable to find work and at last applies to the Church Army. They give him food and shelter and also find a job for him on a farm. His health returns, and soon his admiration for Elizabeth Browning, daughter of the farmer, develops into love. Although she loves him, Elizabeth goes to his room while he is in the field, and opens his Bible to St. Mark. Harold, returning picks up the Book and reads, "Whosoever shall put away his wife and marry another, committeth adultery against her." The next morning, Harold leaves the farm.

Meanwhile Lucy is Al's mistress. Remorse has long since overtaken her, but when she learns that Al is planning a robbery, she can no longer endure the thought of being with him. He threatens her, but she phones the police and escapes. In constant fear of Al's vengeance, she walks the streets of a nearby town day after day in search of work. One night, she flees from her lonely room and attracted by music issuing from a Church, enters. The speaker tells of the arrival of the Church Army in America and the text of the sermon is, "Go and sin no more."

When the service is over, Lucy slips out quietly. The next day with a new determination she applies for a position and gets one in a lawyer's office. A week later, she hears her employer discussing the imminent release of Al Rogers for lack of evidence. As she learns what a menace he is to society, she tells her story to the lawyer and subsequently in court although she fully realizes she is thus endangering her life. Al is convicted, but as Lucy leaves the court she is shot. From the nearby Church come a number of members of the Church Army, among them Harold, who holds her in his arms as she dies.

The Army is ordered back to England. When Harold arrives at the pier, he finds Elizabeth waiting for him with open arms.

LOVE'S REVENGE

H. C. Waterman Melodrama File No. 10848

DISTURBED, Mrs. Kingford informs her husband that she fears their only daughter, Vera, loves Clark Wellington, his secretary, as the two are seated before the fireplace of their palatial estate, The Crags. Her husband assures her that this cannot be true, since he has arranged for her to marry Walter Davenant, but when the impulsive girl is seen leaving the house with Clark and Margery Carlyle, the miller's daughter, who is acting as a companion during the absence of Vera's maid, Justin, Lawyer Kingsford stops them with a pistol. To save the situation, Margery tells Kingsford that she is eloping with Clark; then, later, both return to The Crags, saying that they have decided against the marriage. When Vera's father tells her that Davenant has information concerning the mismanagement of his estate which would send him to prison, the girl agrees to forget Clark and marry Walter, not unmindful of the fact that the life of a poor secretary's wife would be hard for her. Margery's aunt, refusing to believe the story of the elopement, which she cannot fully explain, turns the girl from her home, but Clark's kindly mother welcomes her, and she and Clark are married by a dying priest, after the announcement of Vera's engagement. When Clark is told by a stranger that Vera is marrying an imposter, since the real Davenant is dead, he stops the wedding in the nick of time. To test his love, Margery invites Vera to visit them. Clark had been blinded and crippled when defending Vera's good name, but now, restored to health and suddenly inheriting a fortune, he again becomes very desirable to Vera, who is blinded to all sense of justice by her love.

Shortly after this, Margery is mysteriously missing; a note, from an unknown lover, urging her to go away with him, is the only clue. Later, Vera slips a beaded bag, belonging to Margery into the bosom of a young woman, mutilated beyond recognition by a railroad accident. At last, the grief stricken Clark becomes engaged to the vivid and alluring Vera, although still cherishing the memory of his gentle and charming wife. When Vera discovers that Justin has stolen her jewels, she threatens the maid with exposure, but Justin then tells of a dream in which she saw Vera push Margery into the Black Pool on her estate, leaving the girl to drown. In terror, Vera bribes Justin to keep silent; alone, the heiress wanders to this pool at night, seeking release from tortured memories by the use of narcotics obtained from Davenant's imposter, who has eluded police. On her wedding night, she goes to the pool and is confronted by—Margery! Luring her to a lonely tower, Vera imprisons the girl, after setting fire to the building, two days after her wedding. Clark rescues Margery, whom Lawyer Kingsford blames for the fire, but when Mrs. Wellington cannot secure a confession from the girl, who wishes to shield Clark, she doubts her. Vera forces a cordial down Margery's throat, producing amnesia, instead of the intended death, and on the day of her trial, she is unable to give the necessary evidence. Justin, who has been disguised as Margery's nurse, forces Vera to sign a complete confession. Then, Vera forces the poisoned cordial down Justin's throat, taking enough to cause insanity herself. Cleared of all charges by Justin, at the last minute, Margery at last consents to go to Vera, who dies, forgiven; at the same time, Margery forgives her aunt. When Davenant tells of Vera's use of drugs, they all realize that this, and her passionate love for Clark, caused her to commit crimes for which she should not be held morally responsible. After a year of travel, Clark returns to Margery, and they resolve to forget the past, certain now of their great love for one another.

UNFORTUNATE

Anthony Ross Drama File No. 10737

RIDICULED and mistreated by his older brothers, Tony developed a sense of inferiority at an early age, causing him to be afraid of his playmates at school. Wistfully, he watched them at their games, but was too timid to join the fun; the only popularity he knew was in the winter time, when the boys gladly borrowed his sled. Tony's father, a mason, had little time for the sensitive boy, never interfering when the others imposed upon him. As he grew older, Tony overcame some of his shyness, joining the school football team, although the referee, disliking him, discriminated against him, refusing to score in his favor. Two of the boys became pals of Tony, but when they moved away to another community he was again left alone and friendless. Starved for companionship, Tony stole candy and cigarettes for the other boys, in order to win their favor. Although they accepted these offerings, few of them were willing to help the unfortunate boy. Ralph, the eldest brother, was particularly cruel to Tony, forcing him to spend most of his leisure hours working in a store which he owned jointly with Frank, another member of the family, but refusing to pay him even a small salary. Desperately in need of money, Tony occasionally took a small amount from the cash register from time to time. When Ralph left for Chicago with a married woman, Tony had his first taste of happiness, as Frank treated him with consideration. He joined the ball team, winning a game for his team from the rival "Shoe Strings," by virtue of his excellent pitching. Marion Saunders, a neighborhood girl, who had once attended school with him, watched his playing with admiration.

Tony's father was killed while at work, crushed by falling bricks. Shortly after this, Ralph returned, and married a local girl who reported Tony's petty thefts to her husband, treating the boy with scorn. Hearing Ralph and his wife criticize him brutally, Tony ran upstairs to his room, giving way to tears he could not hold back. When Frank went away to school, Tony, concealed in a box car, travelled to Newark, Ohio, where he secured work as a water boy, employed by a brother-in-law. Later, he visited another brother-in-law, in Columbus, Ohio, working in his beer garden. Although the boy did his best to please, he found that he was unwelcome in both places, and treated with the brutality to which he had been subjected since childhood. Having no other choice, he returned to the store, owned by Ralph, in which he would have a part interest when he reached his maturity, according to the terms of his father's will. Still a "black sheep," Tony was given no more freedom than before. One day, Ralph left a large sum of money in his charge; Marion Saunders entered the store, making a purchase, and chatting with Tony. As soon as she left, he took the money, realizing it was his one chance to get away, and boarded a train for the East.

Suspicion fell upon Marion, as she would not testify against Tony, although she had seen him leave the store. Reading this in the paper, Tony, after debating the question, returned voluntarily, making a complete confession. Friends of Marion's father were able to force Ralph to settle the matter outside of court, and secure a good position for Tony. In this new life, with Marion's encouragement, the "black sheep" at last found himself.

NORTHERN LIGHTS

Erling Johansen Drama File No. 10915

AS the halibut fishing schooner "Nothern Lights," loaded with halibut approaches the Alaskan port, the wives and sweethearts of the crew wave eagerly from shore. The boat docks. Head and shoulders above his men, Captain Robert Olsen swaggers onto shore and embraces his beautiful wife, Paula. The entire catch of fish is offered for sale at the fish exchange and sold to the buyer with the highest bid. The fish is hoisted up, headed, weighed and sold, and after paying off the crew their shares, Olsen drops the bag of money containing his share into his wife's outstretched hands. She kisses him warmly. For a few days, while the crew enjoys the sight of friends and relatives, the loading of the ship progresses. Then, all supplies aboard, the "Northern Lights" departs for the distant halibut banks across the Gulf of Alaska. That night the wife of one of the crew comes to see Paula, only to stare in amazement at sight of the Captain's wife in the arms of a lover. Within short order every person in town knows of Paula's faithlessness except Olsen himself.

Arriving at the fishing ground, soundings and observations are made. After four days and nights of fishing, the cold becomes so intense and the sea so rough they are forced to cease their fishing. All hands are busy on deck with hatchets and shovels, clearing the vessel of the ice which is freezing on the mast and decks. They lay their course toward shore, but the closer they get the colder it becomes and the heavier run the ground swells. The crew is unable to clear the ice fast enough and it generally being understood that the farther one gets out to sea, the milder it gets, the Captain lays about the course west-south-west. The ship is solidly frozen over and it becomes necessary to cut down the masts. But they have waited too long, the vessel is doomed. As it slowly sinks, the crew lowers in three dories. Night descends. The boats keep as closely together as possible. Distress flares are set off. One of the dories capsizes and before the other two can reach it, its three passengers are drowned in the icy waters. At dawn the following day, the seven remaining men, nearly frozen to death, are picked up by a passing schooner and brought home.

As soon as the Captain recovers, it becomes his painful duty to report the details of the disaster to the sorrowing widow of one of the men. In the presence of the gracious and dignified Amy Dahl, Olsen finds all his seaman's phrases inadequate, and touched by her plight, he induces her to accept a considerable portion of the insurance money he gets for the loss of his ship. However, through the technicalities of the shrewd company, Olsen fails to get the large sum he has expected and when all expenses have been deducted he finds he has very little money left. Paula, furious at learning she has had to share their money with Amy, scolds and nags Olsen continuously. Olsen becomes more serious than he has ever been before, and one day the congregation starts as the hitherto unbelieving Captain decides to come to Church. Then one of the Captain's friends feels it his duty to inform him about Paula. Terrible in his anger, Olsen refuses to believe, but the thought haunts him and returning unexpectedly from a fishing trip, he catches Paula entertaining her latest paramour. Unable to face Olsen's wrath, Paula runs off with her lover and the Captain returns to sea. The third day out they are forced to seek shelter on land because of a gale. While dressing a deer he has shot, Olsen notices a glitter on the creek bottom and has a few samples of the ore he has discovered assayed. The report is favorable. A big mining company buys a half interest and rich now, Olsen returns. Later he learns of the death of Paula who has been deserted by her lover, and finding Amy loves him as he loves her, Olsen asks her to be his wife.

FAR NORTH

Ted Norton Drama File No. 10650

IN love with Molly Carpenter, Joe Beck promises to close his saloon, since she will not marry him as long as he is engaged in that form of business. Resolving to try his fortune in the newly discovered mining area about two hundred and fifty miles from Minto City, Joe sets forth up the Thistle River with Jimmy Welch, his partner, who also is in love with Molly. At the close of the first year, the two clear over two thousand dollars above their expenses. Joe resolves to double this amount before returning to Molly, in order that he may invest in business and assure her that he can provide for her. Shortly after this, Jim Welch's aunt dies, leaving him ten thousand dollars; upon receipt of this news, he departs, leaving the claim he owns jointly with Joe in the latter's care. Enduring the hardships of a northern winter alone in his little cabin, Joe hunts and fishes for his meager daily fare, panning gold and continually hoping to discover a deposit of the precious metal. An ulcerated tooth causes severe infection; snowed in, in his cabin, Joe his own physician, removing it with a pair of pliers. Although not discovering gold, Joe traps several martins, whose valuable fur provides a source of income for him, and enables him to travel down the Minta River to a location near Miller City. Ashamed of his failure, Joe does not write to Molly, and believing he has forgotten her, she at last consents to become Jimmy's wife.

Discouraged and ill, Joe is amazed when he receives an offer from two miners to buy his share of the claim he owns jointly with Jimmy, and gives his consent, promising to start at once for this spot, where the necessary papers can be signed. As he is on his way, travelling across the snow covered area on a dog sled, a terrific storm occurs. Their reins broken, the dogs run away in fright, and Joe seeks shelter in a ravine. Almost overcome with exhaustion, he manages to live for several days in this spot on the provisions he has on hand. At last, spring comes, and Joe sets forth, attempting to regain the trail. Molly's wedding day approaches, and the girl prepares to go to the little church, dressed in her bridal finery. As she is arranging her hair, her eyes fall upon a small picture of Joe, placed in the corner of her mirror. With tears in her eyes, she takes the photograph tenderly in her hands, examining it, and sends word that she cannot become Jimmy's bride. The following month, Molly accepts a position as teacher in a small mining community some miles away. Wandering about in a half starved condition, Joe finds a bunch of wild parsnips growing near a deserted camp fire; he hastily prepares to roast some of them, at the same time nibbling at the uncooked vegetables, so great is his hunger. He feels a sudden dizziness, and loses consciousness. A sharp, gnawing pain in his left arm awakens him, and he discovers that his hand is badly burned, as he has submerged it in the hot ashes. Wrapping the blistered hand as best he can, Joe continues, but when he reaches his destination, he finds that Jimmy has preceded him. Also asked to sell his share of the claim, Jimy had investigated and discovered it was worth thousands; had Joe reached the mine a few hours before Jim he would have been cheated out of his share. The doctor who takes care of Joe tells him that the wild parsnips he ate contained oil, fatal to life, which fortunately he did not swallow. Molly is informed of this turn of affairs by Jim, and hastens to Joe, t take up the happy task of nursing him back to health.

LITTLE DARLING

Rosalind Evans Comedy Drama File No. 10873

WITH energy remarkable for one so tiny, four year old Mary Crosley dusted off the sidewalk with a diminutive broom. Suddenly her attention was drawn to a long sedan drawing up in front of her house and as a short thick-set man inquired for the Crosleys, Mary succinctly remarked that they didn't want to buy any books. The stranger informed the little one that he was her father's boss, and as Mary admitted him, a dawn of comprehension overspread her adorable features. "Oh," she observed, "Mr. Crab!" The man winced and corrected, "Mr. Carter is the name." But Mary knew him as "the big cheese" and to Mr. Carter's discomfort advised him so. Mr. Carter's foot began to tap rhythmically, and as he inquired after her father, Mary explained that his sprained ankle was quite better, she had seen him run on it. As for his not coming to work, he couldn't, Mary explained tactfully, because he went down to the river with "a terrible long stick with some string on it." Mr. Carter appeared interested, so Mary elaborated. He had taken some sandwiches with him and some cigarettes, and he whistled as he walked off. Feeling a new sense of importance at the effect of her disclosures, Mary emulated her mother's manner when receiving guests and explained stiltedly that her mother had gone to the store but would be back soon. Soon she disappeared, leaving Mr. Carter to brood over her fact that her father had referred to Mr. Crab— pardon Carter as a big baboon who worked all his employees too hard and cut their salaries to the bone when his own business was doing better than in previous years. A moment later she returned with a glass. "Ginger ale," she corrected, as Mr. Carter's eyes glittered. As he drained the glass slowly, recollecting word by word Mary's disclosures, Mary regarded him closely, leaning forward on her elbows. Before Mr. Carter left, he instructed the little girl to tell her father he could continue his vacation—indefinitely. In his hurry to get out Mr. Carter blundered into a closet, and Mary, gurgling at his mistake, stretched her little arms around his waist and told him she liked him. Hastily the man left, afraid he might be betrayed into sentiment. When Mrs. Crosley returned, Mary triumphantly explained about her visitor, but as her mother let out an anguished cry and questioned her closely, the little one began to whimper.

At five P. M. the errant Crosley returned, jubilantly swinging his catch. However, as his wife revealed the events of the afternoon, his face dropped and he called Mary to him. It was his wife who reminded him it was his own fault speaking that way before the child and taking a vacation like a schoolboy. However, when the fish was served, neither could eat, and sitting gloomily before the radio, Luella tried to convince him he could get a new job. At last they retired. Crosley brooded, sleepless and unhappy. Suddenly the telephone rang. It was Carter. Crosley winced, but as the boss told him to finish out the week with pay and be ready to take on the road job soon, Crosley yipped excitedly. "I like men with ambition," Carter was saying, "and by the way, a doll and baby cab are being delivered to your house to-morrow. Sa-ay, my boy, that little minx is a knockout! "Daddy," little Mary asked pensively next morning, "what's a crab?" And her father answered. "A fine little fat man, darling, with a heart of gold."

THOSE WHO WAIT

Mrs. M. C. E. Gatlin Drama File No. 11069

NINE O'CLOCK. Berma waiting for her father's return so that they can have supper together, tells the impatient maid she can have the rest of the evening off. Then taking out her roadster, Berma begins searching for her father in every place he may possibly be. At last she finds him in a speakeasy. Worried by his utter dejection she sits beside him and learns that he has lost his entire fortune at the races to-day. With a forced nonchalance, Berma puts her arms about his shoulders, and takes him home. Faced with the necessity of getting a position, Berma who has never worked a day in her life, applies to many places without success. At length she enters the legal firm of Gallehue and Jolson, and Victor Jolson hires her as his private secretary, although her knowledge of shorthand is as yet scanty. Spending every available moment brushing up on her secretarial knowledge, Berma drops entirely from the social set to which she formerly belonged. Then one day she meets Jack Clayton, one of her former admirers. Seizing both her hands in his own, he asks what she has been doing, and can scarcely credit his senses when he learns that the lovely Berma is working in a business office. He tries to persuade her to give up her position and marry him, but when she refuses, he guesses she loves somebody else. Berma returns to her office, and blushes scarlet under the cool appraisal of Victor Jolson's fiancee, Margaret Gallehue, his Senior partner's daughter. When Margaret leaves for Europe on an extended tour, she warns Victor not to fall in love with his very personable secretary and tries to induce him to get a less attractive assistant. Meanwhile, Berma, realizing that she is in love with Victor, gives no sign of it. One day, however, as she is taking shorthand, he asks her if she will come away with him for the weekend. Hurt beyond measure, she refuses, and he glances at her curiously when he realizes how deeply he has insulted her. Meanwhile Jack becomes more importunate and finally she agrees to go to dinner with him. However, as they take their places at the night club table, Berma sees Laura Landau the notorious dancer, weaving her sinuous body before Victor Jolson. Victor watches her with interest, and Laura continues to direct her dance at him. Unable to endure it longer, Berma begs Jack to take her home. In the cab he asks her for the last time if she will give up what he calls her foolishness, and come to him. And for the last time Berma refuses. The next morning she goes to the office with the idea of resigning, feeling she can no longer work with him. She finds him musing over a telegram, and as she enters, he puts it aside . Berma tells him she is leaving, and he appears genuinely concerned, as if the idea that he might possibly have to do without her, never occurred to him. When he asks her why she is going, she gives an evasive answer, but when he shows her the telegram from Margaret, telling him she has eloped with a titled Count, Berma's involuntary gasp gives her away. Seizing her shoulders, Victor asks if it makes any difference to her, and as she turns away, he asks her to be his wife. Incredulously Berma turns her face to him, and his lips meet hers.

AIKENSIDE

Teresa Penza Drama File No. 10908

DR. HOLBROOK welcomes his friends, Agnes and Guy Remington, who have come to settle property claims on Aikenside, their joint estate. As the three are seated in his study they discuss plans; while Agnes is in the next room talking to Mrs. Connors, the landlady, Guy tells the doctor that he has granted his capricious sister her rights on condition that she does not marry again, in order to insure his little niece, Jessie, adequate protection. Agnes' first impulsive marriage and reckless divorce estranged her from the family, but he wishes these differences to be forgotten and hopes to prevent further unhappiness. He then calls in Maddy, an impoverished young girl, who wishes to become a teacher, but Dr. Holbrook informs her that her educational qualifications are insufficient. Too proud to accept charity, the young girl leaves, returning to her grandfather, who has been unsuccessful in a law suit in which he claims rights to part of Aikenside. The following week Dr. Holbrook calls, upon discovering that Maddy is ill. He confides to Guy that he believes undernourishment is the cause, and Guy arranges for Maddy to become a governess to Agnes' little girl, Jessie, who is lonely and sad since her mother departed for Newport with a gay crowd of friends. At first Maddy's grandfather refuses, but, impressed with Guy's kindliness, at last consents.

Maddy is happy in her new home until Mrs. Noah, the cook, wisely warns Guy that the girl is falling in love with him. Then he shows her a picture of Lucy Antherstone, his sweetheart, who is in Europe, suffering from a lingering illness, and tells her that he is going to her. Maddy holds back the tears as best she can, promising to look after Jessie in his absence, and Guy, counteracting Agnes' orders that Maddy is to eat in the kitchen with the servants, tells her he regards her as a little sister. He offers to send her away to school, with Jessie, but she refuses. Shortly after he sails, Agnes' marries a wealthy bachelor in Newport and requests Guy to care for her child, as she wishes to enjoy her freedom. Although on the point of leaving, Maddy agrees to stay with Jessie, unwilling to bring further unhappiness to the little girl. After Guy's departure, Maddy is called to the bedside of her grandfather who dies. A little later, the girl's Uncle Joseph, suffering from a severe nervous shock, asks her to come to him; at the same time Sarah, a mysterious woman whom he has often mentioned in his delirium, calls, and admits that when a servant in the home of Maddy's grandfather she exchanged Guy's father for Joseph, when both were infants, in order to avenge an injustice committed against her by another relative. Thus Maddy learns that part of Aikenside belongs to her uncle Joseph and when he dies it falls to her. Independent financially, she awaits Guy's return. When he comes, she explains the situation to him and he tells her that as he has property of his own, the ownership of Aikenside must never come between them.

However, although longing for his love, Maddy refuses it, and prepares to leave until he demands an explanation. She then tells him that she can never come between him and Lucy, until he explains that his English sweetheart is dead and Maddy is all he has in the world. Tenderly she goes to him, and these two face the future together, the crime of Aikenside rectified by their love.

MONEY TO STEAL

R. Dobson Ireland Drama File No. 10880

ENGAGED to be married in the spring, Gloria McKay and Thomas Walton happily plan their home and future, as they stroll through the park. Because Tommy wishes it, Gloria promises to give up her position as secretary in the Swift National Bank the following week, although their marriage will not be possible until Tommy, a detective on the police force, wins promotion. Enviously, Al Turner, who has loved Gloria since school days, watches Tommy as he dances with the beautiful, golden haired young woman, but he tells his companion that she is wise in not marrying him, since his life has been ruined by liquor and a mistaken choice of companions, who have turned him away from honest living. When Gloria sees him, she stops for a moment, presenting Tommy, and the young couple are introduced to Spike Frisco, who is attracted to Gloria. The next morning finds Gloria at her post of duty, capably handling the business details of the bank. When she tells her employer of her coming marriage he expresses his regret at losing so efficient a worker, at the same time offering his congratulations. Just as she leaves the office, Spike Frisco enters. Suspicious of him from the first, Gloria slips into the closet. Drawing his gun, Spike orders the bank president to hand over the combination to the safe and keys to the vault, while his men cover the other employees. Swiftly, Gloria dispatches a clerk who is returning to the bank to send for the police, as she leans out of the window of the closet.

Bravely facing Spike, Gloria smiles at him, and asks him not to rob the bank in which her money is deposited. "Will you come with me, if I don't?" he questions, and when she replies in the affirmative, placing her arm on his shoulder, the infatuated gang leader calls off the robbery, saying that it can just as well be postponed for the moment. Carrying the unresisting girl to his car, Spike drives away with her to his luxurious cabin in the mountains. Here he begins to make love to her; cleverly fencing for time, Gloria manages to keep him at his distance. Meanwhile police arrive and are informed of Gloria's courageous step in saving the money of the depositors. Frantic with worry over his sweetheart, Tommy leads the search for Spike's cabin. Night falls, and still no trace is discovered of the place, cleverly concealed by canyon walls. No longer willing to be put off, Spike forces Gloria into his room, attacking the young woman, and informing her that he abandoned the bank robbery because he thought it more profitable to hold her for ransom after he tired of her. Hearing her muffled cries for help, Al breaks into the room, and orders Spike to release her. Angrily, Spike shoots the boy, who, in turn, fires back, fatally wounding the gang leader. Staggering down the mountain side, Al meets Tommy, and informs him of Gloria's hiding place, as he loses consciousness, and is rushed to the hospital. Spike and his gang are arrested, while Tommy takes Gloria in his arms. Together, they visit Al in the hospital, promising to help secure a light sentence for him, but he dies, a smile on his lips, as he realizes he has accomplished one good deed, and brought happiness to the girl he loves. Tommy wins promotion, and Gloria.

THE LOVED ONE

George Shim Shue Western File No. 10850

YOUNG men from the surrounding territory hitched their horses to the post surrounding Dad Mullings ranch nearly every night of the year, for inside was music and laughter and Sarah, his lovely daughter, the prettiest girl west of the Mississippi. Jack McKay, whose father owned the adjoining ranch, was particularly ardent in his suit, urging Sarah to become his wife, but she offered them all only friendship, until John McCurry, a stranger in the community, came to call upon her father. For the first time, she felt love awakening in her heart, although her father expressed a dislike for the young man, which he would not explain. Against his wishes, Sarah invited John to call, disobeying Dad Mullings for the first time. When John asked her to marry him as they were riding together, she gave him the answer he hoped for, as, dismounting, they embraced. That night, after dinner, the young man bravely presented his plans for marriage to Dad Mullings, who ordered him to stay away from Sarah. Alone with her father, the girl demanded an explanation, and at last he told her that John's father had cheated him out of a considerable sum of money which they held jointly for their depositors in a mining concern, leaving him to make amends as best he could. Financially ruined, he had come to this ranch, willed to him by his father, to start over again, but the shock and hard life had proved too much for his beloved wife who had died shortly after Sarah's birth. Blaming John's father for her death, how could he welcome his son into his family?

Pleading with him desperately, Sarah attempted to prove that John and she should not be made to suffer for an act which the younger man was not even aware of, as his father had died in his infancy. At last, seeing that this did not avail, the girl planned to elope with the man of her choice the following Sunday, believing that when he learned the fine character of her lover he would be proud to have him as a son-in-law. Toward sun down that evening, Dad Mullings walked across the field in which his herd of prize cattle were grazing when a sudden clap of thunder frightened them. With one accord, the frantic animals ran in a panic towards him. Warding them off as best he could, Dad Mullings stood his ground until one of the beasts knocked him to the ground, and another ran across his body. John, in passing, hastened to him, carrying the injured man to his car, and drove him to the ranch house. When he regained consciousness, the doctor informed him that he might never be able to walk again. Forgetting her own plans, Sarah devoted herself night and day to nursing her father back to health. With tears in her eyes, she informed John that she could not marry him now, without her father's consent, and he reluctantly agreed with her. That night, he dreamed that Jack kidnapped his sweetheart, awakening in terror. A few days later, while purchasing a pack of cigarettes in the village tavern, he inadvertently heard Jack mentioning Sarah's name to a group of four men. On the defensive, he listened; the group outlined plans for her abduction. Delayed when his horse slipped and broke her leg, John reached the Mullings ranch by late afternoon, hastily inquiring for Sarah. When her father informed him that she had gone riding with Jack, John related the conversation of the previous evening, and, mounting his horse, stopping only for Dick Henry, his friend, he followed the girl. At last finding her tied in a cabin in the mountains, John forced an entrance, throwing Jack to the ground. When one of his men drew a gun, Dick hasily shot it from his hand, and the two held the gang while the sheriff was summoned, arriving a few minutes later. Returning the frightened Sarah to her father, John was amazed to see the man rise from his wheel chair and hasten to his daughter, happiness overcoming what surgery could not. Joyfully a wedding was planned, as John received the thanks of Dad Mullings, while Sarah nestled in his arms.

MEN LIVE ONCE

Harold Reynolds Drama File No. 11035

WHILE indulging his hobby for photography, Harry Reynolds focuses his telescopic camera upon the ruins of an old bridge. However, his attention is caught by two men who drag an inert body to the edge of the opposite bank and toss it to the rocks below. He runs to the spot and finds the body of a gangster queen who had been taken for a ride and thrown here. Harry summons Dick Taylor, Chief of Detectives and from his description of the two men, Taylor guesses they are Gentlemen "Gene" Shores and "Louie" Jacobs, who have thus far evaded police capture. However, the evidence against the pair is too slim for conviction.

The next day Harry suddenly recalls the camera he had thrown away in the excitement. He finds it, and developing the roll of films discovers that he has instinctively snapped the tell-tale picture. Elated, he dashes over to headquarters, and since Taylor is out, entrusts the photograph to his secretary Sanders. However, as he leaves the station, he begins to realize how he has involved himself, and very much disturbed, Harry draws "Bones" Roberts, his best friend, a happy-go-lucky fellow aside and confides the entire incident to him. Bones worriedly admits he has never trusted Sanders, and urges Harry to hand the negatives over to him, lest the gangsters suspect his part in giving them away. Inadvertently Bones leaves the package containing the picture at the home of his sweetheart, Charlotte. Meanwhile Sanders turns the photograph over to Gene, whose "stool pigeon" he is. Harry, returning to his house, is stopped by gangsters who, with a gun dug in his ribs, force him into a car and bring him to their hideout. There Harry is tortured in an effort to make him reveal where the negative is, and at last, bleeding and unable to endure the hot iron held near his eyes. Harry agrees to call Bones and tell him to hand the negative over to the messenger. However, Bones has to arouse Charlotte, who begins worrying and follows him. She sees him knock out the messenger and take his place, forcing the driver to bring him to the hideout. Charlotte calls the police. Bones covers the gangsters with his gun, although the sight of the limp, bleeding form of Harry maks his blood boil. One of the gangsters shoots, another switches out the lights, and Bones seizes Louie and uses him as a shield. In the dark none dares breathe lest he be shot. Bones pushes Louie toward the door and instantly the gang, believing Bones has tried to escape, riddle the body with bullets so that it crashes down three flights of stairs. Bones shoots at the direction of the bullet spurts and at last with his gun and Gene's empty the two close and in a terrific hand to hand battle, Gene pummels Bones into senselessness and escapes to the roof followed by the police Charlotte has brought. Gene fleeing shoots a policeman and is himself shot just as he is escaping. His body hurtles from the roof. Meanwhile Charlotte has found Bones and Harry and as she reassures them, bends to kiss Bones' swollen but smiling lips.

REVENGE

Ruth Harding Drama File No. 11137

WITH her baby hugged close to her, Mrs. Cooper descended from the train at New Haven and seeking out the cheapest boarding house in town, took a tiny back room. The landlady sympathized when the frail little woman told of her husband who had died without leaving her any insurance. Too weak to do any other kind of work, Mrs. Cooper took in sewing and her exquisite handiwork won many customers for her. However, just as things began to pick up for them, gossip started whispering that Mrs. Cooper had never been married. When little Betty grew old enough to go to school, the children avoided her and called her ugly names. Their mothers withdrew their work from Mrs. Cooper who at last gave up the unequal struggle and died. Bitterly, Betty left town, and accepting the invitation of an aunt, went to live in New York. There, for the first time she was freed of the jeering and snobbery of her former acquaintances, and giving every bit of energy in her body to the task of making something of herself, Betty soon distinguished herself at school. At last, having completed a secretarial course, she found employment in a bank, and rapidly rose to the position of secretary to the president, Mr. Moran. And it was thus that Betty met the president's son, John Moran, Junior who fell in love with her. They were married and after a honeymoon abroad were sent to the New Haven office of the bank. No one in town recognized the beautiful wife of John Moran as the little girl they had driven from town with their wagging tongues. It was at the first dinner given by Mrs. Moran that the dinner partner of Mrs. Robert Evans turned toward her and gasped. Suddenly a woman screamed, and as they turned toward Mrs. Evans they discovered she was dead. The only mark on her body was a small scratch. A week later the Morans played golf with some friends, shook hands as they parted, and returned home. When they reached their own house a message awaited them that Mrs. William Duncan, whom they had left alive and well was found dead in her bedroom, a tiny scratch on her right hand. Detectives were hired. All New Haven was roused by the two mysterious deaths. Sunday night after a motor trip to Long Island with a party of people, Mrs. Henry Cromwell was found dead, and the baffled detectives were astounded to learn that despite their vigilance, the following Saturday Mrs. Robinson who had set sail for Europe was found dead in her cabin, three hours out at sea. Hysteria reigned, and came to a climax when after Mrs. James Hall's bridge, with a deteotive watching each guest, the hostess herself was found dead. Mrs. Moran, whose nerves cracked under the strain was confined to her room for three days. Finally recovered, Mrs. Moran went to see Mrs. Barnes and was informed by the maid that she was out just now, would Mrs. Moran wait? Several minutes passed. Suddenly Betty became deathly ill and insisted on being brought home. There calling in the detectives and doctor she confessed that she was the murderess of all the women who had ruined her childhood and caused her mother's death. She had scratched them all with a deadly poison contained in her ring, but while waiting for Mrs. Barnes, her last victim, she had inadvertently scratched and killed herself. So ended a colossal scheme for revenge.

THE HIGHER PATH

George J. Felder Drama File No. 11074

WITH his young son, Arthur, by his side, Nathan Trent drove through the corn fields on the farm which had been in his family for three generations, proudly surveying them. Years of hard, anxious labor had gone into the creation of this farm, but now the long period of honest toil had reaped a golden harvest. "The meek shall inherit the earth," the farmer reverently quoted, instructing his son that when he reached manhood, not only would he inherit a means of amply supporting himself and his family, but he would be able to contribute to the welfare of the nation, a rare privilege to any man. With the restless energy of youth, Arthur soon left the older man to join Helen, a neighbor on the farm next to theirs, and his sweetheart since early childhood. Smiling, Nathan watched these two, whose love was just finding mature expression, as he reflected that Helen would make a splendid wife for his only son. A little later, Arthur left for college, kissing the lovely Helen for the first time in farewell, and trying to hide the slight trembling in his voice and he said goodbye to his father. At the university the farm boy bore the jokes directed at him because of his rural origin with good natured nonchalance, but secretly, he began to adopt the manners and attitudes of his urbane associates. Richard Gravel, son of a banker, and a fraternity brother of Arthur, particularly influenced the youth, assuring him that he would never achieve fame and fortune on an Iowa farm. Eager, brilliant, restless, Arthur determined to become a banker.

When he informed his father of this decision, Nathan pleaded with him not to desert the soil. Headstrong and reckless, the young man would not listen, although sorry to shatter all his father's dreams. Strolling across the fields with Helen, Arthur asked her to become his wife, but, saying she could not leave her mother alone on the farm, where they both belonged, the girl refused, hiding her tears from Arthur. After graduation, Arthur obtained a position in the bank through Richard's father and subsequently became engaged to Dolores Gravel, his sister. Writing to his father, Arthur pleaded with him to give up the farm, settle in the city and enjoy life, but Nathan scoffed at such a plan. Through a combination of his own ingenuity and good fortune, Arthur accumulated the beginning of a fortune on the stock exchange. Then came the crash. On a temporary leave of absence, Arthur discovered that his father was fighting off foreclosure, too proud to ask his son for help. Although still criticizing the older man for clinging to the difficult life of a farmer, Arthur saved the farm for him, noticing with dismay that many of his old friends had lost their holding and were employed as laborers on the farms they once owned, or were forced to accept charity. When Arthur was informed that his position was gone, as the bank had closed, and his fortune swept away, he at last realized that the control of industry and property by the few was wrong.

Averting a strike by the Iowa farmers, led by Helen's father, Arthur turned his energy toward representing their cause in a brilliant plea to the government. A riot occured and Arthur saved Helen from injury, at last quieting the mob and assuring them that they would never gain their just deserts by these lawless methods.

When Dolores broke her engagement to him, Arthur won Helen's promise to become his wife. With her, he resolved to make his life work the representation of the farmers, an equal distribution of rights, according to the enlightened laws of the Man who said: "The meek shall inherit the earth."

Tal McCauley Drama File No. 11135

BECAUSE they have money and position, Rena's father thinks that nobody in town is good enough for her. He refuses to allow Bill Gurney who loves and is loved by Rena to enter his house. One evening Rena comes running down the steps to find her father pleased over the newspaper account of his reelection to a town office. He questions Rena closely but is satisfied when she tells him she is due at the Choral Club to practice for their appearance at the World Fair. After practice, Rena finds Bill waiting for her downstairs in his car and in the moonlight they ride home together. The following evening Rena gets a telegram urging her immediate presence in Chicago for a solo performance. Hastily packing, she calls Bill but he is not home. As she goes to the station she meets Joe Sherman, who has for many years been urging her to marry him. He too is leaving for the Fair. Just before the train pulls out. Bill dashes up to the station only to see Rena riding off with Joe. Dazed he stands looking after them and Ethel Sawyer, one of the town girls, discerning Bill's distress, comes over to sympathize and to tell Bill what a shabby trick it was for Rena to run off and get married without letting Bill know. At first Bill refuses to believe it, but the memory of the pair on the Chicago bound train seems proof enough. Hurt, bewildered, Bill finds Ethel and her family sympathetic and half-caring, he allows them to make all arrangements for his marriage to Ethel. At the Fair, Rena covers herself with glory and with the Choral Club wins a large cash prize. Joe Sherman renews his old wooing and tries to induce her to marry him, but Rena tells him she loves somebody else. Elated at her success at the Fair, Rena returns home. She is hurt that Bill is not at the station to greet her but her mother and brother tell her that Bill has married Ethel Sawyer in her absence. Incredulous, Rena broods over the situation and at last through her father's influence she secures a teaching position to help keep her mind from Bill. The Principal, Mr. Shutter takes an immediate interest in Rena, and despite the fact that he is years older than she, she agrees at length to marry him. From the first Rena is to learn that he married her to be her father's son-in-law and is more interested in the material advantages he is gaining than in her.

Meanwhile Bill has advanced from a lawyer to a Judge. His wife forever nagging that he thinks more of Rena than of her, spends money extravagantly. Bill's only consolation is his twin daughters. Ethel nags until Bill lets her buy an expensive roadster, and the first time she goes out in it, she sees Rena driving by. Maliciously she tries to cut her off. Her own car gets out of control, and Ethel is killed in the crash. Bill, coming to the hospital, meets Rena again. Rena's husband meets a wealthy widow, and asks Rena for a divorce, and after many, many years, Rena and Bill are to come together at last.

NINE LIVES

Olive Elizabeth Beale Short Subject File No. 10932

HOPNAI was the pride and joy of his mother's life, for she had inherited a long, fluffy tail which the Manx cat had always wished for. Even as a tiny kitten, he attracted attention by his beauty and audacity. When Missy and the Boy came to visit her owners, Aunt Susie and Uncle George, she had so won the youngster's heart that she was presented to him . Safely ensconsed in a lined basket, and unafraid, as a descendant of a royal Manx must always be, Hopnai made the journey on the train to Boston, his new home. At the station, Missy and the Boy were greeted by Dad, who peeped into the basket and smiled a welcome at the late addition to the family who purred in response. The four then entered a restaurant, where Hopnai was served choice delicacies by admiring waitresses. Nicknamed Hoffy by the Boy, the kitten soon became a great favorite with the family, occupying an honored place on a high stool beside Dad during the evening meal, and prompting him to contribute bits of chicken or steak with a delicate placing of the paw on his sleeve. During the long afternoons, the black kitten chased leaves up and down the garden, or pounced on grasshoppers until at night, the Boy, returning from school, chased her merrily and bore her in triumph into the house. As Hoffy grew older she established a reputation by openly spitting in the face of a big dog, scaring him away. Famous also as a mouse killer, he was borrowed by the neighbors for this service, and could scarce understand his Missy's scoldings when she proudly placed her victims on the doormat. Imprisoned in a boarding house for cats when the family went to Europe, Hoffy longed for them as he paced up and down in his narrow cage.

The family moved to a new home at the beach, but devoted to them, Hoffy made himself content, happily exploring his new surroundings. Developing a taste for music, Hoffy would spring up on the piano stool, begging his adored Missy to play, and would contentedly purr an accompaniment. When Caruso, a gray cat next door, attempted to steal Missy's affections, Hoffy learned the pangs of jealously until, observing this, his mistress ignored the intruder. One thing was forbidden the kitten; he must not climb upon the dainty pink and white spread what covered Missy's bed, since his dark fur left a mark ,but the temptation was so great that he continually stole away to this forbidden paradise. Another lesson that Hoffy learned after repeated scoldings from the whole family was not to catch birds.

There came a time when the house was quieted and Missy lay ill. Hoffy pined outside the door and sprang in joyously when at last she was admitted. During Missy's convalescence, Hoffy sat for hours in her lap, nibbling bits of cream toast given him, and purring his happiness. At last came the war; Hoffy remembered the dogs and cats at the boarding house, continually attempting to scratch and bite one another, and wondered if it was anything like that to which the Boy was going. When Missy received no letters from him for weeks at a time, Hoffy would rub against her encouragingly, and urge her to the piano. After a time, Missy would sing: "There's a Long, Long, Trail," and Hoffy would purr when she saw her smile through her tears. On that happy day when the Boy came home, Hoffy was wild with delight, running through the house, and leaping into his arms. Later, when a woman who hated cats and thought them incapable of affection came to call, Hoffy mischievously curled up in her turban, and fell asleep, running playfully away when awakened by her screams.

Years passed, and Dad was gone, the Boy married. But Hoffy was always by Missy's side, watching her continually with a silent, enduring love. Thus ends the saga of Hoffy, a king among cats.

AND LIFE GOES ON

Helen L. Brown Drama File No. 10933

AGAINST the advice of her parents, Marion promises to become Steven's bride. Although admitting that they are correct in saying his one fault is excessive drinking, which changes his kindly personality completely, the young girl idealistically plans to reform him, so great is her love for this man. The wedding takes place, and Marion's mother shakes her head sadly as she sees her only daughter, radiant in bridal white, promise to love, honor and obey an addict of alcohol. However, she extends her best wishes to her son-in-law, as does Kurt Newcombe, who has loved Marion since childhood. After a joyous honeymoon, the young couple settle down in an apartment in town. Promising his bride that he will never again touch a drop of alcoholic beverage in any form, Steven strives manfully to keep his bargain, although it is increasingly difficult as his business associates offer him a nip at the office, or gay crowds of friends drop in with their own "supplies" to mix cocktails at the apartment. Overcome with nervous strain following the completion of a law suit, Steven at last yields to the persuasion of a friend, and stops at a speakeasy for a cocktail. This leads to many more, and Marion, after anxiously phoning the hospitals and police stations, sees the man she loves come home at last, heavily intoxicated.

Heartbroken, Marion tells him that he must keep his promise, since she is expecting a child, and, following the birth of little Helen, Steven wages a losing fight against drink. At last, when Marion is on the point of leaving him for her baby's sake, he pleads with her desperately, and agrees to move to a cottage in the country, devoting his life to writing and farming if she will remain with him. Still deeply in love with her unfortunate husband, Marion gladly agrees, and establishes a charming little home in the mountains. Their only near neighbors are the Taylors, a likeable couple, whose children prove desirable playmates for little Helen. Time goes by, and Marion is happy once more as she sees Steven regain his health. One day he is hunting alone in the woods when Jack Ruskin, who lives in the neighboring village, accidentally encounters him and the two men talk together. Finding him congenial, Steven invites Ruskin to call at his home, planning to go hunting with him again, but as he does not show up, is about to take Marion and Helen for a ride when he appears. While the two men are alone on the porch, Ruskin offers Steven a drink of whiskey. The old temptation asserts itself, and, after refusing, he accepts. When Marion comes down later he orders her away, and with sinking heart she remonstrates with him. In a blind rage he chases his wife with an axe; little Helen runs screaming to her room as he raises it to strike her mother. But a few moments later, Marion, pale as a ghost, takes the trembling child in her arms, and consoles her, telling her that the axe caught on the window ledge. To quiet her, she sends her to the Taylors, but Charlie Taylor, also under the influence of Ruskin's liquor, threatens his own wife, and the two men shoot at one another. Now thoroughly alarmed, Helen runs away. At last she comes to the railroad station where she sees Ruskin, covered with blood. As the child screams, her own parents rush to her, and send Ruskin, who has assaulted his partner, to the hospital. Thoroughly repentant, Steven is at last cured of his malady through the terror he has caused his child.

THE SPIDER CREEPS

Jchn H. Walker Melodrama File No. 10973

BEHIND the harmless looking front which proclaimed WAREHOUSE reposed the sinister and fully equipped laboratory of the Blair Society. Within four scientists, honored graduates of an English University worked night and day on their vitalistic and mechanistic theories. Here guinea pigs reproduced with the aid of chemical injections, eighty year old women were rejuvenated, and dead bodies were revitalized synthetically. Through bribery and threats, the Blairs enjoyed the protection of the weak willed Mayor and District Attorney who could only guess at such horrors as the vat containing the remains of innumerable victims of the scientific curiosity. At length, needing more money to carry on, the Blairs determined to coerce the Bank President, Herman Sloan. When he failed to yield to their threats, The Blairs introduced their bio-chemical spider into the philanthropist's room, and as Sloan's mind relaxed under the deadly effects of the venom, Ransom Blair suggested hypnotically that the banker withdraw the sum of two hundred thousand dollars and bring it to the WAREHOUSE. However, as Sloan staggered into the laboratory, bearing the money, his heart gave out under the potency of the drug. Glassy-eyed he stared at the malefactors, and collapsed silently to the floor. Realizing he was dead, the Blairs ripped his rings from his fingers, subjected the body to a corroding acid, and locked the skeleton in the closet. Sloan's daughter Janet, was beside herself with grief at the disappearance of her father, and placed her entire fortune toward the apprehension of the criminals. The Mayor and District Attorney tried in vain to halt the investigations but at last revealed they were powerless. Whereupon the Blairs arranged to have the casket supposed to contain the decomposed remains of Sloan's body together with the identifying rings, presented separately, delivered to the District Attorney in return for a ransom of fifty thousand dollars from the Sloan estate. Beside himself with fear, the District Attorney declared the case closed, but Lyle Warren, young surgeon fiance of Janet, insisted upon further investigation, refusing to accept the inefficient methods of the police. When Warren arranged for the grilling of the District Attorney, the unfortunate man suddenly let out an unearthly shriek and before the stricken eyes of his inquisitioners stiffened and died on the verge of a confession, while the deadly spider, crept unnoticed back to its place. Warren, determined for Janet's sake to see the matter to its source learned that Sloan had withdrawn two hundred thousand dollars the day of his death. Accordingly when, at dead of night, unable to sleep, he walked the streets and noticed the delivery of complicated scientific apparatus to the WAREHOUSE, he determined at the risk of his own life to investigate. Speechless with horror at the sights of the laboratory, he came at last upon a skeleton which he identified positively as being that of Sloan's, by means of the compound fracture he had himself set several months ago. That night the Mayor's body was found, killed the same way as the District Attorney. Warren was unable to discover the operators of the laboratory until awakening from a troubled slumber, he saw the deadly spider creeping toward him. He killed it, and pretending to be in a hypnotic trance entered the WAREHOUSE. As the doors began to close behind him, his men, following him with machine guns and bombs, closed in, capturing the four Blairs and exposing the horrible death they had planned for Warren. Freed of the oppressing horror, Janet and Warren were married at last, and together they helped each other efface the past.

SEVEN SISTERS

Mabel Bustard Baird Drama File No. 10965

FROM the moment lovely little Marie met Tommy Dugan she fell in love. Marie might have had any boy in the school, and there were those who warned her that despite all Tommy's personal charm and popularity as captain of the football team, he'd make a poor husband. But Marie, suffering as Tommy did every time he managed to get in trouble, kept on loving and the day they graduated, young Marie and Tommy Dugan were married. Her roommate Maude, who adored her, accepted a position as teacher in a local high school, but Marie gave up all promise of a career to become just Mrs. Dugan. In a year Marie's first baby was born. And thereafter, while Tommy would alternately make money on wild ventures and then drift improvidentially, daughter after daughter was born to the union. Then one day came the terrible news that while Tommy was on the road selling typewriters, he had been caught in a storm. Later his overturned buggy and the body of his horse were found floating on the swollen river, but Tommy's body was never recovered. The day after the tragedy, Marie's seventh child was born. Maude, comfortably salaried as a teacher, offered to adopt the golden haired Josephine, but Marie held the mite close, and assured her friend she could manage. Never once during the years when Marie sold her house to move into the railroad section of the town, and to support her household by embroidering and baking, did Marie lend an ear to the whispers of those who maintained her Tommy was not dead, but had deserted her. The girls grew up. Maude was to come flying when Marie cabled that her little household was down with typhoid, and even when the twins passed on, the brave little soldier, Marie, was to keep going, head high, with only love in her heart for her Tommy. In the years that followed, three of the girls were to marry, two unhappily. Helena, who showed signs of her mother's stifled creative talent, was to write, and one day her first check was to come from an editor. How much rejoicing there was then for the Dugans, and how much waving about of the nationally famous magazine in which the name Helena Dugan, authoress, loomed so prominently Then Jo was to graduate, and, with a fine career open to her, was to fall in love with Steve Haines. The moment Maude saw Steve, her lips compressed, for Steve was a prototype of Tommy. All those who had sympathized with Marie were to frown on Jo's love, except Marie herself. She, alone held Jo very close to her, and discovering that Steve was as loving and improvident as Tommy, was to warn her that it was to be a hard life, but a sweet one. Then came Jo's graduation. Jo read the valedictory address, and the solemnity of the occasion was marred only by the hacking cough of a poor consumptive in the audience. That night as they celebrated at home, steps were heard on the porch, and then a dull thud . Rushing out they found, outstretched, the body of Tommy. Marie for the first time in her life fainted. Later, when the doctor had made Tommy's last moments as comfortable as possible, Tommy gasped out the story of his being hurt by a falling spar the night of the storm, how he had been a victim of amnesia until the appearance of Helena's story in a magazine had awakened his slumbering memory. With the blessing of the dying Tommy, and brave Marie, Josephine is married to her Steve, prepared, like her mother, to give her life for the man she loves.

REMOTE CONTROL

June K. Pickering Mystery File No. 11141

IMPATIENTLY Dr. Reynolds roused himself from his calculations and listened to the rapping at his laboratory door. Outside his daughter Irene waited with his dinner. "Set it down," he snapped, "and go away." He could hear her pleas to leave his work and take some rest, but he paid no attention. Again with rapt attention he turned to the dials of his radio. Hours passed. His hands combed his hair nervously as he twisted dial after dial and waited for a response. No sound came from the radio. He grew weary and his head dropped forward. Suddenly he opened his eyes and saw that someone was scattering all his papers. With a wild protest he turned, only to stare fascinated into the expressionless eyes of a ghastly face. Fingers wound about his throat. With a gasp Dr. Reynolds fell noiselessly to the floor. Again Irene came to the door, pleading with her father to come out of the laboratory. At last she forced the door open with the aid of the butler. With a terrified scream she saw her father's prone figure. Minutes later Inspector Collins arrived with his men. Soothing the hysterical girl he learned from her that her father had been experimenting for months with radio. He had allowed no one in his laboratory. Together with his finger print expert, Inspector Collins looked over the clear marks left by the murderer. "I've seen that mark before," he mused, then suddenly he said, "Killer Blaine!" Wide-eyed the finger print expert agreed with him, the markings being unforgettable. "But," Collins said slowly, "Blaine was electrocuted three weeks ago." Examining the room, he paused before the radio set. Suddenly the telephone jangled and Collins fell back as he learned that five horrible murders had been committed within the vicinity, all by the same madman. Spreading a police dragnet, Inspector Collins left his assistant Reese in the room and went out to see the other victims. Everywhere the prints corresponded to those of Killer Blaine. It was uncanny. Meanwhile Collins, falling in love with the pretty Irene Reynolds, urged her to leave the vicinity claiming it was dangerous. Before going, Irene arranged to take some momentos of her father. As she made her way to the station, a huge form blocked her path. Cold eyes penetrated through her. Suddenly she felt the hands circle her throat. With her last strength she screamed. Hearing a distant call Collins raced to the scene, and warning his men to be careful this killer was inhuman, he sprang at the Thing. Irene dropped to the ground, and with eyes wide with horror watched the man she loved grapple with the loathsome superhuman beast. Meanwhile back in Dr. Reynold's laboratory, Reese was looking for clues. Tired of waiting, he turned to the radio, twisted the dials but got no response. In disgust he snapped off the controls and turned toward the desk. At the edge of the wood Collins was being slowly overpowered by the crushing hands. Suddenly the creature fell back—dead. Recovering himself, Collins proceeded gingerly to the Thing, to discover that although he had apparently died but a moment ago, its body was already cold. Meanwhile Reese wandered up and as Collins discovered that the Thing was indeed Killer Blaine, and that in place of a brain were numberless tiny wires, Reese explained that he had noticed that although the tubes of the radio set were lit, no sound came forth and so he had snapped off the set. At last it was all clear. Reynolds had rigged up a wireless control of a dead body and his creature had destroyed him and would have destroyed Collins among others had not Reese detached the set. The mystery cleared at last, Collins and Irene go off together, romance succeeding horror.

THE SEA DEVIL

Willie Mae Flowers Drama File No. 9509

SUSPECTING that Captain Jack Neilan is bringing a more valuable cargo than food to his factory workers on Fife Island, the first mate, Nelson Hawks, instructs the crew to guard Neilan and his friendly second mate, John La Rue, while he searches the ship. Chagrined at seeing John, whom he thought asleep, in the storeroom, Nelson retreats to browbeat the crew for their negligence, and in his fury, kills a protesting old sailor. Informed on the latter's deathbed of Nelson's scheme to kill them both, Neiland and John plan to take the payroll for the factory workers, to the island the next night. No sooner have they rowed away with their treasure, when Nelson rushes from his hiding place nearby to the captain's cabin to find the chest gone; and noiselessly following them, shoots them from the island ambush as they are discussing the map made of the location of the money. Returning to the ship, Nelson, to cover up his secret, angrily accuses the crew of having revealed his plans so that Neilan and John could flee with the booty. Guiding the ship away from the island, Nelson, caught in a terrible hurricane, remembers that he has cut the boats loose; and leaving the others to sink with the boat, saves himself with a life preserver. At the same time he is picked up by a passing liner the wounded captain is rescued by a freighter, and after he has revealed Nelson's treachery, the steamship companies offered a reward for his capture. Having read of the captain's rescue, Nelson, determined to kill him, enters his heavily guarded residence through an underground entrance known to him through his association with the former bootlegger owner. Entering through the secret bookcase door he shoots the captain and flees from the pursuing police to whom the dying Neilan has pointed out the strange exit. Heartbroken, Mildred, Neilan's daughter, and her fiance, Glen, vow revenge and charter a ship to find the money; and Nelson, under a disguise and another name is given a position thereon. Having talked the crew into mutiny by secretly killing one of them and casting the blame on Glen, Nelson has the latter imprisoned; and threatening to kill her as he has her father and John, if she refuses his advances, he also locks Mildred up. Pretending to greater willingness, Mildred steals Nelson's keys when he has made himself drunk in celebration of his victory, and releases Glen. Recovering several minutes later, Nelson hastens to Mildred's room to search for his keys; and while Mildred holds up the angry crew at the door, Glen beats his assailant into unconsciousness. Imprisoning the crew, the two release all rowboats, and hasten to the island for the gold. In the meantime, released by the now untettered crew, Nelson commands the ship; and when due to his misdirection, the boiler explodes, sinking the ship, he saves himself as before and is soon picked up by the same ship which rescues Glen and Mildred. Unmolested during the trip in order to avoid a panic among the passengers, the captain has Nelson and his men arrested as they leave the ship. After the crew have received life imprisonment and Nelson, death, Mildred and Glen are happily married. Their kiss is a symbol of their untroubled future.

THE GREATER REALITY

William Ingledue Drama File No. 11030

EVERY year on her vacation from the school where she teaches, Nell returns to the Lovers' Tree where she and Richard, her childhood sweetheart, had departed. This year, as she looks out the window, she shivers at the sight of the heavy downpour of rain, but dressing carefully, she starts her car and journeys toward her home town. Her eyes dim with unshed tears as she passes the familiar land marks where she and Richard had been so happy, and at last she draws up near the tree. Beneath its shelter, she sees two laughing young people embracing. For a moment she feels a resentment that any others should usurp her rendezvous, then seeing their carefree faces, she calls out to offer to drive them home. Laura and Jack run to the car, and as they squeeze in beside her, they tell her they never miss a day at the tree. Nell sighs and as they press her she tells them about Richard who used to meet her at that tree when they were young.

She tells how when they were schoolday sweethearts, her father objected to Richard because he had no family or money. At the tree, Richard and Nell could meet and exchange dreams about the future. Then, the night Richard was to leave for the war, Nell's father had suffered a paralytic stroke. Unable to leave his side, Nell had discovered later Richard had gone off believing she had deliberately broken their date to be married before he left. The years had passed. Nell's father had died, and Richard never returned. At last, unable endure the thought of the empty house, Nell had accepted a teaching position in another town, but every year she returned to the tree where she and Richard had been so happy.

Laura and Jack exchange glances. Many times lately they have seen an old man sit under that same tree, eyes closed. They have never intruded on his privacy before, but perhaps he is Nell's Richard. Not wishing to rouse false hopes, Laura and Jack delay the departure, since the old man is about due. Suddenly he comes up the lane. The patter of rain on the leaves is broken by a sharp cry, and almost stumbling, Nell rushes into the arms of her Richard. Holding her close to him incredulously, he explains how he had come down with a tropical fever which had left him too weak to return with his regiment from Cuba. When at last he had returned he had found Nell had sold her house and moved away. Laura and Jack leave the two lovers alone, and Richard leads Nell to the home he had bought for them both. Inside they sit before the glowing hearth, and tell each other all that has happened in the barren years of loneliness.

Soon they are disturbed by a rapping at the door, and as they open it they admit Laura and Jack who have brought with them a Justice of the Peace. So after all the years of denial, Nell and Richard are married, and it is they who smooth the path for the young lovers Laura and Jack, who find in the happiness of the older people an example for their own lives.

SPARE THE ROD

K. J. MacLennon Drama File No. 11014

PROMPTLY at nine in the morning Joe Smith walked into his office, bursting with pride. While the others gathered around him, the new manager tremulously announced that a young son had arrived in his family this morning. The boss, walking in, frowned at sight of the entire force gathered around Joe, but when he was informed that the occasion was Joe's first born, he added enthusiastic congratulations. Then one night the boss was invited to Joe's house for supper, and as he sat back comfortably after Ann's delicious meal, and was shown the infant son, his features relaxed and confidentially he remarked that he thought now that Joe had new responsibilities, he would raise his salary. Rejoicing, Joe and Ann bent over their tiny son.

Then came Joe's father. The elder Smith, a wealthy, opinionated old man, had disapproved of Joe marrying at so early an age, and refused to be cordial to Ann. However, now that he saw little golden haired Bobby, and realized this was his own grandson, his resentment began to vanish, and as the baby laughed at the prodding finger of his grandfather, Father Smith was entirely won over. His generous gifts to his son and daughter-in-law, and Joe's comfortable raise in salary began to have their effect. Ann's friends informed her she needed a nurse for the child, and in consideration of their increased income, the Smiths began to entertain a lot. New friends, new ways of spending money, and less and less time for Bobby. Sometimes Joe objected to their neglect of the child, but Ann informed him the nurse could take care of the baby better than she could, and Joe, tired of hearing her complaints about her health, kept his counsel. Meanwhile Bobby, spoiled by his nurse and his parents, found his every wish gratified by his grandfather, and young as he was, he began to feel superior to the little brother who had just come to the family. Again Joe tried to protest when Ann gave the younger child to professional care, but seeing how weak his wife was, Joe said no more. One day Bobby's grandfather ,while directing farm activities, sustained a fatal fall, and dying, left almost his entire fortune in trust for young Bobby. Over-indulged now, Bobby began to make his slightest desires commands, as if sensing his own importance. Joe tried to check his burst of temper, and now, quarreling over Bobby, Joe and Ann bid fair to wreck their own marriage.

It was Bobby's fourth birthday. Tiny, self-willed, Bobby demanded a party and as the guests began arriving, went into a tantrum because the butler had neglected to bring candles for the cake. Nothing would placate him but that he and his nurse go to town to get the candles themselves. Then, as they waited for the street lights to change, Bobby dashed on ahead, to be crushed under the wheels of a trolley and killed on the spot.

In their grief and sorrow, Ann and Joe were to be drawn together, and wiser now, they were to find their happiness in bringing up their younger child, Teddy.

GIRL OF MY DREAMS

Gertrude B. Weeden Drama File No. 11007

THROUGH the horror of bursting shells and dying comrades, Smith was able to endure because of the thought that some day this would end and he would return to his Margery. Tenderly looking at the picture of the pretty childish face, he resolved to keep himself clean for her, rejecting the suggestions of his buddies that he look over the French madamosielles in the various villages where their regiment was stationed. Twice wounded, Smith was fit only for the ambulance service but, broken in health and spirit, he still clung to his ideals, thinking only of Margery, his "Big Soul." Kate, a volunteer worker, became a fast friend of the young man, and to this understanding, motherly woman he confided his ambition to live as Margery would have him. To Kate he read Margery's child-like, proper letters, describing plans for her dehut, the tedious afternoons she had spent, annoyed at this "tiresome war," winding bandages, and other recitals of incidents in her sheltered, prim, selfish little life. Eyes aglow with enthusiasm, Smith would describe his dainty sweetheart, saying that he could never lie to her, and must remain fit to he the husband of so wonderful a girl.

During those trying months after the close of the war, before the soldiers were sent home, Smith and Bangs, his pal, again enjoyed a reunion with Kate at Tours. His nerves almost stretched to the breaking point, Smith talked constantly of Margery. While strolling with Kate one evening, a pretty French girl slipped her arm in Smith's, inviting him to come with her in a sweet, alluring voice. Refusing with a gesture, Smith remarked, an uncontrollable note of interest in his voice: "They don't make it too easy for us, do they?" The next morning, Kate, finding a note from Smith, hurried to him, and discovered him at the bridge his small store of health impaired by drinking. Desperately he related of a heavenly evening spent with Yvette the little French girl; what could he tell Margery? "Don't tell her. You wouldn't tell her of those bayonets still sticking upward in the ground would you? This happens to every man," Kate assured him. But Bangs reported later that Smith was in a hospital, in a state of collapse brought on by worry and excessive drinking. A little French girl, who had been saved from suicide by hospital officials when her family was killed, and given work to occupy her mind, was his capable nurse.

Months of slow recuperation passed. Smith confessed to Margery, who replied that she could forgive this, although she wished he had not mentioned so unsavory a subject, but, since it wasn't brought on by cowardly drinking, all would be forgotten. Back in America at last, Smith had been welcomed at the pier by Margery, wearing violets and the happy smile of one whose life has never known bitter reality. Deeply wounded when Smith, his health still broken, could not fall in with her program of parties and gaiety, Margery quarrelled with him, breaking her engagement when he was at last driven to find peace in forbidden drink. As a result of this, once more Smith found himself in a government hospital, with Yvette as his nurse. "I followed you here," she told him. And when Smith turned at last to the woman he truly loved she happily murmured: "Eet is through love that we become Big Souls, n'est-ce-pas?" While Kate, who had brought the two together, secretly, witnessed the scene with a little sigh of satisfaction.

DECEIT

Hazel O'Sullivan Drama File No. 11028

UNABLE to keep up any longer the pretense of wealth, Jack Kendricks takes his own life, leaving his wife Mary to wrest alone with the problem of supporting herself and her baby Ann. Mary finds a purchaser for her house in the wealthy Jane Van Allen, a middle aged woman who, admiring Mary's fortitude, offers her a position as social secretary. When Aunt Jane, as everyone calls her, leaves for the West to visit her nephew Dick on his ranch, she induces Mary to entrust her child to the care of the faithful old nurse, Mrs. Lawrence. However, Aunt Jane's surprise visit falls through sadly when she discovers that Dick is abroad on a vacation. Philosophically she decides to remain on with Mary until his return. She tells Mary about Dick's disagreeable sister Ella, and about Dick himself, who had been her favorite in every way until, discovering that the girl he loved, Helen Vail, was false to him, Dick had turned misanthropic.

Meanwhile Helen visits Dick's sister Ella in Paris and having discovered she still loves Dick, persuades Ella to invite him to her Paris home. Dick starts at sight of Helen, but schools himself to appear utterly indifferent. Helen fails to dent his armor, and Dick returns to his ranch in the United States. When he arrives he is overjoyed to find his aunt, but hearing a clatter of hoofs without, he rushes out to save Mary, whose horse has become frightened and tried to throw her. Cheeks flushed, Mary winces under Dick's cool scrutiny, and when his aunt introduces them, catalogues Dick as a very rude person. Meanwhile Aunt Jane has decided to adopt Mary and her baby, but, having made arrangements with her lawyer, decides to withhold the secret for a while and further asks Mary to say nothing about having been married or about Ann. Then Ella returns with her husband and plans for a house party. Wearily Dick submits but his anger is aroused when he learns that among the guests Ella has invited Helen Vail. Dick to avoid Helen, spends more time with Mary who realizes she is falling in love with him. Helen, resentful of Mary observes that Harry Thorpe, one of the other guests is madly infatuated with Mary. Accordingly, with the aid of Ella she writes Harry a note inviting him to her room after the other guests have retired, and signing it Mary. That night Harry drinks too much, and Mary awakens to find him bending over her. She screams and Dick comes. Taking in the situation, he hear Harry mutter that Mary sent for him, and orders Harry out. When the others come, Dick pretends that it was he who disturbed Mary—by mistake. Weeping alone, Mary goes to her drawer to take comfort from the photograph of Ann, Mrs. Lawrence bas sent, but discoveres it is gone. Mary prepares to leave, but Aunt Jane convinces her it would only be cowardice. That night at dinner, Dick too drinks more than his wont, then rising, he "exposes" Mary, even holding out the picture of Ann. Sobbing Mary tells them all that the child is hers, and that her husband is dead. Then she collapses. Dick carries her in his arms to his room, and restores her to consciousness, begging her to forgive him for his doubts. And with the blessing of Aunt Jane, whose dearest wish they are fulfilling, Dick and Mary are married.

CHILDREN OF DESTINY

V. E. Dyatt Drama File No. 11090

ALONE in the world, Jean Southerland pledges herself to become a missionary in China. However, having incurred several debts while working her way through college, she accepts a teaching position in a small town before leaving for the Far East. In Linley, Jean meets Bob Barton, popular son of the local banker. Bob falls in love with Jean but she puts him off, reminding him that she has pledged herself to mission service. Unable to sway her convictions, Bob finally yields to her wish and Jean accepts a transfer to another school. With the outbreak of the World War, two years later, Jean goes overseas with a hospital unit. Bob marries a St. Louis girl but a few months later enlists in the Engineers and also goes to France. For one brief hour Bob and Jean meet in war-torn France, to part regretfully as Bob returns to his wife when the Armistice is signed. Home again, Bob learns that his wife has died giving birth to their son Paul. Meanwhile Jean marries a young English army Chaplain and both leave for China to take up their work as missionaries. During a local skirmish, the missionary quarters are set on fire. Jean's husband receives injuries from which he subsequently dies, and she is left to support her daughter Betty by teaching in an American school in Wu-chau.

Years speed by. Bob becomes very successful as a banker and a man of great power in the city. His son Paul, to whom he is very devoted, is graduated from Boston Tech, and is employed by an American company which sends him to China on a railroad project. During his stay in Shanghai, Bob meets Betty who is teaching school there. They become very fast friends and finally engaged to be married. Jean hasn't seen her daughter for a year, but comes to Shanghai now to meet her fiance, having decided that at the expiration of her term of service she will return to America with the youngsters. As she enters Betty's room, she sees a photograph which startles her and learns that her daughter's young man is the son of Bob Barton. Trembling Jean blesses the lad who reminds her so much of the only man she has ever really loved. Six months later, Paul, Betty, and Jean return to the States and proceed directly to the Barton apartment. Paul greets his father fondly and with arms about each other they walk into the room where Betty is. Jean, in the next room, comes to the door, and Bob, recognizing her stares and is about to speak, when Jean lays her finger on her lips in a silencing gesture. He acknowledges the introduction without further show of feeling.

Two months later Betty and Paul are married and as they drive away from the apartment of Bob Barton, Betty laughingly calls back to him, "Daddy, you will look after mother, won't you?" With tears in her eyes Jean turns to him and says, "Boh, they are wonderful children, aren't they?" he slips his arm around her waist, and as they both look out toward the fast disappearing car of Betty and Paul, he replies softly, "Yes, Jean, Children of Destiny."

DOUBLE JEOPARDY

Janie M. Emerson Drama File No. 11075

AFTER a fierce quarrel with his clergyman father who wants him to follow in his footsteps, Jim Weatherbee leaves him. Three years later, his frail mother who has never ceased grieving, goes to meet her Maker, and Jim's father follows soon after. After settling up the estate, Alice finds New England life unbearable and decides to join Jim. She travels for four days at last arriving in the tiny town of Durfield. Through the station agent, Alice gets a guide who escorts her to Jim's "ranch." Alice anticipates Jim's happiness and surprise at her visit, but two days of horseback traveling through the snake infested Everglades begins to dampen her spirits and at last, when she draws up in front of Jim's cabin, her heart sinks at sight of the disorder and grime everywhere apparent. Wearily she sinks into a dirty rocker and only manages to pull herself together when she hears Jim's steps. Her eyes widen as she sees the gun he has fixed on her, but as he recognizes her he kisses her warmly and all her doubts vanish . Jim apologizes for his place, assuring her he would have cleaned up if he knew she was coming. That night Jim listens intently to stories about home, and sighs deeply, but when Alice tells him she has come to stay, he becomes worried and tells her this is no place for a girl. That night Alice is awakened by the sound of her brother's voice pleading with a gruff person he calls Dunk. The next morning, Alice sees Jim's relief when he thinks she has slept through the interview. However, as they finish breakfast Dunk comes in, and when Alice avoids his burning eyes, his mouth twists. That night Jim comes in beside himself with distress. At last he tells Alice his story, how he had come to these parts, fallen in with Dunk's gang and one night when he was pretty drunk there was a fight and a man was killed. Dunk and his gang claimed Jim had done it, and Jim could remember nothing and was seen standing over the dead body with a smoking revolver in his hands. Now Dunk has threatened to squeal on Jim unless Alice marries him. Alice is revolted and Jim buries his head in his hands, and tells her she is not to do it. A few moments later, Dunk swaggers in. Alice promises to marry him in two weeks if, during the interim, he stays away from them. With considerable grumbling, Dunk yields and Alice tells Jim to try and find someone who saw the shooting. The two weeks swiftly pass, but Jim cannot find anyone who will tell the truth about the murder. Filled with horror, Alice decides to risk the perils of the Everglades rather than fall into Dunk's hands. Threading her way through the swamp and forest, Alice hears mule trots behind her and hides, only to hear the ominous rattle of a snake. Paralyzed she waits for the bite, rather than reveal herself to Dunk. Dunk rides on, and the snake crawls away, attracted by another object. Almost hysterical, Alice seeks shelter at the sheriff's home and the sheriff and his posse trail Dunk back to his hideout. Dunk's men put up a desperate gun battle but at last give up. One of the dying outlaws signs a confession that it was Dunk who committed the murder of which Jim Weatherbee is accused, and with her brother a free man, Alice is free to find happiness with the sheriff, who has fallen in love with the courageous Northern girl.

YESTERDAY'S LOVE

Corda Bivans Drama File No. 11107

IT had been spring when Elena and Michael met. Both were students in the same art school, and both had dreams. Some day, Michael told Elena proudly, he was going to be a great architect, and Elena looking over the tall spires of Michael's drawings, agreed that one day Michael would have the world at his feet. When Michael finished his course, his instructors had patted his back and told him he was destined for big things. "And we'll be married, sweet," Michael had told Elena and had fallen to closer kissing. So they had planned.

Then Michael had begun to look for commissions. With the memory of his art teachers' promises still fresh, Michael found it hard to believe that no one would give him a chance. Even the big fellows, Michael learned, had difficulty getting work these days, and for a beginner without money and connections . . . ! Elena had kissed his closed eyes and whispered hopefully that tomorrow someone would recognize his genius. So they had put off their marriage until the necessity of providing food and lodging should not be such a pressing problem. Elena's heart ached as each day Michael returned with despair lining his face. Then one day Michael had been admitted to the inner office of Mrs. Deleeden whose husband had left her many millions and a fancy for struggling artists. While Michael had eagerly laid forth his drawings, Mrs. Deleeden had watched him narrowly and at last had suggested that he bring his plans to her home to-morrow night and they could look over them at leisure. Elena tried to smile the long evenings when Michael went to Mrs. Deleeden's luxurious apartment, and when, elated, he told her he had been commissioned for a new country estate, Elena nodded brightly. Soon Michael was appearing at Mrs. Deleeden's teas, and other wealthy women, none of them as young as they hoped they appeared became interested in the handsome young man with the dreamy eyes. Elena, tortured by the realization that she was the only thing that stood in the way of Michael's marriage to the Deleeden millions and fame, ran away. At first Michael was dazed. He had always been so sure of her. Now she was gone—probably with some other man, else how could she manage? In a month the marriage of Michael and the very wealthy Mrs. Deleeden was celebrated. In her tiny room Elena wept as she thought of Michael holding his jeweled bride close and whispering to her the love words he had once spoken to Elena. Soon, too, Michael's work was exciting comment and contracts for buildings came from hard headed business men who recognized talent. Michael's wife began to complain she rarely saw him any more and when she assured him he didn't have to work, she had money enough for two, Michael bit his lips to keep from crying out. So that was what she had been thinking when she had praised his drawings! And so, six months later the marriage was on the rocks. Michael strolled through the park where he used to walk with Elena. It was Spring again. Suddenly he noticed a small figure on a bench. His heart leaped. She turned with a little cry, and as he sat down beside her and seized her small hand, "Sweet!" he whispered, and then they sat silently for several long moments.

RETURN

Margaret A. Gilbert Drama File No. 11134

IN the dusk the scarcely distinguishable figure of a woman could be seen slowly walking toward the house at the end of the lane. Through the mind of the woman, the whole picture of the past was clearly unfolding.

She remembered how in her youth she had been a quiet, reserved girl, one whom boys avoided because they could not understand. In those days her mother had been fearful that she would have a spinster daughter on her hands for life. And then she had met Billy. They had not needed to get acquainted. From the first moment they had been drawn together, and it had seemed the most natural thing in the world for Billy to come over and ask her to be his partner in the croquet game. Then, after the buffet supper, during which she and Billy had seemed to be unaware that there were others in the room, they had taken a walk to the nearby spring. The moonlight lent its magic to the majesty of the mountains about them. Then suddenly she was in his arms. One week later they were married. There had been no need for the trial of a long engagement; they loved. Their honeymoon had been an idyll. On the sunlit beach of Florida they had rested, racing in the sky blue waters, and walking arm in arm under the low hanging moon. Then they had returned to the little house at the end of the lane. Over the threshold he had carried her, and as her eyes encompassed the warm little room with its gay chintz curtains, she had cried out in joy.

Three years out of engineering school, Billy already held a position to be coveted by men much older than he. Each day at the end of his work he had returned to find her waiting for him, eyes sparkling. Even the gossips were kind to them, because to the dullest eye it was clear that the Joneses loved each other. Billy never seemed to see the eager eyes of other women, and for Celia there were no other men. For two years there had been no blot on their happiness. Then one day they had brought her young husband to her limp and bloody and had told her as gently as they could of the accident that had cost him his life. Celia hadn't cried then. She had remained staring at her Billy for minutes, then had fallen silently to the floor.

As the vision faded, tears streamed from the woman's eyes. She touched the chair that had been Billy's. There was dust on it. She wondered how long she had been ill, a day, perhaps a week. Fingering all the things that had been so dear, she came to the mirror. Suddenly she saw herself in the glass, stopped, went closer. Raising her hand to her face she discovered it was true—her face was bony and wrinkled! She was an old woman! She sank to the floor in a heap.

They found her a short time later. "A most unusual case," the doctor from the Sanitarium exclaimed. "Patients who have known nothing for years often regain their sanity a short time before death, but I've never heard before of one's managing to walk ten steps, much less a whole mile, before losing all strength."

THE YOUNG MAN

Frances Brown Drama File No. 11143

LAUGHTER danced on the face of Richard Holt as his boat pushed off toward Paris. On the dock he could see his mother and father, arms about each other waving to him, and in his hand he clutched a fat check. He wouldn't have the difficulties other young artists had, for he had money. In Paris he took a flat, and arranged about art classes. His Professor squinted at his work and admitted Richard had talent. With hard work, the old man added, some day Richard might attain recognition. So Richard painted. And his studio was overrun with art students and with pretty models who urged him to come out and have a drink. Again and again Richard allowed himself to be torn away from his work by his friends who toasted that Paris in Springtime was made for love and laughter. Little Rosa, the model whose body Richard was drawing for his Diana, sighed as Richard put his easel away and told her she could have the rest of the day off. Once she told him that Art was not born of luxury and ease, but Richard laughed for in his pocket was another check from home, and just the briefest suggestion that perhaps Richard was spending too much money. Paula, Bobby, Musette, Lilli, Yvonne, Margot, girls, girls girls, in endless procession, and music and lights. One night over their choice wine in a gay cafe, one of Richard's friends suggested that he hold an exhibition. Convinced that once his work was before the public his genius would be recognized, Richard hired a gallery and at great cost to himself exhibited his work. His friends raved. The girls kissed him and called him a genius. But Rosa looked at his paintings and murmured they were weak and without character. How could he paint without putting himself into his work? Furious with her, Richard told her he wouldn't require her services any longer. Eyes bright with tears Rosa, who had no other source of income, ran out into the narrow street. Then, Richard got a telegram telling him his mother and father had both been killed in an accident, and since they had been borrowing heavily to send Richard the money he wanted, there was nothing left now save the house, set back in the woods. Richard's friends left hastily. In the dark he sat holding his letter. The critics proclaimed Richard's work frothy and without substance. One even suggested that Richard would do best modeling doll's heads. Now that he had no money there were no friends to bolster his ego. Dolls! He who had aspired to greatness. Richard, needing money now, tried to sell his paintings,—only to be laughed at. Paris was full of young men of talent, some of whom put all of themselves into their work! Richard moved from his apartment to a tiny hole. Then one day he met Rosa again, Rosa from whose face the laughter had fled. She coughed as he drew her inside and gave her a warming drink. Paula, Bobby, Musette, Lilli, Yvonne and Margot would have none of him now, but to the end Rosa adored him. She alone had loved him. And it was for Rosa that Richard painted doll faces and sold them. The manufacturer asked for more. Richard buried Rosa, then left Paris, the demand of the manufacturer still in his ears. Returning to the little house left him by his mother and father, Richard coughed hollowly as he allowed the darky carriage driver to build a fire. All night Richard drew feverishly at his easel. The fire died. Days later, Richard sent his drawings to Paris and worked at more. His hands flew. Faces. Faces. Paula. Bobby. Musette. He was tired now. Tired. The check came for the dolls But the Richard who had died with the faces crowding him, suffocating him, never cashed it.

A DOCTOR'S SECRET

George S. Moore Drama File No. 11144

SOLEMNLY Frank Hope takes the Oath of Hippocrates, and receives with the other members of his class the degree of M. D. During the twelve months of his interneship and the first weeks of practice, young Hope is to observe many infractions of the Hippocratic Oath, but his own record is to be free of any misconduct. Then one day he is leaving to make an urgent call, when a poorly dressed young woman rings his bell, and pleads with him to take her case. Hope's face becomes stern when she makes her request, but as she pleads that she was on her way to drown herself in the river, and as examination proves that several unsuccessful attempts had already been made and there was hardly a possibility of the child coming to maturity, Dr. Hope temporizes and tells her to come back the next day. All night he fortifies himself against complying with her request, but the next day touched by her look of quiet desperation, he accedes . She leaves and he sighs deeply. Some weeks later, Mary James returns, and somewhat to the young doctor's discomfort assures him of her gratitude and hegs him to let her stay on as a secretary and general assistant. Sorely in need of such help, Dr. Hope allows her to stay and soon she proves indispensahle. Working all day and often far into the night, Dr. Hope is soon on the verge of collapse, and Mary begs him to go away for a rest. At length he yields, taking her with him. Soon they become lovers and some time later Mary confesses she is to have a child. Dr. Hope stares at her aghast, and assails her method of trapping him. When he sneers that she should know what to do when she gets in trouble, she leaves, giving him no opportunity to retract his harsh words. Hope returns to his practice. Some months later, in the wards, he hears some of his confreres talking of the plucky youngster who had just been delivered. The nurse comments on the fact that the baby has one blue eye and one brown, Hope's own singular characteristic. Filled with misgivings, Hope enters the ward and sees Mary. Although he realizes the cost, he marries her, and is forced to give up his practice in the small town. In a distant city he sets up his shingle and after a long hard pull, his ability is recognized. At last, following some remarkable research work, he is offered the Superintendency of the largest hospital in the community, with the stipulation that he have two years of post graduate work abroad. He leaves for Vienna, leaving Mary and the baby behind. Occassionally he writes brief letters inquiring after the baby, but to Mary he shows no warmth. In vain she tried to awaken in him the rapture of their first weeks together in the country.

When his two years are completed he returns in triumph, only to discover that his wife has eclampsia, the treatment of which he has specialized in. Impersonally, almost with a cold hatred he treats her, and when she is well enough to speak she tells him that she will release him from their marriage. As for herself, she tells him how she had loved him, how she had tried to make their marriage a success, and how he had avoided her. When at last he had gone away, and even his letters had fallen off, she had proven helpless against the demands of their boarder. For the first time Dr. Hope realizes that the fault is not entirely Mary's, and as she prepares to go, he takes her luggage from her, and softly asks if they can start again.

KNOCKOUT INSURANCE

Arthur L. Buttles Comedy Drama File No. 11157

MR. William J. B. McCluskey was feeling very important. The night before he had given Smiley Moriarty the kayo in the seventh round, and now as he looked about his room and noticed the rows of book pages still uncut he felt that he certainly had "tone." Aroused from his revery by the announcement that a gentleman was calling, William looked up and opened the door to a slick looking bird. However, disarmed by the question was not he that eminent heavyweight fighter William J. B. McCluskey, William began to feel more kindly disposed toward his visitor. And when he learned that Theophilus R. Brown represented a book publishing company who wanted William's picture and autograph for their book, "Biographies of Famous Men," William drew a deep breath. The thought that he would be included in the same classification as Jack Dempsey and General Pershing made him lightheaded and with a flourish William signed his name on the dotted line. A few days later William got a letter from the publisher with a bill of five hundred dollars. Despite his pugnacious attitude and the services of a lawyer, William had to shell out since he had signed a contract promising to pay five hundred dollars for having a piece about him printed in some cheap book they published. Right on top of that William learned that the contract he had signed while his manager Spider Manigan was laid up sick had guaranteed Smiley a percentage of the gross proceeds, and himself only a percentage of the net proceeds. When Spider discovered that McCluskey had cut himself out of any profits despite the fact that he had won, he quit. Right then and there McCluskey decided to get a new manager—even if he had to marry one. So he picked on Marion Johnson, a blond manicurist with class. Beads of perspiration formed on McCluskey's forehead and he blurted out, "How would you like to make a kind of a contract with me?" and explained he wanted her to marry him. Spider sarcastically remarked that McCluskey's sweetie was going to get a first class fighting man with a bean so thick he could stop anything and not feel the jar. He congratulated his fighter, but he didn't see how he could congratulate the future Mrs. McCluskey. Whereupon, McCluskey got ferocious and Spider hastily assured him he meant that that was just his way of saying the girl was much too good for William. Somewhat mollified but still wishing he could crack Spider in the kisser, also the book racketeers and the guys that made him sign "Net proceeds" instead of "Gross proceeds," McCluskey went down to city hall for a license. Infuriated about the questions as to sex, color, and nationality, McCluskey lost his head utterly when the clerk asked if he wanted a license for a b——, and only then did the enraged fighter learn that he was in the dog licensing office.

So McCluskey and the little blonde were married and began traveling north in their new car. In Vermount town, McCluskey had difficulty cashing his bank draft without identification until a mournful looking fellow advised him to take out liability insurance which would protect him from paying out any money if he hit a fellow and injured him. Remembering how much he had wanted to crack Spider, the clerk, and the other birds that had done him dirt, McCluskey paid his twenty seven dollars and got his insurance. Accordingly when on the way back Marion drove and passed a red light a cop began bawling her out. Whereupon McCluskey sailed into the cop. It was some battle. Blow on blow, and more tricks than a magician. McCluskey won at last and the next morning awoke in jail. However, dismayed, McCluskey was to discover that his liability insurance only pertained to automobile accidents. It was Marion who cheered him up. Only then did he learn that his antagonist was Joe Gibbons, a policeman hy vocation, but by avocation the amateur champion heavyweight of the country. And with the publicity gained by the knockout McCluskey was to get some swell chances to fight and with Marion kissing him, McCluskey was to decide that a marriage contract was O. K.

RITA FLEET

Kathryn Robb Drama File No. 11106

COMPLETING his rounds of the children's ward at the hospital, Dr. John Cross, young interne calls up Rita Fleet. From her landlady John John learns that Rita has just left on her honeymoon with her bridegroom Don Wayman, a young millionaire. Months later Rita returns from her round-the-world trip to live in town. Specialists are constantly in attendance upon Don whose health has never been too good. Don, distressed because he cannot have a child broods about his debility until Rita is warned that unless Don can be deceived into thinking himself a father, he is likely to lose his mind entirely. Beside herself, Rita appeals to her old friend John Cross, and imposing on his love for her, begs him to give her a child. At first John flatly refuses, but when, as a physician, he realizes Don's peace of mind depends on it, he and Rita agree to go away for one night. On their return John finds it more difficult than ever to conceal his great love for Rita, but with the coming of her child, Rita becomes once more absorbed in her husband. Don rejoicing over the child, rapidly regains his confidence in himself and lavishes his affection upon the child, Jean. Time and again, Rita tries to warn Don that he is spoiling the child by his over-indulgence, but Don maintains a possessive attitude and asks belligerently who has a better right to love a child than her own father. Rita bites her lip and says nothing. Seeing John's agony every time they meet, Rita avoids him as much as possible, realizing only too well that it is John she really loves. Meanwhile Don continues to gratify Jean's every whim, at the same time asserting his own will at arbitrary intervals just to be sure that she will do anything he asks. Jean, a lovable child, manages to concede points even when she knows her father is just testing her. Once, when Don buys Jean an expensive roadster, and Jean drives wildly down the street, almost knocking over a child, John warns Don that he is spoiling Jean, but Don asserts again that he has a right to do what he wants with his own child. Afraid that some day Jean may fall in love and leave him for another man, Don impresses on the girl that marriage is to be avoided at any cost. Jean sees her mother's unspoken unhappiness, and secretly is inclined to agree with the sentiment. However, when she meets young Bob Haynes, a senior at college and falls head over heels in love she sounds her father again on the idea of marriage. Learning that he is just as much opposed as ever, she refuses to marry Bob in spite of his impassioned kisses which she welcomes.

Then one day, worriedly she comes to the family doctor and confides that she is in trouble and if he doesn't help her she will get an unrecognized physician to "fix her up." Stunned, John learns that young Bob wants to marry her but Jean can't get the consent of her father, and she is under age. Rita pleads with Don to allow the children to get married, but Don is adamant in his refusal and at length Rita tells him Jean is not his child. Aghast, Don turns Rita out of his house, and hounded by the vindictive Don, she and John, who is forced to give up his practice, leave to begin all over again while Jean and Bob are married and find a happiness of their own.

CALL THIS SIN

Marie V. Stolba Drama File No. 11138

AS long as Darlene could remember she had given her life to her younger sister Rose. When, soon after migrating to the United States, Darlene had heen jeered at school for her foreign clothes, she had suffered in silence, but when Rose received her share of contempt, Darlene fiercely flailed her little sister's tormenters, and won respect for them both. Soon the burden of supporting Rose and their mother fell on Darlene's frail shoulders. Giving up school, Darlene took a humble position so that Rose should always have pretty clothes to wear. From the first Rose turned out to be a beauty, and Darlene fought to keep the child from having her head turned by flattery. At a dance one night when Rose was the belle of the ball, Darlene watched a handsome young man come up and claim the next dance. Watching the two glide in perfect rhythm over the polished floor, Darlene forgot that men weren't asking her to dance, all she could think of was that Rose was happy. For several moments Rose forgot to introduce Wayne to Darlene, but at last she recovered herself. It was love at first sight for Wayne and Rose, but Wayne had a widow mother to support and pouted at the thought of having a mother-in-law in her home and refused to be married immediately. To Darlene Wayne seemed everything a man should be, but while she was working late hours, Rose was enjoying a clandestine romance with Harry, a young man about town who never seemed to have to work. Once Darlene, suspecting, warned Rose she was imperiling her happiness, but Rose thanked her to keep out of her affairs, and their mother scolded Darlene for interfering. Then one night Rose came in with reddened eyes and as Darlene, touched, ran to comfort her, Rose sobbed she was going to have Harry's child and he had reluctantly consented to marry her. Ashamed of having betrayed Wayne, Rose married Harry whom Darlene distrusted from the first. Harry made it clear he was coming to live in the house Darlene had bought for her mother and sister out of her own money. Rose continued to hold her position, and when Darlene protested, seeing how haggard her little sister began to look, Harry furiously warned her he wasn't going to brook any interference. At last, unable to endure it longer, Darlene tried to make Rose see the light, but powerless, Rose hysterieally demanded that Darlene leave them in peace. When her mother sided with Harry, Darlene left home. Going to Newport, a summer colony, Darlene secured employment as a companion to Mrs. White, a kindly old dowager, who enjoyed Darlene's soothing voice as she read aloud to her, and feeling toward her as though she were her own ehild, bought pretty clothes for Darlene. For the first time in her life Darlene surveyed herself in a full length mirror and realized that while she had always been regarded as the ugly duckling ot the family, she was indeed pretty with flushed cheeks and dainty clothes. Thus it was that one day while swimming alone in the bay, she was almost struck by a man diving from the raft. In the water he apologized gravely and both laughed. As he helped her onto the raft, he asked her who she was. Darlene bit her lip as she informed him she wasn't one of the debutantes but a paid companion. Philip smiled and told her how he had always admired girls with grit. And so Philip and Darlene fell in love. Mrs. White, knowing Philip's charming mother, spoke highly of Darlene's character, and Darlene's fears proved groundless on meeting Philip's mother, when the gracious white-haired woman leaned forward and kissed her gently. The only flaw to Darlene's happiness was that she received no answer to the letters she wrote her mother and Rose telling of Phillip and her marriage. At last, unable to understand it, Darlene took a trip home to discover that Harry had taken over everything and was even destroying her letters before his wife and mother-in-law could read them. Even then, however, Darlene was to feel as though her adviced was unwanted, and she was to return to the peace and happiness of Philip's arms about her. Only when Harry left with another woman, and Rose was left desperate, did they send for Darlene in whose heart there was never room for resentment, and it was Darlene who was to bring Wayne back to a penitent Rose, and in the content of knowing at last her sister was happy, Darlene was to find her own perfect bliss with Philip.

U. S. A. FOLLIES

John R. Abbott Short Subject File No. 11052

A CHORUS of returned soldiers find their country enjoying the height of prosperity. Money is being thrown recklessly about the streets, everyone rushing to the stock market and excitedly pulling at ticker tape with exclamations of joy. Poor families, made wealthy overnight, are buying wildly, purchasing two cars at a time and discarding their rags for sable and satin. Quickly getting into the swing, the soldiers, singing war songs, discard their knapsacks and join the jubilant parade. Rushing to the marriage license bureau with their sweethearts, they assure them that two can live as extravagantly as one and set up housekeeping on a lavish scale. The newly wed couples, executing dance steps to the speeded up strains of the Wedding March, each select their little bungalow. When salesman knock at the door with washing machines, vacuum sweepers, and other appliances, explaining that they may be purchased on the installment plan, the couples buy everything that is offered.

Then comes the crash. Stocks fall. Banks close. Property values sink. The installment man takes away his appliances. Property owners place for sale signs on their lots, at increasingly lower rates, but there are no purchasers. Gardens are planted on former estates and members of our wealthiest families are seen in the bread line or moving their belongings to shanty town, singing a dirge. The Finance Companies, alone, as the Money Changers, sing a triumphant chorus as they hoard the nation's currency, and laugh at the distress of the former capitalists.

Then the New Deal! The president reads the National Government Credit Insurance Plan. The various metals, represented by girls dressed in silver, gold and copper gowns, are led to the center of a modern slave market, where they execute a song and dance, lifting their arms upward toward a Blue Eagle who soars across the stage. Each one is called forth separately, performs a solo dance, and is then matched with a young man who represents a Degree of Credit extended by the government. The part of the Postmaster is displayed by a comic dancer who, after attempting to balance too great an amount of revenue and mail at the same time, slips and falls, at the close of his eccentric dance, scattering his burden.

The election of 1936 begins with the two leading parties, Republican and Democratic, uniting and resolving to vote together for the Moral Man. Woman, representing Credit, insists upon this election, and upon men of similar calibre for all public offices, examining each candidate for the stamp of integrity as he passes by, and rejecting those who fail to pass with a chorus of indignant "Nos!" As the chorus of National Government Credit Insurance enters, pledging its loyalty to public interests in a stirring song, the Moral Man chooses representatvies of Credit Power to combat bootlegging, kidnapping, and other contemporary evils. The People enter, rejecting offers of erstwhile bankers, high pressure salesman and finance companies, as they turn hopefully toward the Moral Man and the Credit chorus, pledging their allegiance in song.

THE BLIND QUEST

Arthur Henshaw, Jr. Drama File No. 11031

DISTURBED by the strange actions of his beautiful sister Shirley, Gregory Crawford breaks in the door of her room and to his horror discovers she has committed suicide. A half-finished note, evidently cut short by the deadly workings of the poison, mentions the name Tony Bonanza. Wild-eyed Gregory proceeds to the gambling house conducted by Tony, and Tony consents to see him although Gregory raves of killing him. Tony calms the grief-stricken boy and reveals that what Shirley was about to write was that he, Tony had been trying to protect her. Shirley had unwittingly served as the dupe of blackmailers and the identity of Shirley's persecuter, the man who gave her the poison with which she took her own life, was ——— Three shots ring out. Gregory sees a masked figure enter the room. He is struck a crushing blow on the nape of the neck, and when he recovers, he finds himself staring at Tony's dead body, the smoking revolver held in his own hand. Gregory story of a masked murderer is jeered, since his threats to kill Tony had been heard by all the players in the gambling casino. Even Greg's lawyers are stumped. Then, a few days before the trial Greg is visited hy Professor Von Sturtz and his lovely daughter. The Professor reveals himself as a scientist greatly indebted to Greg's deceased father. To Greg's consternation he proposes that Greg allow himself to be sentenced to death, after which the Professor will restore him to life by an experiment which has already proved successful with animals. Greg refuses, until, in love with Gerda Von Sturtz, and realizing that at best he can expect a life sentence, he accepts. In court he tries to prove his innocence but Judge Cannon conducts the trial unfairly, and with the realization that the Judge has predisposed the jury to doubt him, Greg makes no further attempts to defend himself. He is convicted and in the death house Gerda, who has been so confident, weakens at the thought that she may never see Greg again. Still protesting his innocence, Greg is sent to the chair and his body is quickly brought to the Professor's laboratory where by means of an artificial lung and a "Life Ray" Greg is, after twelve hours of breath-taking experimentation, restored to life. For a month he remains conscious but utterly indifferent to his surroundings. Then gradually he begins to recover and at last reveals that he can faintly recall, from his period of insensibility, that the real murderer of Tony Bonanza was at the gambling table. Accordingly the Professor begins weeding out from the regular gamblers at the Silver Moon, Tony's gambling casino, those who were there the night of the murder and arranges to have them all present again. Then suddenly the lights perform strange tricks and Menkaura Khafra, a spiritualist, performs a lot of ghastly hocus-pocus leading up to the materialization of Gregory Crawford, known to be dead. The accusing eyes and hollow voice terrify the nerviest of the gamblers, but at length one gives way shouting a confession. Greg springs at him to find him already dead of fright, and a gasp goes up as the murderer is revealed to be Judge Cannon. Professor Von Sturtz prepares to give his findings to the world, and Greg and Gerda are left alone to speak, at last, of love.

FLOATER

Deuel Layne Drama File No. 10977

WHEN Malcolm Griffith blew into Houston in his natty roadster he had no intention of remaining very long. Tossing a half dollar in the air, he decided to work for the Century rather than the Arcadian-Rice Telegraph System. And then came the Depression, and Della Stewart, pretty daughter of the traffic manager who worked as an operator. From the first Malcolm decided Della was the girl for him, and the forbidding frowns of the night supervisor Harrison Bancroft, handsome six-footer sweetheart of Della, only added zest to the chase. Although Harrison was better looking, Malcolm had the advantage of a car, and Della seemed to divide her attentions quite encouragingly. And as long as there was a chance with Della, Malcolm, one of the best operators in the business stayed on in Houston, contributing considerably to the rating of the local office.

After two years of straightened circumstances, with Della graciously consenting to spend her evenings in local movie houses so as not to embarrass him financially, Malcolm found it convenient, with the impetus given by the N. R. A. to propose to Della. However, as she responded that she had always thought of him as a brother, Malcolm began to see light. She, her father, and Harrison had been leading him on, simply to keep him from drifting to another office. Della tried half-heartedly to deny the accusation, and indignantly stepping on his accelerator, Malcolm drove her home without another word. In his own room, he hastily packed his bags, only to realize that if he left now, he would leave Harrison with the laugh on him. Accordingly he remained on at his post, silent and aggrieved. On Sunday night his opportunity came to plant a jab in the center of Harrison's knowing grin.

Malcolm and Della were working the Dallas wire when Della remarked that she was worried about her father being at Freeport Bay, directly in the path of the coming gale. Malcolm answered mechanically, and when Harrison came in to invite him to go home before the storm hit Houston, Malcolm perversely insisted on remaining at his post over time. Then came the message from Freeport to Della. "Your father was . . . . ." followed hy a complete silence. In a few minutes the storm broke in Houston, the windows shattering and cutting Malcolm's cheek. While the A. C. O. advised Malcolm to doctor his cuts, Della became frantic with worry about her father, and pleaded with Malcolm to drive her to Freeport tonight. Sneeringly, Malcolm asked why she didn't ask Harrison to drive her, and received the expected answer that Harrison didn't have a car, besides —she—wanted Malcolm to take her——. A moment later, belligerently, Harrison forbade Della to leave the office, reminding her that she had several messages to gum down. As Malcolm brushed Harrison's hold on the girl's arm, Harrison swung a haymaker to Malcolm's jaw, and a battle ferocious started, during which Della's sympathies seemed all for the small floater. With one final blow to the other's midriff, Malcolm drew Della into the street. At one point he saved her from being crushed by a falling Neon sign, and with the wind and rain lashing them they drove the sixty miles from Houston to discover that the message was that Della's father had been hurt, but she was not to try to reach him. But it was a gratified traffic manager who greeted his daughter and her swollen-eyed driver, and when Mr. Stewart was reminded that he was himself a floater until Della's mother married him and turned him into a traffic manager, the Old Man gave his unqualified approval to a very happy young pair.

AN EYE FOR AN EYE

James Frederick Drama File No. 10967

"TO be hanged by the neck until dead!"—— Slowly the courtroom cleared of people. Negresses didn't get much sympathy in the southern town. From his place in the audience, the young reporter noted the expression of infinite calm on the beautiful, cream colored face of the condemned woman. Then, arranging with the Chief of Police for an interview, the reporter was admitted to the barred cell of the murderess.

Her story was simply told. She had been a nurse in the house of the Merrills, treated with respect because of her obvious education and refinement. One day, while she was straightening the children's books, Fred, the sensitive, eighteen year old son of the Merrills, came in, his eyes strangely burning. He helped Linda with the books then as she turned toward the window, reached out and kissed her fiercely. She struggled and tore herself out of his grasp. The next morning, Linda told Mr. Merrill she was leaving, but he suggested she had been working too hard and was over-wrought, and urged her to reconsider. That afternoon, Fred asked Linda to press his tie. She left it on his door and returned to her own room. When Mr. and Mrs. Merrill phoned they would be out all afternoon, Fred came to her, and as both tried to conceal their agitation, Fred bent forward and kissed her. . . .

The next day, remorsefully Fred begged Linda's forgiveness and kissed her softly. Weeks passed and when at last Linda confided her fears to Fred, he offered to leave school and marry her immediately. But loving him too much to endure the thought he might eventually feel she had trapped him, Linda refused and at length, buying a little house with the money she had saved, bore her baby among strangers. Soon she was to learn that Fred had married one of his own people; but there was no bitterness in her heart, for she had her child. Linda lavished all her love on the tiny mite, and as she noticed the clear cut features, the lovely silky hair, a resolution was born in her that no one should know that Jeanne had colored blood in her veins. When Jeanne was old enough to understand, Linda lied that she, Linda, was not her real mother, but had taken care of Jeanne since her real mother had died. Jeanne wept at the separation, but Linda cried happliy at the thought of her daughter growing up in an exclusive school and when at last Linda read of the marriage of Jeanne to a rising young journalist, Adam Smith, she felt repaid for all the barren years. Although her own people shunned Linda for having consorted with a white man, Linda was content to live alone in a tiny little house. Then one day a white man knocked at the door. There was a short cigar clenched in his teeth. He did not remove his hat. "You Linda Masters?" he asked surlily, and as she fearfully admitted it, he flashed a badge and put her under arrest for using a false name. Suddenly he dropped his domineering tone, and advancing on her leered she didn't have to be afraid of him. As he reached for her, she ran toward the door. Viciously he shoved her against the wall, reminding her that she needn't put on airs with him. Then, at sight of the clipping of Jeanne's marriage, he asked how she'd like this Adam Smith to know about his wife's mother. Reaching for a bookend, Linda struck. . . . .

Finishing her story, Linda noticed the face of the reporter, drained now of color. "What's the matter?" she asked sharply, and as he rose, he answered, "My name is Adam Smith."

LOVE'S AWAKENING

Catherine M. Jacoby Melodrama File No. 11077

BORED with society, and fearful that her own life will be a replica of that of her social-climbing mother, Sarah Morgan, an English girl decides to slip off alone to see the world. She promises herself if life holds no adventure for her, she will return and be satisfied to marry the man of her mother's choice. Accordingly she takes passage on a boat bound for the United States. The first night out in the salon of the boat people are dancing, playing games, and at a corner table a man surrounded by an absorbed crowd, moves a planchette. The crowd laughs at intervals as their eager questions are answered by the board. Sarah stops at the table and puts a question. She is told that she will have a great adventure just as she desires. A distinguished looking man notices Sarah and exclaims, "We are all having a great adventure; that's what life is!" They watch the curious crowd and half-believing herself, Sarah notices how many of these people hang on the words of the planchette. The man at her elbow asks, "You are interested in the mystic?" and offers to teach her something for more interesting if she allows him. They agree to meet the next day. James Roberts, the writer, has been dabbling in the mystic sciences but has not been caught in the web. He teaches Sarah automatic writing. At first she finds it difficult to learn, but after many laughs and good fellowship she learns the trick. Each night before retiring, Sarah gets out pencil and paper and soon poems and stories are rolling off her pen. When the boat docks at San Francisco, Sarah bids Roberts goodbye and he promises to look her up. She taxies to her hotel, registers, and the next day no trace of her can be found. The management notifies her family. But even Scotland Yard is powerless to find her.

Five years later, the night of the San Francisco earthquake, everyone is running for his life. Out of one of the buildings two men and a woman run. One is struck by a falling cornice and the others, discovering he is dead, leave him and run toward the hills. The woman falls and the man picks her up and stumbles on. A man offers to help the old Chinese man but as he lays the still unconscious woman on the ground, he cries out sharply, and as the Chinaman looks at him quizzically confesses he has been looking for this girl for five years. In her sleep Sarah reveals the events of the interim.

That night at the hotel she had been writing. Suddenly a gust of wind blew all her papers about. Exhausted she had gone to sleep only to be awakened by a voice which had seemed to come from within herself, urging her to get up, dress, and go to 1087 Carol Street. Meanwhile before a Buddha, young Chang Lee, a chinaman prays for a beautiful white wife, reminding his God that he has been taught that if he concentrates long enough his desires will be granted. A tapping sounds at his door, and a beautiful white girl stands without. She does not know who she is, but can only say the Voice sent her. Marvelling, Chang Lee takes her in, thanks Buddha for the miracle, and for five years they live together as man and wife—until the night of the earthquake when young Chang Lee is killed. As Sarah's moanings stop and she drops off into an exhaused rest, the head of Chang Lee's father falls forward on his breast. James, sympathizing pats his shoulders. Dawn comes and Sarah awakening reveals that the memory of the last five years has been completely obliterated. Blankly she looks at the Chinaman, and as she embraces James Roberts, the Chinaman, realizing he is no longer wanted steals softly away, leaving Sarah and James together for all eternity.

FLAMING SKIES

Doris Miller Drama File No. 11031

IT had been too good to last. That Barry Lane, handsome and rich should have loved her, a little waitress, was only a dream. And the letter she held now telling her he was marrying one of his own kind, seared Nan like a flame. So she had gone back to work, gotten another job in a restaurant. She felt the warm brown eyes of Nick, the tall head waiter sympathetically on her, but nothing seemed real except that Barry was gone. And then one night the proprietor had drawn her into his chubby arms and whispered that a beautiful girl like her didn't have to work as a waitress. Nan had struggled, and then suddenly the head waiter had come up, with one blow he had outstretched the bulging eyed Greek on the floor, and and had smiled scornfully when the proprietor had roared, "You're both fired!" So together Nick and Nan had gone out. Nick, discovering that Nan had three small brothers to support since her mother had recently eloped with a younger man, insisted on helping Nan from his own savings, confident that he could get another job soon. He told her of the West, where he had come from, and how he was only working in the city to get enough money to buy a ranch of his own. Nick had fallen deeply in love with Nan, and Nan, seeing him playing with the three little fellows would remember Barry and shut her eyes tight. But months passed. Nick hadn't found another job yet and neither had Nan. Depression, depression! They heard it at every hand. Nick's face became pinched. One day he returned home elatedly to tell Nan he had gotten a job that paid two hundred a week. She looked at him as though he were crazy. Then she found out—bootlegging. Pitifully she pleaded with him not to take it, but he assured her it was only for six weeks. Then the West—and marriage. Nan suffered him to draw her into his arms. Five weeks later, Nick, haggard of face now, whispered, "One week more." Nan held the youngsters close. Nick had given every dollar into her hands. Then one day came Barry, still heartbreakingly handsome and assured. "I came back for you," he vouchsafed. Nan drew in her breath sharply. This was the moment she had dreamed. Firmly he grasped her chin and kissed her as he once had before. "I need you," he said. "And," looking about the room, "you need me, don't you?" Nan shivered remembering the sleepless nights of wanting. Suddenly Nick entered, and seeing Barry he knew instantly. Barry became ugly. His fists clenched. For a moment he hesitated, then, "And I was thinking of marriage." He laughed shortly then, "Get your things," Nan saw the look of triumph on Barry's face and suddenly she knew. It wasn't Barry she loved. She turned to speak, and saw that Barry was pointing a gun at Nick. "I'll come, Barry." But as she reached the door, she slapped his gun to the floor and as Nick put Barry out, she ran sobbing into Nick's arms. For hours he smoothed her hair, telling her he would give up the racket and they would leave for the West to-day. While she packed, he went to the station for tickets . Then came the call telling Nan her husband's bullet ridden body had been found on the road, their marriage license in his pocket. It was Nan who nursed Nick back to life after the doctor gave him up, and when the papers came out telling of the capture of Barry, brains of a gang, Nan scarcely noticed for she and Nick were on their way West, and the children were coming too, rejoicing that Uncle Nick had come back.

THE BETTER WAY

Peter W. Pratt Drama File No. 10979

THE night Bob Noble returned to Dansville to begin the practice of medicine, his friends and neighbors gave a party for him in the town hall. "You'll love them all," Bob had assured his wife, but as Eileen tipped her ears with perfume, she frowned into the mirror. In answer to the warm congratulations of the folks who came to greet the wife that Bob had picked for himself while away from town at Medical school, Eileen smiled vaguely, apparently not seeing the hands extended in greeting. Only when Jan Thomas came forward heartily, exclaiming at sight of Bob, did Eileen cut in icily to remind Bob she hadn't been introduced to his schoolday sweetheart. Jan winced at the coldness of Eileen's voice, but with a reassuring pat of her arm, Bob dashed down the hall to where Eileen had gone. "Dance this one, dear?" he pleaded, and as they swayed out on the floor, dancing in perfect rhythm, Bob thought bitterly that it was the only thing they did together without bickering. Bob urged her to try to make friends of the Dansvillites since his practice depended on them, but Eileen sullenly reminded him that if he had stayed in the city she'd never have to be dependent upon hicks for her livelihood. All that evening Eileen seemed to go out of her way to be nasty to people, particularly to Jan, whose love for Bob she sensed intuitively.

Two months passed. Bob hadn't been consulted as much as he had hoped. Discouraged, he tried to conceal his feelings. Then when a call came to take care of Mrs. Sturgen's sick baby, Eileen scolded because Bob had promised to drive her into Laneside. Hurrying out of the house, Bob suggested that Eileen call Jan to drive her in. Jan gladly offered her services, but when she discovered that Eileen had let Bob go out without breakfast and was buying an evening dress for a hundred and fifty dollars, Jan almost wept. Enraged at the silent criticism, Eileen lost her temper and shouted that she knew Jan was in love with Bob, but Bob had no use for her, and had even admitted that Jan's actions sickened him. Humiliated, Jan fled. Within an hour all Laneside and Dansville knew what Eileen had said, the saleslady wasting no time in passing on the scandal.

After a grim all-day struggle with the Reaper, Bob emerged triumphant. The Sturgen baby slept soundly, and not wishing to wake Eileen, Bob dropped into a restaurant for supper. There he learned what had transpired between Eileen and Jan. Indignant at Eileen's malicious explanation of the scene, Bob turned from her followed by her shrieks that she would never give him a divorce. However, it was with an apologetic air that Eileen came to apologize to Jan. And as Jan graciously invited her in, Eileen drew her arm back to hurl a vial of acid. Jan screamed. Eileen's sleeve caught her and with shriek after shriek Eileen dropped to the floor in agony as the acid bit into her flesh. Realizing there could never be anything for her now, Eileen took an overdose of sleeping tablets. Months later, Jan and Bob were to be married and at last Bob was to have the son he had always wanted.

DEPRESSION BRIDE

Lenora D. Stack Drama File No. 11071

FOR as long as Joan could remember her mother had drilled into her head that it was a disgrace to be an old maid. But when the other girls at school began going about with beaux, Joan began to realize that her homeliness set her apart from the other youngsters. Everyone in town knew that Joan's family, the wealthiest in the vicinity, was setting aside a fortune for their daughter's dowery, and Joan would emerge from the long beauty treatments prescribed by her mother, limp and exhausted. The only happiness Joan found was at school where she was editor of the paper and where her teachers grew enthusiastic over her literary talents. It was Nell Hunter, young English instructor, who understood best the lonely life of the homely little rich girl, but when Joan tried to induce her mother to let her go North and study journalism, her mother gave way to hysterics at her daughter's ungratefulness and renewed her efforts to give large parties to which such unattached young men as could be attracted by the famous Carton wealth, gravitated. Then one day Mrs. Carton began musing about Tom Novelle, youngest son of one of the best families in town. The Novelle children had all distinguished themselves in professions except Tom, the handsomest of the lot, who had been flunked out of college. When Tom's father died, his older brother agreed to support their mother and sister but balked at contributing toward the profligate existence of Tom. Desperate, Tom idly accepted one of the Carton invitations to a lavish New Year's party at the country club, although Helen Wainwright, the beautiful girl he loved, had been uninvited. Mrs. Carton subtly impressed upon Tom how fortunate Joan's husband would be, and for a while Tom began calling on Joan in the hope that her father would employ him at his factory. When Tom managed to get a position for a few weeks he dropped Joan and saw only Helen, but when he lost it he returned and one day asked Joan to marry him. Beside herself with happiness, Joan gave all her love to her husband but even on their honeymoon he regarded her with contemptuous coolness, and when, on their return to town, Mrs. Carton remonstrated, Tom sneered that everyone knew why he had married her ugly daughter. Joan winced as thought struck, and that night Tom absconded, stealing several thousand dollars from his father-in-law. Unable to meet pressing obligations, Mr. Carton put a bullet through his head, and not long afterwards Mrs. Carton died. It was then that Joan received a letter from Nell Hunter who had gone on to New York and employed on a Metropolitan paper, was sending for Joan. Selling her home, her boat, her horse and cars, Joan paid off all her father's obligations and went North where through the aid of the gracious Nell Hunter, Joan received a position with a publishing house. Soon Joan was to meet St. Clair Jones, red headed and freckled and a friendship was to spring up between them that soon developed into love. Joan was to divorce Tom, who returned to find that Helen had married a young doctor with whom she had fallen in love. Pitying himself, Tom had at length married an older woman and on her money lived a dissipated life in grand style, while Joan, never again returning to Easton, was to find happiness as the wife of the brilliant young St. Clair Jones.

THE CRISIS

C. D. Bray Drama File No. 10971

A RICH, tenor voice, floating through the woods, arrests the attention of Clara Mooney as she gathers wild flowers near her country home. Thrilled by its fine quality, she listens, and when the attractive young singer approaches, she cannot help returning his smile. Without hesitancy, he begins a conversation, and the girl finds herself feeling that she has known him for a long time as she replies. The two sit down by the brook, while the singer introduces himself as Henry Johnson, and offers her part of his sandwich, which Clara accepts. Overpowered by the deep emotion which sweeps over her, Clara yields to the embraces of this fascinating stranger, realizing that she is in love for the first time. The next day she is conscience stricken as she meets her fiance, Joe, with whom she has grown up. While they are standing at the church door, she tells him that she wishes to postpone their marriage for two months, until he returns from his trip to the city. Although bitterly disappointed, he assents. Days of doubt pass for Clara when Henry does not come to her, but, later, she finds him by the creek where first they met, and he explains that he, too, had been called away on business. When Henry asks her to become his wife she goes to him, radiantly happy at last; Joe finds them together, and realizes that he has lost, as he, somewhat bitterly, wishes them happiness.

As mistress of Henry's home, and mother of two children, Clara's life finds fulfiillment. But Henry comes to take her beautiful devotion for granted, and no longer expresses his love for her in word and deed as he did during the early period of their marriage. Yearning for tenderness, Clara tries to awaken a responsive chord in her husband, but he laughs at what he terms her foolish, romantic ideas. John Lyster, who comes to their home for shelter, having lost his way, understands the situation at a glance, and tells Clara her husband no longer loves her, urging her to come to him when he is established in the city. This she indignantly refuses to do, but when John takes her in his arms one night she is too exhausted to resist for a moment, and lies, inert, trying to gather her strength. Henry enters at this moment, and throws John out of the house. Then turning to his wife he orders her to leave, saying that she is not a fit mother for his children. Tearfully, she pleads with him, but Henry will not believe in her innocence, and she is forced to leave, planning to send for the children when she can support them. Henry gives her a check for the amount of the property which they own jointly but this she returns.

Alone in the city, Clara engages a room in a cheap boarding house and attempts to find work. Ill and exhausted, she is forced to spend some months in the hospital, longing for her husband and children. When at last she is able to leave her savings have been depleted, but pride prevents her from asking help from Henry or her parents who believe that she is in the wrong. Clara's sister, Gussie who is a nurse, learns that John is in the hospital at the point of death as the result of an accident in the saw mill where he was employed. Going to him, she questions him, and he pleads for her to send for Henry. As John dies, he tells Henry that Clara is innocent, as he receives forgiveness for his sin. With the aid of private detectives, Henry, begins an exhaustive, but futile, search for his wife. Months pass, when Clara, weak from inadequate food and overwork, passes Gussie on the street. Almost collapsing in her arms, Clara hears the story of the search, in which Gussie took part, and as the sisters forgive all past misunderstandings, Gussie plans to notify Henry. The next day he takes Clara in his arms, begging her to forgive. Happily, she returns with him to her home, and clasps her two children in her arms. As Henry smiles at them, he tells her that never again will she feel his love is not as great as hers for him, and the two realize that affection is stronger than it has ever been before.

IT PAYS TO EXERCISE

Gladys N. Harrison Comedy Drama File No. 11013

WOODENA ORSON meets Tessie Nell Terrell (nicknamed T. N. T.) while both are taking a course in Physical Culture. Woodena wins the title of "Miss Venus" in a national contest, and when Tessie returns to Westcott to take care of the home of her bachelor brother, Dan Terrell, handsome but hypochondriacal, she induces the Superintendent of Schools to take Woodena on as Physical Culture instructor. Dan meets Woodena, and finds himself impressed with her beauty, but realizing it, he scoffs at the work she is doing and preserves a gruff attitude toward his sister's friend. Woodena give lectures on the need of proper exercise and diet for a beautiful body, and everyone becomes interested when she demonstrates how she creates and preserves her own beauty. Dan returns home and begins exercising, only to hear Tessie's step on the stair, and to pretend that he was only moving his desk. Tessie smiles, realizing he is weakening.

When Dan complains of the taxes he pays on a strip of land adjoining the river, Woodena is amazed that he is letting it become a liability. She insists that the land is worth its weight in gold, and Dan offers to give Woodena and Tessie a deed to the land if they can make it pay its taxes for the year. The girls become greatly enthusiastic. Using Tessie's old flivver they begin carting away the junk that clutters up the property, and when the ladies of the club inquires as to what they are doing, they explain that this is one of the most efficient forms of exercise. Accordingly in a short while all the women in town are pushing wheelbarrows up hill, and rejoicing as their scales register their diminishing weight. Meanwhile the husbands become alarmed as the ladies moan and talk numbers in their sleep. The land is soon cleared and neatly terraced. Next they decide to make a ball diamond and play ball. Two teams are organized among the women, and Abigail Roe, who is too near-sighted to play, sells tickets. Mr. French looks in vain for his golf suit and Junior tells him Mrs. Rathburn borrowed it to play baseball. On receipt of a quarter Junior "spills the beans" about the ball game next day. Mr. French confides to his friend Mr. Soules, whose wife has been acting very mysterious too. They decide to attend, and pass the suggestion on to all their cronies who have been gathering in clusters at the club to discuss the unwonted behavior of their several wives. The husbands and brothers, after a secret conference, decide to attend the game in style. Accordingly each borrows ladies' clothes to wear and Abigail is beside herself with excitement as a long queue forms at the box office of men swaddled in women's clothes. Junior sees an opportunity to make some money. To the town bachelors he sells the use of his mother's clothes and discovering that Dan Terrell hesitates to join the others in the improvised grand stand shrewdly sells a knot hole in the fence for fifty cents. Junior takes a seat on the limb of a tree but as Moses Johnson looks around for sitting space, Junior sells him his place of vantage. The game progresses. The score is tied at the last inning. Woodena goes to bat, and with bases full hits a home run. The crowd goes wild. Moses Johnson falls from the limb and hangs suspended in mid-air. The wives discover their husbands, who persuade them to play also. The Park becomes a community affair. Woodena and Tessie produce an itemized statement showing the taxes have been paid, and a balance of $34.18 remains. Dan deeds them the land and is persuaded to try the physical culture methods. He is no longer a hypochondriac and he and Woodena sign a contract for life.

MY LOVE STORY

Mrs. Steven Morris Drama File No. 10629

WITH a whimsy that has an underlying seriousness, Georgia and Frederick plan together their married life and their children, first Frederick Junior and then the twins. "Six in all, Mrs. Martin," Frederick says smiling. "No less than six, Mr. Martin," Georgia returns. But the dreams of youth too frequently fade in the cold air of reality. Their parents, thinking them too young and unsuited for each other because of class differences, object and Frederick is sent away to college. Georgia counts the days until his return. Then one day she sees him in the street and with a glad cry runs to him. "Frederick!" she exclaims, but the eyes he turns to her are shamed and as she pleads, "What is it?" he tells her of the night at college, when, missing her terribly, he had gone out on a drinking spree with some of the other boys. They had gone out with some chorus girls and someone had suggested they get married for a joke. "Married!" "I didn't know what I was doing," Georgia hears him say, but as she turns blindly from him, she knows only that all that she has held dear in the world has gone from her.

Inconsolable, Georgia at last accepts the proposal of Wesley who soon makes her life miserable with his jealousy and drinking. To help support themselves, they take in a hoarder, Mr. Clark, a widower, whose child Celia, Georgia loves as she would her own. Only the money that Clark pays in gratitude for Georgie's care of this beloved little girl, keeps them alive in the days that Wesley squanders all their savings on drink. Then Georgia learns that she is to have a child of her own, the child she has always wanted. In her happiness she is kinder than ever to the motherless little Celia. But Wesley, returning one night, ugly from drink, turns on Clark and makes vile insinuations about him and Georgia. Whitely Georgia sways, and Clark, retaining his temper for Georgia's sake, leaves. Deprived now of the board money, Georgia and Wesley are worse off than ever, but with the birth of little Mary, Wesley promises to reform. Then one day Frederick comes back, divorced now from his showgirl wife. As he sees how unhappy Georgia is, he begs her to leave her husband and marry him, but for the sake of little Mary who means more to Georgia than anyone else in the world, Georgia refuses and chooses to remain on with her brutal husband. Frederick secretly manages to see that Wesley is employed, and Wesley, bragging that he can earn money as well as any man swears that he will never drink again. Learning that she can never have another child, Georgia lavishes such affection upon little Mary, that Wesley jealously asserts Georgia doesn't care for him and goes out with other women. For the sake of her child, Georgia says nothing even when she sees Wesley ride by in another woman's car, but one day Wesley is induced by his mistress to have something to drink and losing all sense of what he is doing, he seizes Mary and determines to "show his daughter a good time." Before Georgia's agonized eyes, the crazily driven car overturns. Mary is instantly killed and Wesley dies begging for forgiveness. And in the weeks that follow the terrible loss, Georgia finds in Frederick's protecting arms, some measure of consolation, although there can never be for them the children of their early dreams.

SILVER SADDLES

Sadie Enfantino Western File No. 10748

WITH the unconscious cruelty of childhood, Stanley Smith taunts Betty, a newcomer at school by calling out: "Hello, Smarty," while the other pupils laugh. Sobbing, the little girl confesses this to her parents, Molly and Jerry Rogers, who sympathetically advise her to make friends with the others, ignoring such teasing remarks. In the course of a short time, she attains popularity, but never forgets Stanley's unkindness. A few years later, lovely in her yellow frock, Betty graduates from high school, surrounded by her freinds. Happy in the social life that follows this, the young girl enjoys complete contentment until her mother dies, the victim of pneumonia, commending Betty to Jerry's care. Heartbroken, Jerry goes into partnership with Mr. Galli in the lumber business, taking Betty along to the camp, where both may forget their deep sorrow. Bert, the corral boss, shows Betty the horses, but demurs when she asks him to saddle Silver, a choice mare, that she may ride him. Ignoring his warning, Betty saddles the pony herself, and breaks him in while Bert watches with admiration as she calmly pats the bucking steed and wins him. Galli and his boys secretly cut and ship over one thousand dollars worth of lumber belonging to Jerry. They plan to blame this theft upon a mysterious man known as the Lone Rider, who frequents the community.

Trusting Galli, Jerry agrees to post notices for the Lone Rider's arrest, and when Betty sees his handsome features pictured on these bills, she resolves to ride to him, warning him. Bert tells her that he has been ordered to see that she doesn't ride through the canyon, but she saddles Silver herself, and is on her way. Hearing a tenor voice singing her mother's song, "Little Girl Dressed in Blue," Betty hastens to the Lone Rider, but Silver slips, and the girl is picked up by Galli, who threatens to beat her if she ever again disobeys his orders. When Betty, riding through the canyon later without Galli's knowledge, sees him on the point of hanging the Lone Rider, she intercedes on his behalf, and, fearing arrest, they release him. In order to clear his name and explain the situation, the Lone Rider goes to Jerry's office, but, believing him to be a dangerous criminal, Mr. Rogers shoots him, and he leaves hurriedly. Once more in the canyon, Betty is lifted neatly from her horse, and carried away by the Lone Rider to his hideout in the canyon. Here she discovers that the handsome youth is her childhood enemy—Stanley Smith. When she will not listen to his apology, he refuses to allow her to leave, although after breakfast the next morning he finally releases her while he goes in search of spring water. Secretly in love with her jailer, who has treated her with consideration, Betty tidies up his home before leaving.

Galli comes across Stanley and ties him to his cabin, which he leaves,surrounded by burning brush, but Jerry, passing by, rescues him in the nick of time. Determined to apologize to Betty, Stanley goes to the ranch, where he is shot by Galli's gang, and seriously wounded. The sheriff then arrives, explaining that Stanley is a detective, and Galli is arrested.

As she tenderly nurses him back to health, Betty forgives Stanley, and an early wedding is planned, as she nestles in his arms.

THEY SERVE MOST

Alice A. Sullivan Drama File No. 10966

WHEN the train on which the Reilly family is crossing the continent is wrecked, their baby Owen is hurled several yards free of the wreck. The dead and dying are brought to a nearby hospital but in the growing confusion the baby is overlooked. When his parents regain consciousness they conduct a long but fruitless search for their child who is, a day later, picked up by a passing prairie schooner. Owen grows up, the only clue to his identity being a picture of himself as a baby taken with his mother and father, and the name Owen Reilly which he is not sure is his own.

Years pass. At college Owen is the room mate of Robert McGee, and the two admire each other greatly. One day Owen returns to his room to find the picture of Robert's sister, a nurse, the most beautiful girl he has ever seen. He falls in love with Maize but refuses Robert's invitation to come home and meet her until he finds out who he really is. With the outbreak of the World War, therefore, Owen volunteers and one day is in the front row of a theater when the soldiers are being addressed by speakers, among them Judge Reilly, his father. The Judge, attracted by a characteristic gesture of a young man in the front row, realizes the boy looks like him, and as the meeting ends, hurries forward. However, Owen has disappeared in the crowd, and in his dismay, the Judge collapses. Maizie, noticing his distress, promptly rushes forward and by two brisk slaps staves off a paralysis. He is grateful and explaining that he thought he saw his long lost son in audience, he accepts her assistance home. Maizie learning that the Judge's son and her brother's room mate are one, makes inquiries but learns that Owen's regiment has already sailed. Disappointed, she subsequently goes overseas as a Red Cross Nurse and soon is famous among the soldiers as the gentle and lovely Nurse Faithful.

One day Nurse Faithful overhears some doctors deploring the sudden and unaccountable raving of the brave Captain Owen Reilly. Nurse Faithful enters the room and discovers that acid has been poured on the wound of the gallant officer. She gives him relief and from his delirium learns that he is her brother's room mate in love with her. Hearing him rave about the picture of her he has seen, she assumes the pose, and he is dumfounded as he recognizes her. While Owen is convalscing, Nurse Faithful writes to Judge Reilly and for the first time Owen receives a letter from his own people. His gratitude to the lovely nurse is touching, and now at last he feels free to tell her of his love, knowing that he has a right to the name he asks her to share. However, as they are about to be married, Dr. Root, one of the hospital doctors shoots at Nurse Faithful. Owen leaps at him, and turns him over to the military police. It is revealed that Dr. Root is mad, and that it was he, out of insane jealousy of Nurse Faithful, who had killed many brave soldiers and poured the acid on Owen's wounds. As bride and groom, Owen and Nurse Faithful return to the United States where there is joyous reception awaiting them by Judge and Mrs. Reilly, and Robert McGee, whose happiness is almost as great as that of the lovers.

LOVERS IN THE STORM

Emma R. Fisher Drama File No. 11029

LONG ago Nona and Ken had loved. Ken was a musican who supported himself by giving piano lessons and his earnings, never large, suffered a severe set back with the coming of hard times.

Again and again, visiting Nona in her little house near the little wood, Ken would tell her how much he loved her, but, because he dreaded the thought that his wife might not have the things she wanted, Ken had withheld asking her to marry him. His hopes were all pinned on a concert. If someone could finance a recital and he could make money therefrom, he could marry Nona. It was Ken who brought Nona Midgie, the adorable little pup that became her constant companion. Then Nora Blair, a wealthy widow met Ken. Ken told of his plans for a concert, and Nora allowed her lids to drop over her eyes. If Ken would come to her home and play for her,—Nora suggested, and Ken, putting his whole heart and soul into his playing, looked up from the keyboard and asked her if she would risk her money. He would pay her back every cent, Ken assured her earnestly. Nora shrugged. Money was so important. That night when Ken reported all to Nona, instead of the enthusiasm he expected, Nona looked at him with hurt eyes and asked couldn't he see that the woman was making a gigolo out of him. So they had quarreled for the first time. Nona, although her heart was breaking, deliberately stayed away from Ken's concert, and in his moment of triumph, Ken, hurt by Nona's action, turned to the soft words of Nora. And after the others had gone, Nora wound her soft arms about Ken's neck and told him how wonderful he was. Carried away, Ken kissed her and soon after, Nona who had waited red-eyed for Ken to come back to her, learned that Ken had eloped with Mrs. Blair, the wealthy widow. Soon Ken was to learn that all Nora's interest in his music was pretended. Sometimes she would shriek at him to stop playing the piano when she had a headache, and realizing what a mistake he had made, Ken asked and got a divorce. Meanwhile his playing was attracting critical acclaim and he was signed up for a series of concerts, one near his old home town. Accordingly, years after he had left, Ken returned to find Nona still living alone in her house, her only companion, Midgie. Nona stopped dead still at sight of Ken but when he pleaded that he still loved her, she turned from him harshly and at last, unable to convince her of his sincerity, Ken turned sadly toward the station to catch the train for his next concert. Denied even the solace of tears, Nona started toward the woods with Midgie racing at her side. As she passed some hunters they reminded her of the storm warnings but heedlessly Nona kept on walking. Suddenly the train thundered past, and haggard of face, Ken stood on the observation platform. Nona pushed on. The storm broke in all its fury. A huge oak, struck by lightning, splintered, crushing her and Midgie beneath its heavy branches. Midgie barked and yipped ceaselessly while Nona lapsed into unconsciousness. It was Ken, guided by Midgie's last barks who found Nona and freed her from the branches. And as he held her close, kissing her pale cheeks and explaining how he had jumped from the train, unable to endure riding away from her, Nona ceased struggling. And her arms crept about Ken's shoulders, their lips meeting at last.

THE TRIAL OF VERONA WATSON

Myrtle Morgan Drama File No. 11105

WHILE studying for his law school exams, Edward Hurley walks alone in the country. To his horror he sees that the train switch is set wrong. He runs forward and frantically signals with his shirt. However, he is too late. The train crashes, and Eddie rescues person after person from the flaming cars before he sinks unconscious to the ground. His last thought is for the lovely girl he has pulled last from the wreckage. Weeks later he regains his strength, but he learns that the girl has gone, leaving no clue to her identity.

Meanwhile his wealthy aunt has visted and while Eddie's sister Verona takes care of him, his flighty younger sister Verna ingratiates herself with her eccentric aunt and is invited home with her. Verona and Eddie receive reports of what a good time Verna is having in society, while Verna involves herself with a fast crowd and loses her pretty head. In the apartment of Mary Brogdan there is a wild party in progress. When John Watson, father of Verna's escort calls to find out if his son is here, Mary assures him he is not and finally induces him to leave. Verna and John Junior come out of the bedroom and they all laugh at their own cleverness. Weeks later Verna is out with John Junior and asks him when they are going to be married. Junior afraid of his father tries to put her off but at length consents to speak to his "old man." Dejected he returns to tell the distracted Verna that his father has threatened to disown him if he marries before his twenty-first birthday. Verna returns home. That night a car drives up and John Watson Senior offers Verna a thousand dollars if she will go away and leave his son in peace. Verna weeps hysterically and when Verona finds out her sister's trouble, she proceeds directly to the hotel in town where she rties to induce the stern faced man to allow the youngsters to get married. When Watson tells her her sister undoubtedly knows how she can get rid of the baby, Verona shouts, "I'd rather see her dead," and leaves, upsetting the colored bellhop who has been listening at the keyhole. Watson bribes the bellhop to keep silent, and Verona returning home comes up the road just as her sister puts a bullet through her head with the gun Watson has given her. Verona runs to her, catching her as she falls, and two gossipy old women start shrieking, "Murder!" Verona is held for the murder of her sister and at the trial she is defended by her brother Eddie. Verona exacts a promise from Stanley Reed, the young doctor who loves her, that he will say nothing about Verna's condition. At the trial the bellhop testifies that Verona had cried, "I'd rather see her dead," and the case points toward Verona having murdered her sister. When Stanley, unable to see the woman he loves wronged so, testifies that Verna was with child, her brother and mother break down. However, the prosecuting attorney revolts the jury by twisting the evidence to prove that Verona had murdered her sister after trying to blackmail her betrayer.

Meanwhile Mary reading of the trial, convinces the distracted John Junior to tell the whole truth. John comes to court but he is followed by his father who, to stop his admissions, shoots and kills him. The father turns the gun on himself and Mary, breaking down her own character tells the whole story of Verna's betrayal in her apartment. Verona is freed and is led out of court by Stanley, while Eddie, having found in Mary the girl of the train wreck, finds himself forgiving everything, and learning to love.

HAS SHE A SOUL?

Anna Bell Ward Melodrama File No. 10871

KNEELING beside her father's grave, in the foothills of Virginia, Barbara sobs passionately, experiencing the first great grief of her life. Father Westly, who has watched over the motherless girl since first she was brought to the Convent of the Sacred Heart, consoles her as best he can with the thought that her father is in a better world, as he guides her to her childhood home. Tenderly he bids Barbara farewell as she reluctantly leaves the convent walls to journey to the home of Dr. James MacDonald in New York, in accordance with William O'Dare's dying wish. Her father's old friend smiles a warm welcome as he greets Barbara, clad in the uniform of the convent, and conducting her from Grand Central station, urges her to call him Daddy Jim. The next day he instructs his housekeeper to take the girl on a shopping tour and proudly surveys his lovely adopted daughter, smartly attired in her new apparel. Introducing her to his friend, Paul Blakely, an artist in Greenwich Village, Daddy Jim gives his consent to the proposal that she become his model. The next day, going alone to Paul's studio, Barbara at first indignantly refuses to pose in the nude until Paul assures her that this is no sin; remembering that her adored Daddy Jim has been Paul's friend for years, she at last consents and hesitantly disrobes. When Paul looks upon the beautiful figure, partly concealed by the wealth of golden hair, he realizes that for the first time in his stormy life he has found true love, in this sweet, innocent young girl.

A woman calls unexpectedly during one of the sittings, and Paul is forced to present his wife, whom he has never mentioned. Alone with Barbara, later, he explains that when an impulsive youngster he married the daughter of the man who owned the farm where his father was employed. Shortly after the ceremony, the girl returned to her people, unwilling to sbare poverty with him. When a famous sculptor saw him at work in his barnyard studio he was given his first chance. Success and wealth eventually followed; then his wife returned to him, wishing to share his fame. Because she had borne him a son, Gene, he could not refuse her. Years of unhappiness passed, during which his wife refused to free him, bound by hate, not love. His only solace was his son, now away at school. Concluding this unhappy recital, Paul pours out his love to Barbara, urging her only to promise never to desert him and, overcome with pity for this older man who has always treated her with the utmost consideration, the inexperienced girl gives her promise. Soon after, Barbara is presented to Gene who is visiting his father. Discovering that she has had few pleasures in her life, the young man teaches her to dance and makes it his pleasant duty to introduce her to some of the gayer aspects of city life. As the two are picnicking on the rocks the tide comes in without their realization. When death seems imminent, Gene will not leave her, and both confess their mutual love. The next morning, Barbara sadly recounts her promise to someone else, which she will not break. In consternation, Gene turns to his father for advice; overcome with desire for the girl, Paul lies, assuring Gene that she is an immoral woman. When Gene leaves, thoroughly unconvinced, Paul commissions Togo, his butler, to send for Barbara. He warns her that if she does not renounce Gene, he will kill his own son.

At a party in celebration of the completion of Paul's statue, Gene comes to Barbara, and they are discovered together by his mother who denounces the younger woman. When Gene learns that Barbara has been the model for his father's statue he destroys the work of art, almost strangling Paul when he throws him across it. Pursuing Barbara, he accidentally strikes her with his car, and lifts the girl, who is only slightly injured, in his arms. Confessing the truth, Barbara at last gives herself to Gene whom she loves so dearly, and plans are made for a wedding the following day. The next morning, fearing for Gene's safety above all else, Barbara packs her bags and leaves, in spite of the protests of Mandy Lou, the housekeeper, sending Gene a tender note of farewell. That night the young man is shanghaied and taken to the Orient. Bitterly, Barbara learns that she cannot be received at the convent, as Father Westly gently explains that she is considered unrighteous in the eyes of the church, although God has forgiven her. Barbara secures work in the chorus of a metropolitan production. Fainting during a rehearsal, she awakens to find herself in the arms of Daddy Jim, who tells her that she is to become a mother. Without condemnation, he listens to her pitiful story and persuades her to marry Paul, who has taken to drink since her disappearance. For the sake of her child, she becomes his wife, going with him to Canada that he may regain his health. On board the steamer, Barbara attempts to tell him the truth, but he will not listen. It is not until he discovers her sewing on tiny garments that he learns the cause of her marriage. After beating her, he leaves and is destroyed by wolves. Months later, with her baby daughter, Barbara returns to the city to learn that Daddy Jim is dead. At last unable to support her baby, she leaves her upon the doorsteps of a wealthy home, little knowing that Gene is the man who adopts Genevieve. Saved from suicide by Tom Wong, Barbara lives a life of degradation for years, while Genevieve, bringing out all that is good in her grandmother, grows up into a beautiful girl. Gene's mother requests her son to marry this adopted daughter, but the ceremony is stopped by her sudden death and Genevieve is sent away to the country. Here she meets David, a young engineer. In spite of their love, she cannot marry him because of her promise to Gene. Barbara, recently released from a prison term which Tom Wong's treachery placed on her, is injured in an accident. As Gene volunteers to take the stranger to the hospital, he recognizes her. Upon hearing her story, he sends for Genevieve, whom she identifies as her daughter by a birthmark on the girl's shoulder. Leaving a note in which she forgives her parents, Genevieve advises Gene that the destiny which shapes our ends caused her to be born that Barbara might again find happiness. Genevieve goes to David and when Barbara is stronger, she is taken to the young couple by now her husband. Following his daughter's instructions to make the sunset of Barbara's life a happy one, Gene forgets the sorrows of the past as he turns to the only woman he has ever truly loved.

CALL OF THE FLAME

Sue Meharry Moffett Drama File No. 10913

A CHORUS of grateful children's voices followed Miss Barbar LaParena as she distributed her gifts at the orphanage and walked briskly down the steps to her small car. At the bridge she stopped to wave to Peter and Andy and as they called to ask if she were going to the big anniversary dance of the town, she nodded, and promised to see them there. However, as she pulled into her own driveway and stepped from the car, her ankle twisted under her and the two anxious servants carried her into the house. The doctor shook his head professionally as he ordered complete rest, and as Barbara looked out the window to the town hall across the street, he cautioned, "And no dancing." Smiling ruefully, Barbara asked, "And what would I want to dance for?" Gallantly the old doctor recalled how Barbara had once been the belle of the town. Hadn't Peter, and Andy, and what's his name, Billy Lewis wanted her. Then seeing the hurt look in the eyes of Miss Barbara, and recalling how her father had wanted Peter, the doctor, with a last word of advice departed. Already people were beginning to arrive for the old fashioned country dance held at the town hall in celebration of the hundredth anniversary of the town. Jerry and Felicia, the faithful old servants bustled about setting a fire in the hearth and covering Miss Barbara with her old patchwork quilt, made with her own hands the months following her intercepted elopement.

As she sat before the fire, with the sounds of music and laughing voices drifting in from across the street, Barbara fingered her quilt and each patch recalled a scene. That red bit came from the new dress she had worn one Sunday to go to church. Billy Lewis had come up with his new bicycle, and she had accepted his invitation for a ride. The wheel had coasted down hill gathering force so that they crashed into the meeting house gate. With her red dress hilariously torn, Barbara had been hustled down the aisle to the family pew, while amused snickers followed her ignominious entrance. That paisley bit came from the shawl she had worn the first time Billy kissed her. She remembered how Peter and Andy had fought for her favors while Billy masterfully had swung her into a dance and out into the garden heavy with the scent of June roses. They had pledged eternal adoration then, but Barbara was too soon to know her father favored only Peter. This bit of red velvet came from her skating costume the night she had fallen through the ice while skating with Peter. Billy had caught a bad case of flu from his rescue but her father had only sniffed and said Barbara could have been pulled out without all the fuss. And so at last she and Billy had planned to elope. But at the last moment, Barbara's father, warned by Peter, had appeared and after a dreadful scene Billy, who had been educated at military schools had left for the wars. As Barbara's slender fingers brushed the fragment of the dress she had worn that night, she brushed the quilt from her, not noticing that it lay smouldering on the hearth. Meanwhile Billy Lewis, hair iron gray, had returned to town for the centennial. And it was he who was to rush into the burning home to save his Barbraa, and it was Peter who was to help both of them to safety, thus restoring the happiness he had imperiled so many years ago when he had reported the elopement. And after the many years, Barbara and Billy were to find happiness together.

WINGS OF HATE

Emogene Brown Drama File No. 10984

LATEST recruit at the flying field, Dale White soon distinguishes himself as one of the most promising of all the aviators. One day as he is inspecting his plane, he unwittingly splashes mud on the white frock of Diana Byrd, sister of one of the other airmen. He apologizes profoundly, and insists on removing the spots with a preparation he has handy, giving the laughing girl one of his flying suits to wear while her own dress is drying. They are chatting companionably together, when Diana's brother Russell comes in and frowns at sight of the pair together. Diana puts on her dress behind the improvised screen Dale has set up for her, and accompanies her brother to the field where Dale sees her in conversation with Lawn Peterson, a wealthy playboy, who has taken up flying as a hobby.

In the weeks to follow, Dale is to fall deeply in love with Diana, and to discover that her brother favors the suit of Peterson. Meanwhile, Peterson has been advancing Russell money to cover his gambling debts on the provison that Russell eventually wills win Diana for his own. Peterson, seeing Diana's interest in Dale, fears the younger man will cut him out, and subtly points out to Russell that if Diana accepts Dale, Russell's creditors will send him to prison. A cross-Atlantic flight is scheduled and Diana promises to marry Dale on his return whether or not he wins the purse. In the days before the trip, Peterson plays on Russell's strained nerves, reminding him that if Dale should quite by chance happen to be lost in mid-ocean, Diana would marry him, Peterson, and Russell would have no money troubles for the rest of his life. Accordingly, Russell pours chemical explosive into the gasoline tank of Dale's plane. However, Dale who has gone into the Office to telephone Diana, sees the action through the window, and manages to refill his tank before he sets off. However, Peterson has no intention of letting Russell return alive from the trip, and he pours the remainder of the contents of the explosive in Russell's tank. As the hour for the take-off approaches, Diana kisses her brother and Dale, and waves to Peterson, sitting grimly at his controls. The signal, the throttles, a savage roar, and the line of planes lift into the air and wing out to sea. A half-hour out, Dale sees a ball of fire in the air, and sees Russel leap out of his burning plane. To his horror he notices that the boy's parachute fails to open. Sliding his plane directly under the falling figure, he catches him in the cockpit, and seeing that Russell is stunned but otherwise unhurt, continues on his way. Suddenly he feels someone tearing madly at his shoulder, and Russell screams frenziedly, "The ship is going to explode." Blandly Dale assures him that he changed the gasoline before starting and Russell sinks back weakly. Dale wins the race, seeing Peterson's ship crack up in landing, and Peterson dies before help can reach him. Dale keeps the secret of Russell's attempt at murder, and returns to marry the waiting Diana.

MEDDLING

Anthony Ecky Drama File No. 11054

FOR years Milt has been so tired after a long day of farming that he has had no time to look at girls. Then one day, as he is riding his produce into town, he stops to aid Ellen Tate, whose flivver wheel has gotten stuck in the mud. As he manages the task easily, Ellen watches with open admiration the flexing of his powerful muscles under his shirt. Awkwardly he wipes his hands before accepting her outstretched hand, and when she asks him if he won't come to her house some evening, Milt shyly accepts. It is quite late before he can finish his work, and, carefully washed and combed, he goes calling on Ellen. From the first her widow mother and younger brother like Milt and Milt finds himself in the throes of his first love. However, when hesitantly he asks his father for some of the money he earns from Ed House, whose farm Milt works, Jake waxes furious and forbids Milt to see this girl who is only "playing him for what she can get." Dejected, Milt continues to work for Ed House, and to accept the fact that each week Jake collects his salary and goes into town to buy corn liquor. Again and again Milt tries to rebel, but as his father grows ugly and abuses Milt's mother, the boy forlornly drops the whole matter. Ellen tries in vain to persuade him that he has no right to let his father ruin his life for him, but with the realization that any further argumentation, will just make his mother's life more unhappy, Milt remains mute. Ellen tries in vain to stir him, and at length, calling him a "weakling and a coward," she runs from him sobbing. Milt is about to follow, when his father calls surlily to remind him that he has to get back to work. Old Doc Bentley who, each year takes work in the fields to keep in trim, notices Milt's dejection but cannot get the boy to speak about it. However, when he returns to his home, he receives a late call from Ellen, who weeps on the kindly shoulder and confides the whole matter. Doc thinks for a while then asks how old Milt is. Ellen's tears dry on her cheeks as she replies she doesn't know, and while Doc is looking up his records, Ellen goes to Milt's mother and persuades her to find the actual date of Milt's birth from the family Bible. With proof that Milt is twenty-two, Ellen goes to Ed House and begs him not turn Milt's salary over to his father. Ed hesitates to change the arrangement without authorization, but when Doc explains briefly the circumstances, Ed agrees to assist. Accordingly on Saturday Jake talks of everything under the sun until finally he demands the money. Ed replies that he is going to give it to Milt who is old enough to collect his own salary. Jake, already late for the cherished drink, loses his temper and shrieks but when Ed calmly brings down his shot gun and loads it with rock salt, Jake stops yelling, and with the threat of a charge of rock salt, Jake flees. For the first time master of his own salary, Milt loses his brow-beaten air. Promising Jake a portion of his salary on the condition that Jake take good care of his mother, Milt proceeds directly to Ellen's house, and sweeping her masterfully into his arms, he asks an important question.

JOBLESS HEROES

Carlos I. Ayala Comedy File No. 10969

JOBLESS, hungry, Mike steals a ride on a freight train only to be thrown off by a hard-hearted conductor. As he rolls on the ground, bruised by the sharp pebbles, resentment fills his soul and he hobbles along the road until he reaches the bathing beach. All about he sees crowds of laughing people, seemingly unaware that thousands are suffering from the Depression. Mike tries to beg a few pennies but everyone ignores him, and he walks toward the bath houses. Suddenly he notices a motorman's uniform neatly left behind by a bather. Looking around furtively, he hastily gets into the "borrowed" outfit and leaves his own in exchange. Hastily he walks away and in the shelter of the park, goes through his pockets. He finds a looking glass, a comb, a handkerchief money, and the picture of a beautiful girl with whom he immediately falls in love. He sighs and stretches out under the trees.

Meanwhile the motorman returns from his swim to find his clothes gone and only some tatters in their place. Whereupon he "borrows" some one else's clothes and leaves as quickly as possible. Soon he realizes that everyone is laughing at him and looking down he discovers the suit is many sizes too small and his hands and legs dangle awkwardly. The owner of the clothes reports their loss and soon the motorman sees he is being followed by a policeman and he begins running with the others behind him.

Meanwhile Mike in his motorman's outfit swaggers down the street and sees a car waiting for its motorman to return from the lemonade stand. Mike promptly goes through the car collecting fares. He is about to leave, when one of the passengers stops him saying they have been waiting long enough and he'd better start. Never having driven a trolley before, Mike has a hard time starting and when he finally does start, the car plunges forward with a jerk that sends all the passengers sprawling in the aisles. With the real motorman running frantically after them, Mike goes hurtling through the streets, narrowly missing cars and pedestrians. Suddenly the car stops. He tries the back controls and it starts suddenly without anyone at the steering wheel. The passengers shriek but again the car comes to a halt. The passengers scratch and beat Mike up and get out of the trolley grumbling, while Mike climbs under to see what is wrong, and the trolley goes off empty. Mike comes up unharmed the car having passed over him. While the empty trolley runs madly down the tracks, Mike picks himself up from the ground and begins brushing himself off. A beautiful girl runs up, and helps to brush him, kissing him tenderly as he winces. Together they walk off toward the park. Night falls and the two lovers Mike and the girl whose picture he has found in the motorman's suit, kiss each other warmly.

Suddenly with a groan, Mike wakes up and he finds himself on the same spot where he landed when he was thrown from the train. He wears his shabby old clothes. The whole adventure was a dream, and the girl who was so warmly kissing him is just a stray dog who is licking his bruised face.

DANCE NO MORE

Cassie Lindsey Drama File No. 10982

LAUGHING with childish glee, little Cassie allows her brother to swing her to the top of the load of hay he is tramping, but a few minutes later she slips between the racks, injuring her hip when she strikes a stone. A lamenes results, and when the child slips out, shortly after an illness, and slides on the ice without adequate protection, infection sets in. Bravely trying to hold back the tears, Cassie listens while the doctor tells her that she will not be able to play with the other youngsters for a little while. At school, her playmates, admiring her courage, carry her on their sleds while she smiles happily believing soon she will be able to join them in their games. Devoted to her father, Cassie hides her disappointment when her lameness grows worse instead of better, even after a summer in the country, and an unusually deep bond of affection springs up between these two. When Cassie's father dies the girl feels that she has lost her best friend. Determined not to become a burden to her mother she enters a trade school and learns the art of millinery. Sciatic rheumatism develops and, in treating this the doctor inadvertently gives Cassie an overdose of morphine which causes heart trouble. Still determined to carry on, the girl becomes a governess, supplementing her income with millinery work and later teaching in a private school.

In spite of her affliction, Cassie's happy disposition attracts many admirers, and one of these a widower with a little girl of seven, becomes her husband. Eager that the child shall know all the pleasures which were denied her, Cassie mothers the little girl tenderly, in spite of her deep grief when her own baby son dies at birth. Cassie's husband suffers a breakdown and is forced to give up his position as sea captain, but his wife secures work as postmistress at the little community of Birch Harbor, conducting her business capably from a wheel chair, and at the same time caring for the needs of her husband and daughter. When Ted, who was Cassie's first admirer, is convicted of a petty theft at the post office, Cassie's faith in God and people, which she has sustained through years of pain and suffering, is shaken. Her husband and she adopt a little girl and a baby boy after the death of his daughter, at sixteen. The little fellow is injured in an automobile accident, and as he lies at the point of death, Cassie turns to the practice of Divine Healing. The child makes a partial recovery, while Cassie breathes a prayer of thanksgiving to God. She soon finds that her own heart trouble is becoming lessened, and the period of black doubt which assailed her is forever lifted. Because she cannot adequately care for her invalid son, the baby is taken away by the Ladies Aid Society, and placed in a good home. Cassie once more hides her own sorrow, thinking of his good rather than her own.

After a lingering illness, Cassie's husband dies. Exhausted by the weeks of hard work, in attending to her duties and nursing him, once more she is on the point of yielding to nervous exhaustion and giving up. But remembering God's kindness to her in the past, she turns to him again, and lives only for Gladys, the adopted daughter.

When Gladys grows to radiant womanhood and is loved by Ralph, a young man of character, Cassie feels that she cannot give up the only thing she has left in the world. But remembering that the girl has a right to her own life, she insists upon their marriage, refusing to live with them, as she believes they will be happier without her. Years go by, and Cassie is at last forced to retire from her position at Birch Harbor on a pension. When the hosts of friends whom she has made during her years of service surround her with attentions, and Gladys and her children turn to her, Cassie realizes that with God's help, she has lived a full and beautiful life.

INTO THE NIGHT

Dorothy E. King Drama File No. 11150

ONE o'clock in the sinister Club Saido, underworld hangout. A party of swells, slumming, come in. They watch the risque floorshow with interest and as the orchestra strikes up, move on to the floor, dancing to the barbaric rhythms. Left alone at her table, Susan, eighteen year old sister of the Odgens finishes her cocktail and her head curiously light drifts out to the floor and begins a sinuous dance of her own. The other couples stop dancing to watch her. A tall dark young man joins her, calls for a tango, and in perfect rhythm they dance as though their act had been rehearsed for months. The tall young man bows and Susan is hustled out by her party. As she puts on her evening wrap, the maid informs her there is a note giving her the telephone number of the Big Boss, the man she danced with, and asking her to call. In his apartment, Jim, called the Big Boss waits impatiently for her call. His career flashes before his eyes.

Back his memory goes to the time when as a child his father had been killed by two notorious bandits who had for years rustled his cattle. Small as he was, Jim had vowed he would avenge his father's death. Years later he had killed the drunken bandit Don Estrella, and shortly after, having followed his partner Don Manuel Garcia, the other murderer of his father, Jim ended a heinous career by shooting Garcia in the very act of whipping a cabaret dancer who refused to sit on his knee. Fleeing from the wrath of the bandits' followers, Jim sought refuge near Tia Juana, where he shared the supper of three bootleggers. In a game of poker, Jim cleaned them out and staring into the muzzles of cocked guns Jim eyed them unflinching. Accordingly, scenting adventure, Jim joined forces with them and soon went on to join Zutazzi, the Big Shot. While acting as the "front" for the liquor gang, Jim met a girl and was on the point of giving up the whole racket when he discovered she was double crossing him and was putting him on the spot for the rival gang. In disgust, Jim, escaping the trap set for him, proved an invaluable asset to the gang, and when Zutazzi was rubbed out by the other gang, Jim succeeded him as Big Shot.

Jim's revery was interrupted by the jangling of the telephone and to his great pleasure it was Susan, whom he induced to meet him at the Blue Room of the Missouri Hotel. Over dinner they talked and while the orchestra played a soft waltz, danced together. Susan would not see Jim again until the following Sunday, and they arranged to go to Cliff Rock, where he wanted to show her the Pirate's cave and where they could have dinner in a quaint little inn. It seemed an eternity until Sunday. Then after a perfect afternoon, as they were making their way back, Susan slipped and her arms went about Jim. Instantly he was kissing her and murmuring, "I love you." Susan drew away, and averting her head told him it was her own fault for letting this dream go on. Nothing could ever come of this. She couldn't marry a racketeer. Realizing he was losing her, Jim pleaded with her to give him an opportunity to go straight, and at length, convinced of his sincerity, Susan agreed that if he went west and for a year broke away entirely from his underworld associations she would marry him A year! Jim's anguish was in that cry but he consented. Jim's train was leaving for the West. Anxiously he searched the crowds for Susan's face, and suddenly he saw her, running to him with a party of her friends. She whispered something to Dr. Stafford, the minister, and while the others stood stunned, the marriage ceremony was performed, and when the train pulled out, Jim's arms were about his bride, who had complete faith in his regeneration.

A TRICK OF FATE

Mary Giampetruzzi Drama File No. 11183

IN the small town of Laterza, Italy, the feast of Modonna Mater Domini is being celebrated. The streets are noisy with merrymakers. Suddenly a loud shot is heard and the body of Peter Nemo, a barber is discovered. Everyone is questioned. The next morning Carl Verni, a young man of excellent reputation gives himself up. Everyone testifies in favor of young Verni and against the slain barber, a notorious rouge. The result is that Carl is sentenced to six years in prison.

Twenty years later a family of four come to live in Naples. The father, Carl Verni, is uncommunicative to curious neighbors. Each summer the family goes to Salerno, a famous summer resort. There Lydia, the lovely older daughter, attracts the attentions of Andrew Torra, a young engineer, son of Doctor Torra. Unable to meet her any other way, Andrew hires a boat and purposely bumps into Lydia's, confessing immediately that it was his scheme to meet her. Lydia likes him, but, fearful of her father's vigilance, restrains her responses. When the vacation is over, they exchange letters in secret and after two years of anxious waiting, Andrew writes that he can stand the separation no longer and he is arriving to ask her father for her hand. However, the mailman hands the letter to Lydia's father, who, reading, sends his family to Salerno so that he can talk alone to Andrew when he comes. The young man impresses Verni favorably until he reveals that he is the adopted son of Dr. Torra and that his real mother was Lucy Bacci. Verni pales, but conceals his agitation from Andrew and at the first opportunity proceeds to the home of Dr. Torra and tells his story.

As a young man, Carl has fallen in love with Lucy Bacci, wealthy granddaughter of the stern Bacci. He has forbidden the youngsters love until Lucy and Carl have eloped. However Lucy is under age and until Bacci should give his consent they are in the eyes of the law unmarried. Even when Lucy's son is born, Bacci remains stubborn. One day Carl discovers a love letter in Lucy's possession and she explains it comes from Peter Nemo the notorious barber, who had wooed Lucy before the advent of Carl. Despite Lucy's refusals to consider Nemo, the barber insistent, and he laughs at Carl's impotent efforts to protect his home. Carl's mother becomes gravely ill. One night Lucy disappears and Nemo laughs at Carl as he taunts "the lion let the pigeon escape from his mouth." At last Nemo sneers that Carl hasn't the courage to meet him on the Via Dante at eleven. That night on the Via Dante, Carl sees Nemo coming up, drunk, boasting that he will kill Carl at sight. Realizing that Nemo's three companions are assassins, Carl loses his head, kills Nemo, and serves his six year sentence. His mother dies and Lucy disappears. Years later Carl comes to America, marries, has two daughters, and then, for his health returns to Italy.

Andrew and Lydia are half-sister and brother, Andrew, informed, is desperate and enlists for the wars. Soon Lydia, unable to endure remaining at home, goes to the front as a nurse. Her beauty makes her famous among the soldiers, but each face she searches for Andrew. One day while helping Dr. Ralph Pope, she faints as she recognizes the ghastly torn body of Andrew. When she recovers she learns Andrew has died. The doctor comforts her, falling in love. In time Lydia marries the doctor and his unfailing goodness to her, awakens at last her love. Lydia never learns her relationship to Andrew, and Carl Verni sighs deeply.

SHAM

Wilma Michael Drama File No. 11147

EVELYN GLENN, who is in seven months to inherit a fortune, meets Donald Wade, an impecunious young artist. They are immediately attracted to each other, but when Evelyn's guardian, Mrs. Landry discovers it, she hastily sets about forcing Evelyn into a marriage with Tom Taylor, who, she is sure, will guarantee her a large portion of Evelyn's money. Evelyn protests that she does not love Tom, but he makes love to her, convincing her he can teach her to love him. Distracted by the insistence of her guardian and of Tom, Evelyn retires. Soon, wishing to get some pills for a severe headache, she comes downstairs only to hear Tom and Mrs. Landry planning what they will do with Evelyn's money once they get it in their possession. Appalled, Evelyn decides to leave home. Packing a few of her things she seizes the next train out of town and rides aimlessly until she comes to a little town, so beautiful, nestled as it is among the foothills of a mountain, that Evelyn decides to try her luck here. She rents a room and soon gets a position for herself selling in a store. She takes the name of Ruth James and intends remaining under her alias until she reaches her majority and can claim her fortune. One Sunday, as she is walking, she sees an artist painting a particularly lovely scene, and suddenly is startled to hear someone call, "Evelyn!" Approaching, she sees that it is Donald Wade. Delighted, they talk for hours and Evelyn, explaining the circumstances, asks Donald to preserve her alias. He promises and for several days they are together. When Donald returns to Evelyn's home town, Evelyn, who has learned that her guardian has sent out detectives in search of her, fears that Mrs. Landry may be genuinely concerned about her safety. Whereupon she asks Donald to drop a note to Mrs. Landry from her home town, saying that Evelyn is quite safe and happy. However, Donald is seen mailing the note, and when Tom is called in, he puts the idea into Mrs. Landry's head that Evelyn has been kidnapped. A search is instigated for Donald. He does not deny sending the note, but he refuses to divulge Evelyn's hiding place, and Tom maliciously charges him with having kidnapped and disposed of the murdered body of Evelyn. Donald scoffs at the charge, but when he comes to trial, he realizes with a sinking heart, that the jury believes he has actually murdered Evelyn. Meanwhile Evelyn is totally unaware of the furore she has aroused. One day, however, on her employer's desk, she discoverns an old newspaper telling of the convuction of Donald Wade. Hastily she returns to her own town, and convinces the startled neighbors that she is very much alive. She secures Donald's relcase, exposes Tom for the schemer he is, and coming into her fortune, decides that the way of her happiness is to be found only with Donald Wade, the man she loves.

MARQUITA

Violet McConkey Drama File No. 11053

DICK and Madelon Sherwood, descendants of an illustrious line who first settled in Marseille in the eighteenth century, decide to leave the round of gay social activities at their ancestral castle and return to the spot where they spent their honeymoon. Taking their baby, Adele, with them, and leaving Jack, the older child with his grandparents, the two merrily set forth for a cave in the Blue Forest, eager to be "roughing it" together, once again. While Madelon prepares supper over a camp fire, Dick goes out to catch fish for them, happy as a schoolboy on a vacation. A storm arises, and Madelon watches the darkening clouds anxiously as he does not return, comforting her crying baby as best she can. When thunder peals forth, the young wife quakes with fright; meanwhile Dick's boat is upset and he is thrown into the swirling water. With a desperate effort he finally reaches shore where he is found by a passing group of tourists, hours later, and rushed to the hospital. Frantic with worry, Madelon hides their possessions which will serve to identify them in the trunk of a tree, and proceeds with Adele in her arms in search of Dick. When she reaches the stream, overcome with grief and anxiety, she fancies she sees Dick being drawn down, and, placing Adele on the shore, plunges after the apparition, to her doom. Aunt Betsy, an elderly gypsy woman, discovers the baby as her caravan passes by. When she is unable to find anything that will identify the child, she adopts her, rechristening her Marquita.

Years pass, and Marquita grows into a beautiful, dark haired girl, versed in gypsy lore, and adept as a fortune teller. Subsequent searches reveal the metal box which Madelon hid in the tree trunk, and Aunt Betsy resolves to reveal this to the child when she is sixteen. Regarding her as a daughter, Aunt Betsy has reared the girl with all possible care, securing a tutor from the city for her in the winter time, and paying particular heed to the advancement of her musical education. Several offers have come to Marquita to play at concerts in the finest homes in Europe, but these Aunt Betsy has rejected, fearing to lose the girl whom she so loves and has so carefully guarded from all harm. On her sixteenth birthday, Aunt Betsy takes Marquita to the tree where the discovery was made and opens the box, revealing a baby book, ring and picture of her as an infant, also a family Bible which records the birth of her parents, herself and Jack. Torn between desire to find this family to which she belongs and unwillingness to leave Aunt Betsy, Marquita wanders alone in the forest, troubled. To console herself, she plays her guitar and sings a plaintive gypsy melody. A young scoutmaster, in search of his wandering troup, comes upon her. After mutual introductions, she discovers that he is Jack Sherwood, and when she relates her story, he persuades her to return with him to the home of his grandparents. Together with Kyle Stanley, Jack's friend, the three start out the next day, leaving the scouts in care of another master. A forest fire breaks out, amnd Kyle rescues Marquita, while Jack saves the lives of other tourists.

Once more in the castle at Marseille, Marquita's identity is established beyond a doubt, and her grandparents welcome her with joy. The following spring, she becomes the bride of Kyle Stanley, at a beautiful garden ceremony. Although deeply grieved when she learns that her father died in the Battle of Argonne, Marquita faces a happy future as her adored Aunt Betsy makes her home with the young couple.

OUTDOOR GIRL

Esileda Ball Drama File No. 10870

EYES shining and cheeks aglow with health, Betty joins a crowd of her young friends on a toboggan slide at the fashionable resort where she is vacationing with her father, near Lake Michigan. The merry group collide with several young men on another toboggan and Betty feels herself lifted from the snow by one of this group. When she assures him that she is not hurt, introductions seem to be in order, and he presents himself as Jack Trent, a young medical student, who is tutoring a wealthy friend during this Christmas vacation. Betty's father instantly likes the young man, and expresses his approval when she confesses that she is attracted to him. The two are seen together constantly, skating and skiing over the smooth whiteness of the Lake Michigan county. Although it is plain to everyone that the two are deeply in love, Jack says nothing until, when they are hiking alone one afternoon, he impulsively takes Betty in his arms and kisses her. "I had no right to do that, but I could not help it. I love you so," Jack cries, explaining that the difference in their financial and social status is too great for him to take her away from the luxuries to which she has always been accustomed. "But those things mean nothing," Betty assures him. The next day Jack leaves, sending Betty a farewell note in which he states that he loves her too much to drag her into a life of poverty. Heartbroken, she tries vainly to forget him.

The stock market crashes, and Betty's father is left penniless. Overcome with the shock, he is confined to his bed, and after a lingering illness in which Betty is his faithful nurse, he dies, leaving her alone in the world. As she trudges from one employment agency to another, vainly seeking a position, Betty learns that expensive finishing schools do not always provide the best background for young women who must become self supporting. At last she secures work in a department store during the Christmas rush season. Ted Graham, a wealthy friend, pleads with Betty to become his wife and she finally consents, although telling him that she does not love him. Wishing to pay back a debt, Betty will not give up her work at the store until after Christmas when the wedding is planned. Experienced in appraising sport clothes of quality, the former outdoor girl is placed in charge of that department, and as she helps customers to select skiing apparel her mind goes back to those heavenly days at Lake Michigan, two long years ago. Remembering Jack, Betty suddenly telephones Ted during the lunch hour that, although she likes him very much she cannot marry him, as her heart belongs to someone else. Smiling bravely, the girl returns to her post, wishing her customers a joyous Christmas vacation. At last the store closes, and the tired girl prepares to leave. Someone takes her arm gently, as she passes through the door, and she looks up in amazement to see Jack! He congratulates her on her engagement, but she tells him she has broken it. At once, he urges her to marry him, telling her that he now has a splendid position in a leading clinic. When she refuses, thinking he may offer marriage out of sympathy, he reminds her that "financial differences do not matter," and, recalling her own words, she can only give her consent, as she goes to his arms, happy at last. The two plan a honeymoon at Lake Michigan where their love first came to life.

WOMEN WHO LOVE

Lura Cumberland Drama File No. 11159

SCARCELY more than a child, little Juanita listens dazedly to the words that make her the wife of Lee Turner. Soon enough the youngster is to learn the full horror of being married to a man whose drunken brutalities scar her body and soul. When her baby is born, Juanita expects that her husband will change, but he distrusts her and when the child is born with light hair and blue eyes, Lee, whose is dark, refuses to believe the child is his. When Oliver James, who works in the same building with Lee observes the unhappiness of the fragil Juanita, he sympathizes and advises her to get a divorce. Through the months that follow, Oliver lends his support to the frightened girl and when he asks her to marry him, Juanita, never having known any other man, and knowing only that Oliver has been kind to her accepts. Soon after her divorce is final, she is married to Oliver. Juanita tries to be everything Oliver wants her to, but until she sees the happiness of her sister Gloria who is marrying a man she loves, she does not realize how much she has been denied by never having loved anyone herself. Soon Oliver becomes jealous of Juanita's child and makes her unhappy with his constant bickering. When Gloria discovers she can never have a child of her own, she offers to adopt her sister's child. Juanita objects to being separated from her daughter, but Oliver urges her to do it and at last, unable to endure his reproaches longer, Juanita even gives up her baby. Meanwhile Oliver becomes more wrapped up than ever in his business. For hours Juanita sits in her quiet little apartment worrying about her baby, and wondering if she is happy with her sister up north. Denied pretty clothes by her husband who is putting all his money into a new business venture, Juanita tries to content herself sitting at home at night and sewing. But soon her nerves are at the breaking point. Then one day the Church gives a sociable. Oliver promises to take Juanita, but at the last moment something turns up about his business project, and after Juanita is all dressed and ready to go, he calls up to inform her he can't make it. When their friends call for them, Juanita makes excuses, but at last she allows herself to be induced to come without Oliver. At the dance, the first she has been to in many years. Juanita meets James Howell. They laugh as she hesitantly agrees to dance, and although her feet are at first unused to the rhythms, she soon manages to dance with breathtaking grace. For the first time Juanita falls in love. James' jealous wife watches them with hatred in her eyes, but James holds her closer and they realize that struggle as they may they were meant for each other. Thereafter they try to avoid each other, but their hearts cry out for each other and when Oliver, taking advantage of James' regard for Juanita cheats him in a business deal, Juanita feels absolved from any further loyalty. James' wife sues for divorce, taking all his money. Oliver's business prospers, and with the realization that she is leaving security for a life of poverty and hardship, Juanita gives up Oliver and chooses James—and love.

FORCED DOWN

Emmett E. Rader Drama File No. 11076

ENVIOUSLY watching his friend William diving and swimming in the old swimming hole, little Fred recalls his mother's reiterated warnings. Later that day, unable to resist the temptation, Fred decides at least he can swing on the grapevines overhanging the pool. However, to his terror, he is dropped into the water, and as he comes to the surface, he gasps for help. It is William who rescues him and works for an hour to restore his breath to his body. Subsequently, William teaches Fred to swim and Fred vows that some day he will repay him for saving his life.

Some years later, while the two friends are enjoying a circus, William darts ahead, directly in the path of the circus train. Looking back to see if Fred is following, he trips and falls on the track. Fred darts forward to help him, but his own foot catches in a loose board and a husky farm lad pulls William to safety. Humiliated at having failed his friend, Fred creeps away and William finds him grieving . With the coming years William's father sells his farm and Fred receives a few letters from William from different parts of the country, and then they stop altogether.

The years pass. Fred goes to college and falls in love with Irene Mahoney, a vivacious little Irish girl. To her Fred confides his great desire some day to repay William for saving his life. Fred becomes an aviation enthusiast and with the outbreak of the World War, volunteers for service overseas. Kissing Irene goodbye, Fred leaves.

Tumult! Horror!. Wrecked and torn bodies! War!! Once flying his plane over the enemy lines, Fred feels his motor miss. He is forced to land. Hastily he replaces the fouled plugs and is climbing back into the cockpit when he hears a feeble call for help. Rushing to the side of the dying soldier, he finds William, his boyhood chum, crushed under a bombed dugout. Frantically Fred tries to free him but with a brave smile, William dies. Fred returns at the end of the war, a memory haunted man. Irene tries to persuade him to give up flying, but it is in his blood and he finally secures a position flying airmail.

About half way along Fred's route there is a typical western mining town. The inhabitants rush out of doors to see the mail plane pass. Pete Walton, the rough-looking Justice of the Peace, who makes loans on the side, notes with satisfaction the approach of a comely squaw woman, leading her handsome half-breed son. Pete produces fake papers and convinces her that unless she pays up a mortgage she will go to jail . Giving him all but a few dollars of her savings, Nona leaves, only to be pursued by Pete. At the point of her gun she forces him to let her go. Pete kidnaps her child and Nona is frantic. One day, flying his plane over the hills, Fred is forced down to fix his engine and sees Nona struggling with Pete. She falls and strikes her head. Pete starts running, but at the point of his gun, Fred forces him to lift the unconscious girl into his plane. In her locket, Fred discovers a picture of William Stanley, whose widow she is. It is Fred who recovers her kidnapped son for her, and securing a release from Irene, Fred marries the lovely Nona, protecting her from all further harm, and sealing at last the obligation he could never repay his boyhood pal in life.

GRAFT

H. Louis Layton Drama File No. 10981

NEW comer on the police force, Jerry Kilguor, broad shouldered and keen eyed, smiles incredulously at tales of his fellow patrolmen accepting bribes. However, when his son Jimmy gets infantile paralysis and Jerry finds that within his limited income he is unable to procure a nationally known specialists, he learns that simply by overlooking the fact that the big business men of the town park their cars all day on restricted streets, he can collect monthly a neat little sum. At first he salves his conscience by assuring himself there is nothing wrong in not handing out summonses wholesale, but as Jimmy is cured and he begins to realize the power of money, Jerry begins noticing things about him. One day, while off duty, he notices a truck pull up in front of a supposed vegetable market. Investigation proves the truck is carrying bootleg liquor, and again Jerry pockets a tidy little sum. For the first time the fear of money difficulties cease to oppress him. He buys a home, a car, and when the bank clerk comments on his increase in bank balance, Jerry begins to realize he may evoke suspicion. Accordingly instead of deposits, Jerry begins making investments in apartment houses and stocks, advice about which he receives from the leaders of finance in his district. Meanwhile his children receive the best in clothes, food and education. His wife, under the windfall of affluence changes from a simple good woman, to a bridge playing matron, who finds it necessary to outdo her neighbors in clothes and jewels. Meanwhile, Jerry sinks lower and lower, accepting splits from slot machines, speakeasies, and even a shady boarding house. His personal bravery in capturing the robbers of one of the "protected" speakeasies brings him official praise, but it is the speakeasy proprietor, Tony, who puts money in Jerry's pocket for his work.

With the passing years Jerry changes completely from an affable, likeable young man, to a calculating, shrewd fellow who many have cause to fear. Then one day Jerry learns his only daughter Mary has eloped with a dapper young man whose business Jerry is unable to ascertain. His only comfort is her long telegrams telling him how happy she is, and that she will be home soon. Learning that one of his fellow officers is anxious to return home to see his new born son, Jerry offers to take his heat for the night, and when he sees a truck stealthily loaded he comes forward to exact his graft. However, the crooks open fire and Jerry returns it, managing to blow his police whistle before he sinks into unconsciousness from his wounds. Awakening in the hospital, Jerry hears the groans of one of his victims in the next bed, and to his horror learns he has shot his own son, Jimmy, who dies with a plea for forgiveness on his lips. Jerry sinks into a coma and weeks later emerges from the hospital to learn that his stocks all bought on margin, have been wiped out.

Crippled from the bullet wounds he has sustained, and broke, Jerry emerges from the hospital to face life anew, only to receive the final blow when he learns his daughter has committed suicide after her husband has been shot to death by rival gangsters. But tragedy brings Jerry and his wife closer together, and back where he was twenty years ago, but without family, home or fortune, Jerry and his wife accept the positions of Superintendent and Matron of an Orphan Asylum and at last find peace and contentment for their declining years.

DARK OF THE MOON

Pauline B. Lander Mystery File No. 11204

AS HE stands on the deck of the S. S. Stanhope, Raymond Currier sees the coast of England slowly coming into view. A week before he had been private secretary to the president of the Jones Shoe Company. While assorting his employer's mail he came across one addressed to himself from a firm of attorney's in England. Amazed he learned that a Mrs. Lavinia Moss, supposed to have been an aunt of his, had left all her property in England to him. Securing a vacation, Raymond leaves to investigate.

For hours Raymond cools his heels in the crowded waiting room of the solicitors, meanwhile, fascinated by the grace and prettiness of the secretary Phyllis Wales. The girl looks at him with interest when she learns who he is, and before he gains his interview, he has persuaded Phyllis to have lunch with him. From the lawyers Raymond receives a letter written by Mrs. Moss. From it Raymond learns that Lavinia was the sister of Raymond's father. When Raymond Sr. had been left a fortune, Lavinia had coveted it, and shortly afterwards she was to meet Moss, who urged her to get the fortune from her brother by persuading him to invest in worthless securities. Only after considerable pleading was her brother persuaded to invest his fortune. Lavinia and Moss, whom she married, then fled to England purchasing an old castle where their son Charles was born. Within a year Moss fled taking all he could of the fortune with him. Shortly after, Lavinia learned that her brother had died. When her son Charlie turned out to be a worthless scamp, Lavinia decided to leave her fortune to her brother's son, Raymond. Touched, in spite of himself, by the pathos of the letter and the grief of the dead woman over her scapegrace son and husband, Raymond determines to investigate his property, which has been unoccupied since Lavinia's death three years ago.

At lunch with Phyllis, Raymond learns more about his aunt Lavinia whom everybody had liked and pitied. Also he learns that Charlie and the housekeeper had disappeared immediately after the death of Lavinia. Phyllis begs Raymond to take a gun with him and to be careful. It is the old cab driver, however, who informs Raymond that the house is reputed to be haunted. And that the only neighbors within a half mile radius have been forced to move by ghostly noises and lights. Into the dust covered house, Raymond walks, while the rain pelts dismally on the roof. After inspecting the house carefully with the light of his flashlight, Raymond retires, his pistol within reach. During the night he fancies he hears noises, but attributes it to the storm. The next morning he is having breakfast when he realizes the stove is free of dust! With his pistol cocked he begins a thorough investigation. Accidentally he discovers a button in back of a book shelf and a small door swings open behind the piano. Traversing the tiny passage he comes upon a woman. She questions him sharply, but Raymond at the point of his gun forces her to confess that she was Lavinia's housekeeper, secretly married to Charlie. Charlie, learning that his mother was leaving her fortune to her nephew, had poisoned the tea his wife was carrying and convincing his wife that she would be suspected, had forced her to live in the house with him. Together they had caused the ghostly noises that had frightened off intruders. Raymond causes the arrest of Charlie for the murder of Lavinia, the housekeeper is pardoned, and Raymond takes over the castle and in time the pretty Phyllis for his wife.

MY PARADISE

Melva Christensen Drama File No. 11154

A KEEN sense of loneliness overcomes Louise Struchen in England where she has come with her father. Louise meets Ann Sabine, daughter of one of her father's business associates and at a hospital benefit to which Ann has reluctantly consented to come, Louise meets Nicholas Raskelly, a young Russian violinist. Nick and Louise fall in love with each other, but Ann, jealous of them, arouses the antagonism of the snobbish, money-conscious Mr. Struchen and the young people are forced to meet clandestinely. At length, unable to endure separation, Nick and Louise are married while the latter's father is making a flying trip to Germany. For several days the young honeymooners live in a state of happiness inexpressible and Nick composes a haunting melody, "My Paradise." However, Ann notifies Mr. Struchen who forces Louise to return to the United States with him. Meanwhile, Nick, who has gone out to get himself a violin string, is involved in the holdup of a jewelry store and when he recovers consciousness from the blow the bandit gave him, he discovers that he is accused of the murder of the jeweler. In vain he protests his innocence. Louise writes to Ann, begging her to forward messages to Nick, but Ann, pride wounded because she has loved and lost Nick, distorts the messages to state that Louise has no further use for Nick. At the same time Ann lies about Nick's messages to her so that Louise at length forced to believe, withholds from her husband the knowledge that a child has been born to their marriage. Years pass. The murderer whose crime Nick is paying for is shot and confesses his guilt. Nick, freed, proceeds to America where he begins a long but fruitless search for his wife. At length, despairing of ever finding her, he turns to supporting himself by giving violin lessons. Soon he takes on as a protege Richard Burton, a lad with an extraordinary musical talent. Meanwhile Louise brings up their child Rose with every advantage. When Rose early displays a talent for the violin, inherited from her father, Louise employs the best teacher she can find to improve the child's technique. At length Rose reaches the finals of a national violin contest, reached also by Nick's pupil Richard Burton. The concert hall is crowded to overflowing. Richard's playing is greeted with salvos of applauses. Then Rose steps to the rostrum and as the mellow tones of her violin sing out, the crowd listens in hushed silence. Encore after encore is demanded and at last she plays a lovely little tune which her mother has taught her. "My Paradise." Tenderly Nick listens to the playing of the composition no one knows save his Louise. Then as the last note dies away, he sinks heavily to the floor. In the attendant confusion, Louise who has come to hear her daughter play, recognizes Nick, and as the concert hall slowly clears, Nick and Louise are left alone together after many years, and young Richard and Rose are to experience in their turn, the joys of first love.

FORGOTTEN

CHRISTMAS DAY! Peter Williams sighs at the joy of his employees each of whom he has given an unexpected bonus. Walking down the street towards home, Peter buys his daily paper from Tom Hawkins, the young news lad who is going to school evenings on the proceeds of his news stand. With the coin that Peter gives for his newspaper, Peter presses a large gold piece into the hands of the grateful boy, and with a "Merry Christmas." proceeds on his way. Entering his own home, he kisses his wife Mary and with his son David, and David's fiancee Lillian enters the festive dining room for a holiday dinner.

Years pass. Peter's hair is white now. Mary has gone to her rest, and David and Lillian are married. When his first grandchild is born, Peter makes his son an equal partner in his flourishing business. Peter's greatest happiness comes from bringing home gifts to his little grandson, but now Peter and David are having many altercations. David disapproves of the conservative manner in which his father has always run his business and when Peter proves that his business has always thrived, David shouts that if Peter weren't such a cautious old fool he would have been a millionaire long ago. Only Peter's kindliness saves David from the disrespects of Peter's employees. However, in the business of expansion, Peter remains steadfastly opposed. The Depression sets in. Prices drop. Peter remarks gently that it was just as well they didn't buy at high prices. However, David's face goes ashen white, and Peter almost collapses when he learns that, in opposition to Peter, David has stocked a tremendous supply of merchandise in. Everything must be sold at a loss. Prices fall every day. The firm is wiped out. Peter uses his private resources so that the last of his creditors can be paid a hundred cents on the dollar. As he turns for the last time from his beloved factory, he suffers a stroke and is brought home. Lillian, who has always treated him respectfully, now, finding his care added to her other burdens, turns from him, denying him the aid he needs. Miserable, lonely Peter ages rapidly. David is so discouraged he makes no attempt to find work while Peter's suggestions are rudely ignored. At last David manages to find a job at a few dollars a week. Peter feels that his food is begrudged him, and when one day, Lillian shouts at him claiming he has spoiled David, and it is all his fault that misfortune has come to them, she asks why Peter doesn't go out and beg for his food. Peter recoils in horror, but as his grandchild cries he is hungry, and Lillian looks accusingly at Peter, the old man slowly returns to his own room and determines to go out and beg. However, once on the street, Peter cannot bring himself to ask for alms. All day he tries, but he returns at night to a park bench without having had the courage to ask anybody. The next day, pricked by hunger, he swallows his pride and asks for alms, only to be rudely shoved aside and ignored. He wanders toward the river, only to realize that is the coward's way out. Again he makes his way up Main Street. Suddenly he hears his name called. Wincing he turns to see Tom Hawkins, well dressed now. Tom takes Peter in for some hot soup and learning something of what has happened, informs Peter that he has graduated and been offered an office position. He was to give up his news stand anyway. Why shouldn't Peter take it? So, once more, Peter finds himself with a business of his own, one that can sustain him at least. And from his small earnings, Peter finds his happiness, in sending his grandchild through school, and helping David and Lillian to get on their own feet once more.

THE BETRAYAL

L. Kincade Drama File No. 10968

ALL through her childhood, Jane's father had lavished expensive clothes upon her, and at school, where her lovely voice attracted attention, she easily stood out from the other children. From his distance, Teddy, youngest son of a hard working family, adored her in silence. Then, when Jane's father died, feeling that there was nothing left to tie her to the small town, she left for the city. There, finding a position, she decided to have her voice trained. Discouraged by the high fees of all the musical teachers she sought, Jane finally appealed to Winthrop Carroll, noted musician. His eyes lit up at sight of her fragile beauty, and drawing her to the piano, he gave her an audition. Scarcely hearing her voice, his eyes traced the delicate lines of her face and body, and as she finished and paused uncertainly, he rubbed his hands together and exclaimed, "Wonderful! wonderful!" Jane's face flushed, and as Carroll patted her shoulder encouragingly, he informed her he would take her on as a protege. Scarcely believing her good fortune, Jane returned to her room light headedly. So began her studies under the tutelage of the great Carroll. Hours of hard practice, and always the encouragement of the maestro. Little pats of enthusiasm, embraces, kisses on the forehead, these Jane accepted, and when one day he swept her into his arms and told her she is a genius, and that he loved her, Jane's senses reeled. Carroll induced her to give up her other work and devote all her time to music, and when she protested that she had no other source of income, he assured her she was a genius and he wanted nothing better than to pay her board and expenses. Wavering, Jane accepted, and with it, Carroll's impassioned love and bright plans for the future. Once Teddy wrote, telling her if ever she needed him, he would come, but all that seemed very far away. Then came a woman to see Jane. Graciously Jane received her, only to learn that she was Carroll's wife. Taken aback, Jane heard her tell of Carroll's other loves, and how, after each, Carroll had come back to his wife and child. Tortured by the revelation, Jane went on with her concert. She found the critics all took for granted Carroll's interest in her career, and as she read the reviews, she realized that they were all tactful, afraid of Carroll's displeasure. Realizing that her voice never had the possibilities, Carroll had told her of, and haunted by the memory of his wife's pleading, Jane agreed to give Carroll up in spite of his assurance that she was the most beautiful woman he had ever known, and even if his wife wouldn't divorce him, they could be happy together.

Remembering the careful praise of the critics, Jane tried to get a position singing, but everywhere she was turned away, and realizing that there was nothing left for her, she drank poison. The newspapers gave space to the attempted suicide of Winthrop Carroll's discarded sweetheart, and Jane moaned in her hospital bed as the doctor informed her she could never sing again. But it was Teddy, who, seeing the papers, took courage to come to Jane and persuade her to return with him as his wife whom, in spite of everything, he would always love and cherish. And with him Jane was to find at last, happiness.

S. E. Ray Drama File No. 11015

BECAUSE she cannot tell her mother of the unwelcome, furtive attentions of her adopted brother, Elain flees to an unloved marriage for escape. A friend of the family, Charles, her husband, takes her to the railroad camp where he works. In a few weeks, she is completely disillusioned—her husband is a drunkard, a man of violent disposition. She sees no escape, having been brought up to believe wedlock sacred. The only young, attractive woman in the camp, she catches the attention of Mike Daniels, wealthy superintendent. He bribes Charles to encourage his visits to their home, and Elain cannot help feeling flattered at his obvious admiration. But when Charles suggests sharing his wife with Daniels, Elain decides she has reached the end. Afraid of being beaten, she stalls Charles off until she can secretly return home. Knowing how faithfully her family heeds the Biblical admonishment that a wife should cleave to her husband, Elain tells them she is back for a short rest. That night she wakes to find her foster brother, McAdams, standing near her bed. Only after a silent prolonged struggle in which she sustains several bruises does she succeed in driving him away. But now she realizes the old home can no longer be a refuge and she has no alternative but to return to camp. Meanwhile Daniels learns of her absence and threatens to fire Charles if he does not bring her back and reassure Elain that he regrets his past actions. With Elain's unexpected return, she finds a contrite Charles and Daniels who promises to confine himself to a platonic relationship in the future. A new man, Raymond, joins the camp and both men warn her of his reputation as "lady-charmer." At a dance that week-end, Elain first encounters him. Their first dance together lengthens into several, and before the night ends Elain knows that no other man has ever attracted her so strongly and that Raymond feels that way also. Alarmed at this, Daniels bribes Charles to desert her so he can court her openly. Elain is left penniless and Daniels offers her a position in the camp office. Gradually, he accustoms her to the little luxuries and comforts that only money can obtain. To eliminate competition, Daniels sends Raymond to another end of the camp, 20 miles away. When her divorce decree is granted, Daniels throws a large party. At the height of it, he persuades Elain to marry him at once. Only after the ceremony, when she looks up to see the stricken eyes of Raymond does the full import of her act impress itself. Once again she has married without love, only now she is in love with another man. Several months later, she believes she has forgotten Raymond, until she meets him unexpectedly, and learns that he is to be married. That night she tries to kill herself. When she recovers, she learns she is to have a child. At last realizing the love he has deprived her of, Daniels offers to divorce her after the child is born. But it is too late for that she assures him. She must build her life on a new basis, seeking happiness through her child. When Daniels is stricken with an incurable illness, several years have passed. One night the phone rings, it is Raymond who has regained his freedom. At last their love which has survived the years will reach its happy ending.

ONE MARRIAGE

Fred Valway Drama File No. 11010

AT three, Lloyd Moore learns that if he screams long enough, his nurse will give him all the toys he wants, and he acts accordingly as he approaches manhood. Heir of a large estate which has been in the family for generations, he turns his affairs over to a steward and devotes his time to more amusing pursuits. Invited to a masquerade ball one night, Lloyd decides to go stag, temporarily tired of his flock of feminine admirers. He is almost instantly attracted to a girl simply dressed in a nun's costume. Securing an introduction to Betty, Lloyd refuses to allow anyone else to dance with her and is his most charming self during the next few hours. When he asks to see her again, Betty is afraid because her family is only moderately placed and she knows that Lloyd is wealthy. Lloyd promisese not to reveal his right identity when he visits her. The modest surroundings of her home please Lloyd and he grows ashamed of his spendthrift past. Meanwhile, his steward, Richardson, knows Betty since childhood, and has always planned to marry her. He is astonished and enraged when he learns the two are engaged and that her father does not know Lloyd's real position. When Lloyd has to go away for a few days, Richardson gets permission to sell some of his property for a hospital site. Ignorrant of his business holdings, Lloyd does not realize that some of his land includes Betty's home. Richardson then goes to Mr. Masters and tells him that despite his pleas, Lloyd had ordered the Masters' house to be sold and that they have a week to find a new place. He also tells him that Lloyd is the man whom Betty is planning to marry, deceiving her father. The two decide that Lloyd is seeking a hold on Masters which will give him Betty without marriage. After a terrible scene with Betty, her father forces her to go to London with him at once. The letter she smuggles to Lloyd is confiscated and when Lloyd returns he is bewildered to find no trace of Betty; the house is locked and the Masters' housekeeper refuses to talk. No longer happy with his life of playboy, Lloyd tries to lose himself in work though the alarmed steward tries to discourage him. Going over the business records one evening, Lloyd first learns that the old Masters' house is sold and that he is the seller. Furious, he wishes to discharge the steward who convinces him that he conducted the transaction innocently. Persuades that out of this misunderstanding has come his present unhappiness, he hires detectives to trace his sweetheart. Richardson decides it is unwise to stay with Lloyd any longer and resigns. In London, he calls on Betty and tells her that she is forgotten and Lloyd has someone else. When Richardson asks her to marry him, she agrees and wants the wedding at once. It will help her kill her love for the undeserving Lloyd. A report is sent to Lloyd by the detectives who trace Richardson's destination, and the young man leaves at once for London. In the garden he finds the Masters, and Richardson with his arm around Betty. Ordered to leave, he slaps his ex-steward and promises him a beating if he does not tell Betty's father that he knew nothing of the eviction. Mr. Masters apologizes and leaves Betty and Lloyd alone. The church bells nearby chime a prophetic happy tune.

THE MOONLIGHT MURDER

Henry J. Charest Mystery File No. 11073

LIVING in a sleepy New England town and hedged by all the constraints a strongly puritan grandmother places on youth, Helen frequently sneaks to Joe Dupont's drug store where the fast group hangs out. By accident, Helen overhears a conversation which reveals that Joe is the head of a liquor selling ring, forging government prescriptions. To keep her mouth shut, Joe offers a large sum of money if she will act as a decoy on one of their trips. Joe gives her a gun so she will feel safe but he does not reveal that it is unloaded. On the trip, a police car opens fire on them and Helen, afraid of being caught, draws her gun when he companions do. The next day when Joe learns a detective has been killed in the battle, he is afraid that Helen will talk, so he convinces her that her gun killed the man. Helen flees to New York; there she meets and marries a man who claims to be a jewelry salesman. After her child is born, Harry confesses that he is really a thief, one of the cleverest in the country. He threatens to kill her if she tries to leave him. One day Harry rushes in and tells her they must pack up and run. He's just taken the famous Mandow collection of diamonds and the police are on the trail.

Helen suggests her hometown as a place where none will suspect. For two months everything moves serenely until Joe tries to blackmail her, not aware that her husband already knows her past. Meanwhile Harry makes friends with Bob, the hotel clerk, and after a while sounds him out on a proposition to set up a rival racket to Joe. But when he hears of the blackmailing, he decides to wipe out Joe. Pretending friendship, Harry goes out with Joe to a party. Late that night when the two are returning home, Harry confides to Joe that his car is bullet proof and persuads him to go out and watch Harry demonstrate. When Joe is being led towards the woods, he grows suspicious but Harry laughs and mocks him for being afraid. "You'd better stand a little over to the side so if the glass does break you won't be cut," Harry warns. As Joe starts obeying, Harry pulls out his gun and shoots him three times. The next day when Joe's friends ask for him, Harry pretends ignorance for in the confusion of the party the two are not seen to leave together. When Helen hears that he and Bob are planning to take over Joe's gang, she grows frightened for Harry has promised to go straight. One day she goes secretly to Bob's room to plead with him when Harry comes. Jealously he accuses Bob of illicit relationship with his wife, and threatens to kill him. "Like you did Joe?" Bob taunts. As Harry reaches for his gun, he does not notice Tony, Joe's old bodyguard, standing in the doorway where he hears Bobs accusation. The bullet streaks from Tony's silencer and Harry crumples to the floor. Bob rushes after Tony and to Helen's astonishment declares him under arrest. Then he turns to her and reveals that he is really a Department of Justice agent after the diamonds Harry stole. As he marches off with his prisoner, Helen asks wistfully if she will ever see him again. "As often as you'll allow me," he promises.

SALVATION

Mrs. John Merrill Drama File No. 11161

JOHN MERELY, An American Army officer is sent to Lawag, to relieve the beseiged town. There he hears reports of native uprisings and cruelties. The supply of food he has brought with him is eagerly devoured by the inhabitants who have slowly been starving because of the native guard about the town. Following John's arrival with the advance supplies, a detachment of soldiers and provisions are to arrive. Days pass without the anticipated relief. Pangs of hunger are again felt. Unable to endure the inactivity, John decides to organize a scouting party. Among those who can guide him, most are married with large families of dependents. By lot John finally secures the Mayor, Lee Simons, and the schoolteacher, Frank Craig, to accompany him into the mountains. As they are riding a bolo knife whizzes through the air, straight toward Lee's head. Realizing its certain message of death, John instantaneously pushes Lee aside, sustaining, in so doing, a severe wound. Fainting from loss of blood, John manages to wheel in his saddle and fire point blank at the gloating native, whose career is thus ended. Slowly John sags in his saddle, and as he directs the Mayor to get bandage from his kit and bind the wound, his glazed eyes see Lee and Frank in conference. Impatiently he reminds them his wound is serious, but Lee, glancing over the scant supplies which are to last them decides that by eliminating John there will be more food for the surviving two. Whereupon, coldbloodedly they spur their horses and ride away leaving John moaning in agony upon the ground. Twice John calls after them, then is still.

When he regains consciousness he is in a tiny hut in the mountains. To his utter amazement he sees a woman bending over him. He tries to talk but gently she advises him to rest. He closes his eyes again and when hours later, after another long sleep awakens, he finds that his face is overgrown with a thick matting of hair. "How long have I been here?" he asks in wonder, and learning that for two weeks he has been delirious, he sighs deeply. Under Juanita's tender care John is to regain his health, and a strong admiration is to grow in him for Juanita. She tells him how she was coming home when she saw his body lying in the dust. She had brought him back with her and nursed him back to health. Seeing what a splendid woman she is, John is filled with amazement that she should be living alone, in the mountains. At last she tells him. She taught school but the Mayor of the town had tried again and again to force his attentions upon her, and when one day he had kissed her brutally, she had slapped his face hard. Livid with rage he had sworn that she'd regret it, and had, accordingly broken down her reputation, convinced the townspeople that Juanita was unfit to be near their children, and they had driven her from town. John's sympathy is changed to fury when he learns that the name of the Mayor was Lee Simons. He returns to the town, where his presence causes astonishment, as reports marked him dead. Confronting the cravenly Lee, and the teacher who had replaced Juanita, John exposes them both. They are driven from town, and turned loose in the mountains alone and defenceless as they had left John. Juanita, whom John brings back, is officially re-instated, and in time she and John, falling in love with each other, are married.

THE HAND OF DESTINY

Alexander Weston Brooks Drama File No. 11199

FROM his window Bob watches with admiration the lilting steps of pretty Eleanor Blake. Suddenly his fist clenches as he sees the way of the little girl blocked by one of the town ruffians, and as Eleanor tries to get past, the bully puts his foot out and trips her. Bob races down to the scene and as the bully refuses to apologize, Bob engages him in a fist fight. Sustaining a black eye, Bob helps Eleanor on her way and returns to his home. However, when Bob's father sees the black eye he says grimly, "Fighting again?" and taking his son by the ears administers a severe beating. Bruised and smarting with the injustice, Bob wanders down toward the beach. Suddenly he hears light steps behind him and Eleanor seats herself besides him, putting her arm comfortingly about his shoulder.

Soon after Bob's family moves. He grows up and gets an important position in a firm owned by Marie Douglass, a wealthy widow, some years older than Bob. Finding her sympathetic to his career, Bob soon forms a firm friendship with her, confiding to her his love for little Eleanor. One summer on his vacation he returns to his old town and meets again Eleanor Blake, now grown to be the belle of the town. At the country dance, he has a difficult time getting a dance with the popular Eleanor and fearing lest the other men cut in on their dance, he suggests they walk down toward the beach. Alone in the moonlight, Bob kisses Eleanor, and as he has always planned he tells her of his love. Within a few days he has placed his engagement ring on her finger and they are to be married as soon as Bob gets the raise he has been promised. However, Marie sends Bob out of town on business and when Bob returns, Eleanor begins to realize that Marie is doing everything possible to separate them. She begs Bob to leave his position, but he says, "Don't you realize positions are hard to get these days?" When Eleanor, time and again assured that she is right in feeling that Marie hates her, tries to urge Bob to break away from Marie, Bob, distracted by other worries, accuses Eleanor of being jealous and unreasonable, and, for the first time they quarrel. Eleanor returns Bob's ring, and Bob works furiously at the office. Marie notices him working over time, and coming in to his room, looks over his shoulder at what he is doing. She sympathizes with him, telling him he is well rid of Eleanor. When Bob discovers that Eleanor has left town, having seen the reflection of Bob and Marie on the window shade, he is utterly forlorn. Marie kisses him and he is returning her embrace, when, realizing what a fool he is making of himself, he breaks away from her. Furious at being rebuffed, Marie tells Bob she can get plenty of young men who would be more grateful. Realizing how intuitively right Eleanor had been in her judgment of Marie, Bob is overcome with remorse. Each evening he wanders toward the beach where he and Eleanor had kissed for the first time. One day he hears soft steps behind him, and turning he peers incredulously into the pale face of Eleanor who has come here too to recapture the past. And together they set forth again. With Eleanor's encouragement Bob is to find another position and happiness in marriage with the girl he loves.

MY SON

Alice Cade Drama File No. 10866

A KNOCK is heard at the door one wintry night; opening it, Margery Blaine discovers a man standing on the threshold with his infant son in his arms. Admitting him, she listens sympathetically while he tells her that since the death of his beloved wife he has had no home for the little fellow, and, unwilling to turn him over to an aunt who does not want him, has brought him here, hoping that Margery, who has lost her own baby, he has heard, will care for this one. Margery tells him that it is not she, but her married sister, who lives across the river who has lost a child. As she makes the child comfortable, she notices that the stockings he wears are not mates, and smiles at a father's awkwardness in dressing the baby. After dinner the stranger, whose name is Will Thorp, sets out across the river with little Willie and Margery's father for the home of Helen, her married sister. Won by the beauty of the child, Helen readily agrees to adopt it. In the days that follow, the little fellow becomes a favorite with the entire family. Roy Crowley, who loves Margery, wistfully suggests that it would be nice if they had a youngster as he watches her playing with Willie, but she vetoes the idea. Work is found on a nearby farm for Mr. Thorp so that he can visit his child each week, and he proves a devoted father. A friendship develops between Mr. Thorp and Margery, which Roy watches with some anxiety, fearing it may culminate in marriage, since the attraction is mutual, and Will seems to long for a home.

Some weeks later, a woman appears, haggard and worn, claiming that little Willie is her son who has been kidnapped by his father. When she proves these charges by displaying the mates to the stockings the youngster wore when they first knew him, and pictures of the boy and his father, Mr. Blaine agrees to take her across the river as soon as weather permits. Unable to be separated longer from her boy, she says that she will make the journey alone that very night, ignoring storm signals. Mr. Blaine, however, will not permit this, and escorts her on the dangerous mission. When she clasps her child to her, tears of joy pour down her cheeks, and all are convinced that she is his mother. At first, the child does not recognize her, so changed is she by weeks of worry over his loss, but when she tells him that Enoch and Charles, her two sons by a former marriage, are waiting for him, he smiles happily and cries: "Mother!" Mr. Thorp appears at Margery's home, stating that he is on his way to see his little boy. Feeling that it is best to prevent this meeting until the matter has been settled, Margery hastens across the river to warn the family. As she is driving, the storm breaks out and the bridge is swept away. Roy, learning from the servant what has happened to his sweetheart, hastens to the rescue, and plunges into the water just as Margery is being swept away, eventually taking her to shore and to her home.

When Mr. Thorp confronts his wife he at first denies her identity, then confesses that he took the child when he saw her in conversation with her first husband, fearing that she meant to return to him and he might lose the little fellow whom he loved so dearly. When she explains that she and her former husband were discussing property settlement of her farm he begs forgiveness and they resolve to start all over again. Meanwhile, Margery promises to become Roy's bride, adding that she only hopes their little son will be as adorable as Willie, while Roy assures her that he cannot fail to be.

ONE CLEAR CALL

Ida M. Hubbs Drama File No. 11034

THROUGH the blinding snow, John heads toward home. As he comes up the walk leading to his home, he whistles, "Somewhere a voice is calling." Flinging open the door, he looks about for his little mother who always runs to greet him. However, tonight there is only silence. He calls anxiously and goes through the entire house. Then the newsboy comes up the walk and as John takes the paper he sees with horror that his mother has been struck by an automobile and taken to the Good Sister's hospital. A moment later the telephone jangles and the hospital calls to confirm the accident. Drawing in his breath sharply, John rushes to the hospital. The doctor explains gravely that there is scarcely a chance that his mother can live, but they never give up hope. Frantically John pleads with them to get the best doctors, the best nurses available and Mary Summer, gentle brown eyes sympathetic to John in his grief, enters. Through her tender and faithful ministrations, Mother slowly begins to improve and the doctors proclaim Mary Summer a miracle worker. When at last John can return to work, Mary calls him intermittently to report his mother's fine progress to him. Then one day Mary receives a visit from Victor Staunton, a wealthy admirer of hers. Mary reminds him that last time he had withdrawn his offer of marriage when she insisted on bringing her little nephew into her home. Victor drops his eyes and tells her he was wrong. He realizes it now. If Mary will come with him he will provide for her sister's orphaned child. He will give her evry thing she wants "except love," Mary puts in. However, when she tells John that Victor has come back for her, John withholds the fact that he loves Mary, feeling that he has no right to ask her to share his poverty when Victor can offer her so much. Mrs. Henley is well enough to be able to be entrusted to the care of another nurse, and Mary Summer leaves to be married to Victor. However, soon Mrs. Henley, nerves shattered by a succession of incompetent nurses suffers a relapse. Beside himself with anxiety, John proceeds to Mary's house. It is a week before Mary is to be married to Victor. Mary sits at the piano playing, and her hands pick out John's favorite song, "Somewhere a voice is calling." When John tells of his mother's relapse, Mary prepares to go with him immediately. Victor enters and discovering that Mary is going out on one of her cases, loses his temper and shouts that he is wealthy enough so that she won't have to do any nursing. Mary tries to make him understand that she isn't doing this for money, but because it is a matter of life and death. Standing aside, Victor melodramatically informs her if she goes with John, he is through. Without a moment's hesitation, Mary goes to Mrs. Henley, and once again woos her back to life. The little house blooms under the skillful touch of Mary Summer, and Mrs. Henley adores the girl. One day Mary brings her nephew to the Henley home. The little fellow instantly feels at home, and when John comes in calls him, "Uncle John." Scarcely believing, John looks over toward Mary who is averting her crimson face, and as he asks inoredulously, "May I be his uncle," Mary turns smiling toward him—and their lips meet.

NO PLACE LIKE HOME

Larkin Pate Comedy File No. 11155

MR. David Brown rushed into the house brandishing a newspaper. As his wife looked at him in amazement, David shrieked, "Look, look, David Brown, winner of grand prize of ten thousand dollars in Girley Doiley Contest." Fitting her spectacles to her nose, Mary read the announcement, but turning to her husband refused to believe that he had won it, and when David announced that he had drawn his savings from the local bank and was traveling to New York to collect his prize, Mary continues to regard him as though he were mad. Beside himself with excitement, David hastily began packing, and when Mary tried to stop him chattered that he wasn't going to give up ten thousand dollars just because some fool woman didn't believe the newspapers. Mary tried to stop him. David retreated, stumbling over the end table and bringing down Mary's antique vase. As she wailed, the lamp against which David had humped in falling, tumbled over, and the shade landed plump on top of David's head, sitting there like some Chinese hat. Vainly David tried to pull it off, barking his foot against the andirons and shrieking with pain, while he hopped about on one foot and tenderly massaged the other with both hands. Meanwhile Mary was unconcernedly swinging in her favorite rocker. In freeing himself of the lampshade hat, David inadvertently flung it in Mary's direction. Believing that her husband had struck her deliberatedly, Mary rose, frightened, to do his bidding. Packing his bags without demur, she calls the lazy colored helper to drive David to the station. Boarding the train, David, in his excitement, lost his balance. His suitcase opened revealing the red flannel underdrawers which Mary had insisted on his taking with him. Red as a beet, David gathered his belongings together and climbed aboard, throwing himself heavily in his seat, and sighing deeply. When David recovered himself, he saw a striking blonde sitting next to him. "Ahem!" he coughed but she moved as far away from him as possible. Later, in the dining car, while everyone ate supper, David pulled out the lunch Mary had prepared for him, and while everyone snickered, David wistfully finished his banana. Back in his car, David pulled out his pipe and started puffing away. Clouds of smelly smoke came forth and the horrified ladies called the conductor. David was shown to the smoking car. When he finished he returned only to discover that his seat was nowhere to he found. After charging madly hither and yon, David was informed that the berths had been made up. The porter indicated his upper. David peeked into the lower where the blonde lay. A pleased smile overspread his features only to vanish as she delivered a resounding slap. The next morning in the diner, David spilled his coffee on the blonde's dress. "Fool!" she shouted, but David explained he was going to collect his ten thousand and was nervous.

When he showed her the article, the blonde became more friendly. Ten thousand! With all the cooing and smoothing by the blonde, David began to forget he was forty-six. Mary was long since obliterated. "New York!" the conductor bellowed and with the blonde's arm tucked through his, David proceeded to the Girley Doiley Co. Repeatedly informed that the president was in conference, David tried to force his way in and was hurled to the street. Brushing off the seat of his trousers, David demanded admittance once again. A slap was heard from the president's office and his secretary quit. David marched in—holding forth the paper. The marks of the girl's hand livid on his cheek, the furious president of the Girley Doiley Co. informed David that another David Brown had won and collected the money. David's blonde, seeing she had been misled turned her back on David and went in to take the job just vacated by the former secretary While David, woefully counting his seventy cents, took the train back, murmuring sadly, "There's no-o place like home—I guess."

SONG OF THE CITY

Harry T. Hagen Drama File No. 11197

JOHN is lying under a car adjusting the carburctor and singing at the top of his voice. A car drives up and stops at the automobile tank. He doesn't hear it. A woman in the car listens to John's singing a few moments then honks her horn. The voice stops suddenly and John hurries out to render service. Mae Navarre asks for gas and oil and as John accepts the money, she tells him he has a wonderful voice and shouldn't he wasting his time in a dirty garage. She tells him she is the owner of a night club in New York City and giving him her address advises him to use it if he ever wants a job. A few days later John gets into a quarrel with his employer because he sings instead of attending to business, and John quits. He decides to accept Mae's offer and start singing at the night club. Soon he is a hit. One night a party of social registrites come in. With them is Janet who is immediately attracted to the young singer. The following evening Janet returns alone. She manages to meet John and they are soon absorbed in each other. She asks him to sing at a dinner party at her Park Avenue home a few nights later. Janet tells her mother a young man of Boston's fashionable set is coming to the party and is a fine singer. The night of the dinner, Janet presents John to her family. John's voice amazes all Janet's guests as well as her mother and father who congratulate each other on Janet's young man. The next day, however, a columnist has a write-up about a cabaret singer singing for society the night before. Janet's mother realizes the hoax and soundly berates her. Janet vouchsafes that she loves John but her mother asks her never to see him again. John was to have called for her at home that evening, so Janet goes shopping and phones John to meet her her elsewhere. John asks why she lied to her parents about him and Janet tells him she loves him, and knew her mother would object to a cabaret singer. Meanwhile Mae has been making a play for John. It was she who gave the item to the columnist. John becomes disgusted with her advances and quits. A maid goes into the dressing room that John had occupied and finds a picture of his mother and father, taken ten years ago. The maid, liberally bribed by the columnist for just such bits of information forwards it to the columnist who recognizes the photographs as belonging to a well known hank president. He publishes the article. Janet's mother sees it as well as John's parents who have not heard from the boy since he rebelled against accepting an easy succession to his father's wealth and left home many years before to strike out for himself. He had never yielded to the temptation to use his own name and so win quick entree to what he wanted. Janet's mother invites John's people to dinner. John is reconciled with his father and marrying Janet, agrees at last to take over his father's failing bank, and with his inexhaustible energy, John sets out to make the bank bearing his father's name, once more an honored and sound financial institution.

THE LOVE LIE

Lena Liberty Drama File No. 11257

UNTIL she is seventeen years old Madge is treated like a drudge. Her father drinks and her mother, embittered by her hard life has no love for her children. Once, in a pitiful effort to win a word of approval from her mother, Madge undertakes to cook a chicken. Carefully she plucks it and sets it up to boil. But when her mother discovers that she has wasted a chicken by cooking it without having removed the insides, she is severely beaten. Her father decides to choose a husband for her and picks Jerry, a friend of his. Jerry, seeing Madge, is immediately attracted to her and pleased with the bargain. Dazedly Madge listens while others dispose of her future. When Jerry approaches her, Madge shrinks back, but her father roars at her not to be so high and mighty. Soon after, Madge is asked to sell ice cream at a Church picnic. She has never been permitted to mingle with people before, but now Jerry wants to show off his bride-to-be and he secures permission for Madge. For hours Madge works on an old dress to make it look presentable and when finally she is ready, she looks lovelier than she has ever been before. Jerry, soon bored with the festivities, leaves with Madge's father to get a few drinks, and Madge meets Charles for the first time. Almost instantly the two young people fall in love, but Madge urges Charles to forget her. When he learns her story he grows indignant and discovering she doesn't love Jerry, makes every attempt to save her from this marriage. For brief clandestine meetings the two young people manage to slip away and they write to each other secretly. Then after a long silence on Charles' part, Madge meets him again and he asks why she returned all his letters unopened. For the first time she learns that Jerry has been getting her mail and sending it back. She determines to run away with Charles, but that night Jerry warns her that if she ever sees Charles again, he, Jerry, will destroy Charles' business of which he is so proud. Realizing that she can only bring unhappiness and pain to Charles, Madge sends a curt note telling him she has changed her mind, and that night Madge becomes the bride of Jerry. A son is born to them. Jerry at first kind to her, realizes she still loves Charles, and begins drinking more than ever. In one of his brutal fits, he seizes the baby from Madge's arms and hurls him against the wall. After several weeks of suffering the little mite breathes his last. Sobbing, Madge looks at her husband with loathing. Then, one day, she meets Charles again. Shocked at his appearance. she learns that in spite of his promise, Jerry had sent gangsters to burn Charles' shop. All her loyalty to her husband vanishes, and heedless of consequences, Madge goes off with the man she loves. Jerry, swaying drunkenly tries to stop them by firing at them, but he falls, and before the stricken eyes of Madge and Charles, is killed by an onrushing train. The whistle blows. Charles and Madge ride toward the west and happiness.

BEYOND THE GRAVE

Hannah Hemphill Coleman Drama File No. 11011

THE little town of Centerville, South Carolina, is agog with excitement as citizens read that a man is to be buried alive for three days, under the observation of all. James Martin, veteran journalist in the rural community, is particularly interested, since he hopes that many of his occult ideas may be proven by this sensational stunt. Green eye shade still on his forehead, and old fashioned type setting stick in hand, he hurries to greet Sim Morgan, the "corpse," who proves to be a breezy young man of the world. The two become fast friends, discussing Martin's theories that life beyond the grave exists, for many hours, as they are seated in the little newspaper office Sim frankly states that he believes this is "bunk," and is burying himself only to obtain much needed money with which he hopes to launch a career as a press agent. In spite of their opposite views, the two find much to admire in each other. While in the midst of splitting a pint of whiskey they are interrupted by a visit from the Reverend Barney Williams, pastor of the First Christian Church and his lovely daughter, Peggy. The minister requests the young man to abandon what he considers an unGodly pursuit. Sim refuses, but, attracted by Peggy, accepts his offer to come to church and, dining with the family later, explains that he has signed a contract which he cannot violate, assuring them that he means no irreverence in his sensational demonstration.

More won by his charm than she is willing to admit, Peggy listens fascinated as Sim describes the life of a great city, which he has always known, but when he asks her if she would care to share it with him her answer is an emphatic "No!" Gently, the girl tries to make him see the happiness that comes to those who have faith and live simply, accordingly to God's commandments. Peggy is deeply grieved when Sim laughs at the idea of a life everlasting, silencing her arguments with a kiss. The girl breaks away from him, but when he assures her that he really loves her and wishes to marry her, she replies that she, too, cares, but cannot become his wife unless he is willing to give up his present mode of living.

All Centerville turns out when Sim climbs into his coffin, equipped with a glass plate, and donated by the leading funeral establishment. With great ceremony, the ground is broken and Sim laid to rest, six feet deep. His last words are to Martin, whom he promises to aid by recording any unusual disturbances he hears while interred. Weeping in her room, Peggy reflects that Sim would never make a suitable husband for her, although she loves him dearly. Sim smiles nonchalantly at the curious crowd who gather around his coffin, assuring them of his comparative comfort as food is lowered to him. Shortly before the end of the third day he collapses, however. He is hastily ressurected and hours later, regains consciousness. Alone at last with Martin, he states that on the first night of his burial he heard the cry of an infant before he went to sleep. On the second night, he heard the baby's cries silenced by a lullaby, and the sound of a man painfully making his way to his wife, who assured "her John" that she and the child were well. Martin tells him that he was buried next to Mrs. Gordon's grave; her husband was killed in the Civil War. When he discovers a headstone bearing the words: "Here lies my wife, once the joy of my life, and the child in the grave with its mother," the mystery of the unknown baby is revealed. All skepticism gone by this strange revelation, Sim becomes a devout church goer and teacher, while Peggy becomes his wife.

A WORLD OF THEIR OWN

Mrs. E. F. Cox Drama File No. 11033

The evening is more pleasant that she expects and when she returns she refuses to make fun of him as she usually does among the girls. Although, nurses are not permitted to marry in training period Scott refuses to wait two more years for her and they are married secretly. Although, more than ever Jane wants her dream home to become a reality, she is determined to become a graduate nurse first so she can later assist her husband build up his practice. The situation is trying for them both as their privacy is limited and Scott gets irritable. They rent a furnished room to build the illusion of home on their free evenings, but one night the supervisor sees them enter the building together. The next day Jane is dismissed from the hospital. For Scott's sake she tries to be cheerful. Scott pomises that when they move to Chicago at the end of his training period, there is a nursing school where married women can study. One night, Jane grows very ill and is rushed to the hospital for an operation. During her convalescent period, the kindly head surgeon, breaks the news that Jane can never have a child. Jane is stunned, without a Scott, Jr. in their home someday, life is a dreary prospect. Visiting the maternity wards, her arms ache to clasp the tiny infants and she envies their mothers. When she comes home, Jane tells Melvin that she is leaving him; he has the right of every man to have a wife who will be the mother of his children. But Melvin convinces her that all the happiness he wants is to be with her. When they come to Chicago, she applies at the nursing school only to learn that Scott is mistaken. Her days are empty and Jane goes from one hospital to another with futile success. When Melvin develops influenza, she is with him constantly until the day comes when he tells her their funds are low and she must find some work. She registers with an agency as a practical nurse and is quickly put to work, but Melvin's pride is hurt. Before he is completely well he is back at his practice. Work slacks and Jane is again unoccupied but her husband is pleased. For a time they are very happy together, and then Melvin seems to withdraw from her, surely and irritable. During the climax of a sudden quarrel, Melvin tells her he is tired of her, that Jane should go back to her people. Heartbroken, Jane asks if he would say the same thing if they had a child. Here, Melvin breaks down confessing that he is heavily in debt and does not want Jane to see him fail. Jane persuades him to return to her home town where her parents finance his practice. Then Anna Lilly, her baby sister, an attractive young girl of 20, returns from college. One night Jane cries herself to sleep when Melvin breaks a dinner engagemnt with Jane on the plea of work, and is later seen leaving a restaurant with her sister. When Jane accuses him, Melvin discloses that Anna only turns to him for help, afraid to tell her parents she is with child. He suggests adopting it secretly. Jane sees her childhood dreams come true—three in a world of their own.

THE COLOSSUS OF RHODUS

H. Stephan Drama File No. 11240

IN the kingdom of Kroetus the people are in mourning for the death of their king, Mausolus, but in Rhodus is festivity and merriment. Severus, their ruler, is setting out apparantly to attend his late father-in-law's rites, but in reality to wrest possession of the kingdom. The widow Queen Artemisia sends for Heliogabalus, enemy of Severus, to protect the treasury from his coming. Before Severus sails, Lydia, his wife who has not yet learned of her loss, threatens her father's wrath for Severus' neglect. He replies, "Tonight we wil sail to Kroetus to attend to your father's funeral; take his immense hoard of gold and silver, make his women slaves, and chase their men into the sea." As the king leaves the marketsquare an old prophet calls upon him to repent ere the city walls crumble; their houses be devoured by fire, and even the Colossus, the huge iron statue, fall into the sea. In Kroetus, a large hidden army is awaiting Severus; and the young maidens are to greet the coming soldiers, to ply away their wrath with drink. The plans succeeds and Severus, temporarily discomforted appears before the queen to express his condolences and regrets that

Lydia could not accompany him—only to find his wife already there. While Severus' men feast with the girls in the taverns, their arms are being thrown into the sea. Meanwhile Rhodus king encounters the man whose throne he took, Heliogabalus and he realizes he is trapped. As Artemisia and Severus converse together, it is revealed that long ago the two were lovers and she wed Mausolus only for his treasure; in remorse she later gives him her daughter for a wife. For the sake of this past she pleads with the bold king to leave, but he will accept mercy from no woman. Walking in the palace grove, the Queen finds Lydia in the arms of a soldier, Aristos, her childhood sweetheart, and sorry for her loveless years with Severus promises that Aristos shall lead the soldiers to conquer Rhodus. When Lydia protests, she explains that in reality it will only be an expedition to punish them into good behavior in the future. During this, Severus is frantically trying to rally his men but his ships are gone and their weapons removed. Unable to defend himself he is taken prisoner by Heliogabalus who sends out an expedition of his own followers to Rhodus in his enemy's ships. Severus presents him with a pearl amulet which he begs be taken to the queen, but his enemy scornfully tosses it in the sea. Miraculously the amulet drifts past the queen's bark where Lydia finds and shows it wonderingly to her mother. All her mother tells is that more than 20 years ago she presented it to a young man with instructions to send her this if he ever needs aid. In an audience with Severus, the Queen orders a boat sent after her soldiers to halt the battles. Lydia joins to meet her soldier lover. Not until the boats near Rhodus does the rejoicing end; the citizens realize that these are Kroetus' ships not theirs. Just then a citizen notes that the old prophecy is being carried out—the iron legs of the Colossus is shaking; Rhodus is being destroyed and punished not by men but by an earthquake. In retribution, Severus gives up his kingdom to the rightful ruler and consents to Lydia leaving him. The lovers, Lydia and Aristos, set out to seek a strange land where they can enjoy their happiness undisturbed by men's ambitions and conflicts.

BACK TO EARTH

Mary F. Linehan Drama File No. 11255

NEWSPAPERS featured articles about the meteorie rise of Fred Fields, who had taken the leap from newsboy to financier in one easy bound. Now Fred was married to Madeline Fane who had been born with more pretensions than money and the most exclusive clubs in the city made bids for his membership. At home Madeline awaited him in a lace negligee. Exhausted from a trying day, Fred kissed her. With a sharp reproof she drew back from his embrace, scolding that he had torn her gown. Fred sighed and went upstairs to dress. A half hour later, in an uncomfortable stiff shirt he sat at the other end of the long dining table, and gazed forlornly at the dainty tid-bits on the plate before him. As he toyed with the ruffled decoration on the baby lamb chop, he asked wearily why they never had beef stew, or some dish you could eat instead of playing with. Madeline's lower lip trembled, and Fred savagely finished his dinner, but when he turned to retire, having a severe headache, he learn that Madeline had invited guests over. It was four in the morning before they left.

The next day Fred was shown reports of business reverses. Five stenographers had been dropped from the payroll. Fred sighed as he wrote a check for his wife's new mink coat. Finishing early, he decided to walk home. He dismissed his chauffeur. A girl smiled wistfully at him. Fred tried to recall where he had seen her before, then, hearing a thud, he turned to discover she had fainted. Discovering she hadn't eaten for two days. Fred brought her into a restaurant and over a bowl of hot soup, she had told him she had worked for him but had been laid off. The girl was pitifully thin and shabbily clothed. Mentally Fred compared her with his own opulently dressed wife. Her stringy hair contrasted with Madeline's permanent wave. Bringing her back to her one room flat, Fred returned thoughtfully home, to discover that another round of theaters and night clubs had been planned for the evening. It was through Bertha, whom Fred reinstated in his office, that Fred was to learn the conditions of some of his former employees. Through Bertha he was to take a new interest in life by finding jobs for them again. Madeline complained that he was making a fool of himself, but for the first time in many years, Fred was happy. In Bertha's room, Fred sat down to eat beef stew on the cheekered red cloth. Bertha wasn't pretty but Fred was to discover she had a grand sense of humor. Then one day Fred was to learn that Bertha was going to have a child. Smoothing her hair, he thought of Madeline who had always refused to have children because it would spoil her figure. When Fred asked Madeline for a divorce she looked at him incredulously. That day Madeline came to Bertha to invite her to dinner at her home. Bertha hesitated, then in a low voice consented. Dinner was a torture for Fred and Bertha. With a crooked little smile Madeline had the maid bring on the beef stew. "My husband," she informed the other guests. "seems to prefer coarse foods." Bertha's face drained of color. That night Madeline dressed in her laciest negligee. "Fred," she called softly. At last, going into his room she found his note saying he was going with Bertha, she could get her divorce on any grounds. He would settle a handsome sum on her. Tears came to Madeline's eyes. She had lost.

WHEN the great engineering company by which he is employed goes under during the Depression, Thomas Logan decides to go West and try a new field. Leaving his wife, son, and beautiful sister Shirley, he sets off in his car. One night, in Texas, he is held up and robbed on the road. His car is stolen from him, and tramping, dust covered, and heavy of heart, to the nearest village, he wires to Shirley to send him some of the money he has left behind, Meanwhile he takes refuge for the night in a stationary freight train.

Meanwhile in town Tim Smith, who has just fallen heir to a beautiful ranch through the accidental death of his father and mother decides to leave town and all the unhappy associations. His godfather, the sheriff of the town, tries to dissuade him. Suddenly the car inspector comes rushing up, white of face to report a murdered body in one of his cars. Rushing to the spot, the sheriff discovers the body of Raymond Seaton, wealthy town lad. Nearby is the heavy iron coupling pin with which the head was smashed. With the aid of his bloodhounds, the sheriff accompanied by a posse tracks, after many hours, Thomas Logan. Only the sheriff prevents the angry mob from lynching the fugitive who pleads that he was so frightened on awakening in the freight car and finding the murdered youth beside him that his first impulse had been flight. Later that night Logan's wife and sister Shirley arrive, having chartered a plane. The sheriff, impressed with their obvious gentility admits them to the cell of the alleged murderer, but not before Tim, comforting the fainting Shirley has fallen deeply in love with her. As he is assisting her to the prison, she stumbles and as his arms go about her to assist her, he assures her that he believes now that her brother is innocent and will do everything in his power to help. After an interview with Thomas, his wife and sister accept the proffered hospitality of Tim's ranch and are extended every courtesy. During the night the sheriff is visited by Dorn, the railroad engineer, who tells of having seen, at sunset yesterday, a man throw a heavy package into the freight train. He had noticed the license number of the car in which the man had driven away. With this clue the sheriff and Tim proceed to Amarillo, the town from which the license was issued and discover the car belongs to Paul Sans, a man suspected of being a dope peddler, but upon whom the police have been able to pin nothing. The others are for arresting Sans immediately, but Tim, fearing that Sans may be able to trump up an alibi since the evidence is all in Thomas' direction in any case, prefers taking matters into his own hands. Accordingly he trails Sans to a speakeasy, and pretending to get tight himself, boasts about his own crimes until Sans, to outdo him, reveals how he had killed Seaton to whom he had been peddling dope and who had threatened to squeal when Sans tried blackmailing him. As Sans' men leave the speakeasy they all fall into the hands of the waiting police. Protesting fiercely Sans is captured. Thomas is freed, and Tim returns to find Shirley waiting for him with glistening eyes.

THE GREATER PRIDE

Hilton George Tranchell Drama File No. 11152

IN a small upstairs room Ivy and Tathill, lovers who are together after several months apart, are joyfully embracing, grateful to Ivy's brother, Tom, who helps Tathill enter the house while the rest of the household is busy with the Christmas party in progress downstairs. The lovers mourn the cruelty of her mother who refuses to countenance their marriage for though Tathill is wealthy he comes from a middle-class family. Before they can hide, the door suddenly opens revealing them to Ivy's parents and a few friends who have come to persuade Ivy to join them. To save scandal, the mother hides her anger and announces their engagement to the throng. After a large wedding, the couple leave to honeymoon in Europe, the mother still refusing to forgive and accept Tathill. When the Edezels lose their money, Tom suggests that their new son-in-law be notified but Mrs. Edezel declares she will never accept help from them. Secretly the brother wires "We are all broke—keep secret—make some excuse—Come now or never." The young couple take the first boat back, but all their offers of aid are refused. Now that her family needs her, Ivy though she loves Tathill dearly, bitterly regrets her marriage. Somehow she must earn money of her own and send it to them annoymously. With this decision made, she leaves a note for her husband telling him of her plan and begging him not to try and stop her; she will return six months hence. That night it is bitterly cold and a snowstorm blocks the trains, so Ivy accepts a lift with a nice looking couple. To her surprise, they soon stop the machine and force her to give up her jewels. The next day, Tathill reads that his wife is killed, the body identified by a wedding ring engraved "Ivy—Dick Tathill." Her mother is sure that Tathill is to blame; that his cruelty drove away her daughter. But Ivy, ignorant of this, is working as a secretary under the assumed name of Una Block. Through an attorney, she manages to send a large part of her monthly income to her family pretending that it is a bequest from a remote relative. There is one problem that Ivy has not counted on and becomes aware of shortly after her departure—she is bearing Tathill's child. When her child is born the masquerade must end for surely then her mother's hate for her husband will vanish. Tathill immerses in work to forget, never seeing his "dead" wife's family. Seated at his office desk one afternoon, a telegram comes—signed by his wife and marked "Maternity Hospital." At the hospital entrance he meets his mother-in-law but they ignore each other intent on seeing if it really is Ivy. Their joy at discovering the wife and daughter miraculously alive is dampened when the surgeon informs them that she or the baby must die. But before Ivy loses consciousness, she pleads with them for her sake to bury their differences, and on such a day her mother cannot refuse. When another Christmas day returns, we see the two happy families united, the new baby in the center.

SOCIETY and politics rub elbows at the elaborate tea given by Chief Pharisee Satan in honor of the distinguished Lord Clifton of England and Queen Marie Antoinette of France. Frank Moses bows deferentially to Secretary of Commerce Nero who is a noted political boss. There is a great stir when Uncle Sam enters; everyone else knows that before the evening is over the benevolent old gentleman will agree to finance Clifton and Marie with money and men to continue their frequent wars. Several months later the treasury is critically ill financially and several million ex-soldiers are clamoring for bonuses. The nation's leaders gather in secret conclave to determine what must be done and if they finish more important affairs early enough, consider the matter of selecting a presidential candidate. Emperor Nero complains the public's pocketbooks are no longer responding to his fiddle's spell. Private citizen Scott is there to protest the Navy's manufacture of paint as encroachment on private business; Mr. Ananias deplores that his liberal gifts of stock issues to prominent citizens are not bringing sufficient advertising. Budget Director Adam Cain insists on returning to the ex-service men problem. It is decided to have Rear-Admiral Judas Iscariot, now retired from active service, head a speaking tour to win public sentiment away from the bonus advocates. The two candidates for the presidency, Howard Engineer and the youthful Moses are called in. Both are asked to state their qualifications. Engineer tells them he has invented a steam roller "just around the corner" that will iron out the road to prosperity if he is selected. When Moses is asked for the same pledge, he suggests Nero run off a newsreel of highlights from the year, 1925. The photographs are a panorama of realism and fantasy, blatant advertising, "Make $10,000 over night," leaping stock market tickers, office boys riding about in Lincolns—and Mr. Engineer stumping for two chickens in every pot—followed by flashes of breadlines, men sleeping in park benches, etc. Engineer sneaks away in shame, while Mr. Moses accepts their nomination on the condition he has complete charge of the party platform. The first person the new candidate notifies is Harriet, his present secretary and his future wife. Together they create a slogan to make the nation Moses conscious—"Not another cent for Europe's Wars." The people love a romance and the announcement of the candidate's engagement to his employee wins columns of publicity and thousands more votes. His rival, Engineer, takes defeat ungraciously, and seeks a means of stealing Moses' popularity. He bribes Iscariot to take his chief out to dinner where his liquor is doped. The next morning Moses wakes to find a strange woman in negligee seated near him on the bed. A flashlight camera snaps at the partly open door. His political backers force Moses to resign and save the party from public scandal. Ashamed to tell Harriet, Moses goes in hiding. His betrothed first learns of his withdrawal from the newspapers which simutaneously announce Engineer is replacing him. Harriet is suspicious and traces her fiance. She forces him to tell the true story of his resignation. Remembering that Iscariot has a family history which shows a penchant for betraying his chief, she persuades Moses to find Iscariot. Faced with physical punishment, Iscariot confesses the frame-up. Meanwhile, Engineer is preparing to drive his steamroller over a barricade of burlap bags, bearing such labels as "Crooked Tax Reports, Farm Products, Foreign Debts and Veterans' Compensation," but the Wall Street bag is conspicuously placed out of danger. Just as he places his hand on the throttle, Moses rushes over waving an affidavit attesting his innocence. Pushing, Engineer out, "Wall Street" is thrown on top of the heap and he runs the machine over the sacks. The labor leaders are set to cleaning up the debris over the capitalists indignant protests. Moses rides to victory. And the people turn out to attend a double ceremony—the president's inauguration and wedding.

WITHOUT MARRIAGE

Cora Elgin Drama File No. 11148

OUTSIDE, the lights of Chicago twinkle the spell of success that draws Betty here weeks before and which still eludes her. And in her cheap, furnished room, Betty is pleading for another week's credit from her landlady, desperate at the thought of returning to the drab mill town.

At an employment agency the following day, she encounters her first friend, Lola, long since hard-boiled and city-wise. Under her tutelage, Betty attends her first speakeasy where Lola picks up Joe and Fred. From the beginning she distrusts Joe, flashy spender, who discouraged in his attentions turns to Lola for ready comfort. When Betty becomes ill from the unaccustomed drinks and excitement, the quiet Bob brings her home. Within the week, Betty is clerking in a department store. Fred escorts her to a party at Lola's new apartment; on the way he stops the car and begins to make violent love. Appalled, Betty tries to leave the machine and Fred quickly apologizes. They see each other often after that. Ambitious himself, he arouses her own hunger for knowledge and she plans to resume studying at evening school. One night, Lola, whom she seldom sees because Fred dislikes their friendship, calls her a fool. "Do you want to scrimp away your youth on a small salary like your parents?" When Fred proposes shortly after, she refuses, unable to face the prospect of years of make-shift substitutes, and he leaves angry and hurt at her mercenary stand. The following day Joe meets her outside the store and persists in taking her to dinner. In the luxurious restaurant he chooses to impress her, Joe startles her with the suggestion that he set up an apartment for her. Trying to visualize herself in Joe's arms, makes her realize for the first time that the luxury she craves can have an unlovely price. Angered at her refusal and fearful of what she may tell Lola who considers him hers, Joe tells Lola that Betty has been "making a play" for his money. Lola bitterly confronts Betty, disregarding her denials, and tells her that Fred too is through with her. Afraid Joe may return, Betty gives up her position and changes rooming houses. Alone, she acknowledges her new-found love for Fred and that she loses him through her own weakness. Desperate from days of fruitless job seeking, she returns to her room to find her door locked. That night she tries to sleep on a park bench, only to be wakened in the early hours by a policeman. At night-court she is booked for vagrancy. Meanwhile Fred, convinced that Betty is innocent, seeks out Joe. At a night-club, Joe, drunk and frightened, blurts out the truth. In the ensuing fight, the two are arrested. While waiting in the prison "coop," Joe glimpses Betty awaiting sentence before the judge. He breaks away from the startled policeman and the court is in an up-roar as he shoves his way beside her. A kindly magistrate lets him tell their story, and asks, "Will you marry her if I release you both?" Her glowing face tells what they both desire.

TOGETHER, the twins curiously survey the unopened letter on the breakfast table. Letters are a rare event and this one with its imposing legal address frightens them. Just as Matilda reaches out to break the flap, Madge impatiently tears it from her and in excited tones reads the notice of a $25,000 legacy from their uncle. Madge and Matilda are jubilant; with their school teacher salaries, the money is a fortune and an escape from the daily imprisonment with 40 children to be drilled in ABC's. When Thomas Finn calls on Matilda that night, both girls hastens with the news. For four years Thomas has been a faithful caller at the Dennis home; and Matilda and he have long since reached an "understanding" that can never ripen into an engagement so long as Mrs. Finn insists on living with her son. Madge sometimes urges Matilda to favor some other young men who are not "tied to their mother's apron strings." Both sisters are faithful members of their church sisterhood and the D. A. R. so when Madge flatly refuses to attend Wednesday prayer meeting, it is her first step of active rebellion against the old life. Though her sister resigns her teaching position, Matilda at first insists on remaining; but Madge, knowing her sister's weakness, paints glowing portraits of foreign countries Matilda dreams of visiting. And two weeks later, the sisters are packing for a Mediterranean cruise. Madge goes down to answer the doorbell. In the dim hall, Thomas mistakes her for her twin. He tells her that his mother is dead. Will she postpone the trip until they can go together, man and wife? Usually a very truthful person, Madge wants the trip too much to reveal her identity. She has the strange sensation that another person is speaking through her lips when she calmly tells him that she has spent too many years waiting for him and now that her chance for freedom has come she will not hear of marriage. Thomas' stricken face reproaches her conscience so she tells him that when she returns, her mind may have changed. The next morning, Madge refuses to wait while Matilda phones "goodbye" to Thomas, telling her that he will be waiting at the dock. The trip is spoiled for Madge with Matilda's tears, and often she is at the verge of confessing her duplicity; only the fear that Matilda will not continue the trip and the salving remembrance that she has given Thomas permission to call upon their return, stops her. Although Matilda ignores the men seated at their ship table, Madge grows friendly with several, particularly- favoring Richard Stern, prosperous dentist. When the voyage ends, Stern goes home with them as their guest. Absorbed in her own happiness, Madge forgets about Thomas until she finds her sister crying. Madge goes to Thomas' home and confesses the trick she played, begging him to come back with her so she can tell Matilda the truth. But Thomas admits that he resents the presence of Stern, believing him his rival. "No, your brother-in-law," corrects Madge. Happy in Thomas' arms, Matilda soon forgives her twin. The society columns announce the double engagement and coming double wedding.

THE MOON IS LOW

Joe Tanner Comedy Drama File No. 11264

NOBODY knew where Judicious Jack came from before he took up living in Shueyville. Nobody except the postman who sometimes delivered mail addressed to Joe Benedict, knew he had any other name than Judicious Jack. He lived in the most dilapidated house in the village, his sole companions a score or so of cats. His friends were legion and often he could be seen spinning his delightful old yarns, an absorbed group of listeners about him. To Jack fishing and loitering along the stream were life itself. No matter if the fish were not biting for anybody else, he would always come home with a well filled basket, and his fish mysteriously found their way onto the table of some needy family in the village. More often than not the Widow O'Donnel who lived next door would be the favored one. The constant bickering and sallies of Irish wit between Jack and the widow had always been a source of amusement to the rest of the villagers. Jack gained his living by doing odd jobs, and his spare time was generally spent at the widow O'Donnel's, whose garden he cared for. At times there would issue an exchange of language befitting a pair of legionaires, but the expected blows never materialized. One day a handsome limousine drew up and a world famous movie star inquired after Joe Benedict . It required the services of the postman to recall that was the other name of Judicious Jack. Laura Lane was his daughter. After the death of his wife, Jack had placed her in an exclusive convent and keeping his whereabouts secret, had settled his entire fortune upon her. Laura had been discovered by Richard Young, an assistant director and brought to Hollywood. Despite all Jack's pleas that he was happy where he was, Laura insisted that Jack accompany her to Hollywood. The villagers were loathe to see him go and there were tears in the eyes of the Widow, who shouted belligerently they were all well rid of the likes of him.

In Hollywood Jack was forever doing the wrong thing and getting into embarrassing situations. But in spite of his atrocious frankness and manners, his jovial wit soon won him many friends in the film colony, among them Richard Young who adored Laura. Meanwhile Laura was being flattered by the attentions of a visiting celebrity, a foreign count, who deplored Jack's uncouth questioning. Once even Laura, grew impatient when Jack caused the Count to leave a dance with embarrassing haste. But it was Jack who was to prove the Count an imposter, a stableboy who had acquired the polish and manners of a nobleman he had squired. Humiliated, but grateful, Laura was to embrace her father. Soon after Jack was to become painfully melancholy. It was Richard who made Laura realize that Jack was pining for sight of his old friends in Shueyville. The villagers all greeted Jack with a rousing welcome. He soon regained his lost vitality and was soon to be seen in all his former haunts. One night about midnight he was awakened to see the sky all red above the widow's house. Rushing to the fire, he dashed in time and again to rescue articles and the many cats that had made their home with her during Jack's absence. At last he stumbled out and collapsed in the arms of the widow, Bereft of everything, the unhappy woman turned from the ruins, but Jack caught her to him and asked her to be his wife so they could continue their cross fire of sizzling words for life, while Laura found happiness in Hollywood with Richard.

NOTHING BUT SCANDAL

Robert Oliver Lewis Drama File No. 11246

SAM kissed her lightly. "Another one of those and I'd be intoxicated, and I don't care to be drunk," said Anne. They were returning from the Goose, a popular roadhouse, where Anne's escort pampers his taste for liquor, although he always stops short of the "ugly" stage. Before Anne retires to bed that night, she takes out several sheets of paper, headed with the names of the three young men who are frequent vistors—Sam Dickson, hotel owner; Tom Hartner, automobile man; and Jack Lane, owner of a small stationary shop. A few days before, Anne who at 25 is striking in appearance, wealthy—and bored, realizes that the years are slipping past. She has still to meet the man whom she can love, but she has only a hazy picture of her ideal. Anne looks at her mother speculatively. Her parents are 30 years married and represent the happiness she wants. She turns to her for advice. Mrs. Livingstone tells her she is too fickle. That evening, Anne decides to scriously consider the three men she likes best from the standpoint of good husband materials. Last night with Tom, she reflects, was a revealing one. The program of the evening was left to him. During it she concludes that his financial prospects are excellent; morals good and ambition commendable; but his practical, unromantic, streak tinged with complacency disturbs her. Tonight with Sam emphasizes his excellence as a playmate but he is too promiscuous and fond of a drink. Anne is surprised to find how many things her analytic system is discovering. For Jack's date night she takes special pains in primping. They spend a quiet evening in the garden. Noting his shabby Ford, parked outside, Anne offhandedly asks Jack if he wouldn't get ahead further working in a large company, than plugging uneventfully with his shop. He claims that recognition of one's abilities might not materialize. Fearing she has hurt bis pride, Anne changes the subject. Just before he leaves, Jack does a surprising thing. Slowly, he brings her arm to him, gently placing a kiss on the pulse beat of her wrist. For a moment, Anne is surprised at the inner warmth of her response. Faced with the sanity of her analysis record, Anne decides that his qualifications fall far short of the other two. He is an inactive dreamer too satisfied with his present unambitious position. Totaling her vital statistics after several weeks of alternate dating, Anne is surprised to find Sam has a slight edge over Tom and is far ahead of Jack. She first realizes, however, that she has no score or test for fidelity—the most important qualification. Anne decides to test her suitors at a weekend party, to which she invites Elizabeth, Gretchen, and Elinor, her closest friends at school. When Anne sees the three girls together, her confidence in her plan is a bit shaken. No man could be saint enough to resist their attractions. The girls eagerly enter into the spirit of the test when Anne confides in them. Each girl is given frequent opportunity to be alone with one of the men. They change partners frequnetly, varying their technique with the helpful hints of their predeeessor. When they gather in Anne's room at the close of the day, their related experiences for the most part confirm her previous estimations. Sam has lost no opportunity to kiss each of the girls within five minutes privacy; while Tom though his drinking increases delivers a long lecture to Gertrude on the subject of petting after she assumes an agressive role in the moonlight. They cannot obtain more than a polite response from Jack. At the end of their stay, Betty alone, who has been spending considerable time with Sam, shows reluctance at the game the four have sponsored. That winter Sam comes less frequently, intent on building the new hotel; Jack is traveling on business often. Tom who has advanced in salary and position gradually is accepted as part of the family, though the two in words and action retain the status of good friends. Anne is rushed to the hospital when an acute infection sets in. Both Tom and Sam stay with her parents at the hospital until the critical stage is passed. Though she has already dismissed Jack in her thoughts, she wonders at his absence. A few weeks later, Sam announces that he is engaged to her friend, Betty. In a letter, Betty tells her that she is sure Anne will not be hurt, having yet to experience that love cannot be controlled by rationalization. She remembers this when Jack visits her that evening. He asks if Tom who is out of town for a three week trip has written to her. Anne is not aware until now that Tom's absence has had no emotional effect. Her denial brings Jack hope and maddened with her loveliness he draws her close, kissing her passionately on the mouth. Almost faint with weakness, Anne pushes him away. She begs him to leave. The evening is miserably prolonged. She spends a restless night Sleep finds her repeating, living over the scene with Jack in the garden. Awake, Anne clings to the memory of Tom's sane virtues. In her morning mail is a letter from Dr. Mays. After her blood transfusion, she had asked him to send her the name of the blood donor to whom she owed her life. But she does not anticipate the name in her letter which explains Jack's absence; it was his blood the hospital used. Mrs. Livingstone anxiously inquires the trouble and Anne confesses that in spite of all character ratings she realizes that Jack has her love. Now it is too late; she has already refused him. Leaving the tearful Anne alone, her mother visits Jack at his shop. An hour later, Anne is comfortably relaxed in his arms. She is embarrased when he picks up a crumpled record bearing his name. After an understanding chuckle, Jack confesses that he has secretly opened two new shops in nearby cities. And curling closer to him, Anne sighs happily—

WHEN A MAN LOVES

Fanny Doyle Drama File No. 11252

THE first person in the town to see Betty Collins when she stepped from the train to teach in Shadyville grammar school was Dick Owens. Several hours later, Bob Owens, his brother, stopped off to offer to drive the new schoolmarm home.

Drawing in his breath sharply at sight of her, Bob knew that he had fallen in love. All the way home he was unusually silent, and when at last he managed to stammer out an invitation to the movies, Betty, laughing at his awkwardness informed him she had already accepted a previous date. That evening Bob was to suffer agonies as he saw his brother smooth back his hair carefully for his "big date." In the weeks to follow Dick, dashing, handsome, was to be Betty's constant escort, while Bob tried to conceal his own feelings. Then, suddenly Dick informed Betty and his folks that he had been offered a position out of town. As soon as he made money enough, he informed Betty, he would return for her and they would be married. The day after Dick left, Mr. Hanson, the town miser, reported that his money had been stolen from its hiding place in his barn. Mr. Hanson's housekeeper reported that she had seen Dick Owens hanging about the barn for the last few days, and there were many who connected the disappearance of the money with Dick's precipitate departure from town. But Betty stood by Dick loyally, and for lack of any conclusive evidence, nothing could ever be proved against the absent Dick. When months passed and Betty failed to hear from Dick, she consented to allow Bob to drive her home from school each day. Once Bob, unable to keep silent any longer, told her of his love, but Betty silenced him, and only on Bob's promise that he would not speak his feelings again, did she continue their daily rides. Then, more discouraged than ever, Bob was driving back from Betty's house when he noticed a blue roadster pull quickly away from the bank. Entering, he saw the cashier bound and gagged on the floor, the teller locked in the vault. Shouting for aid, Bob rushed to his roadster to overtake the blue car. Some miles out of town, he decided to stop at the widow Steven's home and phone to the sheriff in the next town to watch out for the blue roadster. The trembling widow dared not warn Bob that the gunmen were in her own back room, their stolen blue car having broken down nearby. As Bob, as deputy sheriff, described the robbers' car, a shot caught him in the shoulder. Wheeling he droped to the floor. Meanwhile the sheriff at the other end jiggled the phone, then alarmed set off with two assistants, arriving at the Widow Stevens just as one of the bandits, having tried to escape in Bob's car, found difficulty with the frozen motor. Thus delayed, he was still within sight when the posse arrived. A shot exploded one of the tires. Bob's car crashed and the bandit was killed instantly. Meanwhile inside, Bob stared at his brother Dick who brokenly explained that he didn't know what he was doing. Realizing that if he gave Dick up he would break the hearts of his mother and Betty, Bob, setting his duty as deputy sheriff aside, testified that Dick, who had just returned to town, had saved his life by leaping on the bandit as he fired. The widow, a friend of Bob's mother, collaborated the lie, and Dick returned home. That evening Betty called softly to Bob, and while he stared at her incredulously asked him if he still wanted her, explaining that it must have been loyalty for Dick because, now that he was back, she knew it was Bob she loved.

HIGH FINANCE

Otto Herbert Drama File No. 11149

PICKING up the newspaper to while away another idle morning, Green Walker's eye is caught by a small paragraph, announcing that his mother-in-law whom he has not seen since his wife died two years before, has inherited $10,000. He decides that here is a glorious opportunity to gather some easy money; the evening finds him quite at home in Mrs. Warren's apartment. Learning that Edna Small, her niece has been adopted by Mrs. Warren and will be her sole heir, Green pays a great deal of unwelcome attention to her. He goes to bed ruminating on Mrs. Warren's wistful explanation that she has always wanted to own her home. The following day, James Craig, real estate agent, sells Green a $2500 house and at Green's request makes the deed out for $3000 to enable him to sell the house at a higher price some future date. Of course Mrs. Warren refuses to take the house as a gift, and Green gets the marked price, leaving him $500 richer. Though Edna dislikes him her aunt is taken in by Green's braggart tales and encourages his attentions to the girl. Green finally leaves on business, promising to be back the following month. Passing by the new Warren home, Craig impulsively visits them, becoming very much attracted to Edna. During the next few weeks he is a frequent visitor. Meanwhile, Green, having found his first real estate deal profitable decides on a plan of further enriching himself. On his next visit he has little difficulty in persuading Mrs. Warren she will be happier in the country. Edna is spending the weekend with a friend and her aunt neglects to mention Craig's friendship. When he comes to Craig, the realtor wonders why nothing was said to him about it by Edna, but believes Green plans this for a surprise, not knowing the mother-in-law really foots the bill. However after a price is agreed—the country place and $1000 in cash in exchange for the present house—Craig grows suspicious when Green insists on cash, refusing a check. When Green tells Mrs. Warren that Craig backs out of the deal at the last moment, he doesn't tell her that she was to receive $1000 also. Amazed, Mrs. Warren reveals that Craig has been seeing much of Edna and she appears to be fond of him. Green soon convinces her that Craig is acting out of spite, knowing that Edna's aunt favors Green. That evening Craig comes to see Edna but the maid has instructions to inform him that the girl does not want to see him any longer; she is engaged to Green. In the weeks that follow, Edna cannot understand why after telling her of his love, Craig suddenly stops coming, but she is too proud to get in touch with him. But when she sees him in the street one day, she cannot resist stopping him. In the explanations which follow, Craig learns of the duplicity. Hearing that Green will be in town the coming Monday, he arranges to have the girl bring her aunt to his office. Craig then sends word to Green of his reconsideration . Hiding Mrs. Warren and Edna in the next room, Craig encourages Green, flushed with success, to boast of the "wool pulled over the old lady's eyes." Then Craig calls out his audience and Green sees his financial dreams collapse. Ragingly, he questions Craig's right until Mrs. Warren says, "Meet my new son-in-law."

THE GREATER HAPPINESS

Lisette Weideling Drama File No. 11070

A SUNSHINY child, Helda is the neighbors' favorite and the petted darling in a large German household where she is the only girl. Her inseperable playmate, Heinrich, lives next door; and her only childhood tears come when in a playful mood, Heinrich teases the stray animals which she adores and mothers. At 14, her idyllic home life is broken with her father's death; and her mother turns to outside work to support her brood. Helda leaves school and becomes the family housekeeper, determined as is her mother that the boys should continue their education. In the evenings she continues her studies under the tutelage of Heinrich. Both are still to young to know or speak of love, but the wings of romance just faintly touch them with the unspoken implication of a future ripening. This is interrupted when Heinrich's family decides to move to Berlin where he can continue his work at the university. When she enters her twenties, her burden of responsibility is considerably lightened; two of her brothers have set up homes of their own. Many young men are attracted to her but from them she chooses David, an ambitious youth who plans to seek his fortune in America. Their first years of hardship are forgotten in Helda's pleasure from her children. Nor does she forget the example of her grandmother, and provides for many of the more unfortunate in her neighborhood. She makes one trip back to Germany before her mother's death. Most of her old friends are still in the little village where she learns that her old playmate, Heinrich, has gone to America many years before. Her very modern, married daughter does not want a child so Helda sadly relinquishes her dream of another baby to love and comfort. Then comes the Wall Street crash and like thousands of other middle-class families, the market wipes out a large part of their savings. David gets a stroke from the shock and dies, leaving her with a tiny income from his insurance. Refusing to be dependent on her children, Helda takes a small apartment where she leads a very lonely life. Christmas is approaching and Helda recalls the delight of past holidays when there were small children to prepare surprises for. A Children's Home nearby inspires her to take some little girls as her guests. The matron suggests two small sisters, whose mother has recently died and who have been placed there until the father can find another home. Christmas Day when Helda calls for them she learns their father is back and wishes to spend the day with them. Helda decides to invite him also; she can't go back alone. The father turns when she enters the room; then—in spite of the years they recognize each other, Heinrich, her childhood friend. No need to beg for the children now. While the little girls romp around the tree, the adults are lost in a reminiscent world, which promises to foster their friendship into something stronger in the future.

GAMBLING CHANCES

Florence Bruhn Drama File No. 11311

SITTING on a park bench in Chicago, Ruth Landen contrasts her present surroundings with the little town she ran away from a few hours before. It is her customary recklessness that makes her leave home after her mother scolds her for her wildness. At 16 she is not yet a woman emotionally and in typical tomboy fashion she and her chum go down the river on a raft. One of the boards collapses and the two girls swim to shore safely. Her mother's threat to inform her father when she sees the dripping girl, makes her carry a long contemplated plan into action. Lost in her thoughts, she is surprised at a woman's friendly voice. Mrs. Sow asks if she is looking for work and the girl who is beginning to feel lonely and frightened as night approaches, readily confides in her. Ruth gratefully accepts her invitation to dinner. When the meal is over, Ruth feels it is time for her to leave although she has no destination in mind. As heedless as ever, she leaves Hinsdale with only a few dollars. Her hostess insists on her remaining. There is a friend coming that evening who may have work for her. She frowns after a moment, and tells Ruth that she can't meet Lee in her countrified clothes. Persuading her to look upon the money as an advance, Mrs. Sow takes her to several smart neighborhood shops. In her first black satin pumps and black, backless gown, Ruth finds it difficult to recognize the sophisticated girl in the mirror as herself. When the doorbell rings, announcing Lee's arrival, the girl waits apprehensively, but the first moment with him reassures her. He is extremely goodlooking, tall and well groomed, with an impish grin that calls forth a delighted response from Ruth. Mrs. Sow soon excuses herself. Lee is sure that he can find work for Ruth but begs her to forget about it until tomorrow. Tonight they should celebrate her first day in the city, he insists. Liking him more each moment, the girl readily assents. At the Avenue Club, Ruth feels that she is experiencing a fairy tale. Turning to the waiter, Lee says, "Bring me the usual." When the man brings two, Lee laughs, "Not with this one; she's different." Ruth couldn't bear to have him think her a naive child, and before Lee can stop her, gulps her first intoxicating drink. As they dance she feels lightheaded and pleasantly warm, before suddenly dropping unconscious in his arms. Lee takes her back to his apartment and puts her to bed, sure that she will be quite fit in the morning. Accustomed to satisfying all his desires, Lee starts to kiss her but stops, experiencing shame for the first time. When morning comes, the horrified girl insists on leaving. But he begs her to stay until evening. It is past midnight when he returns; the dinner is long since spoiled. He admits having gotten in a poker game. Ruth is distressed to learn he is a professional gambler. Lee promises he is reforming He has an offer for a position. He tells her he will take it only if she takes on the job of being his wife. Ruth's eyes flash with the old bravado. "I'll take a chance," she answers.

OUR BOY

William G. Lord Drama File No. 11205

"WHAT'S the matter, seasick?" Ned Dalton, newest and youngest cabin boy on an Alaska bound ship, heartened by the friendly voice of a passenger, Jack Ramsey, confesses this is his first voyage and he is homesick for the family he ran away from three months before. Imbued with tales of treasure hunts, Ned decides to seek his fortune. Jack who takes a fancy to the young boy persuades him to throw their lots together. The gold boom is quiet when they reach Yellow City and their funds are low, so Jack opens a restaurant until they have a chance to look around. An old prospector collapses in there one day and is moved to Ned's room where they discover he has a bullet puncture through his lungs. To his partners, Frank Dover, reveals that he has stumbled on a rich mining pocket and Burt Rascob, who has a cabin nearby, wants a share. When Frank refuses to give the location, he swears revenge; in precaution Frank sends a claim map to his daughter, Jessica, in England. While in town, he is shot from ambush. If they will stake the claim for him and go 50-50 with the girl, he will give them the map. As soon as they can wind up their business and equip themselves, Ned and Jack are setting off. The evening of their departure, Ned gets a severe blow on the head in a deserted street. When he regains consciousness, he learns that all his clothes have been carefully examined. Apparantly, the unseen Burt is on the trail of the missing map—but he only succeeds in delaying them another two weeks while Ned recuperates.

The map directions are very implicit and the trip is made with no special difficulty. But someone is already there in a newly-built cabin. Before they can approach the house, a man armed with a revolver emerges and orders them off. He jeers at their claims, and waves an ownership deed. Ned first suspects him to be Burt but he does not answer to the description. Just then a young woman comes to the door; her features bear a strong resemblance to the dead prospector. Impulsively, Ned calls her name but before she has time to reply, the stranger claps his hand over her mouth and pushes her roughly into the house. Faced with the gun, the two men are helpless, though Jack has to restrain the raging Ned who is haunted by the look of suffering that marks the girl. Jack persuades Ned that it is futile to wait on the chance of seeing the woman again, and both return to town. While reading in his room one evening, there is a knock at the door and the stranger's wife slips in. She hurriedly tells him she is dodging her husband who is cruel to her since these two men came. How does Ned know her name? In the ensuing explanations, Ned learns that Burt is her husband under another name, and that he won her hand in England where he told her of her father's death and claimed to be his best friend. Just then Burt bursts in but Ned beats him to the draw. Three months later the Dalton family is visted by a masked man who makes them pile all their valuables together while they plead with him not to take the mortgage money. Suddenly he pours a pile of golddust on the floor and pushes away the mask. The thief is Ned! But the evening of surprises is not over, until Ned fetches his wife—nee Jessica Dover.

GREED MONEY

Hettie M. Lee Drama File No. 11146

LIVING in a college town, Sally Lee was to watch enviously the well dressed co-eds and handsome collegiates laughing and talking together. Her mother, embittered by her betrayal many years before, warned Sally again and again that rich young men preyed on girls like her. And then one day Sally met Gene Livingstone, son of a millionaire banker. Sally had found Gene's fraternity pin, and brought it to the Phi Gamma house. Inside a gay party was in progress. Gene looked into the lovely eyes of the shabbily dressed town girl, and on a sudden impulse asked if he could drive her home in his car. It seemed strangely unreal for Sally to be sitting next to the handsomest boy at school, chatting easily with him and when Gene asked when he could see her again, Sally scarcely believed her ears. At home Sally's mother looked at her flushed cheeks suspiciously and warned her again not to go out with any of the college boys.

Night after night passed. Sally and Gene were together constantly. Once he kissed her. After that there was no rest for either of them. Gene told her he loved her and as soon as he graduated he would get a position and marry her in spite of anything his mother or father might say. Remembering her own mother, Sally shuddered but as Gene drew her closer her fears were forgotten. Then Gene invited Sally to a fraternity dance. Her mother, waiting up hour after hour was prey to a thousand misgivings. Meanwhile at the fraternity house, Sally was a sensation. Stan, one of Gene's fraternity brothers, cut in on their dance saying, "Say, you can't keep the American Beauty to yourself. Don't be so selfish." Sally's head whirled. Stan brought her cocktail after cocktail, and when Gene found her, Sallys voice was thick and she was pleading she didn't want to go home, she was having such a good time. Heart sick at sight of her, Gene scolded Stan and brought Sally home. Her mother, filled with horror, helped her intoxicated daughter into the house and taking it for granted that Gene was responsible for her condition, slammed the door in the boy's face. Gene returned home for the holidays, and Mrs. Lee, believing she was acting in the best interests of her daughter, wrote to Gene's father, urging him not to permit his son to come back to her daughter. Against his will, Gene was hustled off on a European trip, informed that his father's fortune depended upon the safe delivery of a valuable note. Gene's note explaining all to Sally was never delivered, and Gene was kept in Europe awaiting the reply to the letter which secretly gave orders to keep Gene as long as possible in the belief that he was helping his father.

Meanwhile at home Sally was heartbroken at Gene's apparent desertion. Her mother urged her to forget the rich boy, but Sally was filled with dread as she realized that she would soon have Gene's child. Then one day Stan saw her in town and insisted that she come to the fraternity house, informing her that Gene was expected back to town to-night. A masquerade party was in progress. Stan tried to kiss Sally. She struggled. Someone knocked Stan out, and Sally looked into the eyes of Gene. He had discovered the whole plot and had come back for her. And held tightly in Gene's arms, Sally knew she'd never have to worry again.

THE LOVE OF A MAN

Bertha M. Roy Drama File No. 11263

BIG John Doughterty boasted of his strength. Often he would take a pick-axe from the hands of one of his men and sling it himself to show how the work should be done. His hearty laughter rang through the streets and his score of workers had reason to fear his frowns. After a long day supervising the construction jobs, he would return home, his coat slung over his shoulder. Stepping over the threshold of his own home, he would seize his wife Mary in his arms, and despite her timid plea that he was hurting her, would plant a kiss on her bruised lips. Little Peter stoutly reported what he had done at school that day, and John was all for his giving up wasting time on books. "It isn't books that gives you brawn," he would say, flexing his huge muscles. Mary placed the hot dishes of mutton and stew before him, and John reported gustily the events of the day. He laughed reminscently as he came to the part about how he had knocked down Bill Smith who was slowing up his work. Mary put Peter to bed, then taking up a book, quietly read by the fire while from time to time John remembered another of his day's adventures.

Time passed. More than once now John complained that Peter was growing pale, giving too much time for his books. Once, coming home from Church on a Sunday, Peter greeted a serious faced young man and introduced his schoolmaster. Back home, John laughed heartily at the thought of a man giving his life to study, but Mary didn't laugh. Two days later, Mary met Teddy Mahan again. She hadn't noticed how handsome he was. Now, astride a spirited horse, he recognized her and dismounted. They walked together a few paces, and after discussing Peter's progress, Teddy offered to lend Mary his fine collection of books. Big John grew impatient with Mary's reading, and leaning back in his chair said a man like Teddy Mahan, with broad shoulders like that was a fool and worse to be bothering about such womanish business as teaching. Then the conversation turned to the war. More and more people were enlisting. Big John wouldn't mind himself taking a try at those guns. "Why," asked Mary, don't you?" Big John looked at her sharply, but Mary's eyes were buried in her book. That day Big John saw Teddy Mahan in his soldier uniform. Looking after him, John wondered why anyone as strong and handsome as that should ever be content with teaching little children. He noticed the women's eyes follow Teddy admiringly. But it remained for him to see Mary held closely in Bahan's arms. Big John stared at them bewildered. It wasn't possible. Mary couldn't love anybody else when she had him. Then a wave of hatred for Mahan welled within him. That night, shortly, he announced he had enlisted—in the same regiment as the schoolmaster. Mary's eyes widened apprehensively. Did he guess?

At the front, Big John watched his opportunity. One day with the enemy guns bellowing, the others retreated behind the lines, but John stayed with Teddy. While the skies lit fearfully with the glare of gun fire, John lifted his gun over his head, and using it as a club, dealth his fury and jealousy on Teddy s body. Again and again the blows descended and the boy sank to the earth, bloody and still. Then, passion spent, John looked down at the man his wife loved, and setting him on his shoulders, crawled out of the machine gun nest behind the lines. On the bare hospital cot, Big John looked up into the eyes of the assistant who commended him for his bravery. "He'll live to go back home?" John asked, and reassured, he turned his torn and bleeding face away and his part in the Game was over. Mary would be glad, he thought.

AFTER ALL THIS

Earline Parish Drama File No. 11304

WHEN Donald Calvin and Sue Ashley were only small children, their parents planned their future marriage which would unite the separate fortunes. Sue moved away when she was seven, and the Calvin family said nothing to Donald to prepare him for her blonde attractiveness when they meet years later. Sue comes back to the town to spend the summer with friends. Donald escorts her everywhere, adding to his fond parents' secret hopes. However, he has never considered her as a wife but more in the relationship of a very dear sister.

A stray dog playfully scampering about him as he strolls through the woods one day indirectly introduces him to Joan Lexton, a very beauitful brunette, who is visting her aunt. The two young people quickly become friends, and arrange to meet again. In the days that follow they are together almost every afternoon. His parents notice with displeasure that Donald is neglecting Sue. One day Mr. Calvin calls him into the library and hints plainly of his desire to have Sue for a daughter-in-law. Donald is aghast. Though he tries to tell his father of his feelings, Mr. Calvin orders him to either marry her or face disinheritance. Only a boy still, always surrounded by comforts and a hither-to generous, loving family, Donald is stunned. He realizes it is unfair to marry Sue without love yet he cannot hear to grieve his parents. Donald finally proposes and is accepted. He plans to see Joan for the last time. Running to meet him, she trips and Donald catches her. Holding her in his arms, Donald can no longer restrain himself and tells her of his love. She, too, is in love with him. The days that follow are perfect ones, clouded only by Donald's secret knowledge of his pledge to Sue. As the wedding day approaches, he is nearly insane, knowing that he cannot keep his altar vows while Joan is somewhere in the world. That night when he meets Joan, he is in a frenzied passion in which he tells her that because of his love for her she must die. Wildly he plunges a knife into her yielding flesh. A moment later he realizes what he has done—killed the person most dear to him. A murderer cannot marry the innocent Sue. Hastily packing a few clothes, Donald sets off with no idea of destination. When his money runs out, he hitches all over the country begging odd jobs. One night going along a country road weary and hungry, he sees a farm house. The mistress of the house not only gives him food but promises him work as a farmhand. She had been married and widow twice, and has a daughter who is recuperating from an accident. On the third day, Donald glimpses the daughter who turns when she his footsteps. He staggers. It is Joan—the girl he loved and killed. She recognizes him also and faints. Donald feels he cannot leave without speaking to her Several days pass before he meets her outdoors. He begs her listen to him while he relates the series of tragic events that led to the insanity of that fatal night. Now, he can go, but she must always remember his great love for her. In silence, Donald starts to leave, when Joan wildly calls him. His eyes are unbelieving of his good fortune. With her safe in his arms, the past is only a bad dream; only her lips against his—reality!

CHEROKEE ROSE

W. N. Heyward Drama File No. 11306

WHEN common love for sport together with a silent, sympathetic respect for each other's racial and ancestral pride draws these two—a white man, and the last of the Cherokee Indian tribe, into strong friendship, it is almost inevitable that their children form even closer bonds. Henry St. Clair, who sprang from a proud, old Huguenotte family looks forward to his son Dick, carrying on his unbroken heritage of pure lineage. The blood of both races flow in the veins of Cyrus DuPree's daughter, Rose, whose mother was a white woman of good family. His only child, she attends the town public school, boarding at the home of her teacher, Edith Van Allen who is only a few years years older. Despite brief age differences, Edith and Rose grow very close. They offer contrasting types of beauty. It is the fond hope of Mr. St. Clair and Edith's father that their children unite both families through marriage. The god of love has other plans however. Soon all of Bluffton is secretly aware that St. Clair is sending his son to an eastern school, fearing the boy is growing to fond of Rose. It is apparent that the children's fathers no longer meet, and gossip is rife. That summer when Dick returns he spends his time in joint company with the two girls. However, one day Edith cannot accompany them and Rose and Dick wander alone to the old wharf to watch the sun setting over the river. Pleadingly Dick tells the half-Indian maiden of his love. Rose confessse her answering love but tells him that each belongs in a different world which not even their affection can bridge. They cannot escape the opinion of the world. She loves him too much to see him throw away his place in it, though Dick would do so gladly. This is to be their final meeting before Dick returns to school. He plunges into his studies to forget and when he returns home, after graduating with high honors, his father proudly walks beside him through Main Street. The townspeople are more interested in watching a meeting between Dick and Rose, but the girl is back with her father. She avoids going into town. Her father says nothing but cannot help feeling bitter. One September morning the St. Clairs, father and son, set out in a small boat to fish for bass. Glimpsing them as they pass her island, Rose waits to see again her lover on his homeward journey. A sudden squall comes up. The girl sees the craft tossing helplessly, keel over, with a man clinging to the side. Her screams for help bring her father and together they brave the waves, scorning the tempest as St. Clair had scorned his child. In the darkness he can no longer see the girl. A streak of lightning shows DuPree his daughter is gone. Tempted to turn back, the father visualizes his daughter leading him on to save the man for whom she has given her life. As quickly as it came, the storm abruptly ends. DuPree reaches the boat where the unconscious Dick is lashed to the rigging. Prolonged search fails to reveal the bodies of Rose and St. Clair. A year later two people are seated in the spot where the Indian girl once voiced her love. Her spirit now seems to be hovering in blessing over the two so dear to her in life; now plighting their troth to each other.

DOLL MURDER MYSTERY

James Spillers Mystery File No. 11254

WHILE her fiance, Leo Harten is visiting her at her California University, Mary Wagner receives a telegram telling of the sudden death of her father. She hurries back to her family estate in Kentucky and is met at the airport by her brother Gene, and the butler, Tony. Gene, nervous and high strung, insists that mysterious things are going on at home. The estate is tied up and it will take several months before the rich oil fields left by Walter Wagner can be turned over to his heirs. Leo is with Mary constantly and begs her to marry him immediately. However, out of respect for her father, she refuses. One day she is horse back riding with Leo. Down the road they meet Tony who is going to town to buy some supplies for the house. Mary and Leo return. To their horror they discover the body of Gene, stone dead. Mary becomes hysterical. Tony, hearing her cries returns and phones for Captain Barney Williams, Chief of Detectives who arrives with his Sergeant Baneroft. Although at first no cause for the death of Gene can be determined, Mary refuses to believe that the two deaths were natural and it is Bancroft who discovers death was caused by a subtle poison which acts within three minutes, thereby giving the victim time enough to leave the scene of the crime without suspecting he has been murdered. Everybody in the house provides air-tight alibis. Tony couldn't possibly have been in the house at the time of the murder. Leo was with Mary. The two detectives begin a thorough investigation. Leo pleads with Mary to marry him instantly and becomes resentful when she refuses him. Suddenly they hear a thud. Rushing upstairs they find Sergeant Bancroft bending over the murdered body of Captain Williams. Leo looks at him accusingly as the stricken detective admits that he didn't leave his friend's side for the last half hour. Carefully he goes back over their steps. Meanwhile Sergeant Bancroft is falling in love with Mary. She begs him to stop the investigation and offers to lock up the house and go away. However, Bancroft insists that he can clear up the mystery. Retracing his steps. he recontructs the entire investigation conducted by himself and the late Williams. In the nursery he stops before a doll, and says, "Then he picked this up." Mary stops him saying, "That belonged to my younger sister. It has been here since ——she died." Bancroft steps aside. However, seeing Mary's lips tremble, he is unable to restrain an impulse to take her in his arms. As he kisses her, he accidentally brushes the doll off its place against the wall. Apologetic he picks it up only to notice a small stream of liquid on the floor. Analysing it he discovers it is this liquid which caused the three deaths. Behind the doll is a wall safe, containing deeds to the oil lands. Dashing up the stairs, he surprises Tony, the butler, preparing another vial of the death dealing poison. In his dismay at being caught in flagranti, Tony spills the liquid on himself, and dies implicating Leo, who hired him for the work. Bancroft proceeds to the garden where he discovers Leo trying to force himself on the struggling Mary. Leo shoots wounding Bancroft, but Bancroft overpowers him and turns him over to justice. Safe from further horrors, Mary inherits the estate and is married quietly to the valiant Sergeant Bancroft.

HUNTER'S GAME

Lydia Mar Drama File No. 11156

ALEC MEADHAM was going back to the jungle to-morrow. As he sat with the beautiful girl he loved he spoke of Max, his brother, who awaited him, with the doctor, out in Africa. They would work like slaves in the year to come to build up the Meadham Ivory Company, and then Alec would come back to marry her. Elsa raised shy blue eyes to his. He kissed her. It would tear his heart to leave her but he must go.

The Meadham Ivory Company was in bad shape during Alec's absence. Max had no business head. He was glad to be able to say goodbye to this jungle and go back to England for six months. Alec said it was wonderful there—but he did not tell him the cause of this joy, Elsa. The mail came once in a fortnight. Max never failed to write, but Elsa,—Alec had never received a word from her since he had left town. He could not make it out. Once Max wrote of a "lovely girl" he had met. Alec longed intolerably for his Elsa. Max too found England wonderful. To-day he was motoring in the lovely Southern Wales. How he loved it, but most of all, how he loved the girl who was driving the car. They got down to have tea in a small cottage. Max wondered if Elsa knew Alec. She said she did. She thought he was a fine fellow. Max had a jealous twinge, but Elsa teased him and ran, laughing, to her car. It was late when they got home. She insisted on leaving him at his own house. He could not resist her as she smiled up at him. He crushed her to him. Her foot came down on the accelerator and the next second she had disappeared from view. Soon Elsa pulled up in front of a brownstone house. She tooted and a head was thrust out of a window. "O'Kay!" he called and within a few minutes, Elsa was off on another ride with another man.

Max returned to Africa regretfully. Business was expanding. Max told Alec of his holiday. He spoke of the girl he had met and Alec asked so testily who she was that Max withheld her identity. He saw it would be best to keep his brother ignorant of his love for some time to come. Meanwhile the mail continued to come in. Alec received no letter —neither did Max. Eventually Max wrote asking Elsa to marry him. There was no response.

Unnerved, irritable, Alec thumbed the orders for Ivory. He, Max and the doctor were going into the jungle. After a gruelling day of travel they settled in a clearing. Max was unusually quiet. Alec never spoke. The Doc clicked his tongue with boredom. At last Max roused himself. He showed Elsa's picture to the Doc. The old man's eyes flashed admriation. He leaned over to Alec. "Your brother's got good taste, eh?" he said. Alec raised dull eyes but what he saw seemed to smash him in the face. He pounced to his feet. "With love from Elsa," he read. "Stole my girl from me," Aleo growled. Max was excited too, now, but a clenched fist stopped the words in his mouth. The Doc leaped towards Alec. Max would not strike back at his brother. He wandered blindly to the edge of the jungle. He could not understand it. He heard a sound. Alec was there, pointing a revolver at him. Max cried out, but his brother snarled and pulled the trigger. Alec stood gloating over the body. Gradually the horror of his deed struck him. His throat throbbed . . his face twitched . . The persistent, maddening throb of the tom-toms sounded, pom-pom, pom-pom, pom-pom. . .

Meanwhile in London an organ played the wedding march. A bridegroom pressed his ring onto his lovely bride. She raised shy, blue eyes to his. Later, Peter told Elsa she'd never have to want for money. It was all in the gilt-edge Meadham Ivory Company. The extras outside were already coming out with MEADHAM IVORY COMPANY CRASHES. Elsa drew away sharply from the touch of her bridegroom. Far away, in the wilds of the African jungle the tom-toms never cease, pom-pom, pom-pom, pom-pom.

THE STAIN

Winnie Moore Drama File No. 11249

IN the darkened room the woman on the bed cries again and again, "My baby. Why can't I see my baby?" Her old colored nurse tries in vain to soothe her, then alarmed by the fever the woman is working up, slips from the room and returns shortly with a tiny bundle. The woman cradles the child in her arms and a moment later her aristocratic family come into the room, shocked at the squallor. The little mother is forgiven for having run away from home. She smiles wanly, and dying, receives comfort as her people promises to bring her baby up in luxury. The colored nurse moans but dares not confess that the white woman's baby was born dead, and that the child Elaine, was born of a young mulatto!

Elaine is brought up with every cultural advantage. Nobody suspects her tainted blood and, while at a fashionable finishing school she meets Reed Staunton, a popular young attorney. He idolizes her and friends believe their marriage to be perfect. Together they tour the world, and when they learn there is to be an addition to their family, Reed is more tender than ever to his adored wife. Elaborate plans are made for the baby's arrival .The young husband suffers agonies as the hours drag by. Finally he hears a baby cry. He wants to rush in but he is forbidden. Impatient at being restrained, he burst into the room to find his wife weeping like a lost soul. The doctor and nurse make a dash to cover the baby's face. Reed snatches the covering off and stares in horror at the tiny black face. Consternation fills his soul and he hurls bitter accusations at his wife. In vain she pleads her innocence. Crushed, the husband leaves her, providing well, however for her and her child. The negro mammy who learns of the tragedy comes, and confesses the truth. However, Elaine shows no willingness to live and after her death the baby, Victor, is placed in a home for colored children and showing a remarkable aptitude receives a fine education.

Reed learns the truth. Remorse overtakes him. He drops his career and leaves for the remote parts of the earth trying to forget. Everywhere he is reminded of Elaine and how much he loved her. At last he takes to drink to obliterate the past. He sinks lower and lower to the depths of degradation and finally purchases poison with which to end his life. On his way home he passes a little church. A prayer meeting is in progress and shivering, he walks inside. A dark handsome young man is pleading with souls to accept Chirst. The audience presses forward, drawn by the compelling voice. Almost against his own volition, Reed finds himself among the converts. He falls to the floor and Victor has him carried inside. Finding the poison, Victor puts it aside and carefully nurses Reed through his illness. Reed finds curious consolation in the young minister and shows him the picture of Elaine. Wonder and pity shake the younger man, as he draws forth a similar miniature of his mother. Shaken with emotion, Reed reaches out his hand to his son as the sun slowly fades from the sky.

LOVERS RETURN

Miriam Ramsburgh Drama File No. 11245

IN perfect rhythm Gwyn Jaffsenn and Robert Burton glided across the smooth floor and as the strains of "Sweet and Lovely" drew to a close, Robert brought her back to her partner, Len Meredith. The next day Robert phoned and having given him permission to call Thursday night, Gwyn picked up the letter from her friend Deborah, who had gone to Paris with her Frank, and was enthusiastic over her opportunity to study art for the first time without having to worry over expenses.

Thursday Robert came and for hours Gwyn and he discovered, each other's minds, humors, and tastes. Suddenly, inexplicably she was in his arms. The next day they rode together. They were in love. The days sped by. Once Robert told her of his ideas of marriage. He had watched so many people fail. Was she brave enough to risk a trial marriage? Gwyn wondered if this could be happening to her. She thought of the many failures. She thought of Debbie and her happiness with Frank. "Yes," she answered softly. Thereafter they were closer than ever. Robert adored her and life took on a new rhythm for Gwyn. Lately Robert was worried about his work. He held a high executive position in the branch office of a firm. His superior had just been replaced, summarily, and in place of capable, friendly, Porter, a boorish aggressive fellow had been put in charge. Salaries had been slashed and dissatisfaction was rife among the workmen. Gwyn placed cool hands on Robert's brow and leaning back Robert forgot for an hour his business worries. A week later, Robert phoned. The business had collapsed. He was going away. "Robert . . . " she protested. He was gone.

Life went on. Gwyn had her work. One day Frank came with letters Deborah had sent. From them Frank and Gwyn learned the whole tragedy. Deborah had fallen in love with a young Italian artist in Paris. He always spoke of wanting to marry her as soon as he made some money. Deborah was painting his portrait and at last she sold it for a handsome figure. That night she received a frantic call and proceeding to the attic where the young artist lived, she found he had committed suicide, having found out for the first time about Deborah's affair with Frank. Dazed Deborah had walked the streets until she had been struck by an automobile. It was months before she left the hospital, lame, disfigured, her one obsession to buy back the portrait of the Italian which she had sold. However, it had been resold at twice the original figure to an American collector and she had haunted the galleries until at last she saw it on exhibition. For twenty minutes she had stood before it. People stared at her. Then with a cry of, "God!" she had crumpled to the floor dead.

Through Frank Gwyn was to be able to buy at last the masterpiece of her unfortunate friend Deborah, whose experiment had failed as Gwyn's had. One day Len Meredith was to take her to dinner and to ask her once more to marry him. Regretfully Gwyn refused, knowing that for her there was but one love—Robert's And then at last, Robert was to call. She was working on her novel when he came in. In a crumpled smock, with smudged face, she threw herself in his arms, and holding her tightly he told her of how he had drifted, discouraged, for a year. Then he had met again Porter, who was opening a business of his own in a small town. Robert's salary was only $3,000 a year at present. But would Gwyn marry him when he made more? And Gwyn answered, she would marry him now, and in his arms she felt again—peace.

THE DOOR OPENED

David F. St. Clair Drama File No. 11012

INSPIRED by his great love for Napoleon, Davan Manas, 20th century youth, turns back the clock until he is reliving the historic period of his famous hero's rise and fall. The knowledge comes to Davan that his present self is reincarnation of Napoleon, and in turn that of other great historic figures whose lives have transformed the progress of human destiny. At a peace conference in Washington, led by Helen Von Dergratz, outstanding worker in the pacifist movement, he has an intuition of impending tragedy and warns the speaker and her godchild, Garmita Moulins. Before the women have time to act, a bomb destroys the building and kills thousands. When Manas's prophecy of a second bomb is fullfilled, the police arrest him but convinced that he is innocent release him. Garmita advertises for her rescuer, though her godmother is convinced of his guilt. Only when her life is endangered for a second time does Manas come. He convinces her of his reincarnation theory and that his enemies in past lives, have concentrated themselves into an evil force, planning to destroy the social system. With him, Garmita relives her former selt as Josephine, Napoleon's mistress; she pledges herself to his present destiny. In Paris he is arrested through Miss Von Dergratz' charges but is freed when the French minister mystically realizes that Manas' fortunes and his have been linked in the Battles of Napoleon. Many flock to Manas' appeal for an army of rightcousness to fight the "super-demons." In the coming era of terror he declares a spiritual cleansing will result; the backward and the incarnations of evil will be destroyed; in its place will come a new conception of human brotherhood. In the midst of a financial panic when the government treasury is mysteriously looted, a strange epidenic of sudden deaths sweeps through America's large cities. Water and electric power becomes immovable.

A world-wide television concert is held, a religious drama based on the creation of the universe and the impossibility of its destruction. Thousands desiring the invigorating comfort of faith attend. In the midst of the concert, Manas enters and is the cynosure of all eyes. Suddenly there are wild, horrible screams, then deathly silence—the entire front row of people collapses. Shouting to the others not to move, Manas rushes to the music instrument and turns a swith. The radio box explodes. While physicians and nurses apply first aid, Manas announces that the nightmare happenings are the creations of a group of Germans, his enemies in former incarnations who have finally united in one last attempt against him. They have control of a death ray which can be released at will through any air current; and it is from the radio that they are spreading death at the concert. When Manas tampers with the switch, he rebounds the force of the destructive ray on its operators and the world is safe.

Manas is acclaimed as the people's savior and accepts their mandate to lead them in organizing a new Utopia. Soon after, Manas and Germita, husband and wife, stand before Napoleon's tomb, content that their old love has risen to new heights.

SINNERS IN SACKCLOTH

Hazel Whited Drama File No. 11184

TO Sara Lee the love of the handsome, dashing Ronald Dane was a strange, wonderful thing. Her lovely eyes followed him worshipfully until the day when shyly Sara confessed she was going to have a child. Nervously Ronald told her he would meet her that evening. But the moon waxed and waned, and Sara, waiting alone under the sycamore tree where they had spent so many happy hours shivered and returned slowly home. Time passed and it could no longer be concealed that Sara Lee was to have a child and that Ronald Dane had fled, leaving her to bear her shame alone. Then one day Sara's baby was born, a lovely infant, with a red birthmark on her shoulder. Sara held her little Mary close, but when her father discovered Sara's sin, he ordered her to give her child up. Frightened, realizing that starvation and worse awaited the child if she tried to run off with her, Sara desposited the waif on the doorstep of old Mother Jones, an eccentric character who lived alone in the woods, surrounded by a brood of homeless dogs and cats whom she had given shelter and love. Mother Jones finding the little one stared in amazement, then picking up the tiny one crooned a song of denied mother love. So Mary was to grow up in the woods, old Mother Jones her only tutor. When the minister came, scandalized that the child had not gone to Sunday school, old Mother Jones shooed him off and asked what would the child be knowing of evil? And when the teacher came, Mother Jones sent him away saying the child had no need of book learning. Then one day a couple took a cottage on the lake near Mother Jones' place. The woman befriended the little wild girl, for she was Sara who, still beautiful had met and married Jack, a wealthy older man, without ever having told him about her past. However, when they had failed to have children of their own, Sara had urged him to come to this lake, since her heart cried out for sight of her child. Soon after Mother Jones died. Hearing Mary's cries, Sara rushed to her and picked up the grief stricken little girl in her arms. When she urged Jack to adopt the girl, he acceded, amused at her antics. However at home, the wood child proved a little savage. Only with the greatest difficulty could they persuade her to eat with a fork and knife, and often she embarrassed Sara's guests by skating wildly down the paraquet floors. Sara lavished all her love on the child, who ignoring Sara's love for classical music, jazzed and burlesqued everything she heard. Lack of early training and the inheritance of wild blood from her father soon caused Mary to go astray. Once all the silverware was discovered stolen, and the chauffeur found it in the garage where Mary had hidden it. Sara pleaded with the man to keep the incident secret, but Mary by this time was slipping out of the house to meet a gangster she had picked up. She was induced to act as a blind for thieves and actually helped in a daring daylight robbery. Chased by the police, Mary was wounded and captured. Sara, hearing, rushed to the hospital accompanied hy Jack. At her child's bedside Sara confessed her secret and with a cry of mother, Mary died. Jack left Sara then, but returning to arrange about the divorce, realized how faithful she had always been to him. And with the realization that their love was too strong to be set aside because of a long forgotten sin, he returned to take Sara in his arms, and together they began anew.

A STRANGE ROMANCE

B. Owens Drama File No. 10985

GRANDMOTHER Baron was the first generation of the family to settle on the Wilmont farm. By dint of hard labor, after her husband's death, she managed to provide a living for John, her son, and Mary and Ann, her daughters, They did not share her love for the soil, and only John remained, when death finally dissolved the family, little interested in farming, but unable to make a living at another trade. He married and became the father of two girls, Beth and Madge. Since childhood, Beth, the eldest, assumed many of the household dutiies, as her mother was an invalid. Hastening to her mother, who lay on the floor, the girl discovered that she was dead, and comforted as best she could her little sister, Madge. When her father returned from fishing, the sixteen year old girl told him the sad news, between sobs. A few months later he, too, was discovered to have joined his wife, as he lay sleeping. Beth tried to mother Madge, only eight years old, and provide for them both. Aunt Mary, their only close relative, longed to adopt the girls, but her husband would not permit this; secretly she visted them whenever she could, giving them the small weekly salary she earned at her husband's store. The Taylors, a wealthy neighboring family, offered no assistance to the children; with Chippy, their dog, they were forced to face a hostile world almost alone.

Longing for friendship, Beth picked a bunch of wildflowers, and, finding the door of the Taylor home open, walked in to the living room where she shyly offered them to Una, the daughter of the house, who was entertaining her fiance, Lee Howe. Coldly, the young woman ordered Beth to leave at once, rejecting the flowers, but Lee took them from the girl with his thanks, graciously putting her at ease with his kindness. After she left he remonstrated with his sweetheart for her callousness, and when Bobby and Ray, the other Taylor children, came in from the tennis courts, Lee proposed that all of them aid the Baron girls. Shouts of derision greeted this suggestion, but the next day Lee called, alone, at the little home. Fearful lest he was planning to send them to a home, Beth regarded his advances warily, but when she learned that he only wished to help, tears of gratitude came to her eyes. At his home, Lee confided to his butler, Jake, that he had fallen in love with Beth. When Aunt Mary visited the girls she noticed that Beth seems uneasy, and questioned Madge, who related the story of Lee's visit. Eager to protect her nieces, Aunt Mary stayed over the week end, and, that night, Beth confided again the whole incident. Aunt Mary assured her that if the young man's intentions were honorable she had no wish to interfere, and that could soon be determined. Smiling when she discovered that Beth was too absorbed in romantic dreams to enjoy her breakfast, Aunt Mary gave the girl money for her first pair of silk stockings and a new gingham dress. Lee was greeted by Aunt Mary, who firmly questioned him as to his intentions; when he declared that he loved Beth and wished to marry her, these two became fast friends. Alone with Lee at a fashionable night club, Lee frankly explained the situation to Una, who refused to release him, abusing Beth with insulting comments. Wiring for her parents, Una informed them of this turn of events; Mrs. Taylor filed suit for breach of promise against Lee, Charging him with dishonorable conduct, but Beth refused to believe this. When Una eloped with a wealthy banker, she admitted the charges were false. Providing everything for Aunt Mary and Madge as well as Beth, Lee and his beloved shopped happily together. The following week, Beth, radiant in bridal white, became his wife. Aunt Mary's husband asked forgiveness for his neglect, which the happy girl granted, and with a prayer of thanksgiving, the older woman watched Beth ride away with the man of her choice, while little Madge waved a glad farewell, soon to be with them again.

NOT GUILTY

I. A. Orton Drama File No. 10731

IN her great love for Martin Haines, Grace Moore believes his story that he will get a divorce from his wife and marry her. But when she finds that she needs the protection of Martin's name, Grace is to learn that for all of his professed love for her, he is moved by considerations of a wrecked career and the mockery of his friends, rather than her. "After all," Martin says glibly, "These aren't Victorian times. I'll give you money to go on a year's vacation. Nobody will suspect." "Martin!" Grace cries, and as for the first time she sees the man she loved as he really is, she runs blindly from him.

Months pass. Wanly Grace looks about the white hospital room. "My baby?" she asks. The nurse and doctor exchange glances. "You signed your name to an orphanage blank." For a moment Grace does not understand, then as they tell her she has given her baby away, she cries desperately, "But how could I? I wasn't conscious." The nurse and doctor shrug and Grace is left alone. In the weeks that follow she is forced with the necessity of getting a job or else go hungry. Knowing that the orphanage authorities will be more likely to listen to reason if she can prove she is able to support her child, Grace goes about getting a position and at last is employed as secretary to Luke Thomas, prominent lawyer. Thomas is well pleased with her work and once, noticing the time comments, "You're working too hard, Miss Moore." Scarcely looking up from her typing, she answers. "Thank you, but I'll finish up before I leave." Thomas shrugs and hurries out.

With a hundred dollars in her purse, Grace tremblingly calls at the orphanage to plead for her child, but is informed regretfully that her baby has been adopted. "Adopted," she cries in anguish, but all her efforts to find out who has taken her child are met with the firm answer that such information is never given out. As she wanders toward the park she sees hired nursemaids boredly pushing perambulators and her heart aches within her. One day as she is working, she hears one of Thomas' friends saying, "Well you can't say the Morleys don't try anything. Now they've adopted a baby." Grace thinks little of the conversation until a few days later she sees the Morley nurse coming out of the house wheeling a carriage, and as she half-unconsciously glances in, she is overcome with the conviction that this is her child. Her mind works like lightning and as she follows the woman the obsession to get her child back takes possession of her. For days she plans her campaign, then one day when the nurse carelessly leaves the baby for a moment, Grace seizes her child and escapes. Days later Thomas is appalled to learn that his secretary is charged with kidnapping. Astounded he learns her story and at length promises to help her. With an impassioned speech he calls the jury's attention to the little mother and sways the court's emotions until the jury brings in a verdict of, "Not Guilty," explaining that a mother can not kidnap her own child. Later, in Grace's apartment, Thomas exclaims, "Holding that child so, you look like a Madonna painted by a Great Master." And as a sudden realization that he loves this woman comes over him, Thomas reads his answer in her luminous eyes.

REBIRTH

Patsy Hayes Drama File No. 10874

EVEN when they were children together, Mary and Jim knew they were in love. When, after a sleigh ride during which Jim had placed his own sweater about Mary to keep her warm, she had caught pneumonia, she cried for him constantly in her delirium, and at the advice of the family physician, Jim was sent for. Bashfully, Jim entered Mary's house, but when he looked down upon her wan little face on the pillow, he broke down and cried like a baby. When Mary recovered there was no further talk of separating them, and when Jim's folks moved to another state, Mary convinced her folks to let her go as Jim's wife although neither of the youngsters had reached twenty yet.

So years of struggle started. Two little girls were born to Mary and Jim, and it seemed that for all their hardships there would never be anything but happiness for them because of their great love. However, when the crops failed and the need of food for the children became acute, Jim began to change. Now when he went into town, he sometimes took solace in a drink with the other men. Mary tried not to say anything, even when Jim began staying in town more and more frequently. At last another season came. This time the crops were better and with the money Jim bought a store in town, so they wouldn't have to worry any more, he said. But from then on Mary seldom saw her husband. With another baby on its way, she began to grieve about his working too hard, and one day she came into town to insist that he come home with her. To her utter grief and dismay, she found that he had been spending his time with a town woman of unsavory reputation. Sober now, Jim took Mary home in silence. But some days later, Mary found that Jim had left town with the Lombard woman, leaving instructions with his sales force that the proceeds of his business were to be turned over to Mary. The shock of Jim's desertion almost unnerved Mary entirely, but her mother, sympathizing arrived, and took matters out of Mary's hands until after her baby was born. When Mary learned her child was a boy she exclaimed happily Jim had always wanted a son, but a moment later, she bit her lip and tears forced themselves from her eyes as she realized that Jim hadn't cared what the bahy would be.

For weeks afterward, Mary was too ill to do any work. Then one day there was a knock at the door. When Mary discovered Jim had come back, repentant, she refused to admit him or permit him to see his youngest child. However, the other children ran to their father, and seeing from the window, his devotion to them and the unhappy look upon his face, Mary reopened the door to her husband. Nor was she ever to regret it. For although for years the memory of the other woman was to be strong, thereafter was to come that deep and abiding peace of perfect understanding and love.

WILLIAM TREEBORNE, an eminent geologist,

THE DAWN

J. K. Miller Educational Subject File No. 10852

and his daughter, Eve, listen attentively while Robert Gregory, their young friend, and likewise a geologist, challenges the assumption that the whole of the earth was at one time covered with a gigantic glacier, as the three are enjoying after dinner coffee. Stating that the core of the earth was subject to so much change during the ice ages that prediction of the exact areas which were covered is impossible, Gregory defends the theory of the nebular hypothesis. Later, alone in the garden with Eve, Gregory tells her he loves her; Tree-Borne, coming upon the two in close embrace, promises jestingly that he will consent to the wedding if Gregory is able to sufficiently prove his unorthodox theories. The next morning, in his laboratories, Gregory demonstrates models and photographs he has made of the earth's creation. In the beginning, he shows a gaseous envelope so dense that radiation was hindered and heat conserved. Offering the various fossil forms which were evolved at this time, and whose skeletons still exists, as proof that subconscious life was even then the dominate force in primitive nature, he continues. As the earth's core took shape, organic life was in, rather that on, its surface, having previously existed, he contends, in gaseous matter.

Gradually, the gas was changed to liquid matter, the liquid to solid; among the last gases to be condensed were the hydro-carbon deriviatives. The crust which was formed by this process was laid over the solid and under the liquid masses of the earth's core, which was largely composed of organic matter. The truth of the saying "The mills of the Gods grind slowly, but they grind exceedingly fine," is seen as it becomes apparent how little of nature's secrets have yet been revealed, by the discovery of fossils; a process in which both time and space are equally important. By means of a motion picture, Gregory shows how, when the gases became so clarified that the sun could at last shine through, land and water were separated and the radiation of heat vastly accelerated. The loss of heat caused by this phenomena may have produced a glacial epoch, Gregory adds. Before heat was permitted to pass freely, crystallization was inoperative, therefore organic life must have preceded the formation of marbles, quartzites, granites and other forms. The plastic condition hardened in various forms and degrees, fixed by the shape and motion of the core, which, in turn, determined the various zones of temperatures on the earth's surface. As the shrinking of the core became more and more rapid, Gregory demonstrates, due to loss of heat and the envelope more clarified and rarified, conditions of life became more precarious, and new forms evolved which were adaptable Lateral pressure lifted the forces to their maximum height, where they were baked into solidity, held at an angle. Cold, then played its part as the glaciers crushed down the materials, distributing from the use of earth's new inhabitants. In view of the unknown size and shape of the earth during the periods ending with the quarternary, how can man say whether it could have been covered with flood or glacier?

In concluding this sound exposition of his revolutionary theories, Gregory adds that it is man's duty to posterity to assist nature in controlling crystallization by WORK as well as FAITH. When Eve turns to Gregory, Treeborne concludes that life will go on as, smiling, he leaves them.

NOT WITHOUT HONOR

Ruth Robb Moore Drama File No. 10768

WITH dignity young John Davidson accepts the sympathy of his late father's friends, Charles Dickerson and Richard Bye, and informed that he has been appointed City Commissioner to fill out his father's unexpired term, promises that he will do his duty to his people. However, taking over his office, John, recently graduated from Yale and imbued with a high idealism, is shocked to find how much graft is going on. He finds that most of the city officials including his father's two friends are involved and that the city is on the verge of bankruptcy. When he refuses $1,000 offered him to O.K. the buying of superfluous street cleaning material, the other Commissioners, Dickerson and Bye inform him he is a "young fool." Meanwhile the Smiths, on whose farm John holds a mortgage urge him to foreclose since they cannot make their property pay. John takes it over, retaining the Smiths as his manager and offering them a large percentage of any possible profits. Having always had his own ideas about how to run a farm, John stocks the place with hogs and cattle, provides a program for the raising of grain, and buys modern equipment to the delight of the aged Smiths. His own interest mounts, and each day as relaxation from his civic duties he runs over to the farm and soon falls in love with the Smiths' winsome granddaughter, Jean. When at last he asks her to marry him, however, she informs him poverty has taught her not to marry without money. She will, she says, wait for John until he has accumulated some wealth. More than ever tempted to capitulate to the bribers, John determines nevertheleess to clean up the town, and uncovers the many extravagant purchases which were known to be utterly needless. Meanwhile John meets again Mary Bye, who comes to plead with John not to be so severe with her father. Although John has enjoyed for many years a fine and beautiful friendship with Mary, he will not sacrifice his principles and when he points out to her, step by step, the corruption that has been practiced, Mary, at first refusing to believe, finally shakes John's hand and is one of the first to congratulate him on his re-election, although her own father is one of the many officials put out of office by the aroused tax payers. John gives Mary a position as secretary and she works enthusiastically together with Jim Patten, a city clerk, who is one of the deserving young men put back on the payroll through John's program of reform. Jean, misunderstanding, feels that she has lost John, and consents at length to go riding with Charles Dickerson, Jr. spoiled son of the former commissioner. However, Dickerson, salary reduced and deprived of graft, is forced to urge his son to go to work. However, the boy has been spoiled too long, and to cover some gambling debts plans to abscond with a large sum of money. He tries to induce Jean to go with, but shocked she refuses, and young Dickerson, suspecting that it is because of John, wrecks his car. The boy dies, but Jean slowly recovers and regaining her strength, takes up work in the Children's Hospital. Although John goes through a period when the people distrust him, he at last convinces them that the tax payers are benefitting and men are being put back to work. He is elected Mayor and Mary and Jim, secretly married, congratulate him. At the hospital John meets Jean again, and as she shows him about and he sees the change in her, his old love overwhelms him and at last, the Right Honorable Mayor takes a bride.

PEACE ARMY

Nicholas Pasillico Drama File No. 11261

NEWSPAPERS all over the country carry shrieking headlines announcing the organization of the Civilian Conservation Corps to care for young unemployed men. James Ransom, returning home after a long tedious day at the office, casually glances over the story and promptly forgets about it for the time being. Three months later, Ransom joins the ranks of the idle when his firm faces bankruptcy. Where he goes, he hears the monotonous drone, "Nothing today; nothing today." Down to his last few pennies, Ransom bitterly faces the prospect of borrowing from his parent's slim funds. On a Central Park bench, he is engaged in conversation by Bill Davis, who suggests they both sign for a six months period in the C. C. C., which will tide them over until conditions better in the fall. The boys are assigned to a contingent leaving for Washington the next day. Ransom says nothing to his friends, leaving a note for his mother just before he slips out. The trip to the camp site is brightened by the girls who greet them at the stations. The babble and merriment suggests scenes during the World War. The first week is occupied with building and preparing quarters. Ransom and Bill are assigned to the same company. Both look forward to their first day of drill. Their captain looks vaguely familiar and Ransom finally recognizes him as a former subordinate in his old office. He is not aware that Hooker blames him for his discharge and is determined to settle the score someday. The two men greet each other, Hooker admirably hiding his distaste. The major announces a dance Saturday, sponsored by the "Y." The Peace Army turns out in full khaki regalia. Ransom is shy at dances and sends Bill ahead while he retreats into an obscure corner. He is surprised to find it already occupied by a slight, curly-mopped girl, whose impish, friendly grin changes his first impulse to retire. Peg is much impressed by his New York air of sophistication, and her obvious admiration comes as soothing balm to his pride. When Hooker interrupts for a dance, Ransom yields unwillingly. When the group leaves, Peg promises him to attend the following Saturday. The evening is ruined for him when she fails to come and he realizes that he has forgotten her address. On Wednesday, he sees Peg inspecting camp with Hooker escorting her. He does not know that when Peg asks to see him, Hooker lies about Ransom's whereabouts and promises to deliver a message. Sick at heart, Ransom goes to Hooker, his superior, and receives four days home leave. Two days later he is arrested for deserting and faces dishonorable discharge. Hooker denies giving Ransom leave wishing to oust his rival for Peg's affections. While they are in the major's office, Peg enters, and both learn that he is her uncle. She tells the major that she overheard Hooker grant Ransom's requests, and his rank is taken away. When Ransom's enlistment is up, he learns his old firm is reopening with a position waiting for him. Now he is free to ask Peg to marry him; for the two lovers the future appears a cloudless, radiant path. ,,

CHILDREN OF SIN

Christine Lilly Drama File No. 11160

WITH a swift kiss to her mother, Mrs. Emerson, Emily runs into the shower room and above the noise of the water Emily can be heard singing, "My Darling." Mrs. Emerson smiles and when, some minutes later, the doorbell rings, she admits handsome Howard Burch, and tells him Emily will be right down. Mrs. Emerson sighs happily as the two young people, arm in arm, leave the house and ride off in Howard's roadster. In a quaint little inn they dine and dance, and on the way back, Howard takes Emily in his arms and tells her he loves her and wants her to marry him. Emily worries because Howard's father has never been very cordial to her, but Howard assures her it is just his way. Burch Senior is so engrossed in business that he never takes any interest in anything else. With the blessing of Mrs. Emerson, the two youngsters set the date of their wedding, and Mr. Burch only grunts when he learns that his only son is getting married. However, Howard's mother makes up for her husband's boorishness by her own gracious reception of the pretty Emily. Howard goes about as though there are wings on his feet, and his friends all congratulates him. Meanwhile in a cheap hotel in another city, a woman drinks from a bottle and clearing her straggling hair from her eyes, stares fixedly at the picture of Emily Emerson, soon to be married to Howard Burch. Grotesque tears form in Sara's eyes and she murmurs faintly, "My God." Throwing the bottle from her she douses her head in water to get herself sober, and carefully dresses in her finest clothes. When the office boy sees the gaudy woman who is asking for Mr. Burch, he tries to keep her out, but at last, at her plea that it is a matter of life and death he informs Mr. Burch. Mr. Burch stares at the name and as Sara Wiggins enters, he pales at sight of her. "What do you want?" he manages at last, and as she reminds him how he had left her when their baby was born, to marry a woman who could give him a start in business, George Burch shifts uneasily in his chair. "Well?" he asks, and then comes the astounding disclosure that, unable to support her child, Sara had given her to be adopted by the wealthy Emersons. Howard Burch was engaged to marry his own half-sister. Remembering his son's shining eyes as he had told George of Emily, the most wonderful girl who ever lived, George groaned. "You've got to stop that marriage," Sara repeated tremulously and promised that she herself would speak to Emily. Wearily George returned home to break the news to his broken hearted son and his wife, who had never known of Sara. Meanwhile Sara called upon the Emersons and for the first time Emily learned that her real mother was not dead, and that she was in love with her own half brother. That night lagging footsteps sounded up the walk. Gravely Emily admitted Howard. For several moments they sat wordlessly together. Then as Howard began to speak, Emily put her fingers softly over his mouth and said, "I know, dear." Then again silence. "We shall always love each other," Howard whispered hoarsely. And Emily, eyes filled with unshed tears answered, "Always."

Edward Dale Drama File No. 11095

BEFORE the Depression the Jones farm covers a large territory. But little by little, pressed by obligations, Elmer Jones mortgages the flat lands surrounding his home to Ross Black, the unscrupulous local promoter. As soon as possible Black forces Jones to give up his flat lands and tries to induce him to sell the rest of his property, suspecting that the Jones Hill, on which the farm house is situated, may well be an oil field. Black's attention to Cynthia, Jones' daughter, are resented by Black's secretary Jane Hill, who has been her employer's mistress. Her jealousy is daily fanned but she bides her time.

Then Phil Cline comes to town. The local girls all vie for his attentions, and in his trips to the bank, Phil soon strikes up an acquaintance with Jane. One day in his geological work in the hills, Phil, secretly employed by the Flowing Gold Oil Co. to investigate the oil possibility of the territory, hears a loud report. He finds pretty Cynthia Jones bemoaning a flat tire on her delapidated flivver, and smilingly he assists her. Soon he falls in love with her, and learning that her father intends selling his remaining property to Black, begs her to wait a few days longer. The results of Phil's work soon convince him that the Jones farm is an oil structure and he wires the news to his company immediately. Jane's brother, the telegraph agent Bob Hill is, however, indebted to Black, and reports the wire. Black proceeds to the farm and exerts all his power to obtain the Jones land. The only one opposing him is Cynthia who begs her father to hold out despite the more than reasonable offer. At this point, however, Phil appears with the agent who has the authority to offer a substantial figure for leasing the farm. Black tries to unload his flat lands to Phil but learns, to his chagrin, that this land is off structure and will not produce oil. The oil drilled on the Jones farm makes them wealthy, but Black conceives the idea of whipstocking a hole from his own land to the Jones land, and thus pirating the Jones oil. However, Jane reveals his purposes to Phil. Phil realizes that Black's scheme cannot be legally prevented and when he attempts to get on their derrick to see if the rotary table is tilted, he is roughly thrown out.

The drilling rapidly progresses and they are powerless to prevent it until, with the aid of geophones, instruments which will detect the scrape of a shovel 2000 feet away, they hear and locate the grinding of the pit as the Black well is deepened. Accordingly, Phil has a well drilled just short of the inclined hole. A few days later, the Black company celebrates their successful operation. However, as the hilarity reaches its heights, they are appalled at the explosion of dynamite in the Jones' new well. Phil assures the discomfited bootleg oil men that he has a perfect right to destroy his own well. Realizing that the Black hole has been blown up now, the celebrants retire awkwardly, while Jane Hill is sent on a trip around the world where she says she won't have any difficulty in forgetting Black; and Phil and Cynthia find joy in each other's arms.

THE SILVER DRAGON

Bernard Kubiak Drama File No. 10970

PROFESSOR MERRIT, internationally famous chemist, instructs his young friend, Johnny Fagon, to shoot at a silken target which he has prepared; when the astonished youth sees no bullet mark he is told that it has been treated with a special chemical, rendering it immune. Also demonstrating a chemical which instantly destroys the silk used on airplane wings, the professor remarks that these inventions will be of the utmost importance in the coming war with Germany, which seems inevitable. A few years later, war clouds break and America is at last drawn into the European turmoil. Johnny enlists in the air service and is subsequently sent to France, as a member of the Eighty First Pursuit Squadron. Major Norman, Commanding Officer, receives word from General Hart that three of his men must be sent to prevent enemy balloons from taking pictures; all volunteer, when the command is read at the mess hall, except Johnny, Fraily. Nicklas and Martin are chosen, while Fagon is sent to patrol the skies. A plane with a silver dragon painted against a black background appears; the pilot, hooded in black, drops a warning to stay away from the balloon, which is ignored. The balloon proves to be a decoy. When a group of fokkers appears, Martin is killed and the other two saved only by the timely intervention of the Silver Dragon. Apparently unharmed by bullets, he drives the fokkers away. Spud Nicklas' plane is damaged, but he makes a safe landing in the trees, and is picked up by Johnny.

Overcome with bitterness at the death of his pal, Martin, Slim Gannon charges Johnny with cowardice for not coming to his aid. When Johnny protests that he was engaged with another Fokker, the men jeer that there are no bullet marks on his plane. Secretly, Slim bandages Spud's injured arm, as the star pilot wishes to fly that night when the beacons are tested. A storm arises, and he is lost for hours, but reappears next morning. Barbara, lovely young ambulance driver, comes to the tarmac with first aid supplies, and is shown about by Slim, who finds himself deeply interested in a member of the opposite sex for the first time. She seems to return his emotion until he scornfully remarks that the coward of the corps is over there and points derisively at Johnny. With a cry, Barbara flies to him, calling: "Johnny, my brother! I didn't know you were here!" And in spite of apologies, the girl ignores Slim.

General Von Einburg of the German air forces, orders Major Forten to attack the mysterious Silver Dragon and discovers the enemy tarmac. Three attempts are made, but each time only a small percentage of the original number of planes return, unsuccessful in their efforts, and recording that the Dragon on one occaision brought down two of their bombers at once by a brilliant bit of manouevring. Attempts of the Eighty First Squadron to apprehend the Silver Dragon likewise fail until his headquarters are finally sighted. Entering, they are greeting at the door by the masked figure, who assures them that he is their friend; then, withdrawing behind a lock door, he leaves. When they break in they find only Johnny, securely tied, who announces that he was kidnapped by the Dragon.

Bull Dugan and Fat Scora, mechanic, quarrel over the former's incorrect English at headquarters, settling the dispute with tomato throwing, but this by-play is interrupted when news come that an enemy attack is scheduled for three. Fat and Nicky are shot down in the fierce encounter, and Spud, going to Slim's aid, is saved by the Silver Dragon. As the Dragon saves Bull from a fokker trap he is shot, and, dying, pulls off his helmet, revealing that he is Johnny, as he smiles! The day saved, Slim prepares to send Johnny's possession to Barbara, telling her that her brother died a hero, as he understands that the government forced him to keep secret his knowledge of the chemicals. Even Major Forten regrets the death of so brave an enemy.

ROMANTIC INTERLUDE

Dorotha Ellen Kirk Drama File No. 10813

IMPERSONATING Mildred (Mibs) Mason, a famous dancer, Betty Bryant, sophomore at Indianola College, wins the laughter and applause of her fellow students until the chaperone sends the girls to their rooms to study. Later, when Betty's uncle, who is Miss Mason's manager, sends a check and the information that she is to occupy Mildred's room, at Indianola Springs as a birthday gift, since the dancer has cancelled her intended vacation there, Jean Fox suggests that Betty impersonate the famous Mibs. Always eager for excitement and adventure, Betty agrees to this daring plan, persuading Helen, her more conservative room mate, to accompany her as her maid. . Filled with misgivings, but thrilled with the plan, the two girls register under these assumed names, and are conducted to a beautiful suite at the resort hotel, where Betty, or Mibs, receives flowers from Donald Gordon, whom she discovers is a famous novelist. Dining alone, since she cannot have a maid in attendance, Betty is greeted by a foreign count whom she nicknames "Sir Monocle." He reminds her of happy days they spent together at Nice and Monte Carlo, four years before. Later he presents her to Donald Gordon and Cecil Fielding, his two young friends; Betty has a panicky moment but soon realizes that Donald has not met Mibs previously. Sir Monocle invites her to drive his foreign car, and, recklessly, she speeds across the country, in order to uphold her reputation for daring. When Sir Monocle, or Sir William Ibanitz, as he is really called, presents Betty with a Persian cat, she tries to control her deadly fear of the animal, since Mibs is notoriously fond of them.

Cecil Fielding, Donald's room mate at college, tells his friend that Mibs has evidently mistaken the boy for his illustrious uncle, the writer, and agrees to pose as his valet and chauffeur, in order to continue the association. Since Mibs is a famous swimmer, Betty, who can barely stay above water, is forced to attempt to exhibit her prowess in the pool, and is injured in diving. Donald quickly comes to her rescue. As maid and chauffeur, Cecil and Helen are introduced, and the proud young girl discovers that she is falling in love with a servant as the four drive across the country. Hotly she defends him to Betty when they are alone in their room. As Betty and Donald are dancing, Sir Monocle cuts in, and persuades the young woman to take Felix, her cat, for an airing. Then he proposes to her, but as Felix breaks away, the situation is temporarily saved while the two recapture him. At the breakfast table, Donald tells Betty and Helen the legend of the Treasure Cove. Oolah, half white daughter of Cornstalk, loved Paul, son of her captured nurse, as a child, but when marriage to him became impossible because of tribal hostility, she and her lover jumped to their death over a cliff. Burying his treasure, Cornstalk followed them. The four young people discover the graves of the Indians and Helen, becoming buried when a part of the cliff gives away, inadvertently reveals the Treasure Cove as Cecil rescues her.

Meanwhile, Mibs Mason, and Celeste, her maid, arrive at the hotel. Discovering the deception, Mibs registers as Helen, and soon understands what is going on. She is included in a riding party in which Betty, attempting to uphold Mibs' prowess, is injured, and the dancer helps Donald take the girl to her room. When Donald Gordon, Sr., hears that his favorite nephew is paying court to the dancer whom he loves, he hurriedly arrives by plane at the hotel, and, meeting Mibs in the hall, hears the truth. Betty, Helen, Cecil and Donald, Jr. likewise encounter the two in the corridor, and are much relieved when they learn that the girls they love are college students, who return their youthful affection. The mystery cleared, the six celebrate their engagements with roulette and keno, where a final fillip of excitement is added when gangsters rob the place, taking Mibs' jewels, which, fortunately, are paste.

AMERICANOS

Charles C. Jacklin, Jr. Drama File No. 10935

AT a rodeo in Arizona, Allister, a cowpuncher, is accused by a drunken puncher of having stolen a horse. The two men fight and when the other draws a gun, Allister lunges at it. It goes off, and as the son of Bart Mansfield, biggest cattle king in Arizona drops to the ground dead, Allister discovers that a gang of men, the leader swinging a rope, are out for his blood. Springing into his saddle, Allister outdistances the whole yelling moh and a few days later lands in New Orleans. There he books passage on a fruiter heading for some place in South America. As he smokes and leans over the rail of "Las Vegas" he hears a commotion and learns that a stowaway has been discovered aboard. The fellow, claiming he was beaten up and robbed as he left a saloon in New Orleans, refuses to work for his passage and is in danger of being beaten up severely when Allister interferes. Magnanimously he peals off two hundred dollar bills and pays Yates passage, thereby winning for himself an inseparable but distractingly garrulous companion.

"Las Vegas" lands in the tiny republic of Montecillo, but Yates observes the portly women and with obvious boredom exclaims, "Lead me to a saloon." Minutes later, several glasses of tropical liquor beneath his belt, Yates surveys the lazy-looking town with greater amenity. Passing the Palacio Gobernado where the President resides, Allister notices the guards heavily armed and the burros packed high. "Hell's bells," he exclaims, "I hope we ain't run into a revolution!" Meanwhile, from the balcony of the palace the magnificent Senorita Maria de las Trenas, daughter of the president, notices the two Americanos and dispatches a messenger with a note asking them to meet her in room 215 of the Hotel Rey. The adventurers exchange amused glances and set off for their rendezvous, only to stare abashed at the lovely lady and awkwardly to sweep their hats from their heads. She tells them that there is a revolution in progress and since her father's illness the enemy has been winning. A breathless mozo dashes in with a note telling the Senorita that General Juan Lagarto has been defeated by the rebels, and his men are retreating in wild disorder. Promising their aid, the Americanos meet the staff officers of the Loyalists in a tiny adobe railway station and learning that the former Commander-in-chief has been killed, Allister accepts full command of the army. With three hundred soldados, Allister boards an old fashioned locomotive but at the last moment he is unable, although he searches every saloon in town, to find Yates. After a brief farewell to the lovely Senorita, Allister and his army proceed. On the way they find a scattering of General Lagarto's deserters, and press them into service on pain of death. The Loyalists in the garrison of Vista del Mar, surrounded and beseiged by the rebels have just put up the white flag when Allister's re-inforcements arrive and put the attackers to rout.

Meanwhile, in the capital city, a detachment of rebels rides down the street, shooting and yelling. Yates, staggeringly drunk, comically begins clubbing several revolutionists, stealing up behind them. Discovered, he runs for shelter in an alley, and as his pursuers reach him, silently dispatches one after another with his club. The arrival of Allister's victorious army, finishes the fight. Senorita Maria and her father reward the brave Americanos, but dismayed by the Senorita's praise of Yates, whose comical single-handed battle she has admiringly witnessed, Allister suffers the throes of unrequited love, until Yates informs him he is returning to the States to see his wife and six kids again, and with a cry of joy, Allister dashes to the palace and the waiting arms of the Senorita.

THE PUBLIC SERVANT

Willie Huggins Drama File No. 10962

HUNGRILY watching the delivery of some loaves of bread, Fred Brent steals a loaf and runs. The angry baker has him arrested, and although he pleads hunger before Judge Hansom, he is told that there is no excuse for stealing and is sentenced to jail. There, one day, defending a fellow prisoner against the assault of the warden, Brent is sentenced to solitary confinement. Some days later, while a truck load of bread is delivered, Brent slips into an empty box and is driven outside of the prison gates. Desperate in his anxiety to change his prison clothes he breaks into a house and steals a suit of clothes. As he is leaving he notices a picture of Judge Hansom on the piano, and in a final gesture of derision, he steals money from the safe and departs.

Catching a bus for Philadelphia he enters the casino club, but he is mistaken for a copper and as the signal light flashes all the money is cleared from the table. However, he soon convinces the bar tender that he is one of them, and he gets a job as game boss at the Casino. He meets Texas Mary, one of the cabaret girls and through her is introduced to Toad, gang leader, and Jones, gambler who is running for the office of Mayor of the city. Seeing his opportunity, Brent forms a political club with the slogan "Jones for Mayor." Soon thousands of people are wearing the little buttons Brent distributes boosting Jones and there are big doings at the Casino club on election night. Jones is elected Mayor and in gratitude the Mayor appoints Brent Chief of Police. Mary glows with pride, but her eyes fill with tears when Brent takes her in his arms and asks her to be his wife. Brent cleans up a fortune with permits for gambling houses and dance halls and once a month makes a tour of inspection. Since his arrival is always carefully heralded, when he comes no money appears to be used at the gambling tables and the drinks are all soft. For this his pockets are well lined. Mary begs him to give up the racket, but he tells her bitterly that he is only collecting from crooks. A protest meeting of citizens against the infamous conduct of the city is held and against Brent's express command, the gorillas blow up the Church where it is held. Mary pleads with him to come out of all this, but Brent will not leave his friends in the lurch. Accordingly he finds out when the Attorney General's secret service men are arriving, and he himself convinces them that the explosion was caused by a leaky gas range, and shows them about the so-called gambling houses to prove that everything is above board. However, Bob, Brent's secretary, has been trying to make love to Mary under threat of exposing her husband. When she slaps him, he betrays Brent, but is himself shot as an accomplice when he tries to escape. Brent manages to get out of the casino club, but receives a bullet wound which he tries to conceal from Mary. However, she calls a doctor and Brent is turned over to the police. He gets a sentence of from ten to twenty years, Bob turning state's evidence against him out of spite for Mary. But as he is led away to jail, Mary clings to him, and with tears in her eyes promises she will wait for him until his release, no matter how long it takes.

MY SOUTHLAND HOME

Josephine Di Sario Drama File No. 11092

LIFTING his bride, Selma, in his arms, Phil carries her over the threshold of their new home in the traditional manner. For years Phil and Selma live in complete happiness in their lovely colonial home and the coming of their three children only brings them closer together. One day as Phil sits at the piano, he picks out the notes of a song and Selma, drifting to him, places her hands on his shoulder, and sings in her rich deep contralto, the words of "My Southland Home." As the echoes of the song die away, Phil rises and together he and his wife walk into the garden. Soon the children, noisy and demanding troupe in and Selma goes inside to attend their wants. Years pass. The children go to school, and finally one by one, get married and leave their Southern home.

With hair streaked now with silver, Phil and Selma find themselves still as much in love as when first they met. Then one day Selma takes ill. Day after day she grows more frail, and Phil's heart aches as he sees her setting her teeth against the pain. Her only comfort is the garden in bloom outside, and the great love of Phil. The children hurry back in response to the communication that their mother is dying, and Selma smiles wanly upon them as she notices how far they have drifted in their city ways from the quiet life of herself and their father. As the others leave the room, Selma faintly asks Phil to play for her once more, My Southland Home. With tears blinding his eyes Phil complies, and Selma's lips move soundlessly as she follows the notes of the song. Suddenly she is still. With a cry of anguish, Phil goes to her, but her spirit has gone on.

The days that follow are filled with grief. At last the children insist that Phil come with them to the city, and as the son Kit comes across the music of My Southland Home, he hums the tune and pleased beyond measure plays the song for the music publishers. The song firm for which Kit works as a song plugger, agrees to publish it, and soon My Southland Home is being played on every radio. Meanwhile Phil is finding the city utterly bewildering. The honking horns and blatant voices confuse him, and he feels himself an object of charity in the homes of his children. The first time he hears My Southland Home played over the radio, he stiffens in his chair and listens transfixed. Kit explains that the song is selling like wildfire, but Phil listens incredulously to the saxophones wailing the song. Then, unable to endure it longer, he goes into the street. Through windows he can see couples swaying in time to My Southland Home, he hears a hurdy-gurdy man playing it on an organ while a monkey begs for alms, and passing a noisy cabaret, he sees a coarse faced woman languorously delivering the song while her accompanist follows the lines of her body with half closed eyes. Crushed and hurt, Phil returns to his children and despite their rebukes that he is ungrateful and sentimental, he returns to the South. As he comes up the walk, the trees, the stream, even the birds seem to welcome him and from their myriad throats, like a celestial choir, come the rich full harmonies of My Southland Home.

CONVICTED

Mary M. Jacobs Drama File No. 11203

THROUGH the generosity of Bill Sheldon, Ace detective, plucky little Ann Hunt is able to send her younger brother, Michael, to Medical School. Meanwhile she is unabating in her efforts to locate her other brother, Ted, from whom she was separated at the death of her parents. One day Bill comes in elated over the capture of Ted Hunter, convicted of blackmail. Proudly Bill exhibits the rogue's gallery portrait of his prisoner, but Ann, looking at it, pales and an interview with Ted at the prison proves that he is her brother. Ann, certain of Ted's innocence, is appalled when she learns that Bill is adamant in his attitude toward criminals, and when he advises her to stop wasting sympathy on a lot of vicious characters who should all be lynched, Ann breaks her engagement to Bill, and, on the strength of the sale of one of her stories, sends her brother Michael to Vienna to continue his medical studies, and pays Bill off in full, squaring their account.

Unutterably lonely for Bill, Ann meets Tony Straus, a wealthy broker. When Michael needs more money, Ann decides to sacrifice herself to Tony, who knows that she doesn't love him, but wants her notwithstanding. However, Ann meets Bill again and realizes she cannot go through with the other marriage. She breaks with Tony. Meanwhile, however, Ted has learned of his sister's engagement to Tony and has broken prison. While Bill and Ann are embracing each other the extra about Ted's escape comes out. Frightened by the vindictive look on Bill's face, Ann tries to stop him from getting Ted. To protect her brother, Ann shoots. Bill is taken to the hospital and Ann is grilled under a glaring light. Ann refuses to talk, and Bill declines to press charges. Ann is released, but the police watch her carefully, knowing that eventually Ted will join her. At last, in the park, Ted meets Ann. Bill steps out and is about to arrest him when Ted pleads his innocence, convincing Bill, at last, that not he but Tony Straus, the Black Hawk, is the guilty one, and has pinned the rap on him. With Ted's promise that he will himself help apprehend Tony, Bill, for Ann's sake, lets Ted escape. However, a fellow detective has been sent in case Bill experiences and difficulty, and when Bill's action in freeing Ted is reported, Bill is disgraced. Tony threatens Ann. Bill proceeds to Tony's apartment and with the information necessary to convict Tony, snaps handcuffs on the supposed broker's wrist. Tony pretends it is all a big mistake and offers to go quietly. However, he is in his dressing robe and asking to be spared the embarrassment of going through the halls of the luxurious hotel thus, he disarms Bill for the second necessary to knock him out with a stiff uppercut. Groggy from the blow, Bill looks into the grinning face of Tony Straus, alias the Black Hawk. Tony prepares to end Bill's life with his silenced gun. Meanwhile, however, worried by Bill's failure to appear, Ted and Ann have followed to Tony's apartment, in time to prevent the cold blooded murder. Tony fires point blank at Ted who falls onto the fire escape. Believing him dead, Tony advances toward Ann. However with his last bit of strength, Ted pulls Tony over so that he catapults twenty-five stories to the street below. Ted dies, absolved of guilt, and entrusting his sister to the care of the Detective who had sent him up. Michael returns from Vienna, and Ann and Bill are married.

STRAYING YOUTH

Leonard A. Eken Drama File No. 10974

RED, a typical boy, overhears his father making plans for a fishing trip to Lake Pepin for the weekend. Knowing that several of his friends are going along with their fathers, Red slides happily down the bannister and bursting into the room pleads to go along too. However, Mr. Johnson absolutely refuses, claiming that Red would be too much trouble and besides there is no room. Red's dejection is increased as his friends wave to him in leaving, and as he walks forlornly down the street. he is hailed by Barney, the leader of the Boy's Club of the community. Discovering the cause of Red's unhappiness, Barney offers to take Red himself, and jubilantly, Red secures the reluctant permission of his mother and sets off in Barney's noisy flivver toward the woods. Far from being pleased at seeing his son, Johnson regards Red as disobedient, and that night when Barney regales the lads with adventure stories, the youngsters wince at the ribald songs which float from the tent where their fathers are busy drinking. Drunk and belligerent, Johnson prevails upon the others to stop supporting the meddlesome Barney, and soon Barney learns that the appropriations for the Boy's Club have been withdrawn. He is forced to accept a position elsewhere to help defray debts he has previously incurred, while Red finds a great gap in his life. In vain Red tries to draw his father into a comradeship, and Johnson cuts Red's allowance and tells him if he wants money he can quit school and work. Red walks long distances to save carfare and one day Ole, one of the school ruffians, tells Red he's a fool to walk when he can easily ride without paying fare. Hesitantly Red agrees to slip by the conductor when the crowd pushes in. However, the conductor recalls Ole from the last time he stole a ride, and discovering that neither boy has money for his fare, turns them over to the local police as an example. That night, badly frightened, Red comes home only to be whipped unmercifully by his father. Sobbing, Red goes to bed. The next day Ole has lost nothing of his bravado, and he persuades the lonesome Red to join his gang. Red's first job is just a lookout, and the work seems easy in return for the money he gets. He sees his father's hypocrisy, and thinks his own crimes are less important, while Johnson, thinking he can coerce his son, deliberately destroys the letters that come from Barney, the letters that would have saved Red from crime.

Meanwhile Red meets Grace, a pretty and lovable girl. He determines that after to-night's haul, since he cannot let down the gang, he will quit. But that night Ole is killed, and as the policeman is going to shoot him, Red fires first and escapes. Although nobody connects him with the murder of Patrolman Brown, one of his father's cronies, Red becomes a different person. He tries to quit but the gang warns him they'll expose him if he tries to desert. In desperation he confides his career to Grace, who sobs that she loves him and will follow him anywhere. However, Red cannot ruin her life by making her, like himself, a fugitive from the law and at length, he gives himself up to the police. His trial is speedy and he is sentenced to death. His father berates him for bringing disgrace on the family, but Grace and Barney fight until the last moment to try to secure a lighter penalty for Red. However, the sentence is inexorable, and as he goes to his death, he carries with him the memory of Grace weeping, with Barney consoling her. And even as his life, once promising, now forfeited to the law at twenty-one, is snuffed out, he is consoled by the thought that Grace and Barney will at length, find happiness together.

PRINCE CHARMING

Estelle Osterhout Drama File No. 11239

IN fulfillment of the dearest wish of her mother's life, Reba, scanty wardrobe in one small valise, boards the train bound for Wayland College. Arrived at the little college town, her heart beats high in anticipation. Everywhere she sees happy girls embracing each other. As she pauses, lonely and hesitant, her cheeks burn as she sees a group of well dressed girls laughing at her shabby clothes. At last she is directed to her own room only to pause wistfully as she discovers that her room mate is one of the girls who laughed. Dorothy stares at her. In the days that follow Reba is aware that Dorothy is doing everything possible to have her room changed. For the Christmas services a young guest minister is invited. He delivers a stirring sermon and Reba is touched. However, when she learns that he has just been appointed to a parish in her own town, she finds a kinship with him. Although they have just a few moments together, the young Reverend Evans realizes how unhappy Reba is here, and admires her pluck in going on rather than disappoint her mother who has scrimped and saved to send ber. One night Dorothy, out to a forbidden dance, fails to return on time. At four A. M. Reba sees her stagger across the campus, drunk. Realizing that the wealthy girl will be expelled, Reba helps her back, risking her own expulsion in so doing. Convincing the suspicious head mistress that there is nothing amiss, Reba puts the now sobered Dorothy to bed. The next morning Dorothy thanks Reba for her assistance and apologizes for having been so nasty to her. That weekend, Bob, one of the boys in Dorothy's orowd is convinced that he ougbt to come to a dance with them. When he claims he has no date, Dorothy begs him to take Reba. Reluctantly Bob consents, but soon is delighted at discovering Reba the most graceful dancer he has ever met. Bob's rival, Roy, seeing his interest in his partner, maliciously cuts in. For the first time in her life Reba knows what it is like to be popular, and although it all starts because the two rivals are trying to outdo each other, Reba, as the object of their interest soon becomes a popular figure on the campus. Bob and Roy continue to vie with each other all during the semester, and when Reba, appointed to a local high school, leaves college, Bob promises to come up to see her.

Back home Reba renews her friendship with the Reverend Evans. Together they discuss the problem children of the parish, and soon their interest grows more personal. Reba has never been so happy in her life. Then Bob comes in his handsome roadster, and while the Reverend Evans is visiting, beautiful roses arrive from Roy. Feeling that if he asks her to be his wife, he will be denying her all the luxuries these other men can give her, the young minister stops coming to Reba's house so frequently. Bob drives Reba frantic with his insistence and finally she agrees to go for a ride with him, telling him that she can never marry him because she loves someone else. Fiercely jealous of Roy, Bob wrecks his car before Reba can stop him. Bob escapes almost unhurt, but Reba's life is despaired of. Remorsefully, Bob waits at Reba's side. Roy telegraphs his regrets at not being able to come himself. When the Reverend Evans learns of Reha's injuries, he rushes distraitly to the hospital. Forgetting his professional dignity, he hurls himself at her bedside. Reba opens heavy eyes, and seeing him reaches for his hand and smiles. As the doctor slowly closes the door, leaving the two together, he pats the shoulder of Reba's distracted mother, and says assuringly, "She will live—now."

THE MARRIAGE BOND

Joseph G. Picco Drama File No. 11248

WITH all pomp and ceremony, the cruel Wah Lee arranges a funeral procession for his daughter Fan Lee, who is to him as if dead, since she has married the young upstart Yung Lo. On the sidelines, Fan Lee shivers as she watches her own procession go by, and Yung Lo, putting his arms protectively about her lovely shoulders leads her from the horrible travesty. In their tiny apartment Fan Lee and Yung Lo are having breakfast. With tears in her eyes Fan Lee pretends gaiety and confidence but when Yung Lo tells her that he has managed to get another position, Fan Lee breaks down as she recalls what her father has done to intimidate others who have dared to employ her bridegroom. Meanwhile in the home of Wah Lee, spies report the movements of the unhappy couple and are sent out to threaten Hop Ling, for whom Yung Ho is going to work.

Yung Lo begins working, but he warns Hop Ling that his father-in-law will do anything to interfere. Hop Ling smiles reassuringly and informs the boy he knows the circumstances and is willing to risk Wah Lee's displeasure. However, that very afternoon he is threatened and that evening as he is praying before the statue of Buddha, Wah Lee's henchman, Ming Woo throws his knife into the back of Hop Ling, killing him instantly. The next morning Yung Lo is appalled at the discovery of the murder. He vows to take revenge upon his friend's murderers. In a Chinese tea room, Yung Lo finds Ming Woo bragging to three young girls of the easy money he has made. Yung Lo bides his time. Following the murderer into the street, he confronts him with the evidence of his crime, and as Ming Woo reaches fearfully for his dagger, Yung Lo kills him. Wah Lee furious at the discovery that his subordinate has been killed and learning that Yung Lo is to auction off the stock of the murdered Hop Ling, sends his men to spread gasoline in the back room. The merchants gather and inspect the stock. Suddenly there is a smell of smoke. They flee. Yung Lo discovers the spreading flames and lifting his helpless wife in his arms carries her out to safety. The fire is extinguished but the stock is ruined. Shaking with helpless fury, Yung Lo applies to Wah Lee's biggest competitor and after a long interview with him, Ching Lu informs his men they are to take orders from Yung Lo. Whereupon, fortified by Ching Lu's bodyguard, Yung Lo convinces all Wah Lee's customers that they ought to buy from Ching Lu instead. Wah Lee, finding his business falling off, decides to strike at the redoubtable Yung Lo through the lovely Fan Lee, whom he has long ago given up as dead. Accordingly he sends a murderer to Fan Lee. However, the bodyguard Yung Lo has stationed about his wife runs in and the murderer strikes wildly and leaves. Yung Lo sees his wife's bloodstained body and calls distractedly to her to speak. Then, half insane with grief, he gather's Ching Lu's men and storms the house of Wah Lee. Wah Lee opens fire but outnumbered, is killed with all his men. With lagging steps Yung Lo returns home, to finds his wife, weak from loss of blood, but still living, and with a little cry, he gathers her in his arms.

TREASURE HOUSE

Lewis Smith Drama File No. 10978

IN a little village where everyone is friendly, 70 year old Kate Schultz with her sharp, evil gossipy tongue is extremely unpopular, on her weekly visits to the general store. Between times, she stays alone in her ramshackle house, and it is now 20 years since a visitor was admitted inside, a situation which Miss Kate has craftily encouraged.

Keith Johnson her young, next door neighbor, is sure that the mystery of her conduct has its explanation in the Schultz home. His grandmother tells him that Miss Kate has locked herself away from people since the day her husband disappeared, thirty years ago. No one knows where he came from or who his people were and Miss Kate refuses to answer any questions, and returns to the use of her maiden name. Mabel, the girl Keith loves, suggests that they explore the house some night but Keith is afraid of being caught. One night, Keith is trying to fall asleep and forget the problem of finances which are keeping the lover from marriage. Suddenly he hears a shriek for help; he runs to his mother's room but she is quietly asleep. Again a shriek and Keith realizes that it is coming from the Schultz house. As he runs toward there, he hears footsteps and runs after the figure cloaked in darkness. Only when he grabs her, does he realize it is Mabel who hears the cries also. Approaching the front door, they see that a side window is broken and they enter through it. Running to the kitchen where a lamp is flickering, they find the old woman, her body crumpled with pain and blood trickling from her scalp. Keith sends Mabel next door to call the doctor and police. In the morning, notice is sent to the surrounding towns to pick up all tramps or other suspicious characters. For several days, Miss Kate lies unconscious and her life is dispaired of. Mabel takes charge as her nurse and keeps away the curious visitors. The town is hysterical; sure that some maniac is loose few are brave enough to venture out alone at night. The police are at a loss for a motive, for the only valuables in the house, the silverware, have been untouched. One evening, Miss Kate recovers consciousness but claims that she saw no one. Her back is turned to the door when the assault occurs. But before her death, she sends for the family lawyer and bestows all the Schultz property on Mabel in gratitude. When the funeral is over, Keith and Mabel return to the Schultz house. The $700 cash she receives with the property will help renovate it they declare. Now Keith plans to fill his long cherished desire to go all through the house, beginning with the cellar. In one corner is a rusty door leading from the wine cellar and Keith starts for it but a barrel fallen sideways blocks his path. It is heavier than he first thinks and Mabel comes to his assistance. Suddenly his foot gives way, plunging into rotten planking which reveals a trap door. Keith makes Mabel wait above for him while he descends the ladder. She is startled to hear his shout of surprise; Keith stumbles against a dead body, nearby are several stone jars filled with silver coins. Again the police are called and the man is identified as Miss Kate's missing husband, and her murderer. Justice visits him in the form of a heart attack when he is in hands-reach of the treasure. And Keith and Mabel rejoice that safe from financial cares, the minister can now announce their wedding banns.

THE IMPERFECT DECEPTION

Blanche A. Wiesen Drama File No. 10501

ON the slender shoulders of Marian Hazelton falls the burden of managing the large family. It is no small matter to keep her good natured but wholly impractical father from squandering the small inherited fortune, and when her younger sister Julia wheedles a promise from Mr. Hazelton to send her to college with Harold, Marian uncomplaining sews clothes for her and writes cheerful letters urging her to take advantage of all her opportunities at the University and not worry about anything. At college Julia becomes engaged to Gerald Miller who drives a flashy car. Jack, Marian's oldest brother goes to visit Julia, but Marian is forced to remain at home and keep the household going. At the college, Jack meets George Longmore, a young medical student, and finding how many interests they share, invites George home for a visit on their farm. George falls in love with Marian and returns home to open his doctor's office.

Meanwhile Julia discovers that Gerald Miller is penniless but has borrowed money so that he could put up a big bluff and marry a wealthy girl. Despite his assurance that he has fallen genuinely in love with her, Julia contemptuously breaks her engagement with Gerald, and returns home, saying nothing to Marian and the others when they ask her how Gerald is. However, when Julia runs down to the mailbox and sees only a letter addressed to Marian from Dr. Longmore, on a sudden jealous impulse she burns the letter and when she returns to college she writes a chatty note to him saying that Marian is so busy preparing for her marriage to a farmer, that she has no time to write. George is dismayed at the prospect of losing Marian, and listlessly goes about his work. However, Julia is quick to exert her wiles and acting on Julia's suggestion that if he marries her he will see a lot of Marian, George finally is inveilgled into an engagement with Julia.

Julia writes that she is coming home to be married, and tired and over worked as Marian is, she begins preparations for her sister's wedding, not suspecting that Gerald Miller is not to be the bridegroom. When George arrives, Marian greets him with averted eyes and in a desperate effort to make conversation with George, whose apparent indifference she cannot understand, she stammers that the bridegroom has not yet arrived. George is puzzled and when Marian says, you know, Gerald Miller, George accuses Julia of having deceived him. Julia, thinking that George has discovered her deception, tries to defend herself and so gives the whole thing away. Marian and George listen amazed, and as George sees the expression in the eyes of the women he loves, he crosses to her and says, "Forgive me." Julia hysterically asserts that someone ought to go in and tell the guests to go away and end the terrible farce, but Gerald, who now arrives in car, comforts her and as her sobs subside tells her he has gotten a posiiton and he can make her happy if she will give him a chance. "You mean you still want me," Julia asks incredulously, "I love you," Gerald answers. And that day there are two weddings in the Hazelton house, and two pairs of young people set off on the great adventure of marriage.

THE WOOING

F. H. Ackroyd Costume Drama File No. 11258

HIGH on her throne, watching the feats of strength, sat the beautiful fair haired Greda, Queen of the Tournament. As the victor, Helmbrecht, eldest son of the owner of Sternberg, knelt before her, she placed the crown on his head, and her eyes sparkled as he spoke in low terms of adoration. Later, withdrawn for a moment from the others, Helmbrecht embraced her warmly and told her of his love. To-morrow he would ask her father for her hand in marriage. Sharply Greda drew in her breath. Her father would never consent. He must follow the custom and send a representative to plead for him. Why not his uncle, Lord Gunzelin, whose wealth and position would militate in favor of Helmbracht? A cloud settled on Helmbrecht's brow as he answered he didn't trust his uncle, but seeing Greda's distress, he yielded.

The next day Greda watched impatiently from the parapet into the courtyard below where the guard of Lord Gunzelin awaited their master. Greda's nurse looked at her fondly and for the first time told the girl how her father had captured her mother on one of his pillaging expeditions. At that time archers sent forth whizzing shafts and missiles from the strongly fortified castle, and the warriors of Deithelm were rumored to be insuperable. It was the gentleness of Greda's mother which in time changed the Baron into a noble knight who eschewed pillaging and carousing. He married her honorably and Greda, the fruit of their love, cost Freya her life.

Discovering that her father's room was emptied of company, Greda swiftly found her way there and excitedly asked if her father had given his consent. Gravely the Baron nodded but as he spoke of Lord Gunzelin, Greda's eyes widened with horror and when she learned that the aged ambassador had pleaded his own cause and been accepted she burst into bitter tears. But her father was implacable. It was enough for him that he had given his word. Warned that if she attempted violence to herself, Helmbrecht would be tortured, Greda returned dully to her room. The weeks passed. Greda wept out her heart's grief. The old nurse was her only comfort. Like one returned to stone, Greda endured the fitting of her wedding finery. With frightful composure Greda met her wedding day. Lord Gunzelin in his senility had decked himself out as a young man. The horns blew. The trumpets sounded. The Wedding procession wound its way over the narrow path to the Chapel. Greda sat upon a milk white palfrey, riding to her doom. The palfrey tarried. Impatient, Gunzelin struck the animal a sharp blow. Mounting on its hind legs the animal leaped forward. Frightened now, Gunzelin reached out for his bride. His great war horse slipped on the narrow ledge and, with a terrified scream, Gunzelin rolled to the bottom of the precipice. The bridal party watched the father gain on the maddened steed which Greda rode, then struck on the leg by the maddened beast, the Baron fell to the ground. Greda was fast losing consciousness and then, as blackness descended, she felt the strong and loving arms of Helmbrecht who had waited in the woods to watch her go by, clasped tightly about her body. Weeks later, another bridal procession wound its way to the Chapel again. This time all was gladness, for was not Greda marrying her true love, Helmbrecht, at last?

CHEATING CHEATERS

W. M. Van Ostrom Drama File No. 11305

FOR weeks there are strange, disturbing noises in Pelham Manor. When a heavy portrait mysteriously crashes in the library during the height of a dinner party, Mr. Stedman decides to act. Mrs. Stedman owns a fortune in jewels which are usually hidden in a secret safe. Their trusted servants are suddenly unable to satisfactorily explain a number of suspicious actions. At the suggestion of Mme. de Bellencourt, a Frenchwoman of obscure background, he consults Fred Hessel, private investigator. The Stedmans give another dinner the week following. Their guests include Mme. de Bellencourt, William Leland, her escort; Hessel and his friend, Caroll Renault. Mrs. Stedman decides not to wait for Kearns who is delayed and the meal begins. Five minutes later, Kearns, whitefaced and obviously shaking from shock, rushes in. There is a dead man on the roadway and he accidentally stumbles over the body. Hessel conducts a clueless search around the grounds while Elsie, the maid, phones the police. In the conservatory, they are amazed to find the parrot dead, its throat cut, the windows and outside door bolted. The police soon leave, taking the unidentified body to the morgue. The guests continue as if the past hour had never been. As the clock is striking midnight, five revolver shots resound in the direction of the library. Mrs. Stedman moves immediately to the fireplace. She touches a spring which swings back the bricks, revealing a safe into which she quickly thrusts her costly pearl necklace. The room flashes out into darkness. Seeing the dim outline of a man, Mrs. Stedman takes him for the butler; but he makes no response and rushes out. When the lights go on again, Hopkins declares he had accompanied the men to the other wing. The bullets have shattered the library glass and imbedded in the furniture and walls. On the floor, Hessel finds a curiously shaped button which he slips in his pocket as something which may develope into a clue. The next morning, Mrs. Stedman expresses the belief that the house is no longer secure for her jewels and suggests removing them to a bank in town. Together, they open the vault into which she had hastily tumbled her pearls the evening before, and find the box is empty. Her other jewels are still there.

Over in the upper east side in a back room of the Young Men's Political Club, Tim Monnelli and Bugs Moran, are apprehensively awaiting the arrival of their Chief. They are anticipating a severe rounding from him for their failure to escape with the Stedman jewels. Her quick action in thrusting them away, had spoiled a perfect plan of action. The Chief is in a snarling mood. He tells them that someone else is after the jewels and they must work fast. Their funds are low and he suggests holding up the Stedman chauffeur, returning from the bank with the servants' payroll. During the excitement, Tim and Bugs are admitted into the Stedman house by a ruse, and steal the contents of the vault. The evening papers are filled with the daring half million dollar robbery. Hessel assures Stedman that he is actively engaged on the ease. In her apartment, Mme. de Bellencourt is speaking to her Chinese servant, Lee Chow. Quite obviously the two are in closer relationship than the ordinary mistress and servant. There is a speculative gleam in her eyes as she mentions a pending visit to a jewelry shop which Renault has recommended. On her way there, she stops at a private nursing home and is admitted to Doctor Kean. She applies for admittance for her husband who is suffering from hallucinations that everyone including his wife is his enemy and that he must dispose of her jewels. She promises to be back shortly, if he will have attendants ready to commit her husband by force. Behind the counter is Tim, a stranger to her. He shows her several pieces of jade which the startled woman recognizes as part of the Stedman collection. She had not hoped for such luck. Claiming that she hasn't enough money with her, Mme. de Bellencourt persuades him to accompany her to her husband's office. The car stops at the inconspicuous hospital, and the unsuspecting clerk enters with her, only to find himself seized and led away, loudly protesting. Home, she instructs Lee Chow to put them away in the victrola which is rigged up as a vault. Meanwhile the Chief learns of Tim's disappearance with the jewels and the strange customer. His subordinate hands him a button found in the store, and he wonders where he has seen a similiar one. Hessel is in consultation with Stedman. He tells him that he suspects Madam's butler and the Stedman man are in league. They dine at her home where Stedman's own suspicions are aroused at the un-Chinese appearance of the butler but he keeps his own council. He notices that the Chinaman is always hovering about the cabinet, although Stedman is not aware that it conceals a deadly Purple Ray to protect its contents from unwary thieves. He determines to investigate. The following day he bribes his way into the house by informing the maid her mistress is in danger. When the door suddenly opens in the living room, he crouches in a corner. Lee Chow enters and fiddles around the cabinet. A few seconds later, several men wearing police uniforms push their way in with Renault who is wearing handcuffs. When Mme. de Bellencourt rushes down at hearing strange voices, they inform her she is under arrest for theft with Renault as her accomplice. They order a search of all questionable objects. The shocked Stedman recognizes the voice of the man called "Chief"—Hessel! Armed with a revolver, he springs from his corner and orders Hessel who is holding the jewels to stay where he is. Stepping to the window, he makes a prearranged signal to send for the police. Hessel springs madly at him, but before he reaches him, Lee presses a spring. A blue flame spurts at the master crook who crumples up, death is instantaneous. When the crooks are all removed and the excitement over, the police reveal that the Frenchwoman and Hessel are heads of rival crook-rings, and both have been angling for the Stedman collection. The mysterious dead man was one of Madam's group shot by Tim who feared detection.

THE ROPE OF JUSTICE

John De'Lazzaro Drama File No. 11347

AFTER arriving home in a half drunken stupor, Herbert Stevenson learns his wife has borne twin baby girls instead of the son he anticipates. Only the physical efforts of Jeannie, the young maid, save him from thrusting the unwelcome additions out of the house to perish in the howling gale. Fred Sanders, Herbert's companion that night, although posing as a friend is secretly jealous of Herbert who holds the lion's share of liquor concessions. In his own befuddled state he yields to an insane impulse, setting the house on fire in the early hours before dawn. Jeanny who has just snatched a few minutes sleep is awakened by the odor of smoke. The staircase is already caught and there is no way of moving the dying woman in the next room. The babies must be saved. For identification purposes in the case the children are separated, Jeanny brands the left arms of Vilma and Marian with a small star-pin. Going to the window she calls for help. A man in a car nearby responds and Vilma is lowered to him in a rope made of sheets. She tells him to wait for the other child. When she turns back to the window the stranger is gone. There is a sardonic streak in Sanders and the thought of having one of Stevenson's children amuses him. Jeanny successfully jumps from the window with baby Marian and runs to safety. Meanwhile Herbert who is on the first floor stumbles to safety instinctively and wakes to full consciousness in a hospital the following morning. He feels regret at his wife's fate but makes no effort to find the twins. A few months later, he marries Lena Joyce who has a four year old son, Harry.

The twins grow up unaware of each other's existence. At twenty, Vilma "Sanders" is in love with a young doctor, William Simmonds. Under the guidance of Jeanny, Marian becomes a celebrated dancer. At a party celebrating the opening night of her newest hit, she meets and falls in love with Harry Joyce. Jeanny forbids her to marry him although she cannot explain without revealing that she is not Marian's mother. Sanders gives a party in honor of Vilma's engagement, attended by Stevenson with his step-son who invites Marian and Jeanny. Many comment on the strange resemblance between the two girls. They themselves grow a bit jealous when their lovers under the dim lights once or twice confuse the girls Only Jeanny realizes. Stevenson asks her why she objects to Harry for a son-in-law. The shock of seeing Marian's twin is too much for the old woman and Stevenson first learns of the duplicity of the man he calls friend. He promises to say nothing for a while. Sanders notices the identifying scar on each and realizes his secret will soon be public. He immediately takes steps by revealing he is not her father but refuses to say more. Afraid her birth is tainted, Vilma breaks the engagement. The following night, Herbert is cheated out of much of his small fortune in gambling with Sanders. Still befuddled yet knowing Sanders is too powerful to quarrel with openly, he wanders to Jeanny's where he insists on seeing Marian to identify himself. He goes insane when she bars the way and shoots her. Marian runs out, finds only the body and screams. She is arrested with the gun in her hand. At the trial the state successfully contends Marian murdered her mother so she can marry Harry. Just then Stevenson, hearing the jury verdict of guilty, screams that he is the murderer. He tells the whole story without giving the man's name. At the end when he is about to, Sanders kills him and then turns the pistol on himself. The police mortally wound him. That night as the twins tearfully rejoice in their reunion while their sweethearts look on, an aroused public breaks into the hospital. The moonlight casts a shadow of Sanders lifeless body dangling on the rope of justice.

LOVE IN WARTIME

Eric William Monleith Drama File No. 11318

CAREFULLY removing the trap spring from the half-grown police dog, Bob Wells pats him soothingly. He carries the dog to the house where he teasingly introduce him as a wolf to his adopted sister, Betty, a nurse who is spending her vacation home. Bob decides to call him Buddy, a popular term among the soldiers with whom he had just finished a year's peace time enlistment. While the two are talking, Buddy growls. There is a rattle snake nearby. After the snake is killed, Buddy fetches it to them. The youth decides to use the skin for a dog collar. Supper is enlivened for the parents by the children, bringing the old atmosphere before the children parted. The Wells have always wanted a daughter and when a neighbor dies, they take Betty into their home when she is five. Bob and Betty are very close to each other. Feeding Buddy with scraps from his own meal, Bob announces his plan to train the dog in similar fashion to a few he sees in the army. He goes to the village store to have the rattle collar prepared. There is talk of the war now going on in Europe, and Bob hopes that America stays out. Two days later, Bob and Betty ride over to the village dance. He meets an old soldier friend, Joe Aldrich, and invites him home. As they are leaving there are loud barks outside. Recognizng Buddy's voice, Bob rushes out in time to see Buddy hanging on to a man who is trying to steal their horses. Feeling the man is punished enough, Bob warns him off. Buddy has followed them to the village, he proudly tells Joe. During the days that follow, Bob grows uneasy. Until Joe's arrival he has always looked upon Betty only as a sister. When Joe comes to him and confesses his love for her, he is stunned. For hours Buddy and he tramp the woods. The master tells Buddy who possesses an almost human sympathetic look how repugnant the idea of marriage for Betty with some other man is to him. Yet Bob can't suddenly propose to Betty who he is sure feels only family affection. Bob remembers to call for the collar and learns that the United States is declaring war. Before Joe leaves for his own home to await government orders, he becomes formally engaged. Within 24 hours Betty is called to leave for nursing service in France and Bob to join his regiment. Although Bob isn't permitted to take Buddy with him, he persuades the authorities that the dog will be useful to them in France. He notifies his sister to watch for the dog on the other side. At the hospital, Betty overhears a nurse speak of a dog she sees wearing an odd collar of snakeskin. If she has Buddy with her she will feel closer to Bob. After pulling many wires, she succeeds in having him assigned to her ambulance. Bob is fast growing into a hardened veteran. He and Joe are in the same unit and Bob does his best to act naturally. A letter from Betty tells them she is nearing their base, where a big attack is scheduled. During the battle Bob is blinded by an exploding shell. Betty is passing by when Buddy jumps from the ambulance. He locates Bob lying prone in a shell hole. Following past teachings, he paws open a water flask and pours it on him. From his collar Bob identifies him. The dog carefully begins to lead him back to Betty when he faints again. Buddy then pulls Betty to him. After an unsuccessful operation, Bob faces the world glumly. He learns by accident that Joe is dead. When he sees Betty crying, he attempts to comfort her. It is a shock when she tells him she never really loved Joe. It is Bob who has her love and she only becomes engaged in the hope of making Bob jealous. She can no longer hide it and will leave the hospital as soon as her transfer is granted. As she turns to leave, Bob rushes toward her and kisses her hungrily. Only when Buddy barks in puzzled inquiry a few moments later does Bob suddenly realize that he can see again. The shock of joy at Betty's revelations has restored his eyes.

SERVING OTHERS

Lula T. Brooks Drama File No. 11319

TO young Elizabeth and Anne, the big jolly black woman who is serving the fourth generation of Randolfs, is a beautiful person. Aunt Alice as the children call her is a ready consoling refuge from all childish ailments. It is she Elizabeth remembers who comforts her when she rebels at being the oldest in a household of boys, and is first to tell her of the arrival of a baby sister. Although when the Civil War came Aunt Alice, then a young woman, had been free to leave; she rejected the announcement with amazement. All her desires are bound up with her white folks, and she zealously tends the children as if they were her own. When Anne and Elizabeth are caught crossing a dangerous railroad culbert with a neighbor's child, who loses her life when she slips into the nearby quicksand, it is Aunt Alice who roundly threatens them with physical chastisement and then pleads with their parents not to scold them. Their fright is punishment enough. That night the old servant bakes a cake singing a favorite spiritual. The children smile in relief, restored to her good graces. Only once do they remember seeing her in tears, when the child of her niece, with whom she shared sleeping quarters, dies. Birthdays and holidays are brought into prominence by the servant who would sacrifice her one extravagance, snuff. When the girls reach the age of beaus, Aunt Alice takes her responsibilities seriously. It is difficult for her to imagine anyone nice enough for her charges, but she also gives much kindly advice. She warns Elizabeth whom she now dignifies with the title of "Miss" to forsake her tomboy ways, but the girl is secretly her favorite. One weekend the two girls dressed by Aunt Alice with particular pains for the occasion attend a dance given for them at their Uncle's home. Everyone in the county attends. Elizabeth who is ill at ease slips off in a corner alone. She is joined by a young man, Scott Phillips. Scott is a newcomer to the south and just beginning his legal practice. There is a contagious charm about him that affects her more than any other boy she has met. The one cloud on the evening's happiness is the fear of not seeing him again but she is reassured when Scott asks permission to call. Aunt Alice is waiting for the girls and by the glow on Elizabeth's face knows that something has happened. When Scott comes the old servant makes the girl happy with her grudging approval. However, the Randolfs have other plans and oppose the match. Alice helps the lovers see each other. One night when the girl confides that she is eloping, Aunt Alice insists on being with them when the knot is tied. She then returns home to face the family's displeasure. In their bitterness, the Randolfs accuse her of breaking faith and order her to leave. Aunt Alice goes to a sister, refusing to let Anne inform the newly-weds. A year later when Elizabeth's daughter is born, her parents are reconciled. For the first time, she learns of the servant's sacrifice. They send for her. A week later Aunt Alice can be seen happily crooning over the newest Randolf child.

THE RIVALS

Robert Newton Wells Drama File No. 11309

UNTIL two weeks before the big football game between the two leading high schools, Dick Player's future looks as bright as his present happiness. The Forsythe family has just announced the engagement of their daughter, Shirley, to Dick. Both belong to the leading families of the village. Dick is Blackwood High's outstanding athlete and both captain and quarterback of the team which is heading for the state championship. At a dance, Guy Bussey, his classmate and rival, presses cigarettes and whiskey on Dick. Guy forces him to accept by jeering him as a "mollycoddle." From that night Dick fails to keep any of the training rules and when the game against Stanton comes, he plays poorly. Bussey on the other hand gives his best playing of the season. Victory seems within their grasp when Dick loses his temper the last few minutes of the game and kicks an opponent who tackles him on fourth down. The resulting penalty within one yard of their own goal line, gives the ball to the other side. The championship goes to Stanton. Angry and hurt at Dick's actions which have cost their school the game, Shirley returns Dick's ring, telling him that he is not the man she wants for a husband. During the following weeks, he ignores Guy's jeers until they are all traveling on the same train for High Point College in the fall. Although the other young people are already imbibing the school spirit, Dick stays alone until he overhears Guy telling someone of Dick's behavior the day of the game. He blazes and demands an apology. Bussey refuses and throws his fist heavily into Dick's face, being promptly slapped in return. Seeing this last, Shirley interrupts and spends the rest of the trip with Guy. At college Dick resolves not to participate in sports but weakens enough to watch a practice the day after a very poor game. When he makes a suggestion to Guy, his rival tells him to mind his own affairs. Despite the fact that Shirley's brother, Conyers, is captain, Dick resolves to make the team. He plays brilliantly in practice and is placed on the varsity. The team has a splendid season with its toughest game scheduled for the end against Dale. Meanwhile Dick notices that Guy and Shirley are growing very friendly. One day Dick deliberately stands in her way as she is leaving one of the classrooms, causing her books to scatter when she bumps into him. Dick walks her home for the first time since high school days, and asks if she can forget the past. She promises if he makes up for it in the Dale game. He wants to give her the ring but she insists on waiting until then. The day before the event, Dick grows suspicious when he sees Guy with a shady character. He goes to Guy's room and finds a note revealing that Guy in order to clear off a number of I. O. U's is planning to lose the game for High Point and throw the blame on the other team men. Later he overhears Guy telling Shirley that tomorrow will prove Dick is yellow, and may do something crooked in the game. When the game begins Dick is so intent on watching for a false move from Guy who has fumbled the ball twice, that he misses a play and is temporarily benched. The score is 14 to 0, favor of Dale at the end of the half. Guy is taken out and Dick sent back in his stead plays so brilliantly that the score is tied. The last four minutes of play, Dick apprehensively sees Guy coming on the field again. When Guy makes another misplay, Dick deliberately hits him unobserved by the others. His scheme works. Guy hits back and is ordered off by the referee. In a series of exciting plays, Dick gets through with a touchdown. The grandstands are uproarious when the game ends 21—14, High Point triumphant. Ignoring the eager applauding crowd, Dick makes his way to the field house where Shirley is waiting. Once more the papers are to announce the engagement of a football hero and attractive co-ed.

THE BIG GAMBLE

R. Wrigley Lankford Drama File No. 11262

NONCHALANTLY easing his way along the room, Jackson approaches the dressing table and extracts a small box. Deftly, his fingers work open the clasp and slips its contents, a pearl necklace into his pockets. A few moments later he is sociably playing bridge in the drawing room with company which includes some of the most prominent social and professional leaders in Miami. Retiring for bed in the early hours, Jackson gloatingly fondles the stones; already the newspapers are shrieking headlines announcing the latest of a series of costly jewel thefts. Society crook de-luxe, Jackson first enters that profession after a life of war excitement which wouldn't permit him to return to the tame existence of civilian life. He isn't a coward but he prefers Paris to the trenches; and the military police are led a merry dance; no prison succeeds in holding him more than a week and in desperation the French ship him back to the United States as soon as peace is declared. Even then, Jackson ends his connection with France upholding his reputation, for he jumps off the boat a few miles out and eventually arrives in New York like a gentleman. Jobs are scarce and Jackson develops a Robin Hood philosophy—he will rob the rich and give to the poor, including himself. His career will be that of a lone wolf, for Jackson is too clever to be caught through the bungling of his followers. A goodlooking young chap, he has no difficulty crashing elite parties and is soon an accepted member of the stag line at the debutantes' dances. He has an excellent chance to pursue his trade and he uses it, until the police double their efforts under newspaper lashing to find the culprit. So Jackson decides to take a brief vacation in Florida. On the beach one day, he meets Mildred, a prominent politician's daughter, and from their ensuing flirtation emerges an emotion of greater intensity. To her father, Jackson presents himself as a wealthy New York broker who decides to enter real estate business in Florida. When Jackson marries Mildred he is determined to reform, but soon finds that he cannot keep up with the scale of living she expects. Back to his life of orime he turns, although this time he must work more cautiously for many of his victims are guests and friends of his wife's family. He plans to harvest enough jewels for a secure income, and then say farewell to a life of crime. Although Mildred knows little of his affairs, his liberal donations to charity assure her. One day she tells him to expect a third addition to their family very soon, and Jackson seeing himself in the role of a father for the first time knows fear. His unborn son must not be ashamed of his name, a jailbird for a father. While this resolution is at its height, his old New York fence sends a youth, Martin, to see him. Martin's brother is awaiting trial on a serious charge and money is needed to fight the case. Pleading his brother's innocence, Martin begs him to go in on a jewel robbery with him. The owner of the jewels is an ecoentric selfish old lady and the job looks easy, so Jackson swallows his compunctions. But Martin is later caught and reveals Jackson as the author of the mysterious robberies. Gallant to the last, Jackson not only helps the police return the stolen jewels to their rightful owners, but gives them also his gifts to his wife. Only with Mildred does his composure break and he begs forgiveness. His sole defense to the judge is that only the wealthy were harmed and with the proceeds he helped many. Despite the efforts of his father-in-law, Jackson receives a 10 year sentence with possible suspension in a few years. He leaves to pay his debt to society with Mildred's promise to wait for him in a city where his past is unknown.

LOVE HAVEN

Kathe Hearn Drama File No. 11250

"NO! . . No! . . You can't do that . . You are too young to go to parties!" Lifting the receiver listlessly, Dorothy Mason, lovely little fifteen year old, phoned Gloria that she couldn't come to her party. Then, storming past her prim mother, she locked herself in her own room and taking out a forbidden package of cigarettes began smoking. It was in this same spirit of rebellion against her mother's stern dictates, that Dorothy met Barry Westmore, nineteen year old student of architecture. Their meetings had to be snatched ones. There were lies, evasions. And when one night, feeling cheapened by her mother's outburst over a goodnight kiss the night before, Dorothy suggested they could be secretly married, Barry hesitated for only one brief moment. All would have gone well with them if one of the town gossips had not read the youngsters' names among the marriage licenses issued that week. Fleeing her Ladies' Aid meeting, Mrs. Mason returned home with lowering brows. In disgrace Dorothy and Barry left town to shift for themselves in New York. Young, ambitious, they took a tiny apartment and Barry got a job as a shipping clerk during the day and went to school evenings. The long days became filled with loneliness. Dorothy's baby died at birth through the inexperience of the doctor, and life went on for them. To occupy herself, Dorothy took lessons in typing and stenography and after a few months got a job at twenty-one dollars a week. These mornings she was finding it more and more difficult to arouse Barry, Dorothy had no way of suspecting that one night Barry had gone out with some of the other students. There had been drinks, women, and when he had awakened he found he had been robbed of his tuition for the next month. Every night had been spent carousing since he could not be at school. Then Barry, tired and suffering from hang-overs was fired. Self-pity made him maudlin. One night he went out leaving a note telling Dorothy not to worry about him. For weeks she waited for some further word from him, then leaving a note with the landlord, went to live with Janice, one of the girls from her office. It was Janice who introduced her to a wild crowd, and one night Dorothy was to awaken in a strange room, sharing the hospitality of Hal, one of the gay bachelors. Sobered now, she left.

Meanwhile Barry was reduced to handouts in Bowery breadlines. One day a little boy gave him a dime. Staring at the coin grotesquely, Barry realized what a mess he had made of his life. Odd jobs, a shave, a haircut, and Barry was back, pleading for his old job again. Some weeks later he called Dot at her office, and induced her to come to lunch with him. Over a snowy cloth and hot food, Barry told Dorothy he had been given another chance. The boss was sending him to Paris for a year to study, and Dorothy was coming with him. Dorothy began protesting, but Barry reminded her she was still his wife. And, come to think of it, why hadn't she divorced him all this time? People coming and going saw two long separated lovers holding hands over a table in a tea room.

THRILL OF THE CHASE

Sarah Acre Drama File No. 11312

ALTHOUGH the rest of the family is excited at the impending visit of Mrs. Ellis' niece, her young step-son, Herbert, is indifferent. He is greatly interested in sports and dislikes dances which girls seem strangely fond of. He voices these objections to his cbum and step-brother, Joe, who is confined to bed when a farm horse throws him, breaking his leg. Herbert is looking forward to the coming trip to the fair which the family takes turns at attending, and which he is to attend this year. When Margaret, his step-cousin comes, he is pleasantly surprised. Sbe has all the characteristics of a tomboy yet with the slight, lovely graces that are obviously feminine. A friend of his from a neighboring farm, Frank Loden, calls and makes himself so pleasant to Margaret, that Herbert is confused at his own sense of resentment. She appears fond enough of Herbert to help with the barn chores and go on long hikes. At her urgent request, he has been teaching her to use a rifle. But the young man is aware that her particular smiles and pleasantries are given to his friend. When Frank asks her to attend the coming holiday dance at the schoolhouse, she consents. The night before the trip to town which he has so long awaited, Herbert overhears his brother Joe tell his mother how lonely it will be in his absence. He feels suddenly ashamed, remembering how closely confined to the house these two are and begs his father to take them in his stead. Margaret prefers to stay on the farm. Frank and he decide to go deer hunting that afternoon in the Northern Wisconsin woods. When he meets Frank, he is amazed to find Margaret also attired in hunting togs. He protests and laughingly she informs him that she knew he wouldn't consent so had Frank invite her instead. Under the influence of her contagious good spirits, Herbert's resentment vanishes. After some futile search, they hike deeper into the forest for a favorite deer spot. Soon they each had one. As they are placing the venison in sacks, the sound of wolves come from far away. Herbert reassures the frightened girl, calling it an ordinary sound at this season. But as the sounds come nearer, he tries to hide his own fear. Looking at Frank silently, Herbert starts leading the girl on at a jog trot while Frank, dropping his bundle, sprints ahead. Knowing that the taste of meat, freshly killed, would only make the oncoming beasts more ferocious, Herbert tries to rescue this. Now in a panic, Frank forgets completely about the girl. Alone, Herbert might manage but seeing that the girl is nearly out of breath, he suggests that her best course will be to climb a tree. When the wolves came in sight, he felt slightly relieved seeing that the pack is intent on a deer. Waiting behind the meat sacks,

Herbert drew out his old fashioned double barreled muzzle loader and aimed at the writhing heap swarming over the deer. He was later to learn that the wolves were so closely packed that one bullet kills three of them; two others shot wildly also find their marks. Shouting encouragement to Margaret, Herbert waited with his gun ready to aim, not sure of more wolves returning. Just then he is relieved to hear a shout from Frank who was returning with Mr. Ellis. They triumphantly skin the wolves which bring in a government bounty. A few days later, Margaret tells Herbert that she is not going to the dance with Frank. Blushing furiously, Herbert asks her to go with him. That night he sees her for the first time in a long flowing gown. Noting the amazement in his face, she mischievously inquires if he prefers her as a hunting partner or a dancing partner. In his eyes is the dawning realization that he wants her a partner for life.

THE SPLENDID OUTCAST

E. B. Christian Drama File No. 11310

IMAGINATIVELY walking on air at hearing of his promotion to bank cashier, Jack Parsons returns to the teller's window where fate has another dramatic surprise in store for him. His dream girl stands before him in reality, Eleanor Odell. He is still in a romantic haze when he joins Sylvia Barnes with whom he has an informal engagment of several years standing. While dancing with Sylvia at the Astoria, he meets Eleanor with an acquaintance of his who formally introduces them. He wastes no time in telling her of his love and begs her for a second meeting. Then he learns she is engaged to Eric Casperson who is out of town at present on legal business. She confesses her fondess for Jack but Eric's splendid qualities have long established him in her heart. Jack loathes his rival even before they meet. On his way to her home, Jack sees Eric. He identifies him as a boy he beat severely in high school days when both were interested in the same girl. Eric has never forgotten the scar on his lip, a vivid memory of the occasion. When the two men meet, Eric recognizes him and they are embroiled in a fist fight. Jack's ego is swelled by his new position and takes to a fast crowd, all of which Eric reports to Eleanor. Jack pays Lucyle Baxter $500 to interest Eric in her. He arranges to have Eleanor see her fiance and Lucyle register in a hotel together. Meanwhile sorry and still fond of Sylvia, Jack pretends to still intend to marry her. Trustfully, Sylvia gives herself to him. Engaged now to Eleanor, he brutally rejects Sylvia who is bearing his child. His wedding day is spoiled when he learns Sylvia kills herself, although no gossip is attached to him. Soon after their daughter, Evelyn, is born, Lucyle starts blackmailng him. His income is insufficient and he steadily borrows from the bank until he embezzles more than $20,000. The thefts are finally uncovered during his absence and he is brought to trial. His wife still trusts him until she receives a letter from Lucyle revealing that Eric was framed by Jack. She and the child return to her parents. Fate plays another sardonic jest when the prosecuting attorney is his old enemy, Casperson. Jack is sentenced to ten years imprisonment, receiving a pardon at the end of four. He goes out west, changes his name, and takes a small position as hookkeeper. His old weakness for women makes him respond to a woman's invitation one day. Her husband finds them and shoots Jack in the face. Plastic surgery restores some semblance of features but with his present appearance the most he can hope for is odd jobs. Impelled by old longing, he returns to his home-city. He passes by the Odell home where he sees his former wife now Mrs. Casperson fondling her infant son. Beside her is Jack's daughter. Forgetting himself, he starts to call her. Jack remembers he has forfeited the right. At least he can preserve Eleanor's present happiness. His feet shuttle slowly on in prophetic rhythm of the years to come.

NOT FOR SALE

Zona S. Wooldridge Drama File No. 11321

THE church bells chime an echoing joy as Dolores turns from the marriage altar, and offers her lips to the man with whom she has just plighted troth. This marks the beginning of a dream's fulfillment—a home of her own not for a few years but for always, and with her the man she loves. In Dolores is none of the restless gypsy love of travel that is inherent in her father and makes her childhood a stream of memories of many cities and endless tourist spots. But her wide experience with people makes her a shrewd student of human nature and from her trips she gathers material which she employs in her writings. From this source she saves enough for her future home. Her husband Melvin Crew is in direct contrast. All his life is spent in the boundaries of the Ozark hills and he is extremely dependent on the advice of others. He never acts without the approval of his parents or the family's closest friend, John Walker. His senses are so engrossed in Dolores that he takes his people's approval for granted. Dolores has instinctive distrust for John whom she nick names the "czar" from his despot relations with the villagers. From him the newly-weds purchase a 40 acre tract. Walker suggests paying only partly cash and the rest mortgage. But Dolores insists on paying the whole. She further angers him when she persuades her husband to buy the live stock elsewhere.

Prosperity smiles upon the happy couple for nearly a year when she grows haunted with a fear which becomes reality as America enters the War. The dreary winter is dragging in mocking contrast to those other months with Melvin. She is tempted to leave the lonely house hut recalls her promise, "Melvin, I will keep the home fires hurning until your safe return." Her first evening of horror comes when Walker unexpectedly attempts to kiss her, revealing that he has always desired her. Dolores threatens to tell her husband but he laughs, knowing that she will write nothing to distress Melvin's peace of mind. Afraid that she may, however, tell her parent-in-law, he plants a seed of suspicion with them. When she taxes them with coolness they accuse her of praying for Melvin's death so she can inherit the estate. A friend informs them that she is receiving passionate letters from an old love. When Melvin returns they swear he shall be made aware of her duplicity. Soon after, Walker sends his unsuspecting wife to persuade Dolores to sell the property as he has a customer anxious to give him a large commission for the transaction. In the presence of Nada, Dolores' friend whose husband is also in the war, Mrs. Walker tells her that the town is seething with gossip. Strange men are seen leaving the place at night. It would be wisest for her to sell; she has no place in this community. When Dolores angrily rejects her, the crafty Walker sends his son, Anthony, who tries to make her sign the necessary papers by force. With a pistol she keeps for protection at Melvin's advice, Dolores forces him to accompany her to the pastor's home. In his presence, she forces Anthony to confess it is a plot to drive her away. Just then bells and whistles ring—Armistic Day. A few weeks later a joyful reunion on their own hearth takes place.

SPRINGTIME IN BOHEMIA

Lillie M. Park Drama Musicale File No. 11348

BLITHELY, Ottaker Kolika starts off on a hunt through the Carpathian mountains. During the chase his horse stumbles as the others in the party turn a bend through the thick forest. Beguiled by the loveliness of woodland in the Spring, he wanders on happily in his solitude. As dusk approaches the nobleman realizes he is lost. A bit disconsolate now, he wanders until he hears the faint tinkle of sheep bells. Following the sound he comes upon several peasant girls driving their flock homeward for the night. They have heard of Moldau Castle but cannot direct him. Ottaker who has a decided weakness for the ladies is well content to remain with them a while. Charming simple Vlasta offers offers delightful contrast to the sophisticated ladies of his court. He appreciatively accepts the hospitality of her father's cottage until Vlasta's friend, Sigismund, can guide him home in the morning. He enchants the family after the plain evening meal with glamorous tales of knights and ladies. Only Sigismund is aware that Vlasta is growing fascinated with this being from another world and his leave taking is a dour one. A few hours ago, Vlasta would have been conscious of Sigismund's state. Now she hardly realizes if he has gone or still remains. The sullen Sigismund directs Ottaker home, refusing gratuity, and hoping the nobleman has sense enough to stay at his castle and not turn silly heads. But Ottaker returns often. Vlasta's mother who has previously encouraged Sigismund's suit is delighted, when Ottaker at last persuades her daughter to come to his castle. He pledges marriage when the girl has accustomed herself to court fashions and dress. Unaware that she is an object of laughable sport to the others, the peasant girl is thrilled with her new mode of existence until she encounters Ottaker in a secluded corner of the graden paying romantic attentions to Lady Eliska. Vlasta still feels too uncertain to protest. Alone, Ottaker renews his avowals of enduring love to the country maid. Meanwhile the forlorn Sigismund visits the mountain witches for a charm strong enough to return his former sweetheart's affections. He is sure that Ottaker is holding her with a magic spell. The witches appoint the night of the Spring Fete for the spell's overthrow. On the night the nobleman is to announce his engagement. Openly he has named none of the three which court gossip links him with—Vlasta, Lady Eliska, and the Russian Princess, Olga, an affair extended since the past summer. Away from her lover's embracing endearments, Vlasta is uncomfortable at the court snubs and homesick for her old life. If during the night her pillow is wet with tears, Vlasta will not confess to herself that they are shed for the absent Sigismund. To add to her troubles, Ottaker delighted with the suspense he is creating, ignores the three whose names are linked with his. On the evening of the fete, Sigismund, with the charm carefully placed near his heart, heads a group of fearless mountain lads, and sets off to rescue Vlasta. At the banquet table, the gay company falls into abrupt silence when Ottaker rises. Vlasta's heart beast rapidly as she apprehensively watches her rivals. After a prolonged and flowery introduction, Ottaker finally approaches the subject his guests are anxiously awaiting, saying, "Let us drink a toast to my future bride—" He pauses dramatically and in the interlude is heard the clamor of brawling voices which grows louder as they approach the dining hall. Pushing the guards aside, Sigismund enters. He gazes wildly about until his eyes find Vlasta who feels a sweet surge of joy but stands motionless. Reaching for his charm, Sigismund discovers its loss. For a moment he falters and then with a prayer on his lips, clasps Vlasta to him. Ottaker holds back the guards and permits the lovers to depart. Then he continues as if nothing has occurred, "the Lady Eliska Sedlacek." June ushers in the wedding days of these two merry couples. Sigismund tells Vlasta of Ottaker's impending marriage, and asks if she has any regrets. With swift movement, she presses him closer to assure herself of the reality of his presence.

THE END OF THE ROPE

Webb Thrummer Drama File No. 11202

AT the busy cross-section, young Jarvis Colton, shivering in the cold, sold his newspapers. A big sedan pulled to the curb and Paul Benning whistled to his favorite news lad. As he accepted the coin, young Colton flushed under the intense grey eyes of Benning's little girl, Eloise. Thereafter, the boy was to wait with anticipation and a painful embarrassment for the sedan, and each day there would be Eloise's eyes staring out after him. After the death of his mother, Colton left town and at an airport learned the fundamentals of aviation. Years later, on a war-torn battlefield in France, Colton was to be dragged from the wreckage of his plane, by an army officer. Feverishly Colton was to try to place the familiar face and at last was to recognize the man who saved his life as Paul Benning. With the end of the war, Benning was to return to a political career while Colton continued in aviation.

Time passed. Celebrated as the hero of a record breaking non-stop flight, Colton was to meet at a dance Paul Benning, now governor of the state, and his daughter, the beautiful Eloise. As the guest of honor, Colton was to dare ask Eloise for a dance and thus to incur the antagonism of Spinner, Benning's secretary, a political power, who had, for the last time proposed to Eloise this evening. In conversation with Benning, Colton was to learn that the Governor was being severely criticised for his failure to clear up several kidnapping mysteries. Colton offers his aid, but Spinner curtly suggests that the trouble is too many novices are spoiling the clues. When Eloise declines a dance with Spinner, the secretary leaves. Later, Eloise offers to drive Colton home in her roadster. On the way they are stopped. Hoods are thrown over their heads, and kidnapped, Eloise and Colton are brought to a cave. After several hours of restless waiting, during which Eloise had been forced to sign a note which she was not permitted to read, the kidnappers, masked and cloaked enter to announce that the ransom has been paid and Eloise is free to leave. However, when she learns that Colton is to stay on and be killed, Eloise spiritedly taunts her kidnappers. The leader seizes her in his arms and kisses her brutally despite her scratches and cries. Colton strains at his bonds. In her struggles Eloise tears the mask from her assailant's face and reveals—her father's secretary Spinner. Suave now in spite of his fury, Spinner lowers both prisoners half way down the ravine which yawns at the back of the cave. Then leaves them dangling in the two loops at the end of a single rope with the mocking assurance that they can climb up and go on safely. Conserving his energy until after the kidnappers have gone, Colton climbs, misgivings seizing him about what awaits him at the top. There he finds that Spinner has placed a huge boulder at the mouth of the cave. There is no escape save via the ravine with its deadly drop. Eloise who has climbed painstakingly up, now loses her courage in the blackness. Colton wonders why she didn't take the freedom offered and learns for the first time that Eloise has loved him since his newsboy days when his mother had so little yarn with which to darn his worn socks that she untwisted—With a shout Colton untwists the rope, making it twice as long, and he and Eloise escape. Spinner and his gang are captured and Colton wins Eloise as his wife.

WHILE CHINATOWN SLEEPS

Andrew Krymski Drama File No. 11352

MURKY lights cast greenish shadows on an obscure alley in Chinatown. Feeling his way back after an unsuccessful pursuit of a small boy who still clutches a purloined sweetmeat, Patrolman Donovan mutters angrily when he stumbles against a bulky object. Putting on his flashlight, he discovers a Chinese. His whistle brings his mate, Rafter, running. Closer inspection of the body discloses several fatal stabs near the heart. Fearing the outbreak of a tong war, headquarters triples the force in this section, and assigns Detective Lindstrom to cover the investigation. His first night, Lindstrom makes the rounds of small eating places looking for stool pigeons. One of them, Chippy, he locates in a private gambling room in back of one of Chinatown's most prominent curio shops. Chippy claims that this killing is not a tong affair. He doubts if anyone outside of the actual murderers knows who is responsible. The exasperated detective wonders why the residents refuse to help the police unless they are shielding someone. Chippy raises his shoulders in inscrutable reply. Calling headquarters, he reports the futility of his night's work. The chief orders him to stay on the case and employ every effort and means. It is particularly important for morale that the case be solved, since there have been several unsolved violent deaths in the last months. Feeling a bit hungry and noting the lights of a newly opened, spectacular nightclub, Lindstrom decides to pay the place a visit on the department's expense account. A blue spot is playing on a young, white girl, whose husky voice is rendering the latest torch song. Lindstrom stares, blushing when the girl flashes him a brief smile which softens her face. Ignoring the plaudits of the crowd, Jewel comes to Lindstrom's table. "Mind?"

she asks. Without waiting for a reply she pulls a chair close to his, and lights a cigarette, ordering a highball when the waiter brings Lindstrom's food. Lindstrom is curious about this girl whose hardness is a thin varnish, not yet completely seeped in the vice of Chinatown. Their casual conversation grows intimate. Jewel comes from a small town and accepts this position when the glitter of Broadway fails to materialize. She leaves him soon for a dance number. Though Lindstrom waits, she does not return to his table but joins a group she is seemingly very friendly with, that includes several of Chinatown's most notorious citizens. Why should Lindstrom feel a violent flush of anger when one of them casually throws his arm around the lovely shoulders? Disgusted with himself for forgetting she's like all the rest, he calls for his check. The next night he returns, and several nights after. He is deeply in love with Jewel now and begs her to break off this existence. Word reaches headquarters that he is neglecting his duty. Lindstrom is dismissed from the force. Still he hangs about. Several Chinese are suspicious and get him intoxicated. He reveals that he is off the force and the murder is unsolved. One night Jewel unexpectedly encounters him drunk in a typical joint with Ed Long, a recent Chinese acquaintance. A Chinese woman is inducing Lindstrom to kiss her. The enraged dancer slaps her. A habituate of the place helps her take Lindstrom to her apartment. The following day Jewel promises to reform if he will. To get back his shield. Lindstrom simulates drunkenness. Free to move about now that Chinatown no longer fears his official power, Lindstrom overhears the conversation of two strangers, which reveals that Ed Long is the killer in a gambling dispute. Soon, Lindstrom returns to Jewel. Proudly he holds out his returned badge. "Come along," he says in his best headquarters' voice. "Where," asks Jewel. "License Bureau."

HUMAN BEASTS

H. P. Charles Drama File No. 11354

THEIR first reunion in the trenches since the battle in which Dennis Franklin risks his life to pull the wounded Harvey Johnson to safety, calls for a bottle of scotch to lubricate already loosened tongues. When Johnson attempts to thank Dennis, the latter declares he is only passing on a debt of gratitude to Mike OLeary who gave his life saving Dennis. Harvey is looking forward to the end of the war when he can return to his fiancee, Mollis Maloney. A letter comes telling him she is ill with the flu. In a redistribution of troops the friends are separated. They meet again at a Paris bar where they are awaiting sailing orders home. Dennis is shocked at the dissipated change in his friend. Harvey tells him Mollis is dead. Back in the United States, Dennis enters his father's bank, and Harvey is needed in his dad's undertaking establishment. Married now to Sally, Dennis is too occupied with present responsibilities to look up his old friend. Meanwhile, Harvey gets a foothold with the leading social set of his town. In an infatuated moment, he marries one of its spoiled beauties. Soon he discovers the marriage is a mistake. His parents are dead and the firm is saddled with debts. Harvey's nervous system is still suffering from the war which makes marital relations difficult. More and more he turns to liquor. One night an escaped convict hides in his store. Harvey intends to give him up for the reward money until he learns Henderson's ex-buddy is O'Leary of war memories. He makes Henderson his assistant.

Within five years, the responsibilities of the bank rest on Dennis' shoulders. He finds himself in a world of human beasts where the greedy desire for money makes the big bankers sell "watered issues" and tighten credit on the little bankers. Under his careful management, the bank business is run along cautious lines. He bucks the large banks when he refuses to handle any of the approved securities which later go down the Wall Street landslide. When the bank is spectaculary held up one day, Dennis wonders if these crooks are any worse beasts than the correspondent banks which are refusing to tide their members. Dennis asks his wife to sign a property deed in exchange for an interest in a nearby oil well, having a hunch the investment may turn out well. Laughingly, she complies but jokes him for his late office hours. She attributes it to the attractive stenographer. Usually easy going, Dennis flares up and rejects her apologies. He feels slightly estranged though the family physician warns him that overwork is heading him for a breakdown. In 1931 and 1932 Dennis depends on the crop prices to pay up the bank notes, but even his board ignores his suggestions of the time to sell. They also refuse to accept a moratorium. At a banquet, Dennis loses his temper when visiting bankers blandly tell the community that a bank is treating its customers unfairly if it refuses wheat loans. These same bankers have refused Dennis loans on similar securities. He applies to the refunding committee set up by the government and is refused money to meet interest notes for lack of "adequate security." This is the last straw and Dennis decides to go away for a few days. The vice-president who envies his position pretends not to know where and gossip is quick to step in. Warrants for missing notes are taken out against the unsuspecting Dennis. Only the bravery of his wife saves the family possessions from attachment. When Dennis, parked in a car on a lonely road, visualizes the coming bank failure he is desperate. He comes to his full senses only when the trigger of the revolver in his hand fails to respond. Dennis realizes he cannot leave his family in such cowardly fashion. Impulse makes him look up Harvey. During the evening, Dennis confides his troubles, and Harvey, insisting there is none else he cares for, presses a large loan on him. A newspaper reveals to Dennis that a search is on for him. At once he returns and is soon free of charges. The well strikes oil and with the money coming in, Dennis plans to reorganize the bank. There is satisfaction when the national bank holiday is called and Dennis' bank is permitted to reopen while many of the large companies stay closed. On the verge of going radical, Dennis appreciatively watches the new president's efforts for the little fellow. "It's time to get back in the game again," he says. "Yes, and I don't care how many blonde stenographers you have, just so you save kisses for me," is Mrs. Franklin's fond reply.

ONE WEEK TO LIVE

Lotta Miles Drama File No. 11376

ON the eve of her thirtieth birthday, Irene Cody faces a future as dreary as her past—sterile of love and motherhood, the right and dreams of every normal woman. Then a letter comes bequeathing a legacy from an aunt which opens a new horizon. Mrs. Nickols, her sympathetic, motherly landlady, hurries pantingly up the stairs in response to Irene's exultant call. "This," declaims Irene, dramatically waving the check, "means freedom and adventure and I'm starting out for it in New York!" Through mutual friends, Irene meets Harry Quimby, a young Englishman who is unhappily married. Yielding to emotion, she goes with him on his yacht. In one week she crowds in all the love, beauty and romance, life has hitherto withheld. His religion does not countenance divorce. They agree to drop completely out of each other's lives, consoled with the possession of a period of ideal happiness. But back in her hometown, Irene finds his memory too rooted for peace of mind. When she learns she is to bear his child, her immediate reaction is one of joy. To have with her always the living symbol of a memory that is receding into the unreality of a remote dream. Irene first grows conscious of society's disapproval, when her closest friend, Lucy Roberts turns against her in a violent scene. "No, I'm not at all ashamed. Our love was a beautiful and clean as my child shall be," is Irene's final word. With "Nicky" as she terms her landlady, Irene finds peace again in a small Connecticut town. After Constance's birth, Irene obtains a position as secretary in the law firm of Leland Locke. Gradually they build a relationship as close as brother and sister. When Leland confesses his love for Irene, she mourns the need of hurting him. Irene explains to him that once having experienced love at its richest, she cannot compromise with a less intense emotion. They try to resume the old pleasant footing, but it is a relief to Leland when war breaks out in Europe. He joins a Canadian regiment. Shortly after, Irene learns Quimby's wife has died and he is seeking her. She writes to his regiment and Quimby cables for her, obtaining a leave of absence. Irene sails on the ill fated Lusitania and is one of the few saved. At Liverpool the two are quietly married. In the seven days that remain for them there is not the old wild ecstatic passion of yesteryear but the rich mellowness of maturity. After Quimby's departure, Irene opens their town home for a hospital annex. One of her patients is the brother of her former chum, Lucy. She learns that Lucy is married to a Frenchman and is working to support their three small children. Tragedy breaks into her content with the news that her husband is killed in action. Simultaneously, Leland is reported dead. That night reviewing the past, Irene realizes that she had been trying to live in the past; her real love belonged Leland. When Lucy is fatally hurt in a munitions factory, Irene welcomes the chance for forgetfulness and takes the children home to Nicky. Peace for a while and then the poignant silent reminders of Leland are too much. When America enters the war, Irene enrolls as a nurse. On a furlough in England, her step-daughter with whom she is on excellent terms mentions the puzzling mental condition of one of the nursing home's patients, an American in a Canadian regiment. Irene volunteers to visit her compatriot who appears to be friendless. Casually, Irene wanders over to a moody figure crouched in a wheel chair in a sheltered garden path. "Hello," calls Irene cheerfully, and then . . . Was her mind playing tricks, rebelling at the grief she is still fighting to suppress? Yet here seemed solidity. . . If this is a waking dream, then let it last just a little longer. And the man watching her with the same fascinated intensity, says nothing, sits motionless. Irene places her hand on the soldier's arm. The dream is a not a dream. Here is Leland, older and gaunt. Yet, the same voice but now with almost a tone of prayer as he softly murmurs her name. Now she is in his tightening embrace. There are no ghosts—only at last, her lover.

SAFEGUARD OF A NATION

Avis Platter Drama File No. 11351

NEVER before has the campus looked so beautiful, behind them the university buildings looming in dark shadows and the water lapping at their feet. Jim Keese presses Marigold closer to him. It is the eve of graduation and the impending separation weighs heavily. His own background is of a long line of ministers and though he knows nothing of Mary's history except that she is an orphan, he is sure her people must have been as fine as she. Before he goes home tomorrow he must definitely know his fate. Once more he voices his love for Marigold and begs her to promise to join her life with his. For a long ecstatic moment the girl does not answer, but silently lifts her face to his eager kisses. Then she tells him that though she cares for him the two can never marry. In stricken silence he learns that her mother died in an insane asylum and her father was epileptic. Jim who has majored in sociology places much stress on heritage as she knows. For the few first moments, Jim can remember only that she means more to him than any other. And it is Mary who must keep her head, reminding him that they can never have children. Both have always agreed that marriage without children lacks completeness. They part in anguished bitterness at the pranks of fate. Back in his room Jim exclaims fiercely, "People like Mary's parents should not be allowed to marry and bring innocent children into misery." He remembers his father say this years before. It is a white-faced, silent youth who rejoins his family. His people attribute this to an unhappy experience and wisely leave him alone for a time while a plan slowly forms in Jim's mind. One day he approaches his father on how to keep the unfit from reproducing their kind. Mr. Keese informs him that a few states have sterilization laws which are only limited to a small number of unfit types. After speaking with a number of prominent physicians, Jim tells the Keese family at dinner one night that he intends to sponsor a national "Safeguard of a nation" bill which will provide for the enforced sterilization of any physically, mentally, or emotionally incompetent person. The excited discussion is interrupted by the Duke twins, Earl, and Pearl who loves Jim. Both are plainly the feeble minded type under an apparently normal surface. Jim interests Senator Cooper and the bill is brought before Congress where for months it is the subject of bitter public attack. Jim tours throughout the country defending the bill which is finally passed. One of the first to submit to the brief, painless operation is Mary. The first girl to interest Jim since Mary is Julia Coxcomb, a healthy outdoor girl of excellent family history. She flies into a rage when he is late to an appointment once, accusing him of being interested in another. Jim hasn't realized before that she is strongly jealous. Soon after, he meets Pearl who insists on going with him for dinner. There he encounters Julia and a nasty scene takes place. He flees to the hotel for refuge. Earl who resents the law which affects him is waiting. He informs Jim that he is not really a Keese but an illegitmate child of poor heritage whom the Keeses adopted. First, Jim wants to kill himself but the next day he submits to the law he fathered. He then finds Mary and the two are married. Only one thing spoils their happiness, the lack of children. They go to an orphanage to adopt girl twins but end up with a set of boys also. They have a marvelous time tucking all four in bed. When one cries and the rest join in the "parents" express pleasure at their sound lungs. Then shamefacedly they stare at each other. They had forgotten to trace the childrens' records!

RANCH ROMANCE

Muriel Hughes Western File No. 10910

THE first night back from college, Jean Hitchcock sits about the ranch fire with her father's weddies, when a voice outside warns the Hitchcock crew not to try to poison the Jones water hole or there will be the devil to pay. In the ensuing confusion, Jean learns that the voice belongs to Cromwell Gilbert, the new foreman of the neighboring Jones' ranch. However, when she asks questions, Jean is ordered to her room by her father whom she has always feared and hated. Certain that something dishonest is underfoot, Jean eavesdrops on her father's conversation and learns that he holds the mortgage on the Jones ranch. Gilbert is riding to the bank to-morrow for the money to pay it off, but, avid for the Jones interests, Hitchcock plans a hold-up of Gilbert. Writing a note of warning, Jean slips out of the house and drops it in the Jones window, thrilling meanwhile as she discovers that this Gilbert is a very handsome fellow. Consequently, the following day, Gilbert's men are prepared for the ambush, and cover the supposed bandits with guns. Kid Brown, who, under Hitchcock's direction has been trying to force Jean to marry him, attempts to pull his gun, but as a flash, Gilbert fires first, wounding him painfully but not seriously. Hitchcock is forced to return the mortgage paid in full, and vowing vengeance he returns to the ranch. Meanwhile, Jean is in constant terror of the amorous attentions of Kid, and finds an everpresent ally in Mexican Pete, a half breed. Then, learning that her father is planning to build fences on the Jones' boundary, and planting an ambush to shoot Gilbert as he comes up, Jean rides into town and delivers another warning to the Postmaster for Gilbert. Recognizing the handwriting is the same as that of the first note, Gilbert inquires who left the note and learns it was Jean Hitchcock. He overtakes her and rides back with her toward her father's ranch. Gilbert again escapes the ambush planned for him, but his horse, shot from under him, pins him to the ground. It is Jean's protection that saves his life, but when she returns home, her father lashes her. Mexican Pete interferes, warning Hitchcock he will speak, and Hitchcock sullenly desists. Jean wonders what Mexican Pete is holding over her hated father's head.

While riding the boundary, Gilbert hears a single shot and discovers the murdered body of Mexican Pete. Hitchcock and his gang ride up and accuse Gilbert of the murder, but Jean is convinced of his innocence. Gilbert is led off to prison. However, when Jean tries to attend his trial, her father locks her up, setting Jennie, the old Indian cook, to watch over the door. Jeans sobs out the whole story and Jennie releases her. Together they ride to the court house where Jennie takes the stand and reveals that Mexican Pete threatened to reveal his knowledge that Hitchcock was not really Jean's father, but the murderer of her father when she was a baby. Hitchcock had hired Kid Brown to murder Mexican Pete, near the spot Gilbert passed at that time every day, and Kid was to marry Jean and the hundred thousand dollars left in trust for her. With a cry of rage, Hitchcock leaps forward but strong arms pull him down. Gilbert is freed and learning from old Jennie that Jean loves him, rides after her to ask an important question.

STRANGE BARGAIN

Mary Ryan Drama File No. 11373

"ALL right, since you insist, I'll go through the farce of marrying you, but when the ceremony is over I intend to lead my own life and you can do likewise," declares Allan Kent as he strides angrily past his fiancee, Marian Lynne. Three years ago during a lazy, glowing summer spent together the two became engaged. Still too young for marriage, the couple plan to become husband and wife when Allan completes college and a year of study in Europe. While Marian's love for Allan has grown, he is much younger emotionally. Since he became vividly attracted to Barbara "Babs" DuBarry, a cabaret singer in Paris, he looks upon his feeling for Marian as "puppy love." Returning home, he is amazed to find both Marian and his parents plan to hold him to his promise despite his change of heart. Driving now to Babs' flat for she sailed with him back to New York, Allan cannot see Marian's tears or hear her protests that she cannot keep the promise she made the Kents a few months earlier. Mr. Kent, Sr. and her father were old friends When he died Allan's parents became her guardians. Only her extreme affection for them makes her accept the role of an unloved bride. Allan asks Babs for advice, depicting the younger girl as a mercenary and scheming deceiver. Assuring Allan that it will not affect their own relationship, Babs urges him to marry Marian. During the days preceding the ceremony, Allan acts the dutiful lover in public while privately ignoring her. Marian asks him to avoid scandal by accompanying her to Dexter on their honeymoon and from there they can separate. At Dexter their plan is upset when they encounter the Grants, important clients of the Kent firm, who insist on having the newly-weds for house guests. The sight of the double bed embarrasses them, but Allan finds a couch in a small adjoining room which he improvises for sleeping quarters. It is a strange wedding night with Marian stifling her face in the pillow to silence her sobs. During the days that follow, Allan's interest quickens. He had forgotten what excellent company she could be. When Tommy Vale grows too attentive at a dance, Allan steps in and claims his wife. Marian feels lighter than she has been since Allan's return, and even Allan has moments of admitting he could fall in love with Marian if she hadn't forced him into marriage. Called back suddenly to look after family affairs when Mr. Kent has to leave for the mountains on a rest cure, the relationship of the young couple resumes its old formal lines. Marian first learns of Babs when she hears the servants gossip. For the first time she realizes what a laughing stock or object of pity she has become. Meanwhile, in the office Allan comes upon some check stubs payable to Babs. Confronting her for an explanation, Allan discovers she is the hardboiled wife of an ex-convict. She has been blackmailing his father since she learned from a maid in the Kent home that the firm owed its existence to his wife's money which Mr. Kent "borrowed" years before. Knowing Allan would be too proud to wed Marian if he were penniless, they begged Marian to force him to marry her without disclosing the reasons for this. After the Kents substantiate this revelation, Allan rushes home. Marian is gone, leaving a note that she can no longer keep her humiliating role. Four years later, fate brings Allan and Marian together again at a concert in London. Since she left, no other girl has existed for Allan. During that time Marian won the interest of wealthy Mrs. Norton who takes her abroad as a companion. She cultivates her talent as a singer. For a prolonged moment, Allan stares at the striking, distinguished artist. Then—oblivious of the program, he strides rapidly towards her. "Marian, my dearest." "Allan!" Their broken endearments ignore the unpleasant parting intent only on expressing their hungry years apart.

LOVE'S MIRROR

George Barron Drama File No. 11401

FOR two years Robert Denning has been traveling about the country earning his board by painting landscapes. Finding himself broke in a small town near Savannah, Georgia, he takes a farm job with a kindly old couple. Each afternoon and all day Sunday he is given time off for his beloved painting. He remains on through the cotton harvest and plans to stay until he completes his present canvas. One day, absorbed in his work, he is distracted by a faint rustle and looks up to see a beautiful young girl watching him. At her side is a small dog which regards the painter with suspicion. Robert learns that she is a neighbor and that she has been watching him for several days. He tells her his plans,—a week to complete his work, then Jacksonville, New Orleans. . . She promises to return next day.

The following day Robert arrives early and finds himself waiting impatiently. When she finally appears she apologizes for being late. They spend hours together finding in each other a fine spiritual understanding. When it rains Robert feels like a caged animal because to-day he cannot see her. The next day he finishes his landscape with her at his side. She asks if he has ever done a portrait and begs him to do hers. At last he consents. The portrait is finally finished. They are strolling through the woodland holding hands. With burlesque gallantry he lifts her into his arms and minces across a small stream. He stumbles. She clings to him and his lips meet hers for the first time. In breathless ecstacy they cling to each other. Robert puts finishing touches on the portrait and signs it "Vitold Wielechowski," both having agreed to enhance their game by concealing their true identities. The next day Joyce takes Robert home with her. He is surprised to discover the spacious colonial mansion in which she lives. Joyce's father, a Southern gentleman of the old school greets Robert warmly and induces him to remain on at a party that night. Robert is at length persuaded to accept the offer of clothes from Joyce's good natured young brother. That night, however Robert is baited by Foster, a sleek fellow who had imagined himself favored by Joyce. Later Joyce's father asks Robert about his proposed marriage to Joyce, pointing out the luxury to which Joyce is accustomed. Convinced of the older man's sincerity, Robert decides to go away. He leaves his landscape to the old couple and goes on his way. Joyce is heartbroken when she learns of his disappearance. She can neither sleep nor eat and her brother spurs her to find Robert if she cares so much for him. Before leaving Joyce enters Robert's portrait of her in an exhibition. Many times Joyce discovers that Robert has preceded her. Two weeks in New Orleans sees her giving up hope, however, until, by chance, she sees him through a saloon window painting scenery on a bar mirror. Shabby and unkempt, he refuses her offer of aid, pretending to be drunk. However, Robert learns that he is winner of the first prize of $50,000 for his portrait of Joyce and that his further work is assured of patronage. He returns to Joyce who receives him wistfully, and is warmly greeted by her father who explains why Robert left in the first place. Further Robert reveals that Vitold Wielechowski is his right name, being born a Polish Count. Together the young people are to find love imperishable.

A MOTHER'S HEART

Eleanora Di Rienzo Drama File No. 11399

HER resistance at last worn down by Frank's continued pleas that she marry him, Florence at length admits that she will not accept his proposal because she has a past—once she was betrayed by a man. Frank is taken aback, but at length, wanting her beyond all else, tells her that he still wants her as his wife. At first Florence and Frank are completely happy together. Soon however, Florence begins to realize that Frank distrusts every man who glances at her. He drives her almost insane with his unreasoning jealousy and when her son Nick is born, Frank refuses to believe the child is his. All her love for her husband killed by his mad jealousy, Florence leaves with her child. For years she struggles along, working far into the night to bring Nick up properly. Mother and son live only for each other. One day Nick is disturbed by the thought that he has no money with which to buy his hard working mother a birthday gift. While he pauses to watch a Columbus Day parade go by, a man taps him on the shoulder and offers the youngster fifty cents to direct him to North Station. Happy at the opportunity to get something for his mother, Nick leads the way. There his father awaits him and before the startled child can cry out, Frank kidnaps his son and takes him to another state. While Nick pines away longing for his mother, Frank cruelly photographs the lad and sends the picture to Florence assuring her that Nick is happier now with him. Nick awaits his opportunity to run away and at last, suffering incredible hardship he makes his way back home only to find his mother has vanished. He cannot believe she would go leaving no message for him and wanders distraitly through the streets. At last, bluffing his age, he enlists in the war hoping that he will be killed. But Fate guides those who care least and, wounded, he is brought to a hospital under the care of Jennie, a Red Cross nurse, who falls in love with him. Learning his story, she makes him take a new lease on life, and through her love, Nick recovers. With the armistice he and Jennie, now man and wife return together to renew their search for Florence. Frank, is killed in the war, and among his effects, Nick inherits a letter giving a clue to Florence's whereabouts. With his heart beating high, Nick goes to meet his mother for the first time in many years. He stares bewildered at the painted woman who sneers at her son and tells him she never had a son named Nick. Disillusioned, heart broken, Nick returns to Jennie. Disgustedly he tells his wife he hates the woman who bore him, but Jennie, whom the war has made wise, goes to Florence. At first she finds her hard to approach, but at length Jennie learns that Florence went on the streets to earn her living, only after she believed that her son had run away from her. Nick refuses to be reconciled to his mother, but Jennie regards him with scorn and asks him how much better he is than his father, when he acts this way. At last realizing what Jennie says is true, Nick kisses her tenderly, and with his wife, returns to take his mother forever from her sordid life. And at last the three find happiness together.

THE VICTOR

Guido Nizzi Melodrama File No. 10700

WHILE picking flowers with her cousins, Ida Johnson sees handsome Guy Murrel strolling down a country road near the resort where he is vacationing, and shyly smiles at him. Later they are introduced through mutual friends, and discover that both are from New York, here in the country for the summer months. Almost immediately, they fall in love and plan to marry; Guy is called back to the city, but first arranges to see Ida upon her return. Meanwhile Ida's father has arranged for her to wed Jack Wilson, dissolute young nephew of his business partner. Visiting his family, he informs the girl of this, and when Guy makes a hasty trip to see her, he is forbidden to continue his suit. Confined to bed because of illness brought on by grief, Ida is a guest in the home of Jack's uncle. James Wilson, a cousin, whose appearance is almost identical with Jack's brings Lora, his bride, and a former dancer to the house. She and Jack become infatuated with one another, which Ida discovers. The two of them steal away to a secret prison cell built in the house behind a sliding door, concealed with a huge painting. Resolving to secure Ida's money, which has been promised to him by her father, without marrying the girl, Jack, with Lora's aid, incarcerates her in the prison cell where she rapidly develops pneumonia, due to exposure. Forging a letter, Jack informs Ida's father that she has eloped with Guy, signing Guy's name, at the same time, signing Ida's name, informs Guy that she no longer cares for him. Not believing this, he hastens to her, and follows Jack to the prison cell. They struggle, but Lora knocks Guy unconscious, and he is imprisoned while Ida is taken to a hospital. Her father is summoned, supposedly by Guy. Here the young woman dies, murmuring her story brokenly to James.

After dreaming of her confession, James follows Jack and Lora just as they are about to bury the weakened Guy alive. Jack and Lora escape to Havana, where Jack is later imprisoned after shooting an artist who has become interested in Lora. Still determined to prove the right to his title "The Victor," Jack returns to America following his release from prison. Here he discovers that Guy has at last married Beatrice Morris, and a baby daughter has been born to them, named Ida. Interestedly primarily in her fortune, The Victor marries Pauline Clavel, assuming the name of Joe. In a spirit of revenge, he wins Beatrice away from Guy, sailing with her to Genoa, where he masquerades as Signor Giuseppi Maestri. Following an affair with Maria, an Italian woman, The Victor is again imprisoned for the murder of her husband, but secretly escapes from the penetentiary. Sam, Beatrice's brother, sails to Genoa, returning with her and Pauline Clavel, whom he loves. During a shipwreck, he saves Pauline from death and their love is rekindled. Overjoyed at her daughter's return, Beatrice's mother, who has been confined to a sanatarium as the result of mental breakdown, brought on by worry over the girl, recovers. Guy forgives Beatrice, and takes her to her home. Margaret, another daughter, is born to them.

Although Maria informs them that The Victor is dead, they are skeptical. During Guy and Beatrice's absence, he calls at their home, and the girls welcome him as Uncle James. However, the real James and Lora appear on the scene, as he plans to imprison the girls in the secret chamber of his uncle's home. Instead, he imprisons James and Lora, but Guy and Beatrice discover this, and summon police, since the house is barricaded. Before he can be captured he is murdered by Maria, who has seeretly followed him, and at last the infamous career of The Victor is brought to a close.

THE VOICE OF THE PEOPLE

Clara B. Fansler Comedy Drama File No. 10743

"I HATE to sweep and dust! And I hate to do dishes!" Dorothy announces vehemently, while her mother attempts to soothe the rebellious little girl with a smile, and the assurance that home is the grandest place in the world, after all. Laughing, she listens while daughter tells her that all plates should be made of tin, so that they might be consigned to the ash heap after they had been used, and states that her house will contain only one room. Grace, the baby sister, nods in agreement, echoing Dorothy's protests. Tired from a hard day's work, their father sinks into his arm chair and reads local items and price quotations while their mother prepares the simple meal. After dinner, as the family is gathered around the table, while mother tends to the family darning, the bell rings and Aunt Sadie is admitted. When questioned as to why Uncle John has not accompanied her, she replies that he could not afford the trip, as it is haying time on the farm, and the hired help must be paid off, when sales permit. Aunt Sadie and Dorothy's mother discuss the chores of the week; washing, ironing, baking, mending, sweeping, with Sunday the only day of rest. As she listens, Dorothy resolves that her life will be very different from the round of duty that her mother performs so unselfishly.

Years pass, and Dorothy grows into a lovely girl. When Clark McNamee, son of a banker, is presented to her at a party given in his honor, Dorothy resolves that this is her opportunity to escape from the existence she has led, and he falls in love with her, asking her to become his wife, she consents, although her mother protests that she scarcely knows him. Not heeding this advice, Dorothy marries and leaves for the East, where she will make her home. At first the ability to purchase anything her heart desires fills Dorothy's life with happiness, but after a time, luxury begins to pall, and the young bride finds her days all too empty. Clark's parents and friends are displeased at his marriage to this girl, whose family has neither wealth nor social prominence. His friends will not recognize her as their equal, inviting her to a few functions only for Clark's sake, and treating her coolly. Miserable and homesick, Dorothy persuades her husband to allow her to visit her parents. For the first time in months, she is again happy when she participates in the simple duties of the household, and is welcomed into the friendly circle of kind neighbors who love her for herself. Always ready to copy her big sister's example, Grace has refused to marry Tommy Stevens, whom she loves, hoping that she, too, will win a wealthy husband. Dorothy urges her to accept Tommy, advising her that the joys of a little home and true friends far exceed the sacrifices entailed, and Grace promises to become Tommy's wife.

Feeling that Clark is ashamed of her, Dorothy does not return to him, until she reads that his fortune has been swept away with the failure of his father's bank. Going to him, she tells him she has always loved him, and he replies that he feared she would not be happy now that he must start at the hottom, as he takes her in his arms. Together, they select a little home, laughing at the small amount of work that purchases so much peace and lasting satisfaction.

OUT OF THE TRAP

Victor Giacolone Drama File No. 11350

At his father's deathbed, Joseph Edwards and Maria Lamb promise to spend their lives together. In return Mr. Edwards gives them his farm. After several months of wedded happiness, Maria notices that her husband is very silent at the dinner table. He admits losing his job. During the days that follow, each tries to hide their fear. One day Joseph reading the newspaper learns that a new building and loan corporation is open with District Attorney George Thompson, treasurer. Joseph proposes that they earn their living from the farm, mortgaging the property for equipment. Although Maria is afraid they may not be able to pay the interest and so lose their home, her husband's confidence reassures her. At the loan company they promise him $2000 in a few months. On the strength of this they borrow and obtain credit in the seed stores. Returning from the field one summer day, Joseph finds a letter signed by Thompson stating the company can't assume the mortgage because of diminishing funds. Joseph is bitter at the man and only Maria's pleas restrain him from doing bodily harm. They decide to go to the city for work so their debts can be paid. Newspapers announce that hundreds investing in the home corporation are losing their property. The two congratulate themselves on their escape when a letter comes from a woman who claims to hold a mortgage on their property which is forfeited for non-payment. Through Joseph's efforts Thompson is revealed as a crook but escapes from the state. When Joseph later encounters him, Thompson tries to shoot him and in the resultant scuffle Thompson is killed. Although none knows this, the presiding trial judge is Thompson's relative. When his plot to force the jury to bring in a verdict of "guilty" is foiled, he calls Joseph in his office and threatens to "fix" him. In self defense Joseph shoots him and is sentenced to a year's imprisonment. At the prison he learns from his cellmate Harry that short term prisoners are unpopular so pretends he is in for life. Among other things Harry warns him that Big Tom in the adjoining cell is leader of a jail gang which caused the unsolved death of a guard, Johnson. At recreation in the prison yard one day he sees the gang stab another prisoner for turning "rat." Harry goes to the hospital for a few days and Joseph wins Tom's displeasure when he refuses to pass over a cigarette, pretending to be asleep in his cell. Tom fights with him in the yard and each receives 15 days in solitary. The officials sponsor a grudge fight between them and though warned to lose, Harry loses his temper and knocks him out. Harry is tipped off that Joseph is to he killed. Joseph has only a few days more to go and stays out of their reach. Suspecting Harry has squealed, Tom murders Harry and frames Joseph for the crime. He pleads not guilty and is sentenced to the electric chair. If he tells on Tom, he fears that the others will kill him. The night before the sentence is to be carried out, Joseph has a nightmare in which he pleads with Harry to reveal that his murderer was the same man who killed Johnson. The attendant guards overhear this and bring him to the warden who promises to round up the entire gang if Joseph will reveal the real story. Outside the extras are shouting headlines announcing Joseph's impending death. But Joseph, a free man, is already on his way home. Already mourning him for dead, Mary cannot believe the evidence of her eyes. His ardent kisses soon convince her. Both are radiant with the miracle of freedom, theirs forever, together.

THE AMAZING ADVENTURE

G. E. Rummel Drama File No. 10972

WHEN life in an Ohio town grows too dull, Maizy Bowden and Clara Ralston, chums since childhood borrow the Bowden car, and embark on an adventure-seeking tour After one stormy night in a deserted cabin in Glacial Park surrounded by howling wolves, the two girls seek a quiet place to rest in away from towns and people. They stop to admire a secluded fishing stream when their eyes are attraced to a running Indian girl closely pursued by a white man. Just as the man catches up to the girl, Maizy quickly takes her gun from the side of the auto and orders the man off. The girl gratefully introduces herself as Snow Flake, daughter of the chief of a Montana tribe. Scarface Rogers, whom they have just driven off, is reputed to be the clever leader of a gang of thievcs. The two accept Snow Flake's invitation to dinner with the tribe, and enjoy a ceremonial dance given in their honor that evening. The next day, Snow Flake escorts them to a cabin placed on a mountain trail above the town valley, telling them to look upon it as their home for a while. She slips out before they can ask any questions. Engrossed in a fascinating inspection of the compact comfort and supplies of the little house, they are startled when the door opens and admits old Samuel Dawson, a trapper. He tells them he is the owner of the cabin. Snow Flake knows that he enjoys company. Soon Clara has a hot meal cooking on the small coal stove and the three feel like old friends.

Later, a young friend of Dawson, Herbert Jackson, who is resting from his professional duties as a lawyer comes. He finds Maizy's blonde beauty particularly attractive, and returns several times before the girls feel it time to continue their jaunt. Snow Flake accompanies them to the town; their last picture of Dawson, a figure diminishing in the distant waving energetically till they turn out of sight. Feeling sorry for the lonely trapper, Snow Flake returns to his cabin. Approaching, she sees a figure darting among the shadows but when no answer comes attributes it to imaginations. When she enters the cabin and finds Dawson sprawled on the bed with a butcher knife in his heart, she falls in a faint. Coming to, she rushes home and reports to her father. In her excitement, she hasn't noticed a blood spotted paper adhering to her hand from the cabin floor. Her father places this away and returns to Dawson's place where they find the sheriff, summoned by Scarface Rogers. Through his testimony, the girls are arrested. Jaokson offers to defend them. The community is aroused by the murder and a jury is quickly selected. The opening evidence looks bad. Testimony shows the girls were his last visitors and aware where the now missing gold was hidden. Maizy's fingerprints are on the knife, the most convincing evidence. Scarface is the main prosecuting witness. The second day, Jackson dramatically brings Snow Flake and the chief to defend the girls . The blood-imprinted paper is shown to have been placed by the murderer over the knife. Against all ordinary procedure the court allows finger prints taken of the defendants and compared with those on the sheet. The spectators are tense during the moments before the expert announces that the prints belong to Rogers. When Scarface tries to escape from the courtroom, he is removed under arrest. Although the judge instructs them to ignore the guilt or innocence of Scarface who is not legally on trial but consider the evidence only as it affects the two girls, the jury is much moved by the impassioned plea of the defense who bitterly attacks the District Attorney's stand. In a few moments the jury come back with the verdict, "Not Guilty." A note is passed to the judge containing Scarface's confession. He had planned the robbery with the hope of throwing the guilt on the girls whom he resents since Maizy save Snow Flake from him. The jubilant girls send a wire home, "Please kill the fatted calf." Herbert who is with them turns to Maizy. "Let me go with you as your fiance," he pleads. She nods in happy answer.

GUILTLESS

G. E. Rummel Drama File No. 11316

ON a pleasure jaunt through the hills, two girls seek shelter in a cove from a sudden storm. An approaching animal frightens them, remembering that wolves prowl about this section. His wagging tail reassures them. His eager scampers back and forth seem to be a mute request. The girls trail after him through the soggy ground and stumble against what in the dark appears only a huddled bundle. Closer inspection reveals a man. Dragging him back to a dryer spot, the girls build a fire. Regaining consciousness for a few moments, Barker tells them he is a trapper, mortally injured when he loses his footing on the cliff. The girls introduce themselves, Harriet Sedham and Kathryn Morris, two eastern tenderfoots looking for excitement in the less populated parts of Montana. His last words beg them to bury him on the trail. He has no kin and the small packet of gold hidden in a log crack in his cabin is to go to them in appreciation. The girls tearfully carry out his request. Accompanied by the dog, Danger, they find their way to the cabin. After a hasty meal, they start digging for the money, aided by Danger's eager paws. Just as the bag is in their hands, a knock comes. Hastily, Kathryn ties it about her waist. Before they can unbolt the door, Brandy Ross, crooked gambler forces his way in. He accuses them of killing Barker for his money and orders them to hand it over. Just as he roughly grasps Kathryn, Danger leaps on him and they roll out fighting along the trail. A few minutes later the limping dog returns. The girls decide to seek a safer place. All three start down the trail. A rope swings from the air suddenly lassoing Danger and almost before the girls can move two men step out from behind them. It appears hours before the group reaches their destination. The girls are pushed into an old deserted mine, the exit of which is barred. They spend a night of horror. Their only friendly contact is when an unseen man in the darkness whispers words of encouragement along with tangible evidence of good will in the form of milk. Brandy comes the next day with his partner Spike Jones. They insists the girls marry them as they plan to open a dance hall and the girls will be attractions In an unguarded moment, the girls succeed in getting their guns from them and shoot wildly. The two escape and the gate is once more closed. Their unknown friend returns that night. He tells them the two leaders have left for town and that somewhere in the mine is a hidden exit. By the flashlight he loans them they glimpse his face. Kathryn finds him very attractive. Aided by Danger, the girls find a way out and stumble to a ranch. Baldwin the owner who has a large sum of money from a cattle sale plans to bank it in town and agrees to take the girls where they can get a train. The auto is stopped by Brandy and Spike who shoots Baldwin with the guns the girls have with them for souvenirs; and then turn them over to the sheriff on a murder charge. The sheriff who is bribed by the men supresses the girl's accusations. At the court trial testimony shows the weapons are in the girls' possession when they leave the ranch. The prosecuting attorney also claims that the girls' are also responsible for Marker's death. Just as things look their blackest, the defense lawyer calls a surprise witness. The girls are amazed when the secret service man before them is the same man who helped their escape. Ralph Watson tells the court he has been watching the activities of the Brandy gang for months and becoming a member to obtain evidence. Producing the missing bank notes, he testifies that they had been hidden by Brandy who with his partner committed the crime the girls are now being tried for. The accused men are placed under formal arrest as they attempt to escape. The court sets the girls tree in the custody of Watson who is ordered to take them home. As they wait for the train, Watson turns to Kathryn. "This is the pleasantest assignment I've ever had," he declares. "I'd like to be with you always." "And I with you," says the blushing girl. Harriet and Danger tactfully saunter off as Watson takes her in his arms.

TWIN CABINS

Frederic McConn Drama File No. 11253

THREATENED with being forced into bankruptcy, Daniel Maxon tries to force his daughter to marry Felix Stonehart, who agrees to wipe out a hundred thousand dollar debt only on this condition. Rebelling against being sacrificed in this manner, Hilda packs her bags and on impulse throws them into the back of a car bearing a California license and begs the young driver to drive like Hell. Amazed at recognizing the impertinent young woman as the one whose picture he has admired at his cousin's house, Richard Boardman complies. As they ride, Hilda, instinctively trusting him, confides her entire story. Richard agrees to aid her, but points out that there are certain disadvantages to this mode of travel. Blushing scarlet, Hilda realizes too that her father will probably overtake her and under Stonehart's influence try to make her go through with the marriage in any case. Wildly Hilda asks if Richard will marry her, adding they can be divorced when they reach Reno, and that meanwhile they can occupy twin cabins. Smiling at her, Richard sees that she really believes this to be a solution, and assuming an expression as grave as her own, he stops off with her at a courthouse to be joined in matrimony. However, Dexter, an enterprising yiung reporter recognizes Hilda and realizes what a scoop he has, phones Stonehart to get his reaction to his being jilted. Stonehart boards his plane and investigates, himself. He offers Dexter a large bribe to keep the story secret, and when Dexter refuses, drags him into the plane and takes him along. In his plane Stonehart overtakes the young couple, determined to have his revenge for being made a fool. Finding them sleeping in twin cabins, he silently kidnaps Hilda. However, Richard has been unable to rest, thus separated from his bride on his wedding night, and aroused by the disturbance, knocks Stonehart out, and escapes with Hilda. Stonehart gives orders to have the young pair arrested at a nearby town. When they stop for breakfast they are confronted by Mike Folger of the Highway Patrol who has a warrant for their arrest. Hilda urges him to have coffee with them and empties her box of headache powders in his cup. Folger sleeps and once more the romantic fugitives escape. When Stonehart discovers Folger asleep at the post, he takes him along in his plane and the pursuit continues. However, when he hears the entire story broadcasted over the plane radio and discovers Dexter is responsible, he and Folger strap a parachute on the reporter and throw him out of the plane at a height of five miles. The fleeing Boardmans see the frantic reporter dangling in the sky, rescue him, and take him with them to their next camping place. Unfortunately the camp has only one cabin at their disposal and the Boardmans are naturally confused as to the sleeping arrangements. Although Hilda is by this time wildly in love with her husband she would rather die than tell him. Stung by her scornful attitude, Richard elects to sleep in the car. Hilda soon repents and when the camp is dark and quiet, she slips out to Richard, clad in her daintiest pajamas. Hysterically she cries that she will divorce him on the grounds of extreme cruelty—because he has never tried to dissuade her from her silly notion about Twin Cabins. With that blast she runs away and Richard leaps after her. Catching her in his arms he carries her into the cabin. . . .

A few days later in Sacramento, the enterprising Dexter gets the happy couple, Stonehart, and Maxon together for a picture To save his face Stonehart plans a sensational gesture. While the cameras grind, he tears up Maxon's I. O. U. and blesses the young couple Hilda throws her arms about "Uncle Felix's" neck and the radio grinds out the Twin Cabin Blues, or it is a rhapsody?

A CITY ROMANCE

Ann Muir Drama File No. 11400

ONE lovely Spring night, Joe Pembroke finishes his polishing of the car of Bert Kent, then stepping out of the garage where he works, calls for Lydia Snyder. They walk down the street arm in arm, nodding in passing to Mrs. Bert Kent, for whom Lydia does seamstress work. Summer comes. Lydia's white dress emphasizes her lustrous black eyes and hair. Mrs. Kent, watching them sniffs loudly and comments to her husband that if Lydia and Joe aren't married, they certainly should be. Mrs. Kent withdraws her work from Lydia, whose eyes grow larger than ever from suffering. In December Lydia's baby is horn, and Joe shamefacedly admits to Bert Kent, that he married Lydia in November. Mrs. Kent's sister-in-law, Rose, a widow, sympathizes with Lydia and when others sneer, exclaims it was a shame that Joe didn't marry her sooner and spare her all the humiliation. Dora Kent, herself childless, however, looks down at Lydia, wheeling her son Jim, and comments that a boy like that will never come to any good.

One night Bert Kent comes into the garage and agitatedly asks Joe to have his car ready as he may have to hurry his wife to the lying-in hospital. Joe drives the anxious father-to-be down himself, and from his experience as the father of a two year old, gives Bert advice. Bert's head swims and when he learns he is the father of a baby girl, Joe is the first to congratulate him.

The Pembroke's boy, Jim, now five, and Betty Kent are running in opposite directions when they collide at the corner. Betty falls and Jim helps her home. Mrs. Kent disapproves and in the years that follow when the children are friendly at school and Sunday school she does everything possible to separate them. Concerned over their friendship, she sends Betty away to an out-of-town college. Vacations are spent at various places away from home. Four years pass. Feeling that the infatuation must have died by now, and unable to persuade her husband to move from the neighborhood, Mrs. Kent permits Betty to return home. Soon, however, the young people meet again, and Betty persaudes Jim to take courses at night school. Bert Kent, after an uneven fight against the collapse of his business dies. Mrs. Kent, always arrogant and extravagant is prostrated at the realization that she and her daughter are penniless. It is Jim who comes forward with his savings to save them and unable longer to object, Mrs. Kent permits Jim and Betty to be married, accepting their invitation to come to live with them. However, she never permits Jim to forget that he was born out of wedlock and by her interference she makes the life of the newly-weds thoroughly miserable. However, one day Rose, her sister-in-law comes to visit, and observing the state of affairs she waits until Jim has left with Betty and then soundly berates Mrs. Kent, pointing out that but for Jim's kindness Mrs. Kent would be homeless. For the first time the mother-in-law's eyes are opened to her own actions, and although she pretends unconcern, she silently goes about preparing supper for her children. New happiness comes to all, and Jim, now owner of the garage returns to his home to be greeted by his wife and her mother, who smiles fondly on their love.

MIDNIGHT HOUR

Grace L. Hudson Drama File No. 11402

IN all the quarrels between Pat Duncan and his close-fisted, narrow minded father, his brother Jerry sided with the older man. Moreover, when it came to Amy, whom Pat loved devotedly, Jerry, always smooth of tongue and wily in the ways of women, managed subtly to infer that Pat would never amount to more than a flatfoot cop, and a pretty girl like Amy was wasting her time on such a fellow. Amy loved Pat but there was times when she wondered if, after all, Jerry wasn't right. One day Pat came over with out his customary good humor. Amy soon began to pout and it was only after they had come dangerously close to a quarrel that Pat begged her to have paticnce with him but his nerves were all unstrung from his latest argument with his father who kept pointing out how much more ambitious Jerry was. That night Pat went home only to discover that the barn of the Duncan home was on fire. His face singed by the flames, Pat sought desperately to put down the blaze but in spite of all he could do, the building burnt to the ground. It was only in the morning that the full force of the tragedy was disclosed—Ezra Duncan had been cremated in the barn. There was more than a suspicion that the fire had been of incendiary origin and in the trial that followed, Jerry, with apparent reluctance, admitted that his brother had quarreled with his father just before the tragedy. However, for lack of evidence the charge was dropped and when it was discovered the sole beneficiary of Ezra's heavy insurance was Jerry, some few die-hards said at least the cop didn't get anything out of the murder. Stung to the quick by the suspicions attached to him, Pat became morose and moody. He offered to resign from the police force, but his captain and fellow patrolmen talked him out of it, refusing to believe the wild story. Meanwhile, Jerry began calling frequently upon Amy during his brother's absences. With plenty of money to spend, Jerry brought Amy gifts, even when she begged him not to, and tried to refuse them. Jerry tried to induce Amy to come to night clubs with him, hut she refused, and Jerry in solitary splendor visited all the high spots of the nearby town. He began to long for this kind of life, and through Rena Day, a dancer, met the members of Pete O'Larry's notorious gang. Money, he learned, could be picked up easily if one knew how. And if he wanted, he could join the gang. Jerry looked into Rena's velvety eyes, felt her white slim fingers softly on his, and joined. The first job was a bank hold-up. All Jerry had to do was act as a watch outside. However, someone bungled. The alarm went off before the startled gangsters could get out. Seeing a policeman running up, Jerry lost his head and began running, his gun barking. Suddenly a bullet dropped him. Startled Pat looked into the agonized face of his brother and as he bent to him, Jerry gasped out the truth. It was he who had set fire to the barn, killing his skinflint old father for the insurance. Freed at last of the stigma, Pat was to find Amy still waiting for him, and with her he was to forget the recent tragedies.

THE RECORD

John E. Stanley Drama File No. 11394

THE train pulled away leaving its single passenger, a tall slim girl, standing forlornly on the station. Nora Jewell picked up her handbag and walked down the street. In a few weeks it was evident that the town of Glendale disapproved of its new schoolmarm. Nora, exhausted from trying to teach geography and history to the hostile juvenile population of the town, made no friends. Hearing the whispers as she passed, Nora held back her tears and resolved bitterly that she would hold on to her job until the year was up despite all the efforts made to force her to resign. If she didn't need the money so desperately, she told herself over and over, she would leave. Meanwhile the children and their elders poked fun at her city clothes, her northern accent, and her unsmiling face. Once, having wandered off alone in the woods to correct her examination papers, Nora heard a clear baritone voice singing one of the songs that Will Rhodes used to sing before he jilted her. As she remembered once again how her father had died and his whole estate had dissolved in the hands of his creditors, and how Will who had always claimed he loved her, made excuses and broke their engagement, Nora's head dropped and she wept. A moment later Jack Robbins, driving his cattle home came up singing. Seeing the weeping girl, he stopped, but Nora flung him off and shouted, "Leave me alone, why don't you?" Dismayed at her response. Jack went on, his song growing fainter as he disappeared from view. A few days later, hearing a furious barking of his dog, Jack came up to discover the schoolteacher perched precariously in a branch of a tree, while Tarzan snapped and barked at her. Calling off the dog, Jack apologized and as Nora climbed down, she shamefacedly explained she was sorry for the way she had acted the other day, but she was homesick and discouraged. Jack offered to carry her books home for her, and as they walked together, for the first time Jack learned her story. Nora, given an opportunity to pour out her troubles to the first sympathetic person she had met in Glendale, spoke unrestrainedly, and Jack felt himself drawn to her. Impulsively he asked if she would accompany him to the Sunday School service and discussion the next day. Aware of the stir he created as he entered with the unpopular school teacher, Jack remained close at Nora's side. It was raining when they reached Nora's home, and drenched, Jack accepted her invitation to come in for a cup of hot coffee. Drying off before the fire, Jack realized for the first time how pretty Nora was when she dropped her stern look. Bending forward he kissed her swiftly, then confused, took his departure. It was Nora who offered Jack books he had never had an opportunity to read before, and Jack who gave Nora the idea of having classes for adults. Nora was certain that nobody would want to come to her classes but Jack convinced her that Glendale was cool to her only because they didn't know her. To publicise her school for grown-ups, Jack arranged a game festival. At first people drifted in because they were curious, but Jack organized community singing, and soon someone took out a mouth organ. With leap frog and stunts on the horizontal bars the last reserve of the crowd melted. Nora began telling them stories about countries they had never visited, and before the evening was out, she had signed up most of the town people for her school, Jack lingered after the others had gone. "Nora," he began softly, and soon two people discovered their views on matrimony corresponded completely.

TAKE THIS MAN

Littie Walker Drama File No. 10785

WHEN Dorothy is told that she has failed to pass the fifth grade, the little girl resolves always to face her mistakes and profit by them, as she hides her report from her mother. Resolutely, she studies her lessons, passing with honors the next semester, and continuing with this splendid record in the years that follow. No longer a child, this same spirit of bravely trying again, regardless of what the future brings, dominates Dorothy's life. At sixteen, she is introduced to Floyd Mitchell at a school party. Eager for the freedom her three older sisters enjoy, and in love for the first time, Dorothy urges her parents to give their consent when Floyd proposes. At first, they refuse, but when she continues to plead with them they at last agree that this may be best, knowing Dorothy's impetuous and affectionate nature. On the wedding night, Dorothy is deeply disappointed when Floyd accepts her mother's invitation to remain at their home, since the bridegroom is financially unable to provide for hotel accommodations. As the visit lengthens into a month's stay, Dorothy realizes that Floyd has no intention of supporting her, and secures a position as a cook, receiving seven dollars and a half a week. Floyd refuses to find work, since his wife is supporting him, in spite of her pleadings. Later, Dorothy is deeply shocked when officers arrest her husband for forging a check for one hundred dollars. He is sentenced to one year in an Oklahoma penetentiary.

A faithful wife, Dorothy visits him regularly, promising to wait for him. When he is released, she agrees to start over again with her husband, moving to his mother's home at Paris, Texas, at his request. In spite of Dorothy's efforts to win her, her mother-in-law mistreats the young wife, giving her only two scanty meals a day, and forcing her to arise at five to tend the fires, the beginning of hours of gruelling labor. When Dorothy attempts to write home, Floyd's mother destroys the letters, beating her when she discovers her slipping one secretly to the postman, and advising her that only mail which she has censored may be sent out. Mrs. Woodward, a neighbor, protests at this treatment, and promises to help the young woman if she can. When her mother comes to visit, Dorothy pours out her troubles: at a picnic which the two attend, in company with Floyd and his mother, Dorothy is openly humilated when her husband refuses to purchase an ice cream cone for her. Unable to take her daughter home at the time, Mrs. Woodward sends for her, but Floyd's mother will not allow her to leave, informing police, who are sent at her mother's instigation, that Dorothy is too ill to make the trip. Grace, her sister, comes to care for her. After the birth of a baby girl, Dorothy agrees to give Floyd one more chance. They move to Kansas City, and enjoy a brief month of happiness before Floyd's mother joins them. At first, all is well, as she cares for the baby while Dorothy works, but soon she urges her son to seek the company of other women, and Dorothy discovers that he has given away baby clothes and household money.

When her husband threatens to kill her, and throws gasoline at her, causing an explosion, Dorothy leaves, sending her baby ahead. Jimmie White, a neighbor, who has aroused underserved jealousy in Floyd, helps the brave girl to return to Oklahoma. Comforted by his friendship and her family, Dorothy, as always, faces the future courageously.

FIVE YEARS

Blanche Arly Drama File No. 8172

TOO proud to appeal to wealthy relatives for aid when she is left alone and penniless, Elizabeth comes to New York to look for a position. Discouraged, she takes shelter from the storm in a night club doorway and shiveringly watches the dawn faintly tinge the dark sky. Bill Holden, owner of the "Rendezvous" coming out, sees the girl huddled there and pityingly asks if she's hungry. Reopening the door, he takes her inside and manages to get some food for her from the kitchen. As the girl tries to conceal how ravenously hungry she is, Bill asks if she'd like a position as a hatcheck girl and turns away embarrassed from her tears of gratitude. For weeks Elizabeth works in Bill's place and one night Bill tells her he loves her and asks if she will marry him. Like two happy children they go on a short honeymoon trip and deliriously happy return home only to find that during Bill's absence some racketeers have visited the restaurant and have demanded that Bill sell out to them. Bill scoffs at his manager's advice to do as they say, and when he is visited by four sinister looking thugs, Bill replies that he is conducting his business legitimately and he is not going to be frightened out of it by them. They slowly walk to the door and remind him that anything that happens is his own fault. However, when the next morning, Bill finds that vandals have pulled down all the fixtures and left the night club in a sorry state, he loses courage. The police promise aid, but Bill realizes for the first time that they have been well paid to overlook the damage. It is Elizabeth who urges him not to give up and Bill refurnishes the "Rendezvous" only to find, the night before reopening that another visit from his "friends" has completely destroyed his place. Then he confesses he is beaten and, since they are expecting an addition to their family, they decide to invest what money they have left in a chicken farm. The first year their chickens suddenly die off and too late they discover that they might have saved them if they had known how to treat the croup. Dismayed, Bill gets odd jobs but he does not make enough to keep his family in clothes and food. Utterly discouraged, he goes to the city to speak to some people he knew when he was in the restaurant business, while Elizabeth at home, holds her baby close to keep it warm. Her heart is torn by the child's hunger, when she receives a letter telling her that her aunt has left her some money in her will and the lawyers are forwarding a hundred dollars so that Elizabeth can make the trip. Incredulous of her fortune, Elizabeth seizes the child, rushes into town, buys food and clothes for the baby and returns home to cook Bill a warm supper. When he returns, however, he is so dejected that he doesn't notice the change in Elizabeth or the baby. She puts her arms about him and as, in a discouraged voice he tells her that he was offered a partnership in a good restaurant but he'd have to put some capital. Elizabeth cries out as she feels some thing hard in his pocket and draws out the gun with which he was going to shoot himself. They both cry a little, as Elizabeth holds him tightly and shows the letter and they sit down to their first good dinner in months.

With the money, Bill gets his restaurant and again the sun shines for the Holdens.

DR. CHRISTOPHER'S SECRET

Walter Clement Darcy Drama File No. 11238

(Dedication Betty Marie Snyder)

CARROLL had come again. Sitting in the living room of his palatial residence, the distinguished surgeon Doctor John Christopher ran nervous fingers through his hair. "How much is it this time?" he asked. Carroll grinned, and shook his head. Not money, he replied, and as Christopher rose agitatedly, Carroll said, "To-morrow Canfield Belmont, the noted politician, will have to undergo a serious operation. But, alas, the poor fellow will not recover, because you will operate." Christopher paled and shouted, "You've blackmailed me you've made my life a Hell, But you can't make me a murderer!" Mockingly Carroll surveyed the great surgeon and asked, "I wonder if your beautiful daughter Myra would be interested in knowing a little about her mother." Christopher was beaten and he knew it. More than anything in the world he loved Myra, needed her love and faith. Ever since Carroll had learned his secret he had bent Christopher to his will with the threat of telling all to Myra. Even now Myra was refusing to marry the brilliant young journalist Gilbert Gerioux because it would mean leaving her father alone. A lump rose in the surgeon's throat as he thought of what would happen if Myra ever knew. At the dinner table that night Myra noticed her father's agitation, and putting her arms about his shoulder questioned him about what was troubling him. All that evening Gilbert tried to quiet her fears, but when he dared to suggest that her father might not be all she thought he was, Myra quarreled with him for the first time and returned brokenly to her room.

The next day before a crowded amphitheater of internes and doctors, the renowned Dr. Christopher operated upon Belmont. Three hours later Christopher announced the death of Belmont due to post-operative adhesions. Nobody suspected the death might have been planned. In his laboratory, Dr. Christopher buried his face in his hands and planned the murder of Carroll. Some days later, Myra returned home, a suspicious brilliance in her eyes. "Where's Gerioux?" Christopher asked. Myra explained that she never wanted to see him again, and besides she had met a fascinating man, one Carroll. Christopher leaned weakly against the console. Frightened, Myra asked if something were wrong. A few days later, Christopher called Carroll to his office to hear a new recording by a symphony orchestra. He knew Carroll's weakness for music. During the playing, Carroll felt a slight prick but in his absorption failed to attribute any importance to it. While walking home, Carroll fell dead. Heart failure, the medical examiner pronounced after a cursory examination. Gerioux, sent to cover the case, bit his lip as he realized the dead man was the one Myra had been seen with lately. In Carroll's apartment Gerioux found a manila envelope containing information that startled him.

Calling upon Dr. Christopher, Gerioux asked him what he knew about the death of Belmont. Christopher's face grew livid. Then as Gerioux questioned him about the death of Carroll, the doctor confessed that he had killed Carroll with a hypodermic injection. Carroll had threatened to expose to Myra Christopher's terrible crime of shutting Myra's mother up in an insane asylum because of his jealousy of her. When he had tried to release her he had found she had become insane. Before Gerioux could move, Christopher took poison and fell dying to the floor. Gerioux slowly tore up the envelope with the story of Christopher's crimes, and Myra, never to suspect, was to find happiness with Gerioux.

THE DREAMER AWAKENS

Gussie Friedman Drama File No. 11133

AMERICA, Land of Opportunity! With the horrors of the pogrom in which her mother and father had both been killed, fresh in her mind, little Bertha Golden comes to the land of Freedom. Even the Ghetto with its squallor and noise is invested with glamor for her, and in her youthful joy and enthusiasm, the little foreign girl doesn't realize how much her aunt is sacrificing for her until she sickens and the doctor says, "Malnutrition." Determined to contribute her aid, little Sarah gives up her schooling in spite of the exclamations of her teachers who have watched with interest her remarkable progress. Still little more than a child she gets a position as a domestic servant, spending the few free hours she has studying. However, the indignities she suffers are climaxed when the boy of the house tries to seduce her. Then she meets Ruben Barons, and when he asks her to marry him, although she does not love him, she consents so she can assure her Aunt a home. Ruben, years older than she is kind to her, in his fashion, but love is absent from her life, until she becomes conscious of David Paris, who owns the corner grocery. Like her, David strives for the finer things of life, and his spare moments are given to his violin. When Sarah's son Sidney is born, David rejoices almost as much as she does herself, and each day he puts aside special delicacies for the child. Once, while Sarah is purchasing groceries, her hands touch those of David and both tremble. Unable to keep silent any longer, David pleads his love. Sarah silences him telling him she has her husband and baby to think of. Soon after David sells his store and leaves the city. Years pass during which Sarah's every thinking moment is given to her son's future. Her dearest hope is that one day he shall be a doctor or lawyer. Then one day Ruben is killed in a factory blast, and Sarah is left alone with her child, her aunt having long since passed on. Sarah finds work, and starving and denying herself she begins saving toward Sidney's college education. At school Sidney is a terror. Sarah is heartbroken when the disciplinarian sends for her and says Sidney is an incorrigible truant; but she continues to believe that everybody else is mistaken and her boy is all that she wants him to be. Meanwhile the youth delights in spending stolen hours at the waterfront, listening to the jargon of the longshoremen and practicing their obscene language at home and among his fellows. Sarah tries in vain to check him with her great love, but one day Sidney is arrested for stealing and despite Sarah's anguish, is sentenced to two years in the reformatory. When he comes out, far from being reformed he is imbued with a desire to be a gentleman crook such as he reads about. At home he plans to go on as before, only this time he will be too clever to be caught. Then, remembering the money his mother has saved toward his college education, Sidney one day steals Sarah's two thousand dollars from under her mattress and vanishes. It is the last straw. All Sarah's dreams are blasted. But it is the headlining of Sidney's conviction for murder, and his end in the electric chair that leads David to Sarah for whom he has been searching for years. And held tightly in David's gentle arms, Sarah finds relief at last from her woe.

PAINTED LAUGHTER

Sir Danne McAn Drama File No. 11151

BIMBO, everybody's favorite clown, was nervous. To-night. after the show he was to be married. He looked up at Tiny Tom, his son, poised on the trapeze, and his heart swelled within him. He loved Tom more than life itself. It had been largely Vivian's regard for his youngster that had made him think seriously of marrying again. Tom was only seventeen. For years he had been denied a mother's care, Vivian, strong, healthy, with an infinite capacity for loving, could supply that need in spite of her own youth. In the stands the crowd was laughing, cheering, while Bimbo tumbled and fell, dragging his grotesque wooden turtle. The drums rolled. Tiny Tom spun through the air, landed, and took his bows. Bimbo flopped about until the crowd ached with laughter, and the show was over.

Back stage the circus was celebrating the big wedding. Everybody loved Bimbo and his son, admired the devotion between the pair. And now there was Vivian. Under the scrutiny of the circus folk, Vivian bore up nobly. She loved Bimbo. From now on their life would be hers Her arms rested reassuringly on Tiny Tom's shoulder, and big hearted Bimbo swelled with pride. When Tiny Tom's mother had died, falling from a trapeze, Bimbo had thought he could never be happy again. Now there was Vivian and best of all she and Tiny Tom adored each other. Life went on. Each night before the performance, Bimbo made sure that every trapeze, every rope, every brace and net was well secured of Tiny Tom. At first the property man had objected. But it was Vivian who explained that Bimbo's love for his son prompted his actions and he wasn't doubting anybody's work. Each day after removing his make-up, Bimbo smiled at Vivian and his son, and never was Bimbo such a sensation. Laughter and happiness radiated from him. The circus business picked up. Meanwhile Tiny Tom was falling in love. It had never happened to him before. At first he didn't realize why he always trembled when Vivian came near. Then one day her dress slipped a little on her shoulder. An overwhelming desire to kiss her seized Tiny Tom. In horror he ran from the tent. Now Vivian knew. At first she thought she would go away, then she realized it would only make Bimbo unhappy. Tom was only a child. He would get over it. She avoided him as much as possible, treated him as though he were a baby. But Tom couldn't sleep. He loved his stepmother! He couldn't help it. He wanted her, needed her. Seeing his father caress her drove him almost mad One night the entire circus family celebrated the anniversary of the show. They were doing marvelously. Most of the credit was due to Bimbo, the most famous clown in the business. In his speech, Bimbo thanked his son and his wife who made him so happy. That night as usual Bimbo inspected the trapeze. Seeing Tiny Tom up there, his face drained of color, Bimbo began worrying. He tumbled. The crowd laughed. The drums rolled. Tiny Tom looked at Vivian, shut his eyes tightly—and missed the hands of his partner. Bimbo was as one paralyzed. In a trance he carried on. He fell over his silly turtle and laughed loudly. The show ended. He rushed out. The manager hustled him into a car and sped him toward the hospital. Vivian was already there. Tiny Tom smiled up at them wanly. "Goodbye Dad and———mother," he said and was still. His makeup streaked, Bimbo ran out to the streets. His son was dead. Bimbo stumbled and fell. When he awakened Vivian was holding his hand. Bimbo went back to the circus. He tumbled and made the world laugh. And Vivian hid in her heart the knowledge of why Tiny Tom died.

MY FATE

Mildred Card Drama File No. 11237

RED geraniums bloomed on the porch of the little house in Brooklyn. Jan Stevens was dishing hot food in the kitchen. "Smells good, honey," Bart said rubbing his freshly shaven face with a hot towel. She smiled at him and as he hurriedly downed his evening meal so he could catch the seven-fifteen train for St. Louis, Jan put her arms about his neck and asked wistfully, "How long will it be this time, Bart?" Smoothing back her hair Bart assured her not longer than three weeks, and kissing her closed eyes from which a tear was starting, Bart asked, "Love me?" Then with a hurried glance at his watch, he dashed into the bedroom for his bags. The doorbell pealed and leaving her unwashed dishes, Jan stared at the beautiful woman who stood in the doorway. "Florrie," she managed at last. Florrie chattered of her difficulty in finding her friend. She had just returned from a marvelous time abroad. What was Jan doing here? Married! Impossible! Then as Florrie talked rapidly, Bart came in, hat and coat on, bags in hand. Jan introduced them. Bart kissed Jan tenderly and left. Preparing dinner for her friend, Jan answered questions about her happiness, and Florrie, combing her hair in Jan's room, walked softly to one corner where a sound issued, and leaned over a small figure, clean, sweet, and fragrant. Jan's baby. With a suppressed sigh Florrie returned to the kitchen where Jan was working. It amazed her that Jan, who could have had millionaires, should be happy in these surroundings. Learning that Bart, assistant manager of a large wholesale firm, traveled a great deal and wouldn't be back for three weeks, Florrie firmly saw to it that Jan left the baby with an elderly childless neighbor, and came to visit her at her Park Avenue apartment. Jan breathed deeply at being once more in a luxuriously carpeted room. Three whole days of this. But when she learned that two of Florrie's men friends were calling for them, Jan protested. That evening sitting in Paul Harlow's smooth running car, Jan remembered the days before she had given up everything to marry Bart. There was dinner in a hotel grill, theater, and dancing later in an exclusive club. Paul's eyes burned a dangerous fire, and Jan, who had simply been introduced as Janice Stevens, couldn't resist Paul's invitation for lunch next day. Three days of gaiety followed, then reluctantly Jan returned to Brooklyn —and reality. A week passed before she heard a voice call and gasping his pleasure at finding her again, Paul asked why she had run off without giving him an address. Over a softly shaded table in the hotel dining room, Jan told him of Bart and the baby. Paul's fine eyes clouded with pain, and Jan realized then it was Paul, not Bart she loved. They left, but when Paul suggested a few moments in his apartment, Jan yielded, Jan was admiring the oil painting above the fireplace when Paul entered. Unable to resist, his arms went about her and Jan felt his kisses on her face, her lips and cheeks. Violently she struggled free, and taking her wraps, hurried out, her face burning. When Bart returned he felt something was wrong. But it was not until Paul came that he knew. Realizing then that Jan loved this other man, Bart offered her freedom. Paul, though, taking Bart's proffered hand, looked into his eyes and knew he must go away. Jan, torn between them, looked beaten. Then, his bags packed, Paul heard a noise and unlatching the door saw Jan, tears on her cheeks. "Come," she cried. "It's Bart. An accident." Dying, Bart had pleaded with Paul to take good care of Jan and of Donny. Six months later, Jan and Paul, a few hours married, stood at the rail of their ship, bound for England. Donny was with them. Their future lay ahead.

TRAIL'S END

Virginia Burchfield Drama File No. 11187

"I pronounce you man and wife," and the mountain preacher blesses Mary Bonis and George Jones, who marry secretly knowing that her aristocratic family will not have a mountaineer as son-in-law. The Bonis family move to Middleborough where Judge Bonis tries to recuperate his fortune lost in the bank crash, and socially hold themselves aloof. George becomes an accepted visitor around the home for he helps the Judge in business dealings, and the parents trust their daughters not to think of George seriously. Mary loves her parents but her love for George who threatens to leave if she will not become his wife outweighs her scruples. He promises to announce it openly when he has a home of his own to bring her to. Two years of happiness pass for Mary; although speculation among the mountain neighbors is rife. Particularly they note something that Mary has never contemplated, that George is showing growing fondness for Ella Bonis. The only flaw in Mary's happiness is that George continually puts off building the house and she is afraid her parents will learn their secret. When someone breaks into the courthouse and removes all the records she thinks nothing of it at the time. One day George comes to her and shatters all her dreams, revealing that he is in love with Ella who knows nothing of his relationship to Mary and that his marriage before was faked. The next morning the Judge learns that Ella and George are married and have run away to a distant city. To complete his heartbreak, seven months later Mary has a daughter. Her father will not believe that Mary thought George her husband; and the records to prove it are gone. Against her pleas, the child is taken away. When Mrs. Bonis sister Mrs. Campbell who has not written for years sends a letter asking them to send one of their daughters for a companion; they send Mary to her in Wisconsin as the solution to hide their disgrace.

Her aunt is fond of her and when she learns Mary's history begs her to make her home permanently there. She has always wanted children and in lieu of them adopts her husband's nephew James. The two young people become good friends. Mary has not forgotten the baby so rudely taken, often seeking solace in playing with little Lucy Stewart. The years pass; Mary still pretty has many beaus whom she rejects but never hears from her people. When Lucy is 17, it is apparent that James is in love with her but Mrs. Campbell threatens to disinherit him, revealing a secret that has hitherto been kept from Lucy. The Stewarts are not her parents but had adopted some years ago this child of unknown background. Mrs. Stewart is very ill and when Mary feeling sorry for the lovers comes to questions her, the mother reveals that the girl was born in Middleborough—so at last Mary finds her daughter. But she cannot tell Luey she is illegitimate; when her foster mother dies, Mary keeps her promise and moves into the Stewart home to look after Lucy. Ralph Stewart grows to love her and his unexpected kindliness wins like response but Mary feels she must reveal her past first. A letter comes to her from the estate of George, containing her marriage license and confessing he lied, their child is legitimate. Joyfully, Mary tells Lucy who she really is and Mrs. Campbell consents to James marrying her. After a double wedding, mother, daughter, and their husbands, visit Mary's parents now bitterly remorseful for their treatment in the past.

REVENGE IS SWEET

Minnie Louise Speaker Drama File No. 11374

UNTIL one tragic day, Terry Randall is a normal fun-loving, kindly American boy. His father is a banker in a small western town. There is a spectacular holdup on the last Saturday of the cattle sales season when deposits are unusually large. Spectators note one of the robbers slyly whispering to the official in apparently familiar terms. A rumor is spread through the town that night where groups of sleepless men, worried at the losses which the bank insurance fails to cover, are still lamenting. Randall, Sr. is accused of engineering the theft, of knowing who the crooks are. A group of masked men ride out to the Randall home and demand admittance. When Randall professes ignorance heated words are exchanged. One man spies a silver dollar on the floor; a peculiar marking identifies it as one of his recent deposits. Grimly the men look at each other. With one accord, the men hustle Randall on a horse and drive off through the night. Ten year old Terry watches this scene in horrified silence from the second floor staircase. The next day the dead, tortured body of Randall is brought in by a car passing through the outskirts of the town. Terry grows up with the twin purpose of vindication and revenge. With him he carries always the silver coin which he grimly dubs his lucky piece. Someday he hopes to find the instigator of the murder through this. He goes east to live with distant relatives, but returns several years later. His first encounter with the tough element of the town establishes him as an excellent gambler, splendid shot, and a man free from scruples. Since the community values their gold more than life, Terry is determined to hit their pocketbooks. He imports several hardened, lawless men. Soon after, a period of terrorism sweeps through the county. Men are held up only a few yards from home and after the attempt of one victim to resist only to receive a well-placed bullet, the hold-up men are given passive reception. Suspicion falls on Terry but he is always protected with excellent alibis. One day Terry encounters Madeline Swan, the daughter of the town's leading merchant, who has just returned from finishing school. Chary of women ordinarily, the young man is strongly impressed by her brunette beauty. Shortly afterwards his men bring in the spoils from their latest robbery. Casually playing with the coins, Terry is galvanised into action when he sees a coin, twin to his charm. He learns that this was taken from Swan's pockets. Almost insane with the knowledge that at last he has found a clue, Terry determines to kidnap Swan's daughter in revenge. Arranging a pretext whereby Madeline, under the impression that her father is badly hurt, comes to a deserted spot, Terry takes her to an unknown cabin in the woods. Threatening letters are delivered to Swan. The countryside is unsuccessfully combed. Terry plans to possess Madeline in diabolic revenge but her candid, puzzled attitude restrains him. One day he finds his charm is missing. It weighs heavily upon him as an evil omen. When that evening Madeline returns this to him, some inner pressure in him yields and he confesses the story of his father's death and the life he has since led. A few minutes later, the young couple are in each other's arms. A shot splits through the window. Hours later he returns to consciousness in a hospital. Beside him are the Swans. Madeline forces her father to make a public confession, clearing the Randall name. Looking at Madeline, Terry no longer feels hate. With her kiss on his lips, revenge is sweet.

THE BROTHER IN GRAY

Joseph N. Gagnon Drama File No. 11196

WITH his family beaming pride, little Joseph Ganion leaves his home to dedicate his life to religion. As a member of the Marist Brothers, Joseph takes the vows of Poverty, Charity, and Obedience, to be renewed each year until he takes them permanently. For several years he dedicates himself to study and prayer. Then, one day, he learns that his father is gravely ill. Securing permission to visit, the young Joseph returns home. Overcome at sight of his father's wasted frame, Joseph is dismayed at the seeming indifference of his two brothers. Only in Rose, his father's nurse, does Joseph find a sympathetic spirit. Through the hours preceding and following the crisis of his father's illness, Joseph and Rose are together, and when at last Papa Ganion pulls through, the two young people feel as though they have shared a great spiritual experience. Joseph returns to the monastery, but Rose, looking after him, feels her heart sink within her at the thought that she may never see Joseph, now called Brother Michael, again. At last, unable to endure the thought that he may never know of her love, she writes him a heart breaking letter.

Meanwhile Joseph is undertaking a retreat. For a period of a month, the Brother is to abstain from speech and give himself solely to meditation and prayer. However, Brother Michael is unable to dismiss the thought of Rose from his mind. Desperately he tries to fight off his worldly thoughts and at the end of the month, wan and haggard, he emerges from his solitude, ready to renew his solemn vows. However, he is summoned to an interview, and grilled at great length about Rose whose letter has been received and censored. Unable to endure the probe, Brother Michael shouts, "Yes, I love her," then at the shocked silence that follows his outburst, stops short. In disgrace he is denied the right to go on, and head bowed, he returns home. There his father and brothers regard him with open scorn. Rushing from the house he proceeds down the street, and before the resolution fails him, signs up for the Navy. The irony of his career,—monastery to Navy makes him laugh a bit wildly. Then, he meets Rose again, who is serving her country too as a nurse. For two brief hours, Joseph and Rose walk together, and in her tender eyes Joseph finds again warm understanding. The hour comes for them to part. Overseas both are sustained by thoughts of the other, and when at last the nations cease warring, and the survivors of the bloody fracas return home, Joseph and Rose are to meet again. This time, Josph says softly, there is to be no parting.

ISLAND OF LOVE

Mabel Marden Gill Drama File No. 10391

PICKING blueberries on the tiny island in the middle of the lake, thirteen year old Betty cries out in appreciation as she discovers a lone rock standing majestically alone. Calling her two sisters, she walks slowly around it, and as a lull falls over them Betty gravely suggests that they christen the island, Angel Island, and make a vow that they can only sit upon this rock if they have done nothing wrong. With appropriate ceremony, they bring their communion bibles and each of them solemnly sits upon the rock and promises to be good.

It is Betty more often than the others who gets in trouble. Vivacious, pretty, she dubs the cross farmer on the neighboring estate Monkey Bub, and when he throws a stone at their cow for nibbling at his grass, Betty devises ways and means to torment him. And when Monkey Bub goes a'courting an old maid, who has forgotten how to smile, Betty taps at her window with a nail fastened to a string. Ruth, who is aiding her, is caught, but Betty stoutly comes forward and assumes the responsibility. The next day, red-eyed from a spanking, Betty refuses to sit on the rock, feeling she is unworthy, but her two sisters convince her she has already been punished more than sufficiently.

Years pass. Betty goes to New York and her prettiness soon wins a position for her. Bill, a young mining engineer falls desperately in love with her, and Betty coquettishly promises to wait for his return and marry him. But while he is gone, Betty elopes with Jim, a handsome young scapegrace, and Bill, returning with high hopes is terribly hurt at Betty's broken promise. It is the quiet Ruth, who has been teaching school, however, who wins Bill back from despair, and when he is sent on another trip, Ruth goes with him as his wife.

Stella marries Richard Jones, an older and wealthier man and soon she is giving lavish parties. Meanwhile, Betty's child is born and Jim, having lost his job begins drinking. Stella invites Betty to one of her gay parties, but Jim, drunkenly breaks in and angered at sight of Betty in one of Stella's low cut dresses, seizes her wrist and tries to force her to return home with him. Betty breaks free of his grasp and tells him she never wants to see him again. As the days pass, however, Betty longs for her husband and when she finds Stella is having an affair with a married man, she tries to interfere. Sullenly Stella tells her to mind her own business, but when Stella discovers she is going to have Arthur's child, Arthur smiles crookedly and tells her her husband will never know the difference. Realizing that Arthur has no intention of leaving his wealthy wife on whose income he is living, Stella grows desperate but Betty comforts her. Stella's child dies at birth and Stella weakly asks to be carried home so she can see again Angel Island. In sight of the rock she confesses to her husband, and he after a long moment forgives her before she dies. Jim comes back to Betty and at the rock on Angel Island, they repledge their love and with little Faith perched high on the rock. Jim tenderly kisses Betty and promises to begin life anew.

THE BARRICADE

Helen D. Doerr Drama File No. 10964

ILLY-TREATED serf, born in the shadow of a Russian citadel, Norton dares to fall in love with the lovely Daphne, daughter of his cruel master. It is Daphne, herself rebellious against the tyranny of governesses, who gives Norton his first book, and when one day he hears her play a lovely tune on the piano, he apprentices himself to a cabinet maker and constructing a violin of his own, learns at length to pick out the tune on his instrument. Listening, Daphne is amazed as she informs him the tune was of her own composition. Time passes. Everywhere feudal systems have fallen into decay, and at last Daphne's father frees his serfs. There is wild rejoicing among the captive people who accept happily the hardships of working their own tiny strips of land. However, soon enough they are to learn they are worse off now then before. Pinched faces, frozen bodies ache with pain while the Lords enjoy their sizable tariffs. Rebellion seethes. Once there is open talk. That night, among others, Norton's father and brother are put to death as a deterrent to other rebels, and he is seized for military service. At length the oppressed youths, unable to endure this longer, break out, burning the houses of the Lords. Realizing Daphne's danger, Norton dashes into her burning house and is himself carried out unconscious, unable to find out whether or not Daphne escaped.

Years pass. In France Norton is amazed to see a face similar in features to those of his Daphne. Soon Norton learns it belongs to Margot, the flighty sister of Daphne. Margot, married to the jealous, parsimonious Monsieur Sabine Evonne, is attracted to the handsome Norton, and withholding the information about Daphne's whereabouts, tries to hold the much sought after Norton. He pleads with her again and again, finally asserting if she loved him as much as he loves Daphne, she would not withhold that which is vital to his happiness. At last, realizing she is in physical danger should her husband suspect her passion, Margot unwillingly divulges that Daphne is in Paris, but beyond that she will say nothing. Norton speeds to Paris and in the interim of finding Daphne, determines to pledge himself to music. In a tiny music shop he buys a violin, and the owner, a musician himself, astounded at Norton's talent, gives him lessons without charge. Thus Norton is heard by Professor Rhys who, recognizing genius, offers his own services. At a concert given by Monsieur Rhys pupils. Norton distinguishes himself and is invited by Monsieur Portuondo, a patron of the arts to play some afternoon on that gentleman's precious Stradivarius. However, even that signal honor grows dim in Norton's mind as he looks after the Monsieur's lovely companion, Angelique. In the gilded rooms of the patron, Norton plays beautifully, but while the room resounds with "bravos" his eyes seek out Angelique's. When Norton expresses his longing to use the Stradivarius at his official debut, Angelique pleads with Monsieur Portuondo to gratify Norton's desire. Portuondo looks at her closely and finally makes his offer—Norton may use the instrument, if Angelique promises never to see him again. After a terrific internal conflict, Angelique promises. Norton's performance is a tremendous triumph, and weak-kneed after hearing Norton play "Daphne" Angelique permits Portuondo to lead her out. Dinner in a cafe is an agony to her, and at last they return to Portuondo's apartment . There Norton waits and with a cry he seizes his Angelique-Daphne in his arms, while Portuondo confers the Stradivarius on them as a gift and as they dazedly thank him, he silences them by assuring them "After all I am pleasing myself. This is my tribute to a great love——— which seems to have passed me by."

WOMEN WHO PLAY

A. B. Baldreas Drama File No. 11265

"TOO BEAUTIFUL!" That's what people said about Mary Brown. Secure in the knowledge that she could have any man she wanted at her feet, Mary whirled through life, a gay butterfly. There was James, who had loved her since childhood. Patient, adoring, he always at Mary's beck and call, and she, taking him for granted, gave him a few precious moments between her other affairs. Mary never guessed how James suffered as he saw other men help her into cars and drive off with her, other men place their arms tightly about her beautiful shoulders while dancing. James asked only to be near Mary, and Mary sought adventure. Then Lewis came to town with an engineering corps. A powerful handsome Irishman, he surveyed the town and selected Mary instantly. For Mary Lewis was the grand adventure. For the first time she had met her match, and held close in his strong arms, she felt her naughty manner melting. For the first time Mary was in love. Everyone whispered about the change in her. Some few snickered at the thought of Mary taking orders from any man. And Lewis had his way. Then, about two months after Lewis came to town, Mary was filled with a great fear. With his arms about her, she told him they would have to get married. Lewis said nothing. Bewildered Mary looked into his eyes and for the first time then he told her he was already married. "It doesn't matter, does it, dear?" he asked. Mary drew away from him and shivered. But in the end, unable to remain on in town and see the mockery and sneers of those she had known, she agreed to come away with him to another town and live as man and wife. From the first there was a change in Lewis' attitude toward her and then one day he received a note from his wife telling him she knew all about his affair but would forgive him if he came back to her. And Lewis, anxious for the inheritance promised him by his wife's father, left a check for Mary and rode away. Alone in the darkened room, Mary tore up the check and wept bitterly. Her baby was born dead, and when she was turned out of her boarding house for not paying her rent, she returned home. With head still held high, Mary walked up the streets of the town where she had once been so happy, where she had been called "The Queen of Hearts." Then sitting on a park bench, she let the tears fall unnoticed. Suddenly she noticed a familiar figure going by. He sank heavily on a bench. Forgetting her appearance, everything save his dejection, she moved towards him. "James," she whispered, and turning he stared at her incredulously. "You've come back," he cried brokenly. With Mary's hand on his arm, James told how he had grieved over her departure. Cynthia, Mary's friend had told him of her trouble. Why hadn't Mary come to him? From his broken phrases, Mary was to learn that he had worried so over her that he had lost his job. And Mary was to learn too, that in spite of everything, James wanted her as his wife, and through her aid and encouragement James was once more to find himself, and happiness was to be theirs at last.

FATE'S DECREE

Eclipse Drama File No. 11185

FROM the deck of the Schooner Pratt, First Mate Jones sees for the first time the harbor of Lucea, Jamaica. The next morning while the work of unloading is proceeding, Jones goes ashore. His little native guide informs him of the Tom-Tom dances attended by the whites and blacks of the island, and Jones is shocked to see the evidences of mixed marriages everywhere. Mopping his brow, he notices the general store of Mrs. Vosper and enters. To his amazement, after the hard looking faces he has seen all day, he looks into the loveliest pair of eyes he has ever seen, and a soft musical voice asks what she can do for him. Dazed he returns to his ship, but the astute captain guesses that Jones has seen something of interest and when he asks offhandedly if Jones has been into the Vosper store, the First Mate starts. The captain laughs heartily and admits it wasn't hard to guess since Alice Vosper is the prettiest girl on the island. It is the Captain who arranges to have the Vospers, whom he knows well, come aboard for dinner. The friendship of Jones and Alice flourishes and as he helps lift her out of the boat, he trembles violently in the realization that he is in love. At last, feeling he is being unfair. he informs Alice that he had given his word to marry Genevieve McKenna, daughter of a man who had befriended him in his youth. Alice tries to show that the confidence leaves her indifferent, but both she and Jones fail to conceal their feelings, and Jones promises that if he can manage the break without ruining Genevieve in her social set in Alabama, he will return. At last the cargo of the Schooner Pratt is unloaded and from the shore the white frock of Alice Vosper can be seen until the ship is beyond the horizon. The schooner has an uneventful coastwise trip until sailing majestically into the treacherous harbor of Montego Bay, they anchor near a non-commissioned fruit steamer with a single watchman aboard. A terrific storm blows up. Thanks to the able seamanship of First Mate Jones The Pratt rides safely at anchor but the other boat is unable to drop anchor and while the watchman frantically flies an S. O. S. flag the fruiter drifts helplessly toward shore. To the amazement of his fellow seamen, Jones dives into the lashing waters, and swimming with the greatest difficulty toward the doomed boat, helps drop the anchor and saves the ship. On his return to Lucea Harbor, Jones receives a decoration for his unparalled feat of bravery. Another heartbreaking meeting with Alice follows. Then he comes to shore no more. Puzzled, Alice proceeds to the waterfront to discover that The Pratt is quarantined and that Jones, while helping a fellow seamen has come down with the dread Yellow Fever. Despite the pleas of her family, Alice defies convention to come aboard with the best doctor the island affords, and personally nurses Jones through his illness. Meanwhile Genevieve, out of patience with Jones for his long absence, breaks the engagement and elopes with another man. Free at last, Jones, still weak from his illness, sees Alice preparing to leave the ship, but intercepting her way, he tells her he loves her, and with a little sob, Alice comes into the arms of the man she loves.

THE MAGIC POTENT

Eula Rene Zemo Drama File No. 11411

HASTILY suppressing a cry of triumph, Dr. Raymond Grant looks down upon the rabbit, now kicking with new vigour, on the operating table in his laboratory. His years of confined study and research are rewarded as he gazes upon the tiny vial in his hand which contains a drug powerful enough to prolong life several years in bodies only a few hours away from death, before his fluid is injected. The ingredients include certain secretions of the human body which he secretly obtains through unscrupulous undertakers. So far he has experimented with animals but there is no theoretical barrier against corresponding success with people. The fluid has the added quality of increasing the mental quickness and physical strength of the subject. He tells his wife, Mildred, that their fortune is made. A few days later while taking a breathing space outdoors from an exhausting period in the lab, he witnesses the critical accident of a newsboy attempting to save a dog from an oncoming car. Dr. Grant rushes him to the hospital he is connected with, and after examination finds that the boy is dying. Eager to try his discovery, the physician injects the drug. The results are acclaimed a miracle and wins wide publicity though Grant refuses to disclose his method, claiming it as still in the experimental stage. Soon after, Dr. Grant is called in to administer to the prominent lawyer, Lewis Blaine, and death is cheated of another victim. An indirect result of this treatment is an increasing force on the part of Blaine which within the year carries him to prominent professional heights. Meanwhile, Dr. Grant takes his first human patient of this drug, Chester Perry, into his home where the boy develops a keen interest in medicine. With the doctor's aid, he becomes a medical student in a leading eastern college. Wrapped up in his work, Dr. Grant does not notice that Blaine is becoming a constant visitor of his wife who resenting her husband's engrossment in his profession turns to others for the attention she does not find home. While serving his interneship, Perry is called in emergency response to the attempt of Ruth Haven, wealthy society girl, to commit suicide. Ruth is publicly engaged to Blaine and through an anonymous letter learns her fiance is having an affair. Perry instantly falls in love with her, forgetting his professional self for a moment. It is soon evident that only a miracle can save her. Perry remembers that Grant has performed other miracles so he sends for him to administer the treatment. Grant leaves the girl resting quietly and promises to return to apply another dose. He is not expected home, so he returns to find Blaine in his wife's bedroom. Fearing disclosure which will ruin his career, Blaine leaves after a bitter scene, but returns that night. Dr. Grant's dead body is found in the morning. Although Ruth seems to grow well rapidly, she secludes herself. The mirror disoloses to the horrified girl that her facial appearance is going through a strange distortion and she is filled with a mad desire to draw blood. The city goes through an era of terror soon after. Reports spring all over of a mysterious figure who claws people as they are walking some lonely, dark street. The "thing" they agree is more horrible than any monster. The fiend, who was once the sweet, tender-hearted, Ruth follows her fiance one day and sees him enter the Grant home. His shadow as he embraces the woman is thrown on the shaded window. As he leaves, Ruth springs upon him. Blaine's screams are heard by Perry who wounds the figure. In his panic Blaine confesses the murder. Perry is shocked to recognize after close scrutiny, the girl he secretly loves. An hour later back in the library he stumbles across Dr. Grant's secret prescription which reveals the horrible effect of one injection on certain cases. Here is the explanation for Ruth. Dawn comes pledging a promise of happiness.

DANGEROUS INNOCENTS

Thomas H. Seabury Drama File No. 11405

AMONG the tired, jaded faces of the people waiting for a crosstown bus in America's largest and most sophisticated "big town," Viola Windsor and Myrtle Chester stand out in vivid contrast. Although their clothes are as well fitting as any in the swarming crowd, there is a clear freshness about them that belongs only to country dwellers. Lester Wilcox, known as "Sponky" to a wide circle, was instantly attracted to them. He follows them, sitting unobtrusively on top of the bus and leaving when they do. However, the girls notice him. Taking the initiative Myrtle suddenly turns and asks him what he wants. All Lester needs is a beginning and before five minutes have passed, they are all in a restaurant telling each other their life's history. "I always intended to be an artist, until my family went broke," he tells them wryly. The girls confess that they have left their small-town homes a few days ago with only a small amount of money, hoping to "buck" the city. He leaves them late in the evening at their furnished room promising to return the next day. At home he finds his sister, Jean, who has just returned from abroad. Lester confesses that he sent for her because he has run through the estate but promises to have money soon. At the race track which he visits two days later with the girls he introduces them to Jasper Willis, a heavy race track gambler who is mixed up in another racket. Through him, the girls are persuaded to try the gentle art of "blackmail." At first they indignantly refuse but when assured that someone will be planted in the hotels to play the part of the house detective before things can go too far, their depleting funds persuade them. Sponky insists on taking that role to protect the girls. Things prosper for all of them but Sponky is in love with Myrtle, who looks upon him only as a good friend, and hates the racket they are in. All money is turned in to a "higher-up" whose identity is concealed, and a split is given to them, large enough to permit the girls to live luxuriously. Meanwhile Jasper pays a great deal of attention to Myrtle which worries Sponky who knows his reputation with women. Viola meets a boy from her home state, Mike Sullivan, and is ashamed of the life they have been leading. One night Jasper dopes Myrtle's highball and attempts to take advantage of her, but Sponky breaks in, and gives him a thorough beating. All three decide to leave the tricky business. Sponky has made a painting of Myrtle which wins a large money prize. On the strength of this, he persuades the girl to say "yes." When Jasper is notified, he seeks to force them to change their minds. After they persist he notifies his chief. A week later, Chief Inspector Kenny of the vice-squad places Sponky's sister under arrest on a serious charge. Convinced that there is some connection between this amazing development and their own recent decision, Sponky holds Jasper up at the point of a gun and frightens him into confessing that Kenny himself has been the leader and instigator of a form of white slavery. The morning papers carry the sensational expose and arrest of Jasper. Two weeks later on the money a grateful city has awarded them, the happy couples, now safely tied in wedlock, take their last look at the Statue of Liberty as their ship streams out—bound for Paris and their honeymoon.

DESTINY

Alice Lane Drama File No. 11409

NO premonition of disaster troubled the gay passengers aboard the trans-channel ship, "The Queen." Suddenly, without warning, a violent explosion shook the vessel. Horrible screams arose from those trapped blow. The sea rushed in through the gash torn by the exploded boiler and the majestic ship slowly settled to the bottom. Nations grieved while the headlines mourned, " 'Queen' sunk with all on board."

Meanwhile off the sleepy fishing village of Huxley on the Kentish coast, young George Appleby and his cousin, Bill, espied a floating object through the fog. As they drew near they observed the figure of a woman clinging to a piece of wreckage. Before they could reach her, however, she had lost her precarious hold and slipped into the sea. The lads rescued the tiny bundle she had carried, a baby, but all search for her was in vain. Returning home, George gave the baby over to his mother, a kindly woman widowed through a fishing tragedy, and since there were no marks of identification on the child the Applebys took the waif to their hearts. Years rolled by, the little girl now known as June Appleby, believed Mrs. Appleby to be her mother, and George her brother. One beautiful Spring morning, June and George are repairing nets. June sings as she works and a visitor to the village, amazed at the beauty of the girl's voice makes inquiries. Unable to forget the bell-like tones, Mr. Harries, part owner of the Covent Garden Theater persuades the Applebies to let him take June to London where her voice can be properly trained. It is a painful leave taking for George who realizes he loves June with more than a brotherly affection.

After a year of hard study June, about to give her first concert, sends tickets to the Applebys. However, they realize how different they must be from June's new associates and write they are unable to attend. Bitterly disappointed, June soon concludes that her "mother" must be ill, and despite all the dissuasions of her excited teacher, June rushes back home. There she insists that Mrs. Appleby and George accompany her back, scoffing at their reminder that their shabby clothes will be outre at her concert. At last fearful that she will miss her concert, they agree to go. George feels embarrassedly out of place among the beautifully dressed women and their escorts at June's concert and realizes more than ever the insurmountable barriers between him and the girl he loves. June's appearance is a personal triumph and Professor Garbeneau, a noted savant, is greatly impressed by the girl's resemblance to the once famous singer Lucille Devier, who went down on the ill-fated "Queen." When Garbeneau offers to place June in Grand Opera, George persuades her to accept.

In Vienna the opening night of the Grand Opera season, Gerald Devier, son of the late Lucille Devier, plays opposite June and falls in love with her. His ravings to his aunt about the girl, makes the fine looking dowager observe the girl keenly from her box. It is Mrs. La Plata who persuades June to send for the Applebys to confirm her conjecture about June's origin. And at last, unmistakably, June is proved to be daughter of the once famous singer, and the sister of Gerald, who, after the first moments of adjustment to June's being his sister, realizes that George loves her deeply. And Gerald it is, who brings together at the end, June and the ever faithful and devoted, George.

THE ROUND-UP

Celia Utley Drama File No. 11372

AFTER an extended absence from the ranch, Jim Bowden returns. Though his cowboys speculate as to where he has been, there is a hard, forbidding roughness about him which forbids questioning. Late that night, he calls in "Red" Dunnel, his foreman, and his assistant, Larry. When the men return to the bunkhouse there is a frightened, puzzled look on their faces, but they mention nothing of what has just passed. The next day in accordance with their previous instructions, Larry and Red drive to the little railroad station and pick up a heavy package for Bowden. Placing it carefully in the car, the men turn back to the ranch. Their silent ride is unbroken except when Red, anxiously nodding his head, declares, I don't like this; don't like it at all." "Do you want to get Jim in trouble, you fool?" was the savage reply. The heavy box is dragged to Bowden's bedroom where Jim inspects the air holes before the package is opened. From it is removed a small boy about four years old, trussed and gagged. The child, Bobby, after the first few minutes, cries for his mother, but Jim frightens him into quiet, and declares that he is his father, and that he has no mother. After the first denial, the child fears to speak. The curious cowboys try to comfort the child as the days wear on but he grows paler, until one day a pup, Wolf, is brought.

At Christmas time, the men learn Bobby is hoping for a visit from St. Nickolas. When at the last moment they scurry up clothes and toys the friendship between the men and himself is sealed. They dub him "their little knight." After an almost fatal experience from which Red saves him when the boy wanders too far, and encounters a wolf, Bobby confines himself to the near-house quarters. Although Jim has grown increasingly kind during the few years, Bob still recalls the threats he made on the first terrible night of his arrival. Jim leaves again for a few weeks to conduct some cattle business in the city. There he meets Clara Randall, pretty school teacher, who preceives the kindliness under Jim's stern exterior. After a brief, shy, courtship, they are married and return to the ranch. Bobby instantly approves of Mrs. Bowden, who conceals her surprise at seeing the boy. In private she questions the man who for a while persists in refusing to answer . . . Under his wife's influence, Bowden builds a newer and more comfortable house. Life takes on a much smoother, refined aspect. When Mrs. Bowden falls ill and needs to go to the city for a serious operation, the men are stunned. The round-up of cattle is due and Bowden can't be spared. Mrs. Bowden begs to have the ten year old Bobby accompany her. While recuperating at the hospital, Mrs. Bowden notices a sad eyed woman who visits the wards with flowers daily. She asks her name——Mrs. Randolph. For several days Bobby notices something is troubling her. Finally, Clara calls over the woman and reveals that Bowden has committed a wrong which she wishes to right. Jim had killed a man in a justified quarrel but the prosecuting attorney promises to clear him only if he takes charge of his nephew. The man's name. . . Sanders Randolph who wanted his nephew's share of the estate. At first the woman appears to faint, then in a few broken words she reveals that the kidnapped boy is her son—Bobby. The news is broken to Bobby who when the shock is over, embraces his newly discovered mother. But as he glances at the longing eyes of Mrs. Bowden, Bobby extends a free hand, embracing both.

SEARCH FOR HAPPINESS

Minta Miller Drama File No. 11406

THE front door of the small one family house slammed. "Is that you, Frank?" Marge called from the kitchen where she was giving a last minute touch to the overdue supper. "No," came the answer of her husband's brother-in-law, Ted. Marge, greeting him, notices how worn he appears, a troubled look on the face, which lights up at the pretty woman before him. When he asks for her husband, she tells him that he is late again. Suddenly her control breaks down under the stress of the memory of her husband's actions during the past two months. Ted begs her to tell him the trouble and she confesses that Frank has been coming home late almost every night and recently has stayed away altogether on an average of once a week. Ted, scanning the attractive Marge and knowing how faithfully she has devoted herself to making a home for Frank, is wondering how Frank can treat her so. Impulsively, he blurts this out to Marge. The door opens again, and Frank enters. He greets his wife and Ted with such ugly coolness, that Ted quickly excuses himself. His home is only a few streets away but he approaches it reluctantly, Frank's sister, his wife, has proved a bitter disappointment. After the death of his first wife, leaving him with two children, he suffers a series of unsatisfactory housekeepers until Etta, with an illigitimate child of her own, comes. After several months, she persaudes him to marry her. She soon slackens in her household duties and develops a violent and jealous temper. When Ted finally goes into his house, Etta puts him through a cross examination. When she learns he is back from a visit at Marge's, she accuses him wildly of being too fond of his sister-in-law. Ted hotly denies it but there is a strange look in his face as if he is just recognizing the meaning of his increasing talks with Marge. Honorably, he keeps away for several weeks. One night Marge goes walking, attempting to drive out the restlessness which seizes her. Her mind drifts back to the days before her marriage when she was so confident that her life with Frank would fullfill all her dreams, but an increasing wall has grown between them. As if his conscience is troubling him, Frank has been accusing her lately of growing too friendly with Ted. Marge is horrified. She is abruptly brought back into the present when she encounters Ted, also seeking air. Blushing in the concealing darkness, Marge permits him to accompany her to a small park. Under a light, Ted first sees her tears. The vivid picture of her unhappiness stirs him so that he loses his head. Ted holds her soothingly to him and confesses his love. It is an awakening for Marge who is amazed at her own emotional intensity. Marge is stronger than Ted; she convinces him that they must be faithful to their present mates. The next day, Etta calls on her sister-in-law and creates a hysterical scene before the ashamed Ted arrives and forces her home. Absorbed with this and shaky from the scene, Marge is startled when Frank returns early. At first she thinks that Etta may have called him, but all too soon discovers that Frank has been conducting an affair with a young girl who is now facing motherhood. Frank wants a divorce so he can marry her and avoid imprisonment for seducing a minor. The dazed woman consents. Several months later, she receives the divorce decree. As she leaves the courtroom she encounters Ted who takes her to a tearoom. Here Ted announces that Etta is divorcing him to marry her former lover. In Marge's wildly beating heart new dreams stir to life.

MARRIAGE TRAP

Helen L. Brown Drama File No. 11457

WHILE they were still children, Hugh's parents had broken off his romance with Helen Ashley because her parents belonged to a different Church. Hugh, never able to think of other girls, grew up into a quiet young chap. Among the girls hired by his father as waitresses for their hotel was Laura Dane, tall and beautifully proportioned. Laura, piqed by Hugh's indifferenence to her, frequently tried to draw him out, but Hugh remained reserved and avoided her as much as possible. There had been a big celebration in honor of the tenth anniversary of the hotel. Hugh, going through to see that everything was in order, found Laura straightening up things in the dining room. Smiling at his confusion at finding her alone, Laura asked if he hadn't taken even a little drink with the others. Hugh replied curtly, but as Laura explained that he needn't growl at her, she was only trying to be friendly, Hugh apologized for his boorishness. At last, under Laura's teasing, Hugh consented to have just a swallow of the wine that had flowed so freely all night. The next morning, awakening with a splittering headache, Hugh discovered himself in Laura's room and staring aghast at the girl weeping beside him he heard Laura explain that he had gotten drunk and broken in. Disgusted, Hugh guessed that his wine had been drugged, but Laura only wept harder claiming she was ruined. Unable to prove his innocence. Hugh unwillingly gave her his name in marriage while his family condemned him for having betrayed Laura. A few days later a coarse faced man, seeing Laura addressed her familiarly and learning that Laura was married threatened to expose her past, with which he was only too familiar, unless she paid him blackmail money. As Latham came back again and again, Laura made excuses to leave town, and Hugh, to whom the hurt eyes of Helen Ashley were a torture, agreed. However, Latham found them and soon Laura insisted that they go to another town. One day Hugh found his wife with another man. For the first time he learned the truth about what she had been before she met him. Brokenly, he offered to forget the past if Laura would remain true to her marriage vows. But when he learned that she was continuing to betray him, he left her. Laura returned to Hugh's parents and told a trumped up story about how Hugh had deserted her before her baby was born, and how the baby had died of starvation. Sympathizing, Hugh's parents took Laura to their hearts while Helen, learning the circumstances refused to believe the stories in circulation about Hugh. At last, in spite of all her precautions, Hugh's family discovered the truth about the woman they were sheltering. This time they put her out. Hugh got his divorce, but having long ago been disowned by his family took to drifting with a wild crowd until his health failed. Hugh's brother, anxious now to make amends brought him back and it was Helen who carefully nursed him back to health, her love for him strengthened by adversity. And together, at last, Hugh and Helen were to find compensation for all the wasted years.

FORTUNE'S LOCKET

King Charles Maxwell Drama File No. 11461

THE child danced with delight as her father, Walter Graves, wealthy stockbroker, snapped the locket and chain about her neck. He gazed down fondly at Denville who was celebrating her third birthday. "How your dead mother would have delighted," he murmured half to himself. It was the Fourth of July, and he had decided to give all the servants a day off. Graves had planned an outing for Denville at Sunset Junction which was a drive several hours away. He had among his more pretentious cars a plain, battered automobile which he retained from sentimental memories of less prosperous days. A sudden fancy decided him to use this car. Meanwhile 100 miles away was a woman, Mrs. Baker, who had been half-crazed from grief since her own daughter died, completely unaware of the circumstances that would link her with the Graves before nightfall. Father and daughter had travelled for miles when a spasm of pain contracted Graves' face and he hastily stopped the car near the river edge. His head slumped and in almost an instant he was dead from a heart attack. The frightened child called and tugged at his sleeve, before dissolving into tears. Mrs. Baker was taking her usual, mournful stroll nearby when she heard Denville's panicked screams. Rushing over, she perceived at once what had happened. So shocked was the child that she could not even recall her name but when questioned, Denville confessed that her mother was dead. The car did not appear as one belonging to a wealthy man, and assuring herself that the child would probably be placed in an Orphan Asylum, Mrs. Baker resolved to take her and raise her as her niece. Investigation the next day identified the prominent man and Detective Willis Meek sought the child. Her hat was found floating on the water and Denville was thought to be drowned. The Graves' estate went to the Warners, remote relatives who had been estranged from them. When Denville was twenty, she was a popular young school teacher, but she wanted to go to the large city. Although, she could not remember her last name, she was curious to see if she could discover anything about her people. So with Mother Baker's blessing one morning, she departed. A group of young society people were still celebrating from an earlier party and Denville was shocked by their actions. One of the men detached himself and apologized. Thomas Smith, young lawyer, after learning that she was in search of work, suggested she take a place as maid with the Warners who were friends of his. She was readily placed hut when Melba, the Warner's daughter, learned she was seeing Smith, the girl was extremely jealous. The mother sought a pretext to discharge her. One day as Denville was with her, the locket she always wore slipped out from the neck of her dress. Mrs. Warner accused her of stealing it and called the police and Meek was sent. Smith called for Denville as it was to be her afternoon off but when she failed to meet him, he inquired and was told by a servant that Denville was in the library with the police. He rushed in and declared that she had shown him the locket on the train, and that the pictures inside would identify it also. Meek opened the locket and gasped with surprise. Graves' face and that of his child looked out at him. Upon questioning, Denville revealed it was a gift of her father who had died suddenly while they were driving on a pleasure trip. "Here is the missing heiress," the detective dramatically told them. On top of this surprise, Melba saw Smith take Denville in his arms. "So you're her lover, now," she said spitefully. "No," he contradicted, "Her hushand since last week."

HUMANITY

Nino C. Vanni Drama File No. 11452

WHEN Oran Dunham married a woman whose past life was spent in promiscuous, dissolute fashion, he believed that humanity was essentially good and that when the handicap of poverty was removed Heleana would fit completely as the woman of his dreams. After his two children, Henrietta and Jack, were born, Heleana persuaded him to abandon the quiet mode of existence that they had followed the first years. Gradually, his home "cluttered" with young men who had discovered that with judicious flattery and attention, they could win their ways into Mrs. Dunham's grace and pocketbook. Returning home unexpectedly one day, Dunham finds his wife sitting in a dim corner with a strange man who is eagerly embracing her. Though he remonstrates and pleads with her, his wife now more openly conducts her affairs. She appears to have a great fondness for her children so while Dunham refuses to continue marital relations with his wife, he does not want his children to have a broken home. To the outside world who know something of the circumstances of his household, Dunham is an enigma—either a fool or a saint. Later he adopted Dorothy, the small niece of his old man-servant, Hall. As his own children grow older, they are too busy with school, sports and friends, to have much time for him and Dorothy is almost his sole companion. At a party held for Henrietta one evening which is still in full sway at one in the morning, he goes upstairs to retire when the laughter of a man and his daughter reaches him from her bedroom. Flinging open the door, he soon learns that his daughter has been following her mother's path. Dunham decides that he alone is to blame for permitting a child to grow up under such influences. The next day, he begs Henrietta to go away with him to some quiet place while he allows his wife to quietly divorce him. The girl defies him and decides to go with her mother. He has already settled a large trust fund on Heleana and mother and daughter leave together for Europe. Karl, a neighbor, has grown very fond of the 17 year old Dorothy and Dunham highly approves. Soon he notices that Karl spends less and less time at their house. Sure that something is wrong Dunham learns that Jack has been paying attention to the girl whose head is turned. His heart grows sick remembering the late hours his son has been keeping, refusing to tell where he has been, openly jeering his father. Determined to have it out with his son finally, he learns that Jack and Dorothy have registered at a hotel as "man and wife." He comes in time to avert further tragedy and undergoes the humiliation of having to tell another that his own flesh and blood is a rotter. The boys lunges at his father who administrs a stinging slap. He places Jack on a small allowance and refuses to have him at home. At his urging Karl and Dorothy are married and he turns his house over to them unable to bear the unhappy memories it contains. He has formed the habit of spending his afternoons at a nearby cafe. Three men enter and line up the patrons in a hold-up. One Dunham recognizes as his son. The shades are drawn to hide them from outside. From behind a counter a gun is pulled and Dunham sees his son topple over. The lights go out. In the ensuing confusion, the father drags Jack outside a side entrance and hails a taxi. The boy is dead when they reach home but their name is saved from open scandal . . . After the funeral Dunham collapses. Near death he wills all his possessions to Karl and Dorothy who have taken the place of his own children. Looking at them, after all the blows fate had dealt, a smile lights his face as he reiterates, "The fault lies not with humanity but with myself. . . "

HELLO JIMMY

Nino C. Vanni Comedy Drama File No. 11452

WHILE in New York studying medicine, Jimmie Wolberg receives letters regularly from Anne Brown, his childhood sweetheart. Jimmie's room is cleaned by Sally, a bright-eyed youngster, who, falling deeply in love with the handsome medical student, turns Anne's picture face down. Jimmie reproves her sharply after the third time, and Sally turning up a morunful face asks Jimmie what love is. Hastily reaching for her pulse and taking her temperature, Jimmie exclaims, "My gracions. A burning fever. You should be put to bed with an ice pack at your head," and puts her out of his room. Stamping her feet at being treated like a child, Sally continues to adore Jimmie, who graduates from school and returns home to begine his practice.

Meanwhile Anne has made herself indispensable to Jimmie's wealthy family and when Jimmie returns he finds his engagement to Anne is a foregone conclusion. She is stunning and amorous, and Jimmie finds the wedding date set almost before he knows what he is about. Sally hearing of Jimmie's impending marriage, declines to go with the family to the seashore, and telling them she is going to visit for two weeks, comes to Jimmie's home town. Jimmie is astounded at seeing her. He scolds her roundly and tells her she must return home. Sobbing quietly, Sally leaves and only after she has gone does Jimmie discover she has no place to stay. Meanwhile Sally learns that Mollie, whom the family has never met although she has married Jimmie's cousin George, is unable to come on the train as she has planned because her mother is ill. Sally enters the train from the rear and when the family come to the station introduces herself as Mollie. Jimmie almost collapses when he confronts Sally, but he stands by her. Meanwhile George, traveling about the country, discovers that he can, after all, come to the wedding. He is told his wife is upstairs and enters planning to surprise her. Sally screams but Jimmie, beads of perspiration rolling down his forehead straightens things out and George, glancing appreciatively at the pretty Sally, agrees to pose as Sally's husband. Anne, meanwhile, haughty and suspicious, hires a detective to probe the matter. The detective catches George slipping out of "his wife's" room and sleeping with Jimmy and is about to reveal all, when George and Jimmie, with just a few hours until the wedding, tie and gag him and lock him in a closet. Jimmie answers the door and admits Mollie who has been able to come after all. Dismayed, Jimmie pushes her into the bathroom, while he goes to warn George. But Mollie finds her husband first and almost swoons as she finds him trying to evade the amorous embrace of Anne, herself. Caught, Anne tries to shift the blame on the bewildered George's shoulders, but Mollie defends her husband. Anne retires in confusion, and Sally, coming to comfort Jimmie finds him not crying, but laughing, relieved at his escape. She tells him she is going, but Jimmie catches her in his arms, not to release her until she breathlessly promises to marry him on the spot. So ends all to the satisfaction of everybody.

STRANGE CARGO

Arthur Jay Richards Drama File No. 11462

WHEN the unscrupulous sea Captain Frederick Crespo, is approached by a group of Venezuela revolutionists, he agrees to provide them with a large consignment of rifles in return for a heavy sum of gold. Since the nations have banned the sale of guns to the rebels of this small country, Crespo offers the American Vice Consul, Howard Newcomb, stationed at Caracas, a share in the proceeds if he can aid him to obtain guns from the factory of his prospective father-in-law. Newcomb is heavily in debt and consents. His fiancee's father, Brewster Hilton, will not agree so the guns must be obtained without his knowledge. Unexpectedly, Newcomb's sweetheart, Myrtle comes to visit him, escorted by a trusted and important member of the firm despite his youth, John Higgins. Though Higgins is in love with the girl, he is too honorable to confess it while she is engaged to another man. Newcomb persuades Higgins to place Fenton in their plant on the Eastern United States coast. Once there, Fenton, who at present is on his diplomatic staff, can be depended upon to engineer the removal of the firearms where they can be picked up by Crespo's ship. Busy with his schemes, Newcomb neglects Myrtle. The observant Higgins postpones his departure to keep the girl company. Reports from Fenton indicate that the plans are being carried out successfully. The captain prepares to leave for New York with an oil cargo and on his return South pick up the weapons. Providentially, Newcomb is ordered to a conference in Washington and he decides to sail with Crespo whom he does not completely trust. Myrtle, whom he promises to marry when they reach the States, and Higgins return also. Meanwhile Higgins accidentally overhears a conversation which reveals that Newcomb and Crespo are planning to rob his firm. Hoping to learn more aboard ship, four U. S. Federal agents are planted as tourists. When Higgins tries to send a warning wireless in code, to the firm, the Captain deciphers it. As a result they try to throw him overboard but the agents come to his rescue. In the embroil which follows, a federal man is killed and the others are imprisoned along with Higgins. Though Newcomb tries to keep Myrtle in ignorance, she suspects her fiance is not the honorable man she thought he was and awaits an opportunity to free Higgins. Meanwhile, Crespo learns Fenton attempts to hold them up for more money. After unloading their oil, Newcomb employs Gladys Halstead, showgirl to act as Myrtle's double. Under pretext he locks Myrtle in her stateroom and they sail for the coast. Gladys completely fools the trusting Fenton who gives the "owner's daughter" access. There, in the storehouse, Crespo and Newcomb overpower him and start to load a small boat. Meanwhile, Myrtle slips past the guards and frees Higgins and the others. Only one seaman has been left on guard and he is overpowered. An agent wires for help. As the men place the last weapons in the boat, a flashlight of intense power is shot at their faces, blinding them. Realizing the game is up, Crespo kills himself on the spot since he knows what the law has in store for the killing of one of their operators. Newcomb submits to the handcuffs and is soon joined by the showgirl and Fenton. Utterly ignorant of all this, Myrtle and Higgins hire a machine to drive them to her home. He bends down for a kiss and a moment later chuckling remarks, "I'm not so sorry that they tried to stage a revolution in Venezuela after all!" ,

SINGING BLUES

Jessie Worley Drama File No. 10868

THE tricky lyrics of an original song heralded the approach of Joan Shackleford. There was a chorus of greetings as Joan flung open the door of her dorm and surveyed with mock horror the confusion of clothes and bare legs. Down the hall came the shouts, "Is the bath ready yet?" "May I borrow your jade earrings?" "Wait'll you see my date." Swinging her legs from the table on which she had perched herself, Joan looked on in amusement and joy. To-night was the Alpha Chi dance and she was going with Bev Hale. With only a few moments before Bev was expected, she showered and dressed, and as the freshman called up, "Joan, your date's here," she came leisurely down the steps. For a moment Bev stared at her transfixed, then, breathing, "You're lovely, Joan, lovely," he assisted her with her wrap and called a cab. At the dance, men cut in on Joan regularly, but at last she was alone with Bev in the garden of the Alpha Chi house, and as his lips clung to hers, she sighed in utter happiness. It was two before Joan slipped into her own room and flinging herself on her bed wept for sheer joy. Holding tightly to the bracelet that had been her dance favor, she shut her eyes to dream of Bev, whom she knew now, she loved. So the few short weeks to graduation had slipped away. And on each Bev grew more precious. But lately Bev was more serious. Joan waited for him to tell her what the trouble was, but the more Bev thought of it the more he felt would be unjust to tie Joan to him. His mother, widowed and impressionable, had invested the entire fortune left to her, to a smooth spoken stock broker. Now they had nothing. Bev would have to provide for his mother, now. How could he ask Joan, whom every man at school wanted, to share his poverty? So he had said nothing. Graduation came on. Bev returned home, but at the end he had only pressed Joan's hand wordlessly and hurried off to the train—leaving unsaid all the things he had planned. Unable to believe that Bev had considered her only an adventure, Joan wept. The Alpha Chi bracelet seemed to cut into her wrist as she had visions of Bev returning home to a childhood sweetheart, of Bev telling another girl the things he had told her. At last she returned home. The town boys flocked to her house, but Joan was indifferent and at length word got around that college had changed Joan. It hurt her to think that Bev might, even at this moment be laughing at her for caring so, and again and again she planned to marry Henry, or Bill, or someone, so she could turn the tables on Bev. So time passed and Joan at last took an interest in Interior Decorating. Without the distractions of men and late hours, she began to build up a distinguished clientele and at last she met Gene. Boyish, attracted by her, Gene pleaded with Joan to marry him, and feeling that perhaps the best she could do with her shattered life would be to give it to Gene, whom she could never love, Joan considered him. Then came a call from her sister to help her refurnish, and when her brother-in-law sent a hurried call for Gertie, Joan promised to bring their child Dickie on to them. It was on the train that the adorable Dickie cut his finger, and Joan, hurrying to him found a man comforting the little fellow. "Bev!" she gasped, but as she realized he thought Dickie was her son, she let him go on, hurting him deliberately. And when at last Dickie leaped into the arms of his waiting mother, and Bev understood, he drew Joan to him fiercely and kissed her. "But . . . " she protested, then relaxed, for happiness was to be hers at last.

SMART DAMES

Peggy Richards Drama File No. 10640

CHICAGO JOE gave the revolving doors of the bank a violent shove. Glancing up and down the busy street, he moistened the flap of a long brown envelope, sealed it, and slipped it into the pocket of his overcoat. For a moment he paused to look admiringly at a slender blonde girl brushing by him, then with a sigh he hurried on. From the doorway of a pawnshop a short heavy-set fellow stepped out and joined him. They walked along in silence. Then, "You got it O.K. Joe?" asked Lefty. "Sure. A new one at the bank. He didn't recognize me," Joe grinned. "Okay. Better slip it to me." Slipping his hand into his pocket, Chicago Joe looked dismayed. "What the h——! Lefty, I ain't got it. Look, a hole in my pocket! It must have slipped through. Quick, Lefty, back to the bank." Lefty exploded. "The heck you say! What'll Pete say——"

Chicago Joe's voice grew tense. "Listen Lefty, that girl standing in front of the bank. She picked it up. She's the dame that followed me out. She's still standing there. She don't know what to do with the envelope. Don't let her get away." As the two men approached, the girl walked toward a little gray roadster and almost instantly the car slipped away from the curb. Chicago Joe swore. "Quick Lefty, let's take this car. You've got your keys?" "Sure," Lefty answered. "Never without'em. Say, this is a doctor's car. See the——" "I don't care if it's the Big Shot's car. It's ours. Savvy," Jean rode through the traffic and out onto the highway. The breeze swept her hair back. Suddenly a black car shot past, blocking the road ahead. For a moment she was frozen with fear as the black car forced her off the pavement. Slackening speed, she let the motor pur softly as she looked up into the eyes of two desperate gangsters. "Hand it over," Chicago Joe said. "Hand what over. I don't know what you are talking about." "No funny stuff, sister. We mean business, see?" I dropped an envelope with $5,000 berries in it in front of the bank. Give it to me!" "But I haven't got it." "Don't lie. You were the one that passed through them revolving doors after me. You picked it up." Jean's mind worked rapidly. Seriously she lied. "It wasn't me. I was supposed to meet my boy friend in front of the bank. I must have missed him. I know the girl you mean. I saw her pick up something and take the trolley toward the Saginaw." The two men searched the car desperately, then Lefty said, "Aw come on, Joe. I believe the dame's telling the truth. We can't afford to waste any more time!" As they peered intently into the Saginaw car, Lefty and Chicago Joe were arrested for driving a stolen car.

Jean headed the nose of her car toward town. Parking her car in front of the bank she hurried across the street into a drug store. "Hello . . . hello . . . Paul. This is Jean. Don't worry about that operation. I got five thousand dollars." Tears shone in her eyes as she made another call. "Hello, Mr. Staunton. I'm sending the two thousand back to you today. I'm not coming to your apartment to-night. I know I said I would. But that was three hours ago. I haven't touched your money. No, I'm sorry. I got the money for my husband's operation another way. Goodbye." And as she hung the receiver on the hook, Jean squared her shoulders and walked out again into the street.

THE SILENT PARTNER

Virgil L. Newcomer Drama File No. 10920

AMONG the new men taken on by the successfully operating Hollister Chemical Plant, is Orville Johnson. Leaving the building, Johnson collides with Ellen, vivacious daughter of Frank Hollister, and he glances after her admiringly. While Ellen enters her father's office to wheedle fifty dollars for a party, Johnson proceeds to the office of Charles Longhorn, Hollister's business rival. There in conference with Longhorn and Hubert Pendleton, a trusted employee of Frank Hollister and likewise in the employ of Longhorn, Johnson receives directions.

He is to jot down the secret formulae of the Hollister Company on an extra cuff which, attached to a long rubber band, can snap up his sleeve and out of sight.

At Ellen's party, the necklace of her best friend is discovered missing immediately after Jimmy Thornton, Hollister's secretary, whom Ellen has specially invited, has danced with her. The following day it is discovered in a pawn shop. Meanwhile, Hollister, elated over the profits of the firm, announces to his cheering employees that he is instituting a ten percent raise in salaries and will, if conditions warrant, raise them further. However, within three weeks, instead of the anticipated rise in business, Hollister is disturbed by a considerable falling off. Contracts are cancelled and realizing that someone in his plant is giving away his formulae, on the next day, Hollister informs his employees of the situation, explaining that unless the culprit can be apprehended, either a salary decrease will be necessary or a lay-off of many employees. Further he offers a large reward for information leading to the conviction of the spy. Subsequently Johnson tries to blackmail Longhorn and Pendleton, holding over the latter's head the knowledge that Pendleton is in line for the Junior partnership that Hollister is going to create. Realizing how dangerous Johnson is, Pendleton murders him, throwing his body in a little used section of the woods, so that the body shall be unrecognizable when finally found. However, the romance of Thornton and Ellen Hollister has been progressing steadily and Thornton declares his love for his employer's daughter while they are both picnicking near the spot of the murder. Thornton finds the body, recognizes it as Johnson's and reports the matter to the police. He brings Ellen home and promises he will ask her hand of her father. However, before he can speak, he is called in and Hollister informs him he has reason to suspect that Thornton has been betraying the secret formulae which he, as secretary, has access to. Thornton tries to prove his innocence but he is fired.

Ellen continues to have faith in Thornton, and, pretending to be a student of chemicals, interviews Longhorn as the foremost American chemist. Flattered, Longhorn reveals more to her than he knows. However, while Ellen is there, Pendleton is announced. Suspicious now, she watches Pendleton and discovers him jotting information on his cuff. Immediately she accuses him but blandly Pendleton holds forth his snow white cuffs. Ellen apologizes and asks if she may drive him to his club. She jerks the car to a stop in front of a policeman. Pendleton shoots forward, exposing his false cuff. He is arrested and the murder of Johnson is finally proved against him as well as the robbery of the necklace. Thornton receives Hollister's apology and the appointment as Junior partner, and, most precious of all to him, Ellen Hollister.

YELLOW DANGER

Paul Matyshock Melodrama File No. 10166

UNABLE to find work, Ed Brown wanders discouragedly toward the waterfront. Suddenly he hears a cry for help and as he rushes toward the spot, a bullet sinks into his shoulder and he falls to the ground. When the police arrive they find a gun in the wounded Ed's hand and Frank Scott notorious racketeer dead beside him. On a chain of circumstantial evidence, Ed is convicted of first degree murder and sent to the death house. The shock precipitates the death of Ed's mother and railing against the injustice meted out to him, Ed joins forces with another prisoner, Carl Waite to break jail. With bated breath, the two men escape, but before they can reach the gates the prison alarm goes off. Police bullets get Carl, but Ed runs madly in spite of his wounded hand, and for days remains under cover in intense pain. To the warehouse in which he is hiding, two rum runners come to load their trucks and finding Ed who has fainted from his infected hand, they are uncertain how much of their plans he has overheard and bring him to their chief's apartment. Ed, regaining consciousness, is recognized by the Chief who has known Carl and is willing to help his friend. With no possible chance of going straight, wanted as an escaped murderer, Ed, now known as Tony Garoni, joins up with the gang and narrowly escaping trouble over the Chief's moll who becomes infatuated with him, Ed is sent to sea under Captain Black in a rum runner which is subsequently attacked by the Coast Guard. Escaping the government boat, the bullet riddled "Swallow" founders in a storm and as her boiler explodes only Tony, Captain Black, and the stuttering cook Franz escape. For days they drift at sea until they are picked up by the good natured Captain Kohl. However, Black, confidentially treated by the other captain, chances to see how much money there is in the captain's safe, and engaging the aid of Fred, a shifty-eyed member of the crew, convinces him that there is a fortune for them if they get the crew to mutiny, divide the spoils, sell the cargo in Shanghai, and return with a boat full of dope. Powerless against the drunken, stirred up crew, Tony and Franz helplessly watch the mutiny, and later hear Black commend Fred for murdering Kohl when the captain tried to fight for his ship. Tony boils when Fred thickly boasts that he's a great guy at murder, left another fellow burn for his murder of Frank Scott. In Shanghai, Tony and Franz trail Captain Black to a Chinese dope joint, but Tony is aghast at sight of white girls, among them, the beautiful Mary Stephens. Unable to get her sad eyes out of his mind, Tony returns the next day, but although one of the other girls becomes angered by his insistent demand for Mary, Tony persists and at last learns that Mary is a kidnapped heiress, who has since last night been removed by the Chinaman with whom Black is negotiating. Storming, Tony returns to his boat and while the cargo is being unloaded to the Chinese boat, slips aboard the junk, rescues Mary, who returns his love, and manages to smuggle her back to Black's boat where he conceals her in a canvas covered boat. However, her presence is discovered and when he attempts to defend her, Tony and Franz, knocked out by a heavy blow, are bound and set adrift in the open boat while Mary is confined to Black's cabin. Days of torture follow on the water, but at last the pair are picked up. Tony sounds the alarm and all ships are radioed to watch for the pirate ship on which the kidnapped Mary Stephens is held. Fred quarrels with Black for letting the girl get them in trouble and in the dissension lies Mary's temporary security, but the radioed message is picked up also by Black's ship, and ingeniously he lands at San Pedro and has small boats come up to unload the smuggled Chinamen and the dope. Tony frantic with fear for Mary lands in San Francisco only to be arrested as Ed Brown and despite all his pleas that the real murderer is aboard the pirate ship, held. Franz, arrested as a possible accomplice is released, and still stuttering, covers the water front and at last sees Fred coming out of a Chinese shop with Wang Tung, to whom Black is transferring Mary Stephens. Summoning the police, Franz captures Fred who, under third degree at length confesses to the murder of Frank Scott and Tony, free to resume his name of Ed Brown again, is released. He proceeds immediately to the wharf where Wang Tung, enamored of the lovely Mary, decides to make her his own. In a terrific battle with the chinaman, Ed frees Mary, and the police arrive. Sobbing, Mary accompanies the unconscious Ed in the ambulance, but at the hospital, the doctor after binding up Ed's wound where the Chinaman's dagger has lodged, assures her Ed will recover. Black is killed by a police bullet, and Franz happily accepts Mr. Stephen's invitation to attend the wedding of Ed and Mary.

AMATEUR DETECTIVE

William Charles Anderson Mystery File No. 11251

INHERITOR of a sizable fortune, Danny Selby found the opportunity at last to indulge his passion for amateur sleuthing. However, his first opportunity to prove himself was to come in an unusual way. While seeing his fiancee, Irene Barry off on a cruise to Havana, Danny was to notice among the names on the passenger list that of Philip Miller, noted financier. Returning to his own home, after the boat had sailed, Danny was to buy an evening paper and discover that Philip Miller had committed suicide. Proceeding to headquarters, Danny was to have an interview with the Chief, a friend of his, and on the theory that a man about to commit suicide would not book passage for a pleasure cruise, asked permission to investigate on his own. His theory was further borne out when he learned that Miller had suffered no financial or romantic reverses lately and that nothing had happened to induce suicide. Outside the window of the murdered man's apartment, Danny discovered a print of a rubber heel, worn down on one side, and in the room, the stub of a cigarette slightly doped. Investigating the place where the cigarette was sold, Danny found it a hideout for sneak thieves. Back in Miller's home, Danny discovered that Miller did not die immediately but had lifted the receiver to call his doctor. The doctor had heard a curious squeak but had attributed the sound to a defect in the wire. Also, closer investigation revealed that a large sum of money which Miller had withdrawn for his trip was gone, the police having failed to noticed this before.

Irene returned home, but whereas Danny had pleaded with her to marry him the moment her boat returned, now he was so absorbed in the case that he had no time to see her. Hurt, she told him she couldn't take second place, but Danny, on the verge of discovering the murderer could not give up the chase. Hanging out in the shop where the doped cigarettes were sold, Danny finally saw one little hophead, Spuds, flash a fifty dollar bill and buy a large supply. The dealer smiled at him crookedly and commented, "In the dough, aren't you?" "Sure," the pasty faced fellow replied," and I didn't have to do a thing to get it, either." Following the trail of the nervous hophead, Danny was led to a hideaway under the bridge where several gangsters waited, cleaning and oiling machine guns. "Got the stuff?" one, obviously the leader asked nervously, and Danny started at the squeaky voice, recalling the doctor's clue about a squeak over the telephone. Racing out toward the road, Danny phoned for police cars. There was a furious battle. The gangsters were captured just as they were planning to escape. Joe Harris, the man with the squeaky voice had the run down rubber heel. His men were to swear an alibi in return for a share of the spoils. Harris was the murderer of Philip Miller and Spuds, crying for dope, squealed the whole story. Danny was having his wounded arm bandaged when Irene burst in. "You're hurt," she gasped, and Danny's other arm held her to him while his lips sought hers.

Mildred Amos Drama File No. 11162

AT a country dance, beautiful little Julie Sheldon is the acknowledged belle of the evening. The men all flock about her, and finally Donald Gray, who has been waiting his turn all evening gets a dance with her and suggests they sit out the dance in the garden. Under the fragrant blossems he asks her to marry him, but Julie turns toward him fondly and tells him she is not ready for marriage yet. Donald, realizing that he is in no position to be married himself, since he is an impractical dreamer to whom the routine work of an office or factory is onerous, leaves town.

Time passes. The memory of Donald becomes fainter and at last Julie marries Carl Spencer, who has a position in a nearby town. For a year they are happy together. A baby girl is born. Carl works harder than ever to provide for his wife and child but he loses his position. Discouraged he tramps about in snow and sleet for another, and in his weakened condition falls an easy prey to pneumonia. After his death, Julie is left destitute. In the small garden of the house Carl bought for them, Julie raises vegetables to support herself and her baby. Years of want follow and at last Julie accepts the proposal of Leon Wright, a well-to-do merchant, who, however, is violently jealous of the attentions Julie gives her daughter Sidney. Then a son, Edward is born, but Leon, more jealous than ever, claims it is not his own, and accuses her of being in love with Carter Dane, a millionaire sportsman, who obviously is attracted to Julie. In vain the distracted wife pleads her innocence but when her husband persists in getting a divorce, she is too weary with bickering and illness to make any protests. Carter, who wants her, makes the evidence seem more convincing than it really is and when the divorce is final, he urges Julie to come to live with him, promising diamonds and furs. For the sake of her children, however, Julie refuses and struggles along in a tiny room, while Carter comes to call bringing corsages of orchids. Once she cries at sight of the flowers when her babies want food, but Carter grimly assures her that he will give her money, only on his own terms,—and that means she is not to take the babies with her. Little Edward dies, and Julie, fearing that Sidney too is getting painfully undernourished, decides to accept Carter's proposition. However, that day she meets again Donald Gray, who has returned to town, a successful author. Although she feels she can never aspire to Donald's love again, she knows that she can not go to Carter. With new courage she returns to Sidney and begins looking for work. Carter comes for his answer but she refuses. He accuses her of loving another man. She makes no answer. Just then Donald comes up the steps. Carter glares at him and when weeks pass and Carter realizes Julie cannot be swayed, a fierce hatred of Donald seizes him. Accordingly when one day he sees Donald riding in the car in front, a sudden fierce impulse overtakes him to crowd the author's car off the road. However, his own car catapults twenty feet to the bottom of the enbankment. Carter is killed instantly, and Donald is blinded. During the trying months that follow, Julie is Donald's eyes, and one day they are quietly married to find happiness together with little Sidney.

TERRIFIED, Mrs. Hemingway reads that the theatre which she and her husband attended last night was bombed five minutes after its occupants had left, apparently by a rival in the business. As she hysterically gives an account of this to Mr. Hemingway, he assures her that he sees no particular cause for alarm since no one was injured, and only minor damages done to the building, but she will not be consoled, and at last her husband leaves the breakfast table, carrying his coffee into the kitchen where he discovers the servants, Molly and Joe, have been imbued with a like fear. Giving up, he reaches for his hat, and hastens to the nearest restaurant. As he orders his breakfast, the waiter inquires whether or not he has read the account of the theatre bombing. Hastily tearing the menu card to bits, he stalks out of the restaurant to his office, where first the office boy, then his secretary, and lastly his partner greet him with the same question, all receiving the brief answer: "Yes!" delivered with increasing vehemence. Returning home that afternoon at an early hours, Mr. Hemingway discovers his wife entertaining the bridge club; for once cards are forgotten as these public spirited women discuss ways and means of ending the bombing menace. Catching sight of Mr. Hemingway, they call to him, urging him to give his suggestions, but he hastily retreats to the back yard, only to discover that the neighbor's children are enacting the crime.

At the dinner table, Mr. Hemingway tries in vain to change the subject. Afterwards, he suggests a trip to the theatre as a diversion, which is instantly refused, and leads to a fresh surveyal of last night's excitement. Utterly exhausted, he sinks into a weary sleep when his wife retires, but this peace is short-lived, as she awakens him, breathlessly relating that she saw a short man, with a cap pulled over his eyes, alight from a taxi and deposit a package on the doorstep of Mr. J. Barenwald, the theatre magnate's, home, directly across the street. Convinced that this is another bomb, Mrs. Hemingway telephones his wife, who faints when she hears the news. Her maid, rushing forward with smelling salts, telephones the doctor and the lady's husband, who is in town, attending to repair work on his damaged theatre. Hastily packing her jewels and other valuables, Mrs. Hemingway prepares to leave for her sister, Effie's home, urging her husband to follow suit. Although he laughs at the idea, and advises that they will scarcely be welcome at Effie's home at this hour of the morning, he takes her advice. As they go down the street, Mrs. Hemingway sends her husband back for a fur scarf which she has forgotten.

Now thoroughly alarmed, he sends for the police and the fire department. When they gather, with a huge crowd soon in attendance, he watches proceedings with interest. A newspaper reporter, interviewing Mr. Hemingway, is given a graphic account of the event, as he claims that he discovered the villain planting the bomb, and at once understood his diabolical motive. Just as he has posed for his picture, Mr. Hemingway sees one of the fireman, elected to the task, opening the fatal package, to discover four abandoned kittens inside. When his wife joins him, the chagrined husband advises her that they had better both take a vacation, as they have made neighborhood fools of themselves, but he neglects to add that he took credit for the bomb discovery, and shudders when Mrs. Hemingway purchases a newspaper.

THE MURDER OF MONTANA PETE

Donald Ross Drama File No. 11410

OUTSIDE the pounding rain beats a discouraging, steady drip that churns the dirt walks into mud. Sitting in an old fashioned saloon in Butte, Montana, three men disconsolately view the uninviting outside world and sink back listlessly. Into the dreary quiet comes the slam of a back door, and the gambler, Montana Pete enters with a boisterous shout of welcome to the men. After a few minutes he proposes a card game in one of the smaller rooms. Pete is dealer. Adams opens for $2.00 and Young drops out; Riley calls him but after a moment Pete doubles him. A faint marking on one of the cards catches the observant Adams' attention. Pointing this out to his companions, Adams openly accuses Pete of passing off a "fixed" pack of cards. When Pete calls him a liar, Adams strikes him .All four are now on their feet, tensely awaiting the next move when the lights flicker and gradually dim out. Out in the main part of the shop, the bartender hears a shot. The light is flashed on again and Pete's companions scatter in their panic. The body of Montana Pete is lying on the floor. The sheriff, Dan Quinty, calls at the boarding house where Young and Riley stay, and arrests them for implication in the gambler's murder. Meanwhile, Adams rushes home and tells his wife, Maline, what has happened. He swears that he did not fire the shot. In her fright, Maline loses her temper and declares it serves Adams right for not staying home. Adams grows angry in turn and accuses her of being really concerned over Pete who has visited Maline several times while Adams was at work. At this, Maline becomes furious and orders him out. An hour later, Adams slams the door after him and boards the first outgoing train. Quinty arrives at Adams' shortly after and refuses at first to believe that Adams is gone. On searching the place, he finds a gun of the same calibre as the bullet which killed Pete. Maline swears that Adams left only because of a quarrel, the nature of which she refuses to reveal for fear of further incriminating her husband. Notice is sent to police throughout the country. Criminal proceedings against Young and Riley have been halted since evidence points to Adams. The authories are aware that Pete was making advances to Maline which would give Adams an additional motive. Several months later, Adams is found on a fruit ranch in California and brought back for trail. He and his wife are reconciled and await the outcome together. Experts contradict each other on whether or not the bullet found in Pete came from Adams' gun, but testimony shows also that Adams' gun was recently used. The jury, after the District Attorney heavily stresses the motive of jealousy, finds Adams guilty in the first degree, and the sentence of death is automatically imposed. Transferred to the state prison, his wife follows and attempts unsuccessfully to stay the penalty. The fatal morning arrives. The condemned man is already being taken to the execution chamber when the warden receives a telephone call from an unidentified man who tells him to stay the execution. Adams is innocent and the guilty man would be at the prison gates shortly. The next five minutes are tense until the awaiting guard enters with Young who confesses the crime. Mrs. Adams is sent for and notified. Husband and wife embrace as lovers who have been miraculously restored to each other.

THE GREATER SIN

Anthony Nieder Drama File No. 10801

WHEN she returns home late from a dance one night, June Rockwood is disowned by her narrow-minded father. Her mother tries to urge him to reconsider, but June goes, realizing it is useless trying to explain. Too ashamed to appeal to friends or relatives for help, June becomes thoroughly discouraged by her inability to find employment but at last is accepted as a companion to Mrs. Sands, a kindly old lady with ambitions for her son Robert. When Robert returns home from the hospital where he is interning, he is immediately captivated by June, but Mrs. Sands, anxious to see her boy marry a wealthy girl, informs June complacently that Robert's engagement to a debutante is soon to be announced. Realizing she is too much in love to be able to endure living so close to Robert, June leaves. As she nears the station, she is run over by a car and awakens in a hospital. To her surprise she sees beautiful roses in her private room and learns that Peter Stark, the middle aged bachelor who has run her over, sent them. Stark comes to visit her often during her convalescence and promises her a job when she is well enough to get out. Accordingly June is the more bewildered when he forces his love on her, and with loathing in her heart for him, she leaves. Stark begs her to stay on as his wife, but she runs out. After some time she gets a position as receptionist in the office of a Doctor Black. One day her employer comes in with a colleague and June pales as Robert Sands rushes forward, seizing her hands in his own. Black is forgotten as Robett tells her how he has searched for her. The other woman was just a patient of his and he has loved June all the time. So they are married and June is so happy she thinks that nothing can ever matter. Then one day while she is shopping, she sees Peter Stark. He grasps her arm, and as she explains hurriedly that she wants nothing to do with him, she is very happily married, a strange expression comes to Peter's face. He warns her that unless she comes to him, he will inform her husband of her little adventure. "You wouldn't dare," June gasps, but Stark assures her he would dare anything to get her. June slaps him and hurries on. That night, however, as she waits for Robert, Stark comes and when June frantically tries to get him to go, he laughs at her. "Your husband and I," Stark asserts, "have much in common." Goaded June shoots him. Robert enters. Thinking his wife has shot her lover, he nevertheless wipes June's fingerprints from the gun, and claims that he shot Stark. He is taken to prison and denied bail pending Stark's death. However, Stark recovers sufficiently to confess that June had shot him to save her home, and that both June and Robert are guiltless. Robert is freed, and returning to June, he takes her close in his arms. Together they return to June's mother, recently widowed, and this time there is nothing but happiness ahead.

SUNDAY morning finds the Hall family preparing to go to Church. In comfortable circumstances, there is little they lack to make them perfectly happy. Two years later war breaks out. Nations, greedy for wealth distrust each other. The stock exchange is the scene of wild disorder. And from the melee John Hall emerges a multi-millionaire. Immediately he moves with his wife to a large home, hires many servants and sends the two children off to fashionable schools. Religion and its comforts are forgotten. The Priest, coming to call, is sent away with excuses.

Meanwhile Lora, the daughter falls in love with Paul, son of the local grocer. Whenever possible she slips out to meet him for delightful hours together. However, when her parents learn that she is contemplating marrying the son of a green grocer, they are horrified. Mr. Hall, recalling his own poverty when he was married is more inclined to be reasonable, but his wife, Doris, who is obsessed with the new life, throws up her hands in horror and forbids Lora to see Paul again. Lora offers to elope, but Paul, softly informs her that it wouldn't be fair to make her join him in his poverty. Then Robert, the son returns from college, tall and handsome. His parents take him with them to their parties and night clubs, and Robert seeing his mother dancing abandonedly with a young gigolo, and his father casting an admiring eye on the legs of the chorus girls, is appalled. His parents encourage him to look with favor on Daisy Malcolm, daughter of a millionaire but the next day when Daisy calls to chide Robert for not being responsive to her attentions, he hangs up slowly, and coming into the room where his mother is having breakfast in bed, Robert explains that he is going to study for the priesthood. His parents try every argument to stop him, but Robert is adamant and departs for a seminary.

Some months later, in his club John Hall gets a frenzied note from his broker and in the next few hours he sees the remains of his fortune vanish as his stocks are wiped out. Dazedly he returns home where his wife is giddily entertaining guests with a bridge party. When the last chattering woman has left, Doris remarks that the bank phoned her she has overdrawn her account five thousand dollars and unless she replaces it immediately she will be prosecuted. "You'll fix it, won't you, darling?" she says, but when John tells her they are broke, and what's more owe a fortune, Doris is aghast. Nerves at the breaking point, she rushes into the bathroom, and hearing a thud, John breaks in the door and finds his wife has taken poison. The children return and during the days that follow their house is sold to meet obligations. Alone, deserted they learn how true the sayings are about fair weather friends. But there is one who stand by them—Paul, who now, that Lora is poor, dares to come back and tell of his love. And with the marriage of Lora and Paul, a new day begins for the Halls.

THE WHITE ROSE

Jackie Sutton Drama File No. 11079

THE two handsomest boys in town, Larry Lane and Ted Roe, inseparable friends since childhood walked together in Larry's garden. Together they laughed at the exhibition of local husband-catching at the gala affair the night before. However, suddenly Ted's eyes fixed on a single white rose and his face blanched. Larry seeing his friend's perturbation tried to lead him away, but as Ted continued to stare unhappily, Larry said, "Gay Lander always loved white roses." Ted started violently, and as he turned an inquiring face to his friend Larry explained that his gardner Jim reported that a man always brought white roses to Gay. Then as Ted asked hoarsely, "Are they talking about her, then?" Larry turned squarely toward his friend and explained that gossip had crushed Gay Lander. There were those who reported that Gay was seen with a baby, and that there had been a reason why the lovely vivacious girl from Armour Hill had stopped coming into town. As Larry's voice rose in indignation, Ted placed his hands over his eyes and pleading a headache drove off in his roadster. Larry stood for several minutes staring at the white rose.

It was almost morning when Larry was aroused by Ted's housekeeper who pleaded with Larry to come right over. Hastily dashing into some clothes, Larry sped to Ted's house and learned that Ted was having another of the heart attacks which he had been concealing from all his friends. Stricken at sight of Ted's pain-wracked face, Larry entered the room. Ted feebly gestured the doctor and nurse out and as Larry bent to him, Ted told how he had married Gay Lander two years ago, just before the death of his mother. However, knowing his mother disapproved of his getting married, Ted had begged Gay to keep their marriage a secret for a while. However, when his mother died and the will was probated, Ted learn he would be disinherited if he were married before he was twenty-three. In his great fear of poverty, Ted, who had never worked a day in his life had asked Gay to continue withholding the knowledge of their marriage for the remaining year and a half. He knew that Gay's love for him was being slowly crushed by his weakness, but he had been unable to face the thought of poverty, even when the coming of Gay's baby had made things harder than ever for her. The white roses he had sent as peace-offerings, but Gay had remained distant to him. Finishing his story with a cry of anguish as he gritted out, he knew that Larry had always loved Gay, and he hoped now that Larry would give her the happiness she deserved, Ted breathed his last.

Filled with grief for his weak but lovable friend, Larry proceeded to Gay's house on Armour Hill, and seeing her husband's friend, Gay's eyes widened. Softly Larry told her Ted was dead. She seemed dazed. Then as he repeated it, asking if she wouldn't find relief in tears, she told him she had loved Ted a long time ago. Then, when he had exposed her to gossip and had selfishly urged her to keep their marriage secret her love for him had died. Besides ——Larry looked at her incredulously, and as he eyes told him she loved him, Larry gathered her to him, and for the first time then, they wept. But to-day a new day was dawning for Gay and Larry.

THE WEAKER WAY

Isabel Wallot Drama File No. 11322

CONSCIOUS of a man's staring eyes across the table, Virginia turns from her polite small talk with Arlington Newgate, an ardent suitor, and glances across. For a long, tense moment these two experience the curious sensation of isolation and remoteness from the others, and a premonition that this meeting holds tremendous significance for the future. The dinner is in observance of the eighth anniversary of the Gentrey Airport Association of which Virginia's father, Augustus Claypolle, is president. Through careful questioning, Virginia learns the young man who has so deeply affected her is the fascinating young aviator, Jerry Kiley. When dancing begins, she refuses Newgate for a partner only to whirl off in Jerry's arms an instant later. By mutual unspoken consent the two dance in perfect silent harmony before Virginia accompanies him to the cool darkness of a porch hammock. "This is perfectly crazy," Jerry declares, "I've never spoken to you——at least in my waking moments before, and yet I'm terribly in love with you." So that was it——that strange, sweet attraction that was drawing her to him as if she had known him forever. But Virginia with instinctive feminine coquetishness says nothing, preferring to keep her lover in suspense. Early the next morning, Jerry's car outside is honking the sleepy Virginia awake to keep her golf appointment with him. The couple are practically inseparable during the enchanting summer days. All but Mr. Claypolle and Arlington gaze with bright approval on the well matched pair. Claypolle wants to unite the blue-blood of the Newgates with his daughter while Arlington is very much in need of money. The only thing to do since Virginia is determined to marry Jerry is to dispose of him, Arlington suggests. Claypoole ignores the significance of this phrase and promises a goodly sum if he succeeds. Learning Jerry is leaving on a business trip, Arlington tampers with the plane. Jerry's last conscious memory in the plane is that of endless whirling into space. He regains consciousness in the house of a physician, sole witness of the crash for the machine lands in a deserted spot. Newgate waits expectantly for news of the crash and cannot understand why nothing is reported. Yet there is no indication that Jerry has landed safely. Virginia's disappointed look each time the phone rings makes this apparent. Newgate confesses to Claypoole what he has done, and the worried man gives him a large check to go out of the city for a time. Jerry's injuries are too serious to permit his removal. During a delirious spell what he says of the Claypooles catches Dr. Ashley's attention. When Jerry is better, Dr. Ashley reveals that he was formerly a prosperous physician in the west. Coming home to his wife and baby daughter one day, he learns they have gone. With them leaves his best friend, whose name is akin to Virginia's parent. From an old photograph Jerry identifies them. Jerry wires Virginia of his mishap and she visits him. Unaware that Dr. Ashley is her real father, she is very much drawn to him. As soon as Jerry can walk, the two come to the girl's home for dinner. The amazed Claypoole recognizes him and abruptly excuses himself. Leaving a confession which restores to Virginia her mother's fortune which he has always pretended is his own, Claypoole disappears. When the excitement subsides, Ashley gives beaming approval of his newly found daughter's marriage to Jerry.

RICKETY HOUSE

Magda Brandon Animated Cartoon File No. 10976

As he walks with his nurse in the woods, little Bobby sees a funny little rickety house. He begs her to stop so that they can walk inside, but she hurries him home for supper. That night after Bobby has been tucked into bed, there is the sound of a buzzing outside, and Bobby's eyes widen with wonder, as he beholds the queerest little areoplane he ever did see waiting outside for him. He climbs aboard and with a zoom and a zip he is off to the sky. The plane flies over the roof tops and finally descends swiftly to the ground. In the distance, Bobby can see the Rickety House, and with a happy little cry he runs toward it. However, in the branches of a tree a haughty little bird is scolding, "Cheap! Cheap!" and the willow weeps until her tears form a deep pool. Poor Bobby! He cannot get to the Rickety House. Suddenly he starts at the sound of a deep bass voice and the Sponge boasts that he can drink the whole lake in one gulp. Bobby looks doubtful. but the sponge is very sure of himself. He drinks and he drinks, but woe and alas, he becomes so heavy, that with a look of complete surprise he suddenly sinks into the lake and is never seen again. As Bobby waits, longing to get across, Jack Frost comes and with a merry little whistle freezes over the lake so that Bobby can walk across. As Bobby turns to thank him, he loses his balance on the slippery ice and slides faster and faster until he whizzes right past the Rickety little gate into the Rickety House. There is a series of sharp little noises, and to Bobby's glee, out pops the corn to greet him. The old woman of the Rickety House and all her little children come tumbling down the Rickety stairs to meet Bobby, and with one accord they all put on flat little fish called Skates, and gambol for hours on the ice teaching Bobby too, how to use the Skates. At last they come back to the house. The fire crackles for them, so happy that he beams and soon they all feel as warm as toast. That night there is a gay party at Rickety House in honor of the new guest, Bobby. The Bells all jingle happily. The Piano plays. Two old Shoes show there is still life in them by executing a lively tap dance. The Kettle sings. The Clock beats time energetically. Even the Potato flirts outrageously, winking his eyes until the bashful Beet blushes so furiously that she is still red to this day. But as the Beet dances by coyly with the unctious Potato, the Comb gnashes his teeth in jealousy and finally, with an air of bravado asks the Brush to dance. The Brush treads very heavily, and the comb sighs. The Wind, a huge blustery old fellow, seizes a whole crowd of Leaves and dances out on the floor with them while the Vine laughs so she has to cling to the Wall for support. One little Nail becomes so excited he threatens to leave his place in the Wall and do a dance of his own, but with one rap, the Hammer puts him in his place. The hours fly. The Clock begins to get a little tired. All the dancers begin to get sleepy. The Worm is so tired he can hardly turn. The moon begins to lose her brightness. The beats of the Clock grow fainter. Suddenly there is a shrill sound as the Alarm goes off. In a moment all the guests vanish. Even the Rickety House disappears, and rubbing his eyes sleepily, Bobby finds himself back in his own little bedroom, with only the Clock beating time on the wall.

MONK

William Giuliano Drama File No. 11565

THE black sedan pulled over to the curb. A rattle of bullets sped from the enclosed machine gun. Two men on the sidewalk ducked into the protecting darkness of a hallway as terror stricken children screamed. Detectives Crain and Dempsey called on Monk, East side gangster and mob leader. "Listen, if you want to kill Chink's men we have that many less crooks to worry about, hut when it comes to murdering children—," they said. Monk whose face was scarred in a childhood accident glared menancingly. "I won't tell you who the men are but I'll deliver them to you tonight," he promised with a finality which frightened the headquarters men into silence. That night three bodies were dumped almost on the steps of the police station. Placed on trail for murder, Monk swaggered into the courtroom accompanied by his sister, Marie, and Daisy (Blondy) Lee, his mistress. Charges are dismissed when the state's star witnesses are killed while enroute to testify. A party for Monk's considerable mob is thrown at the Cherry Blossom. Festivities are at their height when Romeo and Joe Lee, Monk's bodyguards bring word that another dope shipment has been hijacked—Chink's mob again. For months these rival groups have been feuding to expand their territory of power. Not a day passes in which new killings are not reported. Monk suspects that Lawson has been double crossing him and arranges for Marie to seduce him one night into boastful confession. When Lawson's body is picked up in the river, Chink has Marie brought to his quarters by pretending that Monk is hurt. There she is branded and thrown out on the street where a passing motorist rushed her to the hospital. Monk, swearing vengence over her dead body, sent Joe to Chicago to kill Chink's sister. The deaths mount with the intense, resultant hatred of the mob leaders, until Washington is forced to take a hand. A squad of picked secret-service men are sent to New York to use any methods which will eliminate the gangsters, for police find it impossible to break down their courtroom alibies. After both gangs suddenly found their rackets continually balked by the police, Monk determined to investigate himself. A much mutilated body identified as Monk was found in his famous death dealing machine, now badly bullet riddled. Joe took over the mob, continuing the warfare. Two months later, a young Cleveland gangster joined Chink's group, his fearlessness soon winning him high favor in the inner circle. Blondy is startled one evening when her apartment is entered by a secret passage known only to Monk and the Cleveland stranger stands before her. Before she can call help, he revealed that he was the old Monk with a remodelled face. Through his tips, his old gang regains its slipping supremacy while unaware of Monk's return. Meanwhile, a group of petty gangsters, headed by "Butch" Stevens try to combine forces with Chink who steadily ignores them. One night, the worried voice of Blondy on the phone informs Monk that Joe is missing. Acting on one of those inspired hunches which has guided him in the past, Monk climbed up the fire escape of Butch' apartment and saw Joe, trussed up, while being questioned. Monk backed the surprised men against the wall. . . Five minutes later the two were speeding to the safety of Blondy's apartment. On the way Joe stopped to reassure the boys and Joe's rescuer reidentified himself with the amazed mob. "Monk," they exclaimed, joyously, half unbelievingly. Triumphantly, they adjourned to the apartment to reassure Blondy. The door was bolted and there was no answer. Uneasily, Monk forced his way in only to be greeted by the dead body of his sweetheart. Without heeding the others, he rushed into a car and entered Chink's apartment. "What would you do if you knew Monk was alive?" he asked. Chink stirred uncomfortably. He reached for his gun, when Monk's set face made him aware that the dead had returned. . . Glaring down at the dead man, Monk heard the tramp of many feet cutting off escape. He was confronted by Butch's men and—here he blinked—Detective Crain and Dempsey—who introduced him to "Uncle Sam's operators." Before they could stop him, Monk turned the smoking gun on himself. "Blondy," he murmured. And then was very still.

THE VIOLIN MURDER CASE

Edmund F. Burke Mystery File No. 10746

ARRIVING in Armsburg for the famed musical fete, Professor McKeen, elderly musician who has recently inherited a fortune, shares a room with Sherwood Sharp, a special agent for the Royal Mounted. When Sharp is called on a murder case, he allows the Professor to accompany him, and in the morgue, Sharp deduces that the murdered man was a violinist newly arrived from Germany. A Jew comes running in breathlessly reporting that Ikie Goldstein, pawn broker, has been robbed and stabbed to death. After the Mounted policeman under Corporal Crayden, who disapproves of Sharp generally and objects to him particularly as a future son-in-law, have searched vainly for clues, Sharp picks up several in the disordered back room of Ikie's shop. Why are all the fiddles broken? From the old landlady, moreover Sharp learns that last night a drunken tramp pawned a violin after haggling about the price. A skinny man eagerly bought the fiddle. Then, after the place was closed, a woman rapped sharply trying to gain admittance. Sharp hurries out and in the taxi calls "42 Rock Street." The Professor starts violently when the cab driver asks if they know that Bill Sparks, who lives there, died this morning while playing the fiddle, but Sharp murmurs, "Too late!" From Spark's distressed widow Sharp buys the violin, in the name and with the money of the Professor, who is now thoroughly bewildered. Sharp sends the violin to their room giving strict orders that nobody is to touch it. Meanwhile, Crayden is elated over his quick solution of the murders, having arrested the hobo Max, who admits the murder of Ikie Goldstein. "What of the other?" Sharp asks, and Crayden glares.

Then the Professor discovers the violin is an Amati, and carried away, begins playing only to collapse. Only the prompt aid of Sharp and Dr. Mueller saves the Professor's life, but the painful jaw of the old man drops when Sharp blandly informs him the murderess will call to-day. Sure enough, a German woman makes a telephone appointment, and when she arrives is arrested by Sharp and the frankly dubious Crayden. Then, Sharp reconstructs the crimes. The first clue came when Doctor Mueller showed Sharp a German paper telling of the recent concert in a Berlin hospital of Carl Snyder, the first victim. Also in the paper was a report that after the concert a nurse was arrested and subsequently released for the theft of a radium cancer cure worth a fortune. According to Sharp's hypothesis, the nurse had hidden the radium in the violin of her fiance and followed him to Canada. However, while Carl was coming in answer to her call, he dropped dead from the action of the radium secreted in his violin, and the tramp Max, finding the body had robbed it and pawned the violin. The nurse followed the tramp and bribed him to get the violin back. Thinking one of the violin sound posts contained jewels, Max took them all, killing Ikie who had caught him. The nurse had broken into the pawn shop, and observed from Ikie's register book that the fatal violin had been sold to Bill Spark. Spark died and the trail had led the Professor and so into the trap set for her. The Professor gets a generous share of the reward for the return of the radium, and Sherwood Sharp once more applies himself to the courtship of Crayden's lovely daughter.

IRISH HEARTS

Marjorie Dare Comedy Drama File No. 10854

IN 1843, John Maloney bids a sad farewell to his home in Cork, Ireland, as he boards an American bound steamer with his two sons, little John and Pat. The father, whose wife has recently died, secures employment in a mining town in Virginia, and here settle down, making a home for his two boys. Grown to manhood a few years later, Pat is a handsome lad and a great favorite with the women. He converses with Elizabeth Cain, a southern belle, while her aunt, who is chaperoning her on a trip, supervises the packing. The two fall instantly in love; horrified, Elizabeth's aunt informs the girl's parents, who hasten her away to her home in Kentucky, but the dauntless Pat follows her there. After clandestine, and immeasurably happy hours together, the two elope, since Elizabeth's family will never consent to her marriage with an Irish mine worker. The young couple return to the small mining community, where the aristocratic and lovely bride is acclaimed a queen by the mine workers, who adore her. Her happiness is marred when she discovers that her husband drinks frequently, staggering home in an unfortunate condition, but her love is so great that she forgives him each time, and each time he promises it will be the last but the habit is too strong for him. Two little girls, Julia and Elizabeth, are born to them. Pat proves an adoring father, singing to his babies and telling them fairy stories as only an Irishman can.

One day, Terry, the little dog, summons Elizabeth with his bark. She discovers Pat, fallen by the wayside, intoxicated, and brings him home. Once again, he swears off, but soon after this is killed in a Tavern brawl. Heartbroken, Elizabeth is forced to return to her home for her children's sake. Pat's name is forbidden in the household; what little they learn of their father comes from a few caustic references dropped by Grandmother Caine. Years pass, and Julie grows up the image of her handsome father, with his winning charm and impulsive recklessness, while Elizabeth resembles her maternal grandmother, and secretly regrets her Irish ancestry. In vain, she pleads with Julia to acquire more dignity, horrified when her adored sister brings a stray puppy into the home during a formal tea, but Julia scorns conventional ways, preferring the woods and fields to social events. When her Uncle John lies at the point of death, Julia goes to him, while Elizabeth refuses, and hears him tell of her father. He recovers, and she returns home, questioning her mother, who explains that she feared to discuss Pat until Julia was old enough to fully understand. Then she pictures his kind heart and appealing personality to his daughter who so resembles him. Feeling that she will never be happy away from Ireland, Julia, at random, picks out a Pat Maloney in Cork, Ireland, writing to him. When he invites her to visit, the impulsive sixteen year old runs away. On shipboard she meets Terry O'Shane, who looks after her, and when Pat turns out to be middle aged and suspicious in character, Terry takes the girl back to Uncle John in America. When she shows him Pat's picture, Uncle John recognizes it as her father's murderer, and informs the Irish officials, who arrest him. His confession clears Pat Maloney of all blame, and when Julia, with her mother's consent, promises to become Mrs. Terry O'Shane, Irish hearts are happy.

PIONEERS

Lena Gray Gordon Drama File No. 11466

THEY were pioneers, in their veins ran the blood of their ancestros who had braved the perils of unknown seas to claim freedom and liberty in a new country. The men and women from whom they had derived their sturdy strength were the ones who had actively rebelled against England's taxes through the famous Boston Tea Party whose levity did not conceal the seriousness of a defiance which culminated in Revolution.

In the early part of the nineteenth century, whole families, with many a mother suckling her newborn babe born on the road in their caravans, laden with household goods, were moving westward. True to their heritage, these pioneers needed to break their own land. For their plain tastes, though they could not foresee the thronged cities that were to come, the east was already overcrowded. Among the carts that ambled easily along one morning was the Richards family which had originally come from Massachusettes. Patience Richards was anxiously administering to the youngest of her brood, Hope, whose cough was distressing. "It won't be long, now," said her heavy bearded husband comfortingly, "There is a little camp right near us here in Placerville. That's California land." They stayed longer than one day. On the third evening, little Hope died and the mother begged to settle near her child. Frank could not refuse the mother who grieved despite the fact that several children were left. A year later found them well settled on rich farming soil. Here Prudence was born. Samuel and John in later years could remember vividly the strangers who stopped overnight and related the great changes that were taking place in the rest of the world—the railroads of the east were pushing westward; new machinery was being introduced that could take the place of twenty men they declared impressively; one of the first American ships had wended its way with cargo of furs and other New World products to exchange in the hostile and mysterious China and the Merchant Marines were growing in competition with England. Peace was rudely shattered when the Mexicans refused to permit Americans in California territory. General Freemont who was blazing the trail needed help in gaining territory and Frank joined them. During his absence the half grown boys did the heavy farm work with the help of neighbors. From their father, the boys learned of a plan to organize an expedition to plant the American flag on one of California's highest Peaks. The three brothers, despite their youth joined. Hour upon hour of perilous climbing. To Prudence who had driven down with her mother, the faint tattered emblem that waved to them miles above their heads brought a patriotic thrill. Patience was one of the early suffragists and she determined that women should have a voice in the affairs of the community they were helping to build. The night she was elected to the council was a dramatic moment for her family. Following the customs, the three older boys married young. Sixteen years had passed since they had settled there. A new schoolmaster came to town, Lee Brown, and as part of his pay boarded in turn at each of the families. In their first meeting, Prudence experienced love though she hardly knew that the strong attraction both felt was thus termed. Brown began to make himself unpopular with the people, however, since he insisted on raking over the slave question. Abraham Lincoln and Washington with the problems of the south were too remote for these people. They were interested only in being accepted as a state. When he told them what was impending they scoffed and it grieved Prudence to see her lover "make a fool of himself." Over this they quarrelled bitterly but Prudence was too proud to apologize even when she learn he was leaving. Then the news came that Civil War had broken out. Prudence rushed to his house. Yes, he was going to enlist . . . And like the pioneers before her Prudence pledged her love and bravely faced the sacrifice of all women who wait in wartime. . . .

FACE THE FUTURE

Margaret McGarrity Drama File No. 11513

FOR nearly a year, Dick Trolear had been engaged to "the only girl in the world;" nor in those months had he grown accustomed to possessing her. It still seemed a miraculous dream that she would ever become his wife. But his nebulous fears were realized when the couple attended a gay-week-end party at Josephine Badger's home. Deryl, his fiancee, had met Bill Fremond there and had openly ignored Dick to be with the other man. Seated in the garden, Dick saw a couple emerge from the car still in affectionate embrace. He did not hear the girl's protests that Bill and she must not meet for a while, but he knew instantly that the girl was Deryl. Sick at heart, Dick returned to the house. The couple separated but a detaining hand stopped Deryl. "Tom Carson!" she exclaimed. "Up to your old tricks again. When you used up all my money, you discarded me and now you've caught another fish and you can't even be faithful to him," Tom replied. Vehemently, Deryl protested that she loved Dick and ignored Tom's charges. When a group neared them, she took advantage and escaped into the house. Though she looked about for Dick, he was absent. Meanwhile Tom went to Josephine and confided what he knew of Deryl, wondering if he should warn Dick. Jo was guiltily conscious of her own hidden love for Dick and was afraid that her answer would be prejudiced. But while these two debated, the decision was taken out of their hands. Deryl met Dick slipping away with his valise. It was simple to convince him that jealousy had blinded reason. To prove her love she offered to elope with him immediately. A year later, Dick was forced to face the fact that something was wrong with his marriage. His wife had grown extremely restless and extravagant. She took frequent trips without him and ran up numerous bills. Financially, Dick had suffered reverses though Deryl turned a deaf ear to all his pleas for economy. One morning at the breakfast table, Deryl nonchalantly announced that a boy was bringing the new fur coat she had purchased. When Dick grew angry and insisted that in that case, she could not take the trip to London which Deryl planned, his wife declared that she could easily get the money from Bill. Suddenly, Dick realized that he had been deceived all these months. Half-frantic, he lunged towards her. Deryl was standing in front of the open French window. As he angrily pushed her, Deryl fell backward; her body soared into space. At the hospital, Dick learned that their unborn child might be hurt by the mother's fatal injuries. Dick was overwhelmed with grief for he had not meant to injure her. Before she died, Deryl begged forgiveness and confessed that Bill was her baby son's father. Dick no sooner left the bedside, than he was placed under arrest on the testimony of the delivery boy who, unknown, had witnessed the struggle. During the trial, Dick was too agonized to protest, and dully received a life sentence.

Unknown to him during his first five years of imprisonment, Tom and Josephine worked to obtain a pardon. One day, Dick was called into the warden's office where these two awaited him with a third person, Bill. Taken aback, Dick learned that through Bill's confession to the governor, a pardon had been granted. Twenty years later, Dick had regained happiness through his present wife, Jo, and his charming 18 year old daughter. Fate appeared to hold another blow when the parents learned that Sally was going out with Bill, Jr., the son of his first wife and her lover. He told Sally his tragic past, and awaited her condemnation. But Sally kissed him adoringly and revealed that she and Bill had known the story for a long time and that Bill's one desire was to be the son to Dick he should have been.

Herbert Norman Drama File No. 11552

PREENING herself before the mirror, Emmaline has visions of herself as a great star. She experiences in imaginations the thrill of being sought by many men and giving her heart to none; living in a world of luxurious wealth which will provide a fitting background for her beauty. Hearing the honk of a car downstairs, Emmaline hurries to keep her appointment with Randolph, a goodlooking and ambitious young lawyer. Since two weeks ago, he has been in constant attendance upon her. An attractive woman easily knows when a man is in love with her. Randolph, she is aware, is consumed with dreams of making her his wife. His sweet, eager greeting tonight troubles Emmaline. Her heart is responding to him but her ambitions are driving her to another path. When the party they attend is over, Emmaline secretly and without success tries to obtain another couple to accompany them home, fearing her own emotions if she is alone with Randolph. As she forsees, Randolph insists on stopping the car half-way home, and takes her in his arms. For a moment she struggles weakly before yielding to his passion. Both are half drunk with love when they part. The next morning, under sober sunlight Emmaline recalls her promise to marry Randolph. The morning mail brings two letters—one from her lover in which he depicts her as his dream woman. Although worldly ambitions mean more to her, Emmaline care enough for Randolph to hate hurting him as she knows marriage inevitably will. The second letter is from her twin sister, Elizabeth, of whose existence she suddenly realizes Randolph is utterly unaware, and who is coming home after a long residence abroad. When Elizabeth comes, Emmaline persuades her to change identities while she leaves town a few days. Her twin indignantly refuses to enter the deception until she sees Randolph's picture and is mysteriously drawn. Randolph is unaware of the change except that Emmaline seems to have grown sweeter. When the day planned for the wedding comes and Emmaline is still absent, her sister is frantic. A telegram arrives announcing that Elizabeth has secured the role of understudy in a prominent New York production. She urges Elizabeth to go through with the marriage, for from letters she understands that her sister is in love with Randolph as she could never be. Heartbrokenly, Elizabeth acknowledges this but how can she tell Randolph the truth? Duped in the enchantment of love, Randolph will never again have faith in anyone. . . At the end of five years "Emmaline" and Randolph are regarded as an ideal married couple. None knows the secret that poisons Elizabeth's happiness, her fear of Randolph's unexpectedly learning the truth. Meanwhile Emmaline has achieved fame but finds it empty. While on a business trip to New York, Randolph attends one of the season's outstanding plays. When the curtain rises, Randolph finds himself looking at the face of the star which is identical with his wife. Wondering if he is going insane, Randolph makes his way into her dressing room when the show is over. Emmaline knows him at once in their dramatic meeting. The secret cannot be kept any longer. . . A week later, Elizabeth grows white with fear when her husband enters with Emmaline. But his affectionate kiss reassures her, before they speak. And Elizabeth learns that under any name, her husband's love endures.

GRAND PARADE

C. L. Kranichfield Drama File No. 11459

THE old man pushed open the cemetary gate, nodded a brief acknowledgement to the caretaker's, "Good afternoon, Mr. Kraft," and wandered over to a far corner. The simple headstone bore a dedication which he had known well for thirty years, held sacred to the memory of his dead wife. With gentle tenderness he placed a small wreath upon the grave. She had been such a beautiful, gracious creature and his ten years of wedded life with her stood apart like a milestone from his more than sixty years of living. His heart was heavier today because it was Father's Day and the children and grandchildren Gertrude would have rejoiced in had paid tribute to him in his son's house where Kraft made his home. He had been hoping to spend it in Los Angeles with his old school friends whom he kept in contact with all these years, but a heavy cold had decided him not to risk the trip. He thought longingly of the reunion plans which were to culminate in a spectacular program in honor of the day at the Hollywood Bowl. The air was growing sharper so Kraft regretfully turned homeward. He was suprised to see his 18 year old granddaughter, young Gertrude, waiting for him. Kraft was very fond of her and had been troubled because she seemed unhappy. "Don't see that young man of yours around any more," he said. Gertrude, unexpectedly burst into tears. After much pressing, she confided that the family objected to her engagement to Bill because he had no money, though both young people were sure that they could make their fortune from an invention he had completed. If only they had enough money to finance the product in the beginning. Home, Kraft felt unusually sleepy and stretched out on the couch. . . Kraft was in the Hollywood Bowl surrounded by his friends whom he recognized despite the years. When the first flush of greetings was ended, he felt a tug at his sleeve. He turned to see a sweet brown haired woman. As in a dream he asked, "Gertrude, my wife, is it really you?" She nodded her head happily. He felt no surprise, only joy and a deep conviction that her presence was only natural. He had the same feeling when he looked at the central stage and saw in addition to many famous stage and screen stars, America's most illustrious figures, George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, etc., sitting there as if they had never been away from the land they loved. Washington set the keynote of the program as he spoke of the ties of the country that had fathered them and the justification of making Father's Day a patriotic holiday as well. The whole panorama of history in costumes and speech was before him. Time and death were only an illusion he thought, tenderly patting his wife's hand. "I've so much to tell you," he said, "But it can wait." Lustily, he and his friends swung into the choruses of songs dear to their youth and young manhood, led by some of the country's most famous singers. And a blend of sentiment and humor was concocted by prominent humorists. The old waltzes, the high wheeled bikes—all passed in revue. Kraft felt someone shaking him. It was young Gertrude. He fumbled about. . . If only the dream could have continued, he murmured. To wait again alone for his wife. Suddenly, he remembered what she had answered before, "You'll tell me soon." And he was not afraid, only glad. Looking at Gertrude, his granddaughter, with sudden resolve he told her that he would finance Bill. As she stooped to kiss him, he said, "Never mind, you marry Bill and be as good a wife as my Gertrude was!"

VOL. VI | SPRING 1934 EDITION | No. 8

TO OUR PRODUCER AND WRITER-FRIENDS THROUGHOUT UNITED STATES AND FOREIGN COUNTRIES

NEW YORK CITY negotiates by far the majority of all stories utilized in Talking Pictures today, and our new department thus enables adequate representation in this field.

We maintain a staff of experts who are second to none. Whether it be work of synopses, technical working continuity, criticism, revision or typing, you may rely upon work of integrity at all times.

The necessity for legal protection through copyright is very evident. Proof of this is demonstrated almost daily in newspapers throughout the country. The Library of Congress at Washington is maintained for that purpose. Reliance upon the common law is unwise. No honorable author or producer desires to become involved in burdensome litigation, and copyright protection is protective insurance, by registration, against that substantial expense. The producer is thus protected against any unfounded claims of authorship, as well as the author himself.

TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE reaches only the producers and our clients. It is not on public sale. No advertisements are accepted, it being our purpose to keep it a strictly professional magazine.

Our offices are available for those producers who do not depend upon staff continuity writers. Our rates for this work are reasonable and are subject to contract.

In addition to synopses herein printed, complete script is submitted to suitable producers where in our judgment such submission is advisable.

Free copy of publication is sent to each author whose story appears herein.

Producers will find it extremely useful to retain TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE in their files for a future emergency, in event that their present needs are supplied.

Apollonia Schroeder Drama File No. 11657

IT is the end of the term at Cambridge. Among the graduates are Ronald and Fredric, two close friends. Fredric invites Ronald to spend a week at his home in England before returning to America. They drive through the English countryside in Frederic's large car and arrive at a large country home. Ronald meets the family and is accepted with every show of cordiality. One day while the boys are sailing, a sudden storm comes up. Fredric falls overboard. Risking his own life, Ronald saves his host from drowning. Before he leaves, Ronald confesses that he is going to look for work when he gets back. Fredric's father commissions him to conduct affairs at their Charleston, South Carolina estate, which has been a family property for generations.

Ronald is captivated by the quiet charm of the place. It is late in the evening. The yard is wrapped in shadows and Ronald feels its mystery. In walking he comes to the hedge which separates the estate adjoining. He hears music and singing. On the evening air it sounds unreal and Ronald steps into the garden to listen. A young girl in a crinoline dress comes down the steps of the colonial house into the garden. She walks down the path to the gate. Ronald hears the faint rustle of her skirt as she passes. He sees her as in a dream and breathes the delicate scent of her perfume. Long after she has gone, Ronald remains sitting in the garden of enchantment. The next day he makes casual inquiries and learns that no one has been living in the house for some time. He is still more puzzled when he sees that the house and garden are not of the period they had seemed the night before. The next evening, he sees the scene as the past evening. Entering, he sees a spinet, and on a desk a folded note, from a lover asking Rosamunde to meet him in the garden at ten o'clock on May 20th 1793. It is signed Fredric. The third evening he finds the dream has vanished. The place is dark.

His business over he goes to New York. At last his inquiries yield him the information that the girl waited in vain for her lover who was thrown by a horse and killed.

One day, in a theatre he sees the girl of his dream. He manages to be introduced and to his great surprise and delight learns her name too is Rosamunde, descendant of the Southern family. Ronald decides to buy the southern estate and make the dream really come true. He plans and builds the house and garden just as he has seen it that summer evening. He wins Rosamunde and they go to Charleston to live. Then one day comes Fredric to his father's estate adjoining. Ronald invites him over frequently. It is May. Now it is Fredric who finds the place enchanting and strangely familiar. As he listens to Rosamunde play on the spinet, a whim of Ronald's, memories of other days comes to him. He loves Rosamunde from the time he meets her and feels he has known her always. Ronald, observing, grows icy with fear. In despair he broods over the turn of events. Then ironically he is called North on a business trip. When Ronald returns he learns that Rosamunde and Fredric are out riding. Suddenly he starts running, driven by an uncanny foreboding. Then he hears a wild patter of hoofs. Even as he watches, Frederic reaches out and stops Rosamunde's runaway horse. However, he miscalculates by a hairbreadth, and a second later he is trampled to death by the uncontrolable animal. Sorrow and grief overtake Ronald. As his friend is gently lifted on the shoulders of the negroes, Ronald leads the weeping Rosamunde into their house. . . .

THY WILL BE DONE

H. M. Sweezy Drama File No. 11775

GRADUATION EVE. In the cloistered study of Professor Leland Rogers, three friends are gathered, oblivious of the celebrants gathered on the campus in song-fest. . "So you are entering the business world," comments the noted economist. Arthur Hastings is oblivious of the warm, eager, eyes of Doris Scott, as he launches into an emphatic description of the hopes, ambitions, and dreams, which within five years are to carry him into a position of power in the public utilities field. Haltingly, Professor Rogers endeavors to disillusion the youth, emphasizing the greed of a few whose wealth has been obtained at the expense of the many. But Doris warns him into silence.

The doors of society are open to Hastings, who, still in his twenties, has attained the vice-presidency of a large power corporation. Wealthy, spoiled Alma St. John cleverly flatters him at an exclusive dance. Too busy to consider women in the last few years, Hastings brings her home and leaves with his senses in riotous tumult. A few weeks of intimate dinners, lunches, and teas, and the society columns carry the announcement of the engagement of the orphaned heiress to the rising financier. In the home of Professor Rogers where Doris, who is engaged in social service work, is visiting, the item is brought to their attention. Doris holds back the tears before sitting down to write a congratulatory note. Within a few months, Hastings is sorely disillusioned with marriage. His wife is calculating and ambitious, the house continually filled with guests when he returns late, tired and weary. Arriving at his office one morning he is in a discouraged mood having learned of another large affair which he is expected to attend. Doris Scott is announced. His face brightens and he insists upon spending the day with her. While motoring with Doris that afternoon, she unexpectedly orders the chauffeur to drive through a quarter new to Hastings. Its oppressive squalor appalls him and he is shocked when Doris tells him that these are the houses owned by his company. Through her influence, he fights for better housing and economic conditions for the employees. Gradually, Hastings' eyes open. A Board of Directors' meeting reveals that the men are more interested in profits. Doris persuades him to visit his old friend, the professor. As a result, they determine to organize a group who aim to establish a new economic order based on the teachings of Christ. In order to win support to amend the constitution a propaganda campaign is organized. Almost against his will, Hastings' power and economic influence grows, and with it his knowledge that business is wrongfully and shamefully organized. Discovering a financial scandal which will wreck the country if revealed, after a sleepless night Hastings decides upon this course to bring about a rude awakening. Only from chaos can a new and superior order emerge. Divorced by his wife and shunned by his associates, undercover Hastings aids the new party which is gathering momentum. Gangsters and "big business" unite in bloody, crooked battle foreseeing their doom, but Professor Rogers is triumphantly elected President.

However, Hastings' party, while having a working majority in both Houses of Congress does not control enough seats to pass the Constitutional Amendments necessary to clear the path for the new economic order, and both houses become hopelessly deadlocked.

In desperation, his party leaders appeal to Hastings to address the House of Representatives, where the more strongly organized minority opposing the changes in the Constitution exists. Hastings is the only one who can hope to present the case for the Amendments strongly enough to assure their passage.

Much against his will, but impelled by a sense of duty engendered by the crisis confronting the nation, Hastings consents to address the House a few hours before the final vote is to be taken.

In an impassioned appeal, startling in its stark dramatization of the dangers of temporizing with the rising tide of human misery and despair which threatens to engulf our civilization and wipe out the prerogatives and fancied security even of those who control the recalcitrant minority and selfishly and mistakenly think they are serving their own interests by opposing the new economic order, he convinces the opposition that only through the medium of the proposed legislation can social chaos be avoided. When the final vote is taken the Amendments have carried. The victory in the House is followed by quick ratification by the Senate and the path is clear for the New Economic Order wherein hope and opportunity await every man.

Realizing that the success of his endeavor means the responsibility for the successful establishment and initial administration of the impending change will rest largely with him, Hastings seeks solitude and guidance on a lonely hillside. Approaching, Doris hears him brokenly murmur, "Peace on Earth, good will toward men."

THE SPLENDID HOUR

Mary F. Linehan Drama File No. 11564

VEXEDLY, Dorothy wondered why the sight of the new man in the office should disconcert the usual cool, efficient composure with which she invariably ruled as office manager in the large Rockville Power Company. When lunch hour arrived, Dorothy hurried out into the garden while the other girls lingered to powder their noses and administer the other beautifying touches which had worn off in the morning. This pleasant spot where the girls enjoyed their luncheons during the warm summer days was Dorothy's pride since she had persuaded the company to fix up the desolate spot. Here, she could show some of the tenderness which she was too shy to show to the girls. If anyone would have suggested this to her subordinates, they would have been amazed. To them Dorothy appeared more like a machine than human, never evincing any of the social interests or attention to appearance which played such a large role in feminine lives generally. Dorothy might have been comforted today if she knew that Paul Prosseau, the new firm member, had perceived the severe attractiveness of the young woman hidden under her austre garments and had wondered if he could break through the shell. When pretty, butterflyish Viola, joined her, Dorothy eyed her wistfully. She was just the type to attract Paul, and spitefully Dorothy commented on her inability to comprehend how any girl with intelligence could spend hours primping for a male. Viola began to flare but something in Dorothy's tones caught her. An astute girl, she sensed the hurt jealousy in Dorothy's voice. Casually, she mentioned Paul's name and noticed Dorothy's sudden blush. Viola suddenly decided on an experiment. She wondered what Dorothy would look like in other clothes and impulsively invited her superior to a weekend party at her aunt's home at Greenwood Lake. Though ordinarily Dorothy would have refused, her acceptance was an amazing indication of the struggle now going on within. Once arrived, the unexpected sight of Paul and the gay frilly dress of the girls appaled her. Viola entered in time to see Dorothy preparing to depart. Within ten minutes, Viola had learned her troubles and went hastily to her own wardrobe. . . A transformed girl joined the party. Dorothy could hardly identify herself that evening with the radiant girl who laughed mirthfully and often as Paul taught her to dance. And under the romantic setting of the moon, Dorothy received her first kiss. A flavor of her new personality, clung to Dorothy when she came into the office Monday. Only to be rudely brought to earth when she learned that Paul had been placed over her head. No wonder he was so nice to me, she thought. All week she was her former drab self, ignoring Paul. Saturday night, she could not bear the haunting memories of the past weekend and sought solace in the company garden to which the night watchman admitted her. Tears came as she foresaw a perpetual spinster's life. Meanwhile, Paul driven by a similar loneliness and thwarted in his attempts to explain to Dorothy that he resented promotion at her expense was also wandering in the garden. He saw Dorothy first. . . Soon Dorothy's head was resting on his shoulder and the violets waved a perfumed blessing on the lovers.

SUCCESS

Mary Helena Nicholas Drama File No. 10787

NEVER, as long as she was to live, would Mary Helena forget the moment her family discovered her ambition to be a writer. Her older brother Tom had found her short story while looking through her desk, and that night after dinner, had assembled the family and in a high falsetto voice had read aloud the poignant little tale. Everyone had roared with laughter over his burlesque, and Mary Helena had listened while the tears made her eyes sting. Then, snatching the tale from him, she had torn it into a thousand pieces and run sobbing to her room. For years, remembering the incident, Mary Helena had been unable to write again although ideas teemed in her brain. Then had come college, and Mary Helena, always an unusual English student had become editor of the literary magazine. One day she was to meet Steve Penner, one of the most popular boys at school, and to the amazement of the shy little editor, Steve was to take an interest in her. One night, driving alone in Steve's car, he had taken her into his arms and rained kisses on her pale face. Incredulous of her own happiness, Mary Helena had gone to her dorm and for two nights had worked upon an epic poem. Then, seeing Steve, she had pressed it into his hands, certain that he, loving her as she loved him, would understand. Only when she heard Steve's fraternity brothers laughing over the way Steve had won his bet that he could get Mary Helena to write something specially for him, did Mary Helena realize she had been the victim of a cruel jest. The next day when the elections for literary editor were held, Mary Helena quietly declined her re-nomination. And her literary career had died there. Never could she pick up her pen without an overwhelming sense of shame. She had outlived her feelings for Steve, but never her literary inferiority complex, and after she was appointed teacher of literature in a small high school, she tried time and again unsuccessfully to recapture that spark of writing genius. Then one day she kept after school Clement Winslow, one of her pupils who never handed in his work on time. After minutes of questioning the little fellow, Mary Helena finally drew from him the confession that he hadn't done his "silly" assignment because he had stayed up late to write a story. Immediately absorbed, Mary Helena had encouraged the youngster to show her his work and had discovered beneath its immaturity and grammatical imperfection a genuine talent. Through her unabated efforts to help him, Clement's talent was to ripen and grow until the youngster was completely happy. And in time Mary Helena was to learn of Clement's father, Michael, who had, since his wife had run away and gotten a divorce to marry his best friend, lost all interest in life. In time, Michael, amazed at the new happiness of his neglected son, was to learn about Mary Helena's aid, and to come to thank her. Then, one day Clement's first story was accepted by an enthusiastic editor, and that night Michael was to call for a special celebration, just Clement, and Mary Helena and he, and as two pair of proud eyes met over little Clement, Mary Helena and Michael knew that they too had found fulfillment.

PARIS MODEL

Sidney Brigg Drama File No. 11781

SURROUNDED by cocktail glasses and various other reminders of a gay party the previous evening, Daymond Finnwick "the sheik of Paris," sleepily opened his eves and surveyed the gallery of feminine photographs adorning the walls of his bachelor apartment. Wilson, his butler, entered with a note, signed by twenty of his admirers, threatening him that if he did not choose one of them for his wife within twenty four hours his life would be in danger as their respective husbands and sweethearts were becoming suspicious of his attentions toward them. With a startled exclamation, Daymond sprang from bed, dressed hastily, and called upon his pal, Jerry Delow. Explaining the situation to him, Daymond stated that as he did not love any of the young women he felt the only thing for him to do was to sail at once for America. After a little persuasion, Jerry agreed to accompany his friend. Daymond left a note in his apartment saying farewell to all his sweethearts; two of them, calling the next morning to prepare his breakfast, were admitted to the apartment by the superintendent who feared, at first, that his tenant had committed suicide when he heard the women's cries and exclamations.

After a trip across the ocean, during which Daymond wore a heavy disguise and avoided all women, the two friends docked at New York. A huge crowd and many reporters were assembled to greet "the sheik of Paris," but Daymond managed to maintain his incognito while he and his pal slipped into a cab. The crowd, hastening to the Waldorf-Astoria, waited there while Daymond instructed the driver to take him to the conservative Bishop Hotel. Daymond and Jerry were registered by Vivian Shannon, an attractive clerk. With a sigh of relief, the young men removed their disguises after Frank, the bellboy, left them. The next day Jerry and Daymond chatted with Vivian and were introduced to Verenia Reynolds, her chum. The four became friends.

Within a week newspaper reporters discovered the identity of the hotel's mysterious guests and informed Mr. Clarkson, the manager, who gave a dance in Daymond's honor, presenting him to the cheering crowd when he entered unexpectedly with Jerry. Discovering Vivian and Verenia, seated at an adjoining table, the boys danced with them, avoiding the others. Daymond persuaded Vivian to walk with him in the park. Suddenly taking her in his arms he told her that he loved her, but she replied, that knowing his reputation, she feared he was incapable of such an emotion. At last he convinced her that she was the only girl he had ever wished to marry, and, radiant with happiness, she consented to become his wife, her shattered faith in love restored.

A week before the marriage Marcella, a French girl, appeared at the hotel, stating that Daymond was engaged to her. In despair, Vivian attempted to drown herself but was rescued by Daymond, driving homeward past the river, and rushed to the hospital. Marcella then confessed that her story was a lie to extort money from Daymond. A short time later a double wedding was held: Vivian and Daymond, Jerry and Verenia were married at a brilliant ceremony at the hotel, followed by a dance.

WANTED—HELPFUL YOUNG MAN

Rosalie Tenzler Drama File No. 11839

JANE WAINWRIGHT embraces her Aunt Grace with whom she is to spend the summer, as they meet in the depot. Affectionately Mrs. Wainwright informs her niece that the lanky, freckled youngster whom she remembers has grown into a lovely young girl, probably old enough to be in love. At this, Jane bursts into tears and confides in her aunt. All her life she had played with boys as one of them—until she met young Jimmy Stewart, an engineer, at a dance. Almost at once they had both fallen in love, and for the first time. The summer a year ago was the happiest of her life as she went swimming and riding with Jimmy. Her family approved of the handsome, splendid boy, giving their consent when the two planned to marry. The wedding date was set, she had purchased part of trosseau when suddenly she received a brief note from Jimmy, saying that she must forget him and not try to find him. Months of anxious waiting passed with no word; but it was impossible to forget Jimmy. Tenderly, Miss Wainwright consoles her niece, advising her that someday she will meet some other nice young man. That following evening she gives a party for the girl, inviting a group of young people who were once pupils of hers in grade school. Leonard Fitzsimmons, a young lawyer, is particularly attentive to Jane, obtaining permission to call again. Miss Wainwright smiles as she sees him practically every evening on the porch with Jane ,and her niece admits that she likes him.

On her way to meet Jane at the library, Miss Wainwright is nearly struck by a truck when a young man assists her swiftly to the curb. Courteously, he asks if he may help her to her destination but she replies that she is going to the library and there are no more streets to cross. Greeting Jane, she relates the incident when she discovers that her purse, containing a diamond ring given her by the faculty on retirement, a pin presented by the school on her second sabbatical, gold pieces, souvenirs of a trip to Africa, several other trinkets and two hundred dollars in pension money, is gone! Mrs. Talbot, her lawyer, places an advertisement asking the young man who helped Miss Wainwright across Fulton Street to return her bag, no questions asked. Meanwhile, the young man, suddenly aware that he is carrying a lady's bag, attempts to find her at the library. Weak from lack of food, he falls to the side walk and is taken to the hospital. As he recovers, after the first good meal and comfortable bed in months, the doctor questions him and he tells his story. With only fifteen cents in his pocket he was on his way to return this valuable purse. A nurse, reading Miss Wainwright's advertisment, shows it to him. The next morning he calls; Jane answers the door, and with a cry of joy rushes to—Jimmy! As he holds her in his arms he tells her that he left because he lost his position and could not ruin her happiness. Months of fruitless searching for work followed; all his money was gone and she must forget him as he was a failure. Miss Wainwright, entering, is presented and hears the story. Jimmy refuses a reward for the return of the bag, but when a former student offers Jimmy a position as assistant engineer, due to Miss Wainwright's influence, he gratefully accepts. A few weeks later Jane and Jimmy are married at Grace Wainwright's home, thanking her for the happiness she brought to them.

THE RADIO VOICE

John Arden Drama File No. 11825

MARY and Bill celebrate their second wedding anniversary with a special dinner and a trip to the theatre, commenting on the happiness they have known together. Confidently Bill tells his attractive wife that when he completes the improved radio transmitter, which he works on every second of his spare time in the little electric shop which he owns, they will celebrate every night. An amateur radio contest is held by a local station; Mary, with her clear soprano voice, easily wins first place and an opportunity to broadcast twice a week. At first Bill is unwilling but when he sees how eager Mary is he consents. When letters come in congratulating Mary her head begins to turn. Losing interest in her home she neglects the housework to practice scales, while Bill, hungry and tired, comes in each evening to a scanty delicatessen supper and an untidy room. One evening he loses his temper and informs Mary that he wishes she would give up this nonsense which she emphatically refuses to do. They quarrel bitterly. Harry, director of the local radio station, attracted by Mary's charm, persuades her that she is a misunderstood wife. Petulantly she neglects Bill, spending much of her time in Harry's company. When Bill discovers this he places a wrong interpretation on their relationship and leaves for New York where his invention has at last achieved recognition, although he does not reveal this fact to his wife.

Deserted, Mary realizes how much she loves Bill, informing Harry that she has been very foolish and cares for no one but her husband. All pretense gone, Mary is herself again. Vainly she tries to discover where Bill has gone but finds no clues. In order to support herself she continues with her radio work, studying vocal lessons on the side and attempting to forget her unhappiness. She refuses to accompany Harry to parties. Meanwhile Bill, in New York, patents his invention, earning a small fortune from its subsequent sale. In addition he is put in charge of the control room in one of the major metropolitan chains. He makes many prominent friends among the radio performers and writers and joins in their gay social life. Sally, a highly paid star of the company, is attracted to Bill; together they enjoy many of the high spots of Manhattan but Bill cannot forget Mary.

A director of the radio company with which Bill is employed hears Mary's broadcast. Intrigued by the splendid quality of her voice he sends the young woman a wire, offering her a try out on his system. Anxious to go away and faced with the necessity of supporting herself, Mary accepts. At last the moment comes for her big opportunity—and Bill is in the control room! When he realizes who is to sing all his bitterness wells up and he resolves to ruin her chance by distorting the sound of her voice. But at the first note, his love returns, and he presents the rendition in the best possible manner. Mary wins a contract; as she leaves with a group of friends one of them accidentally knocks Bill to the ground while passing through a revolving door, causing his nose to bleed. Mary, believing him injured, rushes to him, and as they embrace both decide to start over again—together.

STOLEN FRUITS

Bob Dawbrough Drama File No. 11639

OBEDIENTLY, the car of Clark Blair, youthful manufacturer of Happy Tonic to which the town owes its prosperity, halts before the town's main traffic light. Directly in front of them is strung a large banner—Welcome, Christian Temperance Union. Jack Shaw, his accountant, who has just finished lecturing Blair on his generous contributions to his employees which are using up the firm's reserves, chuckles loudly as he says, "Looks as if they are going right into old Demon Rum's territory." Aboard the speeding special train to Hoptown, Mrs. Killpain, president of the temperance organization, is loudly greeting the members of her flock. She pays special attention to a new member, Martha Sutton, whose youthful prettiness is in utter incongruity to the majority of faces surrounding her. Feeling somewhat shy and lost among them, Martha sinks gratefully into an empty place where Mae MacDonald, a school teacher inwardly rebelling at having come, enthusiastically welcomes a kindred spirit. Martha confesses that she is terrified at attending her first temperance meeting representing her aunt, an ardent member who has instilled her own dislike for liquor in her niece. Upon reaching their destination, it is discovered that there are not enough reservations in the hotel to accommodate them. Although McElrod, the hotel clerk, has little sympathy for their cause, he appreciately notes the young girls' charms. Chuckling, he calls over Blair who promptly invites them to share the hospitality of his house with Mrs. Killpain as chaperone. Martha instantly approves of him and his twinkling though intent eyes upon her are gratifying. Driving to the house, Clark contrives to have Martha sit next to him and obtains a promise from her to slip away and have tea alone with him before the evening program. A radiant smile playing about her lips, Martha enters the room she is sharing with Mae who feels the coming evening's gloom lifting since McElrod lost no time before in persuading her to slip away from the proceedings and join him. "Well," said Mae observantly, "For a member of the white ribbon band you're certainly slipping fast for the town's leading alcohol distiller." The shocked face promptly turned to her makes Mae conscious that Martha has not identified her new admirer, so she at once enlightens her friend. Although tempted to break the appointment, Martha keeps it and for fifteen minutes is completely dignified. When Blair learns that the cold shoulder is being applied because of his business, he assures her with mock solemnity that liquor and he are strangers when the office door is locked. Yielding to his good natured charm, she agrees to be "friends again." At Temperance Hall, Martha is stationed at the door to keep out intruders but small boys persits in setting off firecrackers. The explosives frighten Mrs. Killpain who sure that she is shot, faints and Blair who has been hovering about, hearing the screams, comes to the rescue. When Mrs. Killpain is helped to a chair, she weakly waves for a glass of her own Killpain remedy, a restorative whose recipe has been a family secret for generations. "Absolutely pure," she indignantly responds to the insinuating sniff of Blair as he proffers the stimulant. Before the three day convention ends, the whole town knows that Blair, the most eligible man in the bachelor ranks is on the verge of matrimony. When the closing banquet is held Mae and Martha are both conspicuous for their absence, for Mae is speeding to a minister's home with McElrod, while in a roadside restaurant, Blair is desperately attempting to convince Martha to do likewise. Slowly the girl answers, "I'll do it if you sell your business." Thinking of the hundreds dependent upon his concern for employment and the place his family holds in the town's esteem, Blair tells her that she cannot be serious. Fixedly, she replies, "I'll never live on the money you've gained out of working men's pockets." "More Temperance stuff," groans Blair. Leaving Mae behind, the society leaves Hoptown taking Martha with them. Refusing to accept sympathy even from the McElrods who have set up housekeeping, Blair plunges himself in work until the unbelievable happens some months later when prohibition is declared. A law abiding citizen, Blair is forced to close the factory and use his remaining resources to aid his former workers, turning to insurance for a livelihood. Prosperity begins to return to the town when Mrs. Killpain rents his plant to manufacture Killpain remedies and Aereated Water. Blair is shocked when he encounters Martha at the McElrods and learns that she is now Mrs. Killpain's private secretary. Sales are rising rapidly and Blair drops into the office of his former concern to induce Mrs. Killpain to buy insurance. Although Martha continues to be polite to him, their quarrel still rankles.

Entering one day to collect a premium, Blair finds Mrs. Killpain facing arrest for the Killpain remedies are discovered to be highly alcoholic accounting for their popularity. Because of Blair's high reputation, he succeeds in forestalling public humility, conscious that the grateful eyes of Martha are eager to make amends. . . .

UTILITY BOSS

James Jones Drama File No. 11755

IN their rooms at the fraternity house Jim and Dan are surprised to discover that both have received word of employment with the same company, Jim has been appointed as an engineer while Dan is to be assistant production manager. After graduation exercises the boys pack and take the train for their respective posts in two neighboring small towns. While Jim is visiting Dan he is presented to Dolores, daughter of one of the company stock holders, and is instantly attracted by this vivid society girl. When she marries Dan a few months later, Jim hides his disappointment as he wishes them well. Soon after this his employer introduces Jim to his only daughter, Jane, and as he looks into her eyes Dolores is forgotten. The two discover that they have many tastes in common as they go for long hikes together and when Jane promises to become his wife, Jim realizes that he has, at last, found the right girl. They settle down to a quiet life in their own home, avoiding the artificial gaiety of society, which both dislike, while Dan and Dolores are to be seen at every event held at the Country Club. Dan is promoted because of the influence of his father-in-law, while a less worthy man is given a post above Jim because he refuses to play politics. Jim charges that the firm is indirectly gouging the public because of the high prices charged by the utility companies buying their goods.

The crash comes and the company closes. Opposed to the New Deal because he believes it is a form of bolshevism and means the end of individualism, Dan argues the question hotly with Jim who favors this co-operation with the workers. With Jane, he composes a New Deal song, and takes an active part in helping the unemployed. Dan is at last forced to take relief work, while Jim, inheriting a small legacy from his uncle, continues with his plans. He talks to a psychologist who employs his time in making clay vases, and learns from him that aid should be given for work, not as mere charity. In addition, this man impresses upon Jim the need for diversion for the unemployed. As a result, Jim organizes various teams for sports and establishes free entertainments such as dances, lectures and motion pictures. He is severely criticized by members of many of the churches, including Dan, who regard these steps as a sacrilege. In Dan's community the people believe they are over taxed and must suffer poverty; there is much preaching but only a select few receive jobs. Never the less, he wins the whole hearted support of the working people and many of the more enlightened religious leaders.

Jim receives an appointment from the government to carry on his work, and secures permission to purchase a part of the old electric plant. When he refuses to give Dolores' father a position and will not allow Dan a place of responsibility, the latter becomes angry. In explanation, Jim states that Dolores' father was guilty of misappropriation of funds and Dan did not report him. Dan strikes his old friend; the workers, seeing this, carry Dan away, but Jim prevents any act of violence. Dolores' father then confesses that he was guilty of the charges, but Dan did not know this. As the two friends shake hands, Dan promises his loyal support of the New Deal, and Dolores assists Jane in the recreation center, as they lead its patrons in the New Deal song.

SENTIMENTAL BUSINESS

Isabelle Halperin Drama File No. 11754

ARTHUR JEFFREY points out to his guest, Jim Bolling, the portion of his huge cotton estate which he plans to sell to neighbors, as the two ride together toward home. When Jim tells Arthur that his daughter, Frances, wishes to purchase Nancy, a pretty mulatto slave at the Bolling estate his host gives her to him. Later Dan, Arthur's son, home from the university during summer vacation, finds Nancy weeping as she lies in a corner of the barn. Gently, the young man questions her and as she has worshipped Dan since childhood she confides that she is engaged to Smilin' Sam who is to be sold with the portion of the cotton plantation. Dan pleads with his father not to separate the young lovers, but Arthur tartly replies that business and sentiment cannot be mixed. Wishing to comfort the girl, Dan assures her that at least she can correspond with her beloved; since neither she nor Dan can read or write he will shape the letters at this end and translate her replies while Frances will gladly perform the same services for her. With tears of gratitude in her eyes, Nancy thanks her young master and hurries to tell Sam. Sweethearts since school days, the engagement of Frances and Dan has been more or less accepted by both families for years: when it is formally announced there is much rejoicing among the older people, but little enthusiasm between those most concerned.

After the journey homeward with her new mistress Nancy waits eagerly for her first letter from Sam, but when it arrives she is afraid to ask Frances to read it. She finds a sympathetic friend in Jennie Davis, daughter of the Bollings foreman, who reads the missive and composes another at Nancy's dictation. At first both Jennie and Dan write only what Sam and Nancy suggest; then add extravagant phrases of their own which delight the two lovers. Dan and Jennie soon find they are almost as eager to receive the lively, colorful missives as the two they are helping. The Civil War breaks out and when North Carolina secedes, Dan joins the Confederate troops. Wounded in battle, he is sent to a base hospital where he contracts pneumonia. Dan finds little diversion during the weary hours in the stilted notes he receives from Frances. Between their lines he reads that she does not really love him and is trying vainly to hide the fact. Eager for the lively correspondence he enjoyed from Jennie he asks her to write, and the two exchange delightful letters, this time on their own behalf. Parts of these he shares with Major Lee, a wounded officer who becomes his close friend and accompanies Dan to his home when both are given a furlough. While the two young soldiers are visiting Frances, Dan meets Jennie for the first time, and they instantly fall in love. Likewise there is a strong mutual attraction between Frances and Major Lee. On the day before Lee returns to battle, both confess that they are in love, and reluctanly the families break the engagement.

At the close of the war, Frances and Major Lee plan to marry, while Dan and Jennie announce their engagement. For a wedding present, Frances presents Nancy to Jennie so there are two weddings on the Jeffrey estate as Sam at last claims his bride and sentiment triumphs over business.

THE END OF RACKETS

Virgil Molique and Raymond Bramlage

Drama File No. 11784

JIMMY LEWIS, recently graduated from college, eagerly waits as the train which brings his brother, Don, for a visit, pulls into the depot. Alighting swiftly, the older boy hastens over to Jimmy, and the two exchange warm greetings. Proudly, Jimmy conducts Don to his new roadster; soon they are speeding along the highway when another car swerves in front of them. Don seizes the wheel pulling their roadster into a ditch, while the other car, containing two men and a girl, hits a tree. Fearing the occupants are injured, Don prepares to go to them when Jimmy stops him, recognizing the driver as Sport Wood, a notorious gangster. At that moment, Wood approaches and accuses them but Jimmy answers with spirit that he is the one who is at fault. When Wood and his men attempt to start a fight the two boys quickly settle with them. Jimmy sending the gangster to the ground with a decisive blow. Hastily they leave for Jimmy's apartment; Don goes to the drugstore to purchase cigarettes and send a wrecker and a taxi to the gangsters. While he is away, Sue Moore, Jimmy's fiancee, and her mother, call. When Don returns he is presented to them and offers his congratulations when he hears of the impending wedding and the news that Jimmy has been made cashier at the First National Bank.

While the four are enjoying dinner, Don receives a long distance telephone call and states that he is called back to Chicago on business. When Sue asks him what his business is he explains, with some confusion, that he is employed by an importing company. Alone with Sue, later, Jimmy confides that he has heard unpleasant rumors to the effect that his brother is assisting gangsters; the girl replies that she will do her best to help him in his efforts to reform his brother. With Jimmy's approval, she writes to Viola Peters, her closest friend, employed as a dancer in Chicago, instructing the girl to introduce herself to Don and win his confidence if she can. Pretending to be connected with a gang herself, Viola carries out these instructions. Don, attracted by her charm, spends much of his time in her company. A few days later, Jimmy encounters Sport in a cafe. The gangster extends his hand, telling Jimmy that he always admires a fighter. As the two talk together, Jimmy asks him whether or not Don is connected with a gang. At first Sport denies the charge, then admits that Don is an outside agent. When Jimmy says that he would give anything, take any method, to cure his brother, Sport, relying upon his word as a gentleman, tells him that if he can find plans for the "jobs" Don has outlined he himself will commit the robberies first. This will doubtless discourage Don until he will renounce his criminal career.

Viola, upon hearing of this, searches Don's apartment entering with a key which he has given her. Four successive jobs are completed first by Wood and his gang, as a result. While Sport is robbing a theatre box office, Don drives up; police receive a call from the manager and arrest both Sport and Don. When their sentences are passed, Sport and Don renounce their life of crime; Don turns over what is left of his gain to Sue and Jimmy .Explaining that she tried to help him because she loved him, Viola promises to wait for Don, and as he gazes into her eyes he finds still another reason for going straight when his two year sentence is ended.

NURSES NEED NERVE

Charlotte S. Allen Drama File No. 11778

HASTENING through the reception room of the City Hospital on her way to report for duty Ruth Blair, a pretty young nurse, sees one of the doctors, head bowed dejectedly. Believing it to be Dr. Smith, whose brother's life is in danger, she slaps him on the back and encourages him with her own slogan: "Now don't lose your nerve." To her horror she discovers that the man is none other than Dr. Hamilton, the "Big Doctor," head surgeon of the hospital, but he merely thanks her for the advice and informs her haughty superintendent, Cornelia Clapp, that he is responsible for Ruth's tardiness. After midnight Eudora Wingate, a wealthy widow, is rushed to the hospital and operated upon for appendicitis; Ruth assists Dr. Hamilton. The patient is removed to the luxurious Room Twenty, where she slowly canvalesces, wearing a beautiful negligee and demanding every possible attention from Miss Manning, her private nurse. When Ruth is sent to relieve her, Eudora attempts to bribe the girl to report Dr. Hamilton's vacation plans, but this she refuses to do.

Ruth makes friends with little Tommy Bender, a crippled, motherless child in the wards, bringing him a box of colors, and discovering that he has the soul of an artist, although his father scoffs at these ideas and forbids the boy to indulge his talent. Shortly before a second operation is performed on him, Clara, a cleaning woman who has always taken a deep interest in Tommy, confesses to Ruth that the boy is her own son, taken away from her by the court because she drank. Although she has given up this vicious habit, she cannot regain the custody of her boy.

Dulcie, Ruth's room mate, reports that the new baby has arrived; the mother, an unmarried chorus girl, is not interested in the infant, but Mrs. Carson, the wife of a wealthy druggist, who is suffering from a nervous breakdown, begs to be allowed to hold the child. When Ruth sees how happy Mrs. Carson is with the baby, and learns from Dulcie that her husband will not allow her to adopt a child although that is her greatest wish, she secretly conducts Mr. Carson to his wife's room while she is holding the child. As a result, the young mother is given a check while Mr. and Mrs. Carson decide to keep the baby. Ruth loses her cap for this serious infringement of rules, but Dr. Hamilton privately expresses his satisfaction over the happy outcome. Next, she persuades Lucille Brown, a timid, old fashioned school teacher suffering from a nervous breakdown, to "doll up." With the judicious use of a few cosmetics, Lucille is transformed into a lovely girl who wins the heart of Dr. Watson and thanks her nurse when she plans to become the physician's bride. Nell Peters, a young, unmarried woman, becomes the mother of twin boys; in despair because she must give them up she attempts suicide. Secretly, Ruth shows the boys to their father, awakening his paternal pride. The following morning he marries their mother and the happy family leave together.

Suspicious of Calderone, a supposedly crippled patient, who can get into bed unaided, Ruth translates a note which he leaves for a friend, and confides in Dr. Hamilton and Dulcie that she believes he means to rob the payroll on Friday. When Dr. Corman, a married man of doubtful reputation, takes Dulcie to a cabaret, Ruth reports this to Dr. Smith, who loves her room mate. He enters their private dining room, and as he takes the frightened Dulcie home, after settling with Corman, they "make up," and she agrees to become his bride. Dr. Hamilton, overhearing Ruth attempting to convince Cornelia Clapp that Tommy Bender's father may be responsible for a sudden shortage in morphine, finds this is true. Mr. Bender is sentenced to the penitentiary; Tommy, once more in the custody of his mother, leaves with her for her brother's home and a new life. When Ruth, working with Dr. Hamilton on a case in Westchester, sees him kiss the patient she gives up all hopes of his ever caring for her, and will not listen to his explanations.

On the night mentioned in Calderone's note, Ruth, taking a pistol from the desk, hastens to the front office, only to find Samuels, the night clerk wounded, and Cornelia Clapp bound. She holds the men at bay until police come, then feels a stinging wound in her arm, and faints into the arms of the Big Doctor. When she awakens in luxurious Room Twenty, Ruth is told by Dr. Hamilton that the patient he kissed is his half sister. And all misunderstandings are forgotten as the two plan to sail to Europe—as man and wife!

MORE THAN PRIDE

Anne Gill Drama File No. 11691

SCURRYING down the halls of the dingy rooming house, Tom Morton did not see the amused glances of his fellow roomers or hear his landlady's emphatic, pitying whisper as she said, "There he goes again, sitting on the park bench, mooning over an old woman like a love-sick calf twice his age." He was already late; impatiently Tom was swallowed into the distance. Cold rain beat down in misty spray but oblivious of personal discomfort, Tom finally made his way to the bench from which another shabby lounger, hastily dislodged himself. "Guess after ten years, this bench sure is yours," was the greeting. But Tom was already intent upon the windows of Mrs. Leslie's home, seeking clues as to whether she had already left the house. A rude hand on his shoulder made him aware of Sam, an old friend, returned to once more resume efforts to have Tom cease his futile vigil. The lecture which Tom knew so well was begun again. A few moments later Sam realized that Tom was no longer listening, watching instead the woman who was approaching an awaiting car. There were still obvious traces of beauty which had been hers in youth. Sam shivered. His departure was unnoticed. Deep in thought, back over the pages of by-gone years, Tom was reliving the days of his love which the sight of Beatrice Leslie always recalled.

With a Harvard background and rising position in Wall Street, the gods smiled upon Tom. No woman meant anything until Beatrice was his dinner partner one evening. From that time, the world of emotions centered on her. Married, her husband had the reputation of a scoundrel but Beatrice had always been faithful. Yet love was stronger than convention, and Beatrice succumbed to Tom's urgings. They were to sail on the Europa Friday. On the previous Tuesday, Beatrice, greatly agitated, came to him. Gossip had informed her that he had been seeing much of Chloe Lane, night-club dancer. Tom pleaded business relationship, solely. He could not bring himself to confess that his younger brother, Jim, was really infatuated with Chloe. To save him from a disasterous marriage, Tom sought to reveal the dancers true character through intimacy which would disillusion Jim. Fortunately, Beatrice believed him. The sailing hour came but Tom wes delayed. Despite his hope, Chloe and Jim were speeding to another county bound for a minister. In his hands were at last the final proof of Chloe's unfitness. Although he tried to reach her on the phone, Beatrice had already gone to the boat. She never received his message. A newspaper headline shrieked—Morton Marries Night Club Girl—and Beatrice fainted. All letters and wires from Tom were returned. From mutual acquaintances, he learned that Beatrice had retired in an isolated section of Europe, remote from travelers. Years later she came home and Tom who had divined the misunderstanding sought to explain. But his presence or mention of him was forbidden. To Tom, Beatrice still loomed above all else. Discovering that from the park bench, he could watch her movements—create the illusion of nearness, Tom spent most of his waking hours there. His business failed.

Today, Tom was to earn a few pennies as a stage extra to attend the horse show where Beatrice would be present. After following her home, he waited for the lights to turn on but instead heard screams. Bursting into the house, he surprised thieves threatening her. . . After the police had left, pride was vanquished. The wall of silence broken, Beatrice was to hear his explanation. The park bench would hold its strange character no longer.

CROOKED TRAVELS

James Flynn & Thomas Flynn

Drama File No. 11659

"THE winner!" impressively announces Patrolman Nolan as he holds up the right arm of motorcycle policeman Bob Steele while his opponent, Smith, ruefully rubs his jaw, before extending his congratulations which heal a long animosity between the two. Lunch hours which the men had used to play off Smith's challenge as the boxing champion of the department is over and the two men leave for duty a few streets apart in the city of Los Angeles. While having his tank refilled at a gasoline station, Smith casually notices the fast machine containing three heavy set men who stop for directions. Soon after the district is aroused by pistol shots. Two clerks in a prominent jewelry store are held up while the crooks sweep up the contents of one of the cases. As they emerge, the proprietor who has been hidden in the inner office in back follows and begins to shoot as the men start to reenter the car. A police dog seizes one of the men but the proprietor's shots run wild and the waiting chauffeur wounds the jeweler and stuns the animal. Steele with Smith close on his heels arrives in time to see the car shooting into the distance. Stopping long enough to pick up a few details, Steele pursues the car only to fall off a twenty foot embankment from which Smith extricates him after losing the bandit car when it cuts along a railroad crossing missing an oncoming train by a few inches. Steele's injuries are too slight to postpone the vacation he had planned in Mexico and when upon further investigation a scrap of paper evidently dropped by the thieves mentions Vanda City, Steele and Smith plan to spend their vacation there. In the city's combined saloon and restaurant Steele unexpectedly meets a childhood sweetheart, Mary Fay, who confides that she is being forced to marry the proprietor, San Jose, who holds several promissory notes which her father cannot meet. Determined to circumvent the marriage, Steele learns that Smith identifies San Jose with the jewel robbery. Meanwhile Suzzette whose love Steele has rejected follows him and knowing Mary since childhood sees her alone and persuades her that Steele is betrothed to her. Hurt, Mary refuses to see Steele the next day. The friends take turns at shadowing San Jose until they learn that he is the leader of the famous Snake gang and later discover his hiding cache for the jewels among the rocks. That night they send for reinforcements and Suzzette warns San Jose. He goes to Mary's home planning to take her with him; knocks the father unconscious and kidnaps the girl. While searching for more evidence, Steele is trapped and discovered in the gang's house. Down to his last two bullets, Steele is freed by the arrival of the police led by Smith. Snake's two assistants dash for the cache at the time that San Jose arrives with Mary. Bloodshed is prevented when Steele's group appears; and Mary finds safety and peace in her lover's arms.

THREE LITTLE GIRLS

Agnes Chopp Drama File No. 11558

THE lights on the stage grow dim. The lilting strains of the song, "Three Little Girls," which is one of the season's most popular numbers on the radio is being dramatized in public for the first time. As the simple clear voices of the cast reach the last note, a storm of applause sweeps through the audience. Clifton Randal turns to the sophisticated woman beside him saying, "There Josephine, another triumph for the song you wrote." Her tension relaxed, the young composer laughs as he assists her into her coat. Instead of going to a night club, Josephine suggests that they return to her apartment. A letter is waiting for her and Josephine joyfully rips it open. Noting the pleased expression that lingers after the letter is read, Clifton declares mockingly, "Don't tell me that there is another man in your life?" Josephine laughs as she retorts, "No, but it's from the inspirers of my song." She points to a photograph on the piano top of her three young nieces whom she has not seen for over ten years, "And the youngest is eleven," she adds mournfully. For years Josephine intends to visit them but they live several thousand miles from New York and she has been too occupied striving for the success which at last comes to her to afford the trip. This song has insured her prominence and for several weeks, Josephine has so many engagements that she is bordering on collapse one evening when Clifton persuades her to stay home. The inviting flames from the fireplace persuade her. Clifton, she thinks gratefully, is his usual comforting, soothing self, but she is startled when he abruptly asks her to consider him as a husband. Josephine is undecided. Nearing thirty, she is still beautiful and the fruits of freedom are too delightful to relinquish. Not sure if she loves Clifton, Josephine begs him to wait for her answer. When he leaves, Josephine reaches a decision she has been contemplating for several days. Going to the phone, she asks Western Union to take the following message to Mrs. Helen Gregory, "Starting immediately on a visit to you." There is only time enough to pick up a few presents and drop a note to Clifton the next morning before the train leaves. During the days her train is speeding across the continent, Rosalind, Eunice, and Lola excitedly help their mother prepare the house for their visitor. All three are very much excited at meeting their famous aunt and persuade their mother to take them to the station. To Josephine, they appear lovelier than their photograph, true inspirations of her song. Dick their brother is also an added delight in the day spent in renewing acquaintance with her sister. After dinner, the children reveal that they have a surprise for her and while their mother plays the children sing a welcoming song over which many wearisome hours have been spent. In this lovely, homy, atmosphere, Josephine first experiences a deep longing for a similar home of her own. Yielding to impulse, she excuses herself long enough to wire to Clifton "yes" before returning to join with the children in singing her own song for them —"Three Little Girls."

ONCE UPON A TIME

George Alexander Drama File No. 11556

THE highly polished copper-toed boots rested on a chair. The small boy frowned earnestly and then gave a final, satisfying brush to them, before he turned to meet the smiling greeting of his grandfather. "Tell me a story," he begged. The old man pushed out his chair, and fumbled for his pipe. Earnest ran quickly after the pipe where it reposed on the top shelf—so high that only by standing his tipmost on the chair could it be reached. This was the ceremony that the child and old man awaited with akin eagerness. At last, Grandfather was launched into the favorite tale of both, "Once upon a time—." The boy nodded happily. He had heard the story so often that already it formed pictures in his own mind. He saw the wilderness that had been New York before his father's day. Coming from New England with his bride he had established himself in a district now one of Manhattan's most crowded spots. But then not even grocery stores were located nearer to their home than five miles. Mrs. Crane drove into town with her husband each Saturday to stock up on the food for the week. Then had come the children, inoluding Earnest's father, but Earnest no longer listened to this part of the story, being much more fascinated by the picture of an uncivilized city and the small tavern that grandfather had run. Mr. Crane had never refused to lend money to his friends and through his generosity had lost the business before his grandson was born. The jubilant shouts of his older brothers broke in upon the two. "Hey, come on," they said impatiently, "Mother is waiting downstairs. She is going to the grocery and has promised us crackers. Come on." Earnest stopped long enough for his grandfather to slip a large copper cent in his hand. The huge ten cent paper sack of crackers was another jubilant weekly treat. Afterwards, they all escorted him to the candy store where much deliberation was spent among the fascinating jelly beans, all day suckers. licorice, rum candies and other concoctions that made the spending of a penny difficult in an era when children were not accustomed to the extravagant luxuries of now. The house was in an uproar when Earnest returned. Grandfather had suffered a stroke. Soon life was changed for Earnest. The deaths of his grandfather and mother brought the little boy closer to his father. As the children grew older they and their parent were very close. Imbued with a desire to travel, Earnest joined the army for a year. Trouble with the discipline and homesickness for New York made him leave. Still restless, he worked in several parts of the state until he met Mae Robbins, a sweet old fashioned girl that strangely reminded him of his grandfather's stories. She was everything that he would have approved of, he decided. When Mae consented to marry him, they spent an evening deciding on their honeymoon. Suddenly, Earnest sat erect and said, "I know, New York City." In the darkness he seemed to hear again, "Once upon a time—"

LAND O' DREAMS

Sue Meharry Moffett Drama File No. 11049

"DON'T cry, Betty. I have to go if I'm ever going to have enough money to marry you," declares Dennis, his own voice filling with tears as he holds the weeping girl. It is the eve of his departure to Utah territory where a position awaits him as mining engineer for a large silver deposit, whose recent discovery immediately results in the establishment of a typical boon town, Park City. The last railroad junction is forty miles away. Days later, Dennis joins a party which is going on horseback and wagons. Evening is approaching and the children begin clamoring for water to appease thirst. Seeing tents in the distance, Dennis learns they are nearing an Indian reservation. He persuades the weary band to rest there. When the men dismount, the Indians make no gesture of friendliess until Chief Hawk comes. Dennis greets him ceremoniously and offers gifts if they may rest for an hour on his land. So pleased is the Chief with their attitude, that the squaws are ordered to prepare a meal for the visitors. And while the white families dine, the Indians hold a traditional, ceremonial dance of weird beauty. Unfortunately, a small boy throws a firecracker almost under the dancers' feet. They frown menacingly. Another follows. Several Indians spring from the circle to seize the child, when Dennis thrusts him aside. Surrounded by outnumbering forces, his compatriots look on helplessly. As they are trussing him, a young Indian woman rides in among them, and laughs as his plight. Dennis looks at her pleadingly, sensing that she is an important person in the tribe. The smile on her lips dies and she orders the rope off. "I give him to you, Columbine," the Chief asserts loudly for Dennis' benefit. There is a tense moment while Columbine, through whose blood runs the heritage of both races, looks at him speculatingly. In perfect English, she tells him that he can join his people but they will meet again. In his hotel room at last, Dennis lives over that moment, wondering at the vague menace behind her last words. "Remember, you belong to me." Shots outside bring him running to the street where he has his first real taste of the west. A string of cowboys are shooting at a scarecrow target set over the Blue Duck saloon. Their lanky leader introduces himself to Dennis as Lacy, ex-easterner and now a cowboy looking for fun, "Join me?" The saloon is a confusion of noise—loud talk, a banging piano, and girls with whom Lacy seems quite at home. During the next few weeks, Dennis sees much of Lacy when not working on the mine. The opening of the first mine in that part of the state two years later, draws leading politicians and visitors from great distances, including gamblers. Dennis is publicly honored for his share. For the first time in months he recalls Columbine when she stares at him provocatively while participating in the ceremonies. That evening she follows him and amazes Dennis by her temper when he refuses to return to the reservation. First, he believes she is joking not preceiving that she is madly, jealously in love. . . Besides he is anticipating Betty whom he is marrying this week. Already, he has a house built for her. Exactly six days later, Dennis is proudly displaying this to Betty before they drive to the minister when Columbine unexpectedly appears holding a small child. Before the horrified Dennis can stop her, the Indian girl walks over to Betty and claims the child is his son. Dennis' stunned surprise results in confused denials and Betty thinks he is lying. She removes her engagement ring and silently hands it to the girl. . . "No, you don't," cries the welcome voice of Lacy from the doorway. Columbine tries to run but Lacy holds her while explaining the girl is framing Dennis. An hour later with Lacy as best man, Betty and Dennis blissfully hear themselves pronounced "man and wife."

HOME

Mrs. F. B. Austin Drama File No. 11078

"AND when we marry, we'll have our own home and no more traveling from one state to another," says Mary in triumphant farewell to years of wandering throughout the country with her parents. And Jack Ellison, who has known her since she was 13, agrees with the smiling 17 year old, who turns her lips to him in love. To complete Mary's happiness the honeymoon is spent at her sister-in-law's home, where Mary plans for a not-too-distance time when they can own a similar place. Jack takes a salesman's job, and the two are supremely content in their little apartment where their son, Eugene, is born. But Jack does not forget his old love for the footlights and when he loses his position and finds difficulty in securing another, he persuades Mary to let him return to the stage until enough money is saved for their dream home. But the months become several years and Jack shows no inclination of keeping his promise until Mary finally rebels. Late one evening, Jack returns to find an empty room and a note that Mary is gone, taking Eugene with her. With the money she saved, Mary goes to a small town and opens up a boarding house. On his eighth birthday, Eugene's mother presents him with a violin, his most prized possession. She has long since secured a divorce from Jack. Together, mother and son build a world of happy companionship, in which Mary shares Eugene's ambition to become a famous violinist. When he is 16, Eugene has an audition with a musician who is so impressed with the boy's talent that he obtains a music scholarship for him in New York. In the next five years, Eugene climbs rapidly to success but remains unspoiled. His mother shares his detailed letters with Blanche their next-door neighbor and Eugene's childhood playmate. Mary's hope of having Blanche for her daughter-in-law is shattered when Eugene weds a society girl, a marriage which soon ends unhappily. As Eugene leaves one of his concerts, he is stopped by a shabby middle-aged man. His visitor discloses that he is Eugene's father who for years is seeking his wife and son, contrite for his past behavior. When Eugene returns to his home-town, the hall is jammed with people anxious to see and hear their city's famous son. Rejoining his mother backstage, Eugene dramatically introduces her to Jack, anxiously awaiting her reaction. Seeing him after 20 years, Mary realizes that her old love is not wholly dead. That night as Eugene strolls happily with Blanche around the garden, a reconciliation takes place between Mary and Jack. The dream-home of their youth becomes a haven for middle-age.

THE ACHIEVER

Harold C. Kinsman Drama File No. 11561

THE blacksmith shop fascinated Peter. Here he could forget his backwardness in high school and jeers from the younger, huskier boys. The day that "Bull" so-named for his bullying habits, scoffed disparagingly while Peter was walking with June Hill made Peter form several resolutions. Until Dan Olson, his blacksmith friend, agreed to take him into the shop, Peter said nothing at home of his plan to leave school. Six months of hard labor hardened the youth. There was an air of new alertness and sharpness about him. One day Peter came across a notice in a Chicago paper which revealed that "Bounce" Fryer, contender for the lightweight boxing championship, was establishing training camp shortly, close to Peter's home. Peter determined to pick up some boxing points. His chance came when he pushed a stranger out of danger from a recklessly driven car. In gratitude, Fryer made him a sparring partner during Peter's free hours. "Always keep your chin out of the way," Bounce advised. A few weeks later, Peter successfully applied this advice when he knocked out Bull at the railroad station. June's father witnessed this and Peter sensed admiration when he went out with June that night. June persuaded him to join the Blue Jays as pitcher, though Peter had originally refused since he lacked the requisite confidence. Though he "blew" up from nervousness at the beginning of his first practice session, Brown, a retired ball player and friend of Coach Bolden was attracted by Peter's slow curve. Under his tutelage, the youth progressed. The day he won his first, important game, Peter tasted the savour of success. Although Peter was very young, Brown considered him good material for the Chicago Cubs and tipped a scout to attend one of the Blue Jays' games. Knowing how important good playing was, Peter tried too hard and played like a rank amateur. June saved the day when she tipped off Bolden to lie to Peter that the scout was not able to come that day. Only afterwards, with a signed contract in his firm clutches, did Peter realize that June was really responsible. When he left for the coast to gain experience before joining the regular team, it was with June's tentative promise to marry him. Pacific coast sport writers recognized that a new baseball star was emerging and when Peter returned to Chicago, he already had an interested public waiting for him to "show his stuff." The Cubs were standing fourth in the Pennant series with a good chance of entering the championship series against the Reds. In his first game, Peter showed flashes of the baseball gift that justified his new position. Jubilant at the friendly plaudits, Peter wandered alone that night enjoying the air of gaiety and life in Chicago's main thoroughfare. Although it was against training rules, he visted the Paradise, notorious nightclub. He did not see the couple which nudged eaoh other when he entered. Soon the escort vanished and the girl persuaded Peter to join her. Unnoticed, she slipped knockout drops in his drink. But while he was raising it to his lips, Bounce Freyer who had been watching from the sidelines knocked the drink from Peter's lips and ordered the girl arrested. Newspapers carried the story of a gambler's attempt to dispose of a Cub player, but Peter was speeding home in answer to a telegram which notified him that his mother was ill. She was over the crisis when he arrived, and June promised to return to Chicago and marry Peter if he pitched one of the final critical games and won. Although the manager at first was afraid to risk the game with a comparatively, inexperienced player when he learned the reasons, he changed his mind. That night, fans celebrated the Cubs' victory but Peter was too busy with his wedding.

FOR ALL TIME

Monica Jurczyk Drama File No. 10491

PRETTY June Gay attracts many men, but refuses all social engagements until Charles Smith, foreman of the factory where she is employed, invites her to lunch. Jealous of his attention to this young girl, Connie Phillips, another worker at the factory, punctures the tire of his car, for not taking her to lunch, but he discovers the flat tube, and drives away with June in a borrowed machine, waving gaily to Connie. Motivated by anger and friendship for the innocent June, Connie warns her that Charlie has carried on many affairs with women, and his intentions toward her doubtless are dishonorable. After this, June refuses to see him, and attends a Saturday night party at Connie's home, where she meets Don Davis, the son of a New York attorney, who is visiting in the little town, with his friend, Harry. The four arrange to attend a motion picture together the following afternoon, and as Don sees June's eyes fill with tears at a touching episode in the film, he loses his heart to her, and confesses his love when they are alone. Although returning it, June refuses to accompany him to New York, but when she is not looking he slips a railroad ticket, money and the address of a hotel in her purse. Discovering that she has spent the afternoon with Don, June's mother and brother forbid her to ever see him again, and rudely order her to her room. As this is typical of their treatment to her, June, finding Don's gifts in her purse, decides she will leave.

When she arrives at the hotel, June finds a room engaged for her, and is unpacking her things when Charlie, who has discovered her address from overhearing a remark by Connie, knocks at the door. He attempts to persuade her to return to her home, but she refuses, saying she does not love him, and wishes to remain here. As he is leaving, Don calls, and furiously jealous, Charlie tells the attorney's son that June is his former mistress, which Don believes. Deserted by both men, June, with only a few dollars in her purse, searches for work. When she is lunching with a girl whom she meets at an employment agency, she is told to apply at the ten cent store, and, following this suggestion, is given a position selling sheet music. Ruth, an attractive young blond, who is in charge of victrola records, invites June to share her apartment, and introduces her to Dick Clinton, who escorts her, with a group of others to Tony's Road house. Desperately unhappy over the loss of Don, June takes her first drink of whiskey, and soon becomes intoxicated. She allows Dick to guide her to a private room, but Ruth follows the two, and takes her friend home. Trying to forget Don, June drinks recklessly, and spends most of her leisure hours in Dick's company, at various gay places.

Noticing that his son is unhappy, Don's father questions him, but, Don refuses to answer and leaves the office. A few weeks later his father advises him to find June again, but he is unable to do this. Charlie, also, returns, searching for June, and sees her at a cabaret. While under the influence liquor, she tells Charlie of her love for Don, and he traces him, and informs him that June is a worthless girl. Throwing Charlie to the ground, he goes to the cabaret, and pleads with June to marry him. When she refuses, he gives Ruth money, asking her to take June abroad for a rest. As they are sailing, Ruth confesses that Don provided for the trip, and, when he bids her farewell, she goes to him for all time.

LOOKING GLASS HUSBAND

Evelyn Percy Comedy File No. 11454

COMPLETING his hurried dinner, Tom Templeton compliments his wife Helen on her cooking and rises from the table. Helen listens to his explanations that he has to dash out to another business conference, then forlornly complains that a wife wants to be more than a cook. Has he forgotten that he promised to stay in with her tonight? Thoroughly exasperated, Tom interrupts, saying he is tired of her nagging. Business is business. If Helen feels so neglected why doesn't she go out and make her own friends instead of sitting home to brood? Even when Helen reminds him this is their second wedding anniversary, Tom tries to carry off his over-sight with bravado, and demands his hat and cane from Mose, the colored butler, who has been in the service of Helen's family for years. However, when Helen confronts him with the gossip that he has been seen with various women of unsavory reputation, Tom's face falls. Quickly recovering, he assumes a hurt expression as he explains that for some time he has been annoyed by the appearance of a double, a man who resembles him feature for feature. As long as the confusion had been confined to business difficulties, Tom had remained silent, but now that this other man was invading the sanctity of his home and instilling doubts in Helen's mind, Tom was going to take action. Embracing her husband, and apologizing for ever having doubted him, Helen sees her husband to the door. Mose shakes his head despondently, and as Helen sinks back in her easy chair, Mose produced the evening newspaper which carries a story about Tom Templeton, arrested with two women and other man, in a joy-riding accident. For a moment Helen's faith in shaken, but almost immediately her attitude changes to indignation at the "double's" trouble making. Moses, less certain of Tom's blamelessness proposes a little scheme. When Tom comes back, let Helen pretend he is an imposter, at the same time asserting that her husband has just left. Accordingly when Tom returns, Mose acts to put him out. Outraged, Tom calls for Helen, who, to his utter amazement assures him coldly that her husband has just left her embraces a moment before. Bewilderment gives away to indignation as Mose, rolling his eyes, expands upon the amorous technique of Helen's "husband." At last, in spite of himself, Tom becomes convinced that another has been here in his stead. Furious now, he maintains that he and nobody else is Tom Templeton. But when Helen and Mose express their impatience with this imposter, Tom goaded to jealous fury by the thought of his wife in the arms of another, seizes his loaded revolver, and maintains he is going to kill his betrayer. Mose puts him out, and Helen gives way to tears, fearing that she has lost Tom forever. Mose's reassurances however, are abruptly terminated by a rapid succession of shots, shouts and splintering of glass. In despair Helen calls out, "Tom Tom; my God what have you done?" Wild-eyed, panting, Tom grits out "I killed the man who looks like me." Outside there is a second shattering of glass, and laboring under the burden of the bullet-splintered hall mirror, Mose staggers in to exclaim dramatically, "Yassuh, you certainly did kill him. You done busted de best darn mirror in de house."

MOTHER

Helen Jenkins Drama File No. 11559

THE dinner table was set for two. Mrs. Groves entered with the salt and pepper shakers and then went to the window. Laura was late for the third time that week. She knew it was silly to worry but Laura was her only child. Glancing back at the mantel shelf, her eyes fell tenderly upon the photograph of the young man who had been her husband. When Laura lost her father at an early age, Mrs. Groves determined to devote her life to the child. The door slammed. A pretty, exhuberant girl of 17 flung her arms about her mother's neck and breathlessly forestalled her mother's gentle scolding. "I do worry so," said Mrs. Groves, hurrying into the kitchen. "We were so busy rehearsing our class play, that I forgot the time again," Laura answered. Throughout the meal, the mother heard with affectionate interest the happenings in her child's day. For years this had been a habit with these two who were closer to each other than most. R-r-ring! Hurrying to the door, Laura's mother pretending not to hear her daughter protesting Mr. Andrews' thrice-weekly visits, of which tonight's was one. Mrs. Groves greeted Andrews as the old friend he had been for ten years. Resenting his presence, Laura nodded curtly before slipping away. Morton was beginning to honk the horn on his collegiate ford which still had enough "go" to take them to the town's sole de-luxe movie house. For the twentieth time, that night Andrews again begged Mrs. Groves to marry him. In the past, Mrs. Groves refused since she was determined not to give her child a stepfather. In the last two years, Laura had shown such jealousy that Mrs.

Groves only appeased her by promising that she would never marry. She refused not to see Andrews, her only friend, and the girl felt the justice of that. Laura returned earlier than usual and crept to her room. The mother sensing that something was wrong rushed up to her. Her head buried in a pillow, Laura sobbed that Morton had asked her to marry him. "Why should that make you unhappy?" "Because I don't think I love him but I like him terribly," she answered. When high school graduation day came for Laura, Mrs. Groves was relieved. Her daughter's unhappy and restless state since she had decided it was best to see less of Morton, troubled her. Placing her child's happiness above her own, the mother finally consented to Laura's numerous pleas to go to New York City for college. It meant more scrimping from an already inadequate income, but Mrs. Groves was willing to sacrifice herself. The glitter of Broadway lights was a heady wine to the unsophisticated Laura. A suave, worldly, man like Joseph Rockland found it simple to impress her when they met at a sorority dance. Dances, theaters, nightclubs —to all these Rockland introduced her, playing upon her naive emotions so skillfully that she was soon infatuated. The hour of rude awakening came when she received a notice flunking her out of college. Needing sympathy, she phoned Rockland who persuaded him to come to his apartment. "You won't mind having a wife without a degree," she teased. Nervously, Rockland glanced at her. There was a tense moment in which neither heard the door open. A woman confronted them. So Laura learned that her lover was already married. Sick at heart, she crawled blindly to her dormitory room, only to find a telegram that her mother was critically ill. . . . At the bedside during the weary hours before it was known whether her mother would live, Laura had time to realize all that her mother had meant and done for her. In the comforting arms of Morton, Laura prayed for another chance. As soon as her mother improved, Laura confessed and begged forgiveness. The love that continued to shine in her mother's eyes assured her. . . .

DREAM LOVER

Lois Shaw Brooks Drama File No. 11515

AS Joan Evans was dressing for the Glenwood dance, a shot came from her father's library. She rushed downstairs to find her father dead from a self inflicted bullet wound. Near him was a letter which explained that Evans had embezzled a huge sum from his bank and was facing arrest the next day. It was the chauffeur, Jack, who tenderly bore the girl to her room when she swooned. Even at such a moment it had been inoredibly sweet for him to hold the girl he had adored for several weeks in his arms. Watching him with jealous eyes, her maid, Sue, of Spanish extract and firey temper did not fail to notice this. Sue had high hopes of marrying Jack, and without realizing the cause, heretofore, had noticed that her lover was growing more distant. Late that night after the police and physician had left, Joan wandered alone through the gardens. She was the last Evans and though she was not afraid of poverty or work, she felt bitterly lonely. At 20, she had refused to take any of her suitors seriously, secretly measuring them by the man of her dreams whom she knew some day she would find in reality. From the garden shadows, Jack stepped out, and offered his sympathy. He yielded to impulse and begged her to draw on his small savings which she refused. For the first time Joan really saw him as a man and under her emotional strain, suddenly saw him as her dream lover. Instinctively, they swayed to each other and for a moment he held her in a long embrace. Like a girl in a dream, Joan woke and ran to the house . . . Jack determined to fit himself to a place where he could rightfully ask Joan to marry him. After the estate was settled and the servants were discharged, Sue wanted him to marry her at once. When Jack confessed that he had no intention of marrying Sue, the maid swore vengeance on any girl who took her place with him. Joan decided to become a nurse. Three years later she was one of the most successful nurses in the operating room and was offered a position in one of the leading New York hospitals which she decided to accept. Dr. Shannon, young, brilliant surgeon, who during the last year had acquired fame for several spectacular hrain operations received a shock when he saw Joan in the operating room. Although she did not recognize him, he was the former chauffeur. His brusque treatment of the girl he still loved made Joan decide that she hated him. The case was a difficult one and Shannon asked Joan to nurse him. One night he succeeded, by a ruse, in securing a date with her but it was a partial failure since he was too shy to confess his identity. Unknown to both, Sue all these years had been following Jack and secured a position in the same hospital as maid. When she saw them together, Sue felt it would be a greater revenge if she poisoned their patient. Luckily, Joan saw her emptying some medicine into the usual dose and held the other girl by force until help arrived. When the police came, Joan recognized her as Sue, her old maid. Jack, who had been much upset, at last told her what he had been in her old home. He had taken the position, quitting in the middle of his medical studies in a fit of anger with his family. Love for Joan had made him resume his career. Looking deeply into his adoring eyes, Joan knew that again she had found her dream lover.

SECOND CHANCE

P. H. Keller Drama File No. 11511

"YES, sir, it certainly is a beautiful ranch," Jeb decided for the thousandth time as he sat under the comforting shade of the apple tree and watched his flock of chickens strutting about. But his contentment was quickly shattered at the sound of his wife's impatient, shrill voice. Martha hated the ranch, she insistently declared, and persisted in nagging Jeb. Long ago, he had decided that nothing would satisfy her. Today, she complained that there was not enough income, although he pointed out that his extra work had brought in enough to cover their expenses and leave a small sum aside in the bank. There was no use in arguing with such a woman, however. Although Jeb tried to answer her softly and lightly, it infuriated her more each time. Inwardly Jeb grew desperate at the thought of spending another fifteen years or thirty years with Martha for he was only forty. The next day, he was varnishing the kitchen with a borrowed brush. Martha entered and accused him of extravagance in spending a quarter for a brush. Although in itself it was a trivial thing, to Jeb it was a culmination of many similar scenes. Sick at heart, Jeb retired to his room and took out his revolver. As he was holding it in his hand and depicting the blessed peace to come, his eyes strayed to a suitcase. . . Three hours later he was traveling down the road, not sure of his destination but rejoicing in freedom. In Jeb's pockets, was the worldly wealth of eleven dollars for he had assigned everything else in a note to his furious wife. Jeb accepted several hitches. One motorist announced that his destination was Pasadena, California. Jeb chuckled. He would share expenses with the driver and make a visit to Johnathon, a brother whom he had not seen in years. Once there, the hospitable brother and wife begged him to stay and help them with the tourist and summer hotel. Soon after, Lydia, a professional nurse, moved in. At once Jeb knew that he had no intention of leaving so long as she remained. Watching her fresh young loveliness, Jeb reminded himself that he was a fool. For the first time, forty seemed old, and he could not believe that Lydia could ever return his interest. Fortune smiled when Beth and Doris, two charming, inquisitive girls, won his heart and also that of Lydia. They insisted on the presence of both. One beautiful summer night, Lydia teased the children, declaring that Jeb was her sweetheart, but Beth, nearing tears, claimed him for herself. Jeb said nothing but felt himself blushing furiously. They stayed out in the fragrant air after the children had gone to bed. Once Jeb felt her arm brushing invitingly, but dismissed it as too sweet a fancy. Just then he heard a voice which he could not fail to recognize. Martha stood before him accusingly. "So, this is why you left me, you old fool," she declared. As Lydia looked at Jeb questioning, he mumbled, "My wife." He did not see Lydia stumble into the house. Jeb spent a sleepless night but was resolved not to submit to his wife. Again he must run away! When dawn came, Jeb and his faithful suitcase stole stealthily from the house. A few yards away he began to break into a run and suddenly stumbled against—Lydia, also with a suitcase. He did not dare believe what this so obviously meant and said, "Lydia, my dear, I love you so, that I couldn't remain without you, but I'm much too old." Tenderly, she caressed his cheek and answered, "Not too late for a second chance!"

RAINBOW WEBS

Jennie Myrlea Engle Drama File No. 11514

WALKING through the general office with her customary Monday morning briskness, Lelia Morris, was conscious of the admiring glances of the stenographers as she entered the inner sanctum of the room that bore her name. The letters piled on her desk and the secretary who entered shortly were all tangible evidence of the success that had come to her through years of struggle. She smiled at the photograph of Neil, her husband, and the ever present fresh violets which he had ordered since the day he won his first important law suit. Today, roses had been added for Neil had remembered that this was the anniversary date of her first important promotion. Her thoughts drifted while the present faded into the past. . . . They had married when Lelia was assistant to the designer in the garment factory and Neil was a struggling beginner. Together their first year they had dreamed of a time when economic security would enable them to have children. Often Neil persuaded her to walk with him along the North Shore, Chicago's most exclusive resident district, where he dreamed aloud the home they would someday build there. When the designer left, Lelia persuaded her employers to give her a trial as cutter and designer. She originated several new departments including draperies in her accomplishments and then branching out into interior decorating. Among the fashionable social set, her popularity grew so that no home was "done" unless Lelia had supervised it. During those years when work made increasing demands upon her time, Neil made no protests but rejoiced in her attainments. . . "Mrs. Wilson is calling about the draperies," interrupted the secretary who abruptly jerked Lelia back to her immediate tasks. When she returned that evening, Neil could scarcely wait for her to take her coat before he jubilantly announced that as a surprise, he had purchased a building lot. With a flash of temper she responded, "And I suppose you expect me to retire and raise a family." Hurt, Neil pointed out that there were many outstanding women who had combined motherhood and a career. Offhand, he could name a dozen. "Don't bother, I've heard them often enough," she answered, "You can go there alone if you insist." She swept aside his arguments that they were growing older and could renew their youth in their children. So bitterly did they quarrel before the evening was over, that Neil moved to his club. Refusing to admit how much she missed him, Lelia increasingly threw herself into her work during the ensuing weeks. Together with members of her old firm, she organized a mill which wove material from her creative designs. But she was tired, unlike her normal self. She woke from a horrible dream of rainbow webs which were strangling her, one Sunday afternoon, and glancing out the window she saw spider webs on the tree twigs tapping on her window. Suddenly she comprehended that she had been strangling herself with business—shutting off all personal life and love. She fainted. During the critical days of illness, Neil returned and promised never again to speak of children. After a second blooming of love during the winter, they took a trip to Europe in the spring where Lelia found new ideas for the Chicago factory. When they returned, Lelia asked if Neil still owned the lot. When he shamefully said, "yes," she confessed she was to become a mother. Many years later a guest at their North Shore home admiring the three children the mother proudly introduced asked Lelia how she managed to keep so young and handle a home and a large business. Meeting her blushing husband's eyes, she casually answered, "It's easy. I could name a dozen. There's Louise Homer—"

DOUBLE ADONIS

John M. Wagner Drama File No. 11567

ON the football field, King and Bruce appear midgets in comparison with the western players, but their fast, alert plays impress the varsity coach who invites them to try out for his squad in their sophomore year. Easterners, the two boys have been chums since childhood and though they come from wealthy families they avoid the "fast" college set. Preferring to live off the University grounds, the boys rent rooms on the Jarrett ranch. The childless couple welcomes their presence along with a host of friends of both sexes. When they report to college for the second year, both show the excellent effects of a summer spent on hard work on the ranch. By their junior year, the boys who are leading players on the varsity team are besieged by girls but they show no indication of "falling." They apply for lifeguards in the summer at Paradise Beach, which is patronized by a large college crowd. King and Bruce are easily the best looking men on the beach with the added attractions of intelligence and prominent football records. Growing annoyed at the increasing number of "drownings," King declares that he never wants to see another girl. But he changes his mind quickly when he meets Diana Manners, who invites him to a party. She promises to get her friend, Gloria Stewart, for Bruce. Seeing the attractive partner chosen for him, Bruce decides this is one blind date he is going to enjoy thoroughly. The evening's pleasantness is marred when Elliott, an acquaintance of Gloria's, tries to kiss her while dancing as he is intoxicated. When Gloria objects and he persists, Bruce knocks him out. Later he learns that Elliott is on the California boxing team and receives a challenge to meet him during the college season. The girls are persuaded to attend the same university and make a constant quartet to the envy of Molly and Lola, two girls who have been angling for the attention of the "Double Adonis," a nickname which sportswriters attach. After only a few weeks training, Bruce meets and successfully defeats Elliott who demands a return match. Bruce agrees to meet him in a bout for charity at the close of the football season which Bruce captains. The parents of both boys come down for the championship state match against California, and approve highly of Gloria and Diana. When Bruce leads the team to victory in a series of brilliant plays, the public becomes widely interested in attending the "grudge" boxing match. More than 20 thousand people mill about the large indoor stadium where the bout is held during mid-semester vacation. At the close of seven furious rounds, Elliott loses for the second time. Though he pretends to bury his resentment, Elliot schemes for revenge. Meeting Molly and Lola at a dance, he discovers that they will align themselves with him. Determined to break up Bruce and King's friendship, Elliott learns that Gloria is meeting King secretly. Unaware that their movements are shadowed, the two are dining together in a secluded road restaurant when Bruce, forewarned by Elliott, enters. Angrily, he requests his fraternity pin back and stalks out. When King returns to their joint room where he hopes to explain now that Bruce has had time to cool, he finds his chum's things are already removed. The campus is shortly aware that their two most prominent leaders are apart. On the night of his birthday, Bruce enters his study to find Diana waiting. He forbids her to mention Gloria's name but she insists that he read a note she discovered in Lola's room. Signed by Elliott, it discloses that he "faked" an appointment and that the only time King and Gloria had previously met was to discuss a surprise birthday gift. . . Again, the campus sees the quartet together, this time with a diamond engagement ring on Gloria's hand. And King and Diana plan to follow suit shortly.

THE NEW ORDER

Will Stanley Drama File No. 11569

THE church was thronged for the first appearance of the new Children's Choir. Their childish voices soared sweetly near the altar which for twenty years had known only the music of a choir consisting mainly of men and women in their late thirties. When the service was ended, Miss Matilda Bangor, a leader in the main choir, rushed first to congratulate the new organist, John Porter, who had organized the new group with such outstanding success. A few members gazed significantly at each other. It was well known that for years Miss Bangor had been hopefully seeking to change her name to "Mrs.—." In the midst of Matilda's congratulations, she was chagrined to find that he had turned to nineteen years old Alice May who had all the loveliness of youth which found an answering response to the organist. After several unsuccessful attempts to win back his attention, Matilda slipped away. Walking home with Alice, John promised to sponsor a young people's choir which would alternate with the others at Sunday services. Within a few months, scores of young people who had paid little attention to the church began to attend having been drawn in through the infectious personality of the organist. None was surprised when Alice and John announced their engagement but Matilda was determined to break it.

Forced by the depression to cut expenses, the administration board voted to place John in charge of all the music activities and discontinue their small payments to the choir. The old members were furious and Matilda cleverly persuaded them to engineer the church into cutting John's salary in half. Playing on their vanity, Matilda told those who had for years sung in the choir that John was planning to completely supplant them with girls and boys in their teens. Originally, she had considered getting John's reputation discredited. Mack Dudley who had been rejected by Alice attempted to get John drunk at a roadhouse one night. All preparations were made to "frame" him with one of the dancers. While consenting good naturedly to go with him, John spoiled the plans by refusing to touch liquor. After several weeks of clever propaganda, Matilda's cohorts won the measure reducing the music director's salary by one vote. As Matilda had foreseen, John was unable to meet expenses with his low income. The couple were forced to postpone their marriage and John resigned. Under Mr. Simmons, the new music leader, the children and the young people's group began to lose membership rapidly. They resented and openly rebelled the absence of their friend. When Matilda read that Prohibition repeal had finally passed she thought nothing of it. But many parents were concerned in the months that followed and their dancing daughters and sons spent their former choir practice nights in beer gardens and the large numbers of 1934 version of the old fashioned saloon which have sprung up rapidly. Unknown to Matilda and her group, the directors called a meeting in which Mr. Randall passionately showed that the church's failure to provide interest for its young people was driving them away. He persuaded the wealthier members to contribute from their own pockets a sum large enough to re-hire John. Only Matilda glared at the shining, happy face of Alice, once more conspicuously wearing her diamond ring.

THE VEIL OF PREJUDICE

Lillian Brickner Drama File No. 11570

FROM earliest childhood Flora Gordon, the sweet and lovable daughter of Kenneth Gordon, prosperous florist, was brought up to revere the Christian religion. Sacrificing herself for her deeply religious invalid mother, Flora acquired a great love for the spiritual life as evidenced by the forms and color of the Christian ritual. One day as she returned from a walk in the beautiful garden of her Lakewood home, she was to discover her mother dead. In her sorrow she and her father were to be brought closer together than ever, but soon, grief for his departed wife ended the life of the old man, and he too passed away, leaving Flora heiress to his estate.

A few weeks later, while gathering flowers in her garden, Flora received a call from Paul Rudolph, representative of the Insurance Company handling her father's estate. Paul, a handsome young bachelor was a proud young Jew, brought up to eschew Christ and the teachings of the Christian religion. His mother, Mrs. David Rudolph, a wealthy society matron, prided herself on her standing in Jewish philanthropic circles, and her every effort was bent toward marrying her son to one of the distinguished young girls in their circle. However, from the moment Paul was to see Flora, arms laden with freshly cut flowers, coming toward him, his heart was to leap with a profound and passionate love for this girl. Throughout their conversation, both sought to restrain the love that filled their souls and shaken, Paul was to leave, struggling with all his being to forget this gentile girl. Flora's agitation was immediately noticed by her uncle Seth, a retired minister who had come to live with her after the death of her parents but when at length she revealed its cause, Seth rose majestically and informed her if she married a Jew she would be denying her faith in Christ.

Torn by the struggle against Flora, Paul confided in his mother, telling her of his sincere love for Flora. Enraged, she threatened to disown him, adding that should he marry this girl, she would mourn her son as though he were dead. Meanwhile Flora, unable to sleep walked alone in her garden, turning to God in prayer. "God of us all," she murmurs, then as she repeats those words the conviction comes over her that there is but one God, and his love binds all mankind together. In His eyes there are no distinctions between gentile and jew, but all are alike his children.

Paul, unable to win the sympathy of his mother to whom he is deeply devoted, realizes that a true love is willing to make sacrifices. Coming home late from his office, that night, he passes Flora in her garden and hears her pray to the God of us all. He too sees the light. Forgetting all creed prejudices, he rushes in and takes her into his arms. Home, wealth, friends, mother, all are as nothing to him beside their love. So at length they are married. Paul's mother, lonely and grief stricken pities herself but at last the full extent of Paul's sacrifice for the girl he loves is revealed to her. Swallowing her scruples, she visits Flora's uncle Seth and discloses to him that the burden of easing the lives of the two lovers rests upon them. And before the understanding of these once bigoted people, race barriers drop. Race barriers gradually dissolve in the community and the returning Paul and Flora carry on the work of promoting a widespread tolerance and good fellowship between all creeds and nationalities.

BONDAGE

Rosa Poyer Drama File No. 11577

"YOU have no right to marry a fifteen year old girl to a man more than twice her age simply because he is wealthy," stormed Kate, Ena's aunt. "What right have you to talk, you would have been better off doing likewise, rather—" replied Ena's father, Harry Bowman, glancing significantly at Kate's two year old illigitimate child playing unconcernedly in a corner of the room. Kate flushed and was silent, recalling the unfortunate love affair with the nephew of Ena's godmother. Perhaps, she thought drearily, they were right and love meant nothing. Resentful of semi-poverty her father's shiftlessness reduced them to, and tired of the social restraints placed upon her, Ena had finally succumbed to family pressure and permitted the engagement to be announced. On the day of Ena's wedding, Kate slipped away to her own marriage with Jim, an old school friend who had moved to a distant city and eagerly forgave her past. Ena's dream of freedom was quickly stifled by George who jealously watched her and during the next four years she was further tied by the birth of Beth and Junior. But her Aunt Kate was not content to lead the humdrum life of a housewife for a man whom she liked but could not love. Craving pretty clothes their income would not permit, Kate secured a hotel position where she met Ramon, a waiter who was studying evenings to pass the bar. A few weeks later she came to her husband and confessed her love for another. During the first months of her new marriage, Kate lived in constant dread that Ramon would learn of her past. The march of time went swiftly opening to Ramon a promising legal career, the only flaw in their home being the absence of children. She anticipated with mingled pleasure and anxiety a letter from Ena announcing that she was coming on a visit with the children. After their first embrace at the station Ena promised to keep Kate's past secret. Noticing that Ena seemed distraught, the aunt sent Ramon out with the children and under Kate's sympathetic inquiries, Ena confessed that she had just learned her husband was still tied by a previous marriage. He had begged her to wait for him until the legal entanglements were straightened but Ena was unsure of herself. There was only a few years age difference between Ramon and Ena and under his evident admiration the younger woman bloomed for it was the first time she had experienced this. Then came the night that Kate suffering from a headache sent them alone to the dance. The romantic strains of the music, the rich moonlight outside went to their heads like wine. Impulsively their lips met and clung, Ramon, driving home two hours later, begged her to elope with him. Ena remembering all her loveless years wondered if she had not a right to happiness but then she thought of her children and Kate and courage fled. Finally, she succumbed to his hungry pleas to leave the city with him at once. Planning to stop at the house long enough to secretly pack a few things they were amazed to see a physician's car turning out of their driveway. Alarmed, they ran into the house. While Ramon rushed upstairs, Ena paused to open a telegram which announced her "husband" was free to marry her again. Slowly, she dragged herself up the stairs. "It's nothing," Kate called happily. "Only at last we are going to have a child." Expressing deep happiness for them, Ena, carefully avoiding Roman's eyes announced that she was returning to George. In the midst of her pain, she was overwhelmingly thankful that Kate would never know.

GARDEN OF MEMORIES

La Von Blackmer Sharpe Drama File No. 11617

FROM all ages, groups and classes, men and women volunteered their time and services, even their lives when the United States entered the World War. In a large southern steel company, Elaine Jacobs listened to her employer, Arnold Bethea, president, confer with a government official concerning an extensive munition contract. After his departure, Bethea turned to his secretary and announced they would move their office to a companion plant in Anniston, Alabama, where he would depend a great deal on Elaine despite her youth during his necessary absence. The months passed swiftly for Elaine absorbed in the demands of her manifold duties. The little town was alive with further activity as the training camp for the 29th Division, "The Blue and the Gray," its 40,000 khaki-clad soldiers consisting of half nothern and half southern boys had met in the heart of the South, the Civil War forgotten in the need of present unity. The strain of six months told on the girl. Yielding to the desire to be alone, she slipped away for a walk, chancing to stumble upon the ruins of an old estate whose garden was in bloom, a profuse, enchanting, wild fragrance hovering over. Home she was met by her roommate who excitedly informed her that an old friend, Lieutenant Bert Whitmore, had been stationed at Camp McLelland and would visit them that evening. Silently but strongly, Whitmore and Elaine were drawn together and in the weeks that followed, friendship blossomed into love. The day he took her to inspect the camp filled Elaine with horror. She shuddered at the thought of Bert's leaving for France perhaps to meet death. Often they visited the garden together, dreaming of the future when the war was over and they could be together always. The day for Final Review came, only a few more days and the regiment would sail. Hearing the strains of martial music, Elaine answered the Call; it was her bit, she would send Bert to France happy, as her husband. They had 24 hours to themselves then husband and wife were parted. Back in the office Elaine struggled to be brave while Bethea who had always silently loved her watched with concern. A telegram came several weeks later announcing Whitmore had been seriously wounded. She fainted and Bethea alone rushed her to a nearby hospital where Elaine was to learn she was to have a child. She faced motherhood bravely during the anxious months but on the eve of the birth of her son, final word from the War Department told her Bert had answered the sound of Taps. It was Bethea who later established a home for mother and son. During the long months which followed though she could never forget Bert, Elaine knew he would want her to face the future bravely. On her twenty-first birthday Bethea begged her to marry him. Conscious of his patient goodness, Elaine wandered alone to the garden there to keep rendezvous with old memories. Here she felt strangely at peace. . . . Bert, her lover, her fallen hero, her young husband, would understand.

MADAM CINDERELLA

Lorraine Tyler Drama File No. 11642

THROWING herself into the arms of her stepfather awaiting her at the railroad station, Joan was oblivious for the moment of the attractive young man beside him, Rolf Holmes, assistant director of the Stuart Theatrical Circuit. For years, Joan had been a trapeze artist until Stuart insisted on sending her away to boarding school. That evening, Joan persuades Rolf to escort her to one of the performances where she can view her successor, Ruth Crawford. With obvious admiration for the latter's daring and skill, Rolf introduces the two women. Sensing a rival, Ruth affectionately caresses Rolf with a revealing air of past intimacy which embarrasses him in Joan's presence. During the following days, Joan to her dismay realizes that she is falling in love with Rolf. A disparaging remark about "amateur" performers Ruth deliberately makes in her presence, cuts Joan deeply. Despite her lack of practice, Joan who has free run of the stage, announces a surprise performance by herself. For a moment staring into space from the high trapeze, Joan is afraid but the scornful eyes of Ruth and the concerned face of Rolf spur her to success. Rolf follows her to the dressing room when the plaudits have died down and in the reaction from his acute concern confesses his love. Married soon after, the couple have several months of happiness together before Rolf is needed in a neighboring city to supervise a unit. Since he plans to be away only a week, Joan remain behind. When Joan learns that she is to bear a child, she is too joyful to await her husband's return. Meanwhile Ruth, still in love with Rolf, skilfully plays on his old affection, although Rolf persists on maintaining the relationship solely on the basis of friendship. As the two are talking in the dressing room, Ruth sees Joan approaching and quickly throws her arms about the surprised Rolf. Confronted a moment later by his indignant wife, Rolf protests his innocence only to be disbelieved. Returning to their home just long enough to pack, Joan takes a boat to California wishing to put miles between her faithless husband and herself, revealing in a note left for him that she is to become a mother. Her one friend on the ship is Raymond Brandt who helps rescue her when the ship crashes into another in the fog and the passengers are forced to seek safety in small boats. Losing consciousness, Joan wakes to find herself in a hospital where she is kept for several months until her child is born. Her resources are low and she seeks work but her injuries though they leave her beauty unmarred will not permit her to return to her old profession but she has a pleasant singing voice which wins her a position on the stage. When her son is five she sends him to military school. Meanwhile, Rolf has been forced to marry Ruth, for Joan has been listed among the passengers who were drowned. Joan, now known by her self-chosen name, Madam Cinderella, receives an offer to join the Stuart circuit which is too excellent to be rejected. Trembling, she awaits her introduction to Rolf after her first showing though the years have considerably changed her.

While waiting, she is shocked to learn that Rolf is suing his present wife for divorce having discovered her in a compromising situation with another member of the company. Seeing her, Rolf is overcome with emotions which he attempts to hide, finally confessing that she strongly recalls the only woman he loved, Joan. Yielding to her sympathetic presence, Rolf tells the story of Ruth's pursuit which cost him his bride. Unable to bear it any longer or hide the love which has never died, Madam Cinderella asks him to look at her once more. His eyes open in disbelief and then under her encouraging smile with growing wonder—Joan! The thirst of years is in their rapt kiss.

MASTERMIND

Otto C. F. Leddin Melodrama File No. 11774

PROUDLY watching his daughter, Adelaide La Deon, former senator Othar La Deon wagers that she will carry off many of the prizes at the Annual Horse Show, in progress that night at the Fair Ground. Count and Lady Rollo De Soto, Baron and Lady Martenzo, General Boris Bohnar, Governor Leo St. Clair, Lieutenant Earl Roberts, Lieutenant N. Dobson, Admiral Tracy Armstrong and Prince A. La Bendo, all on their favorite mounts agree, while Major Willard Rowano rides over to wish the girl good luck. With consummate skill, Adelaide and Rowano guide their horses over the difficult hurdles, each winning many prizes. Several of the former senator's friends are also awarded; at the conclusion of the colorful event he invites them all to an informal dinner in honor of their respective viotories.

Meanwhile Judge Jasper Roscoe, reading of the event in the paper, plans to kidnap Adelaide. He instructs Lieutenant Dobson, who is a friend of the La Deon family, to plan a picnic, suggest a ride alone with the girl in order that his men, Gero Fulido and Monte Rollus may seize her. The following week end La Deon gives a brilliant party to celebrate the twentieth birthday of his daughter. At Dobson's suggestion the picnic is held. Adelaide, who is much interested in carrier pigeons, takes one of them with her, not telling the others as they have teased her about this hobby . After luncheon she rides away with Dobson while Rowano stops to examine a grotto. Two men ride up, bind and chloroform Dobson and seize Adelaide, covering her with a duster, and threatening her. Rowano, hearing her screams, takes the license number of the car, but cannot overtake the kidnappers. At Judge Roscoe's garage the group changes to another car, then drive swiftly to a large, deserted country house where Adelaide is turned over to the care of Granny, Roscoe's accomplice. After her dinner is brought to her. Adelaide writes a note to her father, giving her location as best she can, and sends the message, on a paper napkin by means of her carrier pigeon. The next morning Judge Roscoe, heavily masked prepares a note demanding two hundred and fifty thousand dollars ransom money which Adelaide signs.

Governor St. Clair orders state troopers and police to spare no effort in searching for the heiress; Rowano discovers that a man by the name of Britt rented the car, for the purpose of transporting a salesman, according to his story. His suspicions are aroused when he discovers that the garage from which the car was rented is owned by the questionable Judge Roscoe. In the garden, Rowano intercepts the message from the pigeon; as he is presentnig it to La Deon he sees Hilda, the maid, slip a note under the door which instructs Adelaide's father to advertise in the paper if he intends to comply with instructions. Both men hasten to St. Claire, who advises that they answer the advertisement while he investigates all suspects and studies the territory by airplane. A second note threatens harm to Adelaide if investigation is not called off.

Suddenly, at the breakfast table, Dobson confesses, saying that Judge Roscoe had the power to send him to prison. He drugs the victims with prepared whiskey, reveals their identity, and they are captured. Adelaide, restored to her father, consents to allow Rowano to take care of her from now on, while Dobson is given enough money to leave the country as his reward.

WHITE BEAVER

Ruth Cunard Mueller Drama File No. 11705

TO Jacques, who brushed his velvet coat and burnished his tall boots, St. Cyr was the grandest gentleman in the world. There was still in his manner the hauteur of one who, in white and gold had guarded Louis the IV. Now in Quebec, St. Cyr was aide to the Intendant. St. Cyr heard now his orders to trace the disturbing story that Jean was wood ranging. Sickened he turned away. For a Frenchman to live with an Indian wife was a crime punishable by death, and Jean was the brother of St. Cyr's fiancee, the most charming girl in New France.

As he stepped out into the sunshine, St. Cyr turned at a light tap on the shoulder. Levien, the trader, informed him that he wished to dance with the beautiful Yvonne to-night. In cold fury St. Cyr turned on the man, who held his ground and spoke steadily. "I—Levien—carry a message to the lovely lady from her brother—Jean."

Beneath crystal chandeliers that reflected the myriad lights of a thousand candles, St. Cyr danced the minuet with Yvonne. Later, as she shivered slightly, St. Cyr hastened to get her cloak. He knew though he handled it lightly that the magnificent white beavers were worth their weight in gold. As he drew the glorious garment about his love, their lips met. Suddenly Levien was upon them. "He brings you a message from Jean," St. Cyr said. "Jean—" the word seemed to tear her white throat. Later, white and shaken, Yvonne begged her lover to find Jean and bring him home.

In the soft grey of early morning, St. Cyr moved up the river, the two efficient Hurons guiding the canoe with swift silent strokes. It was night before they reached the trading post. Before the trader's fire, St. Cyr stretched his legs and learned from Celeste, the trader's wife, that Levien obtained all the best skins from the Indians and left only the musty ones for them. It was said that Levien kept an Indian wife, and sold his furs to the English. With set lips St. Cyr continued on his way. In strong contrast to the humble headquarters of the other traders, Levien's buildings were in excellent repair. Inside the luxury of the house amazed St. Cyr. Silver, fine glass and pewter, and priceless fur rugs. They sat long over their supper. Levien, tongue loosened by the excellent French brandy, became friendly. It embarrassed St. Cyr who hated this business of spying. Once St. Cyr fancied he heard the soft tread of mocassined feet, but the rumored beautiful Indian wife of Levien remained out of sight. Later, when Levien was gone, St. Cyr inspected the room again. Under a cleverly fitted trapped door he discovered a subterranean store house. full to overflowing with baled pelts. Later, with Jacques he went into the storehouse and lifting the iron catch on another trap door moved along the concealed passage which led them into the forest. Sick at heart, St. Cyr followed the faint trail until he came upon a low cabin. In the doorway sat an Indian girl with lips red as cherries. Behind her, St. Cyr caught a glimpse of Jean.

He turned abruptly. "Back, Jacques!" And remember, we have seen nothing. It was from the blacksmith, later that day, that St. Cyr learned that Levien was well loved among his men whom he treated with unfailing justice. After supper St. Cyr smoked reflectively before Levien's fire. For the first time then Levien revealed his hopeless love of Yvonne, how in worship of the unattainable aristocrat, he had sheltered her brother, himself bearing the brunt of suspicion. Moreover, in his storerooms, Levien had hundreds of bales of fur which he was to have sold to the English. To-morrow he, himself, would take them to Quebec. St. Cyr extended his hand. Shortly afterwards, the stately bells pealed forth the marriage of St. Cyr and the fair Yvonne. Beside them stood the pale faced Jean. Before his fire that somehow failed to warm him, Levien stared at the priceless white beaver cloak that had come to him to-day, a gift from St. Cyr's bride.

STOLEN PERSIAN JEWELS

Carl E. Skogan Mystery File No. 11640

WHEN the will of the late George Castle, eccentric millionaire is read, it is discovered that he has left his old mansion containing a fortune in jewels to his neice, Rose, on the condition that she lives in it for three weeks. No other residents are to be permitted save a butler and maid. Rose, who has once visited the old man in the horrible old mansion, shudders and cries hysterically that she would rather forfeit the fortune than accept the terms. However, her best friend Fern offers to come with her, acting as maid. Moreover, Fern's fiance, Bob, who works in the same office, agrees to come along for protection, acting as butler. Since Rose needs the money desperately, the three proceed to the castle.

Everywhere there are cobwebs, and mysterious masks upon the wall. The three young people shiver apprehensively, but the thought of Rose's need of the money gives them courage. When, moreover, they take out the splendid Persian jewels, their hearts leap. Giving courage to each other, they proceed to make the mansion livable. When night falls, however, their terrors inorease. The two girls remain together, and Bob guards their room. Under the terms of the will, Rose may not set foot out of the house for the three weeks. Often during the night they are awakened by strange noises, but Bob, ever watchful, flashes on the lights and the sounds subside. While reading through the books, they learn that old George Castle was attended by an unscrupulous lawyer, Petlin, who, in a vain effort to get the eccentric old man's fortune from him, instilled a fear in him that the Castle fortune might be inherited by an insane person. Although George, to the end insisted on leaving his fortune to his niece rather than to the lawyer, he was at last convinced to test the sanity of the girl before turning over his fortune to her. Bob realizes that the noises and strange mysterious hands that appear as the three weeks draw to a close, are probably the efforts of someone who wishes to drive Rose insane. However, despite all the reassurances, the situation begins to get on their nerves. Rose is interviewed by a reporter Kenneth, who spreads her picture on the front pages and comes back day after day for new developments of the story. Bob and Fern who agree to get married at the expiration of the three weeks, realize Rose and Kenneth are falling in love.

The last week approaches. One night the precious jewels are stolen. Kenneth, on the excuse that his paper has sent him, stays close to Rose. During the night Bob, ever alert, sees the flash of an automobile light. Fern begs him not to go, then, leaving Rose to the care of Kenneth, accompanies her lover. After many hair-raising adventures, they track down Petlin and his gang of cut-throats, hired to drive Rose to insanity. Bob and Fern are given their part of the recovered jewels, and when the three weeks are up, leave with Rose and Kenneth to be married far from the scene of their recent terrifying adventures.

BRAZILIAN ESKIMOS

Ted Ingham Animated Cartoon File No. 11555

IT is a tropic night in central Brazil. The heat is stifling. But a little group of eskimos, clothed from top to bottom in heavy furs sit about in silent misery. Some of them chew reminiscently on leopard skin, but the others just lean forlornly on broken harpoons. Meanwhile Minnie weeps.

Many years before there had been a league of tribes called together for the purpose of agreeing to disarmament and peace. Among them the Brazilians under their leaders Red Fox, and B. B. Wolf, had demanded that they be the head of the league. For forty days and forty nights the league had been unable to come to any agreement because of the arguments of the Brazilians. At last, in anger, the Brazilians had departed. But their heads were so turned by their success in keeping the rest of the world from coming to any peace agreement, that by mistake they traveled north instead of south. At length they landed in Eskimo Land and stopped over with Many Seals Hipler, the only chief in the world who declined to come to the peace league. Rogue met rogue. At length the Brazilians departed, but with them they had taken Minnie, the abducted daughter of Many Seals Hilper. Loud was the lament among the eskimos when Minnie's absence was discovered. In their rage and vengefulness, the eskimos determine to pursue the Brazilians. In their flight down North America the enraged eskimos were none to considerate. A howl of complaints marked their journey, but bent on revenge the eskimos continued, meanwhile grinding their battle axes. At last in Brazil they reached their objective. Eskimos clashed with Brazilians. The din was terrific. For two weeks they fought while the rest of the world, hearing the strange noises, for which there were no words in their peace loving languages, feared the world was coming to an end. At length, however, every single Brazilian redskin bit the dust. When the smoke of battle cleared, Many Seals Hipler stamped into the palace of B. B. Wolf, and discovered his daughter Minnie unconoernedly munching chocolates and reading the latest committee report of the league of tribes. Kicking and screaming at being deprived of her comforts, Minnie was returned to her people. However, the rest of the world had met again at the peace conference to determine what was to be done with the erring eskimos. None of the nations had any arms left to properly punish the northerners. At length Uncle Sam rose. Remembering the Monroe Doctrine he felt called upon to do something, yet what? At last the solution was reached. A huge canal was built at Panama just across the border of South America. Accordingly, when the eskimos started their triumphant tour back home, they found their way blocked by the Panama Canal. In disappointment and chagrin they jumped up and down and stamped on the ground, but they were balked. Unhappily they returned to Brazil, and there, to this day, they say there is a tiny tribe of eskimos, shivering with heat in the Brazilian tropics, while Minnie weeps.

Mrs. Charles Lawson Drama File No. 11692

TOO grief stricken to weep, Virginia Lou stares at the locket her dying mother has given her. That locket, which is not to be opened until her eighteenth birthday contains the explanation of their living here in loneliness in the slums. Penniless, friendless, Virginia Lou learns that she is about to be sent to a home for orphaned children. Desperate, she runs away, and faints from cold and hunger on the back steps of a night club. She is taken inside and revived, but Spike, the rough spoken but good natured proprietor has no idea what to do with her. Virginia begs them to let her remain, she can dust and sweep, and Red, the gray haired piano player urges Spike to keep the poor kid on.

Virginia grows up in the night club, kept out of sight and taught by Red to sing and dance. One day Red tells her of his life, shattered by the desertion of his wife. Red had loved her dearly, but she had broken his heart when she ran off with one of the other entertainers. With a sob in his throat, Red teaches Virginia to sing the song his wife had always sang for him. Virginia's fresh young voice is heard through the half opened door and one by one the entertainers come to the door to listen to the bell-like tones. Accordingly when there is a spot open on the program, Spike asks Virginia to fill it. and with Red accompanying her on the piano, Virginia brings down the house with her poignant call of love. At one of the tables a young man Forrest Ames stares intently at Virginia. Later, introduced, Virginia is to meet his party and to learn that he is engaged to Ruby Dennis, granddaughter of Old Man Dennis, richest man in New York. With them is Paul, a young man obviously in love with Ruby. Backstage, Virginia is to find Red holding a grey haired woman close, and with tears in his eyes, Red explains that Virginia's song has brought his wife back to him again.

Again and again the society party comes back. Ruby admires Virginia tremendously and when she expresses her interest about back stage life, Virginia offers to take her on a tour of the dressing rooms. Alone with Virginia, Ruby confesses that her grandfather is forcing her to marry Forrest, but that she loves Paul. However, on her eighteenth birthday when, at last, Virginia can open the locket and learn the true secret of her birth, she is to gasp and Spike, coming up is to be greatly concerned over her. Forrest, who has with difficuty maintained his reserve out of respect to his fiancee, breaks down one evening when he is dancing with Virginia, and the confession that he loves the night club girl is wrung from him. Meanwhile Old Man Dennis, immune to reasoning, continues his plans to announce the engagement of Ruby to Forrest. Virginia consents to come to the dinner as an entertainer, but rises and while Dennis shouts hoarsely that she is to be thrown out, exposes the old man as a meddlesome selfish old man who was trying to ruin the lives of these two young people as he had ruined her own mother's life years ago. Virginia is Dennis' own granddaughter, the victim of Dennis' interference when her mother tried to marry the man of her choice. Moreover, to cap the proceedings. Virginia reveals that Ruby is the bride of a week of Paul Martain, and that Forrest Ames has, at the same time married her. Dennis sputters ineffectually. Virginia offers to release Forrest, but holding her tighter in his arms Forrest answers, "Only if you don't love me." The answer in Virginia's soft eyes is enough.

THE OREGON TRAIL

Alice M. Hammer Drama File No. 11464

THE desire for work and the adventurous blood of their ancestors drove them on to seek new unexplored land in the late 1890's. Reminiscent of an earlier covered wagon era, was this group of nine families with their teams and wagons together with a large herd of horses which they intended to sell at a favorable market. In one of the foremost wagons was Nancy Dorset, who had worn the proud title of "Mrs." for a little over a year, and with her was her sister 'Lizbeth. Dorset was foreman of the cowboy group which was hired by Roy Daniels. Driving over the mountains, the two women caught sight of a donkey engine which was letting down logs from a mountainside. A cable snapped and from the distance they could see the car plunging with its human cargo. Nancy fainted from shock. She became horribly ill. The caravan was camped at the end of a meadow along the Oregon trail. That night Mack, Jr. was born. Daniels had agreed to hold the caravan over. When he visited the wagon the next day, to congratulate the proud parents, he had whispered to 'Lisbeth that he was doing it mainly for her. The girl knew that Daniels was falling in love with her. All along the way, he had paid much attention but the girl was unsure of her own feelings. Six days later, the caravans resumed their travels, along miles of America's most beautiful country.

Occasionally, the wagons stopped at farms and offered their services for hire. Eventually they passed through the Mormon centers in Utah and were following the river, when a small Indian band stopped them and offered to barter. 'Lisbeth was watching them curiously when an Indian pointed her out to the others. They asked her astonished brother-in-law to give them her in trade. While he was angrily refusing, one of the Indians crept over to the girl who hadn't caught the significance of the conversation. Before she could even scream, the Indian was knocked from the wagon by one of the other wagon men, Lou Hennas. She admired him from a distance but the two had never spoken together before. After he had driven off the man, Hennas urged the wagons to make haste for the Indians were in a bad temper and had an eye on the horses. Already the band had left with two. In the night, the watchful men heard the Indian whoop in the darkness and aroused the rest of the sleeping group. It was a wild night and 'Lisbeth was frightened as the horses plunged on. She was amazed and pleased to find Hennas at her side. By a fortunate mistake the wagons made a wrong turn which changed their destination and brought them to a fort and safety. Daniels rode over and jealously ordered Hennas back to his work. The next day they were approaching the state line when the horses were to be inspected. To escape having them all quarantined, Daniels secretly took a favorite though infected horse of Hennas and shot it. When Hennas accused him, he denied it and the two men quarreled finally engaging in a fist battle without witnesses. After one blow Daniels dropped to the ground stunned. Convinced that he had killed him Hennas' impulse was to flee. Unexpectedly, he encountred 'Lisbeth and confessed both his crime and love. Hennas was unaware that Daniels had recovered a moment later and had followed him. Although he was a hard man, his love for 'Lisbeth was honestly unselfish. Daniels stepped out before the startled couple, explained, congratulated and apologized all in one breath. Under her sparking eyes, the men shook hands. . . Never before had there been so perfect a night for lovers.

HOMESTEAD

H. E. Jacobs Drama File No. 11637

AMIDST the scattered sheds that had once been houses for discouraged home steaders in Central Oregon, Flax Hendow's property was rapidly gaining a spruce like appearance. Like his pioneer forefathers, Hendow had sought new lands a few weeks ago when his carpentry trade in Washington slowed. Although many had come to this territory, the lack of nearby water afforded a serious problem. Not afraid of work, Hendow had bought up an old claim on land about a mile away from a sheep camp where water could be hauled from in barrels. Soon he brought his wife and his daughter, Marcia. It was not long before economic conditions drove many others to the land and while waiting for his crops, Hendow added to his income by doing carpentry work. While working for Dennis, a neighbor, who lived by himself twelves miles away, Hendow was persuaded to invite Dennis to supper. Dennis had glimpsed his daughter one day and in a territory where women were comparatively few determined to know her better. During the evening while Dennis' approval grew, Marcia felt only indifferent. She protested against his assisting her with the dish washing but Dennis, perceiving an opportunity to be alone with her, insisted. Clumsily, he sought to brush her arm as if by accident but the warning flash in her eyes abashed him. Quickly Dennis apologized though he perceived her ill-concealed shudder. The next afternoon, Marcia rode a few miles without heeding her direction when she was startled to see another horse approaching and the Indian, Long John, from the near reservation pull the animal directly in her path. Before she could scream with fright, the hoofs of another animal could be heard and within a few moments, Randal had joined them and menacingly driven the Indian off. Introducing himself as a cattle man from the surrounding creek bottoms where the ranches were established affording plenty of water for the stock, Randal insisted on accompanying her home. He told her that the Indian was probably drunk for though the sale of intoxicating spirits to them was forbidden, someone was reaping a harvest through illicit traffic. In the days that followed, Dennis noted with growing concern and anger that Randal was a far more successful rival. Not only was Dennis interested in wedding Marcia but he also wanted the Hendow homestead for his real income came from liquor sales and the Hendow place was better situated for his purposes. The night that the engagement of Marcia and Randal was announced found Dennis in dispair but not for long. Bribing Long John with several bottles of whiskey, he arranged to have him injure Hendow and throw suspicion on Randal. Hendow was returning to the house when the Indian who despite warnings had fortified himself with several swigs stumbled between the post which served as a gate. Hearing Hendow run towards him, Long John fired and missed. In the struggle which followed, Hendow attained the gun and knocked him momentarily unconscious, before neighbors arrived. Realizing that Hendow could have killed him but did not believe in taking life, Long John revealed the plot. And Dennis was to suffer the humiliation of being dragged to justice by his rival.

MISFIT

Marie T. Kleine Comedy Drama File No. 11626

NERVOUSLY, Mike Flanigan paced up and down, now and then casting an anxious glance at the maternity ward. With five girls already in the family, Mike was relying heavily on a son at last appearing on the scene. He had gone through a similar time a year earlier only to be presented with another daughter despite the family physician's hopeful predictions. The door opened and Mike rushed over to the nurse who ignoring him walked over to another anxious parent-to-be. Finally his doctor emerged. "O.K. Flanigan," he shoutcd. "It's a boy!" As soon as the hospital permitted, Mike tiptoed into the room, "Well, its a royal highness in our family at last, Rose," he said joyfully. "Yes, if he doesn't turn out to be a misfit like his father who never gets anything right." The nurse's return brought an end to the angry retorts and the parents turned to the more serious business of naming the child. "Michael Patrick," suggested Flanigan. "No, old fashioned names for him. It's to be Roland or no christening," said his wife. They compromised on Roland Michael. At the christening party two weeks later, Flanigan demonstrated the awkwardness his wife had alluded to when he stumbled over some toys and spilled a tray of filled coffee cups, splashing mainly on his mother-in-law, Mrs. Barnes, who insisted on regarding the accident as deliberate. She proceeded to rake up everything she disliked him for including a reminder of the five hundred dollars she had loaned for the house. Although she had been partly repaid, Flanigan knew that he would never hear the end so he stormed from the house and sought solace in the corner beer tavern, returning when the house was dark. Only after ten minutes furious pounding did his wife admit him and it was nearly dawn before they finished with their grievances, Flanigan blaming his mother-in-law for giving everyone the impression that she had given the money as a gift and there he was working his head off to repay her. "Not much of a head at that," she snapped. During the week, the relations badgered him into sending his family away to the sea-shore for a month. Mike looked forward to peace and quiet, quite confident that he could tend to the house alone. To make sure that he was not gadding about, Rose phoned the first evening waking him from a deep sleep which he found it impossible to resume for the rest of the night. Consequently when the alarm rang, he dozed off again and rushed to work breakfastless and late. Four days of housework, after his job, left him sore and exhausted so he began to let the dishes and pans pile up in the sink. Unfortunately, his mother-in-law chose to visit while he was tending to some burning chops for his dinner and when she attempted to criticize him, he chased her from the house. Saturday night, he held a party of his old bachelor friends which almost wrecked the house and when it was followed by another the next week, tongues got busy. Early one morning, he ordered his winter's coal in and then invited the men still wearing their coal-blacked overalls into the dining room for breakfast. The bell rang and a pretty sales woman begged to demonstrate a steamless cooker. Inviting her into the kitchen he became so absorbed that he did not hear his wife, who planned to surprise him, enter. Refusing to hear any explanation, she chased the girl out of the house and turned upon him. Ten minutes later, Mike crept away and looked at his son, sighing, "I guess this is a woman's world after all!"

REDEMPTION

Elizabeth Ilean Mullings Drama File No. 11635

AMBITIOUS, resourceful, Robert rebels against idling his time on the ranch of his wealthy father. When he informs his family that he is leaving to make a fortune of his own, there is a great quarrel. At length he is told that if he leaves the West, he need never return again. Regretful, yet eager for the adventure that awaits him in the outer world, Robert sets forth.

The whirl and noise of the city dazzle him. However, soon enough he is to find that a willingness to work hard is not enough. Everywhere he applies for work he is refused, and at length, down at the heels, he accepts a humble job in a factory. One day returning from his work, he is attracted by a crowd at the corner. He joins them and his breath catches as he sees a gypsy girl of surpassing loveliness telling fortunes. Suddenly three policemen come up. The crowd scatters leaving the trembling-lipped gypsy girl standing forlornly among her scattered coins. The girl looks wildly about, and on an impulse he cannot restrain, Robert dashes up to her, seizes her by the arm, and draws her into the shelter of an alley. The police look frantically about, and at length, disgruntled maroh off, exclaiming sullenly that the girl must have disappeared into thin air. Robert learns that the pretty girl's name is Santena, but when he asks when he may see her again, he learns that her father, an old gypsy chieftain refuses to let Santena mingle with outsiders since she is a Princess. Overcome with longing for her, Robert follows the gypsy camp and one day discovers that Santena's father is forcing her to marry one of the indolent gypsy lads. He interferes. The chief orders him seized, but Robert escapes, bringing the adoring Santena with him.

Time passes. Unable to find employment, Robert is forced to take Santena with him to a barely furnished attic. As days drag by without employment, Robert begins to despair. He takes to drink and Santena, hurt and discouraged goes back to fortune telling to provide food for them. Elated over the first steak in months, Robert inquires about its source. When he learns how Santena earned it, he gives way to dejection and swears he will get a job next day. However, weeks pass and at last, unable to endure the thought that he is living on the money Santena makes, Robert breaks off with Santena telling her he will no longer be a burden to her. Santena tries to dissuade him from his flight, but at length angered informs him if he leaves now, they are through. Robert goes.

From a newspaper article he learns that his father is on the verge of failure. Resentment gives way before filial duty. He returns and finds his once wealthy father on the brink of despair. Heart and soul he throws himself into his father's work and soon has saved the ranch. His father embraces him but Robert's heart is heavy for Santena. Then one day he turns at the sound of a familiar step. With a little cry, he turns toward the woman he loves, and that night the ranch resounds to the joyous celebration of a gay wedding.

GOING HOME

Mrs. S. R. Adkins Drama File No. 11658

WALTER McCarty, wealthy banker, is informed by his physician he must take a complete rest. He returns home and tells his daughter Mildred the news. Neither can decide exactly where to go until Mildred's fiance, Philip West comes to the rescue. Phil's friend, Eddie Carison has a ranch out west and will be glad to accept them as paying guests. Two days later, they are on their way with Phil as their guide. They arrive at dusk. The last rays of the sun have spread a golden powder over the hills and Mildred's breath catches in her throat at the sight of so much beauty. They turn to Phil in appreciation for having brought them here, and Phil reveals he has just received a telegram permitting him to take his vacation now instead of a month later. Mildred learns to ride and enjoys herself hugely as she is permitted to milk the cows and feed the chickens. While out riding one day she meets a cowboy who, remembering that he has passed the Carison ranch, shows her the road back since she has lost her way. She learns he is looking for work and tells him she has heard they need an extra man on the ranch. Jimmie Turner gets the job and in the days that follow he and Millie, who has liked him instantaneously, become fast friends. Both her father and Phil, however, object to her association with a common cowhand; and from the first Jimmie and Phil are antagonistic to each other. One day Phil and Mildred are out riding. Three men kidnap Mildred and tie her escort to a tree. They force the girl to write a note demanding fifty thousand dollars ransom, then sticking it in Phil's pocket, they hurry Mildred away. Meanwhile Jimmie Turner rides up, and observant of Phil's half hearted attempts to get free, he becomes suspicious. Realizing it is useless to try to overpower Mildred's abductors, unarmed as he is, he follows and waits outside the two story frame house where they take her. Slipping up to the window, he hears one of the men tell a squinting old woman that a dark haired man wearing glasses and a black hat would come about midnight to see Millie. He was to be given the key to Mildred's room. Jimmie returns to the ranch, gets a black hat and glasses, blackens his blonde hair with soot, and is about to slip out when he overhears McCarty say he tried to keep Mildred from being so friendly with that Turner fellow. Sighing deeply, McCarty gives Phil the fifty thousand dollars to deliver to the abduotors. Riding like a demon, Jimmie returns to the house, bluffs the old woman into delivering the key and finds Mildred weeping on the bed. He reassures her and they leave. Before they can go, however, the four men come noisily up the steps. Jimmie confronts them. Two raise their hands, the other two try to shoot it out, hut Jimmie beats them to the draw. With Mildred's help he disarms, ties and binds them to their horses. Delivering them (including Phil West, the leader) to the sheriff, he learns that Phil wanted the ransom money so he could marry another girl. As the sheriff leads his captives away, Jimmie sways and falls from loss of blood, his wounds having been unnoticed by the others. Mildred is beside him constantly in the days that follow, and it is she who is to induce Jimmie she loves him and wealth makes no difference. Moreover, she is to learn that Jimmie is a law student, who has come west for a needed vacation, and Mr. McCarty, penitently, is to approve the match.

THE BEGUILING BLONDE

Shirley Stevens Drama File No. 11684

ALTHOUGH she had come to Hollywood to make good as a writer, pretty Inez Prentice was to remain on as thousands of others, doing other work. From her flower garden, she was to derive a small income, enough to live on comfortably if not luxuriously. Each day Jerry Winters who lived next door, was to watch her cutting and pruning her flowers and his interest was to mount. Once, while Inez was struggling with the unmanageable garden hose, Jerry leaped the fence into her garden and offered his assistance. Later, he told her he was an electrical expert who had come to Hollywood to get a joh. However, ironioally enough, all he had been able to find was work as an extra. In the day's that followed Jerry was to be with Inez constantly, helping her in her garden and doing minor repairs about her tiny house. Jerry was falling deeply in love, hut Inez dashed all his hopes to pieces one day when dreamily she told him she had always wanted a brother and Jerry was just that. "Couldn't I ever be more than a—brother?" Jerry was to ask wistfully, hut Inez's eyes seemed to hold the answer. Shortly afterwards, Inez was to come racing into Jerry's house to inform him that her aunt was ill back home and she had to go to her. Jerry promised to see that the flower garden was kept intact during her absence.

While she was gone, Inez was to find herself missing Jerry incalculably. The moment her aunt's health permitted, Inez returned to Hollywood. There she found many changes. Jerry had heen observed doing one of his bits, and the director, spotting him as a personality had raised him to a featured role opposite Vera Wallace, onc of the most famous blondes in Hollywood. Vera, following a long established practice, set about getting Jerry to her feet, and Jerry, untutored in the ways of women began to fall. Inez bit her lips as she observed Vera's chauffeured limousine outside Jerry's house, but in spite of all Vera's persuasions, Jerry insisted on keeping his little bungalow despite the fact that his salary was now a thousand a week. Inez, loving Jerry dearly, realized that Vera was just playing with him, and it hurt her to think that her Jerry might suffer. She saw less and less of Jerry these days. Meanwhile at the studios Jerry was getting fed up with Vera's possessive attitude. Vera, in turn coquettish, seductive, jealous, and tempermental made Jerry's life miserable. On the set she ordered him around until, unable to endure it any longer, he did what no other man had ever dared,—told her she was a spoiled, ugly-tempered shrew. Bursting with indignation, Vera enjoyed a fit of hysterics. At her orders, the entire picture was scrapped, and a new leading man was obtained. However, secretly the entire staff admired Jerry, and the director himself offered Jerry a high salaried job as an electrical expert. It was Jerry who got the director to read one of Inez's unsold stories, and the rest is history. Inez is now a big name as a scenario writer; Jerry is making good as a technical expert, and Inez is Mrs. Jerry Winters now. As for Vera, they never talk about her.

SEA DAUGHTER

Eric Olsson Drama File No. 11703

THE wind lashed the sea against the little island. From the window of their tiny house, Anna Larson looked out on the troubled sea. Suddenly she cried out as she noticed a brave little craft coming toward the inlet. Even as she watched, a mighty wave tossed the boat upon the sharp jagged rocks. Calling to her grandfather Ole Larson to follow her, the young girl hraved the storm and making her way to the wreck, helped the lone passenger of the boat to shore. Once inside the warm house, and divested of his dripping outer clothing, Eric looked about appreciatively. His eyes fastened on Anna, and under the intensity of his glance, Anna dropped her eyes.

Soon a romance was to spring up between Anna and the stalwart young Eric. With the help of Ole Larson, Eric patched his hoat, and when his work was completed, he informed the Larsons he was leaving, "You'll come back," Anna cried sharply, and drawing her tenderly into his embrace, Eric stooped to the luscious red lips which had never known a man's kiss before, and promised he would.

Back at headquarters, Eric reported and learned that the activities of a group of smugglers had increased lately. Recalling Anna's words about the threats her grandfather had received from one Tom Pelter who had wanted to use the old man's boats, Eric informed his superior that he had a clue to the smuggler's whereabouts. Accordingly he began a lone search of the surrounding islands. Once, waiting hidden in a tree, he watched three men silently carry heavy boxes behind a clump of bushes. After they had gone he investigated and found a secret cave. Returning hurriedly to headquarters he secured a boat under the captaincy of Leif Johansen, the ruddy faced captain. With his, re-inforcements, Eric stole silently ashore and led his men to the hidden cave. Stealthily the sailors carried out box after box of the contraband store, as evidence, then waited for the coming of the smugglers. Tom, boasting of his intended marriage to old Ole's girl, stumbled along drunkenly. But one of his assistants, alert to danger, cried out that strangers were about. Tom laughed loudly and proclaimed nonsense, at the same time, taking no chances. Sending all the other men into the cave before him, Tom heard their slight gasps as they were overcome by the waiting government men. In an instant Tom was escaping. The captain Johansen, blocked his path, and Tom whipped out a knife. However, Eric leaped upon him and averted his deadly aim, receiving the blow in his own arm. In mortal battle Tom and Eric rolled and at last Tom was outstretched, unconscious. Johansen had the hrave young man carried to his own cabin aboard the boat, and Eric, recovering, was given every attention. Able to sit up at last, Eric gave a cry of surprise at seeing Anna's picture in the captain's possession. In answer to his questions, however, he learned that the picture was of the captain's wife, taken twenty years ago. In wonder and growing comprehension, Eric learned that their child had been kidnapped hy an insane sailor with a fancied grievanoe. Eric led the captain to the Larson's island, and there learned that Anna was not really their grandchild, but had been entrusted to their care by a seaman from a passing vessel who had never returned. Anna's real name is Johansen, but she was soon to change it to Mrs. Eric Swansen, with the full approval and congratulations of the Larsons and her beaming new found father, Leif Johansen.

PRIDE OF THE HILLS

Mrs. Robert E. Ligon Drama File No. 11708

KENTUCKY, famous for its long line of "blue blood" racing horses, has produced the outstanding horse of the last two years, Ginger, a black beauty of amazing speed. As Derby Day nears sportsmen from all parts of the country are preparing heavy hets for this is the outstanding annual event. Ohlivious of the conjecture and attention being paid him, Ginger is stubbornly pawing the ground one morning refusing to move. Knowing his tricks from the past, Mr. Jerome sends the stahle boy, Sam, for his daughter Sara Nell. Sara possesses an answering streak of wildness in temperament and appearance, and she quiokly coaxes Ginger to take his workout with Ned, the jockey. "I don't believe that horse would run without you," laughingly declares her father. For several minutes they watch the powerful legs of the horse kicking up the dust around the course, when they are interrupted by an approaching car. An eastern gambler, John Talbot, has come to learn if Jerome can be persuaded to sell the horse. Knowing full well what Sara's answer will be, Jerome tells him that Ginger belongs to her. With rising temper at his smug audacity, Sara indignantly refuses to consider any terms. Talhot drives off but he leaves the others uneasy. Sam is warned to keep constant guard over Ginger. Back in the house, Jerome informs Sara that she can take the trip to Europe that Sara has always wanted. The girl refuses to leave him and her little brother, Bohby, until Derby Day is over. At dinner, the phone connected with the stables rings and Sara immediately fears that something has happened to Ginger. However, Sam is calling to tell them that Dan Ralston has been thrown from his horse and is seriously injured. Dan is a new neighbor from New York who has been living alone on his father's property. Several times Sara and he have met while riding but Sara has heen too much the tomboy to he greatly interested. Accompanied by her father, Sara drives immediately to the scene and Sara is conscious of a strange pang upon seeing the still, crumpled body. They rush him to the hospital where he is placed on the operating table. Not until Sara is reassured that he has a fighting ohance to live, will she consent to return home. The hospital notifies the Jeromes when Dan regains consciousness. Both young people feel extraordinary pleasure upon seeing each other. When Dan is well enough to be moved, Sara persuades him to complete his recuperation at her home. They are still uneasy about Ginger when Bobby innocently informs them that strange men have been walking about the grounds. During the next few days it is not lost upon the household that Sara is growing increasingly feminine in her attention to dress and that Dan's presence is responsible. Returning from a visit to Ginger one morning, Sara decides to surprise Dan and bring him his luncheon tray herself. Stunned when she nears the open doorway and sees him embracing a young woman, Sara nearly drops the tray as she rushes blindly for the stairs, trying to force haok her tears. Dan recognizes her footsteps and calls to her so Sara reluctantly returns. She is pleasantly amazed when Dan introduces the visitor as his sister who has motored down to reassure herself of Dan's comfort. Noticing the stress of emotion, Sara is still laboring from and guessing the cause, Mrs. Elmore tactfully slips away. Soon Sara hears the words of adoring love that she has dreamed for many recent nights and pledges herself to marry Dan the day following the Derby. Meanwhile, Talbot has not foresworn hope of making a fortune by withholding Ginger. With several accomplices he makes for Ginger's quarters under the cover of the night. Sara, unable to sleep through sheer happiness, decides to pay a late visit to her four legged friend. Unaware that she is being followed, Sara suddenly feels a blanket tossed over her head before she can cry out and is dragged to the waiting car. Upon seeing her, Talbot has changed his mind, deciding to frighten Jerome into withdrawing his entry in return for his daughter's safe return. In the early morning hours, Sara is deposited in a cabin and a young man left on guard, while the others return to town to stock up on provisions. Overhearing their intentions, Sara is terrified that her father will consent before she can escape. When the others are gone, her guard identifies himself as a youth whose parents had been befriended by Jerome in the past. Talbot has forced him to help hut now he feels remorseful. Untying her honds, Ray leads her to a horse and directs her home where she returns to find her father and lover frantio upon reading the kidnapper's note. Dan insists on returning with the Jeromes to the scene of her imprisonment where they rescue Ray, who wounds himself in order to throw off suspicion of voluntarily abetting the girl, from his accomplices. Talhot succeeds in escaping. Derby Day arrives without further excitement until a few moments before the race opens when it is learned that Ginger's jockey has been doped. Against all protests, Sara insists on riding her horse in his stead. And to the acolaim of thousands thrilled by the unusual sight, a girl leads the Kentucky horse to victory, and oblivious of the plaudits of the crowd stumbles into the arms of her anxious lover.

THE TRAVELER

"SEE AMERICA FIRST," screamed the billboards as small Donald, unconcerned, played happily on his mother's lap. Already he was well accustomed to traveling and was to grow even more so in the succeeding years, that took him through some of the loveliest cities and states in the Union. Because of olimatic conditions necessary for young Donald's health his parents had become nomads and through succeeding winters he had seen the wonders of the south, and later the latin countries. A lovely spring day in 1916 saw a "house on wheels" ambling along the highway of a rural section of Maine driven by Donald, now a youth of twenty, who found after his parents death that though he was in excellent physical condition the wanderlust had seized him. Converting an automobile into combined living quarters and a library, Donald traveled where fancy chose—the stars his roof on pleasant nights and fellow travelers on the road for company. Housewives hungry for books and remote from libraries were appreciative customers and money jingled pleasantly in his pockets through uneventful days. Uneventful until the day he impulsively followed a cross road and stumbled upon a remote house. The girl who answered the door was the most charming, attractive person he had met he instantly decided and her smile when he announced his mission was warming. "What books do you like?" he asked. Her eyes grew dark with excitement as she confessed that she who had never been more than a few miles from her home was hungry for books of adventure, tales of far-off places. While she fingered the volumes, Donald lost his usual shyness and launched into a description of the scenic wonders he had known when Hall, Ruth's cousin, came upon them, and ordered Donald off. At first Donald hesitated but her pleading eyes decided him. Miles away, Donald realized that he did not know her name or address and craved to see her again. Camping for the night off the roadside, he was startled to hear himself hailed. Ruth ran pantingly to him before gratefully flinging herself on the grass. During the hours that followed she told him that she was engaged to Hall through a family arrangement though she detested him and had been seeking escape. If only Donald would let her accompany him to Washington. . . She was still sleeping in the car when Donald rolled his blankets from the ground and sought eggs and milk at a farmhouse. He returned an hour later to find that Hall had followed and taken her away. For several days he searched the vicinity where he had found Ruth but was unsuccessful and the tang of the open road seemed no longer as attractive. When America entered the World War, Donald was among the first to go overseas. During the height of battle, he recognized Hall among the new company which had joined him. Under the first baptism of fire, Hall lost his head and dropped screaming from a flesh wound. Remembering Ruth he was tempted for a moment to leave Hall to his fate but finally risked his own life to drag Hall to safety. Half-way across another shell hit Hall who before he died, recognizing Donald, gave him Ruth's address and assured him she was still unmarried. Two years later the travelling library resumed its journeying with Donald now on a honeymoon with Ruth.

THE JADE IDOL

Alfred C. Purland Drama File No. 11654

NEVER was Walter Whitney to forget the evening when he returned unannounced from the Orient where he had gathered a few more of the valuable curios that were his one passion. From the dining room, his younger brother, Martin, called to him urging him to stop only long enough to freshen up a bit. "I've someone I want you to know." Five minutes later Walter was to meet the one woman whom he felt instinctively he could love, the one woman who could fit in with the regal, distinguishing beauty that featured his cherished collection. Under Malise's solicitious inquiries, Walter expanded and spoke much more freely of his treasures than he was accustomed to. "And what did you bring from China this time?" asked Martin. Walter's eyes gleamed with sudden remembrance. How could he have for a moment forgotten the sacred Jade Idol of the Emperor Wuchau Kuei which after many strange journeys had finally crossed the water to become a prominent addition to the Whitney treasures. "Wait until after dinner; I'll show it to you then," he promised. Near the close of the meal, Martin ordered the servant, Togo, to bring one of their few remaining bottles of old, rare, wine. To Walter's astonishment, his brother filled their glasses and then rose impressively to propose a toast to his future bride. Walter's fingers trembled and as he went upstairs to fetch the jade piece, the hovering Togo was amazed to hear his master say aloud, "Walter, you are a fool." Shrugging his shoulders Walter descended the stairs and soon displayed the idol. Martin looked upon it with his usual tolerance for his brother's expensive whims but the involuntary cry of admiration from Malise came as balm to his wounded judgment for much as Walter cared for his brother he was conscious of his weaknesses which included pretty women and an instinct for gambling which involved him beyond his means. In spite of his feeling of loyalty which would not permit him to emotionally consider Malise now in any other light than a sister-in-law, he had felt a slight sense of disappointment in her choice. During the following weeks, Walter was continually polite when he encountered the engaged couple but he consistently refused invitations to accompany them. Being tied up at a meeting, Walter asked his brother to call one day at the shop of Lee Chung where he was having a vase mended. While waiting for it to be wrapped, Martin in conversing with the proprietor learned that the idol would fetch $10,000. On the way home, Martin brooded over that sum which would nicely cover some pressing gambling debts whose I.O.U.'s were soon due with no prospect ordinarily of covering them. The thought of stealing the idol was rejected but luck seemed to favor him when he learned that Walter was dining out. Calling off an appointment with his fiancee on the pretext of a headache he ordered Togo to take the evening off. After an hour of brooding, Martin became inspired. He made a "pocket" in the floor and waited until the hour of Walter's return neared. In subsequent order, he smashed the case containing the idol, secreted it and then disarranged the room. Intent upon this, he did not hear the masked figure enter until Martin was ordered to turn over the idol. Martin scuffled with him, then knew only darkness. . . Meanwhile Walter encountered Malise and persuaded her to return to his home with friends. Alarmed at the silence, Walter stumbled upon his brother and soon revived him. Before the police could be summoned, Togo entered and revealed the plot which he, suspicious, circumvented. Martin rushed into the night. Mingled with Walter's grief was the knowledge that he was free to dream of his love's fulfilment.

FERTILE LAND

E. E. Byrd Short Subject File No. 11623

WHILE filling out the prescription handed to him by the small boy, Harvey Layton notes the shabby clothes and undernourished condition of young Thomas. He takes the crumpled bill with a pang of regret, realizing how much toil and self denial the money means. Like thousands of families throughout the south, the Lukes are share-croppers working farms for absentee owners, bearing all the losses and none of the gains, each year finding them more in debt. The years of depression have particularly hit such families bringing down the prices of farm products. With a sigh he turns to the next customer, John Dickson, jobless, his wife expecting a baby. Formerly a farmer he took a position in town and now has no money to return to the land which at least might supply him with food. With thousands of fertile acres, Layton wonders why the government cannot aid such families. Returning home that evening, Layton is still obsessed by this problem. Several hours later he hits upon a solution and for several weeks goes with little sleep to draw up a Depression Panacea based on the establishment of a home-owner credit corporation financed by the sales of government bonds. Reading the draft aloud to his wife the following principal points are brought out: Government and State owned lands supplemented by suitable purchases would have homes built with modern conveniences as well as necessary farm buildings also adequately equipped. Each tract with its added improvements would be sold at actual cost, the purchaser to pay in 100 semi-annual payments with three per cent interest, etc. Suitable provisions for the fixing of wages and prices of materials. Special agents would determine the best crop for each soil and cash would be advanced to the farmer for tools and livestock. Only purchasers who had bought a stipulated amount of cotton goods are to be eligible. Provisions for the setting up of joint school funds and adequate personal and property insurance are compulsory, etc., etc.

Overcome with sudden weariness, Layton retires for the night, his thoughts still concerned with his program. Dreaming that the president has accepted and put into action his bill, Layton travels on an inspection tour throughout the country. The factories in the north are humming turning out machinery, farm implements, tractors, ploughs; while the southern mills are running three shifts to meet the demands for cotton goods the New York clothing industry is being revived; thousands are returning to the automobile plants in Detroit which reflects the new wave of prosperity as millions of laborers regain purchasing power. But in the south the greatest change is reflected—new equipment, homes replacing shacks, men ploughing land with new vigor since for many it is the first time in generations that the profit from the soil will revert to them instead of absentee owners. All this is reflected in the homes of Luke and Dickson which graphically reflect the changed status of the country . . . Awakening at this point Layton determines to reach every important Washington figure until the dream is realized.

THE BANSHEE RETURNS

Bernard McCartan Drama File No. 11615

REFLECTING the pride of its master, the steed sped over the drawbridge that connected the MacCarthy Clan Castle with the outer world. Swiftly dismounting, Sir Rory Gifford turned his horse over to the waiting servant and strode into the castle where he was greeted warmly by Sir Ronald, the head of the clan. The knight had time only for a sparse exchange of greetings with his leader's daughter, Eileen, whom he had silently loved for many months, before the banquet was announced. It was the eve of the famous annual stag hunt and the conversation revolved about it. Secretly, Sir Rory counted on capturing the prize ranking among the leading huntsman in the group. Dinner over at last, he hurriedly sought out Eileen who had withdrawn expectantly from the throng. In their search for a quite place, Eileen persuaded him to go with her to the West Window which was placed in the highest turret and which legend held as the favorite romantic spot of young lovers since the castle was first built. Together they watched in silence the storm that raged outside, ruffling the calm of three lakes grouped about the castle. A flash of lightning frightened Eileen who screamed. Hurriedly, he placed his arms protectively about her and in a moment impulsively kissed her forehead. Sir Rory held his breath fearing her anger and several minutes passed before she shyly convinced him that it had not been displeasing. Soon their lips clung as he confessed his love. Barely had they parted from the embrace when a shriek was heard—the call of the banshee which for several generations had meant an inevitable warning that a member of the clan was to die. Though the knight sought to dismiss it as nonsense, he consented to go downstairs with the girl, whose frightened face aroused comment. The announcement of the banshee's call had a dampening effect upon their gay spirits. Before they parted, Eileen begged her father to see that her lover was careful. When he questioned her concern, Eileen confessed her love. Sir Ronald forbade Sir Rory to see her again, claiming that he had other plans, but Sir Rory boldly refused. "All other commands, but not this. . . " he declared. Everyone was awake at dawn for the hunt and in a few hours the slower horses were weeded out. Sir Rory and Sir Ronald were in the lead, the stag plainly before him. The younger man's horse shot forward and he could not suppress a smile of triumph. But his horse stumbled, and the chief was victor. When they returned, Eileen sought to console him and though it was forbidden they could not restrain their desires. Coming upon them unexpectedly, instead of growing furious, Sir Ronald consented to the betrothal, stating that he had wanted to test his spirit. Again came the scream of the banshee and the frightened company broke up early. After a sleep-broken night, they were aroused to action by the announcement that the rival clan of O'Donnels was marching upon them. It is another of a series of battles extended over the years for the supremacy of the Killarny Lakes. The O'Donnels were taken aback when they saw the MacCarthys prepared for them. While fighting valiantly, Sir Rory's lance was snapped and he was mortally wounded. With his last breath he sent a message of love to Eileen who was to learn that the banshee had claimed another victim.

PAUL

J. W. Blum Drama File No. 11557

"THE Lord our God is one," declaimed Saul of Tarsus with his fellows in the Hebrew school taught by the Pharisee teachers who held strictly to the letter of the old Mosaic law. When Saul left with his fellows, his teachers looked after him with pride. He was among the most learned of the young scholars and a rigid follower of the Jewish faith in those troublesome times when Jesus of Nazareth was converting many to Christianity. Saul led in the frequent persecuting raids upon the followers of the new faith, finally receiving permission from the high priest of Jerusalem to make prisoners of the Gentiles in Damascus. On the road, Saul dramatically saw the light—his faith in the divinity of Christ was born, resulting in Saul's baptism and conversation. His people were stunned upon learning that Saul had cast off his religion and name, henceforth to be known as Paul. Jews crowded about him and stoned him near to death when Paul healed an impotent supplicant. Paul and Silas were together when he again cast out the evil spirit from a maid to be beaten and scourged by rods and then clapped into prison. Freedom regained, Paul made his way to Athens where he found the streets filled with statues, among them standing prominently an altar bearing the inscription, "To the unknown God." Here, Paul pledged himself to proclaim the teachings of Jesus. . . Preaching in the temple of Jerusalem, Paul was dragged out, only to be rescued by the authorities who placed him in chains and brought him before Governor Felix for trial with Tertulus as prosecuter who charged Paul with seditious acts including the "profaning of the temple." All the suave, sly cunning of a twentieth century lawyer was employed in this trial. The governor resented the lecture on righteousness, temperence and the day of judgment which Paul delivered in a private meeting, though he was unable to control his fear. Felix finally left him in bonds but the governor who replaced him resumed the false trial. Convinced of his innocence Festus interested King Ageippa who permitted him to make his defense before him. Granted his appeal to Emperor Caesar, Paul set out for Rome still wearing chains. Placed on a ship with many prisoners, he sailed for many days till a dispute arose and the men hesitated at continuing the journey. Disregarding Paul's advice they decided to continue when a high wind soon sprang up. During the height of the storm, Paul's voice could be heard. Under the cover of night, the sailors sought to escape on small boats until Paul advised the centurion and the soldiers that hope rested only in keeping the sailors, so the boats were cut away. Morning saw conditions improved enough to encourage them until the ship ran aground. Dissuaded from killing the prisoners, all arrived safe on the island of Melita, peopled by barbarians. Paul healed many after making well Publius, the father of their chief. The journey was then continued on a new ship which discharges them at Puteoli, suburb of Rome. They resumed the weary trip on foot. Paul was separated from the others and brought before the emperor. Though defending himself eloquently, the sentence of death faced him. In his solitary cell in the days still alloted him, the martyr spent his hours pouring over the last letters that were to bring new inspiration and comfort to the millions yet-to-be.

BEYOND ALL THIS

Joe R. Krieger Melodrama File No. 11777

EVER since she was a little girl, Lucia Morano had had a devoted admirer who watched and worshipped from afar. Antonio, adopted son of the caretaker of the village graveyard, had longingly looked at his little princess through the cracks in the wall surrounding her father's estate. He had seen her grow from an adorable child into a lovely young heiress, endowed with all the poise that her aristocratic blood and careful training made so naturally hers. As throngs of wealthy suitors from the foremost families in Italy called upon her, Antonio wistfully turned to his hobby, sculpturing —and while he created beautiful images of the lady he loved he sadly reflected that she could never be his. Rella, leader of a notorious gang of criminals, also took an interest in Lucia. He informed his men that he must find a method of securing her priceless collection of jewels, left to the girl by her mother. Bribing the servants, two of Rella's accomplices entered the room that night and placed a sleeping potion in the pitcher of water by Lucia's bed. A few moments later the girl drank from this pitcher and was soon fast asleep. Her father knocked, then entered the room, frightening Rella's henchmen so that they left hastily, by the window. Alarmed when he could not awaken his daughter, Signor Morano sent for his physician, who pronounced that the girl was suffering from an attack of sleeping sickness.

After days of anxious care no improvement could be made in her condition. At last the doctor informed the anxious father that the girl was dead. Strioken with grief, he adorned the girl with all her jewels and watched while she was laid away in the old family vault by Antonio's foster father. Overcome with emotion, Antonio watched the scene from a distance, while Rella commented coldly that his men had evidently prepared an overdose of sleeping powder, and must now rob the vault. That evening they broke into the vault, rusty and cracked with age. In a few moments they had gathered Lucia's possessions. Rella reached for a necklace about the girl's throat when she slipped; as he rudely pulled her up she uttered a little cry and opened her eyes! Wild with terror, Rella and his men fled from the vault. Antonio's father entered, and seeing the girl attempting to rise, he also ran away, hastening to his son. At once, Antonio entered, took the girl in his arms, and carried her to his cottage. He instructed his father to send for Signor Morano and the police, while he calmed the frightened Lucia. Trembling with joy, Morano took his daughter in his arms. Police soon apprehended the oriminals and took them into custody.

Refusing a reward, Antonio could hardly believe his ears when Lucia asked him to call. During the next year he became famous for his sculpture and when, one day, Lucia's father told him that he might marry his daughter, if he wished since, she had confided that she loved him alone, his happiness was complete. Two children were born to the couple and joy reigned once more at the Morano estate.

JOHN FARALLY

John A. Ebbitt Drama File No. 11788

JOHN Farally, a youthful idealist, confides in his friend, Richard Owen, that he plans to correct many of the economic and social wrongs of the world when he graduates, as the two stroll across the campus of their university. When he discloses that he wishes most of all to live in New York City, Richard replies that, as his father is influential in that city, he can doubtless secure positions for both of them. Immediately after graduation the two leave for the metroplis and, through Mr. Owen, senior, secure positions with a brokerage house. Eager to explore this fascinating new world in which he finds himself, John visits theatres and cafes along the Gay White Way and life seems very sweet to him. During a ball given by his employers in celebration of the sixteenth anniversary of their firm he is presented to Rita James. As the two waltz together, both find they have similar idealistic views. In the days that follow, a rare companionship develops between these two as they discover a similarity of taste in almost everything. When Rita consents to become John's wife he experiences the greatest joy in his happy life.

Then comes the crash. John watches, aghast, while clients of his company face financial ruin, many of them taking their own lives as a result. He loses his position and spends anxious days going from one agency to the next in search of work while his savings steadily disappear. Unable to keep up appearances and too proud to let her know the truth, John avoids Rita, but she encounters him, ragged and hungry, upon the street one day, and tries to persuade him to accept money from her but he refuses. When Rita assures him that her love is as true as ever he hurriedly turns away to hide his emotion and that night steals aboard a freight train bound for Chicago. Through a Welfare Agency John eventually secures a small position as an assistant in a bookshop. Fay, the owner's daughter, becomes his friend, encouraging him when he decides he will attempt to write a book of his own experiences. Patiently she types the manuscript for him, listening to his ideas as they work together far into the night. When Marks, a publishing agent, drops into the shop to purchase a rare book, John asks him if he will read his manuscript, and impressed by the personality of the young salesman, he agrees. A short while after this he returns, saying that his company has agreed to take the book which he believes shows unusually promise; Fay glows with happiness as she congratulates the young author. In the course of a few months success has come to John, and with it wealth.

Hastening to New York, he calls at Rita's apartment. The bell is answered by an elderly woman who informs him that Rita died following an attack of pneumonia. Bitterly, John feels his happiness turn to ashes as he leaves again for Chicago. Here Fay discovers him, alone in a cafe, and persuades him that, for Rita's sake, he he must face the future bravely. Realizing the truth of her words, John begins his greatest work, dedicated to Rita, his only love, while once more, Fay encourages.

WHITE ANGEL

Delia C. F. Smith Drama File No. 11638

AN unwanted child. Trembling-lipped, little Lila realized that's what she was. Her mother, very heautiul, tall, and slender, avoided her whenever possible, and her father, busy, hut kindly, lavished gifts of money upon the little girl whose heart ached for love. Only the old colored mammy, Cleo, sympathized with the little girl, and on her broad lap, Lila wept that she wanted her mother's love, such as other little girls had. Even the little pickaninnies on the estate seemed to be adored. On the full-toned violin her father had hought for her, little Lila poured forth her poignant loneliness. The little black children listened spellbound to the fair child's music, and mammy Cleo applauded warmly, but Mrs. Foley cried out sharply that the child was making an infernal racket. Sohbing pitifully, Lila locked up her violin and ran to her room. Once, wide-eyed she heard her mother snapping, "I never wanted the child. I've never been well a day since she came." So that was it, the child thought. She had brought her mother only trouble. Once, seeing the unhappy eyes of the child, the father determined to spend more time with her. He brought home a pony for her, and for the first time in her life Lila knew what it was to be ecstatically happy. Each day she rode about the estate, and her father, coming up would whistle for her. With a little cry of happiness, Lila whistled in return, and speeded down the road to meet him. But even this joy was short lived. A business deal called Mr. Foley from town. Lila's loneliness was greater than ever now. One night, fancying she heard her father's whistle, the little girl pattered down the lane. But only the wind returned her anxious whistle and as she waited forlornly at the gate, the wind swept through her thin night gown. Shivering she returned to the house, but her teeth chattered and chill after chill seized her. Mrs. Foley scolded the child for going out in such weather, but mammy Cleo, catching sight of the pinched flushed face, hurried Lila to bed. Wailing forlornly, the mammy summoned the doctor. "Influenza," the dootor pronounced. Tossing with fever, Lila called again and again for her mother to come to her, to kiss her, as other children's mothers did, but Mrs. Foley remained distant and unmoved. "It's her own fault," she cried, "going out without proper clothes on." Only Manny Cleo and the little pickaninnes wept and prayed for Lila, while Mr. Foley remained blissfully unaware that telegrams awaited him telling of his child's illness. Recovered at length, Lila grew more wistful than ever when she learned that even in her illness her mother had not come to her. At length they arranged to send her to school. During the holidays the other girls returned home, but Lila received only expensive gifts from her father and messages of love from Mammy Cleo. At length, unable to endure the happy stories of the other girls about their lovong parents, Lila ran away. Her father, learning she had disappeared, for the first time grew concerned. Reading over the note of heartbreaking loneliness and despair that Lila had written, he sent detectives out to find her, but in vain. Time passed. Lila, working as a governess, one day entertained her two little charges by playing the violin. Professor Gerhardt, guest of the people for whom Lila worked, heard her and marvelled. At his persuasion, Lila agreed to play at a concert, replacing a well known concert artist who was suddenly indisposed. The broadcast, heard by the Foleys at home made then strangely reminiscent. As song after song that Lila had played as a child quivered through the air, Mr. Foley set out to investigate, only to find the artist had left for parts unknown. Only when Mrs. Foley came down with typhoid fever and cried for the child she had neglected, did Lila return to kiss the tortured brow. Slowly Mrs. Foley began to convalesce. Mammy Cleo prayed happily, Mr. Foley's arms crept about his daughter's shoulders, and Lila wept happily, for at last she knew she was wanted.

BACHELOR DAYS

Charles Clement Comedy Drama File No. 11614

AT his club, Tom watched the bachelors enviously. They didn't have to rush home from work. They didn't have the responsibilities of a wife and child. If they wanted to go off on a spree, there was nothing to stop them. Returning home morosely, Tom picked at each dish his wife set before him. There were times, he felt, when a man got tired of domestic life. Suddenly he realized that Elsie had been talking to him for several minutes. Junior laughed raucously. "Aw Mon, he didn't hear a word you said." Confused, Tom pretended he had been paying attention, but as he realized that Elsie was explaining that she was going to visit her mother for a month, a wild joy leaped in Tom's breast. Cautiously he restrained it. It wouldn't do to let Elsie know how pleased he was. "I don't know how I'll ever get along without you," Tom mumbled dutifully, but Elsie merely snapped, "Nonsense," and went on with her detailed directions about cleaning the house and taking care of the plants and gold fish. "Of course," she finished, "I'm taking Junior with me." The last douht in Tom's mind vanished.

With an eagerness he could scarcely hide, Tom saw Elsie and Junior off on the train, nodded violently while Elsie repeated her directions, and laughed exultantly as the train chugged slowly out of the station. Free! Free! He was free! At the club he ordered a couple of stiff drinks. Pleasantly plastered he hegan searching for somebody to go on a tear with him. However, man after man complained that he was all worn out from last night's carouse, and finally, disappointed, Tom went out himself. In his fourth speakeasy he picked up Pat, a merry wastrel, who drink for drink kept up with Tom. Elated over his sudden finding of this priceless hosom friend, Tom grandly invited Pat home with him. Days passed. Tom's head was splitting from too much drinking. Pat drank steadily, reduced to a sodden, contented heap. Tired of bad tasting gin, Tom decided to put up some tea. But he left it on the fire until the tea had all boiled out. He was tired of canned goods, and the pile of dirty dishes in the sink made him a little sick. The house hadn't been aired since Elsie left. Butter, milk and sugar had been on the table for days. Suddenly, contrite, Tom staggered over to the goldfish only to discover them lying bottom up, in the water. Grief stricken, Tom lurched to the plants, and discovering them withered and parched, poured water frantically over them, meanwhile ruining Elsie's oriental rug. The bed sheets were black, and as Tom, in receipt of a telegram from Elsie saying she was returning to-morrow, went down to the kitchen, a bright eyed mouse regarded him thoughtfully. In despair Tom dashed from the house.

Elsie took one look at her house and fainted. Frantically Tom and Junior worked over her to revive her. Tom looked up plaintively, and Elsie, casting one look at the little-boy-about-to-be spanked look, held back her scolding and silently set about restoring order. In three days the house was livable again. Tom snickered a little as he saw the lonely bachelors drinking in the olub, and returning home, he took Elsie and Junior into his arms and smiled happily, at peace with the world.

TWISTED CARDS

M. Berenice Elzey Drama File No. 11702

HIMSELF a self made man, Harvey Weston is bitterly disappointed when his son Robert refuses to take an interest in his business. They quarrel and Bob goes west. There he meets Kenneth Blake, youthful owner of Bar W ranch, and the two become fast friends.

Meanwhile Harvey is made the guardian of Dorothy Walters, daughter of his life long friend Jim. To Harvey is entrusted a small fortune and some bonds for his ward. On an almost certain tip, Harvey gambles with Dorothy's money and loses. His own securities tied up, he is unable to replace the whole amount immediately, and he is subjected to blackmail by his seoretary Carlos, who steals valuable papers. Harvey is unable to pin the theft on Carlos although he suspects he has the papers. In desperation, Harvey sends for Bob. Bob leaves for the east. Shortly after his departure, Dorothy, unaware of Bob's return east, comes to visit the ranch. When she learns he has gone, she takes a train back home. Shortly afterwards Ken receives a telegram from Bob and seizes a plane for the East. The train on which Dorothy is riding is wrecked. Dorothy is reported dead, but she is on her way east in an automobile driven by Helen Salers, a daring and attractive girl.

Meanwhile Bob was proving too great a menace to Carlos' safety. Accordingly he was followed in a taxi by Carlos. When he hailed a taxi, the one in which Carlos was hiding drew up and as Bob stepped in he received a crushing blow on the head and was carried to a shack on the other side of the river. Meanwhile Ken arriving at the Weston home finds Bob's father beside himself with anxiety. Dorothy returns with Helen to prove the reports of her death erroneous. Helen is induced to remain on for a few days as a guest. She suspects Carlos and one day when she and Ken are out riding, sees Carlos pass in a high powered car. They follow Carlos car to the shack where Bob is prisoner. Ken leaves Helen in the concealed car and rows toward the shack. By a ruse he frees Bob and together they escape to the car. Helen starts and they just manage to elude Bob's captor who fires ineffectually after them. Back home Bob is so weak that he is put to bed. Dorothy goes down stairs to get a book as she is about to put on the light in the library, she hears stealthy footsteps. She see Carlos withdraw a white envelope from a wall panel. She screams. In an instant Carlos leaps at her, hands circling her throat. Her screams are heard by Bob who, weak as his is, races down the steps and gives violent battle to Carlos. With desperate strength, Bob overcomes his more powerful assailant, and Ken, awakened comes down to help bind the prostrated figure of Carlos. Carlos' blackmailing activities are brought to an end, Mr. Weston explains all and is forgiven by Dorothy, Ken and Helen announce their engagement and Bob at last speaks the love he has borne for Dorothy for many years.

HEARTACHE'S END

Gladys Swartz Drama File No. 11616

THE train pulled away, leaving its lone passenger, a frail, white faced young girl, standing forlornly on the station. Learning that the only hotel in town was operated by the Thomases, a kindly old couple, Mae Clark took a small room. As the days sped by, Mrs. Thomas treated the wistful girl as though she were her own child, and it was she who stood by Mae in the hours during which her baby was born. Well again, at length, Mae was to leave for the city, entrusting her baby, Norma, to the care of the Thomases, to bring up as their own.

Years passed. With the death of her foster parents, Norma, who had loved them dearly, found herself adrift. Bob Nelson, earnest, likable, adored Norma and begged her to marry him, but gently she informed him that she couldn't bind him to her while the circumstances of her birth and parentage remained a mystery. At last, inspired by the faithful nurse who had battled gamely for the lives of the Thomases, Norma left for New York where she was accepted for training in one of the foremost city hospitals. Miss Simpson, her room mate, given to violent likes and dislikes, chattered of Miss Mason, the stern and lonely superintendent who seemed to take a personal interest in Norma's progress. One day, Miss Simpson returned to their room elated over a glimpse of Dr. Baker, the new interne. In short order Miss Simpson developed a violent infatuation for the indifferent young doctor and wagered that she would win him over yet. Norma tried to conceal her distaste for the other girl's ecstatic ravings, but it remained for Dr. Baker, himself, to ask for Norma after having observed her steadiness in the operating room. Simpson, jealously warned Norma to keep hands off Dr. Baker and went so far as to murmur threats. Meanwhile the young interne, catching up with Norma as she was going out to mail a letter, insisted on driving her to the post office and refused to bring her back until she promised not to avoid him as she seemed to. There followed many attempts by the interne to see more of Norma, and Simpson, mad with jealousy, offered Norma poisoned candy one night. Within a few hours Norma was writhing in pain. Only the prompt work of the doctors, among them the frantic Ray Baker, saved Norma's life. Simpson was nowhere to be found, and Ray, learning for the first time how the other nurse had threatened Norma, attributed Norma's refusal to marry him to that cause. Again he pressed his proposal, but Norma, loving him beyond life, admitted it wasn't fear, but the mystery of her birth that kept her from accepting. Although Ray persisted as she had known he would, Norma remained implacable. Ray left to open up his practice in a nearby town.

Meanwhile Norma found a new friend in Miss Mason, the superintendent, and while asking her not to prosecute Miss Simpson who had been caught, Norma revealed how she had been deserted by her mother and brought up by the Thomases. Shortly after, Dr. Baker, bringing a private patient into the hospital, called for Norma's aid on the case. The delirious patient, at sight of her cried, "Mae, Mae!" and insisted that Norma remain close to him. On hearing about the strange case, Miss Mason grew considerably agitated and entering the room whispered brokenly, "Bob." So at last Norma was to learn that Miss Mason was her own mother and the dying Bob her father. Mae and Bob had been married secretly against the wishes of his wealthy family, and discovering she was going to have a baby, Mae had fled, leaving a note advising Bob to get his divorce. The secret of her birth solved, Norma no longer resisted Ray's entreaties, and together at last they were to find happiness.

HIGH STAKES

John G. Aikin, Sr. Drama File No. 11627

THE battlegrounds of the Civil War claim another victim with the death of John Aiken, prominent plantation owner, whose bride of a few months is left to face the shadows of coming motherhood alone. Soon after the birth of her son, Richard, the widow slips away to join her husband after entrusting the child with her faithful Negro servant, Aunt Fane. The estate left to the child includes a large Texas land grant bequeathed by an uncle who was awarded the territory for valour in the war of Texas and Mexico. According to instructions, the Mammy supervises the land which is cultivated by the slaves who are now freemen, and when Richard is old enough sends him to school and college where he prepares to become a geologist. At the commencemnt dance, Richard experiences the magic of first love when he meets Grace Darling, who further endears herself to him the next day when he has her meet Aunt Fane who has come to see her master receive his diploma. Grace greets her deferentially as if there were no distinction between the two. "You're real quality." declares Aunt Fane, gazing shrewdly at the two attractive young people. Deferring his departure to the plantation, Richard decides to stay in the city for a time and see more of Grace. He has yet to meet Sam Boyd, real estate man of reputed wealth, who expects to win Grace for his wife. Having lost heavily on some land deals, Boyd grows excited upon learning that some land in Texas whose owner has yet to be traced contains valuable oil deposits. His mind concerned with this report, Boyd is at first absent minded when he meets Richard at Grace's home. Soon he realizes that he has a dangerous rival and is scarcely civil to him until Richard mentions that he is seeking advice on some property which he plans to visit in Texas. Alert at the bare possibility that these are the very lands he is interested in, Boyd persuades Richard to bring the papers to his office the next day. When they prove to be the property Boyd is after, he urges Richard to leave the papers with him so he can interest some financial backers. Turning over all but the original deed in return for a receipt, Richard leaves for Texas. Grace pledges herself to wait for him. Boyd does not plan to have Richard return, however, and sends a man to dispose of his rival. Dusk finds Richard returning from his land, having discovered traces of oil. Confronted on the lonely road by a menacing stranger, Richard is shot down before he can defend himself and Boyd's receipt taken. Hours later Richard, of whose death Boyd has been notified by wire, recovers enough to drag himself to the main part of the road where he is picked up by Negroes who nurse him to health within a week. While Boyd is seeking funds to incorporate the land for which he has made a bogus deed, Richard identifies himself to the U. S. authorities who aid him in obtaining capital from the Houston Oil Company. When Boyd learns that strangers are working on the property, he rushes there to claim it only to be greeted by the "dead" man who orders his arrest. A few weeks later, Aunt Fane proudly watches Grace and Richard walk down the church aisle.

WITHOUT LOVE

Zella Addeau Mohlmann Drama File No. 11700

IN the drawing room of the Scott house, Ethle is berating her husband Ralph because he will not buy her a new car. Patiently Ralph explains their present income doesn't warrant the extravagances which Ethle has been given to, but Ethle shouts abuse, and when Ralph's mother, payless maid of all work, timidly makes a suggestion, Ethle turns upon her venomously. That afternoon, Ethle goes for another demonstration of the new car, and attracted by the flashing black eyes of the salesman, purchases the car in her husband's name. She returns home triumphantly and insists that Mrs. Scott come for a ride. The older woman protests, but Ethle nags her until with two friends of Ethle they set off. Showing off her driving prowess and ignoring the memory of Ralph's warnings about recklessness, Ethle steps on the gas. Mrs. Scott protests, but too late, Ethle loses controls and the car plunges down an embankment, killing Ethle, and injuring severely the other passengers. In the hospital one of the women dies, the other returns home, shaken but otherwise unhurt, and Mrs. Scott sustains two permanently crushed legs. Ralph is distracted by the tragedy. Bills mount. He hires housekeeper after housekeeper, but all are alike inefficient. To add to his despair one of the twins takes sick. It is the kindly old Dr. Hartman who suggests that Ralph remarry. Bitterly Ralph protests that he hates all women except his mother. However, when the doctor tells him about a widow Alicie Delta, who is ready to make any sacrifice to send her three daughters through school, Ralph agrees to marry Alice, excluding, however, all love from their bargain. Their meeting is awkward, but the details of the arrangement are kept secret from all but themselves. In the ensuing weeks Ralph is amazed at the tender care Alice gives his son and mother, and at the order that prevails in the formerly chaotic home. However, misogynist that he is, Ralph attributes it all to Alice's powers of deception, her desire to win him over before revealing her true colors. All women, Ralph told himself over and over, were alike. Then, Mr. Meyers, father of the departed Ethle came to call. Sneering at Alice whom he continued to regard as Ralph's mistress rather than wife, Meyers revealed that he was going to foreclose the mortgages he held on Ralph's home because of his disappointment that the widower had not married Ethle's sister Hazel. Out of her own money, the little left her from her first husband's insurance, Alice pays Meyers off. Meanwhile Mrs. Scott suffers exceedingly and Alice is busy making her last moments comfortable. Ralph's bachelor brother reveals that he is in love with Alice, and for the first time Ralph realizes he loves his wife, but cannot bring himself to break his promise not to make love to her. Mrs. Scott dies. Ralph worries about the mortgage he has to pay off, and discovers that Alice has been singing in public to help defray expenses. Not until, however, he learns that Alice has even paid off his mortgage does Ralph fully realize her worth. His resolutions crumble, and with a cry of hunger, he takes her in his arms. While Alice, who has long struggled against her own love for Ralph, holds him closer and a new life begins for two people whose love is a thing assured.

DISTRICT ATTORNEY

Roman G. Reader Drama File No. 11783

TIRED after a hard day at the office, Monica comes home to find her mother ill, in bed, and her two younger brothers, Frank and Edward, impatiently waiting for her to prepare supper. With a weary sigh, she begins to peel vegetables when Dad Dilger, a politician, enters noisily. She sees at once that he is intoxicated as he begins to upbraid his wife for "taking it easy," and his children for every small fault he can find. Monica is on the point of tears when Mrs. Callahan, a neighbor, comes in, and tells the father to quiet down, in no uncertain terms. Then she comforts Monica who wearily says that she hopes someday it will be better. Monica's father falls asleep while the two women prepare supper. The next evening while Monica is buying groceries for dinner she is served by an attractive young clerk whose name, she sees on his cap, is Dave Smith. On subsequent visits to the store she discovers him pouring over a volume of Blaokstone, and he tells her that he is working his way through law school. Winning permission to call, Dave becomes a frequent visitor, and Monica knows her first real happiness in the walks and talks they enjoy together. The two become engaged, but when Monica comes home one day and is informed by the kindly Mrs. Callahan that her mother is dead, all thoughts of a wedding are given up, as the girl takes over the responsibility of caring for her two brothers.

While walking through the park, Monica is annoyed by Chester Brett, a shyster lawyer, who rudely attempts to start a conversation. That evening her father brings Mr. Brett to his home as a dinner guest and introduces his daughter. At Dad Dilger's persuasion, Chester runs for distriot attorney, while Dave Smith is likewise nominated. Chester attempts to blackmail his opponent by charging him with immoral character, incompetence and fraudulent discharge of duties, but Dave proves these accusations to be false, winning followers by the sincerity of his stirring, impersonal speeches, which Monica secretly delights in, as she listens over the radio. A dance is given in honor of Chester's nomination which Monica is forced to attend in order to quiet her father. Chester places a sedative in Mr. Dilger's whiskey and when he loses consciousness, informs Monica that he has sent her father home in his car, although in reality he has given instructions to have him taken to his own apartment. Escorting Monica home, Chester enters, saying that he wishes to see her father, although the girl hesitates as her brothers are away at camp. When Britt tries to force his attentions upon Monica she calls for help; Dave, passing, hears her, breaks into the house and throws Chester to the floor. After Brett hurriedly leaves, Monica tells Dave that she has always loved him, but avoided him, ten years ago, because she believed it her duty to take care of her brothers. When Mr. Dilger refuses to allow the two to wed they elope, with the help of Monica's brothers. Shortly after this, Mr. Dilger is injured in an automobile accident. As he dies, he receives forgiveness from Monica and Dave. Election night brings a sweeping victory for Dave and Monica.

STRANGE WORLD

Arlene Baukind Adventure File No. 11573

FROM the east dormitory of the college, a bare headed youth came running, calling, 'Jane! Jane!" Enthusiastically they greeted each other and as they walked down the street arm in arm, discussing the puppies Dick had given her many years before, a tall freckled lad bumped into them. He stammered awkwardly while Dick, recalling he was the chemistry honor student who spent hours working in the lab, introduced, "Mary Jane King, Larry Garhitty." Interested, Jane's eyes widened while Larry explained he was working on a rocket to fly to Mars. "Whee, that must be grand. Mars!" Jane exclaimed. Dick grew impatient. "Come on Jane. Race you home." With a backward nod to Larry, Jane was off in a flurry of flying heels. All that afternoon Dick confided to Jane about his crush on a fragile blonde little girl he had just met. Jane looked down at her stocking torn at the knee where she had slipped and wondered why Dick had never thought of her as a woman as well as a great pal.

That night preparing for bed, she sighed deeply. Suddenly a sheet came down over her head. A strong sweet odor filled her nostrils and she was carried through the night to a tiny shack. A shrouded slim figure kissed her forehead, set her in a queer machine, set off a lot of machinery, and with a terrifio explosion Jane was off, sailing through the air at an incredible speed. Awakening in midflight, Jane stared in amazement at the firmament through which she was hurling. Dizzy she dropped off again and regained consciousness in a strange land—Mars. Strange things happened. Mysterious messages, trapdoors, giants who bellowed commands, unearthly colors and foods, and wonder everywhere. After the first shock Jane began enjoying this upside-down land, but her impudence to the giants seemed to upset the gigantic louts considerably. When Jane refused to act as a decoy for passers-by to enter the giant's castle, she was seized in a vice like grip and carried kicking and screaming to an inner chamber where she was clothed in exotic veils by a group of submissive females Martians. Posed seductively at the entrance of the palace, Jane remained tantalizing out of reach of passing males. One came by, stopped in fascination, then, drawn irresistibly walked toward the archway. Instantly the walls drew together, the trapdoor sprung, and the victim dropped to his doom. Overcome by the realization that she was little better than a murderess, Jane gave away to hot tears. Then, surprised, she looked up to see the concerned, handsome face of Larry Garhitty. As he came eagerly toward her, Jane screamed a warning, but with a leap, Larry sprang over the fatal archway and landed lightly at her side. Gathering her in his arms, he carried her out of the garden of doom and hurriedly made his way to the waiting rockets. The Martians, aroused, gave pursuit, but with a double explosion, the rockets veered off into space. Back on earth Larry explained that it was he madly in love with Jane and jealous of Dick, who had taken Jane on the flight. Jane's parents, after the most joyous of welcomes, withdrew leaving the two young lovers together and as Larry drew her in his arms, a succession of bright flashes indicated the arrival of newspaper reporters. Confused, the adventurers joined hands, and with a little cry of happiness ran after Dad and Mother.

Everett Fisher Drama File No. 11772

WITH reverent affection, Patrick O'Day gazes at the portrait of his deceased wife as it hangs over the fireplace in his home in East Ireland. Molly, his nineteen year old daughter, enters the room, and as he tenderly places his arm around her Patrick explains that it was her mother's wish that she should visit their relatives in America when she became a debutante. With tears in her eyes, Molly tries to smile as a group of friends she has known since childhood sing ballads of Erin during a farewell party. A short time later, father and daughter view the statue of Liberty as their steamer sails into New York Harbor. They are met at the dock by Patrick's sister, Helen, who embraces him, and is then presented to her Irish niece. As the three drive to Helen's palatial residence, plans are made to introduce the young Irish girl to society at the same time that Helen's daughter, Elaine, is presented. Although Molly eagerly embraces Elaine, the latter turns coolly away and vainly attempts to persuade her mother that this cousin is an ignorant country girl who will harm her chances for a successful debut. Nevertheless, the dance is given for both girls, and Elaine's friends are amazed when the "country cousin" turns out to be a poised and radiantly lovely young woman.

Dr. Robert Hamlin dances almost continually with the popular Molly "cutting in" whenever possible, while Elaine slips away with young Richard Connors. The next day Molly accidentally enters the room when Elaine is carrying on a whispered telephone conversation with Richard. Upon being accused of spying, Molly denies this charge and goes upstairs to her room, throwing herself upon the bed and giving away to tears. . . Robert invites the two girls to a swimming party at his home. When Elaine sees that Molly has obviously captured his interest she persuades him to join her in the pool; later she slips away and hastens to Richard. Left alone, Robert soon returns to Molly and at last wins permission to take her to dinner the following evening. The Irish girl's eyes sparkle with pleasure until she sees Elaine and Richard enter the same cafe. Recalling Elaine's displeasure at her overhearing the telephone conversation with Richard, Molly snddenly concludes that Elaine and Robert must be secretly engaged. Pleading a headache, she asks to be taken home. The following morning, Molly and Robert accidentally meet as both are enjoying a swift canter along the bridal path. Dismounting the two silently survey the beautiful country; suddenly Robert crushes Molly to him, kissing her passionately. For a moment she returns his embrace, then breaks away and rides swiftly home. Elaine informs her that she is, indeed, Robert's fiancee. Persuading her father to take her back to Ireland, Molly prepares to call Robert and bid him goodbye when she hears Elaine and Richard planning, over the phone, to run away. Hastily, she locks Elaine in her room, and goes to Richard's apartment. As she pleads with him to abandon his plans Molly is embraced by Richard. In struggling to free herself she breaks the strap of her gown. Maddened by the beauty of her white skin, Richard will not release her, but at last she falls, striking the table corner and losing consciousness. Richard pours liquor on her lips and telephones for Robert who, utterly disgusted with Molly, takes her to the hospital and leaves. A few weeks later the saddened girl enters her stateroom as she and her father are about to sail for home. Here she finds Robert. He tells her that Richard confessed the truth, and Patrick smiles as he sees the two lovers embrace, as he discreetly withdraws.

THE REVEALING CRYSTAL

Leo Zimmer Drama File No. 11688

"I'll clean up this city if I have to do it single handed," newly appointed Chief George Blottner was saying. Gene Crowley, brown eyes gleaming, looked up into the earnest young face and pleaded, "You'll be careful darling, won't you? I love you so." The next moment they were in each other's arms.

At the Mozey Club, most fashionable of the night spots of the city, Gene Crowley was dancing at the head of the butterfly number. Suddenly there was a stir as Mayor Cain, himself, entered with a party of diamond decked visitors to town. The chorus worked harder than ever. Mayor Cain smiled good humoredly at being recognized, and Gene winked slowly. As she hoped at the conclusion of her dance the Mayor sent for her. She joined him at his table and acknowledged the introduction to the other members of the party. One of the fat men, Gene noticed, was wearing the largest diamond stick-pin she had ever seen. Gene danced with the Mayor and listened to his unctnous compliments. Later, as they returned to the table, a drunk bumped up against the table upsetting it. He was put out. A few moments later the man with the diamond shouted, "I've been robbed." Police went after the drunk, searched him and his apartment thorughly, but the diamond had disappeared. Meanwhile George was going on with his investigations. Several of the big politicians had been exposed. George had received several warnings to stop if he valued his life. Meanwhile the Mayor was coming nightly to see Gene dance, and Gene was making her own observations. Alone with George, she reassured him when he grew bitter about her friendship with his Honor. She was becoming notorious, George warned, but Gene assured him she was just helping him.

One evening, while applying salve to a burn on his neck, George was confronted by a masked man. "Hands up," he was ordered, and struggling desperately he was blindfolded and taken in a car tor a ride. As he fought his assailant's hands tightened about his throat. The Chief of Police struggled free, and dropping fifteen feet off the road, remained hiding at the bottom while the baffled bandits splintered the groud ineffectually with bullets. A passing motorist gave George a lift home. When George recovered from his near murder, he learned that the First National bank had been held up, robbed of fifty thousand dollars, and the cashier had been shot dead. The only clue was a stickpin from which a huge diamond had been removed. Gene recalled the missing stickpin that night at the Mozey club and George snapped his fingers appreciatively. Both the fingerprints on the stickpin and on his salve dneck corresponded.

During one of her numbers at the Mozey club, Gene danced with a crystal ball. She offered to tell the infatuated Mayor's fortune. He placed his moist hands on the crystal. The fingerprints on the glass, on the stickpin, and those taken of George's would-be assassin corresponded! George gave a party at his home for the city notables. Gaiety reigned. The Mayor's eyes gleamed as he learned that Gene Crowley was dancing. But the pay-off came when the Mayor was arrested. Under fire he confessed to the hold-up, the murder, and several other crimes. George was made mayor-elect, and for his bride he took the lovely Gene, without whose invaluable assistance he could never have gotten where he did.

A GESTURE OF FATE

Otto Guenther Melodrama File No. 11779

THE strains of Lohengrin's Wedding March are heard in the living room of Daniel Van Swenton's palatial home as the noted financier enters with his only daughter, Janis, radiantly lovely in bridal white, and gives her away to Bob Stewart, a construction engineer. After the ceremony, Janis bids farewell to her friends and boards a steamer, en route to the mountainous country of Lhasa in inner Mongolia where Bob is to assist in laying a road bed for a railroad. On the steamer Janis, while touring the decks with Bob, encounters Dorothy Moore, a friend of boarding school days, who is on her way to join her father, a missionary in Tibet. The two girls hold a happy reunion. While sauntering through the streets of China Bob and Janis discover a group of bandits attacking a Lama. Swiftly, Bob drives them away; as a reward, the Lama presents him with a sacred ring which will supposedly bring him security in his travels. This Janis persuades him to wear, as they thank their friend and leave. Dorothy, Janis and Bob are travelling on a train which is secretly loaded with military equipment for a Provincial War Lord. During the night, Kasarov, leader of a mongol band, loots the train, killing the crew. Stunned by a blow from one of the bandits, Bob is left, as they believe him dead, while Dorothy and Janis are taken captive.

A Lama, noticing Bob's ring, applies first aid and assists him to reach the offices of the American Consul. Diplomatic conditions render it impossible for him to be granted a pass into the section of the country where Kasarov may be found, and Bob is forced to bide his time. Remembering the name of the Lama he once befriended, Bob goes to him and is advised to join his Order; in this way he can not only help to rid China of its roving bandits and the much hated Lama of Tashi but he will be able to search for his wife. Consequently, Bob takes the oath, renouncing creed and race and garbs himself in the Lama costume. Meanwhile, Janis is rescued by a missionary band while Kasarov's men are camping, but they are unable to save Dorothy as one of the guards gives an alarm and they are forced to hasten away. Janis assists at the mission, refusing to return to her home, since she has vowed that nothing but death will part her from Bob, and still believes that somewhere, they will meet again.

Capturing a small band of Kasarov's men, Bob tortures them until they confess that they slew the white girl in order to be rid of her. Insane with rage, Bob becomes ruthless and absolutely without fear as he captures band after band of the mongols, winning the title "the white butcher of Tibet." At last he captures Kasarov; the missionary father, with Janis, plead with him not to torture his prisoner. With a gasp of amazement, he recognizes Janis and agrees to turn Kasarov over to the Provinal anthorities, whereupon the kindly father invites him for dinner. His mission fulfilled, Bob renounces his pledge and exchanges his costume for a dinner suit. When Janis rushes to Bob's arms with tears of happiness shining in her eyes, the mission father, smiling, tells the cook that dinner will be served later, as he leaves husband and wife together.

HOT TEMPERED

Sadie Van Lenten Short Subject File No. 11828

BIG, Irish Pat Murphy disagreed with practically everything and everybody. He considered himself an authority on any given subjeet although his education had ended after he had spent three years in attempting to pass the third grade. His foreman stood in awe of his temper until Pat abused one of his fellow workers, causing the man to quit. Then the foreman informed him that he would give orders—until Pat had been appointed in his place. Since Pat had a wife, Mary, and two children, Jean and Jimmie, dependent upon him, for once he did not answer back. Taking his anger out on the nearest object he kicked the dog and the unfortunate animal went off howling down the street. Crossly he asked why dinner was not ready; when Mary replied that it would be as soon as she fried the steak he snarled that he would throw the meat outside if it was tough. Calling the children, Mary apprehensively served dinner. Pat's piece of steak contained a piece of grizel which he could not cut; raving, he picked up the table cloth by its four corners and dumped it in the yard while neighbors watched at their windows and Mary remained silent. After he left she reset the table for herself and the children. Still in a temper, Pat ordered his dinner at the lunch car, then entered the barber shop where he asked for a shave and haircut.

Tony the new barber, asked Pat, who wore his hair straight back, how he wanted it cut since it was badly mussed from frequent ruffling. Not heeding. Pat thought he asked whether or not he wanted hair tonic and replied: "Suit yourself." Tony then parted his hair in the middle. When Pat saw the result he flew into a rage and attempted to strike Tony but the other barbers took him out of the shop locking the door. When he had cooled off and started for home Pete, the bootblack, who had gotten Tony his job, stopped Pat. He warned him that Tony was once hired by Chicago gangsters to take their victims for a ride, and pictured many lurid killings in which the Italian had participated. As a result he had been sent to the penetentiary, where even the warden feared him. Released, he determined to go straight for the sake of his wife and child and for this reason had controlled his temper just then. Pretending not to be afraid, but inwardly quaking, Pat nodded and started for home. The next morning at the breakfast table he started to apologize, much to Mary's amazement, but could not finish.

Pat waited as long as possible before getting another haircut, until his friends began to comment on his appearance behind his back. At length he went to a barber shop in the next block and sank into an empty chair, ordering his usual shave and haircut without a glance at the barber. Only when his face was covered with lather and he heard the barber talking to himself in Italian did Pat realize Tony was shaving him. When Tony asked him how he wanted his hair parted he meekly replied: "Suit yourself. Tony," and apologizing for his conduct on their previous meeting, tipping him handsomely when he learned that he had been the cause of the barber's dismissal. On his way home, Pat brought toys for his children; flowers and steak for his wife. And nothing ever again made him lose his temper.

HIDDEN JEWELS

Mrs. Anna M. Pierce Drama File No. 11866

WITH a broad smile of content Mandy Blake walks away from the Five and Ten Cent Store surveying the imitation jewels she has just purchased. Her ample figure is pushed about by the surging crowd, but she continues to smile. When she sees a fretful baby the kindly colored woman draws out her treasure, a glass diamond ring in an imitation platinum setting, for the child's amusement. At that moment a rat faced man rushes by, knocking the ring from Mandy's hand, and disappearing in the crowd. Feeling in her ample pookets she draws a ring out. glad that she has not lost her treasure. Mrs. Harris, wife of the police captain, drives by and gives Mandy a ride, commenting to a friend who is seated besides her that the colored woman is almost as much loved by children as their own mother and washes clothes whitier than anyone in town. Sergeant John Burke wearily requests his wife to leave the baby with Mandy and accompany him on a short drive. Then he confides that Mrs. Townley, wife of a big shot at the City Hall, was robbed of a diamond ring valued at six thousand dollars and a purse. Money was found on the suspect but could not be identified. The purse was also discovered in a corner of a street car, but no trace of the ring could be found. Tommy Evan, a neighbor who accidentally met Mrs. Townley and was assisting her with her parcels, was also suspected. However, no one believed him guilty as his character was well known, but Mrs. Townley had forbidden the boy to call upon her husband's cousin, Madge as a result. The girl was broken hearted at this edict.

Knowing and liking both Madge and Tommy, Grace sympathizes with them as well as her husband who, she realizes, may easily lose his job as the result of this unreasonable woman's demand. The two go to the little home Grace has had built for Mandy in an old wash house and coal shed; here they discover their child playing with a bracelet on which Mandy's rings have been strung. The colored woman explains that the bracelet is her good luck charm, requesting John to sell it for only if she becomes very ill, which he promises to do. As the improvised teething ring is returned to Mandy. John and Grace take their son to his home. Months of anxious searching for the missing solitaire pass. When it is not found John is dismissed from his post in spite of his splendid record, due to political influence. He is curtly informed that his position will be waiting for him when he finds the missing ring. Tearfully, Madge confides in Grace that she loves Tommy but her cousin, with whom she lives, has separated them.

Mandy is suddenly stricken; the doctor informs Grace and John that he must operate. As they are in straightened circumstances, they are forced to see their old friend taken to the charity ward, until John remembers the bracelet, and attempts to sell it, with the glass rings locked around it. In amazement, the jeweler informs him that there is a valuable diamond in the collection. John realizes, with an exclamation of joy, that Mrs. Townely's ring was dropped in Mandy's pocket—and his own son was teething on it. He instructs the doctor to send Mandy to the best hospital in town, purchasing an annuity for her with the three rewards he collects for the ring's return. The faithful colored woman chuckles as she lies in the hospital, recovering, and surrounded by flowers. The following morning a much admired sergeant of police is welcomed back by his loyal force and, after Mrs. Townley is forced to apologize to Tommy, two happy young people embrace.

STUNT FLYER

Mabelle J. Nelson Drama File No. 11832

ALTHOUGH their little farm is mortgaged to the hilt, Peggy Mann persuades her husband, Wallace, to stay with it instead of becoming an aviator, for the sake of Little Mann, their adored son, who is happy and healthy in the country. When half their cows are taken by the health inspectors because they fail to pass the tuburcular test and skunks destroy their chicks Wallace is determined to leave. He quarrels bitterly with Peggy, at last saying good bye to her and his boy. For a month he studies aviation, then, homesick, for his family he flies back to the farm with one of pilots to find that Peggy and Little Mann have gone; foreigners who purchased the farm cannot tell him where. He returns to the aviation school and becomes a stunt flyer. In a small village, Peggy and Little Mann make a new start; Peggy takes in washing to help finance the tiny home she purchases and the youngster does his bit by selling papers, often walking miles. Adelle Carter, a circus performer, becomes attracted to Wallace; although they often dine and dance together he cannot return her affection. Every night he looks at the pictures of his wife and child, longing for them and hoping to find them.

When Peggy sees photographs of Adelle and Wallace, which the circus entertainer has instigated, she becomes bitter. She attempts to inspire Little Mann with a fear of planes as she notes his interest in the mail pilot's machine. C. W. Sheldon, a wealthy retired merchant, often talks to Little Mann when the youngster delivers his papers. A friendship grows between them; Sheldon, also, is interested in the boy's attraetive mother, whose story he has heard from a former neighbor of the Manns. He offers to give Little Mann a bicycle but Peggy refuses, stating that he must earn it. Then Sheldon offers a bicycle as a prize or the boy who can grow the biggest pumpkin in time for the state fair. Enthusiastically, the youngster enters the contest when Peggy purchases pumpkin seed for him. Heavy rains, stray chickens, and two dogs who fight on the hallowed ground nearly ruin the vine but at last it prospers. Peggy and Little Mann feed the plant milk when the pumpkin is set and the happy boy is given first prize at the fair. Little Mann insists upon watching the stunt pilot; when he hears that the flyer's name is the same as his own he questions his mother but she refuses to answer. Fascinated, he watches each movement of the plane while Peggy keeps an eye on him but, using the excuse that he wants a drink of water, the youngster slips away and, recognizing his father, rushes to his outstretched arms. When he tells him that he would enjoy an airplane ride more than anything else, Little Mann is granted his wish; Peggy, horrified, sees father and son entering the plane. She hastens to him but is injured by a team of race horses as she crosses the track. A pilot takes Peggy to the hospital in his plane while her anxious husband fulfills his contract, performing his stunts under terrific strain. At last he is free to go to Peggy, now out of danger. As he kneels besides her, one arm about Little Mann, he tells his wife that he has saved enough money to purchase a small farm; will she help him manage it? And she answers with a kiss.

BREAKFAST FOR THREE

D. Harrington Drama File No. 11780

AT the close of each school day, Jonathan Harper and Jerry Parker raced to the main entrance of the city high school to see who would have the honor of carrying pretty Judith Merson's books. The boys flipped coins to decide which one would he allowed to take her to the school dances, since the young lady wisely declined to decide between them. This rivalry continued through the first two years after school when hoth boys, filled with the importance of their first positions, urged Judith to marry them. Jerry, with his strict application to duty, drew a little the larger salary, but it was gentle, philosophical Jonathan, with his sense of romance and adventure, whom Judith really loved. One day, when they were picnicking together at the outskirts of Plainsville, their home town, she surprised Jonathan by accepting his habitual proposal, and laughed at his astonishment, as he hastily took her in his arms. The following month the two were wedded at Judith's house; after a heavenly and all too short honeymoon they purchased their own little bungalow. Jonathan worked twice as hard as he ever had before, saving every cent he could manage, and Judith sang happily as she took care of her doll's house. Promoted because of his constructive suggestions on managing the grocery business, Jonathan was sent to a neighboring city.

Then came the depression. At last Jonathan's manager was forced to let him go. There followed weary and unsuccessful days of searching for employment, while Judith tried to do her part by encouraging her husband. After a particularly wearing day of attempting to create a spring wardrobe from made over clothes and prepare a meal from warmed over dishes, Judith's courage failed her. The next morning breakfast did not appear until eleven and it was served in icy silence. When Jonathan, after futile attempts at conversation, sighed, Judith reprimanded him. When he cited, with contempt the number of men who were solving their problems by suicide, leaving wife and children alone in the world, Judith stormed that any man of feeling could not "philosophize" while his wife was starving. Looking at the simple, but adequate, meal, Jonathan thought of a suitable retort, but said nothing.

All the fighting spirit gone from him, Jonathan walked desperately away from town, heedless of the hot summer sun pouring over him. Worn out and more unhappy than he had ever been he paused before a mountain stream—and Judith's words came to him. In this condition there seemed no good reason to go on living. A voice, pronounced in its British accent, and informing him genially that he was on private property, interrupted his reverie. He accepted the owner's hospitality, and as the two men were sipping whiskey and soda, he was informed that his friend was sailing for London to join his wife, Shirley, on the morrow; could he help him select a reliable American agent for his firm? An hour later, contract in his hand, he rushed home to find Judith gone, her room in disorder! She must have gone to Jerry—or could she have taken her own suggestion? Faint with relief, Jonathan saw his wife emerge from the bathroom, fresh and lovely. Her comment on the good news was: "So, Jony dear, now we can have Jonathan Junior?" "And Judith Two," he replied, his arms about her.

SWEET FREEDOM

Lola M. Pence Drama File No. 11786

THE eldest of six children, Millie hastened home after school each day to assist her frail, nervous mother with household tasks and care of the younger members of the family. Each night, at the sound of her father's key in the lock, she waited apprehensively. If he had been drinking it was often her task to prevent him from drawing a gun on her mother when the two quarreled. Denied most of the normal pleasures of girlhood, Millie was the gayest member of the group on the few hay rides and picnics that she was allowed to attend, but her suspicious mother's unjust accusations robbed her of most of the pleasure of these innocent diversions. At last, no longer able to endure such unfair treatment, Millie left home at seventeen. Her belief in God and the power of prayer gave her courage to face the world, alone. Soon she secured work in a factory where she made friends with many of the girls of her own type and joined in their diversions. During the summer months the factory closed. As Millie had not worked long enough to save money she immediately took a position as a household assistant with Mrs. Manly who, although firm in her demands, showed the girl every kindness and soon regarded her as a personal friend. Ralph, Mrs. Manly's young cousin, became attracted to Millie while visting and invited her to attend the theatre with him. When Mrs. Manly sanctioned this, the girl eagerly assented. In the days that followed, the two fell in love, and planned to marry when Ralph graduated from college.

A travelling salesman, J. H. Manly was seldom home and Millie came to dread his visits when, under the influence of alcohol, he was often brutal to his wife. Receiving a telegram that her sister was desperately ill, Mrs. Manly was forced to leave at once; Millie assisted her in packing and other hurried preparations for the trip. A few days later she wired Millie that her sister had died. On the night after the funeral Mrs. Manly, overcome with nervous exhaustion, collapsed and was forced to remain in bed for a period before attempting the journey home. Alone in the house, after carefully bolting the doors, some instinct warned Millie to place her employer's small, pearl handled revolver under the pillow. A few hours after the girl had retired she heard someone downstairs; trembling, she lay quiet until her door opened and Manly, intoxicated, entered. Upon his invitation to make love to him, Millie hastily retired to her closet, throwing her things hurriedly out of the window and climbing down on a rickety ladder left by the painter. Swiftly she ran down the streets till she fell unconscious. When she awakened she found herself gagged and held firmly hy Mr. Manly. He carried her to a car, drove home, then threw her upon her bed. Reaching for a revolver, the girl shot three times, noticing, before she fainted, that Mrs. Manly stood over her.

Unable to afford a lawyer, the girl pleaded her own case. As she completed her story, a nurse entered with a confession of his own guilt signed by J. H. Manly just before he died. As she turned to go, Mrs. Manly took her home, explaining that she respected her for protecting her honor and preventing her husband from destroying his wife's love. When she received a wire from Ralph, en route to marry her, Millie knew that her faith in God was justified.

STOLEN HAPPINESS

Helen C. Dickie Drama File No. 11787

INFLUENCED by two older schoolmates, adventurous, thirteen year old Julia West runs away from home to their tenement apartment where for the first time she dons the forbidden paint and powder. Police interrupt a wild party given by the girls to take the frightened child to court where, sobbing, she runs to the arms of her distracted mother and all is forgiven as she tearfully tells her story. Two years later War is declared; Detroit plays host to the many soldier boys encamped on its outskirts. At a dance given for them Julia meets Ralph Nelson, a tall, lanky Swedish youth, from Timber Lake, South Dakota. The two fall in love, but the clerk will not marry them as Julia is under age. At last her mother gives her consent fearing the headstrong girl will do something reckless if she withholds it. When Ralph is transferred to a camp in Cleveland, Julia's faithful mother gives her railroad fare to visit the young husband, sending Gloria, her older sister, with her, as a chaperone on the journey. At last separated from Ralph, Julia returns home and becomes a telephone operator while her mother runs a boarding house, cheerfully caring for her six children and aided only by Gloria who has an important position with an automobile manufacturing company. Two brothers marry war nurses in France. When Ralph returns, Mrs. West gives him and Julia a hall bedroom, all she can spare, while he holds down various temporary jobs, completely untrained for city life.

The first grandchild in the family, Ralph junior, is born to the young couple, and there is much rejoicing as the baby is christened. Julia, still eager for pleasure, returns to work, leaving the care of the baby to her mother, and stealing out on dates. When she comes home at a late hour she glibly explains that she was working over time, but Ralph, seeing her enter a car on New Year's Eve, quarrels with her. Julia strikes him with a chair and hands him a gun when he threatens suicide. Julia's brother, Kenneth, and his wife offer to adopt little Ralph but his mother will not hear of this and hides the youngster when the childless couple plan a Hallowe'en party for him. Successful as a carpenter's assistant, Ralph eagerly tells his wife that his employer has offered to build a bungalow for them which he can pay for in small installments taken from his salary, but the selfish young woman will not consent to this, as it would mean an end to her gay times. She meets Frank Koch who takes her to a roadhouse. As the two are driving home th ecar falls in a ditch and both are slightly injured; Julia is not worried because of the poor example she is setting for her son, as she laughs at her mother's scolding.

Wishing to divorce Ralph, Julia orders him from the house and when he returns to his farm to make a new start, she pleads desertion. Her mother agrees to remain silent if she is given the custody of little Ralph to which Julia assents, but shortly after her marriage to Frank, Julia breaks her promise and the issue is decided in court, with Ralph testifying against his former wife. She is to have the child only on weck cnds. When Frank secures a position in Washington, D. C., he and his wife take Ralph away from school in their car; two boys report this, and Ralph, senior, visiting Mrs. West, pursues them in a stolen Cadillac. Light from his car blinds Frank until he plunges over an embankment. With the help of passersby, Julia, Frank and little Ralph are rushed to a hospital, where Frank immediately dies. His sentence suspended, Ralph anxiously waits around the hospital corridors. The doctor summons him, and he holds the hand of his beloved little boy as the child dies. After the funeral, the sad task of telling Julia the truth falls to Ralph, and as he gathers her, weeping, in his arms, and tenderly comforts her, both agree to build a new life out of the mistakes of the past—once more together.

HIS GREATEST CASE

Henry Hansmeier, Jr. Drama File No. 11782

AS he is seated before the fireplace in the living room, Charles Rexford, District Attorney, tells his only daughter, Kathryn, that he does not approve of the frivolous, gay life she has been leading or the group of idlers she has chosen as her companions. The girl listens, seriously. Later, in an open roadster parked in front of the house with young Egon Buckwalter, Kathryn, remembering her father's conversation, tells the boy that he must choose his profession and make good before she will become his wife. Rexford, driving up just after Kathryn has slammed the door and entered the house, addresses a few jeering remarks to Egon, whom he particularly considers worthless and likewise slams the door. Through the influence of his father, Joseph Buckwalter, a prominent mining engineer, Egon secures a position with the renowned firm of Keith-Marineau, lawyers, in the exclusive Stanley Building. Although possessing an LL.D. himself, Egon is kept busy at routine work and cases of minor importanee. All drinking is strictly forbidden by his employers. Inwardly he rebels, but sticks to his position for Kathryn's sake.

Meanwhile Richard Greever, a field engineer, is promoted by Mr. Buckwalter to the local office and dances with Kathryn at a party given by Egon. Instantly attracted, he wins permission to call, and when he is not studying his minerological books, is frequently with Kathryn during his leisure hours, to her father's complete satisfaction. She invites him to come to a dance at Lake Pavillion, although Egon is escorting her. Finding Kathryn at a small table in the bar room with Egon, Dick joins them; at her suggestion he orders hot tea and rum, omitting the tea when he prepares Egon's drink, and taking Kathryn away to the dance floor. Infuriated when he learns that his daughter has gone to a place of which he disapproves with Egon, Rexford drives to the pavillion, and strikes the young man when he encounters him, alone, on the porch, but when he discovers Kathryn and Dick dancing together he leaves, content. Intoxicated, Egon protests after he has been left alone all evening; when he attempts to place his arm about Kathryn Dick sends him forcefully to the floor. In despair, Egon drives to his office at the early morning hour, writes a note of farewell to Kathryn on a sheet of half used paper, tearing it in two, and shoots himself, but he ducks as the bullet whizzes past, and is only slightly wounded. He drives to the river; the following morning his car stained with blood from his wound and with his farewell note pinned to the cushion, is found by police.

Two years later Edwin Hamilton, a lawyer, rents a suite in the Stanley Building and wins a number of brilliant cases. He is appointed assistant District Attorney to Rexford and through him meets Kathryn, who becomes interested in this unusual man with irregular features, glasses and a distant manner. However, he courteously avoids her. After an evening at the Pavillion, with hot tea and rum, Dick proposes to Kathryn; weeping, she tells him that she loves only Egon and proposes suicide. Recklessly they drive away until they crash into another car; Dick is killed instantly and the driver of the other car, apparently dead, disappears.

Prosecuting relentlessly, to Rexford's amazement, Hamilton charges Kathryn with manslaughter, then resigns and leaves the city. Later he returns, showing that the occupant of the car is alive and has signed a confession that he was driving without lights against a traffic signal. When Kathryn calls at his office he explains that he was righting a wrong done to him at Lake Pavillion, and shows her a torn piece of paper, containing a message that "You can win," by a psychology teacher. The other half matches Egon's farewell note, which she draws from her purse. Then Hamilton removes his disguise—and as Kathryn goes to Egon's arms, all past misunderstandings are forgotten!

WAVES OF DEATH

Harry Gendos Melodrama File No. 11707

THE hour of midnight. All over the country, people are dancing, humming the latest tune now being broadcast over the radio air waves. Detective Leon DeRanik is comfortably relaxed in a leather easy chair as the strains of music fall softly. Suddenly, the radio splutters. There is a moment of dead silence before from the loud speaker barks forth a mysterious voice announcing, "Tomorrow at this hour, James Mulhall, mayor of Chicago, will be dead." Twice the warning is repeated before the stations resume their customary programs. DeRanik springs from the chair and telephones one of the large broadcasting companies who are as puzzled as he. Thousands are questioning the police in frantic horror. Newspapers rush extras while the President issues a reassuring bulletin and orders an investigation made. The next day visitors to City Hall are carefully examined for weapons and identification papers before being permitted to enter the executive offices. Despite these precautions, Harvey Lambert, secretary to the wealthy manufacturer, Stanley Loring, rushes terror stricken from the mayor's office a few minutes after his arrival, to announce that Mulhall is dead. A police officer who had been stationed in the private office for additional protection vouches for Lambert's innocence. A week later the voice is again heard. Only this time the nation is further shocked to hear the names of three of Chicago's most prominent business leaders listed for a fate similar to the mayor. Adam Hershman, millionaire importer, refuses to heed the warning and will not permit the police to establish guard over him. The butler last sees him in the library and his master is still there the next morning, all life fled. Both inquests fail to reveal the causes of death for Mulhall and Hershman have always enjoyed excellent health. Yielding to the pleas of his daughter, Rita, Loring sends for DeRanik to conduct a private investigation. Curious about Lambert, DeRanik questions Rita with whom the secretary is obviously in love. However, she knows little of him previous to his present employment. Time is pressing and though a thorough investigation of the enemies that any prominent figure makes while climbing to success is conducted, DeRanik returns to the Loring house one evening, at last convinced that he has reached the first blank wall in a hither-to brilliant career. Lost in thought while walking along the garden, he stumbles upon Rita endeavoring to escape from Lambert's unwelcome embraces. After calling Lambert roughly to account, DeRanik assists the girl into the house, unconscious of the secretary's malignant glare. Awakened from a sound sleep in the early morning hours, DeRanik learns that Hayes the financier is dead in similar, strange fashion. It is late evening before DeRanik finds a clue, a handkerchief lying near the body. As DeRanik holds this, he becomes aware of his hand, burning and irritating. A faint peculiar odor is attached to the handkerchief. Hasty tests in the laboratory reveal that the cloth has been treated with a chemical of rare poison which causes death when rubbed into the pores. Fortunately, DeRanik is aware of an antidote. The striking of the clock reminds him that Loring's hour is near. While guests are merrymaking, DeRanik arrives in time to save Loring. However, he pretends that tragedy has befallen, and lines up the guests. None hesitate to reach for the handkerchief when asked, except Lambert. Placed under arrest, Lambert confesses that he sought vengence on the four who years before stole a valuable formula from his father, a chemist. Foiled in a last minute attempt to escape with Rita, Lambert takes poison, and DeRanik comforts the shaken girl he has grown to love.

SCREEN SONG

Myrtie Brodt-Buzzard Drama File No. 11706

WHEN young David Trent rescues Ching Lee, the laundryman, from the destructive pranks of his college classmates, he wins a loyal friend and also meets for the first time lovely Sarah Ann who watches him from the outskirts of the crowd that shamefacedly listens to Trent's lecture on good sportsmanship. During the following days, the pair are constantly together about the campus and under the spell of a warm-spring night, David proposes and is accepted. The romance is interrupted when David is suddenly called home to the bedside of his father and mother, stricken with a fatal illness. Before his father's death, David promises to continue the education which will prepare him for the diplomatic career he is intent upon, and to take care of his Uncle John whose own brilliant career has been crushed when he refused to uphold a crooked manoeuver. Now David first learns that his parents denied themselves in order to pay for his schooling. Supporting himself through his last semester with odd jobs, David feels in honor bound to release the moderately wealthy Sarah who refuses to hear of it. Upon graduation, he becomes attached to an important law firm which grows so impressed with his ability that David is aided in securing a secretaryship with the American Ambassador to China. The lovers resign themselves to parting until the time when they can afford marriage. While boarding the ship. David is astounded to meet Ching Lee who is determined to return to China as the servant of his rescuer. The peaceful trip is disturbed when David finds his cabin ransacked one day. Later while taking a nap in a secluded part of the deck, he awakes in time to grapple with a thief going through his coat pockets. David is aided by Leo Rondue and Francis Sombre, fellow passengers, who unknown to David have "framed" this meeting to win David's goodwill. They carefully cultivate the secretary since they are part of an international group which sells state secrets and advance information to rival powers. All Europe is interested in America's attitude toward China and Japan and it is Rondue and Sombre's function to obtain information from David or, failing this, disqualify him and arrange to have a more favorable secretary replace him. While playing a record made by his fiancee, in his new quarters, David feels particularly lonely and hits upon the inspiration of making a film of himself accompanied by a record of a song which he composes, "My Picture of You." This he sends on to Sarah Ann. Meanwhile his fiancee has spent the first few weeks moping at home until her aunt gradually instills the fear that David is forgetting her. His letters grow colder through the result of suppressing the news of the surprise on its way to her. Persuaded one night to go to a dance and weekend party, she meets Peter Andrews, an orchestra leader of social prominence, whose devotion in the following days makes a deep impression. Distance and the knowledge that it may be years before they can afford to marry, makes the image of David somewhat unreal yet Sarah Ann wishes to be faithful. Peter's love, too, demands an answer. While thrashing out this problem in her room, the package from China with the accompanying letter of explanation is brought in. Soon she is looking and listening to her beloved and all thoughts of Peter are banished. In China, under the tutelage of his ship-friends, David sees much of the city but is too cautious to spend any time with feminine company for his chief who has taken a liking to David warns him that many are spies. Growing disgusted as time passes and David ignores all their subtle questionings, Rondue and Sombre pay a surprise visit to his rooms while Ching is visting relatives in another province, and order him to reveal the contents of an important message which they are aware that the Embassy has received. Angry upon learning their true colors, David at first indignantly refuses and then is shown faked photographs of himself which place him in a compromising light with a strange woman. His visitors threaten to give these wide publicity which will ruin his career. David is given twenty-four hours. All night he paces the room—if he sells his country's secrets he can never again hold up his head and if he permits the photographs to be published his career is ruined. His decision is made when a roll of film and records come from Sarah Ann with her screen song of love and message of faith in his integrity. When the blackmailers enter, David has arranged a camera and dictaphone for evidence. The Secret Service men, whom he had previously sent for, arrive but the visitors grow suspicious and refuse to let him answer the door-bell. Ching Lee returns unexpectedly and they gain admittance with his key. Soon David is to learn that through him, the Embassy has succeeded in rounding up the notorious gang they have been seeking evidence on for years. When he receives a sudden message to call at the flying field, David discovers his sweetheart, her aunt, and Harlowe, motion picture director, who wishes to purchase their Screen Song. Alone with David Sarah Ann attempts to persuade him but he refuses to commercialize their love. Her eyes fill with tears since she had thus hoped that an early wedding would be possible. But she is soon reassured when David shows a bankbook containing his ten thousand dollars reward issued to "Mr. and Mrs." A button is pressed. In the darkness her face glows on a miniature screen and together they break into song.

WINGS OF REGRET

Mildred Edwards Drama File No. 11789

RIDING slowly along the bridle path of The Oaks, her father's estate, Doris Cameron encounters Melvin Clarke, a stranger, whom she directs to her home, with a proud little toss of her head. When Jessie, the housekeeper, conduots Clarke into the study where Howard Cameron is waiting, Cameron, directly, asks for leniency in paying his gambling debt, the first he has ever incurred. Noticing Doris outside the window, Clarke agrees to let the matter rest and remains for dinner. The sole comfort of her father since the death of his beloved wife, Doris has been isolated from young people and as she listens, entranced, to the worldly Clarke she finds the realization of her girlish dreams. When her father becomes ill a few days later, Doris rides to the hotel at his request and summons Clarke. At her father's gentle questioning after Dr. Lee has told him that his days are numbered, Doris confesses that she loves Clarke, as he suspected. Influenced by this, Cameron gives his consent when Clarke proposes that he marry Doris, inheriting the estate only after the owner's death. Lawyer Lindsay draws up these generous papers and Cameron informs Doris, but Clarke says nothing to her.

A few days later, Cameron sinks into a state of coma. The motherly Jessie prevails upon Doris to go for a walk with Rex, her police dog. A storm comes up suddenly and Doris seeks refuge in the doorway of the little maple syrup hut. Frank Gardner, a young naturalist, invites her inside, introducing himself and stating that her father has given him permission to use the cabin. He prepares luncheon for the girl, and listens with concern when she tells him of her father's illness, helping her home later. Clarke is called away on business but Gardner is a frequent visitor, helping Cameron when he is taken with a sudden attack, and remaining in the guest room at Doris' request. When Clarke returns he sees Doris hasten to Frank, in the garden, and becomes jealous, although she explains that she thought it was Melvin whom she was joining. At her father's request, Doris conquers her pride and requests Clarke to marry her at once. Cruelly, he laughs at her humiliation, but, wearing pearls which her mother bequeathed to her on her wedding day, the girl becomes his bride. Jessie slips a bunch of violets, sent by Frank, into her hand; when Clarke discovers this he charges his wife with being untrue to him and refuses to believe her denial.

Determined to break her proud spirit, Clarke denies his wife all affection. He sells part of her father's stock of blooded cattle and attempts to borrow, Gypsy, her horse, for women guests at a hunting party which he gives at an adjoining cabin. When Frank, away on a business trip, returns, Doris summons him at her father's request. Inadvertently, David Connel, Clarke's guest, reports this. In a rage, Clarke follows Doris and finds her, alone, in the cabin, where he accuses her. Then he tells her father that Doris is unfaithful causing an attack. When Jessie reports this to Doris, all love for her husband goes, but, with the help of Frank and Dr. Lee, Cameron's condition improves greatly. After bitter words to his wife, Clarke leaves for the city where his friend, Wentworth, convinces him that he is in wrong and really loves his wife. Clarke at last sets forth to admit his error to Doris, but is seriously injured in an automobile accident on the way.

When he regains consciousness he finds Frank nursing him. Sullen and angry at first, Frank's kindness at last wins him, and he confesses that some perversity in his nature has made him unjust but he had wished to make amends. When Frank forgives him and prevails upon Doris to do the same he openly weeps. Believing that he has but little longer to live, Doris promises that when he recovers they will start again. Frank, unable longer to conceal his love for Doris, prepares to leaves, but when he finds her, unconscious, in the snow outside his cabin all barriers are swept away. Both confess their love, but agree that they must help Clarke, who now has a chance to live. A jealous fit of temper, brought on when he discovers Doris bidding farewell to Frank, who is sailing for South America, causes his end. He attempts to shoot Frank, who enters when he hears Doris' warning cry. Frank wrests the pistol from him, and forgives the unfortunate, lonely man as, at last, he dies. When Doris turns away Frank's arms are about her and Cameron sees that his beloved child will at last find the happiness he almost robbed her of, in his blindness.

THIS ONE HOUR

McCloud Porter Drama File No. 11853

WHILE changing trains at Atlanta, Georgia, Raymond Potter notices a pretty southern girl who is conducted to a seat across the aisle from him. He smiles but she turns coldly away, opening a magazine which she begins to read. Five employees, returning from a convention for salesman, attempt to engage the girl in conversation, one by one. They offer her candy, cigarettes, the newspaper, and make various remarks about the weather, but she pays no heed, and at last tells them to stop bothering her, in no uncertain terms. Discouraged, Potter decides that he will have no chance with the young woman, but he watches her, fascinated. When she attempts to open her window he springs to the rescue. Smiling, she thanks him, and asks him if he will bring her a pillow; at once, he does so. Then she asks him to sit down, while the five employees stare in amazement and chagrin. She tells him that southern girls do not usually speak to strangers, but he seems to be different. Deeply flattered, the young man listens while she explains that she is bound for Philadelphia to visit her aunt. After much persuasion, she gives him her address and asks him to call if he is ever in the city. At the next station the young woman, whose name is Frances Hornes, bids him farewejl, and, with his help, leaves the train.

Although bound for New York Raymond collects his baggage at Pittsburgh and changes to a Philadelphia train. Once in the city he jumps in a yellow cab and gives the driver Frances' address in Germantown. He is met at the door by the girl's aunt, who tells him that Frances has spoken of his many kindnesses to her on the trip, as she invites the young man to dinner and summons her niece. During the meal, Frances confesses that she has always wanted to see Atlantic City. Quickly Raymond invites her to go with him and at last her aunt consents. The two enjoy a glorious holiday on the boardwalk, riding on the various concessions and eating popcorn like a couple of happy children. They swim in the afternoon, later lying on the hot sand. When they return, Frances' aunt has prepared a little surprise party for them. At the conclusion of this happy day, Raymond bids farewell to Frances, promising to see her on his return from Canada, and goes to the Y. M. C. A. where he packs his bags.

In Montreal, Raymond's friends give him a rousing welcome and plan a gay party for his benefit, inviting a group of chorus girls. In the midst of the hilarious celebration, Raymond constantly thinks of Frances and cannot enter into the fun. Suddenly he leaves the party and returns to his hotel. When Stewart, a business associate who is sharing his hotel room, questions him about this unusual behaviour he replies that he has discovered that he is in love. Renouncing all his former pleasures, Raymond works feverishly, to the amazement of his employers who had always regarded him as a happy go lucky young man. As a result he is promoted and given a substantial position. When he confides that he wishes to be married the head of the firm good naturedly gives him a short vacation. He hastens to the home of Frances' aunt where the maid informs him that the young lady has gone to the railroad station, to return to Georgia where she is to be married. Raymond catches her just as the train is pulling out, and as she rushes to his arms her aunt wires the girl's mother that Frances has suddenly changed her plans.

NO-MAN'S ARMY

Franklin L. Couch Drama File No. 11704

THERE where only two people in the world who could get along with Otto Leitner, his son Carl and his second wife Hilda. Many years before Otto, then a German military instructor, had quarreled with his superiors, shouted that the whole German system of kultur and militarism was at fault. Renouncing his fatherland, he had migrated to the United States with his motherless son. There he had become a citizen of his adopted country, found a position teaching at an American University, and becames famous as a terror of an instructor hut one whose lessons were never to be forgotten. Hasty-tempered, hot-headed, Leitner jumped at conclusions and became the despair of his colleagues. Only Hilda Jannssen, history research worker who shared his office, saw the essential shyness and tenderness which Otto hid under a brusque exterior. Even his son whom he loved dearly was deceived by his gruffness and was inarticulate in his presence. Her tact and understanding unlocked Otto's tongue. When Carl fell ill, it was Hilda who insisted on performing the little tasks that no paid nurse could do. Together they watched the night of the crisis and when dawn came, Otto knew Carl was safe and that Hilda was dear to him. So Leitner, who had buried his dreams of love with his first wife who had quarreled with him incessantly, found himself a few weeks later taking another woman to wife. To the amazement of everybody around, the marriage of Hilda and the volcanic Leitner was a success. Again and again, Leitner questioned her about what she could see in him, unable to believe his own good fortune.

Then one day he came upon Carl and Hilda in intimate conversation. A terrible suspicion leaped into Leitner's heart. Before the impact of his accusations, Paul and Hilda fell back speechlessly, stunned; Leitner did not give them a chance to answer. Ten minutes later, he strode from the house and without telling anyone, signed up for military service overseas. In the trenches, Leitner, now a colonel, sought to forget his gnawing pain. Though sometimes he shut his eyes tightly as he directed his men against the Germans, once his countrymen, there was never a thought of disloyalty. America was his country. America for a little while had given him a home, happiness. Thinking of this again one day, he remembered with renewed anguish the two who had destroyed all his faith and content. Again he turned to concentrate on the dispatches before him. Every surprise attack of the Americans found the Boches waiting in great force at a supposedly weak point. Somewhere in their midst was a spy. Colonel Leitner gave orders for a vigorous search. No mercy was to be shown the betrayer. During the night, he was awakened hy the report that the spy had been found. In yankee uniform, the boy had been seen creeping across the field from the German lines. Thundering his orders, Leitner looked up into the face of the traitor. Suddenly he gasped. "Carl!" Bitterly he assailed the boy who had destroyed his home and now betrayed his country. Carl's lips moved soundlessly before he was removed for court martial. When the son left, Colonel Leitner buried his head, shaking with grief.

Hearing footsteps shortly, Leitner hastily composed himself. Stunned, he heard a captain report that Lieutenant Carl Leitner was not a German spy, but one of the cleverest American scouts, posing as a deserter to enter the German lines. "My boy," Leitner murmured, all the pride and insolence suddenly vanished. Carl stared implacably for the space of a moment, then softly explained. "That day . . . I was telling Hilda about Amy, my bride . . . I never could speak to you. . . ." Leitner turned white-faced. "Then there was never anything between you two," he said in relief.

From his suitcase, Leitner pulled out a photograph which he had been unable to bring himself to destroy. On the desk now, Hilda's face smiled upon the two. While cannons boomed in the distance, father and son drank a toast to her.

THE MOUNTAIN ANGEL

Martha Dusenberry Drama File No. 11790

GOLDEN haired Leona Ward had many admirers in the Ramapo Mountain district where she lived, but since school days her sweetheart had been Bill Brookes, a neighbor boy. The eldest of nine children in a poor family, Leona was urged by her parents not to marry a boy who had as little as she, since she would be forced to work hard all her life, and could not help educate the younger boys and girls. As they strolled over the mountain paths together, Leona and Bill planned their future. If only he could secure enough money to purchase a small farm, he confided, he would be able to take care of his sweetheart's younger brothers and sisters while they were in school, but he was penniless. As she assisted her mother with the household tasks and cared for her invalid father, Leona tried in vain to think of some way in which she might help. One morning she arose early to pick blueberries at the lake, thinking that at least the small sum she could secure from their sale might prove useful. Night fell, and the girl did not return. Anxiously Bill led a party of searchers, but, after several days, no trace of the mountain angel could be found. All gave up except Bill, who spent the greater part of his time in this endeavor. In the fall he discovered a family who lived a mile south of the lake and who reported that they had heard a woman's scream as it being carried away by force, at the time of Leona's disappearance.

Bill also learned from these people that Zypanier Conklin, an eccentric old man in the community, had not returned from Haverstraw where he went last July. Desperately Bill searched the mountains. Exhausted, he fell asleep, dreaming that he found his beloved in an old mine. Awakening, he discovered an iron ore mine, abandoned in the eighteenth century, similar to the one he had pictured in his dream. Hearing a pistol shot, Bill turned, to find Zypanier with his gun leveled at the younger man. With an unsteady hand the old mountaineer shot several times, but missed. In self defense, Bill shot back, mortally wounding Zypanier. After determining that the old man was dead, Bill, lighting one match after another, explored the mine. In a dark crevice at the center he discovered Leona, tied to the damp ground, unconscious. Feeling her pulse he discovered that it still beat feebly. Carrying her to the outside world, Bill took water from the mine and tenderly bathed her face, discovering a small wound on her forehead which he dressed. At last she opened her eyes and smiled faintly. Pitifully weak, since she had eaten nothing but fish and corn meal since her captivity, Leona had to stop frequently on her way back home. While her parents welcomed her joyfully, Bill reported the matter to police, who exonerated him in the shooting on the grounds of self defense.

When authorities explored the mine they discovered three thousand dollars in silver and bank notes as they burned the hay mattress. The old miser was given a funeral with this money and a portion of it was awarded to Bill, who purchased his farm with it. Here Bill brought his bride and her people. Today another Leona, seven years old, with her mother's golden hair, is growing up in the mountain country.

TIE-UP

Hallie H. Henderson Comedy Drama File No. 11863

GENIAL Bill Logsdon invites Sarah Kemp, his wife's old maid sister and Amos, his bachelor brother, to make their home in his lodge in the Kentucky mountains. When the two arrive, Mary, his wife, attempts to make them feel at home as she introduces them. Each responds bashfully and timidly scurry off to their rooms, not appearing until dinner time, and adding nothing to the conversation except to ask for certain dishes. Bill, Jr., the young son of the house, abruptly asks them why they don't talk while his parents hastily request him to be quiet, explaining that Uncle Amos and Aunt Sarah are tired after their journey. But in the days that follow conditions remain much the same as the two apparently cannot conquer their shyness. When Marry sees how much both of them enjoying playing with little Bill she tells her husband that it is a shame they have no homes and families of their own and he agrees. After dinner Bill, Mary and Bill, Jr. often gather around the huge fireplace to pop corn and tell stories. Amos and Sarah sit silently at either end of the fireplace, wistfully watching. When they retire, Bill comments to Mary that it is a pity each must go to his own room and lonely fire, when two hearts might beat as one, and she adds that there is many another lonely bachelor and spinister in the community.

That gives Bill an idea; with Mary's help he plans a party. All spinsters and bachelors between the ages of forty and one hundred are invited to a party at which grape juice is to be served. Eagerly the women read the announcemnt and prepare, buying all the perfume that the general store can supply. One of the guests fills her slippers with sweet tern seeds. Dressed in their best, and many of them wearing an unaccustomed touch of powder, they arrive at Bill's house but, alas! the bachelors do not appear, and the girls are forced to go home defeated. Nothing daunted, Bill tacks up a proclamation on the town bulletin board inviting only bachelors, and promising each a reward to be found in a small ball of yarn. They appear and duly unwind the ball, to discover a small bottle of Kentucky moonshine in its center. While the men enjoy this they gather around the piano. Bill leads them in singing and a happy stag celebration is held while Sarah watches in amazement, cautioned by the smiling Mary that she must not join them. This keeps up for four nights; each time the balls of yarn grow larger and each time the bottle in the center increases in size. As the men leave the house in a hilarious frame of mind they remark that they would not miss one of Bill's parties for anything.

On the fifth night the balls of yarn are so large that the guests remark each must contain a hogshead. But when they unravel them, a spinster is enclosed in each one! Desperately, the men attempt to escape, but, tangled in the yarn, they find this impossible. At last they give up. Refreshments are served and all timidity is forgotten as a result of the wild scramble. When the guests leave two by two, headed for the parsons, lead by Amos and Sarah, Bill states that his ball party was a success and Mary smiles in agreement.

OUT OF THE PAST

Ann Forse Melodrama File No. 11785

PASSENGERS on the evening train en route to the State Asylum notice a beautiful, carefully dressed girl, held firmly at the wrist by a stern matron while the sheriff, across the aisle watches, and comments that she must be another prospective inmate. One of them remarks that she is Marion Wainwright, the heiress, recently committed by her step-father, who preferred to send her here rather than to a private institution, for some unknown reason. At the entrance, Marion's restless brown eyes seek some method of escape, but this is impossible as she is hastily led inside. After supper, which the girl cannot eat, another matron conducts her to her room, ignoring her protests, and leaving her to toss unhappily on her narrow bed through the long night. The next morning she avoids the friendly advances of the patients who greet her at the breakfast table, shrinking away in fright. Dr. Johnson, head of the ward, listens sympathetically when she tells him that she was committed here because she refused to marry her step-brother, Ted Wainwright. In this way the money her mother left her would have remained in the family, but, as she was engaged to David Brooke, this marriage would have meant that her fortune would have belonged to her and her husband jointly. Seeking the only other way to retain her fortune, according to the terms of her mother's will, her step-father had had her declared unsound in mind, as his son in this way became the heir.

Although anxious to help, Dr. Johnson turns sadly away, as he has heard many of these stories . He is troubled with a vague feeling that he has seen this girl before, as he turns away. A dance and informal entertainment is given at the asylum; at first Marion refuses to attend. But, touched when she sees the inmates in their best dresses, many of them dating back to the period of hoop-skirts and bustles, she resolves to bring what happiness she can to these unfortunates. A trained dancer, Marion delights them with a beautiful solo. As she watches the change in their expression, Marion realizes that mental illness is no more a disgrace than physical illness; many of them can be cured and all can be made happier. Listening to Marion's sweet, plaintive voice as she is singing: "What Would I do Without You?" Dr. Johnson enters her room and questions the girl. She tells him that her mother, long ago, used to sing that song to her father. Then he disappeared. When he was at last given up for dead, her mother married Holbert Wainwright, believing he would help to bring up her little girl. Instead, his cruelty was so unbearable that her mother died a year later. While away at boarding school she met David Brooke, a young engineer, and became engaged to him. Upon discovering that she would not marry Ted Wainwright and would deprive him of the estate, her step-father, through political influence, had her committed to the institution.

Convinced at last that she is sane, Dr. Johnson sends for David, his own mind in confusion. Rushing to her, he asks her her mother's married name, and when she replies "Middleton," clouds clear away. Dr. Johnson, a victim of amnesia for many years, realizes that Marion is his own daughter! He left his wife and child to attend a medical conference in Berlin; overwork took its toll, and he lost his own memory—Marion's song had restored it. Presenting the facts, Dr. Johnson is instrumental in securing the prosecution of all connected with his daughter's incarceration, while she joyfully welcomes him. Safe in David's arms, the girl plans her wedding. It is held at this very institution where her happiness was found, in the doctor's office, while her friends in the hospital orchestra play the wedding march.

THE CROSSING OF THE TRAILS

Jack Brown Melodrama File No. 11854

ALONE in front of his camp fire, Hank Russel shudders as he listens to the howl of a wolf, leader of the pack, whose mate he killed. As he gazes into the fire he sees, in retrospect, his boyhood home in Texas, Jean, his young wife, and their little son, Bob, running to meet him at the end of the day. With a sigh, he reflects that he probably will never see them again, as, listening to the strains of a guitar in the distance, he falls into a fitful sleep. The next morning Russel completes his map of trap lines and returns to his lonely cabin. Noticing that there is a circle about the sun, an indication of a coming storm, he chops a supply of wood and prepares to remain at home. Wistfully he watches the birds migrating toward the south, his heart longing to follow them. Bob Winston, young game warden, tells his sweetheart, Lucile Heywood, that some strange monster has been terrorizing the settlers and killing their cattle. If he can kill this menace the reward will enable him to resign from his post and build a cabin so that they may be married. Anxiously the girl pleads with him not to endanger his own life in this cause.

Some instinct warns Russel to lock his cabin door that night. He awakens to see a strange, inhuman figure prowling about, outside his cabin. Seizing his revolver from the table he goes to the door, but the figure disappears. Trembling with fright, Russel returns to his cot. Shortly after this a storm breaks, and during the flashes of lightning Russel sees, again, the hairy monster. When the storm causes his door to fall apart the weird figure enters. Russel attempts to shoot, but misses. He loses consciousness as the hairy arms of the monster encircle about him. Bob Winston, riding towards shelter, hears Russel's shots and screams. He hastens to the cabin and fires six times at the monster who disappears, apparently uninjured. Feeling Russel's pulse he perceives that there is still a faint spark of life in the man and sets forth to revive him. After working all night, Bob finds Russel still in a state of coma. He rides to Sam Forrester's store where he finds Dan Heywood and Lucile. After much persuasion, the girl is allowed to accompany her father and Bob to the cabin. Deftly she nurses the injured man and prepares supper for her companions, while Bob watches in admiration. In delirium, Russel begs "the law" to take away the monster they have sent after him, wildly protesting his innocence. Lucile and Bob steal away to watch the red gold sunset over the Platte River while Dan Heywood sleeps. His arm about the girl, Bob tells her that someday they will always be together, although he fears the fact that he was unable to kill Russel's assailant will mean discharge. Regaining consciousness, Russel watches them, but reflects, aloud, that if he does not hold the boy responsible he himself, may he arrested.

That night, as Bob is preparing to retire, Russel notices a birthmark on his shoulder. After questioning him, he learns that Bob is his own son, and is told that Jean died, forgiving him. Russel confesses that he was unjustly accused of robbing a woman and left home as circumstantial evidence might have convicted him. He dies, willing his cabin to Bob and Lucile. The next day settlers find a dead gorilla, escaped from a circus, on the river bank, and peace reigns once more.

THE SHADOW OF THE CROSS

Louise Butler Drama File No. 11865

WEARILY Marcheta plodded onward, frail hands clasping her love child. In the garden of the Spanish mission near her destination, her mother's home, Marcheta rested at dawn. Weakness crept over her as she prayed for strength to find a home for her son before death claimed. The shadow of a cross reflected on the wall of the garden shone upon her in promise. Yet the "safety" she promised Leonardo would have mocked her had she known that even now the mother, Conchita, was praying that her unseen grandson would die. When dusk came, death visited Marcheta a few steps before Narvado Castle, just after she called for help. Conchita ran too late, and picking up Leonardo swore vengeance on the unsuspecting babe who had cost the life of the one most dear to her. Until his twentieth year, Leonardo was a tortured prisoner in the home of a mad woman, longing for release and unable to escape. The one desire of Conchita was to hear him beg for mercy. A night came when in the darkness Conchita revealed the cause of her hatred; then struck him repeatedly with an old rawhide whip until his face and body were ribbons of cut flesh. Sinking to the floor unconscious he appeared to beg for leniency and Conchita left, satisfied. One day he recovered and spied an open door leading to the outer world. Leonardo escaped but not before Conchita attempted to follow screaming, "A curse upon you and who ever comes into your life." Frightened and hurt, he stumbled along back streets until Captain Dears of the American ship Good Hope had him brought aboard and nursed to health. New life seemed to open for Leonardo until he came to Dears' home where the old maid-sister, Anna, resented his presence and felt that he had robbed her of her brother's affections. On his next trip, Dears insisted that Leonardo remain behind. Three weeks later Leonardo's friend was to lose his life with his ship and the Spanish youth be vividly reminded of his grandmother's curse. Stumbling from the house, Leonardo wandered aimlessly along the east side until he collapsed from hunger. Rescued by Alice Allen whose poverty-stricken life had driven her to the streets, Leonardo was to hear his first kind words from a woman. During the following days, she nursed him to health. Later he tried to leave, afraid of bringing unhappiness but unspoken love stirred within their hearts. Turning her back to the old love, desirous of regaining self-respect, Alice found a place as sales girl in a five and ten cent store. Leonardo was not as fortunate in finding work. The taunts of a neighbor as she returned one evening brought tears to Alice. Unaware of the cause, Leonardo was stirred into confessing his love which is too great for denial. The next morning the two became husband and wife. Through the black weeks before he at last found work they were happy in a dream world. Then he learned that she was bearing a child. In fear he recalled Conchita. One day Leonardo came home; his son was born but Alice's life was ebbing fast. Simultaneously, death was hovering about Conchita who at last realized the needless suffering she had inflicted. Delirious she wandered to the mission garden to pray for forgiveness and happiness for Leonardo and any he might love. In the moonlight the cross of forgiveness shone on the wall and thousands of miles away reflected itself in the young couple's room—the pledge of continued life for Leonardo's love.

LUCKY AT CARDS

Ralph Lewis Drama File No. 11856

THE veranda had every seat occupied, as members of the houseparty, exhausted by their morning sports, sank wearily into the chairs waiting for the luncheon bell. Pretty Raldo Lorraine idly listened to the chit-chat. Words drifted to her. Someone called, "When's Ralph Whitney coming? Won't be much chance for the other boys if he is here." Curiosity prompted her to inquire about the unknown man. Ted, her present adorer, dismissed him with the words, "Heartbreaker. Love 'em and leave 'em. . . " The bell rang at last and put an end to all discussion. When Ralph arrived that evening she forgot everything except that he did something to her pulse which no other man had caused. Raldo smiled ruefully to herself after the third dance, twice with Ralph. She had laughed at "love at first sight" and yet—In the garden, they seemed to drift naturally into each other's arms. Ralph was very gentle with her; the magic spell of emotion had touched him also. During the next two days they played constantly together during the day and the evening belonged to the isolated circle of love. Each had already delayed departure but the final evening was approaching. On the garden bench, Ralph at last whispered, "Love me forever?" Her "yes" was a defiant pledge to the future. Going to her room later, Raldo's happiness was tarnished; brought rudely back into reality when she overheard her hostess say, "Oh, Raldo's just Ralph's latest lady of the evening. All of them fall for the line of that modern Don Juan." Hours she paced the floor before departing secretly to test Ralph's love. If he really cared, Ralph would follow. Weeks dragged on, however, and she heard nothing more. Later she was to learn that the wires and letters he sent had been intercepted by a bribed servant. When an aunt later introduced her to Philip Wendhall, the gifts and attention his wealth made possible and his swift infatuation were balms to Raldo's pride. Nothing mattered. At least Philip might be happy, she thought. So they were married and Raldo tried to hide her lack of love in fulfilling the functions of a dutiful wife. Unknown to her, this was not enough for Philip who had once thought that in marriage he could awaken her to a kin response. So he drifted from her leading an inner life apart from the smooth surface the world saw. Five years passed and Philip returned one day with Ralph whom he had met in business. The two pretended to be strangers; it became impossible for Ralph to avoid coming to the Wendhall home. With Peggy, a cousin of Philip who lived nearby, they made a frequent foursome. One night at bridge, Ralph and Raldo, partners, won the rubber. Peggy archy reminded, "Lucky at cards, unlucky at love." Philip meaningly responded that it was untrue in this case, teasing her into confessing that she and Ralph were engaged. Following congratulations, Ralph left to escort his fiancee home and then return to the Wendhalls. Her nerves frayed by the knowledge that she still loved Ralph, Raldo taunted Philip with drinking too much and not realizing that even if he no longer cared another might, resulting in a challenge for her to make Ralph forget Peggy—whom she claims he has pledged through propinquity and not love—for a half hour. In that time, Raldo forgot it was make-believe. Both learn of the misunderstanding of the past and that their love is still foremost. Surprising them in each other's arms, Philip revealed that he had always known so to change their "might have been" happiness to "its going to be" had framed with Peggy to cause a situation bringing Raldo and Ralph together. Secure in their happiness, the two are never to know Philip's sublime sacrifice of his own love.

ONLY YOU

Elsa Burt Drama File No. 11858

MOONLIGHT shone upon the boy and girl who strolled together, bound in the sweet intimacy of youth. Wallace was to always remember this night when Ruth Olstrom granted his first kiss. In the months that followed, minor clouds shadowed their happiness. Two years older than the fifteen years of Ruth, Wallace and she had been a part of the inner circle of church and school since early childhood and their friendship was looked upon with indulgence. Although Wallace, displeased that Ruth could not always accompany him, occasionally took another, Ruth never resented it, secure that she alone counted. A year passed and the awaited May-day Party came. The day started as beautifully as they had anitcipated until Wallace suddenly withdrew. Alarmed, Ruth walked aside with him to learn that Wallace was jealous of her polite response to Ted Ranston. It took several minutes coaxing to persuade Wallace that his imagination had been over-active. Nearby Betty, her older sister, worriedly observed this. In the months that followed these spasmodic outbursts grew worse. Knowing that her parents were distressed, Ruth at last told Wallace they must part but he pleaded that for the love they had both confessed, another chance be given. Yet when Wallace caused a violent scene at the Senior dance, Ruth refused to grant another trial, aware of its futility from past experience.

They rarely met during the following year but from rumor, Ruth learned that he was going with Marian Beardsley. To Ruth he first announced his engagement while she resisted the silent pleading in his eyes. Though aware that he was in love with another, Marian cared enough to marry him. Ruth's love had not died but remained a hidden precious thing in which each meeting brought pain. She entered training for a nurse and it was through her friend Nancy that she learned Marian had divorced Wallace who proved unfaithful. Later he married Jane Bently but Ruth was too busy to think, devoting herself to others. A visiting nurse in New York's east side she fell ill with pneumonia. Learning this, Wallace came to assure her that with Jane's help he had at last become a man though it was no secret to his wife that underneath all, it is still always "only you." During recouperation, when Ruth learned that Jane had suddenly died, she decided to accept a position in Chicago. Her sense of honor declared that Marian who still loved her former husband had the right to seek happiness again with Wallace and her absence might provide the opportunity. However, Wallace followed her. It was sweet to be with him . . . for just a moment she yielded in his arms. Pleading fatigue, she escaped to her room. Dawn found her fighting the temptation to surrender but instead she ran away again. None knew where she had gone. After months of futile search, Wallace, suddenly feeling old and tired, longed to return to the scenes of his first happiness. The same impulse drove Ruth and they accidentally met at Betty's home. Now she was to learn what he had come to Chicago to tell; that Marian had become engaged to another. And she was free to relish the old familiar words,—"Only you!"

SWEET SORROW

Hattie Naples True Story File No. 11950

EAGER to serve his country, Phillip volunteers during the first months of the Spanish American War, but is rejected as he is underweight. Securing work with an engineering company which is building a dam, the young man bids farewell to Gertrude, his sweetheart and joins the men. William, the superintendent of the company, instructs him. The two become fast friends as they pass the long summer evenings playing cards and talking together. Three times the dam breaks loose, carrying all their work before it. Mollie, a horse who has become a mascot with the camp, is severely injured; tearing a piece of his shirt, Phillip bandages the faithful animal. Discouraged because he lacks the proper materials for the work, Bill gives up, but Phillip persuades him to give him a chance. Doubtful, because of Phillip's youth, Bill hesitates, but at last consents. Hiring additional men and instructing them to drag heavy logs, Phillip at last successfully completes the dam, and is congratulated by Bill and Mary, his fiancee, whose father is a prominent engineer. The following Sunday, Phillip saddles his horse, Nellie, and rides toward Bill's cabin for a visit. As he approaches he sees a group of people on the border of the dam and discovers that the lifeless body of Bill has been recovered. Concealing his own grief as best he can when he looks at the body of his friend, Phillip leads Mary away, taking her to her father.

His health greatly improved, Philip is accepted for service in the war and boards a train for Tampa, Florida. When the troops arrive a heavy rain breaks; in amazement they notice alligators at every turn of the road. On the battlefield Phillip displays great bravery. In the midst of the cannon roar he prays that he may return to Gertrude and his aged mother. Peace is declared, and he soon holds his mother in his arms. In spite of his splendid record on the dam Phillip finds it difficult to secure work as other men have filled his place while he served his country. Knowing that George Brody, a prominent merchant, wishes to marry Gertrude he breaks his engagement to the girl, as he feels he can offer her nothing. Phillip opens a modest real estate office and a second hand clothing store, selling government goods. Once a week he holds an auction; there is much amusement when he sells a pair of boots at a good price and the purchaser later informs him that they do not match. Pitching government tents and equipping them with a few necessary articles of furniture, Phillip rents them to settlers.

While Phillip and Joe, his friend, are fishing, the boat catches on fire. Joe attempts to beat the flames down with his overalls but fails. Both men are forced to jump into the river and swim for their lives. Weakened by hardships of war, Phillip calls to the younger man who at last pulls him to shore. Gertrude, picnicking on the bank with Brody, witnesses this and rushes to Phillip, telling him that she loves him alone as she holds him in her arms. Then Phillip explains his reasons for avoiding her; she assures him that his financial status makes no difference. They are married, and Phillip purchases a beautiful home for his wife, buying it only a few minutes before another purchaser appears. Mary's father offers Phillip a position but he refuses as his business is successful. With Gertrude, he wins a place in the community, helping to develop it.

BLUNDERS IN ROMANCE

Marguerite Moutier Sherman

Drama File No. 11909

INTO the harbor of Newport, fashionable resort of New York's socially prominent, streamed the boat which carried Lennox Murray, young Virginian who had reeently returned from a five years stay abroad which left him disgusted with American customs. With him was his father and Mary a distant cousin who had persuaded Lennox to stop at Newport which she felt would convince him continental manners could be found in the more aristocratic circle. Just before they reach Ocean House, exclusive hotel, Lennox remonstrated against Mary's use of the word "cousin" preferring that she address him by name. Mr. Murray who loved Mary as a daughter was grieved at his tone and quietly told the girl that he feared his son had been badly spoiled by his aunt with whom he traveled in the principal capitals of Europe where he had been extremely popular. Mary denied this, admiring his fastidious appearance and ways. However, she felt that it was high time he married and had brought him to Newport with the secret hope that there he would find a suitable bride. The hotel crowded with people anxious to sleep even in the lounge in order to possess that address further annoyed Lennox. At breakfast the next morning, the center of attention was beautiful Ella Chase seated with her mother at an adjoining table and flanked by several admirers. Her spoiled habits were evidenced when in penetrating voice she asked Stracey who "those new people" were. Before her blushing companion could answer, Lennox drew himself up and coolly introduced the little party. As they departed, Ella was shaken from her usual self-possession. When she learned that Lennox belonged to a leading wealthy Virginia family, Ella began to consider the possibility of marrying him. After quarreling deliberately with Stacey, Ella went to her room to contemplate a plan which would wipe out the memory of her former ill manners. With an air of spontaneity, she entered Mary's suite where Lennox and his father also were and breathlessly apologized. Soon both Mary and Lennox succumbed to her charms and it was not long before Lennox was her avowed adorer. Ella gloated in the added prestige which this brought. And Mary rejoiced. Their first rift after their engagement came when Lennox objected to Ella's plans to attend the fancy dress ball deeming it "vulgar." He made it known that his dream of happiness was to take her to the seclusion of his Virginia estate. Although she knew that he objected to Stacey, Ella called him to her and Lennox was forced to excuse himself. When he returned, Stacey was alone and delivered the message that Ella had retired. Lennox resented her entrusting a message to the man he disliked and hot words were exchanged. Although no formal notice was made, Newport buzzed that night with the news that Lennox was awaiting a challenge to duel. The next day Lennox stayed in the suite anticipating hearing from Stacey and though Mary was not aware of what had happened she sought to comfort him. Unconcerned, Ella had her own plans; she did not intend to bury herself in a quiet life; although she wanted a marriage which would enhance her prestige she also wanted to indulge herself with the admiration of many men. The hour of the ball approached but since Lennox did not appear to contemplate attending, the simple dress which Mary planned wearing to please him hung in the closet. Lennox suggested that his father take her but while the girl protested two notes came. Mary's was from Ella announcing that though she would not attend the hall she was presenting herself to the world that night as a bride; the card for Lennox said simply—Mr. and Mrs. Herhert Stacey.

Lennox who was thought to be on the high seas sent back Lemoine, his French valet, instead and unexpectedly returned to Virginia where he was joyously greeted by Mary. He then revealed that he had just learned that he always objected to calling her "cousin" hecause Lennox really wanted her for his "wife." And with the pleased father's blessing, Mary blushing agreed to the change.

MORE THAN LIFE

Ernest A. Benninghofen Drama File No. 11852

SWEETHEARTS since childhood, Mary and John announce their engagement during a picnic held by the church they have both attended all their lives. Weeks of happy planning follow when Mary busily sews on her trousseau and, with John, selects the little cottage that is soon to their home. An architect by profession he eagerly throws all his energy into the work, winning promotion. At last the happy day comes when John, looking into Mary's pure, beautiful eyes, partly hidden by her bridal veil, hears the minister pronounce them man and wife. Although Mary's mother cannot hold back a few tears she tells her husband that their daughter has married a splendid man and he agrees. The young couple enjoy a brief honeymoon at a neighboring resort, then return to the little city where they were born. In the days that follow, John's designs for small homes become nationally famous, while Mary, radiantly happy, helps him plan a nursery for the baby that is expected. A few months later he sees his wife, more beautiful than ever, at the hospital, tenderly holding their little daughter in her arms. As the baby grows older she comes to resemble her mother more and more each day. When the child is two years of age Mary is stricken with a fever. Desperately John sends for the best physicians in the country but in spite of their efforts his wife dies, commending little Mary to his care.

Stricken with grief, John turns to drink to forget his lost happiness. Unable to sleep, he tosses restlessly, crying out Mary's name. At last, leaving his daughter in the care of Grace, Mary's cousin, John goes to Chicago. Here he plunges recklessly into the gay night life. Sally, a dancer, whom he meets at a cabaret, becomes interested in him principally because he spends his money lavishly, and the two are frequently seen together. Neglecting his work, John loses his prestige. Although Grace writes to him frequently, informing him that his little girl asks for him continually, he cannot return a failure. Discouraged and tired of everything, John at last consents to take Sally to Europe when she repeatedly urges him to make the voyage. Intoxicated and bitterly unhappy, John packs for the trip. The night before he is to leave he awakens from a sound sleep, certain that he has heard Mary's voice, in distress, pleading with him not to leave their daughter. A few minutes later he receives a telegram from Grace, urging him to come at once as little Mary has been injured hy an automobile and is not expected to live. Hastening to her bedside, John is overcome with remorse as he looks at the little white face, so similar to Mary's own. For weeks he is in almost constant attendance at her bedside. At last she is pronounced out of danger. When she recognizes her father the little girl turns to him with a cry of joy, and he promises never to leave her again. That night, while sleeping, he sees a vison in the clouds. Two angels appear, lifting a veil; behind it his beautiful wife appears smiling and urging him always to be a good father until the day when they can be together again. As the vision disappears, angels softly sing that his loved one is waiting; some day the angels will gather him to the bright land—with her. With Grace's help, John again wins his place in the world and fulfills his sacred trust in guiding little Mary.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE

Katherine Bryant Atwood Melodrama File No. 11945

TOMMY ALLEN, visiting his aunt and uncle, Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Allen, encounters Dorothy Giltedge, who lives in a downstairs apartment, and gaily introduces himself. The girl turns coolly away, but they are formally presented to one another at a dinner given by the Allens, and soon become friends. With Dorothy as a guide, Tommy sees many places of amusement in the city. His boyish pranks, such as attempting to bring a huge dog into the dining room, awakening the roomers with false reports of a fire and ringing doorbells antagonize Mrs. Higginbottom, the owner of the building, who lives upstairs, next to the Allens. But Dorothy discovers a warm heart and a keen mind underneath this foolishness and comes to love Tom. When he asks her to marry him she consents. Bee, her little sister, becomes ill with a cold and is sent to bed at an early hour. She awakens at three in the morning with a fit of coughing; before she again falls asleep she hears the rattle of a stove lid upstairs. Will Higgenbottom excitedly rings the bell next morning, asking for Mrs. Giltedge. At once, she hurries upstairs to find draperies, rugs, clothing, upholstery, relentlessly slashed in the Higgenbottom apartment. Calming the distracted owner, Mrs. Giltedge sends for the chief of police who arrives with a detective. Questioning everyone, he learns that the Dees, in a downstairs apartment, were asleep, after a session with a sick hahy; the Giltedge family at home with Bee, the Allens at a dinner, while Mrs. Higginbottom, her children, Willie and Hattie, and their old nurse, Patience, staying with them temporarily, attended a picture show and retired at an early hour. Tommy, alone, cannot account fully for his actions, as he was driving home from a fraternity dinner, unaccompanied.

Assuming charge, the detective bores a hole through the ceiling of the Giltedge apartment and on the floor underneath a bed in the Allen's. While the excited children watch he listens to conversation secretly, but gains no clues. On the third day of the mystery, Tommy suddenly leaves town without a word of farewell to anyone; his relatives are as completely surprised as the others. Will is unable to arouse his mother one morning; she says that she is not sick hut drowsy. The boy becomes ill himself shortly after breakfast, and Hattie, remarking that the food does not taste as it should, refuses to eat. Continually, Nurse Patience looks at the picture of a departed child, which was slashed until only two pieces remained; each time she remarks that no mother could have done that.

When Mrs. Giltedge hears a knock at the door she admits Patience, while the Chief of Police hides in the coal cellar, the detective in the pantry. "Do they think I did it?" Patienee nervously asks. As the bell rings, Mrs. Giltedge answers the door, returning to say that it was only a book agent. Assuring Patienee that no one is considered guilty at present, Mrs. Giltedge bids her goodhye, then throws away the rice she was cooking for supper, at a sign from police. A former employer writes that Patience apparently removed oil paintings from their frames at his home, since she was the only one who had access to the attic. Swearing her innocence on the Bible, Patience is taken away by police to a hotel and watched. A houseman, entering through the transom when she does not respond, sees that she has hanged herself with a rope of sheets, to the chandelier. Tommy returns, explaining that he left in order to save Patience, little dreaming that the poor, frustrated woman was a poisoner, as well—and Dorothy rewards him with a kiss.

THE UNFAILING LIGHT

Viola Jacobs Drama File No. 11970

THE youngest of a large family, little Catherine learns to assist with the household tasks as soon as she is large enough to manage a broom and a dish towel. Before she is seven both parents die, sadly the child places flowers on their grave, but in her eldest sister, Louise, she finds a second mother. It is Louise who insists that she find time to play and who works far into the night sewing party dresses for the child so that she may enjoy the same pleasures as her classmates. And it is to Louise that she comes with all her youthful confidences for advice and counsel. Her mother's hrother takes property belonging to the orphan children, advising them to sign papers which deprive them of all rights before they are old enough to understand what they are doing. A wealthy aunt, refusing to care for the children, attempts to place Catherine in an orphanage. With flashing eyes, Louise indignantly tells her she will never permit this and secures a position as school teacher, in order that she may support the child. Many young men become attracted to Louise but she refuses them all, stating simply that her life belongs to her little sister. Religious by nature, Louise attempts to guide the gay and pleasure loving Catherine along the same path, but the girl is too absorbed with her own pursuits to turn to church work.

While attending a dance, Catherine is tagged by Vincent, son of a banker. Attracted by his suavity and sophistication she often goes riding with him in his high powered car, although Louise warns against him. When he asks her to accompany him on an extended trip to the orient, without benefit of clergy, Catherine sees that Louise has correctly estimated him, as she calmly refuses and bids him goodbye. Ignoring his telephone calls and flowers, Catherine resolves not to see him again, although confessing to Louise that she misses this gay comrade. As Louise is on her way to the station to meet Catherine, home from college for Christmas vacation, she is struck by a truck crossing against traffc signals. The frightened Catherine is rushed to the emergency hospital by neighbors but before she arrives, Louise dies. Sobbing hysterically, the girl is led away from the dearest friend she has ever known. Returning to college, the gay Catherine is so changed that her friends scarcely recognize her. No longer interested in studies she neglects them until she is discharged from college. Seated alone in a cafe, little caring what happens to her, Catherine encounters Vincent, who has been searching for her. He again urges her to accompany him, and she promises to give him her answer in a week's time. Bitterly and utterly disillusioned, Catherine wanders into a church on Sunday morning. The minister advises his congregation to study psychology as a means of self analysis. Idly, Catherine goes to the home of Dr. Lord, a noted psychologist. His inspiring words show her a new meaning to life; as she is on the point of sailing with Vincent she suddenly has the courage to refuse. In the months that follow, Catherine, assisting Dr. Lord in his clinic, comes to love him. When he asks her to become his wife she tells him abont Vincent, but he replies he has known all along. Safe in his arms, Catherine faces a new life with courage.

HOUSE PARTY

Marion Roberts Reabold Drama File No. 12016

MUCH controversy arose at the birth of Mary Jane West. Aunt Aubry had always cherished the name of Jean and Aunt Aubry was always to be consulted. However Mary Jane's mother had never agreed upon any point that Aunt Aubry made an issue. For many years the only common bond was their devotion to this child. Mrs. West believed in restraining girls in every possible way. Aunt Aubry believed heartily in self expression. Jane had grown to womanhood imbued with the very characteristics, influenced by her mother's training of which Aunt Aubry just as heartily disapproved. Mary Jane suffers a nervous collapse and it is prescribed by the doctor that she should have a change of environment. Mrs. West decides to send her to visit Aunt Aubry.

Aunt Aubry then has an opportunity to mold Mary Jane into the type of young woman she has always hoped she would be. She immediately launches her socially and very quickly Mary Jane finds her time occupied in accepting invitations to parties, dances and outings. Youth, always quickly grasps the gayety of life and to Mary Jane, it was all a revelation. She soon recovered and developed into an outstanding personality at all these social gatherings. She had an air of timidity about her which was unusual in a young woman of the day and which because of its rarity added to her popularity with the young men and distinguished her trom the other girls. At a house party given at a lodge in the mountains, she meets Nelson Windthropc, clubman and sportsman. The timidity of the girl impresses him as an unusual trait especially since all his life, he had admired courage above everything else, especially in woman this was the first requirement. A hunting trip is planned by Nelson and Mary Jane accompanies him but at the sight of a gun she becomes panic stricken and asks to be escorted home. This reaction intrigues Nelson although he nurses a certain feeling of disgust for this timid, cringing little creature. Mary Jane's mother resenting the new life that her daughter is leading asks her to return home. After a few weeks at home under her mother's restraining influence. Mary Jane longs for a further taste of the new found freedom and leaves home to live her own life. Many months later Nelson is pursuing his favorite sport in the lake country of Montrose. During a conversation at the lodge one evening he hear that a young woman is amazing the guests at Warner House by her shooting prowess. She boasts of competing with any man. Nelson's interest is aroused and he seeks this young woman only to find that the object of his intense interest is the timid little Mary Jane. She is dressed becomingly in hunting togs and challenges even him. His friendship for her ripens into something deeper inspired by this common interest but she refuses his offer of marriage, stating that now that she has overcome the fettish of fear she wants to continue to enjoy her new found happiness. She tells him that she is the same girl of whose timidity he has so disapproved. He could not have altered his opinion to so great an extent simply because she has overcome that one characteristic. He vows that he will win her love. Mary Jane tells him that perhaps in time she will feel differently.

THE JADE GODDESS

Frieda L. Polzin Drama File No. 11860

SLIPPING away from guides, Goeff Hollis saunters along the strange streets of the far east absorbing its queer by-ways for himself. The hour is late and few people are abroad when Goeff stumbles into a struggling little group in an alley-way. Instinctively, Goeffs leaps to the defense of the Hindu who is in the center of the fray. Together they make their escape after Goeff has spun a descending knife from a ruffian's hand. Grateful to the American who has saved his life, Sham-Kar persuades Goeff to accept the hospitality of his home. During the next few weeks, many of the secrets of the Orient are revealed to him, for Sham-Kar is a master of the realms of mysticism. It is their last evening together when Sham-Kar brings Goeff to a deep marble pool in a hidden room. There the Hindu pours oil on water; sets it ablaze, and as the flare sputters into nothingness a large snake appears. This he places on the palms of the wondering spectator, and as the Hindu waves his hand the snake becomes a tiny Jade Goddess, a figure of a miniature woman. Gasping in astonishment, Goeff learns that only he and the girl he is to marry may touch this charm; for all others it will revert to the snake form. Sham-Kar pledges him to part with the idol only to his fiancee and never to reveal its secret. Back in America the curious adventure would seem only a dream but that the jade remains. At a Greenwich Village studio party, Goeff finds Joan Patrick, a writer imbued like himself with zest for the bizzare. Mad-cap pleasure weeks follow until the day when Goeff is sure that he wants her always for his wife. Remembering the words of Sham-Kar, he has her to tea in his apartment. With concealed trembling. telling nothing of its background, Goeff places the figure on Joan's finger tips. The idol remains unchanged and Goeff knows that the fates have decreed Joan for his bride. After his acceptance, Goeff gives her the jade as a talisman. Unsuspectingly, Joan displays it to Mavis, her roommate, who rushing to keep an appointment with Nick Charter scarcely glances at the token. A few days later, Mavis stumbles across it while searching the bureau for funds to pay pressing debts. Stumbling across the Jade Goddess she considers pawning it but scarcely touches the miniature before it turns into a snake; when dropped it reverts to its usual form. Then she recalls a casual remark of Nick who has spent years seeking such a charm whose existence is known only to rare collectors. Having a client who will give a fortune for the idol, Nick bargains with Joan to sell the jade. Unaware of its peculiarity but valuing the property from sentiment, Joan refuses. Unwilling to touch the stone, Nick kidnaps Joan, taking her by airplane to a secluded island home and endeavors to force her to place the tiny goddess, which she now carries in her purse, in a jewel case to be turned over to him. Frightened by her absence, Mavis notifies Goeff who learns the destination of Nick's plane. He enters the moment that Nick is beginning to torture Joan and promptly knocks him down. Joan is to learn that Nick is Goeff's cousin who has a deadly horror of snakes. As punishment, Goeff thrust it in Nick's hand. Watching it turn into a reptile, Joan first finds the secret of the jade. The little goddess seems to smile upon them graciously as the two embrace.

A WOMAN'S LOVE

Mrs. Alice Terrill Drama File No. 11859

MUSIC from the piano rose softly in the little church observing Armistice Day. Arthur Blake, cashier in the Corn Exchange Bank, stared at the pretty pianist, Dora White, throughout the service. After dinner he ohtained an introduction and the romance which was to end in marriage began. Dora ended her school-marm days to become a housewife and in due time a mother. After Dode, the second child, was born, Arthur remained away from the home evenings frequently on the plea of business for he had been promoted to greater responsibility. Her trust was too great to question him and it was several years yet before Dora learned the truth. Arthur came to her and asked for a divorce, claiming that socially she was not adequate to move in the circles his work demanded. Upon pressing him, he finally revealed that he no longer loved his wife but was having an affair with Mrs. Florence Reed, a widow. Too broken-hearted to protest, Dora allowed him to obtain a divorce and have taken away the pretty home which she had been tricked into mortgaging. Married now to Florence, Arthur accepted a position as president of the small Altus Bank, ignoring his children. To support them, Dora obtained a position where she could build life anew. Called unexpectedly in the inner office one day, Dora encountered her former husband and his new wife to whom her employer, Simpson, unwittingly introduced her. Her composure held until the couple had gone and then Simpson became aware of the situation he had placed her in. Overcome by remorse, Simpson confessed his love for Dora who gently refused him. For her there could be no other man. She continued to stay with the firm; Simpson reconciling himself to the position of a good friend. A year passed swiftly. Then the day came when from the open office windows, Dora heard the newsboys shout, "Extra! Arthur Blake, President of The Altus Bank Missing. Twenty Thousand Dollars Shortage Uncovered." On the verge of fainting, Dora was found and brought home. Later she learned that they had escaped to Europe. During the still hours of the night, Dora at last concluded that Florence was to blame and that for his own sake Arthur must be brought back to repay society and start afresh. After Simpson failed to dissuade her, he took the responsibility of the children whom she moved to the old home which she had recovered, and Dora disguised herself as a man in order to frequent the better places which they probably were habituating. Months passed before she found their trail. In London, she watched the American Express Office where mail was delivered until she found Florence and trailed her to the restaurant where Arthur pleaded with the woman to bring him dope. Florence left him for a few moments and in that interval Dora persuaded Arthur to accompany her, promising him the drug. She was to learn that through this habit, Florence had gained her power all these years. Too far gone to realize what was happening, Arthur was easily brought aboard, still not knowing his companion's identity. The Bank agreed to forestall criminal proceedings until Arthur was medically fit and the $5000 reward she turned in on Arthur's debt. Soon Arthur learned that Dora had been his companion. During the five years of his prison sentence they kept in constant touch with each other and when the day of release came, Arthur learned that Florence had heen killed in a hold-up . He was free to marry the woman whose love had heen always his and return to the home of their first years of happiness.

THE STIGMA

F. M. Johnson Drama File No. 11900

OBLIVIOUS of everything except each other and the words of love unspoken in each other's heart. Jim Brail, lumber camp foreman, and Helen Neal, whose life has been spent in the backwoods, cantered along the forest path. Suddenly Helen's horse reeled and started dashing madly with the frightened Brail hot in pursuit. Grasping the reins, he silenced the frightened animal which had been aroused from its customary good-natured hy a swarm of wild hees. Helen felt too shaky to continue the ride, so hand in hand they sauntered, the horses trailing behind. The words which Brail was too shy to speak hefore now found utterance under the stress which fear aroused. "I love you, so much I—I." The girl laughed at her lover's awkward fumhling; though she blushed, her eyes held steadfast. And in them he read his answer. Moments passed before he could again speak sanely. In happy delirium, they dreamed aloud their plans for the future. Gloomily, Brail contemplated the months to come before they could reach a town where a minister could marry them. But while working one day, Brail sighted a stranger about the camp. He looked twice before he dared to believe his good fortune, and then hustled the surprised minister to Helen's home. Now husband and wife, their wedded life began in a small cottage in the forest. When the honeymoon ended, Helen returned to her parents' home. Came the day when the dread of every woodsman crouched its ugly head —fire blazed through the trees, making the land a glaring inferno. Mere chance saved Brail who found refuge in Blind River, reaching a cave where the water was shallow. Emerging on the other side, charred logs warned him that the flames had swept through the area of his wife's home. Pantingly, lie ran the few miles to the Neal house only to find it burned to the ground, all signs of life obliterated. Dazed and grief stricken, Brail was picked up by a rescue party and carried to the coast. Later, he shipped on a steamer to the Orient seeking forgetfulness. Yet some miles from the scene, Helen and her family had found refuge and were equally convinced that Brail had perished. Unable to bear the region where their love had flowered, Helen went to the city, living among strangers. When first she realized that she was to have a child, her sorrow was eased—in the little one Brail would live again. But the sneering, pointed tongues of people who disbelieved her marriage branded her and the baby girl with the stigma of illegitimacy. Only Mrs. Jones with whom she boards is kind, but after several years she was unable to bear the situation for Dorothy's sake. Again she moved, a maid in a rooming house of a mill town. The little girl is the pet of the rough men who become gentle in her presence and respect the mother whose superiority they recognize. One, Carl Westing, begged her to marry him, but the memory of Brail was too dear. Gradually she weakened, as he emphasized the advantages he could give Dorothy. A bearded stranger took a room there. Though Helen saw him seldom, he and the child were strongly drawn together. Injured, he convalesced in his room. Helen had given up her work, preparing for her coming marriage. When Dorothy told the man that she was leaving soon, she tried to console him while her mother packed by bringing in her haby shoes, a rubber doll, and a picture of her daddy which he recognized as his own. So Brail and Helen find that their mourning had reached its end. Life and happiness anew.

RADIO ANNOUNCER

Harrison Doonan Drama File No. 11857

"YOUR fortune is made, if you can produce authentio playlets of rustic life for our Wednesday hour," declares President Stone of the national radio broadcasting chain to Jim O'Connor, rising young script writer and program announcer. Given two weeks to create samples of a series of sketches, Jim isolates himself in his boarding house for several days but when he throws himself down on his cot exhausted is dissatisfied . Spying the hometown newspaper of his landlady, Hobart News, Jim feels that the tiny town will make an excellent study of rural characters. Hours later the train pulls out of Hobart leaving Jim to face the curious stares of the loungers who come daily to meet the train. Inquiring at the General Store for a place offering room and board, Jim is directed to the home of Tom Gleason, the town marshal. The glib announcer nearly loses his tongue when instead of Gleason, he confronts Mary, the prettiest girl he has ever met. Mary who finds the city man attractive is not displeased by his confusion; and boarding arraingements are soon made. Gleason greets him gruffly at mealtime but Mary's hospitable conversation is warming. Jim excuses himself to visit the general store where the men gather to exchange gossip, giving him the material he seeks. There, Mike Colbert, propriertor, is listening in on the old fashioned radio ear phone set, and relaying the program to an eager audience. For a moment he is silent while mingled emotions play about his face; finally Colbert announces that Scott 'Lefty," notorious Tulsa gangster has escaped a police hunt and is believed hiding in some small town. The men break into dispute on their course of action if "Lefty" came to Hobart. Steps clump heavily outside and Jim enters. Silence falls as each lounger looks questioningly at his neighbor and then peers back suspiciously at Jim, wondering if this stranger may not be the wanted criminal. Though aware that something is wrong, Jim refrains from giving his identity since realizing his purpose the natives may grow too self-conscious in their conversation, defeating the purpose of his visit. While he retires to the background conversation lags and one by one the men slip away. The following night, Jim returns having arranged an eaves-dropping place near the side wall of the store. His mysterious movements are overseen by Gleason. All the hanger-ons can speak of that evcning is the presence of the stranger. When he returns to his boarding place, Gleason warns that any "rough stuff" will result in arrest or worse. Breakfast the next morning is a strain for Mary, too, is beginnning to doubt. Unable to bear this, Jim tells her the truth. Finally convinced, Mary begs him to leave before the villagers harm him. Showers during the day have churned the ground of his listening spot, and while waiting Jim accidentally stumbles on oily smelling dirt which he scoops up and sends at once to Tulsa Oil Company for analysis. A coded telegram reveals the land is rich with oil deposits and experts are coming to meet him at once. Meanwhile a Vigilance Committee forms to run Jim out of town; and the town marshal notifies Tulsa authorities that "Lefty" is there. The townspeople suspect the oil men are gangsters and march threateningly upon them. Detectives break through the moh and announce that Jim is not their man. With Mary now at his side, Jim explains his presence and the discovery of oil. While the young couple embrace, the marshal hastily assures his prospective son-in-law "I knew you were o. k. all along."

THE CAMERA'S BATTLE

C. A. Johnson Drama File No. 11845

AT the opening of the World War Alfred Jorgens, a successful photographer, dreams of riding in airplanes, although he has never seen one of them, and of taking pictures of enemy territory. Acting upon this idea he writes to the War Department who advise him that they can use his services if he completes a course in Aerial photography at Cornell, since America has entered the war. Bidding farewell to his parents, who oppose the plan, and to his friend, Sadie, he boards a train. After an eventful journey for the young man who has never been out of Iowa before, he arrives at his destination. Quite by accident his salute to Lieutenant Pottlebee is mistaken for a sign of disrespect but when the young man explains his good intentions his superior officer smiles and they become friends. At school he also makes a close friend of Edwin Bowlin; the two are sent to the Wright Field. En route they spend a delightful day at Niagara Falls in company with two girls whom they meet on the train. After arriving at the field, Alfred notices with interest the photography hut and the splendid equipment for aerial mapping. They are called to attention then welcomed with outstretched hand by Lieutenant Pottlebee. In the course of time both Edwin and Alfred are appointed sergeams under Lieutenant Pottlebee. Part of their duties are to train the new cadets. Alfred receives a box containing cakes and cookies from Amy Lovington; a week later she writes a letter, explaining that she is Edwin's friend and wishes to be Altred's also. He sends her his photograph, taken in his flying uniform, and receives a small picture from her which he wears next to his heart.

Coming down with a fever, Alfred is confined to the hospital, but he persuades his pretty nurse to fill in his temperature as normal as he hears that he may be sent overseas. Lieutenant Pottlebee secures a commission but Private Jack Crow has it destroyed through his father's influence. Gleefully, Jack relates this to a group of friends while Arthur, in the shadows, listens, then calmly thanks the private, ironically, for thwarting the plans closest to his heart. On the Fourth of July friends and relatives of the young airmen come to the field for a gala celebration. Edwin and Alfred picnic with two girls, until the boy from Iowa again becomes ill. He is sent to a sanitarium in Green Mountains where he receives word from Amy that she has sailed for France. His sister, Lydia, a nurse, also goes overseas, while he longs to join them. Just as he is pronounced recovered Armistice is declared. Alfred listens to his comrades returning with tales of heroism and horror and feels that his chance to serve is gone forever but that very week he is offered an opportunity to accompany Lieutenant Landbloom to Panama to make a map of the territory. He accepts, and when a wing of the plane is torn, necessitating a parachute jump, Alfred learns that heroism has its place during peace times, as well. The lieutenant lands on the crevice of a canyon; perilously Alfred makes the ascent, helping the officer to climb to safety.

When he returns, Alfred enters his home without knocking, clasping his surprised mother in his arms while his father soon joins them. The next week Lydia returns with Amy, who rushes into Alfred's arms. Explanations follow; then, while the family is enjoying the town's Homecoming Festival, Alfred and Amy slip away in a DeHaviland to the home of a minister who marries them.

THE HIGHER HONOR

Waymon McKoy Drama File No. 11967

JERRY JOHNSON joins the police force to achieve fame and honor and thus win the love of pretty Ruth Stubbs despite their complete social divergence. He quickly receives recognition. Ruth is being courted by Harvey Davis which obstacle Jerry hopes to overcome. At this time the police are exerting all effort to round up a notorious gang. Jerry feels that one Barley also of the force is spying for the gang. He makes known his suspicions to the chief and promises to convict them. Jerry embarks upon this daring mission and from an obscure spot at the top of a building watches Barley accept his cut from members of this gang and reports this fact. Their conversation regarding a big job which has been pulled that very evening and references made to a plot to kidnap Ruth Stubb amazes Jerry who also receives word that Harvey Davis, a member of the gang is designated to lure Ruth to the spot where she is to be captured. Jerry tells the chief that the plan is to bring Ruth through the town at midnight in a car to be followed by another car and tells him also of his love for Ruth and of this opportunity to win her. Ignoring all danger he hastens to 320 Mill Street, an address given by the kidnappers, to await developements. He observes a Packard draw up to the entrance of a poolroom and three men emerge and disappear through the doorway. Jerry conceals himself then beneath the tool or baggage box of the gangsters car and is convinced by the conversation ensuing that this is the car that is to follow the one in which the victim is to ride. After driving for some time Jerry jumps from the speeding car and sees the machine turn at a bend in the road, coming to a halt. He immediately scales a telegraph pole and attaching a radio phone, calls his chief to report. He advises the chief to send some men to the Maple Highway. The place is heavily guarded but he manages to creep along unseen, in the shadows. He comes upon the guard and after a breathless struggle overcomes him. Proceeding up the road he sees a row of small cabins dotting the wood. Peering into one of the windows of a lighted cabin Jerry finds Ruth seated in the midst of the gang, one of which is Harvey Davis, who is at this moment cruelly thrashing her. Stumbling upon a huge concealed dynamo he demolishes it, extinguishing all the lights whereupon the men rush from the cabin to see what has caused the sudden darkness. Jerry moves nearer to the eabin and hears the voices of Harvey and Ruth. Harvey threatens to kill Ruth if she but stirs. Rushing into the cabin Jerry fells Harvey by the use of his pistol and picking Ruth up in his arms he dashes to the entrance of the wood. The police arrive then whereupon the gang is surrounded and captured.

At his chief's office later, Jerry meets Mr. Stubbs, who offers him a $200,000 reward but he is not interested and slowly walks from the office despairing of winning Ruth's love. At this point Ruth runs to him and admits modestly that it is really him who she loves.

MYSTERY RIVER

James F. Simpson Western File No. 11831

UTTERING a little sigh, Alice Porter recalls the events of the past few days as she watches dawn break over Sunrise Valley from her lookout in the oak knoll. Shorty Moore and Bill Evans, two cow punchers on the J Bar P, her father's ranch had started to Black Butte. A shot from the mesquite bushes wounded Bill and sent the chuck wagon over the cliff. Shorty, on his horse, Baldy, attempted to pop the brush but was knocked off to the ground. He described one of the men whom Jeb, Alice's father, identifies as Black Pete Larson, a former cowpuncher on his Texas ranch whom he was instrumental in sending to the penitentiary for cattle rustling. Reading a post card from a school chum, Alice remembers the peaceful days when she lived with her aunt, following the death of her mother. After graduation she insisted upon joining her father who, injured in an accident, was running the Arizona ranch with the aid of Brent Woods, his young foreman. Smiling tenderly, Alice recalls how Brent taught her to ride and rope a steer as well as any of the men and how this companionship ripened into love as he asked her to become his bride at this very spot. A call from Jeb ends Alice's reverie; she hastens to the house to dress Shorty's wounds, received when he went after Bill. He reports that all supplies were stolen from the wagon.

The next morning Jeb finds Alice gone; there are evidences that she has been carried away by force. Brent rides in to warn Jeb that Pete's gang are entering the box-like canyon which marks off the ranch. Before he can leave in search of Alice, eight men attack. Runt Kendle and Shorty Moore are killed; Brent wounded in the temple. Pete's men then set fire to the ranch house. While assisting a wounded comrade, Jeb's injured back gives away and he falls to the ground. Believing they have killed everyone but Jeb, whom Pete ordered them to spare that he might suffer knowing Alice's fate, they leave. Meanwhile, Alice has been seized by Pete's right hand man, chloroformed and taken to the hideout which connects with the J Bar P by an underground passage, beneath the waters of the Black Mesa. When Pete enters the bedroom and approaches her she feigns unconsciousness but he notices that water in the basin has been used and cruelly wakens her with a slash of his riding whip. Courageously the girl kicks him and he is forced to leave her, his mouth bleeding profusely.

Two Gun Eddie Connor, Jeb's nephew, rides to the once beautiful ranch on Stranger, his horse, for a visit. Hastening to Jeb, he improvises a tent with a blanket, and leaving supplies for him and Brent, starts after Alice. The Eel, a member of Pete's gang, brings Jeb's cattle to the hiding place. Eddie sees him and lassoes him, forcing the man to disclose the entrance to the hideout. Stealthily, Eddie approaches the house but when he hears Alice scream he runs inside, drawing a gun on Pete, who is forcing his attentions on Alice, her clothes torn from her. Four men enter at the sound of the shot which sends Pete to his death, but Eddie dodges them and shoots them all. The Eel, so nicknamed because of his ability to escape when tied, frees himself and shoots Eddie, when the latter strikes a match, escaping with Alice. As soon as he is able, Eddie follows, at last finding the two by a campfire, en route to Mexico. Eddie shoots, killing the Eel, who wounds him in the thigh as he dies. Alice dresses her cousin's wound; at midnight they reach the J Bar P Ranch in time to see the last of Pete's gang about to kill Jeb. Brent, summoning all his strength, shoots him first. Joyfully, the group are reunited and, with fresh courage, the dead are buried, the ranch rebuilt, while Brent and Eddie bring back the stolen cattle. Eddie serves as best man when Alice and Brent are quietly wed at the nearest town. Then, bidding them all farewell, Two Gun Eddie turns to the open road in search of more adventure while Jeb, the bride and groom wave farewell and urge a speedy return.

STREET ANGEL

H. E. Khatib Drama File No. 11959

A TRAIN enters the station to be met by a surging crowd who has come to greet and welcome the Reverend Joseph, who has gained a far famed reputation for healing the sick and maimed. He emerges from the train with his staff of aides. The crowd cheers and offers homage to this great religious leader. A young girl, Jessie by name also steps from the train, accompanied by Judith, her mother. They are poorly dressed and are encumbered with many belongings. A small dog carried by the girl escapes from her grasp and Jessie dashes through the dense crowd in an effort to rescue her prize possession. A young man who calls himself John, returns the puppy to her and advises her to wait with him until the crowd has dispersed, explaining that these people are admirers of the Rev. Joseph. Jessie tells John that their meager circumstances make it necessary to find modest living quarters and he directs them. Judith is ailing and after a few weeks they find their funds have petered out. John has been a constant visitor and arrives one day to find the landlord at the door demanding rent which is long past due and Judith, sick and spent telling him that she cannot meet this obligation. Jessie is out in search of food. Unable to find employment, she finally goes to the door of a lavish looking dwelling and ask for aid which is refused. Judith tells John that she is to die and confides the fact that Jessie is the daughter of a wealthy Texas motor manufacturer whose name is Hudnut and she asks John to take her daughter to him upon her death. He promise to do so. Jessie goes to the Reverend Joseph's rooms seeking aid for her mother but the crowd is so great that she is about to turn away. She finally obtains an audience but is amazed to find that he seems to lose all spirituality in her presence and attacks her. John goes in search of her and finds her in conflict with the Reverend and thwarts him in a pugilistic combat. Jessie faints in the street while trying to obtain food and John goes in search of water for her. Upon his return he finds that she has been taken to the home of Laura, a well known courtesan, who also called upon the Rev. Joseph.

Laura is being financed by Hudnut and when he sees Jessie he is so overwhelmed at her beauty that he offers her $10,000 if she will become his mistress. This she refuses. Rev. Joseph is identified as an escaped convict and arrested at Laura's house, while arguing with Hudnut over Jessie. Hudnut attacks her while she is resting in Laura's home. A storm arises and while they are struggling, a streak of ligthning flashes upon a cross hanging upon the wall. Jessie calls upon Jesus to help defend her honor, clasping his picture. At this point the ceiling crashes and buries Hudnut beneath the ruins. John appears, having been informed that Jessie was taken to Laura's house. Upon his recovery Hudnut is informed that it is his own daughter whom he has accosted. He repents, giving his blessing to Jessie and John and a goodly share of his fortune.

Frank A. Losito Drama File No. 11897

PILOT Tom Sanders slowly entered the office of the Seneca Airport to report the death of Bill Nether, killed when his mail plaine crashed. In addition three registered mail bags were missing. Awaiting the report of the medical examiner, Dr. Stone; Major Donnaloy, manager, heard the report of Gerald Norton, ground mechanic, that the plane had been in perfect condition when it set flight. Nor had the radio operator received a message of the impending crash. When the physician disclosed that death resulted from several bullet wounds as far as could be determined since the body had been practically destroyed in flames from the wrecked machine, the mystery deepened. It was evident that deliberate murder was involved. Jealous of Gerald who was the favored suitor of Sue Nether, Sanders insinuated that the ground mechanic was guilty but Donnaloy who thought highly of the young man who reminded him of his own dead son refused to heed. Stone gave the weapon found on Nether to the Major for safe-keeping since several bullets had been fired which would leave a peculiar, distinctive mark by which the guilty person could be identified. On the way to Sue's home, their car was held-up by a masked figure and the gun robbed. Gerald had already notified Sue and to the doctor left the task of breaking her loss to the mother. During their absence, Gerald was in charge. A strange plane hovered over the field, dropping the missing mailbags. Startled, Gerald dragged them inside, thrusting the attached note unread in his pocket. When the Major returned, the story of the strange plane sounded too suspicious. Against his will, Donnaloy ordered Sheriff Boeland to arrest him when Gerald refused to uncover his bandaged hand which it was believed concealed a bullet wound. Closeted alone with Boeland a few minutes, Gerald to Sanders' discomfort is pronounced innocent although no explanations were given. When Sanders accused Gerald of bribing the officer, the mechanic knocked him down. A check-up of the registered mail showed that only one letter was missing—for Gerald. Returning from the cemetery after Nether's funeral, Gerald revealed to Sue that the letter contained their wedding license. Both feel that it is mysteriously connected with Nether's murder. Back at the airport, Gerald fumbling for a cigarette found the note he had forgotten to read, stating—"Here is mail. One letter missing. The Fox." On the back side were scrawled meaningless figures and the initials C. W., the clue which was to lead Gerald to pay a surprise visit while driving with Sue that evening, to the old, deserted Webb cabin. While Sue waited a few yards away, Gerald found an old plane in a barn near the cabin which was occupied by several men engaged in playing poker. Ordering them to hold up their hands, Gerald was stunned by an unseen figure who crept behind. In an instant the cabin was emptied except for the unconscious man. Sue, becoming apprehensive, found him and hastily revived Gerald who ordered her to fetch the Sheriff and Donnaloy, when they heard a plane crash nearby. Dawn brought the two to whom Gerald revealed the guilty man was—Bill Nether!

An old trunk's contents and a newspaper clipping disclosed that the body found in the wrecked plane was stolen from a reformatory and substituted. "Why?" asked the stunned Major. Reconstructing the crime, Gerald revealed that Bill was a dope fiend who Sanders controlled. Knowing that a wedding license was expected, Sanders who wanted Suc himself forced Bill to pretend his death and throw suspicion on the mechanic. Gerald had discovered this while trailing Sanders, as Agent 75 of the U. S. Secret Service, wanted for a former mail robbery. Driving to the scene of the crashed plane, they found a crushed body with the missing marriage license nearby, and a watch, "To Bill from Sue." Sanders came to long enough to recognize that the law had caught up at last. The tragic happenings behind them, the young couple embraced that night as Sue whispered, "The career of Agent 75 is over."

COMPLETE HARMONY

F. J. Coughlin Musical Drama File No. 11844

CHILDREN in schools in every nation are taught their respective country leads all others in industry and form of government. Bewildered, they learn that every war was won by their nation, all colonies and trade regulations are conducted ethically only by their government. One group is led to believe that communism is the only thing, another favors monarchy, another dictatorship and still another democracy. Peace conferences start out calmly enough but soon end with each representative volubly speaking his own language and standing up for his own nation. Suddenly an American citizen breaks into the conference room and demands silence. When he questions the representatives, asking them if what they desire is complete international harmony above all else each replies in the affirmative. He then proposes that this be secured by education the youth of the country in racial tolerance. An international picture, showing the fundamental similarity between all people, he believes, will secure this ideal. At first his plan is ridiculed, then it is agreed that it should be given a chance.

Production begins. Russian children and adults illustrates the working of communism, so different from other forms of government, but as pictures of boys and girls at play in the great nurseries are shown, it is seen that the spirit of childhood is much the same, universally. England pictures its devotion to its monarchy, but the similarity in the hobbies, sports and past times of these people, different to form but the same in spirit, is a common factor with all people Young fascisti go through their military and civic drills. Ireland wins every heart with its program of gay songs and dances, bravely presented in spite of the hardships of the country. Characteristic oriental dances and games illustrate the fact that these people, too, have their joyous moments. Young Europeans see that many of their dances are adaptations of the strange and beautiful rythms of the jungle. All the programs are given in the native tongue and costume of the country represented. Pictures of each nation rejoicing at the Armistice are shown, proving that none favored war. A group of representative people from each nation are shown vacationing together at a country resort. As an East Indian in a turban attempts to learn baseball from a Yankee, and an Englishman awkwardly attempts to follow a Singalese dancer all racial barriers disappear in the laughter that follows these earnest attempts. At the conclusion of the film, representatives from each nation pass across a stage singing their respective national anthems. The United States concludes this as the American flag is carried by workers in every industry, to the accompaniment of the Star Spangled Banner. Then all join in a grand march, pledging international harmony, the end of all war, and the beginning of a new understanding brought about by mutual faith.

Fascinated, children and adults alike flock to theatres showing Complete Harmony. All talk of was is ended; peace conferences are looked upon as vacations. In schools and industries workers of every nationality are seen side by side as complete harmony is at last realized.

ROAD KNIGHTS

LeRoy F. Folsom Comedy File No. 11830

HARRY, who takes tickets at a local movie house, persuades Louis, who sells them, to accompany him while he bums his way to Hollywood in order that they may enter the films. Reluctantly Louis consents, reflecting that Mr. Slusher will probably give them back their jobs if they fail to make good. The two pals go to the railroad "jungles" where they listen to a bum relate how his pal was killed in a freight train crash. Another tells that a railroad "bull" shot his friend. Frightened, Louis wants to give up the idea, but Harry drags him into a freight car bound for Los Angeles. At the next stop, Louis, waking from a sound sleep, calls to a railroad bull, asking him if they have arrived in Los Angeles; he chases them down the street until they eventually lose him. Returning to the depot the boys enter to escape the cold. Harry tells the operator that they are waiting for their brother, Louis that it is their sister whom they are seeking, while the man views them suspiciously and informs them that their train is not due until evening. Replying that they will wait here as they came to town in a spring buggy, they settle down for the night. Harry, falling asleep on a bench, awakens and searchs for Louis in the Ladies' Rest Room until an irate feminine passenger chases him out; subsequently he finds his pal curled up on a small white foot stool, his head pillowed on a roll of toilet paper. He kicks the stool out from under him. When the station master hears this commotion he puts them both out.

Hungry and cold, the boys attempt to bum their breakfast at Louis' suggestion. Knocking at the door, Harry puts up a pitiful tale to the tall Mexican who answers, although Louis nudges him to remain silent. The Mexican's answer is a pistol shot which sends the boys racing down the street. At the next house an Irishman greets them; when they offer to work he sets them at a huge wood pile. They take turns with the axe. After several hours' work they are rewarded with a sandwich apiece. Harry, attempting to get a drink, grabs the water releaser under the pump and is thoroughly soaked. The pair return to the railroad jungles. Seeing a light, Harry begins to run until Louis convinces him that it is a train, not a bull. Seizing him by the coat collar he drags him onto the front blinds when it stops and once more they are off for Hollywood. Louis begins to cry in relief while Harry disgustedly turns over and goes to sleep, greeting them with flowers and applause on their dreaming of a reception of beautiful movie stars arrival at the cinema capital. He is rudly awakened when the freight car stops with a jolt at the station in Los Angeles.

As the boys leave the car a railroad bull sees them and chases them while a huge crowd gathers, laughing as they stumble over one another. Louis hides behind Mr. Goldstein, prominent producer of comedies. Shaking with laughter, he persuades the officer to leave the pair in his custody, then gives them each five dollars and instructs them to report at his studio for work tomorrow morning. As the two walk down the street Louis thumbs his nose at a bull; seizing him by the hand, Harry rushes down the street while the officer pursues.

BEAUTIFUL WOMAN

Giuseppe Biscotti Drama File No. 11894

WANDERING through the streets of Torino in search of distraction, Alberto, with his friend Gino, stop a moment to view Miss Lulu Gordon announced by the barker of a carnival booth as the most beautiful woman in the world. Discarding her blonde wig she joins Gino and his friend, but leaving the gay crowd, Alberto wanders into the poorer sections of the city. Here he meets an anarchist who arouses his interest in social conditions. Sadly the young aristocrat confides that his father recently commited suicide, his mother is confined in a sanatorium and he is without friends or fortune in a strange city where he has come to take a government position. Unable to adjust to Gino's mode of living, Alberto moves to the home of Baron Pietro Loana, an elderly dilettante, whom he assists with his photography. A rare friendship grows up between these two who have much in common, although the older man criticizes Alberto's enthusiasm for the Socialistic Party as he believes they curtail personal freedom.

In another section of the city, Maria Anestione impatiently awaits the arrival of Elena, the orphan of her dead husband's sister, and the only one of the family whom she sincerely loves. Maria, affectionately called Martuccia, warmly embraces the youthful Elena, who has come to cultivate her glorious voice in spite of family opposition. She confides in Elena that she is madly in love with Alberto, whom she has known since childhood; at the opera that night the two women look for him, but he watches them without coming forward.

When Alberto writes to his cousin, Martuccia, stating that their love must not continue as it is a destructive force to both of them, she becomes rigid and hysterical. Loretta, her maid, cares for her, while Elena goes to Alberto, whom she has not seen for years, urging him to come to her beloved Martuccia. This he promises to do, but as he gazes at Elena's fresh young beauty he realizes that she is the one woman in the world for him. His old passion for Martuccia flames again as he sees her so in need of him. Together they attend Elena's debut and as Martuccia watches Alberto's face when he sees Elena, beautiful in white, obviously destined for fame, the older woman knows that her day is over. Questioning Alberto, she forces him to confess his love for Elena; the next day she leaves, giving no address. Eugenio Fiamberto, a famous conductor, encounters Elena in a cabaret with Marianna, her chaperone, and promises his assistance in obtaining auditions for her. He is responisible for her debut. Calling at his home, when he is away, Elena is welcomed by his wife, and makes friends with his daughter, an attractive child.

Alberto makes a stirring speech, analyzing the problem of individual labor from a sentimental rather than a scientific viewpoint. As a result he is nominated on the Socialist ticket. Receiving a letter from Loretta he hastens to Martuccia, although telling Elena that he loves her. He discovers that Martuccia is dying, and tenderly cares for her, but she again leaves him. Although refusing Fiamberti's love, Elena manages to obtain prominent parts in the opera. Alberto pleads with her to marry him, but, remembering Martuccia's grief, she replies that love is not for her, she will go on—alone. Luigi, also in love with Martuccia, takes Alberto to his home where he finds the beautiful and unhappy woman, dead.

In the six years that follow, Elena climbs the heights, at last singing in La Scala, while Alberto, renouncing his Socialst career at her request, becomes a prominent lawyer. Alberto calls on Elena at Naples; with tears in her eyes she tells him that all her success has not meant as much as one night they spent together before they said farewell! The following month Elena and Alberto are married; when they read that Lulu Gordon has become the wife of a business man, Alberto says that even the most beautiful woman wants love, while his bride smiles in agreement.

THE SWIFT YEARS

Idella Kessler Drama File No. 11905

THE photograph album was on the table. Tapping nervously the open letter in her hand, Alice unbound the volume which held the picture record of childhood and the swiftly passing years. This little photograph of a winsome, mischief-loving child, her sister Jane. They called her Rowdy Jim. Alice dipped into the bag of memory—Rowdy Jim sliding down the banister to greet Uncle Medro; April Fool Day made for her pranks; the frightened kitten eyeing the coaxing child from a tree top; the day she vanished. Dinner time had come and Rowdy Jim did not answer their calls. No trace of her could be found in the favorite spots she usually frequented. All night the family searched aided by nieghbors. The next day she was found in the grain bin where she had imprisoned herself by swinging on the "big door until it shut."

Then there was the Sunday when Alice's eyes met that of Charles Fordway and was jerked back to the church service by Rowdy Jim who gleefully heard the date of the Sunday school picnic. Though the small girl wanted to accompany big sister and Charles, she was ordered to wait for her father. Returning to the buggy that evening, the young people were startled to see the child sitting expectantly. She had hidden under the seat and fallen asleep on the journey.

When the sisters returned to school, Rowdy Jim still lived up to her reputation. Robert Lee became her closest friend and evenings a gay quartet joined by friends would fill the living room with song. More photographs in the album, Rowdy Jim growing more sedate until she became Jane; Alice becoming engaged to Charles and then the wedding. The newly-weds made their home 75 miles away and Harold Tracy a distant cousin of Charles, came to visit them. She spoke so much of her sister that Harold wanted to meet her. Alice kept Jane's arrival a secret but she could still see the astonished, admiring gaze he turned when she brought her unexpectedly to the supper table. The weeks flew but Jane and Harold continued to be very much in each other's company for Charles was working and Alice was taken up with her Ladies' Aid responsibilities.

Here were more pictures showing the pair poised at various beauty spots that section was noted for. Alice remembered clearly her growing hopes that the two would marry although Robert, her childhood friend, had always wanted Jane. Then Jane came and revealed that Harold was going away. Yes, they were in love, deeply; but years before his father had arranged a match between him and the daughter of an old chum, Merry Elesmere. It was his dearest wish and Harold had accepted this. Now, however, he rebelled. That day he had received a telegram ordering him home; Merry was waiting. Though Harold pleaded that his heart belonged to another, Mr. Tracy was insistent. So Jane and he were parted while Alice mourned for the last vestige of Rowdy Jim vanished with her lover's going.

Again swept on the years. . . Today Alice sat expectantly dreaming of the child-to-be when the postman came with the letter now in her lap near the album. It was from Jane; she had said "yes" at last to faithful Robert.

HER RIGHT-HAND MAN

Mae M. Strawser Drama File No. 11906

DONALD LEE never forgot his promise to his father. The little family crowded the wharf to watch the ship, "Flying Janet" depart on a two month's voyage. Suddenly, Mr. Lee, who was secondmate, after kissing the other three children and his wife, pressed twelve year old Donald tightly to him. "You're to be Mother's right-hand man . . . always on deck, alert and ready." he said. And the boy's eyes shone with understanding as he pledged himself. Day after day around the date that the ship was expected to return, Donald went down to the dock staring out at the water which he was later to learn had engulfed the ship and all its men on a stormy night. Neighbors grieved for the little family during the weeks of suspense before Mrs. Lee gave up hope. Seeking to comfort her, Donald continued to remind her that he was "her right-hand man." In a fishing village where everyone was accustomed to doing their own work, employment was scarce. The summer boarders gave washings and the income supplemented by the change which Donald earned running errands was to carry them skimpily through the winter. Waiting for the steamer which brought in summer vacationists, Donald was suprised to see three young men, each with an odd machine which the isolated youth was only later able to identfy as a bicycle. The next day when he called to deliver clams at the Nelson home where they were staying, he obtained the job of cleaning the machines each week during their stay, and surprised his mother with the money which would buy fuel for the winter. Eugene Rawson and his companions grew very fond of the youngster and when they left, a few weeks later Donald received a bicycle with their compliments. When Donald was seventeen, Eugene who had been admitted to his father's law firm visited the island again and became a close friend of the Lee family. Young Marjory Ellen delighted in the pleasant teasing of her brother's companion. When Eugene's father met the Lees, he was very much impressed with the mother who city-bred had buried herself in a hamlet for the sake of love. Long after Donald had gone to bed, the Rawsons conferred with Mrs. Lee who finally consented to move to the city where Donald could prepare for the law career he had secretly set his heart upon, and congenial well-paying work be secured for her. At college, Donald justified his backers' hopes; his one desire still was to be in a position to help his mother more, to give her the luxuries their father would have wished. When he first met Elizabeth Rawson, Donald was shy but like her brother she was too warmly friendly to be denied. Donald grieved for his friends when he learned that Eugene's father had died suddenly. Then came the day when Donald realized that he was in love with Elizabeth. Thereafter, he made every excuse to keep from being with her. His mother who had approvingly noted their past intimacy sought to question him. Suddenly, Donald burst out wildly, "You're always first," for he knew that it would be years before he could afford marriage if he were to care for his mother. But soon Donald was to receive an invitation to join Eugene s firm and that Eugene was engaged to Marjory. "Make it a double-wedding," suggested the mother, looking pointedly at Donald. They slipped away, leaving Elizabeth and Donald alone—both dreams within his grasp.

DOUBLE-DECKER

Marie T. Kleine Drama File No. 11903

THEIR savings swept away in a real-estate syndicate which existed only in the mind of a swindler, the Talbot family was swamped with bills instead of anticipated profits. Under the strain, George's disposition became embittered and his temper explosive. After a scene at the breakfast table which sent the two children away crying, Nellie felt that it was time for her to step out of the role of housewife and help the financial situation. An experienced dressmaker and designer, Nellie was sure that in spite of her twelve years of marriage she could qualify for a similar position now. The children were old enough to be alone while Mrs. Ferndal, her mother, could live with them and tend to housekeeping. At first George protested, pride hurt, but Nellie promised that it would only be for a year or two. In a Sunday paper, Nellie found the advertisement which exactly fitted her desire—Wilbur Ade who was opening an exclusive dress shop wanted a woman manager. Dressing with extreme care after she had received an appointment with him, Nellie, trembling, was ushered into his presence. Her prospective employer was much younger and more attractive than she had anticipated. She soon perceived that he was also shy but within a few minutes he was acquainted with her past experience. "Monday morning at nine, then," said Mr. Ade. Gleefully Nellie waited for George's return; the only cloud was the realization that she had withheld the fact that she was married and had a family of her own. Yet knowing that many men objected to hiring wives, Nellie felt justified. During the months that followed, Nellie as manager proved extremely successful, and was now earning an income larger than her husband's. With the added money, Nellie filled an old dream, having their two-family house converted into an entire house which she laughingly called her "Double-Decker." Weeks later, George was puzzled by subtle changes in his wife. Nellie herself was not sure what was happening but gradually she had become aware that Ade considered her more warmly than an employee. Lately, he had asked her to lunch several times and Nellie had been unable to think of a good reason for refusing. She struggled with the thought of confessing that she was not free since her young girlish figure made it impossible for an outsider to guess that she was a matron. And yet if she told, he might ask her to resign and suddenly Nellie knew that the work had grown very dear to her. Both were working late one evening when the others had left. Wearily, Nellie sank down on a chair; in an instant Wilbur was kneeling beside her, kissing her fingers tenderly. Nellie remembered George—she wanted to protest—but infatuation held her. Moments passed before Wilbur permitted her to go. In the following days he pleaded for her to name the wedding day and Nellie laughed in despair at her own predicament. She had no grounds to divorce George and her lover had still to learn of his rival. On her birthday, Wilbur wanted to take her out but she pleaded that she had promised the day to her "brother and his children." In the midst of dinner, Wilbur called unexpectedly and the Talbots joined in deceiving him until George later stumbled upon Wilbur embracing his wife. Stunned, George went temporarily out of his mind and in the scuffle which followed Wilbur was killed. At the trial, Nellie who realized her folly, assumed the moral blame and her husband received a light sentence. Reunited again—Nelie gladly returned to her housewife role and found happiness in having George once more the master.

THE RIGHT GIRL

A. N. Reichenbach Drama File No. 11838

AS they are seated on a bench in the park, Mabel Bratton attempts to persuade Mary, her twin, to abandon the idea of going to Hollywood to enter the motion picture industry, as she cannot bear the thought of their first separation. In love with Martin Bilger, a bank cashier, Mabel does not wish to accompany Mary, but the latter is determined upon a career, despite her affection for her mother and sister. While they are talking, Thomas Pawling, a detective with the firm of Henderson and Henderson passes and speaks to Mabel, then, noticing Mary, he apologizes in confusion. After Mary goes home to pack, Mable, laughing, goes to Tom, explaining that she is a twin. That evening, Tom urges her to marry him, but she refuses, saying that she has given her heart to another. Sorrowfully, Mable and her mother bid farewell to Mary, Hollywood bound. That evening, after her mother warns her against a triangle situation, Mable admits Martin. When he tells her that he has been made assistant manager of the bank they plan to marry. For reasons of her own, Mable insists upon a quiet home wedding, in secrecy. After a glorious honeymoon, Martin takes his bride to the beautiful home which he has purchased as a surprise but, still urging him to keep their marriage a secret until Mary returns, Mable slips in and out of the house quietly, giving her mother's address to all but her intimate friends.

Two years later, Martin loses all when his stocks are taken away from him and his position gone, as he is unjustly accused of fraudulent application of public funds. Bravely Mable returns to her mother's home and her work in the shirt factory, assuring Martin that he will soon regain his former position. After dinner, in an attempt to forget his worries, Martin often walks alone in the country. One evening as he is passing the bank where he was formerly employed he hears a smothered cry for help. Climbing the column on the porch, he sees the night watchman bound and gagged. Quickly he enters the building, finding his old key in his pocket. Looking down the corridor, Martin discovers a group of men attempting to open the safe. Disguising his vice so that it sounds like a group of people he advances and the burglars escape through a window which they have jimmied open. Hastening to the safe, Martin seizes the fuse, but it explodes. He is seriously injured and taken by police to the hospital. Awakening from a sound sleep, Mable is summoned to the hospital where she sees her husband bandaged and unconscious. Police question the young wife but she firmly states that she knows her husband is innocent of bank robbery, although circumstantial evidence is against him. Desperately she goes to the firm of Henderson and Henderson, seeking Tom, who has just returned from a business trip in Florida. Explaining the situation to him, but not revealing that Martin is her husband, she enlists his sympathy, as he agrees that the young man is obviously being framed by politicians. Disguised as Santa Claus, Tom enters Martin's ward at the jail, and enahles him to escape. At the airport, Mable joins him; together they go to a small settlement in the Canadian Rockies, where Martin soon wins a place of prominence and respect while his wife is loved by the community.

At an appeal from Mable, Mary leaves Hollywood to take her sister's place. With Tom she helps unravel the mystery surrounding the bank robbery although the detective still believes she is Mahle. The two of them follow the night watchman to a cabaret where, under the influence of liquor, he confesses that he was a member of the gang. As a result they are all apprehended and Martin's name is cleared. Then Mary reveals her identity, becoming Tom's bride. When Marble and Martin return home at Christmas time one of the bank director's, dressed as Santa, presents the young man with his stocks, deed to his home, and his former position, apologizing. Mahle then brings the evening to a happy climax when she introduces her baby son to the gathering and both husbands claim that they have married the right girl.

THE MAIDSTONE CASE

William Harkins Mystery File No. 11898

THE servants were weary when they returned from the village hall which their master, Lord St. Mathews permitted them to attend. It was eight o'clock in the morning with much to be done before breakfast could be served. James, the butler, dragged himself into the drawing room to pull the blinds. With a start, he noticed Lady Helen St. Mathews on the chair in rigid posture. Thinking she had fallen asleep he called softly, "Milady." She did not stir and James came closer to find that she was stiff with death. Trembling, he sent immediately for the police after discovering that Lord St. Mathews quarters were unoccupied. Blustering, well meaning Inspector Kelly who was quick to jump at conclusions lined up the servants at once while his partner Inspector Jones devoted himself to the scene of the tragedy for it was apparent that the bullet wound which caused Lady Helen's death was not self-inflicted. Holding a blood stained coat which had been found near the body in his hands, Kelly soon identified it as belonging to Norris, the chauffeur. It was further learned that Norris had separated from the others during the night and that Norris had recently purchased a revolver. In the chauffeur's pockets was a large sum of money which threw added suspicion since a money robbery had been recently reported. Kelly prepared to place the man under arrest although Kelly made the following denials and explanations: He had not worn the coat which had been missing for several days; the revolver had been purchased at Lord St. Mathews' behest and the money was the change which had not been returned. Meanwhile Jones discovered that the clock which had fallen with its hands pointing at three, an odd hour to be drinking tea as the nearby cup indicated, had been changed from eleven o'clock when death, as the medical examiner's report verified, actually took place; furthermore the position of the body indicated that Lady Helen had seen her murderer approaching from the mirror opposite and had not turned which showed that the killer was familiar. And Lord St. Mathews could not be located! The key about her neck indicated that she had hidden something important for it did not fit her jewel case; evidently the murderer sought whatever it was because all the drawers and chests were upset. Hidden in the conservatory in a plant box, Jones discovered papers which revealed that Lady Helen had been married before to Raoul St Clair, who had offered the hospitality of his home Maidstone when St. Mathews was on the verge of suicide having gone through a large fortune. At Maidstone, St. Mathews met Helen who became infatuated with him, resulting in an affair. Through her lover's instigation, she administered slow poison to her husband who caught a severe cold after learning from a jealous woman the betrayal of his honor. He cared enough to conceal Helen from punishment but when death was near condemned the two to marry knowing that love would soon turn to hate. This letter in Jones' hands had remained with a notary public to be turned over to the police unless the decree was carried out. Jones found that St. Mathews killed his wife because he was in love with Helene Luttnay-Smith whom he wished to marry; and because he feared that some day she would reveal the violent crime of the past. Helene was to learn St. Mathew's final murder before the police arrived and in the resultant struggle shot him. The true facts were hushed up. On the records, the Maidstone Case was officially closed.

MY HERO

Aldiero Foniri Melodrama File No. 11840

NOTORIOUS throughout the mountain district of Kentucky, powerful Richard Lake enjoys his reputation as a gang leader and kidnapper, particularly of beautiful women. An accomplished hunter and marksman, Richard has inspired such fear in his people that little effort is made to arrest him. Mike Jones, reporter on the Courier, appeals to Mr. Thomas, owner of the paper, to launch a campaign in order to secure Lake's arrest, which he agrees to do, although exercising caution. His only daughter, Mary, overhearing a part of the conversation, is thrilled by Mike's bravery and persuades him to stay for dinner. After that, Mike is a frequent caller at the Thomas home. Mr. Thomas is not surprised when the young reporter tells him that he wishes to marry his child, but he refuses, saying that Mike's life is too dangerous and that he cannot support Mary as she is accustomed. Unwilling to abandon his plans for apprehending Lake in order to enter a safer and more profitable vocation, Mike is forced to tell his sweetheart that they must wait. Her arm about his shoulder, she replies that she understands, but hopes he will soon be willing to conform to her father's wishes. Mr. Thomas and Mary vacation together at a mountain resort. As they are waiting for their car at the station, Lake and his accomplice, Joe, see Mary and determine to kidnap her. Lake fires, seriously wounding Thomas; while his daughter swears revenge they seize her, carrying her away to their cabin in the mountains. Robert Cannon, of the local police force, discovers Mr. Thomas and sends him at once to the hospital.

Several hours later, Thomas regains consciousness and summons Mike, relating the incident to him. With Robert, he drives at once to the mountains. When they near the cabin, at midnight, the two alight from the car and stealthily creep through the tall grass toward Lake's hide out. A dog, seeing them, barks, giving warning. Joe leaves the house, looking about, when Mike strikes him over the head with a gun, carrying him to the car, and tying him. Lake appears, but Mike covers him with a gun, demanding that he reveal Mary's hiding place. Craftily Lake points to a pile of blankets; when Mike lifts them he discovers nothing, but Lake draws his own revolver, and fires at Robert, who has stepped in front of his friend. Falling, Robert drops his gun. Swiftly Mike wrenches the pistol away from Lake. He hears Mary's voice in the next room and breaks open the door, discovering that she is tied to the wall. With a quick movement, Lake again pulls his gun away from Mike while the latter is attempting to untie Mary. Covering them both he orders Mike to direct him to the car in order that he may make his escape, promising to kill them both if he does not comply. Briefly Mike directs him; then, as he leaves the room, he makes a flying tackle at Lake, sending him to the floor. While Mary holds the pistol, Mike binds Lake securely with the rope which had secured Mary, and leads him to the car. Police arriving at Robert's call, take both criminals into custody.

An official reward is bestowed upon Mike for his bravery. At the hospital, Mr. Thomas, recovering promises promotion to the brave young reporter, adding that he may marry Mary if he wishes, since he seems able to take care of her. Nestling in his arms, Mary christens him "My hero" as she promises to become his bride.

HOUSE OF SORROW

Edith Mae Akins Drama File No. 11965

RETURNING from the cemetery grief stricken, Ben Ashton finds himself alone with his three small children, namely Mary Ellen, the oldest, Rose Lee, three years old and two year old Benny. Mary Ellen at this period is ten years old and being the eldest and of a sympathetic nature she voluntarily assumes the role of a little mother to her sister and brother. Ben Ashton feels that children so young require the guidance of a mother and so after three years he brings home to serve in this capacity, a wife. Despite Mary Ellen's misery at the presence of a step-mother, Lucy Ashton quickly wins the love and devotion of this little family. Mary Ellen develops into an attractive young woman and upon graduating from school, wearing a dress made by her stepmother whom she affectionately calls "mumsy", and capturing all the scholastic honors, she secures a position with the firm of Pelton & Pelton, attorneys at a substantial salary which she offers as her contribution to the family budget.

Across the hall, Stuart Grey is employed and Mary Ellen becomes acquainted with this dark stalwart lad. Stuart is ambitious and studies law during his leisure time. During the development of this friendship, Rose Lee and Benny contract the scarlet fever and die and through his devotion during this trying crisis in Mary Ellen's life, tbat friendship ripens into love and upon recovering from her grief, they marry. After their wedding trip, they return to a newly furnished home. Stuart establishes law office and Mary Ellen chooses to assist him at the office. For a year all is harmonious and upon their first anniversary, Stuart plans a party for his bride with some friends among whom is Alex Brown. Stuart finds his practice increasing and declares that he owes it all to his wife who exercises much good judgement in many of his legal and financial problems. At this time he purchases a larger home and a car for Mary Ellen. A client appears at the office namely Pauline Lewis who ignores the polite inquiries of Mary Ellen whom she refers to as merely the stenographer. She is a woman of ill repute whose acknowledged beauty has caused many a marital rift. She wishes to speak to Stuart regarding filing divorce proceedings against her present husband for whom she no longer cares. Stuart is summoned to her home almost every evening presumedly to discuss her problem. At this time Mary Ellen finds that she can no longer spend her days at Stuart's office as she is to have a baby and she confides this to her husband. He is at this time drinking heavily and very much in the throes of fascination for Pauline Lewis who is indifferent to any man's family ties. Mary Ellen tries to quiet her fears by recalling the phrase "Have faith" to which her stepmother has so often referred. The baby dies at birth and for a long time Mary Ellen is inconsolable. However she gains her health back again and is harassed by the fact that Stuart continues to devote much time to Pauline. Passing by her home one day, Mary Ellen chances to see Stuart in Pauline's arms, through the window. This influences her to seek gaiety in an effort to obliterate this scene from her memory and she dresses with great care and drives to the night club where Stuart had taken her on their first anniversary. It is here that she again meets Alex Brown who has heard of Stuart's affair with Pauline and he senses Mary Ellen's unhappiness. They become fast friends and Mary Ellen finds herself enmeshed in an amour with Alex due to the chain of circumstances which has made her seek other companionship.

Stuart leaves Mary Ellen after numerous quarrels and goes to Pauline, leaving Mary Ellen financially well provided for. She divorces Stuart and returns home to her parents and again returns to work for Pelton & Pelton, making herself a valuable asset to this firm. Mr. Ashton dies and Mary Ellen throws herself whole heartedly into her work. She is sent to the town where she has spent most of her married life, to establish a branch office. Upon returning to this town she accidently meets Alex who again offers her marriage but she refuses and seeks forgetfulness by becoming active in philanthropic work. One day she finds a crowd gathered in the street, only to find a tramp lying in the gutter. She recognize this derelict as her ex-husband Stuart and has him carried to her home delirious. She nurses him back to health and they become reconciled to each other and plan a happier future to off set the lurid past.

THE ROYAL MOUNTED

Morris Addison Nutter Drama File No. 11827

A BULLET whizzes through the night and Corporal Peter Ramsay, in his lonely cabin in the Canadian wilderness, feels a stinging pain in the back of his head. Unsteadily, he rises from the tahle; then the Northwest Mounted Policeman staggers and falls—dead. Two months later Sergeant Stewart Forbes stops at the cabin of his friend to bring him a message from Virginia, the corporal's daughter, in school at Banff. When no one answers his knock he breaks open the door and discovers the body of a man whom he at last identifies as Ramsay. Sadly he buries the man in the frozen ground, swearing vengeance on his murderers. Reporting at Fort Royal, Banff, Alberta, to Captain Robert Scott, the commander, Forbes is commissioned to trail the criminals even should it requires years before he apprehends them. When Virginia hears of her father's death she turns to Forbes, sobbing, while he tenderly takes the girl in his arms, consoling her as best he can. Studying all the maps of the district in which Ramsay was murdered, Forbes realizes that his task will be a difficult one as there are only forty cabins within a radius of four hundred miles of the territory. Virginia pleads with him not to endanger his life, but, authough he tells her he has always loved her dearly, he reminds the girl of his code.

Three men, dressed in hunting attire, are seated around a campfire in the Canadian wilderness. One of them, Karl Sanders, is extremely nervous, unable to eat his supper. At last he confesses to his comrades that he killed a "Mountie" after their job at Little Pond, as he feared arrest. The other men force him to leave their group, knowing that his reckless action will probably mean arrest for all of them as they are aware of the vigilance of the Northwest Mounted Police. For days Karl follows a trail, alone, until he drops, exhausted. When he regains consciousness the ground is covered with a ligh snow. Seeing a cabin in the distance, Karl cuts his leg with his hunting knife; then calls for help. The owner carries him to the cabin and applies first aid. Suddenly recognizing Karl as the man who robbed his trap line of furs, the man turns on him, but Sanders stabs him in the chest with his hunting knife. After taking supplies from the cabin, Sanders leaves, eventually rejoining a former comrade and planning to rob trappers again.

As he pursues his lonely task Forbes sings ballads of the Northwest to keep up his courage. A great blizzard sweeps the land, but, equipped now with snow-shoes and a dog-sled, the Mounted Policeman continues on his way, arriving at Ramsay's cabin one year after the murder. That night he heards Sanders hysterically announcing that he has found articles of Ramsay's clothing, and believes the ghost of the man he murdered is haunting the place. Upon hearing this, Forbes carves a hole in the log cabin wall and shoots. A volley of shots follow; then Sanders sets the cabin abaze. Forbes rattles the window; shots indicate that the two are together. Silently he escapes through the door. With only four shots left, Forbes sneaks through the bushes, killing Sander's accomplice and receiving a shoulder wound. He orders Sanders to put up his hands; recklessly the murderer shoots and misses. Forbes handcuffs him and returns with him to Fort Royal where he is appointed commander to succeed Captain Robert Scott who died during his absence. Virginia becomes his bride at a wedding attended by the entire force who honor their leader. Seven years later she shows her little son a statue of his father, killed in line of duty, and proudly he resolves to devote his life, likewise to the honor and glory of the Northwest Mounted Police.

WOMEN LOVE FOREVER

Theodore Kervitsky Drama File No. 11971

NERVES distraught and pacing restlessly up and down his prison cell, Billy Sullivan, convicted of a crime of which he was an innocent victim, chances to see in a newspaper article, that the judge who had sentenced him to twenty years in the penitentiary, has now become governor of the state. Billy is young and boyish in appearance with none of the ear marks of the usual criminal. The warden has become very interested in him and secretly believes that the hoy is really not guilty. Therefore when Billy suggests writing to ask for a pardon the warden approves. Billy is particularly anxious to be free so that he can care for his mother who has fought unceasingly for his freedom as she has never doubted his innocence. The pardon is granted and Billy leaves the prison with the warden's blessing and a generous money gift to aid him in starting life anew. The governor requests that he come to him after being released, as he is particularly interested in his case. He arrives at the capitol and while walking to his destination he is thrown down by a private car driven by the governor's daughter. Awaking to consciousness several hours later in the hospital, he meets her standing at his bedside frantic lest the accident should prove fatal. He is not hadly hurt and after the anxiety has been appeased, they find themselves very much engrossed in each other.

She has called her father who appears and upon hearing that this is the boy whom he has freed, he endeavors in every way to assist him. The boy's first thought is of his mother whom he rushes off to see hoping to surprise her. The governor and his daughter Jane accompany him to his mother's home. Upon arriving there, he finds his brother, a ruthless creature, giving a gay party at which the guests have been imbibing freely of too many alcoholic beverages. He is informed by his brother that their mother is dying in the hospital and after exchanging many angry words, he hastens to his mother's bedside. Jane follows him and after he has once again reassured his mother of his innocence, she dies. He is so grieved that he sets about to clear his name and get those who were responsible for his mother's unhappiness brought about by his disgrace. He goes to the speakeasy known as Ottie Walls place, which he has been told is the rendezvous of the gang who are responsible for having framed him. He discovers that his own brother Eddie is one of this mob. In a wild struggle Eddie tries to redeem himself, after being shot, by tipping Billy off as to an immediately impending danger.

Billy is triumphant and discovers that among the men present at this fracas is one Lobell, a detective who hears the confessions of one of the gang, clearing Billy of the crime. He returns to the home of the governor with Jane who tells him that he should consider it his home for the future as they plan to marry. A shot is heard from ahove and after reaching the door of her father's room and forcing an entrance they find the governor dying from a self inflicted bullet wound and he confides that Billy is his son, whose mother he had deserted many years before and Jane is his stepdaughter by a later marriage. The governor eould no longer face the fact that he had done his own son a never to be forgotten injustice. Jane and Bill receive his blessing and tearfully watch him depart from the mortal world.

TANGLED PATHS

Myrtle Cull Drama File No. 11836

HEAD erect, Beverly Rogers bravely holds back the tears as she leaves the superintendent's office of the city hospital, discharged. The nurses whisper that they eannot understand how so capable a girl could have given a heart depressant to a serious cardiac case; although Beverly stated that Dr. Philips ordered it verbally he denied this charge. Hastily packing, Beverly boards a train, impulsively deciding to go to Canada. At Montreal she changes to a local train, arriving at a small settlement in the wilderness. Mr. Regis, the kindly station master, drives her to a lodging house where the landlady, French-Canadian Maria, prepares tea and welcomes her as a guest. Beverly asks Mr. Regis if he knows of any place where she may secure employment as a house-keeper, adding that she has had some experience in caring for the sick. He promises to take her to the home of Dr. Smith. The following evening the genial, elderly doctor invites the two to supper, later offering Beverly a position as his assistant. Gratefully she accepts, and as these two lonely people enjoy the delicious dinner Beverly prepares the following evening, both feel a happiness they have long been denied. A snow falls the next day; clad warmly in woolens, Beverly accompanies the doctor on his rounds, at her request. At first the peple, many of whom are Indian trappers, are frightened at the sight of this attractive girl, but they soon welcome her as a benevolent saint, won by her kindness.

As they are seated before the fire Beverly confides her story to Dr. Smith, after they have become devoted friends and partners. She adds that she was adopted by an elderly lady at the age of fifteen; her name at the orphanage had been Mary Philips. Dr. Smith's eyes widen in surprise at this; glancing at her shoulder he notices a small butterfly mole and starts to speak; then changes his mind. To prove his confidence in her, Dr. Smith allows the girl to make the rounds in the afternoon while he goes out in the morning. He tells her that once he was a prominent physician in a large city, married to a beautiful woman, with two children. When she ran away with a man whom he believed to be his friend, taking the children, and informing him that the boy was not his own son, his happiness was destroyed. A broken man, he came here to forget. The story is interrupted by an Indian coming to the door with a sick child. While Beverly applies ether deftly, the doctor operates for appendicitis, saving the child's life, and both forget their sorrows in this work.

Beverly's snow shoe breaks as she is returning from her duties. Corporal Robert Peters of the Northwest Mounted Police, passing, takes the girl home on his horse where Dr. Smith prevails upon him to remain for supper. On the second evening when he is alone with Beverly he asks her to marry him, adding that as soon as he captures the criminal he is seeking he will be promoted. She consents, and he places his mother's engagement ring upon her finger.

After he leaves a man breaks into the house; Beverly, turning, encounters Dr. Philips. He seizes her but at that moment Dr. Smith enters with a revolver and informs Beverly that this man is her stepbrother, here to extort money. Peters, entering, takes him into custody, as Beverly forgives him. Dr. Smith tells the girl that she is his daughter; Regis looked up the records but he feared to shock her with the news that Philips was a murderer. In her father's arms, Beverly finds happiness at the end of tangled paths.

ON TRIAL

Dora Dorasick Drama File No. 11958

AT THE sound of a customer entering the Blue Ribbon Lunch Room, Barbara McCoy, polishing silver in the kitchen, hastens to serve the newcomer. Discovering that he is an attractive young man she bribes Molly, the other waitress, to allow her to serve him when he comes each evening. One day he courteously introduces himself as Paul Lawrence; in turn, the girl tells him her name, and allows him to persuade her to attend the theatre in his company. After that they frequently spend delightful evenings together, dancing, attending motion pictures, or listening to the radio in Barbara's tiny apartment. Lonely and starved for affection, Barbara soon finds herself in love with this attractive young man whom she knows so slightly. Nestled in his arms she confides that she married at sixteen, running away from home, and too proud to return when her husband proved to be unkind and neglectful. Determined to make her own way in the world as she had been taught to do, the girl took the only position she could find. Kissing her, Paul assures Barbara that he will always look after her. A few months later, summoning Paul to her apartment, clad in a negligee, a distracted Barbara sobs that she is to have a baby; he must marry her. Mrs. McCoy strongly oppose this, advising Barbara that she has made one mistake, she must not make two. But, unable to wait, Barbara and Paul are married secretly in the home of a minister.

The next day they drive to Barbara's home, receiving scant congratulations from her mother. But a few months later, when Barbara nurses Mrs. McCoy through a dangerous illness, all is forgiven. As Barbara and Paul are sleeping, they are awakened by a sharp knock. Police are admitted who arrest Paul for bigamy, ignoring his protests of innocence and Barbara's tears. Engaging Wentworth Holt, a brilliant young lawyer, as Barbara's attorney, the girl's uncle prepares to help the young couple. Deeply interested and sympathetic, Wentworth assures her that he will do all in his power. Lillian Lawrence, who married Paul two years before, testifies that she commenced divorce proceedings againts him, but dropped them. Paul then states that he married Lillian, deeply in love with her, but when he discovered that she was entertaining another man in the apartment during his absence he left her. Wanda, his sister, informed him that his divorce had been made final through a Mexican court; subsequently he married Barbara because she desired it, although still loving Lillian. Corroborating this story, Wanda adds that she deceived her brother since she did not wish to see him return to Lillian. Through the eloquence of Holt's arguments, Lillian is ordered to complete her divorce, which will entitle her to substantial alimony. The case draws to a conclusion when Barbara, taking the stand against her physician's orders, testifies that she has received a letter from Lillian, asking her to give up Paul, since they still love one another; she has decided to comply with this request. As she can no longer hold back the tears, Holt gently assists her to her car, assuring her of his continued friendship, while the courtroom looks on in amazement. With a cry of joy, Lillian rushes to Paul's arms.

Despondent over the thought that her baby will have no name, Barbara leaves a note of farewell and drives to the river. Holt, calling a few minutes later, discovers the note in the hands of a frightened maid. At once he drives after the girl, reaching the bank as Barbara is sinking. Leaping into the water after her, he rescues her, and when she regains consciousness, begs her to become his wife. Barbara replies that she loves him, but considers herself unworthy. Quickly, Holt silences this with a kiss, and the two are married in the same courtroom. A few months later, a happy Barbara holds her baby son in her arms, while Holt smiles at the pretty picture of mother and child in the garden.

THE BELOVED REBEL

Hildo Dejardin Historical Drama File No. 11921

PROUDLY Alberto Bautista, a poor student living with his mother in the suburbs of a Latin American city, recounts his father's deeds of bravery, adding that he gave his life in the last political revolution. Someday, he states, he will serve his country as devotedly. Upon graduation, Alberto enters the army. Aa a ball which he attends he picks up a fan and gives its to its owner, lovely Marina Martinez, daughter of Colonel Don Gerardo Gomez Martinez. Believing in equality, and remembering her smile, Alberto dares to pour out his love in a passionate but respectful letter to Marina, she answers with a brief note, stating that she will marry some one of her own rank; he is too poor for her consideration. Virginia Sandoval, who shyly admired Alberto all through their school years together, comes to bid him farewell and wish him success. She is to teach in a rural district. Dissatisfied with the tyrannical regime of President Gutierrez, Colonel Martinez becomes leader of a revolutionary movement. Retiring with his family to his ranch, Martinez plans to overthrow the government. Ten thousand troops volunteer to join him, making their headquarters at the ranch while he awaits supplies and ammunition from foreign ports. Alberto, now a sergeant Major and anxious to win promotion in order that he may prove his worth to the proud Marina, is appointed leader of the anti-revolutionary army, and ordered to stop Martinez's invasion.

Through espionage, Alberto learns that Martinez is the instigator of the entire revolution and that he is hiding at his ranch. The young sergeant offers to capture him. Alone, he goes to the ranch house and is admitted by the amazed Marina. When she learns his mission she asks him to take her father as a gentleman, and this he promises to do, removing his fire arms. Realizing that his cause is momentarily lost and that he can best serve his people by yielding, Martinez, at Marina's urgent request, accompanies Alberto, wearing his dress uniform. Refusing guards, Alberto accords his to the President. To Alberto's horror, Martinez is mearcerated in the notoriously unhealthful La Cabana; here he is brutally treated and denied even the necessities of life. Indignantly, Alberto demands that the president keep his word in granting Martinez the privileges of a gentleman and a fair trial. Instead, the colonel is privately court martialled and ruthlessly shot at sunrise. At last aware of the injustice of the government, Alberto becomes a leader of the insurgent group. He encounters Virginia in a hospital, no longer a shy girl, but a poised and couragcous young woman, who has come to serve his forces as a nurse.

Revolution spreads over the country. America sends John Tell, in an endeavor to establish peace, but injustice has been borne too long. Led by Alberto, the people demand abdication of the President. At last Gutierrez grants them this, fearing for his life, and hurriedly leaves the country by plane. Alberto is nominated in his stead and, while throngs cheer widly, he promises justice to all. Marina now offers him her love, but he turns to Virginia. In despair, the unhappy Marina ends her life with poison, leaving a note which states that she was too proud. Virginia becomes Alberto's bride at a gala ceremony at the capitol.

UNDER THE BLUE EAGLE

Ellen Hinton Bathurst Drama File No. 11300

DROPPED from an executive position because her employer is hiring cheaper help in defiance of N. R. A., Evelyn begins a long search for work. Everywhere she sees the hypocrites who fly blue eagles and violate the principles of the president's plan. Starving, she meets again Jim Geleson, whom she has known before he became a notorious gang leader. Jim greets her enthusistically and offers her all the money she wants if she will live with him. Evelyn refuses and returns home only to discover that her room mate, Mary, has committed suicide after losing her position. Dully Evelyn picks up the newspaper and as she reads of the 100% co-operation with the N. R. A. in town, she laughs hysterically. She proceeds to the hangout of Jim Geleson, and after considerable difficulty gains admittance. Jim rushes forward to embrace her. Evelyn accepts the chair he offers and tells him she has changed her mind. However, a new bitterness has taken hold of her and when he boasts of his fearless gang, Evelyn unfolds her plan to Jim. He regards her as though she is mad, and refuses flatly, informing her he is not going to help the government which killed his brother last week. Evelyn, realizing the hold she has over Jim, declares simply that she is leaving. Rather than lose her, Jim calls his gang together and tells them that henceforth they are to take orders from Evelyn. Accordingly, fortified by her bodyguard of gorillas, Evelyn goes calling on one of the Code violators. The stocky boss laughs at her orders, and Evelyn threatens him. The next day the local newspapers headline "RED HEADED GIRL GANGSTER AIDS N. R. A. WARNS ALL STORES IN TOWN TO PUT ON NEW HELP INSTEAD OF PROLONGING HOURS OF WORK." Jim laughs at her, but is her slave. A week later, when no results are forthcoming, Evelyn issues orders to destroy the plate glass windows of the violator's shop. New help is required to replace them. Many of the stores, in fear of further demonstrations for the first time begin observing the rules they have pledged themselves to. Evelyn laughs hysterically, and Jim holding her close, begs her to give up the mad idea. When she comes back to one of the stores, however, to warn them again, she is met with a barrage of gun fire. Carried back to Jim's headquarters, Evelyn moans with pain. Jim bends over her anxiously, and as she opens her pain filled eyes he tells her he loves her, how he has realized it now when for a moment he thought he might lose her. Begging her to marry him, he pleads with her to come on a prolonged honeymoon with him as soon as she regains her strength. But is not until Jim promises to give up his underworld career and open a respectable business of his own, such as he had before the Depression hit him and he discovered he could make thousands illicitly, that Evelyn agrees. The gang is disbanded. Jim offers his men work in his store. Amusing complications ensue as the gangster try to adjust themselves to ideas of honesty. Many customers never realize their watches have been picked from their pockets and returned by the salesmen, after a sharp look from Evelyn or Jim, and a new life begins for them all with the dawn of a New Day.

APRON STRINGS

I. M. Montney Drama File No. 11320

WISHING to earn enough money to help Ruth, the woman he now loves, Earnie Landel, sits down at the typewriter, to write the story of his life for a motion picture. His thoughts wander back to childhood. . .

Before his mother dies, giving life to Earnie, Bess promises to look after her brother. His youth is spent in the harsh atmosphere of their uncle's home while through the years the sacrifices of his sister make it possible for him to go through high school. Dreaming of the children whom he will someday adopt and give pleasure and affection denied him, Earnie remembers the words of his uncle who when their father remarried declared that no woman cared for another's children. Mary, a classmate, dispells these fears. They keep their love hidden, deciding they are too young for marriage. She places a three-year time limit and Earnie leaves with Bess, who has recently married, and her husband for the west where he plans to make his fortune in the interim. A worker in an apple packing shed, he meets Violet who drives away the image of Mary. Though Earnie dreams of becoming an author he is only an unskilled laborer and the family objects. After she consents to wait while Earnie works in a logging camp, her last letter states that her mother has forbidden her to correspond. At once he returns only to find her tied to another. His thoughts go back to Mary only to learn indirectly of her marriage also. Life becomes a procession of girls, striving to satisfy hunger for affection and a home. He misses the inspiration of "apron strings," which his sister and Mary accustomed him to. Each time his hopes are dashed—laboring at the saw mill, he is introduced to Jean and becomes attached only to learn that she is not sympathetic to adopting children. When a rival calls her a "gold digging hussy", Earnie strikes him and is overseen by Jean who blames him. The two who follow are also disappointing—Betty is pleasure-mad; Florence is fickle. Delicate Pearl to whom he becomes engaged though it is doubtful if she can have children, dies suddenly, leaving a note that she is glad to set him free for it is sympathy and not love Earnie feels for her. At his boarding-house, he scarcely notices Ruth until he learns that she, too, is grieving—for a divorced husband. When she reveals that she is going to risk her health by going to the famous Leper's Island as nurse for the sake of supporting a child in the sanitarium, his own troubles seem smaller. Ruth seems the woman for him and he begs her to change plans while he seeks financial aid. Enroute to his brother's home, Earnie is picked up by a film booking agent who gives him addresses of studios seeking original plots.

Here reality comes to a stopping point and Earnie imagines the close as he wants in real life—the play a huge success, and Ruth his bride; on her wedding ring engraved "Apron Strings;" adding a theme song, "I Will All My Dreams to You."

Ashamed to appear before the studio executive in shabby garments he supplements his earnings seeking gold dust, retrieving it after his story is accepted to make into a wedding band. His story ending is fulfilled except for the most essential part. Ruth, he learns, has suddenly remarried her former husband. Sick at heart, Earnie is haunted by boyhood memories. Underneath, the memory of his first love, Mary, persists. Returning, he finds many familiar scenes disappointingly changed, only to approach the old school building and encounter Mary. He is to learn that she is still free but her cousin, bearing the same name, is married. Then, slowly he draws out the ring realizing that it was meant always for her. Both stoop to pick up a newspaper clipping which drops from his pocket. Mary reads aloud—"Twins for Adoption."

THE FIRST FLIGHT

George G. Duering Drama File No. 11849

AS JIMMY FARRAL, a cowboy on his father's Texas ranch, sees an airplane winging its way across the blue sky his ambition to become a great pilot is born. Informing his parents of this he eventually wins their permission and drives to Dallas in his Ford touring car. After securing a room at an inexpensive boarding house the young man peruses the want ads. He discovers an advertisment offering young men interested in aviation an opportunity to earn while learning. Hastening to the school, Jimmy eagerly pays his enrollment fee of fifty dollars and is sent to the Crane Hotel to apply for a position in the laundry but finds it already taken. That evening he attends his first class at the aviation school and receives a manual of instructions which he studies far into the night. The following day his instructor takes him up for a first flight; he returns, filled with enthusiasm. When the instructor congratulates him on his splendid physical condition he replies that it is the result of Joe Bonomo's Physical Culture Course which he studied at home. His savings rapidly disappearing, Jimmy desperately looks for work, with no results. After studying an alluring army poster the boy decides to join their ranks, in hopes of being assigned, eventually, to the air service. An experienced rider, he signs up with the Cavalry and is sent to Fort Bliss, Texas, where he soon wins first place because of his equestrian ability.

In his spare time, Jimmy enrolls for a welding course and takes up various sports through the Y. M. C. A. While playing golf alone, one day, he encounters an attractive girl who consents to become his partner. When she wins he proposes that they enjoy an outing together in Old Mexico to celebrate her victory, and she agrees. They attend a bull fight and a dance in the picturesque country, and discover, as they ride home together on the train, that they have fallen in love. Shortly after this, Jimmy is appointed to the air service at Kelly field. He bids farewell to Dorothy, his sweetheart, advising her that soon he will be able to send for her. Passing his tests, Jimmy next learns the art of parachute jumping. When air manoeuvres are held his plane accidentally crashes with another. Pulling the rip cord only a short distance from the ground, Jimmy is able to save the captain, caught in the other plane, before flames sweep over it. As a reward he is promoted to the post of lieutenant but when his aviation school offers him the directorship he resigns from the army to accept. Then he sends for Dorothy; the two are married at a simple ceremony attended by fellow aviators. The next year a little son is born to them.

When a glider designed by Jimmy wins first place in a contest he takes the model to Germany, flying from Le Havre field, accompanied by Dorothy. Apprehensive at first, Dorothy gives Jimmy permission to fly his own glider when she sees that his heart is set on it, and, again he wins first place. Jimmy sings and plays American songs at a banquet given in his honor, later broadcasting them. His company sends for him and he returns, first selling his glider to the son of his host. Jimmy lives to see his son a famous pilot and his airplanes purchased by thousands as America leads the world in air consciousness, due to his leadership.

RETRIBUTION

Mrs. A. C. Wilkinson Drama File No. 11200

A JUNIOR at Princeton, Merill Sutherland, heir to a tremendous fortune falls in love with Ruth Ellington, who lives in the college town. Fearing the antagonism or his mother, a snobbish dowager, Merill pleads a secret wedding. After a week of happiness, Merill is called back to attend the marriage of his sister Katherine to Lord Emberson, whose title the ruthless Mrs. Sutherland has bought for her unwilling daughter. Meanwhile, Merill is constantly thrown into the company of Sybil Stewart, his mother's choice for him. Although Sybil has grown into a slender and patrician beauty, Merill has thoughts only for Ruth. However, when his mother discovers that her son has defied her and married a girl he has met at college, she secures an annulment of the marriage since hoth youngsters were under age. Heart-broken, Ruth writes that she is going to have a child and sends back the torn pieces of the check with which she was to have been paid off. For a moment Mrs. Sutherland hesitates, but ambition goads her to continuing her cherished plans. Merill never suspects Ruth is bearing his child, and Ruth dies in childbirth. Her youngster, called Ruth after her, is adopted by the Jacksons, a kindly couple, who, when Ruth is four years old, are killed in an automobile accident. Ruth is sent to an orphan asylum where, attracting attention by virtue of her remarkable singing voice, she is patronized by the wealthy philanthropist, Mrs. Massa and sent abroad to study.

Meanwhile Merill, now married to Sybil goes to visit his sister Katherine, who has recently given birth to a son. To his shocked amazement he learn that Katherine is utterably miserable. Her cruel husband is in love with a Lady Aberdeen, whom Katherine is forced to have as a guest in her own home. Emberson makes no pretense of respect for the American wife who has bought his title, and Katherine, suffering, tries to keep up the pretense for the sake of her son. However, when matters become unbearable she takes Merill's advice and decides to leave her husband. Her baby develops a mastoid and while flying with him across the English Channel to have him operated upon by a noted surgeon, Katherine and her son are killed in a plane disaster. Confronted with the results of her ambitions, Mrs. Sutherland breaks down. White haired, stricken, Mrs. Sutherland confesses for the first time that Ruth had written of a child. Merill's search is unavailing, however.

Meanwhile, Ruth, informed on her eighteenth birthdthat she is a daughter of the fabulously wealthy Sutherlands, prefers to go on without help from her father. However, when she has achieved fame as a singer of the first magnitude, and has been contracted for the Metropolitan Opera House, she writes a brief note to Merill, who, his voice trembling, meets for the first time his daughter. Mrs. Sutherland begs forgiveness. Sybil mother's her husband's daughter, and Merill tries to make up for all the years of neglect. Feted, honored, Ruth meets through her father Jack Wallingford. They dance together at a dinner given in Ruth's honor. Jack, wealthy, handsome, accompanies the Sutherlands on Ruth's triumphal concert tour, and after a final memorable concert at the Metropolitan, Ruth retires from public life to become the adored wife of Jack Wallingford.

BRIDE OF MYSTERY

Mrs. Maud Thomas Melodrama File No. 11963

RECEIVING a telegram that his father is on the point of death, Gerald Jones hastily packs and leaves school, journeying to the hotel where the elderly man has lived in seclusion for several years. On the train he engages in conversation with June, an orphan, bound for the same city to seek a position. His father informs the young man that if he marries before his death he will inherit the estate Believing that he can help June as well as himself, Gerald pleads with her to become his bride, not disclosing his purpose fully, and at last she consents, as she is in love with Gerald. Dressed in bridal white, June promises to love, honor and obey this attractive stranger at the bedside of his hot tempered father. A few minutes later, Mr. Jones, Sr. dies. When June reads the terms of the will in the paper the next morning she hastily packs and leaves her husband, utterly disillusioned. In dismay he searches for her, but, as he saw her only for a few hours, and under great emotional stress, Gerald cannot describe her accurately to police. Several months later, Gerald meets Alice Harding at a dance and falls in love with her, but she coolly refuses to take an interest in his suit, seldom accompanying him to theatres and cafes in spite of repeated invitations. Jack Wilson, son of a banker, is his most serious rival.

Gerald's aged housekeeper informs the young man that several strangers have evidently searched the house in his absence. While he is reading in the library one evening he feels a presence, and, turning abruptly, notices several men outside the window. Hastily, he follows them, but they disappear over the garden wall. In his search, Gerald discovers that the watch dog has been poisoned and the gardener knooked unconscious. Applying first aid, Gerald revivies him, but the bewildered man is unable to describe the intruders. A short time later, Gerald is notified that he must appear in court, as a man and woman who claims to be the true heirs to the estate have filed charges against him. In dismay he discovers that his deed to the property and his father's will have been stolen. Carl and Beverly Jones claim that they are his father's only heirs, by a second marriage, and that Gerald was born out of wedlock. In sympathy, Alice Porter offers her help, engaging Conrad Winslow, a brilliant attorney, for Gerald's case; only at the urgent request of the young woman, who is his personal friend, does the lawyer consent. Nancy, the aged housekeeper, testifies in court that she is Gerald's mother. Removing a gray wig and heavy mask of makeup she stands revealed as a beautiful and cultured woman. Once a housekeeper in the Jones home, since she had no means of support, she married Gerald's father, keeping the ceremony secret for years at his family's request, since she did not wish to ruin his career. Witnesses corroborate that testimony, and it is disclosed that Carl and Beverly are not related to Jones, but are children of his second wife by a former marriage.

When Gerald tells Alice that he loves her, but is not free to marry, she reveals that she is none other than June, his wife! After a glorious honeymoon in South America, the two return to the estate where Gerald's mother welcomes them.

THE GLEAM OF FAITH

Mrs. J. Regner Drama File No. 11896

EVERY Sunday evening Robert's mother and father spend a happy hour in prayer and singing while they teach their little son the beautiful stories in the Bible. As he grows older he resolves to devote his life to the service of others, bringing them joy by instructing them in God's Word. At college, Robert, an accomplished athelete and brilliant student, wins many honors. Although taking an active part in student life he does not join in drinking and gambling sessions. His only sorrow is the death of his beloved mother; at her bedside in the hospital he promises always to remember her teachings and apply them throughout life. Always ready to help a weaker student, Robert is popular with everyone. He is elected class president; in that role he is instrumental in promoting a democractic spirit among the student body, regardless of fraternity affiliations, or finanical status. While attending a lecture by a noted former governor Robert resolves to enter social service work in an attempt to improve conditions for the poor of the city. After graduation he works diligently at his chosen profession, making a complete survey of conditions as well as preaching a message of hope in the Sunday Mission which he establishes. Playgrounds, churches, recreational centers, clinics and schools are established through the young man's efforts.

Robert discovers that Stewart Kellog, a prominent political leader, is responsible for the dangerous and unsafe conditions in the tenement homes. Fearlessly he attacks him through the press, charging him with misappropriation of the people's money. As he is preaching on the power of faith to an outdoor gathering Robert notices a beautiful girl standing in a doorway watching him with a smile of approval. At the conclusion of the sermon she introduces herself merely as Catherine, another social worker. While Robert conducts her to her car, both find they have similar views and enthusiasms wishing to devote their lives to this great cause. As Catherine waves a farewell, Robert knows that he has found the one woman in the world for him. Although their work keeps them apart, both think constantly of the other. Eventually they meet again at a mission. After the last cup of coffee has been served, Robert declares his love and Catherine, in his office, replies that she, too, cares for him, as she goes to his arms. At that moment Stewart Kellog breaks into the room; while he glares at them Catherine introduces him—as her father. Angrily he orders Robert to stay away from his daughter, advising him also not to make false charges against him. With perfect calm, Robert asserts that his charges are true, proving this with facts. Catherine pleads with Robert to leave them; for her sake, he complies.

Severely criticizing his daughter for her social work he forbids her to enter the tenement district again but when Maria, a poor Italian woman, begs her to come for the sake of her sick child, Catherine hurries to the district. As she enters the building collapses, due to Kellog's negligence. Catherine, severely injured, is rushed to the hospital where she calls constantly for Robert. At the doctor's orders, Kellog sends for him. After hours of prayer, Robert is told that Catherine is out of danger. He turns to Kellog, to find him, kneeling, promising God to serve him and thanking him for the faith of these two young people who have shown him the way.

MEN WITHOUT MORALS

Elizabeth Callahan Drama File No. 11949

ALONE in the little grocery store where she works from early morning until late at night, Betty's only pleasure is in serving the school children who come every noon to purchase lollypops. Someday, she tells her mother, she will have children of her own to whom she can give the pleasures she has never known. Roger, nephew of a senator, loves Betty. The two become engaged at a picnic but, as Roger is a poor law student, the wedding must be indefinately postponed. Sam was the flashy driver of the rig which was hired by salesman to drive about town; calling every week at the store to take orders, Betty treats him with cool courtesy but after he repeatedly urges her to drive with him in his handsome rig with the dappled grey horse the girl consents. He is very kind to her, showering her with unaccustomed attentions, and promising if she marries him she will have the home of her dreams. At last, believing that Roger no longer cares as he seldom writes, Betty consents, against her parent's wishes. Instead of the home he promised, Sam takes his bride to a few barren rooms above a livery stable owned by his brother, which they share with Sam's mother. His mother boards a group of stable men and forces Betty to arise at six in order to prepare their breakfast. The girl is deeply shocked when Louis, a poor hunchback, is dismissed merely because he asks for a second helping of cereal. Resenting the girl, Sam's mother has the constable serve papers on her in order to force her to leave, but the court upholds that she may stay unless her husband takes her with him to another home.

When a fire breaks out in the stable, Betty remains with her mother-in-law until both are rescued; still the woman hates and abuses her. When Betty learns that Sam drinks and frequents a house of doubtful reputation across the street she pleads with him to give up these vices, but he only laughs at her. At last she divorces him securing a small cash settlement. Sam pleads with Betty to remarry him, again promising her a home and stating he cannot live without her. Moved by pity and love, she consents. For a few happy months they have a small cottage of their own, then Sam again drinks and brings Betty to the livery stable. The girl secures employment in a bottling works where she accidentally cuts her arm, receiving a deep and permanent scar. Becoming infatuated with an older woman of doubtful reputation, Sam neglects Betty completely, spending all his time and money on Myra. Her colored maid, grieved at an injustice, reports this to Betty who follows them to a hotel, discovering Myra, clad in a negligee, waiting for Sam. Bitterly, Betty explains her actions to the hotel owner, who sends them away, explaining that they registered as Mr. and Mrs. Smith. In front of a group of farm men, Sam boasts of his infidelity until Betty losing all control, throws plates at him, hysterically. Sam pretends that his money is being spent on horse racing but Betty learns that Myra receives it. His mother dies, leaving nothing to Betty, and a month later, when her own mother is taken, Sam sells her furniture, keeping the money himself.

Disillusioned, Betty, secures a divorce, leaving all this behind, finds a haven in a room in a barn and returned to the hard life at the bottling works. An attorney helps her force Sam to pay alimony; at last she is able to purchase a little home by means of a bank loan. She visits Sam, noticing that his mistress' dog is buried more elaborately than her own mother. Myra, her beauty faded, has married a farm hand; the three live in the same house, although Sam will not permit the husband to dine with them. Sam calls upon Betty, telling her that he has aways loved her alone, but it is too late. From the depths of her sad experience, Betty composes a song, which comes to her, suddenly; "Why Cast Me Aside for Another?" Achievment brings happiness, at last, and when Sam who has heard the haunting melody over the air, asks if he may visit, Betty faces the future with hope, forgetting past sorrow.

TRAPPED

Joseph Byars Mystery File No. 12026

YOUNG Jim Bullock confides his dreams of a gay and exciting life in a metropolitan city to Georgia, a neighbor girl, as the two watch the sunset over their homes in the Kentucky Hills. Frank Crane, an industrious farmer boy who loves Georgia, watches them, longing to arouse the same expression of rapt attention in the girl's eyes himself, but when she refuses to attend a dance with him the following week she knows that she is becoming interested in his adventurous rival. Pleading with Georgia to marry him, offering all he has in the world, Frank cannot hide his disappointment when she replies that she hopes for a more glamorous life. Rebelling against the routine of farm work,

Jim steals a small sum from his father and journeys to Danville, the nearest town. He is delighted when he sees posters announcing that a travelling stock company will give a performance that evening and eagerly purchases his ticket, depriving himself of dinner in order to do so. The first member of the audience in the small auditorium, Jim eagerly awaits the rise of the curtain. Others watch this boy, so obviously from the country, with amusement, as he cheers the hero and hisses the villain. To the naive hill-billy, the leading lady represents all that is glamorous and romantic despite the faded wig and wrinkles scarcely hidden by heavy makeup which more sophisticated members of the audience criticize.

As he walks home the next day the boy dreams grandly of himself as a prominent matinee idol or a successful business man, wined and dined by the elite of a modern city, the object of countless women's favor. Again neglecting his work, Jim prepares to go rabbit hunting, rusty shot gun in hand. Passing farmers already plowing their fields and women spinning, weaving and washing according to the anitquated methods of the district, Jim comes to the cabin of John Dean, an eccentric hermit. As he gazes through the broken window pane, Jim observes the hermit removing a roll of bills from a dresser drawer and concealing them underneath a plank. Several hours later, Constable Brown, calling in an attempt to persuade Dean to deposit his money in the bank, recoils in horror as he sees the man lying dead, in a pool of blood. Covering his body with a sheet, the constable observes that money has been taken from the cabin and picks up a theatre stub. Boasting of his trip to Danville to Georgia, Frank and other members of the community, Jim swaggers toward his home, taking the girl with him. Alone at last, he tells Georgia to meet him at the creek after sundown as he is going to go to the city and wishes to take her with him; impulsively the girl agrees. In his room, Jim counts the money he stole after ruthlessly murdering Dean and discovers it amount to $3000. Concealing it he is eating his supper when the constable calls and arrests him, stating that the theatre stub found by Dean's body convicted him, as he was the only one in the community who had attended. This silences Jim's protests and he is led away while his mother sobs, stricken with grief. grief.

The next morning Georgia hears the story from neighbors and turns pale. She confesses her plan to run away to Frank, but he answers by telling her that he understands, as she goes to his arms.

BAD WOLF

Loretta North Drama File No. 12020

"WHO'S afraid of the Big, Big Bad Wolf, Big Bad Wolf—" softly Janet Wayfield sang this to keep her spirits up as she attended to her duties as bookkeeper at Price's Grocery Store. For in spite of herself, Janet could not keep from remembering. . . . the days when she and Jerry Ryan had attended grammar school together when he gallantly carried her books and she helped him with his lessons. The high school proms and local parties they had attended, always together. The night he asked her to become his bride, as they were driving in his battered Ford. The parties and showers her friends had given her. And then the day when Jerry suddenly disappeared without a word to anyone. Would she never hear from him again? Was he alive and well? Months of anxious searching and waiting had brought no answer to these questions. Returning home at the end of the day, Janet prepares dinner for her father, a widower, and attempts to hide her worry from him, as she talks of other things. But he sees her unhappiness, and urges her to enjoy herself with her young friends as she once did. Acting upon his suggestion, Janet accepts when Dorothy Moore invites her to attend a party. Here she is presented to Joe Penford, Dorothy's cousin, who has come to accept a position at the bank. For the first time in months, Janet forgets her misery and joins in the general merriment, encouraged by the gay and sympathetic Joe.

Granting his request to call, Janet presents Joe to her father, who persuades him to stay for dinner the following evening. With a smile of satisfaction, Mr. Wayfield observes that the young man is a frequent caller, and once more Janet attends social functions with a semblance of her old gaiety. As Joe and Janet are enjoying the beauty of surroundings woods together, the girl tells him the story of her lonely vigil that she is keeping for Jerry, and he places his arm about her in sympathy, assuring her that she must not worry as he knows Jerry is well, although he cannot tell her more. Puzzled, Janet pleads with him to continue and he admits that he recently encountered Jerry in his native city, but promised to keep his address a secret for the time being. In answer to her father's inquiry, as they are seated together in the living room, Janet confides that she loves Joe with a deep and abiding passion far more powerful than the brother and sister relationship that existed between her and Jerry. Yet she feels she must keep her promise to her fiance. While Joe and Janet are riding together, the girl's horse becomes frightened and throws her to the ground. As Joe holds her in his arms he pours out his love and, regaining consciousness, Janet returns his embrace, but tells him again that she must keep her promise to Jerry.

Weeks pass; then Janet hears a familiar voice in the living room. With a pounding heart she enters to find Jerry conversing with her father. He explains that he left town at the instigation of a man he met in the hotel, who promised him a good position. It did not materialize and he was too proud to return a failure. At last he secured a position with a prominent firm and met Joe at a party, sending him here when he read of a vacancy in the bank. Alone in a strange city, Joe's sister, Jean ,became his friend and he married her. As Joe calls with Jean, Janet rushes to his arms uttering a sigh of relief, while her Big, Bad Wolf disappears forever.

THEATRE DATE

Patricia Terry Short Subject File No. 12015

IN love with Jane Freeman, Jerry Miller sings happily as he dresses, recalling the evening last week during a dance when she promised to become his bride. At a sacrifice, the boy plans a gay party, following the theatre, when the engagement is to be announced at the Aire Nido, among a group of their close friends. Donning top hat and tuxedo, Jerry views the reflection of a smartly dressed young man in the mirror with satisfaction. Mentally he pictures the evening that is to come, the songs, dances and entertainment by the stars of the exclusive club, the congratulations of his friends. Carrying the image further, Jerry plans their wedding day and the little home to which he will bring his bride. Later, perhaps, she will croon a lullaby. . , his reverie is interrupted as he alights from his roadster at the florist shop, purchasing a gardenia for his button hole, a corsage for his beloved and a quaint, old fashioned bouquet for Jane's adored Granny. Arriving at the Colonial mansion, Jerry is warmly greeted by Mandy, the old colored servant, who conducts him into the living room where Granny, dressed in black silk with dainty lace jabot, lies asleep, her rosary and Bible in her hand. As Jerry observes the delicate little figure, belonging to a gentler age, his thoughts go back to the days of the old South, when this mansion was a scene of many a gay ball for heroes of the Confederacy and their ladies. Teasingly he hides Granny's bouquet. When her Irish setter joyfully greets Jerry, Granny awakens, smiling at the young man.

Entering the room, Mandy informs Granny that the Poker Club to which she belongs cannot come because of the heavy snows. With an expression of disappointment, she nods graciously. Her only diversion and vice, this club to which Granny and a group of other ladies whom she has known for years belong to, has often netted her winnings as large as eleven cents, in the course of a long tournament! Jerry teases her gently about her gambling; then, he turns to greet his radiant Jane, offering her her flowers. Granny tries to smile, but Jerry senses that she is hurt and quickly presents her with his gift. In delight she opens it, as he bends for a light kiss. When Granny asks if they will stay to play cards with a lonely old lady, not knowing Jerry's plans, all thought of a theatre and gay party are forgotten as they gladly consent. Seated before the fire, the three play poker enjoying cakes and tea which Mandy proudly serves, as she beams at them. In reminiscent mood, Granny recalls her girlhood when she came to this mansion as a bride, dsecribing her wedding and the social customs of the day, so different from the modern age. "But young people haven't really changed; they are as fine as ever," Granny loyally asserts, her arms about each of them. Taking this opportunity, Jane and Jerry announce their engagement. Granny is delighted, reminding them that as children they promised to marry when they played together under the trees. Smiling tenderly, Jane recalls her first date with Jerry, when they attended a dance, children no longer. With a little laugh, she reminds Jerry of his jealousy when she became attracted to the dashing Carlyle Evans, a middle aged actor, whom her father had known. In a happy mood, they picture again the picnics and parties they attended, always together—while the radio plays songs of long ago.

At the conclusion of the happy evening, Jerry goes upstairs to bring Granny's slippers, and Jane, excusing herself, follows. When they come down together, much later, they discover that Granny has fallen asleep—for the last time, with a smile on her sweet face. His arm about Jane, Jerry silently thanks God that they made her last evening a happy one, as he comforts his sweetheart.

A HAPPY LANDING

Marjorie Clarke Drama File No. 12032

ROCKLAND was a small country community, the population of which was small and therefore most every one knew just what his neighbor anticipated doing long before the party in question had time to accomplish the act. The Martins were a much respected family in the town. Sylvia and James were a devoted brother and sister and very popular with the younger set. Both Sylvia and James attended the local high school and usually walked to school each morning together. On this particular morning they were leisurely going to the schoolhouse when they were accosted by an attractive looking lad who introduced himself as Jack Dean who had just moved into the house across the street from the Martins. He inquired if he would be permitted to join them as he had already registered and was to attend school here for the first time.

Jack's father was a well known aviator and from him the boy inherited his love for adventure and had many plans to follow in his father's footsteps. Jack and Sylvia became fast friends and James sharred Jack's enthusiasm for flying. A prize was to be offered for the best model plane to be erected, the prize to be a free course in aviation. The boys planned to spend their evenings competing for the much coveted prize. Sylvia was to lend her moral support and watch the progress they were making. She accompanied her brother to Jack's house each evening and watched them work diligently on their project chatting with Jack's parents and making herself generally helpful. Jack's father was most pleased at the boy's inclination to achieve something constructive. In December the plane was finished and The Cornell Flying Corporation which had offered the reward announced that the prize had been won by Jack Dean and James Martin. The boys completed their course and joined the flying corps. Sylvia had gone away to college and upon reading a newspaper one evening she was startled to learn that Jack had been one of the casualties in an accident which had happened that day. Jack had asked Sylvia to marry him but Sylvia told him that only after completing her college course would she consider marriage and by then she would be certain that he was the man to be considered. For she reasoned that perhaps her seeming devotion to Jack was but puppy love.

Her fears for Jack's safety upon reading the account in the paper made her realize that her affection was deeper for him than she had allowed herself to realize. Hastening to Rockland she rushes to his side only to find that his condition was not quite as serious as she had been led to believe. Jack however was convinced that Sylvia's love for him had prompted this spontaneous act and for this he was grateful and Sylvia promises to concede to his plans for an immediate wedding upon exacting a promise from him that he will never fly again. This he cannot do because of his enlistment in the service and Sylvia returns to school unhappy but resigned to delay their plans until he can get his release. Aviation seems to be a hobby even at college and her classmates urge her to learn, declaring that this will aid her in overcoming her fears. After much urging on the part of her friends she consents and plans to fly home to Rockland and surprise Jack. This she does and Jack, about to apply for his release from the service declares that only if Sylvia promises him never to fly again will he abide by her request. She promises and the wedding date is set.

IS IT A DREAM?

Mrs. H. R. Fancher Drama File No. 11773

AS Robert is a babe in arms, his mother prays that he may grow up to be true and gentle hearted. He learns his baby prayers, goes to school and at the age of seven as he and a companions are fishing, discusses God. They come to the conclusion that God isn't as important as Washington or Lincoln because you never hear about Him in school. At nine he has a tiff with Dick and strikes him. Dick counts nine to get control of his temper, then picks up Bob's cap and hands it to him, triumphantly marching home. When seventeen, trying to appear as a man of the world he and his companions are about to enter a tavern as Dick passes. They jeer at him because he refuses to enter. A girl passing by tells them they are poor sports and walks on with Dick. Dick and Bob attend the same college. During Dick's last year he helps Carl, a drunken school mate, to his room and after visualizing the different effects on youth between Carl's description of his Sunday School teacher and the address of a Dr. Winston before the school the previous day, a dream is born.

Bob studies to be a lawyer. During his last year at school he and Dave, visiting at a farm are appalled at the poverty. Arriving home, newspapers are full of how the Morgan's evaded income tax payments and while morally wrong it seems to be legally right. From this time on Bob and Dave get the idea that honesty is not the best policy. One night as they discuss the unfairness of things, an underworld character with whom they have become friendly, suggests that they go in for kidnapping. They think this is going too far but when he suggests they kidnap only from racketeers they agree. A racketeering plot reveals as its head a Mr. Skinner, whose daughter the boys plan to abduct. By mistake they get the neighbors daughter who, as her eyes meet Bob's the next day says: "So you're still a poor sport." They spend some time in the hide-out where Margie asks them twice to listen to Dick who is now an inspirational speaker over the air. The first time he says we should leave vengeance to God. Our part is to overcome evil with good. The second time he says "Only three things our God requires of us: 'To do justly, to love mercy and to walk humbly with God.'" Both of these talks are so inspiring that they impress the boys deeply. The boys get the ransom money with these words to the girl, "Darling help your captors," Bob sees the error of his ways and tells Dave and Jim that he thinks they had better return the money and the girl. Jim, enraged, says "You double-crosser. I want that money." He pulls a gun from his pocket and shoots Bob. Dave and Bob reach for their guns when a voice rings in the room saying "Vengeance is mine." (Jim accidentally turned on the radio as he pulled his gun from his pocket). Jim runs from the room as Bob faints. They return the money and the girl and while Bob is convalescing in the hospital the other boys stay at the home of Mr. Armstrong, Margie's father, Dick calls, explaining his dream to Mr. Armstrong who conrtibutes $2,500 for its futherance.

Jane Skinner calls and because of her scornful attitude Jim plans to abduct her. As she is driving alone he blocks the road, forcing her to ride with him. He imprisons her, demanding ransom from her father, whose criminal activities he describes to the girl. A little negro boy relays the money to a white boy who gives it to Jim: police, watching, give chase while Mr. Skinner, Mr. Armstrong and Margie join. Jim's car crashes and he dies. Meanwhile striking her head against a window and breaking it Jane calls for help. Two hunters rescue her, telephoning her father who comes for the girl. When he admits the truth of Jim's accusations, Jane pleads with him to restore the stolen money. At the Armstrong home Dick is just about to tell Mr. Armstrong that his dream has come true when Bob, on his way home from the hospital stops to say goodbye. Mr. Skinner enters, half mad and reveals that he is a racketeer. Bob tells him that because they are in the gutter of life is not reason for them to stay there and turning to Dick, tells him that it was his words that set his values straight and makes an impassioned plea that youth might hear more of men of his type. Dick then reveals that that is what he has been working for and contributions of interest parties have brought about the realization of his dream.

As Bob bids Margie goodbye he hopelessly tells her he still loves her and she says: "And I love you now."

THE DEVIL GOAT

Ward Mitchell Comedy File No. 11966

RIVALS for the love of pretty Rinda Farley, Aaron Adkins and Tom Craley both pay court to the girl, presenting her with flowers and huge boxes of chocolate. Wisely, she declines to state her preference, accompanying first one then the other to dances and parties held in the small village in Lincoln County, West Virginia, where she is employed by Aaron's mother, who regards her more as a friend than a servant. Delicate and nervous as the result of illness during his childhood which kept him from enjoying boyish sports, Aaron tires easily while Tom Craley holds the reputation of being the champion amateur wrestler of the county. Rinda attends the county fair with Aaron, as he was first to invite her, but Tom joins the group, self-invited. He easily demonstrates his prowess at pounding a huge sledge hammer which registers his strength as twice that of his rivals. Escaping from him, Aaron leads Rinda to the concessions. Here he enjoys a happy afternoon with the girl as they ride the merry-go-round, ferris wheel and other diversions with merry abandon. In the Crazy House, Aaron forgets his shyness, gayly sailing through whirling barrels and down collapsible stairs with Rinda. But Tom sees the two and quickly joins them, daring Aaron to enter a wrestling contest. Unwilling to admit his fear, Aaron grits his teeth and enters, pitted against a man of much greater strength. In spite of his game fight he goes down and is sent home in an ambulance, a pitiful and slightly ridiculous figure, while Tom escorts Rinda. The next morning Aaron confesses to his mother that he has lost Rinda's respect, but she encourages him by stating that he will someday be able to prove he is not a coward.

Ward Brumfield, a travelling man, returns from his duties on the road with a goat which he presents to his two small sons. Gleefully the boys harness their pet to a wagon, riding about the community while passers-by draw back in amazement as this is the first goat to be seen in Lincoln County. While the animal is pasturing he breaks through the fence, running through town. Molly, an old colored washwoman, drops her bundle of linens hastily on the street, uttering a shriek of terror as she sees the goat approach. Sam, her husband, lazily enjoying an afternoon nap in a rocker on the front lawn, is sent up in the air as the animal swiftly charges at him. Toward sunset, Rinda prepares to drive the cows home from their pasture when the goat appears. With bellows of fright, the cows take to the woods, while Rinda hysterically runs toward home, informing Mrs. Adkins that a monster with the face of an old man has frightened the herd. Calmly, Aaron brings his shot gun when the goat appears, headed for the house next door. With a scream of terror, Tom, waiting for Rinda on her porch, runs into the house, while Margaret, the neighbor, faints. Assuring them that their demon is only a goat, Aaron quietly drives the cows home out of the river and calms the woman. As Mrs. Adkins sees the light of approval in Rinda's eyes and the new self assurance in her son's, she timidly pets the goat, while Tom slinks away, ashamed.

MY HUSBAND'S OTHER WIFE

Mrs. William Smith Drama File No. 11948

HOME from boarding school for the holidays, romantic, fifteen year old Mary Butler accidentally bumps into Wiley Jones, as the two are passing through revolving doors. Gallantly he picks up her parcels, introducing himself, and persuading the reckless girl to have tea with him. As she looks into his eyes her school girl dreams come true, and when the dashing stranger proposes marriage, Mary recklessly agrees, becoming his wife that very afternoon. The shock of the news proves fatal to Mary's grandmother, while her parents, deeply grieved, refuse to speak to her, their plans for their beloved child shattered by her thoughtlessness. Moving with Viley to a small bungalow in Albany Mary tries to make the best of the situation as she learns to cook and keep house. Accidentally listening over the party wire, she hears two women discuss her disappearance, adding she is said to be living with John Carr. The first seeds of doubt are sown in her mind, but she does not question her husband. That evening Mary faints; Dr. Smith later tells her that she is to become a mother. Mary is overjoyed but Wiley says little. Weakened by worry, Mary almost loses her own life and nurses tell her that the baby lived only a few minutes. Certain now of Wiley's deceit and the fact that he no longer loves her, Mary applies for a position as a saleswoman for ladies' apparel. Mrs. Brooks, the elderly manager of the company, draws out a photograph, identifying the girl, but gives her the agency.

In the months that follow, Mary works diligently for the Blair Coat and Suit Company, achieving success. She is sent to another city where the manager greets her in her home. When Mary notices Wiley's picture on the mantel she turns pale. "That is John Carr, my husband," the woman explains. Mary faints, but her hostess revives her, and takes her to the guest room where dinner is sent to her. Stealing downstairs quietly, Mary sees Wiley, surrounding by his wife and three children, at the table. Hastily, she leaves the house, sending Wiley a bitter note in which she charges him with unfaithfulness and counsels him to remain with his family. Returning to her parents in Danville, Mary is warmly welcomed. Her shattered health is soon restored under the kindly care of the family physician. Bob Hall, her brother's friend, becomes attracted to Mary. In the spring they are married, starting life anew in a little cottage. Then the depression causes Bob to lose his position with an electrical firm. The bonus he receives from the government for heroism overseas is not sufficient to care for his needs, and he urges Mary to return to her people for a visit. Unable to provide for her he disappears in order that she may be free; Mary, not understanding his motive, is once more disillusioned as she return to her empty home and secures a position in a law office. In a reckless mood, she forms a friendship with William Bryant who is supporting Ruth, his mistress. When his foreman insists that he marry Ruth, he proposes to Mary instead, and, little caring what happens to her, the girl accepts. Shortly after this she reads that William and Ruth have taken out a license to wed. When Mary's mother becomes ill and sends for her the girl goes at once, taking over the management of the household. Henry, Bob's brother, persuades her to accompany him on a visit to her former husband. Bitterly, Bob charges her with infidelity, explaining that he only left her for her own good. With tears in her eyes, Mary turns away, but Henry tells her that Bob still loves her and will understand someday. Mary resolves to be worthy of his love as she faces the future with courage.

THE BIGAMIST

Allan James Drama File No. 11835

DRIVING recklessly, Gwendolyn Holmes crashes over the side of Long Bridge. As her car hangs suspended over the torrential stream Dr. Chester Morris, passing in his roadster, hastily climbs on the side of the rock, risking his life since his added weight almost unbalances the smashed car, and drags the girl to safety. Lying in his arms while he bathes her temples, the girl regains consciousness and as she gazes into the depths of his fine, serious eyes she resolves to marry him. Except for a severe cut on her shoulder, caused by a gashed windshield, the girl is uninjured. She invites her handsome rescuer to call, but he courteously replies that he cannot as he is too busy in his scientific work at the laboratory. When Gwendolyn observes that his only interest in life seems to be his experiments she assumes a like interest, at last persuading him to make her his chief assistant. He explains that cellular life produces cells of its own kind even in minor divisions, such as the hair. At the close of a hard day the young scientist suddenly notices how lovely his assistant is and impulsively takes her in his arms. When he asks her to marry him she readily accepts and the ceremony is performed that night. Taking no time for a honeymoon, Chester returns to work with Gwendolyn. Petulantly the girl writes to her sister, complaining that she has no social life, but adding that her husband is so kind to her she realizes she must not complain. She encloses a picture of the handsome young doctor.

On a warm afternoon Gwendolyn removes her laboratory smock and Chester notices the scar on her shoulder. Certain of his experiments, he asks her permission to operate, proving that the reproduction of cellular life can completely obliterate the ugly scar. Gwendolyn consents and the operation is performed. A few days later while her shoulder is still heaviiy bandaged, Gwendolyn receives a letter from San Francisco. She informs her husband that she must make a trip there at once —and alone, refusing to explain her mission. After a hasty journey by rail, Gwendolyn rents a car and drives to San Quentin. As the prison gates swing open she embraces her twin sister, Peggy, who so resembles her that guards stare in amazement. While the two girls are driving toward the station, Gwendolyn recalls the day when she took a dare and attempted to steal a bracelet from a jewelry store, regretting the fact that she allowed Peggy to turn herself over to authorities as the guilty party But Peggy replies that that was merely selfishness as she was happier serving the sentence than she would have been worrying over Gwendolyn. Self reproachfully, Gwendolyn recalls instances ever since babyhood when Peggy always shielded her until her twin asks her abruptly if she is happy with Chester, to change the subject. "He should have married you, Peg. He deserves a wife who will always be loyal to him, as I could never be," Gwendolyn replies.

Hastening to catch the train, Gwendolyn again crashes over a bridge rail. She is rushed to a hospital.

For several days Peggy attends Gwendolyn in the hospital. A telegram arrives for Gwendolyn. Peggy opens it and learns that the Doctor has been severely injured in an explosion in the Laboratory Owing to Gwendolyn's condition they decide that Peggy shall proceed to attend the Doctor in Gwendolyn's place until such time as the Doctor can safely be told of the accident to Gwendolyn.

While Peggy is attending Chester, whose eyes are heavily bandaged, he express the sentiment that he is well pleased that she went away as he seems to feel more ardently in love with her since her return. Peggy confesses to herself that she loves him.

Peggy receives world of Gwendolyn's death in the hospital in San Francisco and fearing the seriousness of a shock to the Doctor, she withholds the information from him until he is quite well.

With still bandaged eyes the Doctor runs his hand over Peggy's shoulder and is elated to find that the skin is smooth and the ugly scar has vanished. Still Peggy must remain silent.

During a period of ardent protestation of love, Peggy tells the story to the Doctor and they decide to marry as soon as custom will permit. The Doctor feels that he has married the same woman on two different occasions.

OCTOBER LOVE

Annabell Purviance Drama File No. 11841

EACH morning before going to her office Carla Norton stops at the modest little home of Michale Malone, known as crippled Mike, bringing him the morning paper and a carefully prepared lunch basket. At one time an expert engineer. Mike was seriously injured in a railroad crash. Unfit to carry on his work, he was forced to depend upon charity and the kindness of Carla in his last days. Carefully, she assists the old man to his shed in the back yard where she leaves him as he cautions: "You must not go any further." A secretary to J. D. Kern, Senior, of the Kern Motor Company, Carla is busily employed until noon, when she meets Anthony King. When he tells her that his friend, Jim Lang, has requested him to entertain a visiting cousin, Carla petulantly reminds him of their engagement. They quarrel, for the first time. Two nights later Jim calls on Carla, urging her to marry him, but she replies that neither of them can afford it. Angry and hurt, Tony childishly breaks the engagement. Carla throws herself upon the bed, sobbing, when he leaves, but pride prevents her from calling him as she wistfully longs for the sound of his voice on the telephone. In the days that follow Carla smiles bravely, keeping her unhappiness to herself. The girls at the office comment that Carla and Tony have not been seen together, but she refuses to discuss the subject.

Peg Bainter informs Carla that the Business Girls' Sorority is to have their fall formal but the girl only states that she is not going. Curiously, Peg questions her about Mike; Carla explains that, like herself, he is alone and friendless in the world. If she can make him happy she is only to glad to do so. On the evening of the formal, Carla sees Peg and Tony, in evening attire; she slips behind a telephone pole in order that they may not see her and overhears Peg advise Tony that she believes Carla is helping Mike in a robbery, since she will not explain her actions. With a sinking heart, Carla sees that Tony apparently believes this. She hastens home without waiting to hear his reply. Several hours later she is wakened from a sound sleep by a rap at the door and hears Tony asking to be admitted. Hastily he explains that Peg's college friend did not appear; she asked him to escort her to the formal. Bored with the affair and angry when Peg attempted to discredit Carla he looks for her at Mike's house and discovered that the cripple had disappeared. Police were notified, but no trace of him could be found. At once Carla hastens to Mike's house, informing police that she saw the cripple at five o'clock that evening. His parting words were that his great work was almost completed.

At Carla's insistence Teney breaks into the shed, although police laughingly remark that this is useless as the door is locked from the outside. In amazement they see piles of expensive wood. Carla discovers a tiny door in the shed. When Tony opens it a heutiful hand carved model of a cathedral with a perfect clock and chimes is revealed. This Mike leaves to Carla for her kindness, explaining that small sums of money given him by the girl paid for the wood. Meanwhile Mike is discovered dead, in the driveway of a neighboring house. The sale of his masterpiece enables Carla to pay for his funeral. With eyes suspiciously moist, Tony urges Clara to make their marriage as perfect as Mike's cathedral and she consents.

WILD FLOWER

Madyne L. Emo Drama File No. 11833

COLLEEN hastens through a trail in the woods to the secret spot which she has named Wild Flower Valley. Seated on a flat stone the girl surveys fields of colorful blossoms while in the distance Silver Spangle, the mountain stream, winds slowly away. Dreamily she recalls childhood days in this valley where an orphan, she has now come to live with her uncle Corda and cousin Belle. A storm comes up; hastily Colleen returns to her home. Belle prepares supper and a blazing fire; soon Corda, who has been assisting his men in rounding up the cattle, joins the girls. The next day Colleen discovers that her beloved valley has been ruined by the storm. As she sees a lone camper, Chance Previst on the sacred ground the girl angrily kicks his horse, blaming him for this destruction. Angrily, Chance tells her that someday she will pay for her cruelty. At the ranch house, Belle is introduced formally to Chance, whom Corda has hired to look after the girls when he is away attending to his duties. While Collen and Chance are riding through Wild Flower Valley the girl dismounts, ascending a steep slope, and sprains her ankle. Chance carries her to his horse, resting on the way, and takes her home, all emnity forgotten between them. As a surprise, Chance builds a cabin in the valley which he presents to Colleen on her birthday.

At a tea given by Belle, Chance is introduced to Charmaine Sergava; Colleen notices that he turns pale. Hyacinth Gish, Peggy Gilmore, Erin O'Brien, Tashminia Brent, a dancer, and Denny Wilson, a cowboy who loves Colleen, are among the guests. All the girls find Chance attractive, but he has eyes only for Colleen. The following day Corda sends him to Arizona City to purchase rope. Entering a dance hall where Tashminia is employed, he watches her dance the hula, then conducts her to a private room where he questions her about Charmaine, learning that the girl came from Utah. While purchasing a package of cigarettes he overhears Ace Carney, a cattle rustler and his brother Keith plan to kidnap Colleen. Tashminia agrees to tell the rustlers that she dislikes Chance, refusing his offer of five dollars as she wishes to help him. At the ranch, Chance reports his discoveries to Corda; hearing a scream, Denny summons the two. Chance discovers that Colleen has been taken from her cabin. Covering his face with a black handkerchief, he trails her at last to Keith's tent; in a disguised voice he persuades the girl to leave with him, returning to her own cabin where he prepares supper. At first she refuses to eat; when he leaves his gun and goes in search of wood, Colleen attempts to shoot him until she recognizes Chance and rushes to his arms. Before they return to Corda's home they plan to marry. When Cynthia Wilks, a school friend, visits Colleen, Chance carries on an innocent flirtation with her; Colleen, becoming angry, breaks her engagement. Carney's men approach the ranch; Chance hastens to the valley for Colleen, only to discover that she has gone to New York to marry Gordon, whom she met while atending school. Valiantly, Chance defends the ranch, throwing Carney from his horse. Eventually all of Carney's men are killed, except Ace, who withdraws. The fire which they started is put out. Chance hastens to the hotel where he encounters Tashminia, leaving for the city; With a sinking heart, he sees Colleen and Gordon board the same stage coach. Learning her New York address from Belle, he writes, telling the girl that he dreamt she was a red wild flower in her valley, waiting for him. In answer, Collen returns, stating that she could not marry Gordon as she loves only Chance. Carney's men stage another attack; all are killed as Chance ends Ace's life. Sending for Charmaine he confesses that he is her brother who ran away in a spirit of youthful adventure. Chance is given a share of the ranch; the following spring he claims Colleen as his bride, while Denny and Belle are married.

SMALL TOWN GIRL

Lily Hirt Drama File No. 11907

WHEN Mary left the barren little farm where, as the eldest of a large and extremely poor family, she had had little time for pleasure, she resolved to obtain some of the luxuries of life, at any cost. A waitress in a Harvey House, her youthful charm and high spirits more than atoned for the poor grammar and total lack of culture which were hers. Al Morgan, a travelling man, was particularly attracted to the girl. After a little persuasion over the lunch counter she acompanied him to the theatre. His expensive presents and easy promises soon made the girl forget that he had never mentioned a wedding ring. One day she told him that she was expecting a baby. He promised to marry her, but that evening Al left town; Mary never again heard from him. Her little daughter, Jakette, was born in a charity hospital. Unwilling to give up the baby, Mary almost starved before she found a position as maid in a large household, while her sister Milly took care of Jakette. Bitter against the whole world and men in particular, Mary resolved to make them pay. One evening as she was standing by the gate she spoke to Joe, a lonely bachelor, who lived in a comfortable house next door with his aged father. Using the excuse that she wished to borrow matches, Mary called and, finding Joe alone, engaged him in conversation. Eagerly he told her of his government position, his quiet life, his hopes and dreams, asking her to call again.

On the next visit Mary brought along a potent bottle of wine. Unaccustomed to drink, Joe never realized what happened until he found Mary in his room the next morning. Months later she told him that they must be married. He agreed; the two went to a neighboring town, returning six weeks later with their baby son, Joemine. Although Joe's father was on the point of death, due to a fall which had seriously injured his hip, Mary calmly took possessions of the house, sending for Milly and her baby Jakette. Lazily the two country girls enjoyed their freedom, sitting on the porch, idly gossiping. Joe's father was deeply grieved; at first, his friends stayed away from this veteran newspaper man who had so helped the communty but gradually they called, although the parson, on one excuse and another, refused to christen Joemine. Infuriated by Mary's callous attitude, Joe reprimanded her, but she threatened to expose his conduct, which would result in his losing his job. As weeks went by, Mary's heart softened when she saw his kindness to her children. Resolving to show her appreciation, Mary ran the household most capably, nursing Joe's father with untiring skill, and finding a new happiness in service.

Sarah, a seamtress, who had long wished to marry Joe, told Mary that her husband would not have a chance of becoming postmaster general at the fall elections as long as she lived with him. At last, she resolved to pay back his kindness. Packing her things, Mary took her children to the station: Joe, coming home unexpectedly, found her note and overtook her. As he held her in his arms he told her that she had brought him more happiness than he had ever known, regardless of her past. The following fall while the new postmaster and his Mary watched the children play under the hose, the parson stopped to ask if he might christen Joemine Sunday.

MISSING LINKS

Mrs. Nellie Pake Comedy Drama File No. 11908

FOLLOWING a native guide through the heart of Australia, Professor Rondel with his daughter Kitty, and Ernest, his young assistant, seeks to study native customs. They are amazed one morning when they hear sounds of weird laughter in the trees. Four strange creatures appear, resembling animals with human expressions. Their tails are linked, similar to a chain of sausages. A first the explorer and his party reach for their guns, but when they see the childlike innocence of their visitors they join in their laughter. The four motion, indicating that they would like to join them at breakfast, with a nod, Kitty invites them while Ernest frowns in disapproval. The four impishly throw pieces of toast at one another, until one of them, obviously the leader, pulls the entire table cloth away and drags it after him, while Kitty watches, convulsed with merriment. Understanding partially the strange language which they speak, which resembles pig Latin, Kitty addresses them, and offers to teach them English. With difficulty they attempt to sit still while she patiently points out various objects, naming them. One of the four rapidly learns a few words but two of them leave in disgust, with wild shouts and leaps. The other one, suddenly bored with preceedings, dashes wildly at Kitty but her best pupil rapidly comes to her rescue, ducking her tormenter in a nearby stream.

The two least intelligent of the group, whom Kitty names the Twins, pilfer goods from the camp. They are particularly delighted with an alarm clock which they continually set at all hours of the night, hiding it in the trees and screaming with laughter when the campers are aroused by its bell. Each morning they waken the group with showers of cocoanuts. Attiring themselves in Kitty's lingerie, the two put on a ballet dance, to the amusement of their onlookers. In pantomime, they imitate Kitty attempting to teach them, and Ernest as he shaves. Each month, Eros, the more intelligent of the group, loses a link from his tail and appears to grow more civilized; soon he has an adequate command of the English language. He watches Ernest make love to Kitty one afternoon, hidden behind bushes. The following day he attempts to take the girl in his arms, awkwardly repeating Ernest's phrases, which he little understands. With diplomacy, Kitty attempts to change the subject, proposing that they gather cocoanuts. At last they are interrupted by Zero, the clown of the group, who insists upon a game of tag; with a sigh of relief, Kitty gladly joins in with this suggestion. Ernest, watching proceedings from the bushes, becomes annoyed and requests Kitty to stay away from the group after this. She refuses, assuring him that they are harmless and amusing. They quarrel, Ernest leaving with wounded pride.

A storm comes up while Kitty is canoeing alone in a mountain stream. She is hurled into the waters. Answering her cries for help, Ernest plunges in after her. The four missing links form a chain, assisting the two to shore. Applying artificial respiration, Ernest revives Kitty, begging her forgiveness, which she grants readily, nestling in his arms, whle her rescuers look on in surprise. As the two announce their engagement to Kitty's father, the professor states that he is ready to return to the United States and preparations are made for departure. They offer to take the four back with them, but when the missing links learn that there are not cocoanuts in the country, they refuse vehemently. As the profesor, Kitty and Ernest wave farewell aboard their river steamer, the four burst into loud wails of lamentation which can be heard for miles. Kitty, with Ernest's arm about her, throws kisses until they are out of sight. Then Zero consoles the group by leading them to a bush where he has carefully hidden the alarm clock—and with shouts of joy they prepare to find new victims to tease.

RING IN THE NEW

Ruth Dunkelman Drama File No. 11975

SWEETHEARTS since childhood, Betty Johnson and Bob Sanders recall the days when they first planned to marry at a party in honor of the girl's fifth birthday. All through high school days and college parties, this attachment grew stronger, as the two attend social functions and enjoyed sports together. Ending these reminiscenses with a kiss, Betty joins her father, Samuel Johnson, a retired manufacturer, while Bob calls at the office of The Times, owned by Mr. Sanders, Sr. Close friends and neighbors for years, the Sanders and the Johnsons enjoy many picnics and parties together through the long summer months. Both families are delighted when Betty and Bob announce their engagement at the close of one of these happy days and a party is planned in honor of the event. When Betty tells Marie, her maid, of her coming happiness, the servant cannot suppress an expression of jealousy. Later, when talking to Jeffries the butler, at the Sanders home, Marie states that some people are born lucky as she bitterly regrets that they cannot have the same fortune as Betty and Bob. Established in a law office, Bob rapidly wins promotion. Sadly he confides to Betty that he is trying a divorce case for a young couple married only a year; nestled in his arms, she resolves that no misunderstanding shall mar their happiness. Reluctantly, Bob is forced to take part in litigation against a department store owned by Betty's father, although Mr. Johnson assures him that if he proves the charges against the present directors are true he will have them discharged, bearing no emnity toward th young man because he is innocently involved in this friendly disagreement.

Delighted that Rose, a school chum, is to visit in time to attend her engagement party, Betty drives to the airport with Bob to greet the young woman. A few days later, after many hours of preparation, the party is held. The young couple receive congratulations from their many friends, but their pleasure is marred when Betty discovers that many of her gifts have been stolen from the library. In the search that follows, Mr. Johnson reports that confidential papers regarding the litigation against his store have disappeared. Police are unable to find any trace of the guilty parties. Since Bob is the only one who could have been interested in securing the papers, circumstantial evidence indicts him; police claim that he had the gifts stolen merely to throw suspicion upon someone else. Betty and her family firmly believe in his innocence, but Bob insist upon postponing the wedding until his name is cleared. Believing that the law firm for which he is employed is unethical in its practices, Bob withdraws, securing a connection with the most promnent attorney in the city as the result of his splendid record. Months of careful study fail to reveal the missing papers. Sobbing, Betty throws herself upon her bed until Marie at last confesses that Jeffries accepted a bribe, admitting two strange men into the house during the engagement party, in order that he might be able to marry her. Her description leads to their detection and arrest. Bob, his name cleared now, claims Betty for his bride while Rose marries R. J. Grant, his friend, at a double ceremony. The two couples kneel under an arch, a white bell of flowers suspended overhead. Three years later, after joyous honeymoons in Europe and Honolulu the four recall the party in pantomime, while Marie and Jeffries, married through Bob's generosity look on and inform them that the thieves have subsequently been electrocuted for murder of prison guards.

Edith Jewell Drama File No. 11972

ALTHOUGH protesting his love for Emily Howell, Gene Kay, a widower for only a little over a year, wishes to enjoy a brief period of freedom before again marrying. Believing that he is not sure of his love for her, Emily tells him she is going away in order that he may decide. Impulsively, the unhappy young woman boards a plane for Florida where she plans to spend the winter months. Hope Raffield, the hostess, a charming woman of thirty, whose white hair contrasts with her youthful skin, engages Emily in conversation. Discovering a rare bond of understanding between them, Emily confides her story, while Hope relates that she was engaged to Ralph Hastings who, with herself and her brother Ronald, was a partner in air projects. Shortly before their wedding day Ralph was killed in a crash. Her only pleasure since that day was in flying; she hoped to live and die in the air. Believing that she, too, might find spiritual freedom in the air, Emily resolves to become a pilot. She accepts a letter from Hope introducing her to Ronald, manager of the Miami Airprt, but decides not to use it, anxious to succeed by her own efforts. Ronald refuses her request but, discovering the enthusiastic letter from his sister, which Emily accidentally drops, he searches for the girl.

At last finding her in a small hotel, Ronald promises to be her friend and makes a place for her in the school immediately, instructing her himself. Naturally adapted to her new avocation, Emily soon becomes expert under Ronald's teaching. When she receives her diploma she purchases her own cream colored plane The White Swan. Meanwhile, Gene, receiving no word from Emily, becomes interested in Myrna, a dancer, escorting her to many social functions. Desiring to escape for a brief vacation in order that she may plan her future, Emily impulsively flies away alone over the Gulf of Mexico, without advising her friends. Discovering a tiny island the girl alights and prepares to camp, pitching her tent. Worried when Hope reports that Emily is not in her apartment, Ronald flies in search of her, at last discovering her insolated hiding place. He persuades the girl to allow him to remain with her on the island. As they are exploring its rocks and streams together a storm comes up. The two seek refuge in a cave. Tenderly, Ronald pours out his love, urging Emily to allow him to protect her, as he holds her close while thunder crashes in the distance, but, still in the thrall of her hopeless passion for Gene, she can give him no answer. He offers to leave for an adjoining cave, but Emily urges him to remain with her, and, turning instinctively toward him, Emily pours out the unhappy secret of her love for Gene begging him not to desert her. Morning comes, and as the two breakfast together, Emily is happier than she has been for months. Their disappearance has attracted nation wide attention through the newspapers. A searching party, led by Gene, flies over the territory. In order to protect Emily's reputation, Ronald flies back alone, informing Hope that all is well hut the truth must be kept from the public. Hours later, Emily returns. A huge crowd has gathered, led by Gene, who rushed forward to embrace her, but Emily calmly returns his ring, welcoming Gene only as a friend. Bitterly he tells Ronald of their affair. His arms about Emily, he replies that he respects her all the more for her courage. Together, Emily and Ronald fly away in The White Swan to find—happiness.

BEHIND A MAN

E. Grey Western File No. 11951

A DRUNKARD because of an inherited taste for alcohol, Tom Buckener had found in Mary a champion since his high school days. It was she who scolded him when he neglected his studies to attend a wild party—and assured him that he could overcome this vicious habit if he set his mind to it. When he was discharged from the university because of continuous intoxication, Mary counseled him to continue his studies at home, still believing in him. Discharged from his first position for the same reason, Mary demonstrated her supreme faith by becoming his wife. in spite of the advice of parents and friends. Eager to make good for the sake of his lovely Mary, Tom applied himself to his work for several months, refusing all offers of liquor. Then, tired from a hard day, he weakened as he passed a saloon, and joind a group of friends for one small whiskey and soda. Unfortunately, one led to another until Tom's mind was reeling. When a group of his enemies began to jeer at his wife for compelling Tom to obey, he lost complete control and sprang at Pete Duchin, the leader of the group, and a worthless man about town. Determined to protect the name of the one person who had faith in him, Tom struggled with Pete while the latter drew a gun. A shot rang out and Pete crumpled to the floor—dead. Tom's friends hurriedly took him home where Mary was informed of the news.

Controlling her emotions, Mary prepared to leave the country with Tom. A few days later the two arrived in the little mining settlement of Cosmic City, to begin a new life until such time as Tom would be strong enough to prove his innocence.

Here, months later, a lone horseman rode, surveying the sign of welcome on the outskirts of the settlement with grave amusement. Entering the general store, the stranger observed the loveliest woman he had ever seen conversing with the storekeeper. Turning to him she smiled a radiant welcome, expressing her splendid character eloquently. The stranger, after purchasing tobacco he idly remarked that the community was a little dull. Challenging the remark, the storekeeper replied that it was exciting enough to its inhabitants. For example: The woman who just left was Mary Buckner, married to a fine man, but with one flaw in his character—lack of will power. Refusing to join the men in the saloon he won their contempt. One evening they seized him as he was passing, dragging him inside, and forcibly pouring liquor over him. A member of the group even went so far as to point a pistol at him, insisting that he drink, while the others laughed. Then Mary entered. Throwing back her cloak, so that all might see she was soon to become a mother, she mounted a table and head proudly erect, pleaded with the men to help her husband; he was weak in spirit as well as body and had come here to make a new start. Without a word they released him. A month later when her little son was born, every man in the community sent Mary a present for the baby, and every man would sacrifice his life for Mary.

Riding away, the wind blew back the stranger's coat, revealing a sheriff's badge. Idly lighting his pipe with the warrant for Tom Buckner's arrest, the stranger watched the paper turn to ashes with an expression of satisfaction.

SATAN'S CITY

Arthur Henshaw, Jr. Drama File No. 11375

NEWSPAPERS are black with headlines announcing the last victims of gangdom which include a child. In a poolroom, John Smith, typically American as his name, breaks into a scatching denunciation of both the crooks and municipal officials to his fellow employees of the Creamery Dairy Company. "Slim, the proprietor", begs him to be silent for Rocci, one of the leading racketeers, is near the other pool table with some of his "mob." Smith prmptly makes his tirade more public. Rocci seeks to intimidate him and is tossed through a window for his pains. At Smith's bidding, his friends who have served with him in France, disarm the moh before thrusting them out. With election coming on, the Record, morning paper, gives prominent play to Smith's courage and declares him a type needed for the city's new mayor. When the president of the Dairy discharges the boys, fearing retrihution on his plant, Smith is persuaded to enter the mayoralty race. The others led hy Smith's closest friends, Darhee and Malcolm, are re-hired and deliver a "vote for Smith" card with every milk bottle. To the consternation of the politicians and gangsters, election night finds Smith the new mayor on a pledge to clean up the city. John Smith likes his new job, particularly Marian Lund, the secretary, whom he lacks courage to ask out. Gangdom, by pre-arrangement, is silent the first weeks. Then homhing, mysterious fires, mythical insurance rackets, flood the city. Mayor Smith is being sharply criticized though he is prepared for this emergency. At a dramatic meeting of the police force, he discharges the more flagrant grafters and puts in a special squad made up of his "ex-dairy associates." Smith encourages an attempt on the part of the racketeers to turn their machine guns on him as he drives home apparently alone. Darbee, his driver, deliherately forces the trailing car of gangsters into a stone culvert. Several are killed. This marks the opening of a relentless and increasingly successful battle. Rocci in desperation plans to rob the City Light Company. Unfortunately, the policeman he chooses to bribe on that beat is honest. Smith is tipped off and he with his peace army await the crooks. In the turmoil that follows when Rocci and his associates find themselves trapped, Malcolm is killed by a bullet from Rocci's gun intended for Smith. Death simultaneously claims Rocci. Lavoni, chief underworld figure, whose headquarters are in Chicago, comes down to find a new man to handle Rocci's unfinished affairs. First, something must be done ahout Smith. A clever frame-up is arranged whereby Smith is made interested in ore stock which promises great benefit to the poor in his city. He generously advocates it; only when the papers present him in the light of one personally endorsing the stock, does he grow afraid that all the gilt-edged assurities may be fake. Investigation reveals that the people have been stung and Smith will be blamed. All the city "rats" are grilled, disclosing Lavoni's role. Darbee and Smith hop a plane to Chicago and successfully locate Lavoni with the money. Triumph seems at hand. Just as they are ahout to depart, hell hreaks loose. Their guns are wrested from them. Death and disgrace stares at the two. The day and the future is saved by Smith who suddenly discloses a powerful, tiny derringer. Triumphant heroes, Smith and Darbee return to the city. Darhee eggs Smith into proposing to Marion. A few weeks later Smith's colleagues are gathered for a hillarious celebration of the wedding.

BRIDE OF THE SWORD

C. Singh Costume Drama File No. 11572

IN THE palace of King Phillip of Spain the State Ministers are asembled to discuss ways and means or resisting the French invasion. Excitedly the Minister of War reports that the French having laid waste the country are nearing the Capital. Reports of the horrihle destruction with fire and sword have created panic among the people. In the town men and women are gathered in the streets frantically discussing the advantages of surrender. Hard pressed at the reports of the shortage of provisions in the beseiged Capital, the King asks for advice. Van Diego, one of his trusted officers, in reality a traitor who is daily reporting state secrets through the use of carrier pigeons, counsels surrender, picturing gloomily the plight of the citizens. However, Victor, most trustworthy of the King's officers, and Van Diego's rival for the hand of Caroline, a heautiful court lady condemns the idea of surrender. He tells of the French treatment of fair captives, and rousing the manhood of the Court, declares it cowardice to surrender. Better far, he maintains, to die than to submit. Diego casts indignant glances at Victor who opposes him at every turn, and when the King rebukes him for cavilling, Diego rises and leaves the assembly. The others support Victor and it is decided not to yield until the last person is killed. The meeting adjourns, but Victor remains with his King. It is Victor who proposes that Phillip seek the help of the King of Portugal, but Phillip replies that it is impossible to get a mesage through the heavy French lines. Victor volunteers to carry the message himself. Phillip hesitates then, after several minutes yields, writing a letter dictated by Victor. Pledged to the greatest seerecy, Victor receives the blessing of his monarch, and leaves. He seeks out Caroline who receives him warmly. However, when he informs her that he is leaving on a dangerous mission and may never return Caroline bursts into tears. At length, with a brave heart, she takes leave of her lover and Victor sets out.

In the dead of night, Victor slips out of the palace through a secret passage, known only to him and the King. Soon he is within the French lines. Victor is appalled to hear the distant steps of the relief sentry. Seizing his bayonet, Victor gives the salute and with bated breath watches the other go on, unsuspecting. In a moment, Victor has made his way to the stables and selecting the finest looking mare, Victor boldly takes flight. He is observed, hut his uniform deludes the enemy into thinking he is one of their number on urgent official business. On and on he rides until horse and rider are too tired to proceed farther. At an old inn, Victor takes shelter, hiding in the wine cellar. However, a French officer suspecting that the Spanish innkeeper is not giving him the best vintage, himself inspects the cellar. Victor draws and the officer, already a little tipsy, is soon overcome. As Victor disarms him the Frenchman offers Victor anything in return for his life. Victor, again changing clothes, promotes himself in rank, and binding and gagging the other, walks out, narrowly escaping detection several times. He steals another horse, but the animal is reconized by the Officer to whom it helongs, and the signal of pursuit is given. By clever dodging, Victor escapes being wounded but his noble animal is shot from under him and the brave beast, after leaping twelve feet across a yawning chasm dies, while Victor's pursuers stand at the other side, none daring to make the leap after him. Spent and starved, Victor makes his way on foot, changing his uniform for that of a Portuguese farmer and at last reaching the court of Leopold, Victor persuades the reluctant monarch to come to the aid of his neighbor.

Meanwhile in the beseiged Capital, the starving inhabitants are reduced to despair. Outside the French await the final moments, while Diego, already swaggering about in secret, grows impatient with Caroline who continues to resist him in spite of his offers of protection. Diego's men rouse the starving populace to mutiny and already rumhlings are heard in the square. Diego, commended by the French, determines to seize his prize without further delay. Accordingly he forces his way into Caroline's apartment.

Victor and the Portuguese army arrive at last, falling upon the carousing French and taking them entirely unaware. While the slaughter goes on outside, Victor slips through the secret entrance and is about to report to his King when he hears cries issuing from Caroline's room. Breaking into the locked chamber, he cries out at sight of Caroline, rapidly losing strength under Diego's attack. A duel ensues. Caroline watches with eyes large with fear. But, with superhuman strength, Victor overcomes his more powerful assailant, and takes the yielding girl in his arms. Then, awakening the King, Victor reports his success. Loud cheers go up as the French disperse and the friendly Portuguese with Victor at their head march into the city. Soon there is another celebration for the gallant and personahle Victor takes as his bride the incomparably lovely Caroline.

LADY LUCK SMILES

J. Nelson Brown Drama File No. 11899

SLEEK black head nestled against Robert's shoulder. Slow romantic strains from the orchestra fitted the couple's mood. Swinging Helen closer to the music leader, Rohert waved a five dollar hill to him, signalling that the dance should continue. From a ring side table Uncle Regan watched disapprovingly. A frown came over Rohert's face for a different cause however. Approaching, was Harvey Nelson who refused to fade from Helen's life as all rejected suitors should. Ignoring Robert, Harvey tapped Helen, smiling at her surprise. "Just happened to drift in." he explain nonchalantly. Without further question, he took the girl from her escort's arms. Robert returned moodily to his table. "Thought that was the girl you planned to marry," cackled the old man. "Well I am, going to ask her tonight," was the reply. Recalling the recent dance incident, Regan protested that Rohert was too extravagant for a young man, even if he was in Wall Street. Boastfully, Rohert reassured him that his income would go up accordingly. There were moments when his uncle exasperated him even if he was making Rohert his heir. When Harvey returned Helen to her table, meaningly Robert suggested that they leave since his relative had to catch a train. Alone at last with the girl he loved, Robert banished his jealous mood and popped the all-important question in the homeward-bound taxi. Shyly, she nodded her head as his lips sought hers. A few years later, Rohert was forging ahead in husiness so rapidly that he had little time for his wife. Once she asked him wistfully, "Still love me." Brusquely he reassured her; while with a sigh she reminded him that he had forgotten the day was their anniversary. Helen's only friends were wives of men equally immersed in their own affairs so they sought entertainment in the company of young men with more leisure. Although they regarded it as perfectly innocent, Helen rebelled until the day she met Harvey again who insisted on resuming friendship, assuring her that she was more beautiful than ever. His flowers and theater invitations thrilled her since it had been a long time that she had been deprived of these attentions. Meanwhile Robert's uncle died leaving everything but an old violin to charity, declaring that Robert appeared amply fixed. His nephew tossed it in the corner of a library wondering at the oddity of the gift since he never played. Returning early one day, Robert was shocked to find Harvey in his home. An old pang of jealousy arose but he laughed at himself. Still, Robert spent many uneasy hours, dimly beginning to realize the extent of his neglect. He wanted to tell her that he loved her but as each day passed he grew more and more afraid to speak for fear that he should learn he had already lost her. When the crash came, Robert was badly caught. No longer could he ask Helen to give him a second chance now that he was penniless. While dining with Harvey, she accidentally learned that Robert's firm was ruined. Hurrying home, she reassured Robert of her love and willingness to face poverty with him. As Miller, the auctioneer, prepared to sell their furnishings, Robert resolved to kill himself so Helen might have the insurance. He turned the motor on in the garage. . . Dragged back to consciousness, Robert learned that the despised violin was a genuine Stradivarius for which Professor Stowski, symphony orchestra leader, offered $75,000. His fingers tightened around Helen while he murmured, "A second honeymoon."

LOVE'S PITFALLS

Harry H. Hedley Drama File No. 11826

EACH morning two motor cars are driven to the entrance of Miss Graham's Primary School; little Evelyn Sanford is helped from one while Master Bobby Coates alights from the other, their respective governesses watching while the children enter, together. Once inside the schoolroom, Bobbie is free from all restraint. To the amusement of the others he dips papers wads in his inkwell, throwing the missives at his teacher. While his back is turned the indomitable Bobbie burst balloons and makes unusual noises with his mouth until he is caught and punished, while Evelyn, quietly studying her lessons, looks on in amazement. Each evening the children are driven home in their cars. At secondary school, Bobbie's pranks continue with increased ingenuity. He refuses to study but often carries away scholastic prizes. Impishly he sends his schoolmates on trips to the railroad station, telling them, jestingly, that their parents are waiting. When they discover this they duck Bobbie in the pool, yet he is extremely popular. Evelyn continues her studies. When Bobbie places a notice on the door announcing that school is closed he is caught and given a thrashing. Sweethearts now, Evelyn and Bobbie part sadly at a farewell party given before he leaves for the university. Choosing the wrong companions, Bobbie goes to underworld dives, robbing patrons. He is expelled from school for this and sent to prison where he leads in a jailbreak but is recaptured by guards.

Meanwhile Evelyn makes a brilliant social debut and at length, believing Bobbie dead, accedes to her parents wishes becoming the fiancee of Lord Trenton. Released from jail, and believing he will have no chance if he attempts to go straight, Bobbie and Jay Lindsay, a prison companion, sing and play the banjo outside of theatres, planning to rob wealthy patrons. Evelyn and her father drive to a matinee; while Mr. Sanford is conversing with the manager, Evelyn sees Bobbie and waves to him. Impulsively he springs in the car beside her, instructing Jay to drive to their boarding house. Bobbie's gang, recognizing Evelyn, take charge of her, demanding a ransom of sixty thousand pounds within ten days, and forcing the girl to write to her father advising him to pay if he ever wishes to see her again. Mr. Sanford notifies police, offering a reward of fifty thousand pounds for his daughter's safe return. When Bobbie attempts to force the gang to release the girl they order him away at the point of a gun. Then they take Evelyn to a cabin in the woods, subjecting her to brutal treatment. A party is held, and Evelyn is thrown into the arms of the underworld men. Bobbie returns to the boarding house and is seen by police who investigate. Although the proprietor sets fire to the house police discover a letter giving the gang's address and with Bobbie's aid, locate the place. A fierce gun battle ensues; three of the gang are killed and two police injured. When Evelyn is taken back to her father by Bobbie he explains that he only meant to prevent her from marrying another man, and would give his life to save her. In gratitude, Mr. Sanford secures a position for Bobbie with his firm, and eventually gives him permission to marry Evelyn. After a beautiful and simple wedding at the girl's home, Bobbie and Evelyn board a train, while friends shower them with the traditional honeymoon rice.

RED DUST

Mrs. Marie H. Livingston Drama File No. 11973

LYING at the point of death in Merey Hospital, Mrs. King summons her two sons, Ray, the elder and her favorite; Dick, the younger. Informing Ray that by the terms of her will which she has not changed he inherits all the estate she urges him to look after his younger brother and this he promises to do. Shortly after their mother dies Ray goes West in search of fortune, spending his inheritance in gambling. Changing his name, Ray becomes "Handsome Jack." Won by his charm, Marjorie Steele, daughter of a wealthy miner, falls in love with Jack at the Miner's Ball. In spite of her father's warnings, the girl marries him, swept away by this overpowering attraction. Shortly after this her father dies. Jack soon wastes the inheritance which his wife receives. In despair when she learns that he is drinking frequently and associating with other women, Marjorie at last leaves him when he ignores her pleas. Meanwhile, Dick, supporting himself while he attends school by working after hours for an elderly woman, becomes a detective. Mrs. Nan Macey nurses the boy through a seige of typhoid; through her he meets her daughter, Mary, calling on her frequently after he recovers. As they are seated on the porch one afternoon she promises to become his bride. Dr. Butler, the physician by whom Mrs. Macey is employed receives a call from one of his patients. Dick accompanies him to Marjorie's home, where Mrs. Macey is in attendance. A few hours later, Marjorie's son is born.

As Dr. Butler and Dick drive back to town they hear the voices of two men quarreling in a lonely cabin, followed by a pistol shot. Dick questions Jack, whom he discovers with Lola Hart, a young woman of notorious reputation. Summoning police, Dick orders their arrest; he is also taken into custody at Jack's request, but later released on bail. In prison, Jack swears his innocence to Dick, who promises to help him. The next day, Dick makes a survey of the territory, discovering the footprints of a man in a peculiar red dust. Later, resting in the park, he sees two men furtively whispering to one another as they are seated on a bench, and notices that the shoes of one of them are covered with the same red dust that he has just discovered. Summoning a taxi, Dick brings police who arrest the men in spite of their protests. At his request Dick is allowed to keep one of the shoes covered with the dust and belonging to Punk Bundy. Pale and shaken, Jack enters the court room during the trial. Mrs. Macey, Dr. Butler and Dick tell the same story of the proceedings. Voluntarily, Lawrence Gray, a neighbor, testifies that he heard two men quarreling. One of them threatened Jack, using abusive language and warning him to stay away from Lola. Then a shot rang out and Boots Ricky fell to the ground, dead. On the stand, Punk Bundy at first denies all knowledge of the crime; then, when confronted with the red dust on his shoe he suddenly cries: "I did it! Red Dust—that's all I've seen ever since." Jack's testimony reveals that he is Dick's brother and Marjorie's husband. When he is declared not guilty, Dick hastens to him, and all is forgiven as the two brothers clasp hands. At Dick's summons, Marjorie enters the court room, followed by Celise, her faithful maid, who carries the baby. With a smile of happiness she grants her husband one more chance as he thanks God he has found her again.

THE CASE IN E-4

Margaret Copren Drama File No. 11824

"MISS Cory, you are to special the case in E-4." Crisply Miss Flint, chief nurse, issued the command, as the girls filed by in orderly procession. June Dale, Madge Cory's room mate and friend, informed the girl that E-4 was a mental case, a patient of Dr. Ronald Blake. Smiling a little at the mention of his name, Madge replied that she would do her best to handle it, of course, while June surmised that Miss Flint would probably like to see her fail, since it was obvious that the chief nurse resented the attentions Dr. Blake had been giving to Madge. Assuring her that this was nonsense, Madge left to fulfill her duty, with a hurried goodbye to June. Appearing before Dr. Blake she assumed a professional manner equal to his own, but an expression of deep personal interest passed, momentarily, between them before the young nurse entered her patient's room. When Madge did not appear for lunch or dinner June, gaily disregarding rules slipped down the back stairway to the psychopathic ward, familiarly known as Paradise Alley. Hearing Miss Flint conversing with the night superintendent, June flattened herself against the wall, drawing her apron out of sight until her blue uniform blended with the surroundings. In amazement she heard Miss Flint state that no restraining sheet was to be used in Madge's room, nor was she to be relieved. Then she hurried to E-4 to report this.

Indignantly, June repeated this to Miss Whitney, her supervisor, who waited for her return. "Dr. Blake said no nurse should be on a mental case more than eight hours." Slipping her arm about June's shoulder, Miss Whitney agreed, recalling Dr. Blake's obvious interest in Madge on several occaisions. Then, entering the ward, the two walked apart, in silence. Determined to go through with her duties, Madge watched her patient, fighting off sleep. A young and once beautiful woman, the unhappy patient won Madge's sympathy. Exhilarated with life herself, she could feel no anger toward this poor creature whose restless, tortured eyes watched her every minute. Recalling the days when she entered the hospital against Miss Flint's wishes because Dr. Blake, overhearing their conversation, paved the way for her, remembering her anxious days as a probationer, when, upon one or two occaisions, the doctor had given her an encouraging word, had congratulated her upon her conduct during the first operation she had assisted at, Madge determined not to be found wanting. Gently she stroked her patient's hair; the unfortunate woman relaxed, then suddenly seized her wrist with the grasp of a maniac. Dexterously, Madge freed herself.

Another night, and no relief. June confided this fact to Carl, a young interne, as they were dining together. He replied that Dr. Blake must be informed. Stealing to Madge's room again, June overheard Miss Flint tell the superintendent that Dr. Blake was not to be summoned to E-4 since the patient was resting and must not be disturbed. In her own office, Miss Flint telephoned that if the patient in E-4 did not sleep by midnight a restraining sheet might be used, and relief sent for Miss Cory during the supper period. Upon hearing that Dr. Blake was in the ward, Miss Flint announced that she would be over. Impulsively donning a becoming evening gown and applying unaccustomed touches of powder and rouge she hurried to Paradise Alley. Watching her patient with a mirror, Madge assumed sleep and at last heard the regular breathing of slumber. Relaxing, the girl dropped the mirror and closed her eyes momentarily, awaking with a scream of terror as the maniac's arms encircled her; then all became darkness. When she regained consciousness, Dr. Blake was bending over her; nearby stood the oxygen tank which Miss Flint had sent for. As she turned to Dr. Blake, nestling in his arms, Madge caught sight of Miss Flint, her face stricken with remorse and frustration. From the depths of her own great happiness, Madge pleaded leniency for Miss Flint on the grounds of ignorance of the case. "It shall be as you say," the doctor promised the girl he loved. "I didn't really know," Miss Flint whispered, turning away with tears of gratitude in her eyes.

THE DESTINY OF LOVE

June Norman Drama File No. 11895

AS Jane hears the beautiful strains of Nevin's Rosary played by Clifford Gray, a young professor who has just come to her city, during a benefit concert at which they are both to assist, she feels a strange enchantment holding her in its power; ever after that this is for her the Immortal Song. Mr. Brown, the leader, introduces these young people. Jane accompanies Clifford on the piano while he plays the violin, forgetting the fact that she is a happy and devoted wife, so strong is Clifford's fascination. In the days that follow, Clifford is a frequent guest in Jane's home; John, her husband, and Phillip, her young brother, welcome him heartily and he enjoys the gay, gracious hospitality that has contributed toward making Jane the most loved woman in the community. Desiring his wife's happiness above all else, and trusting her implicity, John notices that Clifford loves Jane, but rejoices in the fact, since he understands that her warm heart and great beauty attract everyone. Unable to escort his wife to a play in a neighboring city, John requests Clifford, or, Ray, as he is now familiarly called, to take her. Beautiful in a pale blue gown, Jane rides besides Ray until at last he cannot resist kissing her, not with the usual causal friendless, but passionately. Both confess their mutual love but agree that they must never hurt John, whom they also love. Miriam Gale, secretary to a lawyer, makes her home with Jane and admires Ray, secretly, realizing his devotion to her friend.

Horticultural expert, John is called away on an important business deal. Taking Phillip, who desires to enter the same field, John persuades Ray to remain at his home in order that he may safeguard Jane and keep her from loneliness. As John and Ray drive around the lake together, John confides that on the day Jane's parents were killed in an accident she seemed to sink into a strange mental state in her effort to bear her grief. The doctor informed John that he feared this might result in complete breakdown, so sensitive was her nature. It had been his privilege to offer her a home where, surrounded by happiness, she was able to bravely become herself again. Deeply grateful for the possession of this lovely wife, John confides his greatest wish has been always to save her from shock; he enlists Ray's aid in this purpose, securing his promise of complete co-operation. Miriam and Jane join the two men for another short ride, and on the morrow Phil and John depart. The days pass quickly, but Ray devotes much time to study, realizing that Jane is the first woman he has ever loved and determined to keep faith with John. On the last evening before John's return, Ray plans to go to a dance, but, instead, takes Jane to the theatre. On their return she tells him of her parents' death and John's abiding and almost fatherly kindness, which she can never repay. They embrace passionately in the rose garden, but, after this, Ray tells Jane he must leave. Wiring his mother to join him, he plans a tour of Europe. At dinner that evening Ray welcomes John and Phil on their return, while Jane hides her sorrow for their sake. Frankly discussing the situation, Phil tells Ray that he admires him deeply for concealing his love for Jane, which is apparent. John, overhearing his beloved's name, listens to this conversation in the closet confiding this fact to Phillip as they drive to the office together, and expressing his appreciation of Ray's honorable conduct. On the way to join his mother, Ray, inspired by the beauty of Jane's nature, helps a poor newsboy and his mother, contributes money to a cripple. Delighted when she sees the change in his nature as they travel through Europe together, Ray's mother tells him that perhaps his suffering has been the means of guiding him to the faith and Christain ideals she has prayed he would find, and he agrees, as they bless the name of Jane. On shipboard, Ray plays the Rosary as never before, at the request of fellow passengers.

Meanwhile the Reverend Brown, a new minister, attacks Jane's character, requesting the young woman to resign as church organist since he construes her friendship with Ray and her unrestrained love for everyone as immoral. When he carries these charges to John, informing him of his conversation with Jane, the justly angered husband hurried home, finding his beloved in a state of collapse. Mr. Hanes and Mr. Waters, members of the board of elders call, repeating the minister's charges at Jane's request, but assuring the young woman that they withdraw their agreement of them, and will stand by her to the end. At the conclusion of this trying scene, Jane becomes dangerously ill. Mrs. Gray and her son, returning from Europe, call and at Miriam's suggestion, Ray plays the Rosary. For the first time in weeks Jane smiles naturally; after that recovery is slow but sure. She finds a devoted friend in the motherly Mrs. Gray. Mr. Manning dies, and Miriam assists his stricken wife.

Explaining the situation of the death of Jane's parents, John wrings an apology from the Reverend Brown who asks her to continue her church work, but the cool attitude he has so unfairly aroused toward her among those who have long envied her hurts the girl deeply, yet, Reverend Edwards, her devoted friend, persuades her to continue. Frankly discussing the situation with Ray, John confides that Jane continually murmured "the Rosary" during her illness. He agrees to a divorce for their happiness, but Ray forbids it, as he leaves for his new position in a distant city. Gently, John upbraids his wife for her changed attitude, when she shows no interest in a promotion which will take them to another community. For his sake, she becomes the old Jane, and once more they are happy. Accepting an invitation to visit Mrs. Gray, Jane agrees that she will join John there during the holidays; then they will prepare to settle in their new home. With outstretched arms, Mrs. Gray welcomes her, adding that she will be delighted to see John, while Ray seconds this. But a few days later he is forced to tell Jane that John is at the point of death as a result of pneumonia following an accident. Escorting her to John's bedside, Ray promises to care for Jane always as John dies.

A few years later, the Reverend Brown resigns. Ray wins promotion to the position of principal, and as he and Jane are seated before the hearth of their home which duplicates the happy one that Jane once knew, they watch a little John, who would have gladdened the heart of his name sake, at play before them.

THE GREAT SECRET

Andrew P. Das Melodrama File No. 11851

SEVERAL prominent physicians hold a consultation at the bedside of Howil Winton, who accumulated a fortune in the stock exchange during the Great War and now lies at the point of death, suffering from cerebral paralysis. His wife, who is expecting her first child, lies in bed in an adjoining room, anxiously inquirng about her husband's welfare. Ordering the physicians from the room, Winton, with great effort, telephones for his attorney, Harold Denton. The lawyer hastens to him and is ordered to draw up a new will. If the child his wife is expecting is a son, seventy five per cent of his fortune is to go to him, the other twenty five to be endowed for the creation of the Winton Memorial Nursing Hospital for Nervous and Mental Disorders. But if the child is a girl she is to inherit only twenty five per cent of the estate; fifty per cent is to be bequeathed to his brother's only son, who will carry on the Winton name, and twenty five per cent to the nursing home. At the conclusion of this command, Winton sinks into a state of coma; Denton sends for Dr. Carey and when the millionaire regains consciousness he signs the will, instructing Denton to read it to his wife. Overcome with bitterness at this injustice, Mrs. Winton sobs hysterically when Denton and Dr. Carey leave. A week later Winton dies; his wife arranges to sail for Paris, accompanied by two nurses and a doctor. The evening after her arrival her child is born at the Rosseau Maternity Hospital.

Three years later Mrs. Winton returns with the child whom she has named Ralph Tudor Winton. She cares for the baby herself, engaging no nurse. When the youngster reaches school age, his mother exacts a promise from him to keep a solemn secret. Then she tells him that in reality he is a girl; no one must ever know the fact until he reaches his majority. Not fully comprehending the mysteries of sex because of his isolated up bringing, Ralph agrees, but, away at school, his strange secret causes him to avoid the others. As the full signifiances dawns upon him he is very unhappy, yet remains true to his promise. Rudolph McBurney makes friends with the shy youth, persuading him to join in hunting, fishing and various sports. The two are soon inseparable companions. On Rudolph's twenty-first birthday his parents give a banquet which Ralph attends, in spite of his mother's fears. He drinks and smokes with the boys, but is unable to conceal his jealousy when he finds Rudolph making love to a girl, and the friends quarrel. Then Ralph, to keep up appearances and avoid suspicion makes love to Gertrude Hall, a pretty guest, and all is forgiven. The McBurney oil field is destroyed by fire; Rudolph leaves for the West and at length writes to his friend, informing him that he has become a farm hand. At night he studies dramatics under Madame Bruno.

At Ralph's persuation, Rudolph attends a banquet in honor of his twenty first birthday. The guests snub him, as he cannot afford a tuxedo, but when he discovers Madame Bruno has been engaged to entertain them and cleverly assists her he wins their applause. Rudolph calls to borrow money for a trip to the coast for his health; Ralph, now twenty one, dresses as a girl and reveals his secret. The shock is too much for Rudolph's nerves. He returns to his farm and collapses, mentally deranged. Ralph, or Enid, as she now reveals herself, has him taken to the Winton Hospital, where she herself becomes his nurse, at last restoring his memory by resuming Ralph's costume for a brief visit. Mrs. Winton dies and her daughter then reveals the secret; courts award her seventy five per cent of the property, breaking her father's will. Meanwhile Rudolph has fallen in love with his nurse on their excursions together in the park. When he is released from the sanitarium, Enid resigns. Taking him to her home she turns to him, and, without a word of explanation, all doubt and misunderstanding clears away as Rudolph turns to the girl he loves, not as a friend, but a sweetheart.

THE TWO TIMER

Charles A. Felder Drama File No. 11954

AS Chief of Police Farley receives calls from a grocery store and a drug store, reporting robberies in the same evening, he announces to his men that the Two Timer has pulled another job. Citizens read with mingled fear and admiration for his skill of this daring robber who always commits at least two thefts, often three or four, in the same evening, a few hours after police are on his trail in the first locality. Business men discuss him at lunch; club women make him the issue of their meetings. Many agree that if he is caught he should be lynched, but meanwhile the debonair Two Timer continues, robbing stores, filling stations and banks, wearing no disguise, injuring no one. Fearlessly he even neglects to cover his face with a mask and brief glimpses of him are seen now and then. Every suspicious character in town is arrested on the chance that he may be the man in question, but eventually all are released when they prove their innocence. Between robberies, the Two Timer nonchalantly enjoys a dance or a motion picture, often even calling the police and informing them of the first job of the evening. Molly, a little sales girl, confides to Eddie, her sweetheart that this dangerous man must be exciting to know, but the boy scolds her for showing any interest in such a scoundrel. When Henry Carona, a boy from Oklahoma, drives to town in his battered Ford in search of a position and takes a room at Mollys boarding house, the two become fast friends. Nicknamed the Oklahma Kid, the likeable youngster soon wins a place in Molly's affections; she confides her interest in the Two Timer's activities to the boy, who readily understands and is similarly enthusiastic. Often the two ride gaily through the town in Henry's battered Ford, while the stolid and devoted Eddie looks on with injured feelings.

"Get the Two Timer!" becomes the slogan of mayor, police force, and citizens alike as the second largest city in the south becomes a laughing stock in Eastern newspapers because of this man's skill in evading the law. Desperately, the mayor visits training schools for police in the large Eastern cities, returning to apply their methods to his own force. Still time goes by and glimpses of the Two Timer always driving a high powered, stolen car, with consummate skill, are the only rewards. When a robbery is committed the crowd is so dense that police are unable to leave the spot rapidly, thus losing valuable time. Big Mike, star motorcycle cop, hastens to a drug store which has just been robbed, but is scarcely able to reach the telephone booth. Then, one day, Mike sees young Henry Carona about to enter an expensive car, and takes him into custody. At headquarters, the seventeen year old Oklahoma Kid boastingly confesses that he is, indeed, the Two Timer! And adds that he will not serve a year of his sentence. He attempts suicide with a razor and is rushed to a hospital in the police car where the doctor disolves that his throat was only slightly slit on the surface. Hatred turns to sympathy as papers all over the country carry the story of the likeable youth, but sentence is passed and Mollie, sobbing, turns to Eddie for comfort as the boy is taken to prison. A fews months later, newspapers announce that the Two Timer was shot and killed by a guard while attempting to escape—his boast not to serve a year of his sentence, a reality.

MARRIAGE VOWS

Clarence Booth Comedy Drama File No. 11957

STRIDING nervously back and forth in his office, Marshall Millington, noted attorney, delivers a lecture on the evil of divorce to his patient secretary, who attempts to soothe him. Manlike, he lays most of the blame for ruined marriages on the opposite sex, charging women with infidelity, intolerance and similar crimes. The office boy announces that a young lady is waiting in the outer office to see him. She is ushered in and requests that he file divorce proceedings against her husband as he drinks heavily. When questioned, Millicent, the attractive client, admits that her Bob drank before they were married, but promised to reform. Even after their baby was expected, and later died, he seemed more devoted to his bottle than to his wife. Angrily the attorney refuses her request, stating that she married for better or worse and must not refuse what followed. Two youngster who met at a club picnic and impulsively married the same afternoon next seek annulment, admitting that they lied to the Justice of the Peace regarding their ages. Again the irate attorney refuses, hoping to teach heedless youth a lesson in taking the consequences. Shortly after this an elderly couple, wed for more than forty years, call at the office. Iry, the husband explains that Lizzie has grown to nagging for him; he wishes to marry a young woman and Lizzie is more than willing. Advising them that if they have lived this long together they can continue until death do them part, Marshall persuades the couple to forgive and forget, smiling for the first time when he sees how eagerly they follow this advice, still loving one another under the surface of petty irritations.

"I hate women!" Marshall explodes to Oliver Smith, his friend, as the two are chatting in the latter's library after dinner. With a little smile of secret amusement, Oliver presents Betty, his niece, who is visiting him, noting the interest on Marshall's face as he looks at the lovely girl. Leaving them alone in the library, Oliver goes to his room, awaiting results. A bit awkwardly, Marshall offers the composed Betty a cigarette; then, suddenly, takes her in his arms, kissing her passionately. A few weeks later the two are married. After a glorious honeymoon in Bermuda, they select an apartment in the city. As it is necessary for Marshall to economize in order to help his parents who are purchasing a house, he cannot afford servants. Betty's biscuits prove to be proverbially hard as rocks; her eggs are burned, her coffee weak. At first, Marshall forgets all these disturbances in his well-ordered life when he holds the girl close to him but as time goes on he becomes more and more annoyed at the poorly cooked meals which are slowly ruining his digestion. Losing control of his hot temper, he persuades his attorney and friend, Ed Price to serve divorce proceedings on his bride, leaving town for 3 days. When he returns, remembering Betty's good sportsmanship when he could not afford to buy her clothes, he hastens to the house to ask forgiveness, but Betty is gone. Weeks of anxious searching follow; at last he accidentally encounters his wife at a large house party and begs her forgiveness. Betty explains that Millicent is her friend; she was attempting to prove that marriage vows can be trying, little dreaming Marshall would divorce her for so small a fault. The next morning a thoroughly penitent Marshall discovers that his adored wife is an excellent cook, as they breakfast together.

PRAIRIE MINIATURE

Sarah Cummins Passmore

Historical Drama File No. 11946

THE settlers were very busy cutting their sugar cane which was being hauled to neighbor Fittman's press. Men swapped stories as they unloaded the cane and fed it to this device which separated the sap from the stalk. Children stood fascinated, watching that their particular barrel would be filled for upon their return home, mother was to have buckwheat cakes ready for them. Little Eyie had come into the world and this occasion prompted Mrs. Fittman to prepare a feast for the neighbors. Eyie's mother had been a victim of Typhoid pneumonia and the child had contracted a malady which had given up by the one available doctor as incurable. He pronounced to the family that she would never walk again. Her mother, helpless in bed, a sister Anne five years old was father's only helper. Neighbors came and went in their desire to aid the stricken family. Mother recovered and upon the advise of Mrs. Fittman who prescribed an old natural treatment for the child, mother saw the infant slowly respond to this remedy.

Spring came and Bill Fittman paddled on his raft made of a barn door to take the children for a ride and Eyie too was included in this adventure. It was not long before Eyie romped with the other children trying to catch Humming birds which was a favorite passtime for the young ones. Life was full of danger and it took courage and steady nerves to brave the many obstacles which presented themselves daily to these hardy people. Reptiles abounded in profusion on the plains and were a constant menace. Often mother and father would return to their cabin only to find that a venemous Cobra had wended its way into their living quarters. Father using his hay fork usually mastered the ugly creature and put an end to it. These sturdy people were particularly desirous of rearing their children well and schools were established as quickly as possible and a teacher brought on to preside over each. Very often these teachers were the few unattached females in the community and it was not uncommon to find as in the case of Tilly Boyle, that a teacher eventually married her pupil. The Roberts had been among the first to come across the plains seeking to establish a home and reap a livelihood from the soil. The family consisted of three daughters and two sons. Mr. Roberts was English by birth and a cobbler by profession. He was an important addition to the community as he was the only one who knew this trade. Mrs. Roberts was Dutch, short and fat and possesed the Dutch sense of thrift. She was determined to succeed in this new venture of building something lasting for the future, particularly that her children might eventually become prosperous and independent. Mrs. Roberts had high aspirations for her children and was desirous that they secure a good education. Margaret however, the youngest of the girls, showed other tendencies at an early age. She would sit at her desk in school with her head down on her arm to conceal the slate upon which she was forever drawing pictures. Margaret's only sympathizer was Alfred Fittman who not only approved of her artistry but showered his approval and affection upon her generally. As Margaret grew to young womanhood despite the disapproval of her family she yearned to go to Chicago where she could devote more time to the development of this art and which she could not further here as on the prairies most of all her time was devoted to working in the fields and assisting her mother generally as there was no place or time for leisure. Arrangements were made for her departure. She would miss everyone especially the dog like devotion of Alfred who wished that he could go with his little sweetheart. Eyie, Margaret's only confidant promised to look out for Alfred and ty to prevent him from becoming too lonely. Needless to say that her efforts in his behalf capture his heart. Margaret achieved fame as an artist and had several of her pictures accepted by the Chicago galleries. She had long since forgotten her childhood sweetheart. Her life had been far removed from the simple prairie life of her family.

In this country, sacrifice and hardship was accepted as part of the price paid for the land from which was to develop the great resource which was to become the backbone of the nation. The cabins were always adorned during the summer by flowers which grew in profusion and gardens were the pride of every prairie woman. Quilting parties were festive occasions and one quilt would call for the services of all the neighborhood. The women would sew and chatter while the men would sit and smoke their pipes and assist in threading needles and also prepare the feast. After the feast they would clear the table and tidy up the cabin at which the party took place. A wedding was planned for Eyie and Alfred and they took up their life on the prairie building a refuge and economic background for the future, tilling the soil and following in the footsteps of their stalwart parents. Much joyous comment was enjoyed when once during the season the children were taken to grandma's cabin where an abundance of goodies prevailed. Children were trained to speak only when spoken to. This gave them a fine opportunity to devour the many goodies during dinner without being disturbed. After clearing the table and helping with the dishes they romped and played over the fields little cognizant of the many deprivations which had been suffered hy their mothers and fathers. Life on the prairie was lived by the settlers as one big family. Their interests were one. The simple tbings of life were held important and worthwhile.

PATROL LEADER

Murray Cooper Drama File No. 11893

WHILE in Europe United States soldiers were engaged in the battle of democracy, the police chief in a large American city left with an inadequate force ordered his men "to get dead or alive' the two gangs, the Big Shots and the Pests, who had opened a reign of crime and terror. Even while he spoke, the two groups were fighting in a crowded slum alley. Upon hearing screams for help, Fred Hope, leader of the Pests, youths averaging 18 and 19 years of age, had rushed with his followers to the scene. There they had found a crippled man in his late twenties resisting attack from four of the Big Shots members. While Fred tackled the cripple's opponent, his gang zestfully entered the fray. Knocked unconscious by unfair means, Fred was taken to the home of the man he had just befriended, Dr. Dan Camp. Arriving at the tailend of the melee, the police explained to a curious spectator that Fred's group were petty thieves while the others were the "big shots" of crime. Between the two gangs a personal ruthless feud developed because the Big Shots molested defenseless girls.

When Fred opened his eyes, around him stood Dr. Camp, his mother, and his sister Laura. Unaccustomed to such kindness as they showed, Fred fled the moment he was left alone. But in the tenement where he and "Chick," his small brother, lived, tended by a housekeeper, the memory of that other home rose vividly. Entering the lighted basement of the Camp home one night he saw boy scouts engaged in knot making, signalling and other scout activites under the direction of their leader, Dan. Heartily welcomed, Fred became a frequent visitor to Troop 190 where he was initiated into the ideals and interests of the boy scout organization. At a dinner to which Fred and his brother were invited, Dan urged them to become members of his household and leave the poverty and misery of the slums. The brothers gladly accepted. In the new environment. Fred became a changed person in speech, habits and dress, imitating his idol, Dan. Joining the boy scouts, Fred successfully went through the stages of tenderfoot. second class, first class, assistant patrol leader and finally patrol leader. Through Dan's suggestion, the city decided to use several troops of boy scouts to help the police clean up the undesirable elements. Placed in charge of 15 picked youths, Fred made Bob, a scout, and Tim, his former buddy, responsible for the Pests good behavior. Several days later, Tim brought Fred to see a young girl, a dope victim. Investigation disclosed that the number of morphine addicts were increasing, fed by an illicit supply. After an unsuccessful police raid on the suspected source, "Mission Inn," Fred led the scouts to the place unexpectedly and found the evidence but Scotty, a scout, was killed. Later Bob confessed that he was indirectly responsible having been bribed into warning the Big Shots. Looking at Fred's stern eyes, he knew his own life must pay forfeit. . . A few weeks of happiness for Fred with Laura when they went on week-end hikes with the troop, engaging in real scout life. Pleasantest were the nightly bon-fires and group singing. Then the scouts were called to participate in city-wide raids. At one clean-up, Dan suffered the wounds which were to cause his death. Before his end, Dan begged Fred to take his place. Heartbroken, Fred returned to his old gang to handle the public enemies in his own way, feeling the scouts were treating the search for Dan's murders too easily; afraid also that he could not continue "on the level" without the guiding sponsorship of his scoutmaster. In the final fight between the Big Shots and Fred's men in an ammunition warehouse which the former were raiding, gunpowder exploded. Many were killed including Fred. The day of the funeral was Armistice Day. While rejoicing whistles blew, to the mourning Laura the spirits of the valiant soldiers who had given their lives for their country seemed to pass before her. For a moment, she saw standing among them Fred who, too, had done his bit, wearing the scout uniform.

BY THEIR ERRORS

Marie Temple Drama File No. 11904

SLYLY, little Patricia gives Wayne Smith her dish of ice cream at the birthday party which her mother has arranged in honor of the day she becomes ten years old. After the last game has been played and the last youthful guest departed, Patricia's mother tells the child that Wayne is the best mannered boy in the group. Pat's heart leaps, for already she has come to love this attractive boy. When Wayne bids her farewell as he leaves for college, a few years later, both are suddenly shy, aware of the awakening of true love between them. Home on a vacation before the beginning of his second year, Wayne impulsively kisses Patricia, and she returns his passion. The two become engaged; Pat is disappointed when her widowed mother, whom she has always regarded as her closest friend, is not enthusiastic over this prospective union. After graduation, Wayne is to be sent to California; he urges Pat to come with him ,assuring her that two years later they will return and her mother can live with them, since the girl has promised never to desert her. But when Pat's mother is heartbroken at this temporary separation, the loyal daughter will not consent to accompany Wayne. He leaves, alone, while she at last gives way to her tears. Throwing herself eagerly into her work as a kindergarten teacher, Pat attempts to forget her unhappiness, but when Wayne weds the daughter of a California rancher, whom he describes as a wonderful pal, and Pat's mother dies suddenly, the young woman feels she has little left to live for.

Wayne brings his wife, a semi-invalid, to his home town, selecting a beautiful home for her, and Pat becomes her friend, as she calls frequently on the two. When Wayne's wife is taken to a sanitarium he calls unexpectedly on Pat, late one night. As they are locking up the house for the night, they pause at the door of Pat's room. Suddenly their love, suppressed for so many unhappy years, carries them both away as they meet in an impassioned embrace. The next morning Patricia realizes that she has unwillingly sinned against Wayne's wife. To right this wrong she goes, alone, to Boston. Weeks of fruitless search for employment follow, but as the girl plays for the little daughter of her landlady, who is crippled hy paralysis, another boarder hears her and asks to be instructed in music. Soon she has a small group of pupils. But a few weeks later she realizes that she is to become a mother, and despair again encircles her. When Wayne, who has traced her through detectives, calls, and sees her condition, he is all tenderness, promising her what help he can give her. Dr. Owen, Patricia's physician, inspires the girl to face the future courageously for the sake of her child, and when the baby son is born, Pat receives gifts of money from the doctor. He explains that Wayne is his Mason brother. Wayne too, helps to pay the bills Pat has been forced to incur, and in her child she finds new courage.

When Patricia receives word that Wayne's wife and mother-in-law have heen killed. Wayne paralyzed, in an automobile accident she goes to her beloved, taking Wayne, junior. Through the power of healing which God has granted her, Pat gradually restores healfh to Wayne. A year later they are married in a little church. Together they face a new life, determined that they shall spare their son the heartaches a mother's mistaken love brought to them.

ROAMING MADNESS

Philip Ormand Baker Western File No. 11961

WITH tears in her eyes. Lillian refuses to marry Jim Page, advising him that he must first prove his manhood. Resolved to win the girl he loves, Jim resigns from his position in the bank, pays off the mortgage on his mother's home, and boards a train for Crescent City where he secures a position as kitchen helper at the Starr A ranch. In his spare time, the young man learns to ride and shoot expertly; Rod Mahoney, foreman of the ranch, watches Jim, and, liking his spirit, gives him work as a cowpuncher. Valuable stallions belonging to Elmer Bradford, owner of the Starr A, are stolen, and Jim volunteers to ride the range in search of them. He finds the imprint of a man's heel and a blank cartridge near horse shoe tracks, but loses them when he crosses the creek. With a piece of paper, Jim takes a measurement of the heel print and places the shell in his pocket. A bullet whizzes past him; examining it, as it is lodged in a tree, Jim discovers the same shell. Returning to the ranch, Jim discovers that Elmer has heen wounded in the shoulder, his little daughter, Marion, cruelly beaten. Applying first aid to his employer and carrying the child to bed, Jim reports to Rod, who adds that $1,7000 has been stolen from the payroll and one thousand head of cattle rustled. These facts are kept from Elmer. Riding in pursuit of the villains on his horse, Black Knight, followed by his faithful dog, Jerry, Jim leaves. Jack Thornton, owner of the neigboring ranch, reports that members of the Black Circle, a notorious gang, have threatened to kidnap Evelyn, his daughter, if he does not join them. Elmer sends two of his boys as an escort for Jack; one is killed and the other captures the murderer, who is lynched over the harn when he refuses to disclose the gang's hiding place.

A year later, Jim, recently elected mayor of Crescent City, becomes the father of a baby boy.

CABIN IN THE PINE

Mrs. H. F. Hoppes Drama File No. 10803

WHILE on one of his rare visits to the city, Jim Brown falls dearly in love with the beautiful June Deering and takes her on a round of night clubs and theatres. Impressed with ms indifference for money, June assumes that he must have several gold mines and when he asks her to marry him, she accepts. June pretends to be madly in love with Jim and after a month of city gaiety Jim takes her home with him. However, when June discovers that Jim is a forest ranger she is speechless with fury. Only when Jim reveals to her his cache of gold left to him by his father, does June keep up the pretense of contentment. Jim, beside himself with love of her, cooks and waits upon her but one day returns home to find she has fled taking his money with her. It is her note calling him a sap, though, which is the final humiliation, and spurring his horse he rides into town to discover that she has left on the stage coach two hours ago. It is Mrs. Jones, the kindly old woman who brought him up, who assures him he is well rid of June, and that it would be folly to persist in riding after her to kill her. So Jim retires to his cabn and for several months goes about his work of detecting and extinguishing forest fires. Then one night he hears a strange wailing outside his door, and coming out finds a baby in a basket. He pours some milk for the child and then finds a note telling him to take the "brat" it is his. The note is signed, June. At first helpless, with the aid of the kindly widow Jones, Jim brings up his child whom he calls Sunny. Sunny learns the language of the forests, and her father glows with pride as she dashes down the hill, sitting on her horse superbly. One day he brings her a tiny pup which is tamed and proves a faithful companion.

When Sunny is sixteen she finds her mother's wedding dress and puts it on. Jim coming in, looks at her wth tears in his eyes, and realizing for the first time she is no longer a baby, he decides to send her to college so that she can be a very great lady. Sunny protests she doesn't want to be a lady but at last she leaves, excited over the beautiful wardrobe Jim has selected for her. Soon it is discovered Sunny has a remarkable ability for commercial drawing, and her professors predict big things for her. Each vacation Sunny spends with her father, riding and fishing in the vast forests. Then in her Senior year she meets Don, the idol of the whole school. Attraacted hy her diffidence to men, Don soon falls in love with Sunny but not until the night of the fraternity masquerade does Sunny consent to marry Don secretly. When they arrive at the party, everyone greets them warmly and Don brings Sunny to meet Mrs. Lander, the hostess, once an actress and still a gorgeous woman. However, at sight of Sunny Mrs. Lander laughs harshly and finally reveals that Sunny is her own daughter, and that she has been angling to win the young Don for a husband. In her bitter disillusion at meeting her mother, and finding her hard and slangy, Sunny boards a plane to return to Jim. However, when she arrives she finds him dead on the floor, the wolf dog outstretched heside him. Sunny faints and is discovered by Don who has followed her. Weeks of fever follow for Sunny before she recovers from the shock for Jim had fallen injuring his head. The wolf dog, savage instincts aroused by the smell of blood had attacked him, and Jim had shot him before dying himself. But with Don near, the past is to be forgotten and ahead lies only happiness.

RECONCILED

Frances White Drama File No. 11619

WHEN Dolores Nelson, daughter of a prominent manufacturer, marries John Moore, a shiftless but lovable young fellow, her father gives way to an ungovernable fit of rage. Shouting that John will never amount to anything, he disowns his daughter and tells her he never wants to see or hear of her again. Soon after, John's employer, dependent upon Nelson for his largest orders, fires John, explaining that he cannot afford to lose so valuable an account by incurring the ire of the furious Nelson. John comes back crestfallen, but with Dolores to comfort him, he renews his faith in himself. He sets out to get another job, and although his salary is now only half what it was before, he manages to get along. Two children are born to the Moores. Then comes the Depression. Although John works hard and is poorly paid, he is the last employee to be taken on, and it is he who has to go. For weeks John tramps about looking for work, and at last his spirit breaks. One day he is induced to drink to forget his worries. Soon liquor has become a habit with him. In vain Dolores tries to break him of it. Every time he is with her and the children he is all penitence and remorse, but when he is outside, he gives way to bitterness. Meanwhile Dolores, listens with only the sorrow a mother can feel to the questions of her little daughter Mary about Christmas and whether Santa will be able to find their little house. Dolores, brushes tears from her eyes while she sews a little dress for a clothspin doll she is making Mary, the best that Santa can afford this year. Meanwhile, little Joseph, aware in his precocious fashion of the gloom that hangs over the house, learns that hy trapping wild rabbits he can sell them during the holiday season. For weeks he lies in wait in the woods and at last bags a great catch. The day before Christmas, however, as he is going to town with them, his father stops him and suggests that if Joseph turns the money over to him, he'll get the gifts. Speechless with the fear that John will spend the money on liquor, Joseph runs all the way to town, sells his rabbits, and holding tightly to his money, purchases a turkey with all the trimmings, gifts for everybody, and with a singing heart he returns home. However, his eager buying is noticed by a lonely old man who learns the story of the youngster.

Christmas eve the children retire, hut John has not yet returned. Joseph brings out all the gifts, sets the table temptingly and sets the tiny music box playing a carol. Imagine the amazement of Mary and Dolores as they open the gifts and prepare for the feast. It is time for dinner! Lagging steps sound on the stairs and John returns with gifts for all, purchased with the proceeds of his snow shovelling all during the night. As they rejoice, another footfall is heard on the winding stairs, and in comes Mr. Nelson, who, finding out that Joseph was his own grandson, had come to take Dolores back to his heart. It is indeed a merry Christmas. Mr. Nelson gives John a responsible position in his factory, and the Moore children are given all the advantages they have been denied so many years.

HEARTBREAK TRAIL

Carl J. Webley Drama File No. 11562

WITHIN the democratic walls of the classroom, they formed their friendship—Louisa Donovan who lived "on the wrong side of the railroad tracks" and Ronald Cromwell, son of a well-to-do manufacturer. Throughout Junior High School, Ronald daily accompanied Louisa to her shabby home. It was a tragic dav for both, when Louisa was forced to leave school to help the family finances. Mr. Donovan worked only at odd intervals and used most of his earnings for drink, leaving the burden of supporting the family on the frail shoulders of Louisa's mother who had heen in failing health since little Ted was born ten years after the birth of her daughter. A few weeks later Ronald's family moved to another town 100 miles away. The two young people continued to exchange letters. Since Louisa was needed at home part of the time, it was difficult for her to find work. When Jerry Watson, 50 year old widower, advertised for a part time housekeeper, Louisa applied. After scrutinizing her charms in a fashion which made Louisa feel uncomfortable, she was engaged. After the first three weeks, Watson began to invite her to go out with him. The girl refused though she was terror stricken at losing her job. Her letters from Ronald and her small hrother were her only consolations. Meanwhile Watson, learning of Donovan's weakness for drink, installed himself in the father's good graces. Donovan promised to make Louisa marry him. Mrs. Donovan was stricken ill, requiring a costly operation. When Watson offered to pay the hills if Louisa would become his wife, the mother urged the girl to refuse but for the sake of saving her mother's life she accepted him. The night before she was to be removed to the hospital, Mrs. Donovan died. After the funeral, Louisa's father insisted on moving to an isolated farm. In her letters, Louisa was too ashamed to hurden Ronald with her troubles. The time came when Ronald ceased to write. Louisa learned the answer when she found a bundle of old letters in her father's coat pocket which he had failed to mail. She was kept virtually a prisoner in the house which Watson visited several times a week. When a letter came from Ronald announcing that he was coming to visit her shortly, Donovan forced the girl to write a letter stating she was engaged to Watson. Unless she married him, the father threatened to place Ted in an orphanage. A week before the wedding, Donovan and Watson were in the living room, loudly celehrating the coming nuptials. Upstairs, Louisa was singing Ted to sleep. Suddenly, the merriment turned to screams of anguish. Louisa rushed downstairs to find her fiance and her father blinded by poisoned liquor. Three miles from town and the nearest telephone, the girl ran along the road until a passing motorist offered a lift. Dr. Gregg was on an emergency case and it was another hour before he could leave. Approaching the road to the farmhouse, Louisa first noticed that the sky was red with flames from the Donovan farmhouse. With anguish Louisa remembered the sleeping Ted. Stumbling from the car, she ran towards the fire screaming his name. Strong arms appeared from the darkness and drew her back. "Ronald!" she cried. "Ted is safe in my car," he told her soothingly. . . The fire which consumed Donovan and Watson was no more radiant than the bright face Louisa turned to the two she loved.

SHORT CUT TO LOVE

Clifton Sanford Wady Comedy Drama File No. 11618

FROM the window of his rooming house, Eddie Carr looked across the narrow alley to the pretty girl transcribing short hand notes. For days now he had watched her, and there was something about the lovely tilt of her head that set Eddie's heart beating. Once he saw her entering the house and would impulsively have rushed over to her, had not one of the other hoarders tried to detain her. Eddie saw her blush painfully, and his sudden appearance gave the girl an opportunity to escape a scene. The other fellow pushed his hat forward on his head and went down the street whistling his insouciance, but Eddie realized that there was no chance of meeting her just casually. Once Eddie saw her weeping on a Saturday night. He was alone too and he longed more than anything to ask her to come with him, hut he didn't dare. He would only frighten her and ruin his chance for ever.

Then, one day, passing a pawn shop he noticed an old queer model of a shorthand machine. Going in to inquire he learned that the inventor had never been able to put the machine across and had died of disappointment, burning his plans. The pawn br)ker had had the machine for three years and was willing to let it go for two and a half dollars. Studying the directions, Eddie soon learned that he could pick up the system himself. If only he could use the machine to meet the shorthand girl! Billie Burt, Eddie's chum, engaged to be married, listened sympathetically to Eddie's story. But when Eddie wrote out a note in the phonetic shorthand saying he had "lng wntd t mak ur aqntns" (long wanted to make your acquaintance) and wanted to demonstrate his machine, Bert shook his head saying if she were so shy and modest rushing in like that would spoil everything. No, Eddie had to be more subtle. Accordingly Eddie prepared an alphabet guide to his system and wrote a note telling her as a stenographer with progressive ideas she would probably be interested in this new system which would enable her to turn out two or three times the amount of work she was accomplishing now. Followed a sample business letter phonetically written and signed "Urz trly." The next few weeks Eddie wrote notes regularly, all in the fascinating characters and all without signature. Betty Sprague, in spite of herself, was interested. She began to wonder who might be sending her the notes, and inferring that after all he must be interested in her or he wouldn't be so persistent. Romance beckoned. So one day it came about that while she was entering the house she saw Eddie Carr with a foot or two of the ticker paper on which all the notes were written, hanging from his pocket. For a moment Betty hesitated then breathlessly she murmured, "Excuse me, please, but you are losing the stenography paper from your coat pocket." They both blushed furiously. Then Eddie said, "Thank you, Miss Sprague, but it is blank paper; may I write on it—a long message?" Now she knew! Soon Billie and his bride returned from their honeymoon to find a note, in phonetic shorthand awaiting them. But the last lines were all written in caps, and there was no contraction about the closing words "—AND BETTY AND I ARE ENGAGED."

THE SILVER KING

Pendarvis Tagholm Drama File No. 11563

NESTLING against the smooth, luxurious cushions of his imported car, Roger Baily orders the chauffeur to drive him home at the close of a wearisome day in the fur trading market. Baily is a spectacular, romantic figure in the business world. Ten years before an ordinary fur trapper in the far north, ability and capacity for prodigious work at last brings him to the mecca of his ambitions—New York City. Here, he gradually corners the fur market until he at last becomes its leading figure. Arriving home, Baily is jubilantly greeted by his two year old son, Larry, who searches his father's pocket for the customary surprise while the mother laughingly looks on. The dinner party at the Baily home that night is attended by many prominent social and political figures. Among them is his partner, Kirk Rankin, whose background is in great contrast. Shrewd in business, he operates on the principle of "putting it over on the other fellow." He despises the trustful Baily and is in partnership with him only because they have a tremendous volume of profit. At the close of dinner when the guests have broken up into small, congenial groups, Kirk asks to see Baily alone. Apologizing for bringing business matters into a social affair, Kirk points out that they are so busy in the office that they have no time to really confer. Kirk suggests that it would be a good stroke if one of them made trips to the North and purchased furs directly from the trappers. When Baily agrees, Kirk suggests himself for that task since he is unmarried. Kirk returns jubilantly to his apartment where Peg Oris, one of the office secretaries, with whom he is conducting an affair, is awaiting him. Kirk announces that he is all set for an additional revenue of income from that "fool Baily." Peg tells him to forget business for a time and give some attention to personal affairs. "You've been promising to marry me for some time." she declares aggrieved. He stops her protests with a kiss. On the trip, Kirk purchases inferior skins at very low prices while sending in false statements to the New York office and pocketing the difference. When letters of complaint come to the main office, Baily never sees them for Peg removes all incriminating evidence. Later Kirk, richer by a hundred thousand dollars which should have gone to the traders, returns to New York with glowing reports. One day Peg is absent from the office following a violent quarrel with Kirk who openly confesses that he is tired of her. Dan Hunt, a northern trapper, breaks into Baily's private office and accuses him of unfair dealings. Baily thinks him insane and orders him out. But when a letter in the afternoon mail repeats this charge, Baily first grows suspicious. Kirk is gone for the day so Baily leaves word for him to call at his home that night. The men meet in the library. Kirk attempts to bluff innocence, and then, brandishing a revolver, threatens to kill Baily if he exposes him publicly. A struggle follows. The gun goes off. Kirk lies dead. . . Panic stricken, Baily is persuaded by his wife to leave the city. The fugitive seeks seclusion in the silver mining country. For three years he does not dare to communicate with his family. When he stumbles on a silver deposit, Baily is widely publicized with his photograph appearing in the eastern papers. Learnng of this, Baily plans to catch the next ship for Europe. Hurriedly, he throws his clothes in a grip. There is a heavy knock. Convinced it is the police, Baily looks wildly about for escape. The door opens revealing his wife. . . Police are searching to tell him he is innocent. Peg has followed Kirk to the Baily home that fatal night and has seen Hunt creep to the window and shoot. A comparison of bullets proves the trapper's guilt.

THE GOLDEN YEARS

Lavinia Sharp Drama File No. 11259

"SHAME, Virginia lives in a cabin with a Mammy—shame on you, Virginia." The little girl breaks away from the taunting children and seeks refuge at the end of the school yard. She tries to hide her tears, only half-understanding that between her and the other children is some strange, inexplicable difference. Already the children have forgotten their victim. They turn to more pleasant thoughts of this evening's birthday party in Nancy Rolfe's home. Virginia shuts her ears against the tantalizing comments. She is the only girl without an invitation. To herself, she half wails, "I did have a real father and mother, once, too—

yes. and a brother." This time the tears fall unheeded. She remembers the last time she is with George. After her parents' deaths, the two children are taken into the home of a half-uncle, John Hutchinson. Often his wife beats severely the eringing four year old until young George rebels. Half carrying his sister the two run away from the Hutchinson home and hasten on until they stumble upon a cabin. An old negro slave woman takes them in. George begs her to keep his sister until he returns, but the months pass into several years. Nothing more is heard of him. Today, when school is ended. Virginia hurries home to her Mammy, reproachfully remembering that the old woman was "porely" when she left that morning. Nearing the house, she waves in surprised glee at the sight of Isaac and John Venson who live on the neighboring plantation, and whom she regards almost as her big foster brothers. The boys do not respond as merrily as is their wont. They refuse to let her enter the cabin. Taking the child aside, the boys tactfully break the news that death has robbed her for the third time. When her grief subsides. they tell Virginia that she is to live at their home. "Always?" she asks. "Always," come the solonn promise. Under kindly and loving tutelage, Virginia approaches maidenhood. When she is old enough to attend the county balls, Isaac and John squire her together. At first the boys will not admit it to each other, but eaeh day finds them deeper in love with Virginia. They realize that she is fond of them. as brothers, and each fears to be the first to wake the girl who still has much of the innocent grace of the child into womanhood. When Isaac's knife slips and cuts his palm, Virginia insists on binding it. Intoxicated by her nearness, Isaac impulsively exclaims over her beauty. He is surprised to see the sudden rush of tears, and places his arms about her to comfort her. In his embrace, Virginia finds courage to reveal her hidden love. John bravely hides his disappointment and acts as best man at the wedding. At the height of their first year's happiness, the Civil War opens. Both men enlist, leaving Virginia, carrying Isaac's child, to tend the plantation. The months drag, Virginia's only solace her small son, whom Isaac has yet to see. Word comes that Isaac has been killed in battle, near the close of the war. John promises upon his return that she is to regard her late husband's home as permanently hers. He dreams that someday, she may become more than a sister-in-law. But Isaac is not really dead. By a strange coincidence, the man who saves him when he is severely wounded, is Virginia's lost brother George, who nurses him back to health and memory. A few months later, a joyful reunion of all three takes place, the past a bad dream buried in the golden years ahead.

THE AVENGER

F. J. Santos Drama File No. 11598

OVERJOYED, upon hearing the news that her brother, Isidoro, was not dead as reports from America claimed but was in hiding for a murder which he had not committed, Matilda did not notice the bold admiring stares of Sea Captain Oliver while talking with her cousin, Albert Ramalho, the captain's brother-in-law. Albert, however, was uneasy. since he loathed Oliver whom he suspected of causing his sister's death after five months marriage. Matilda with her sister, Emilia, and her father returned the day before the boat sailed from the northern Azore island to bid Albert goodbye. Unperceived, Captain Oliver proceeded to set sail and attempted to forcibly detain Matilda, proposing to marry her. Unknown to him, Matilda had already accepted Albert who leaped to her rescue. In the ensuing struggle, Albert and his chum, Amadeu, were thrown overboard and rescued by Emilia and her father, who had been awaiting the sister in their motor boat. Catching up with the vessel, Albert surprised Oliver who snatched a knife and threatened to dispose of him in the same fashion as the man whose murder had been pinned on his cousin. Infuriated, Albert flung himself upon his sister's murderer and at last succeeded in throwing him out to sea. The half dozen men who manned the vessel agreed to accept Albert as captain. The Ramalho family decided to continue with them to New York to meet their son and brother. While docked in New York, Amadeu was left in charge. The happy reunion was interrupted by a telegram from him stating that friends of Oliver had learned of his death and were threatening reprisal. In the dark of night they slipped out of port, Albert confessing that he feared arrest since it would interfere with his long search for the man who had murdered his father, a sailor, which explained why he had left a position as aviator several years before. Unaware of the reason but through friendship, Amadeu accompanied him. While sailing peacefully, two seaplanes appeared overhead and bombed the ship. As they were preparing to drop into the water, Albert saw the planes descending. Bouyed up by life savers, the group awaited the machines. While one aviator turned his gun on Amadeu, Albert, unnoticed, crept over and diverted his aim which instantly caused the other flier's death. The six crowded into the planes but found themselves running low an gas, making an enforced landing on a nearing schooner. When Albert told his name and what had happened, he was mystified when the captain ordered the two men taken by plane to an island seventy miles away. As the plane was mounting, Albert glimpsed the face of Abraham River and realized he was trapped. While they were in the air guarded by an armed sailor, River tried to attack Matilda while her sister leaped to her defense. In mid air, Albert diverted the sailor's attention long enough to knock the pistol from his hand. Throwing the driver and his companion out, they hastily flew back to the vessel. Having given the sailors orders to do this with the captives, the captain was not surprised to see the ship return. In the ensuing confusion when he realized he was tricked, River was finally overpowered by Albert. Upon questioning, Albert learned that his search was over. The captain who had attempted to kill him was also his father's murderer. A few days later the prisoners were given to the Amereian authorities, and to Matilda and Albert's joy the engagement of Emilia and Amadeu was announced.

BLUE EAGLE

Mrs. P. H. Roe Comedy Drama File No. 11094

ARMED with their bachelor sheepskins, Tim and Sandy set off to celebrate the end of their eollege days and their coming plunge into the business world. They participate in a card game with friendly strangers and wake up the next morning to find themselves pledged to huy a chieken farm. Neither have heen away from cities longer than vaeations but during a morning of sober deliberation decide that in time of depression, the "back to the farm movement" might not be so bad. Tim's father has a little money saved and abetted by the mother, they persuade him to back them. When they reach the ranch, they are startled to find two other occupants—girls. Peg and Mary are equally indignant and ask what they are doing on their property. Explanations show that the same party had sold the farm to both; and now neither group will consent to relinquish their claim. When the girls protest that they are johless and alone in the world. Tim who likes Peg's Irish pertness, suggests that they go halves. For the first few weeks things run smoothly, the girls are busy with the cooking and putting the house into livable condition and the boys have enrolled in a correspondence course on "Care and Feeding of Chickens." Deciding they need a chaperone, they send for Sandy's relative, Grandma Rielly. The boys make a trip to the city for customers but after the fourth shop refuses to buy, they decide a new technique in salesmanship is called for. Secretly marking the weight of each chicken, they introduce each product as the "only weight conscious chickens in the world;" and hold a publio demonstration. Each flap of the wings represents a pound and while Tim holds them with his sales patter, Sandy prods them into the right number of flaps. Soon the customers flock to buy the chickens, but not for eating purposes, for entertaining and bewildering their friends. They feel so pleased that they decide to step out for the evening with the girls. But the four are chased out in the middle of a dance when several disappointed customers spy them and determine to get their money back. A wild chase in autos ensues, ended only when the boys' car goes haywire and wedges into a grocery store, taking all the bystanders strength to remove it. A policeman arrests them, and the boys call their college friends to supply bail. All adjourn to the ranch to celebrate their narrow escape from jail. Grandma Rielly who has gone to sleep hours before wakes to an infernal racket, and takes a kerosene lamp to go downstairs and investigate. To the visitors, the old lady in her long flannel gown and nightcap looks like a ghost. Their screams frighten her into dropping the lamp and everyone scramhles madly to get out. The flames spread through the house and from there to the chicken coops, and the quartet sadly see their future fortune turn into useless roasted chickens. Tim sends a telegram to his father, and in his reply learns that his father holds insurance on the property to protect his loan. Jubilant he announces the news to Sandy and they decide that their next partnership will not be farming. Sandy reminds him that this leaves the girls unprovided for. But Grandma Rielly helpfully suggests "you can marry them."

BETTY

C. H. Park Drama File No. 11553

THE little island on the mid-Pacific was well named Paradise. Its tropical beauty made a perfect setting for lovers. On the adjoining island, a little community of white men had taken over the trading post. Charles, sweeping out his general store glanced over at the blue waters where an American ship had docked, discharging passengers eager to spend vacation time in this haven. Returning to the back of his shop, he slipped on a clean white jacket in anticipation of visitors. When the shop bell tinkled, he hurried out to be greeted by Harold Kempton, middle-aged widower accompanied by the prettiest girl Charles had ever seen. He flushed as Kempton introduced him to his sister, Betty, who had just arrived. "She wants to talk over some business matters with you," Kempton declared, "So you will excuse me a few minutes." Charles attempted to act matter of fact as Betty asked him if he could use a quick, alert girl in the shop, referring to herself. Eager to see her again, Charles delayed his answer until the following day which gave him an excuse to call upon her. Begging her to let him show some of the beauties of the island. Charles hired a boat and took her over to Paradise Island. Hours passed like magic. Neither knew what their tongues were voicing for their hearts could hear only the throbbing of love which both became aware of without words. Though it was agony with her lips so near, Charles refused to spoil that moment of spiritual closeness. That night Charles tossed restlessly on the twin-bed adjoining his wife, Nancy. For the first time he wondered if Betty knew that he was married. Though Charles was determined to keep his marriage vows, this love had come upon him unexpectedly and he was greatly troubled. When he came to the store, he was met by a stormy helper. Bitterly, Betty asked him why he had not told her of his marriage. Refusing to heed his halting explanations, she flung the store key on the counter and fled. A few nights later, Charles accompanied by his wife, met her at a party but she ignored him entirely, devoting her attention to Ramon, a Latin whom Charles distrusted knowing his reputation. During the evening, Ramon who had drunk too much, tried to publicly kiss the protesting Betty. Forgetting himself, Charles flung the man down. Spectators parted the two while Ramon swore vengence for the insult to his pride. When Charles heard a week later that she was engaged to Ramon, he purposely waited for her on the road while she went on a solitary stroll one night. He forced her into a boat. Back on Paradise Island, Betty suddenly wept for the sweet memory and dream it had onee held for her. Taking her in his arms, the kisses they had denied themselves before were no longer to be resisted. Early dawn, Charles was still unsuccessfully pleading with Betty to elope with him. She refused to break up his home and Charles recognized the bitter truth of this. They were on the verge of their final parting, when Ramon sprang silently from behind them and stabbed Charles. . . . A week later Charles returned to consciousness to learn that Ramon had escaped and Betty had returned to America. Though he could not bring himself to confess openly to his wife, Charles knew that Nancy forgave him. During the next five years, the memory of Betty was still a vivid wound. Nancy became ill with a fatal tropical disease, but before her death she revealed that she had obtained Betty's address in case someday. . . Two months later, Charles was blissfully reunited with the woman whose love had endured with equal strength, and for the first time learned that alone, Betty had borne and cared for his child through the painful years.

FLYING GHOST

Frank Nemchak Drama File No. 11568

SOMBERLY, Fred Bell enters the Little Rock airport office and places a blood stained aviator's cap on the desk of George Wilson, supervisor. "We found his charred body in the burned plane, the same way as the previous three," the day pilot reported. This is the fourth time within two weeks that night mail planes have mysteriously crashed while flying over Hell's Stretch, dangerous gap over the Appalachian Mountains. Each time, the plane has descended like a flying comet of flame. The bags of missing mail are proof that the crashes are not accidental. Fruitless investigation is underway and pilots are refusing to take night duty. Gazing at the helmet in fascinated horror, Marian Wilson, his fiancee, makes Fred promise not to take a plane up after dusk. When a week passes undisturbed, the gloomy tension about the airport lessens. The Cleveland plane comes in discharging a number of holiday passengers including Fred's cousin Sally. Marian glimpses the two driving to Sally's home and not knowing the true relationship, grows jealous. Her temper rises while waiting for Fred, an hour late for their evening appointment. Refusing to hear any explanation, Marian throws her ring at him when he apologetically enters. Disconsolately, Fred wanders down to the airport where he learns that the night pilot has met with a slight accident and the new relief man, Powell, is not due until the following day. Considering his promise broken with his engagement, Fred consents to pilot the plane. Entering the machine, he casually notices a puncher and two round bits of leather on the seat. Tony, the mechanic, jumps to claim it, confusedly excusing his absent mindedness. "Sure Marian won't mind?" asks Wilson. "No," he answers curtly just before soaring off the field. When Wilson calls his daughter, he learns of their quarrel and quickly reassures her about Sally. Immediately, Marian asks if Fred is in the office and first learns that he is enroute. For several hours she and her father listen anxiously to call signals from his plane which come reassuringly every two minutes. Intent on catching up to schedule, Fred forgets the "flying ghost" which superstition attaches to the crash-ups until as he nears Hell's Stretch, a heavy gust of wind rips off one of the plane wings, demolishing his radio set. With extreme difficulty, Fred brings down the plane which collapses and crawls out suffering only from a twisted ankle. A few seconds later and a rocket flares from the cockpit, setting the machine ablaze. Almost immediately, the grinding brakes of a machine are heard and several men dismount. Creeping further into the underbrush unseen, Fred watches the men remove several mailbags as one calls, "These are the ones with the holes. It's O. K." Convinced that here lies the explanation of his comrades' deaths, Fred drags himself to the car and curls onto the spare tire for support. For hours, the men travel until they reach a shanty protected by the woods. Overhead, planes can be seen fruitlessly searching for though the damaged plane is found, Marian insists that the search for Fred be continued. Creeping near a window, Fred overhears them plan to take another mail plane in similar fashion that night for the chief sends word that it will not to expected so soon. Feeling faint, Fred retreats to the woods where he collapses. Hours later he returns to consciousness and the memory that a new pilot is going to his death in a few hours. Disregarding his pain, Fred stumbles to the deserted road where he obtains a lift. He reaches the airport ten minutes before the pilot is setting off. Seeing him, Tony screams that Fred's ghost is back and whimpers for mercy. Now, Fred is sure who the "chief" is. When explanations are over and the police leave to arrest Tony's accomplices —Fred finally turns to Marian. Her white, drawn face at present shining with radiant relief wipes away all bitterness. Fred tenderly places the ring back on her awaiting hand.

SHADOWS AT MIDNIGHT

Ralph Cox Mystery File No. 11408

THE stillness of the night hour was shattered by the piercing glare of a skyrocket, followed by a woman's scream. Ned and Tom Davis, detectives, passing by, having lost their way, stopped and rushed to the spot. Inside the house they found Mr. and Mrs. Fox, the latter a pretty girl, petrified with terror. Learning that the rockets always presaged death, Ned and Tom offered to remain on through the night to guard the terrified pair. Hours passed. Suddenly there was a shuffling sound as though someone were moving upstairs. Gripping his gun, Tom slowly climbed the steps. There was a crash, and forgetting everything save his brother's danger, Ned leaped up after him, finding him lying on the floor nursing a nasty bump on the head. Tom explained he had seen a ghastly face, without a nose, and then he had fallen unconscious. Descending to the Foxes, the two detectives were appalled to discover Mr. Fox lying on the floor murdered and Mrs. Fox was gone—vanished into the night. Ned shuddered, but Tom, attracted by the helplessness of the girl, refused to believe his brother's theory that she had murdered her husband and escaped. Sending Ned on to town to get help, Tom settled back to await the return of Goldy Fox and guard the scene of the crime. About four in the morning, he heard a noise. Suddenly Goldy cried out, "Don't shoot!" and amazed to see her standing there in men's clothes, Tom listened doubtfully to her story of having been carried off. She had regained consciousness in a deserted farm house, and finding a suit of men's clothing had changed from her own torn dress into it. In the morning Tom had her guide him to the spot, and investigating the house discovered behind the logs in the grate, a box of rockets. It was Goldy who told him how her husband, whom she soon learned to despise and fear had taken her to this deserted country. The only other person she saw was her husband's brother Jack, a sullen, morose individual who lived nearby and resented anyone coming near his place. It was he who owned the shack, to which Goldy had been brought. Determined to uncover the mystery, Tom went to see Jack. At the gate a brute of a dog leaped at Tom and would have torn him limb from limb had not Tom shot. Jack came out with lowering brows, and surveying Tom, whose bleeding arm hung limp, warned him that it would mean death if he ever came snooping around again. From Goldy, as she bandaged his torn arm, Tom learned that Jack had once had a son, who would now be about twenty-six, but the boy, always feeble-minded, had been killed in an accident several years before. The coming of a terrific storm soon shut out the hope that Ned would be able to find his way back that night. Goldy shivered and Tom promised to guard her with his life. A moment before midnight Tom saw a skulking figure peer in at the window, Goldy screamed at the horrible face. Tom leaped toward the window, but the thing had gone. Again footsteps. This time Tom caught Jack, who explained that his son, who was not dead, but had had his face partly shot off by an exploded rocket, was loose. Jack feared for him. Again Goldy's scream, and Tom discovered her fighting in the arms of the faceless lunatic, who, turning, tripped over the knife he held and died, horribly. Jack wept over the body of his murderer-son, while Tom, holding Goldy in his arms, staggered out to meet Ned who had come up at last with the police.

THE UNHAPPY CABALLERO

Felipe Garcia Drama File No. 11621

AMONG the gay people of Sevilla, Pepito Jarana, only son of a Spanish grandee, was a favorite. Expert at dancing the Bolero and La Jota, Pepito endeared himself to the populace by his bursts of generosity, his orders of cognac for everybody, including passing beggars. "If he weren't so rich," his admirers would say, "Perhaps he would have been a great bull fighter." At the same time they smiled at the thought of an Andulusian cavalier exhibiting himself face to face with the bull, amid the "oles" of the fight spectators.

However, Don Ricardo Jarana disapproved of his son's loose manners and his extravagance. Padre Francisco, the family priest and adviser, suggested that the only advisable course to cure Pepito of his profligacy, was—marriage. Advice from Padre Francisco in the grandee's household was a command, so Pepito was ordered to find a wife and spend his days in the peace of his home, far away from the clicking of castanets and jeweled heels.

After vain attempts to change his parent's mind, Pepito submitted himself to what he regarded as 'the altar of sacrifice." Meanwhile his father was picking a bride for him according to the custom of the wealthy families of Spain. One of his gypsy sweethearts, learning he was leaving her to get married, sombrely seized his palm, and read, "I see bad luck in store for you, many wives but never happiness." Crestfallen, Pepito snatched his hand from her grasp, and tossing her a peso, he departed.

At last Pepito met the bride of his father's choice, Rosarito Gallardo, wealthy and beautiful, newly arrived in Sevilla from a religious college in Madrid. Wedding bells rang out and the house of the grandee gleamed with Fiesta and gay spirits. Only the bridegroom was missing. Everybody began to whisper. Padre Francisco alone waited calmly, accustomed to delays. Suddenly the caballero burst in white of face. Silently he strode toward his bride. Before the stratled guests he thrust a pack of letters into the bride's limp hands. Her father, leaping to his feet ran forward as though to run Pepito through, but Rosarito, trembling lipped, stopped him. Only too well she knew the content of the ribboned packet. Her burning words of love, the accusatory pictures in the intimate embrace of a gallant lieutenant. The whole shameful affair exposed to hostile eyes. Whatever the checkered career of the bridegroom, the bride was expected to be pure.

The abrupt ending of Pepito's first marriage attempt, besides bringing the easily imagined scandal, precipitated the death of the aged Don Ricardo and the retirement of Padre Francisco as adviser to the Jarana household.

As for Pepito, deeply moved by the death of his father, he deserted Sevilla for Madrid, vowing never to attempt another marriage, the prophetic words of the gyspy clinging to his heart.

Madrid. The guitars, the folk songs, smell of wine and peasantry of his native Andalusia gave way to the heady champagne, high class cabarets, and American jazz bands introducing a new and stimulating rhythm. Pepito soon became a favorite in the social life of the city. He met women of every description. He whirled through a succession of "affairs," but the word "marriage" was crossed out of his love code. Then came Margaret O'Connor, an American in Spain, into his life. She was the widow of an American Engineer who had come to build a dam but was reported dead after an explosion of dynamite in the building area. Five years had elapsed since the report, and though his body was never identified among the many victims, to Margaret and everybody else his death was an accepted fact. The captivating widow loved Pepito, but no "affairs" for her. She wanted marriage and nothing else.

For weeks Pepito argued against the bourgeois respectability of marriage. They, he told her, were untrammeled souls, too big to be bound by middle class conventions. But in the end he yielded, and once more preparations were made for a wedding. Solemnly the bridal couple met at the altar, but at the time-honored question "Is there anyone present who knews any reason why these two people should not be joined in marriage?" a voice ran out. It was Margaret's husband. He had not been killed in the dam explosion, but had, the night before, absconded with the building funds.

Disillusioned, thwarted, Pepito took to gambling. Within two years his wealth had vanished through his fingers, Back in Sevilla, the dream of his admirers came true. Pepito, poor and distressed, became a bullfighter, not for glory but to earn his daily bread. Soon his name became a box-office attraction. Fame offered him all a man could wish for. But he was melancholy and lonely in the midst of all the celebrations for him. Bitterly he toasted, "My first wife. . . " Women exchanged glances. Filling his glass again, Pepito lifted his wine "To my second wife." There was an undercurrent of whispering. He looked down at the faces turned toward him. Staggering to his feet he refilled his glass and sneered, "To my third wife," then to the amazement of the company he smashed his glass against the floor, the red wine trickling like blood upon the rich carpet.

However, in the life of the famous toreador there was one bright spot. Far out in the suburbs of the city, there was a little dancer Marinela who loved him devotedly. She asked nothing but his love. In the arena, Pepito performed his dazzling feats, the crowd roared its applause, and Pepito presented the car of his slain bulls. But when he had finished, and was tired of the demands of his public, he returned to the waiting arms of Marinela.

Even when Marinela bore him a son, she asked nothing of Pepito. Now the famous toreador came more frequently. It amused him to fondle his child, and Marinela, face drained of color, looked on wistfully. One day coming up to her house, Pepito was amazed to hear a babble of voices, and he heard Marinela called ugly names. The landlady shouted that she won't have such a woman in her house any more. For the first time Pepito realized how his selfishness had made Marincla and the boy suffer. Tonight, he said tenderly, after the bull-fight, we shall be married. Tears stream from Marinela's eyes as she thanked him.

But that afternoon in the amphitheater, Pepito looked up to see Rosarito and Margaret in the gallery. For a moment he faltered. But that second was fatal. The bull rushed, head low. Groaning with pain, Pepito sent for Marinela and on his deathbed, gave her the protection of his name. "My third wife," his voice was an admixture of irony and tenderness. In the room the silence was broken only by Marinela's muffled weeping.

DARK MOON

Samuel Madison Drama File No. 11403

IN the blackness of a Pennsylvania coal mine, Tom Mason, young immigrant, works steadily. Each evening he attends the night school and writes home regularly telling what a wonderful country America is, and how, as soon as he has saved up money enough, he is going to send for his mother and younger brother. In time his diligenee attracts the attention of Reanse, a foreman, and Tom is given an opportunity to advance himself. One day he meets Helene Cribbis, a beautiful, well dressed girl, and she smiles at his shyness. She invites him to her home, and Tom, who has, through the years of hard work and study, never taken out a woman, finds his senses reeling. Thereafter he sees Helene regularly and when she expresses her dissatisfaction with his work in the dirty mines, Tom gives up his steady position and invests his capital in a small store. When he tries to send for his mother and brother, he learns that he must first becomes a naturalized citizen. Helene talks him into buying her a beautiful diamond ring, and Tom, thoroughly infatuated complies. Frequently, however, he worries when Helene tells him he ean't come over because she has a headaehe or must see a girl friend that evening. Esther Peters, one of the patrons of his store, keeps up his courage with her silent understanding, but Helene, jealous of Esther, creates a scene. Then Tom receives word that his brother has been killed in an aceident and that his mother is inconsolable. Remorsefully, Tom makes arrangements with the steamship eompany to take the next boat back home to bring his mother here. Helene tries to prevent him from going, but when she realizes that Tom cannot be dissuaded, she pleads with him to stop at the station to take home a package left there for her. Tom takes it but as he is bringing it back, he is stopped by a policeman and when a revolver is found in the package, Tom is heavily fined and sentenced to two months in jail. Tom swears that he had no idea what was in the package, and Helene convinees him that she was not responsible for his arrest. The two months in prison are torture for Tom, and Esther volunteers to keep up the shop for him. On his release Helene tries again to prevent him from going, but this time nothing can stop Tom. Secure in the knowledge that Esther is taking care of everything, he sails. Only his presence saves his mother from going out of her mind in her grief over her son's death, and Tom returns to America with his mother. He is disappointed that Helene is not waiting at the boat to meet him since he has told his mother all about her, saying they are going to be married as soon as he returns. Helene pretends to be cordial to Tom's mother, but Mrs. Mason instinctively distrusts the girl and finds much more in common with Esther. When Tom discovers that Helene has all the while been in love with another man, he gives up in despair. But it is his mother who makes him see that he lost nothing in Helene, and in the love of the faithful Esther, Tom is at last to find true happiness.

THE LOVE PARTNERSHIP

Joseph R. McLaughlin Drama File No. 11955

FROM school teacher to beach-comber! This was the descent of Dennis Whitney when the local bank failed soon after he left college swallowing all his income except for a few practieally worthless bonds; and a year later the school which employed him was forced to cut down on its staff. Most of his friends were also financially embarrassed and Dennis, as the flying weeks dwindled his resources and he grew tired of being rejected for any kind of work, took refuge on the seashore where he had once built a shack for summer use.

In one of the wealthy summer homes nearby, Fern Dalton was holding a house-party which included Harvey St. John, an Englishman, whose unsavory reputation caused his family to send him away. He had an allowance which depended upon his remaining in America where his past was unknown and had become a social lion in society. Determined to marry Fern, he had made a loan to Mr. Dalton who had secretly suffered reverses through a broker, Sam Dunning. Harvey planned to force the marriage when the notes came due and Dalton would be unable to meet them. Tiring of the festivities, Fern slipped down to the beach alone wandering aimlessly until she unexpectedly met Dennis examining a net used to catch drift from wrecked ships. A boat from the Orient had been capsized near there recently and Dennis anticipated a lucrative haul. Looking at her, Dennis knew instantly that no other girl could mean as much though he sensed her contempt for his appearance and occupation. Spying some Japanese glass floats, Fern offered to purchase them but afraid that the offer resulted solely from pity Dennis refused. As she bitingly retorted, several of her friends including Harvey approached. Harvey mocked her taste in "boy friends" stinging Fern to a defense which surprised herself, although Dennis forced Harvey to apologize which he did with ill-grace. From the house can be heard the loud ringing of the luncheon bell. Impulsively, Fern put out her hand and wordlessly Dennis held it tight for a moment. Alone, Dennis turned to his dog who yapped approval of the young woman. While the tinkling of piano and phonograph music eame through the evening air that night, Fern sat alone her thoughts persistently drifting to the young beach-comber. She roughly refused Harvey's company who angrily taxed her with preferring the "tramp fellow." Fern flushed but remained silent. Harvey returned to the house where he sought out her father and revealed that he held the notes which were due next week, insinuating that he would forget them if Fern could be persuaded to marry him. Bewildered, Mr. Dalton promised an answer within a few days. The next day Fern went again to the beach, walking slowly in pretense that she was not really so interested in seeing Dennis again. They were only a hundred feet apart when Fern stmubled upon an odd hard lump which Dennis, running to her assistance, identified as ambergris worth a sizeable fortune. For a moment he hesitated before telling her since silence would secure the treasure for himself and enable him to return to Fern's social level. Fern insisted that he return with it to her father whom they found with Mr. Dunning who had not yet heard that Harvey had revealed his "cards." While Mr. Dalton sighed with relief since the ambergris would more than pay his debts, Dennis learned from Mr. Dunning that his worthless bonds had become valuable again. When Dalton suggested that Dennis become his partner the young man agreed if Fern became his partner. Her kiss sealed the bargain.

AFFAIRS OF ANTOINETTE

S. Adelle Caudle Drama File No. 12055

GAILY, Antoinette Bonheur recites tales of college life to her family whom she is visiting during summer vacation, as they are all seated around the table in the spacious farm house. When Toney, her little brother, asks the girl if she still collects butterflies, a hobby acquired during her freshman year, she replies that she intends to search the fields on the morrow. After dinner, Toney proudly displays his collection of stuffed birds to his adored older sister, teasingly remarking that someday she will be familiar with this one, as he shows her the love bird. Blushing, she changes the subject, but at night as the girl lies on her couch she dreams of her ideal—strong, courageous, handsome, and, of course, in love for the first time. Early the next morning Antoinette, clad in brown knickers and an old brown hat, chases butterflies, net in hand. As she watches them skim gracefully across her father's fields, she reflects that each and everything has its own way of living. While resting on an old log seat near the boat house, Antoinette sees a lovely yellow butterfly and soon has him under her net. When she arises she is confronted by an attractive stranger who introduces himself as Vincent Quinn, a neighbor and a geologist, adding that until a year ago his home was in Yukon; now he has no ties. Possessing the sensitivity of an artist, Vincent portrays the quaint farmhouse, with washings blowing in the breeze, as delightful rural pictures, and Antoinette finds him a delightful companion.

She invites him to stay for lunch, and he accepts. At the conclusion of the meal, Mrs. Bonheur enters the room, urging the young man to attend a dance she is giving in honor of her daughter's homecoming and again, he is happy to accept. Radiantly beautiful in her dance frock of creamy lace, Antoinette takes Vincent's breath away as they waltz together. Priscilla Cohn, her best friend, later tells the young man that he has made a conquest when his admiration is apparent. The following day Antoinette, Toney and Vincent explore the northeast section of the farm while the geologist explains various interesting and scientific facts regarding the rock formations. After Toney leaves, the two are seated in the hammock when Vincent confesses his love to the girl, adding that he must tell her something, but cannot finds the words to do it. Abruptly, he leaves. The next morning Vincent asks Antoinette to drive to Winnipeg with him; she consents, and they start out together through the bright summer sunshine. Antoinette points out the Agricultural College where she became interested in collecting lepidoptera. Silently, Vincent drives to the railroad station, presenting Antoinette to the only woman passenger who alights—Cynthia, his former wife. As they drive homeward after this brief meeting, Antoinette is the silent one, while Vincent explains that his marriage proved to be a failure, divorce inevitable. In Antoinette he had found all he thought Cynthia was. that she was not.

Antoinette visits her grandfather in a neighboring town. This wise and kindly old gentleman advises her to return to her love, since his very suffering has made him the sensitive man she adores. But as she is returning, Antoinette reads of an explosion in a mine which Vincent meant to visit with her, that very day. Sick with fright, she hastens to their bench by the lake, to discover her beloved, safe and sound. As she nestles in his arms, with a prayer of thanksgiving, she hears. the notes of the love bird across the waters.

WHEN DREAMS COME TRUE

Eddie Hoffren Drama File No. 12029

WHILE watching the news flashes that encircle the New York Times Building, Bert is accosted by Stanley who asks him for a match; then. after lighting his cigarette, watches him, obviously eager to start a conversation. With the cynicism that metropolitan life so often develops, Bert ignores the young man, though fully aware of his interest and when Stanley touches his arm he draws away angrily. With convincing sincerity, Stanley explains that he is alone and "broke" in New York, longing for companionship more than anything else. After surveying him critically, Bert offers to take him to a cafetcria and he eagerly accepts. Over their simple meal Stanley confesscs that a short time ago he was a factory worker, in love with June, a beautiful girl. As a result of the depression he lost his job; because of this and his mother's illness he was unable to see his sweetheart. She believed he was devoting his time to some other woman in spite of his explanations to the contrary. Writing him a brief note she left town; the same night his mother died in his arms, following a heart attack. Anxious to escape from too poignant memories he joined the army and came to New York at the end of his period of service. Bert then explains that, although an American, he lived in England until the death of his mother, a short time after his father had been killed. At her grave his sister, also named June, informed him that she must go away from this unhappy spot, and sailed for America shortly afterwards. Bert's friend, John Henderson, who lived in a neighboring city, gave the young man a job and introduced him to Jean. Soon this friendship ripened into love as the girl helped him forget his grief. But when a prominent theatrical manager offered to help Jean become an actress she deserted Bert and he, too, came to America where he recently found employment in a large mercantile firm. Gratefully accepting his offer to share his hotel room, Stanley accompanies his new found companion and both affirm that at least they are no longer friendless. As they sleep, both dream of a masquerade ball; June, removing her mask, floats into Stanley's arms, while the orchestra plays the lovely strains of the Blue Danube and they waltz to its measure. In a little alcove, Bert sees Jean also removing her mask, and turning to him with a cry of joy, saying that she was on the verge of suicide when something prompted her to come here. When morning comes, the boys compare their dreams wistfully wishing they were reality. As they are leaviug the hotel a girl stops them and June is clasped in the arms of Bert, her brother—soon to be claimed by Stanley, her sweetheart. She tells them that she is employed here as a telephone operator and had just discovered they were registered at that moment. As the two are enjoying breakfast in her cozy apartment, she tells Bert that Jean, his sweetheart, is her friend; they became acquainted while the girl was engaged in a play which closed, staying at the hotel during its brief duration. She will inform her as soon as she hears from her again of Bert's address, since Jean has confided that she desires only to be his wife. But at that moment Jean calls, unexpectedly arriving in town from abroad and Bert takes her in his arms. As the four plan happily for the future, with a double wedding in a short time, they agree that dreams can come true.

JOSEPH'S COAT

George Norten Westervelt Comedy File No. 12132

WITH a cry of anguish, Amy surveys her husband, wearing a disreputable coat, several times to large for him and carrying out a vivid color scheme of nile green, tobacco grey and magenta. Apologetically Joe asures her that he has an excellent reason for donning this particular garment, which he purchased in a second hand store last week, but breakfast is not a cordial meal and hurriedly the young husband prepares to leave. Looking out of the window he speaks to Elsie Baxter, his new secretary, then hastily kisses Amy and is on his way. After he departs, Amy picks up the breakfast dishes, still frowning. Glancing out of the window, she observes that several of the neighbors have seen Joe wearing this atrocity and have gathered in little, tittering groups. But later, as she is dressing to attend to her morning purchases, Amy picks up Joe's picture. As she tenderly gazes at the clear, honest eyes, the sensitive, generous mouth, her anger disappears and she hums a little tune. At the office, Dick Hemenway, typewriter salesman, calls to repair a machine and is directed to Elsie's desk. Joe notices that the repairs seem to take all morning as the two engage in almost inaudible conversation and frequent insertion of paper in the machine. The telephone rings; Joe gleefully instructs Elsie to take down the number, Lex 3-1573, which she does in some confusion. Then. informing her that he is off to New York to close a business deal, he asks her to telephone this information to his wife.

With some surprise, Amy receives the tidings. Her only comment is a slightly sarcastic sound, indicating that she understands. But that afternoon, Amy sees a man helping Elsie onto the car with the solicitude which can only indicate awakening love. With a sickening sensation, Elsie realizes that the man must be Joe, since there cannot be two coats of that horrible design in the city. Steadying herself, the young wife attempts to conceal her grief from strangers, although one motherly woman tells her that she looks ill, and advises a doctor. In the privacy of her own room, Amy gives way to hot tears, as her world crumbles about her. She recalls the days when she and Joe attended grammar school together. Always he was her hero, defending her in battles, carrying her books home for her, sharing the treats in his lunch box with her, while she, in turn, helped him with his spelling and consoled him when he was punished for boyish pranks. This continued throughout high school when they attended their first dance together. Inseparable at all games and parties, love had grown between them so naturally that both knew, without words, what was in the other's heart that afternoon they embraced before separating to attend college. After graduation, Amy recalls, engagement parties followed and at last the wedding at her church. Honeymoon days at the lake pass through Amy's mind, and, still weeping, she realizes this is the first unhappiness she has ever known with Joe.

Late that evening a jubiliant Joe enters the house. Amy starts to greet him, then remembers. Later she sees him, smiling in his sleep. For the first time in her married life ,Amy searches his pockets and discovers a note, arranging a meeting place and signed

ELSIE X37

Heartbroken, Amy packs her suitcases to leave when Dick calls at the door, explaining that Joe accidentally took his coat yesterday, he was forced to borrow Joe's. But, he adds, it brought him good luck, since Elsie promised to become his wife! Joe enters and hears the story again from the happy youth, congratulating him. When Dick leaves, Amy sobs out her story, begging Joe's forgiveness. With mingled laughter and sorrow at her grief, Joe explains that this coat, once the property of a vaudeville actor, was worn when a client approached him with plans for a valuable deal. Superstitiously, he vowed to wear the coat and keep the matter secret until the deal was consummated, believing the garment a symbol of good luck. After a merry breakfast, a happy young couple burn Joseph's coat in their back yard, together, while Joe shows Amy that she read the signature on the note upside down; it is

THE MOTHER

Mariano Rodriguez Melodrama File No. 11911

JULIAN, a student, encounters little Eloisa, a child of fourteen, as she is carrying food to her foster brother and father in the fields. Offering his assistance, he introduces himself, completely enchanted by the girl's beauty. In spite of her extreme youth, Julian is falling in love with her, and he confesses this when he steals into her garden for a brief visit. After that, the two arrange for many poignantly sweet meetings, unkown to Eloisa's parents. Unwilling to leave Periban the city in Michoacan where his sweetheart lives, Julian at first tells Eloisa that he will discontinue his education, but, knowing the splendid qualities of his mind, she prevails upon him to return to his academy at Guadalajara, Capital of Jalisco. The rules prevent him writing to his beloved, but Julian thinks of her constantly, as he gazes tenderly at Eloisa's picture each night. At last, no longer able to continue without seeing Eloisa, Julian steals away for a visit, but finds her home deserted. Neighbors tell him that the family has gone to America. In despair, Julian returns to school, but, unable to concentrate upon his lessons, he enters the mercantile exporting trade, recieving a position which sends him to America, where he seeks his sweetheart. Still vainly searching, Julian resigns from his position, entering a steel foundry in Homestead, Pennsylvania. Martha, the proprietress of his boarding house where Julian stays, becomes interested in the young man. To her he confides his story of his five years' search for his lost love, as she listens sympathetically.

Through his diligence, Julian wins promotion and is employed in the engineering department. At a party given by his employer he is presented to a lovely girl of nineteen affectionately titled Mexicanita, since she is a native of Mexico; she reminds him of his lost Eloisa. Winning permission to call again. Julian tells him her story, and, with a cry of delight, she confesses that she is, indeed, Eloisa. Suspicious that they are not really her parents, Eloisa confesses that she is unhappy, as she feels they were cruel to separrate her from Julian, but, his arms about her, the young man assures her that they will be together from now until the end of their lives. Eloisa shows him a baby dress with the initials, E. M. which once belonged to her; this confirms her suspicion that she is adopted. That night, Julian confides all to Martha. Her memory goes back to the day when she was wooed by Alberto Mercado, a frontier guardsman. Surprising her, the dashing young soldier climbed the wall of her garden and urged her to become his bride. Impulsively she consented and they ran away together, later informing her father. A member of Villa's revolutionary troops, Alberto was killed by government troops a short time before her daughter, Elvira, was born. Wounded herself in the fray, Martha lost consciousness. When she came to herself, her little daughter, clad in a dress bearing the initials E. M. was taken from her. Desperately she appealed to the orphange as soon as she was in a position to care for her baby, whom her father refused to educate, but Elvira had been given the name of Eloisa and adopted by a family in Periban.

Calling upon Eloisa with Julian, Martha is shown the baby dress, and realizes that this is her own child. Not wishing to startle the girl, or admit her own negligence in not searching for her child, at this time, Martha says nothing, but informs the foster parents that if they oppose Eloisa's wedding she will cause trouble. They agree to her demands, assuring her that she may reveal her identity if she wishes, since Eloisa is no longer a child and is leaving them. Eyes glowing with happiness, Martha sees her daughter, radiant in bridal white, marry Julian, planning someday to tell her the truth of a mother's sorrow.

THE MYSTERIOUS RING

Joseph P. Alifano Mystery File No. 12022

WHILE all Paris reads of the daring crimes committed by the Mysterious Ring, a group of bandits composed of five men and two women who live in a cabin near Magno Creek, the criminals, under the orders of their leader, plan to rob the Central Bank, as they know that twenty thousand francs are to be transported. The next morning the two women enter the bank, ostensibly to open accounts. At the given moment they signal with a wave of their handkerchiefs; two of the gang enter, holding up the guard and cashier, two the customers, and one those about to enter the building. The woman take the money, escaping with all but one of their gang who is shot and killed, drive away in an armored car. Count Boldwino, one of the customers in the bank who is injured by the bandits, offers five thousand dollars reward for their apprehension, describing a ring which his assaillant wore to the police. The next day as his beautiful daughter, Elena, is seated in the garden at the end Villa with her mother two men enter, claiming that the motor on their car has stopped. With the aid of a servant whom they have bribed they throw a blanket over Elena s head, escaping with her. In distraction, her mother screams, then loses consciousness. When she comes to herself she tells police and her husband, aroused by her cries, what has taken place. Guards find a note demanding ransom, with a seal which the Count identifies as having been made with the mysterious ring.

Elena is taken to the cellar of the gang's headquarters where one of the women is told to serve her. Desperately her father wires Captain Pizzoni of Malsiglea, his daughter's fiance, who, refusing a squadron of planes offered by his company, flies at once with one mechanic. Four hours later he hears the story of the girl's parents, and promises them his aid. With the mechanic, Pizzoni flies over the territory until he sights the cabin. Landing a quarter of a mile from the cabin, Pizzoni makes his way stealthily toward it through the bushes, sending the pilot back for aid from the count. One of the bandits hears him and he is captured, and brutally slugged with a revolver. When he regains consciousness he finds Elena, weeping over him, but quickly reassures her that all will be well. Marcella, Elena's maid during her captivity, enters and overhears them, but due to her fondness for the girl, does not report this conversation immediately. Two armed cars follow the mechanic's plane to the cabin. As the bandits see the plane approach they attempt to hide their captive in the forest, abandoning this plan to fire at the machine. In order to escape more easily, the chief's aide decides to shoot the prisoners but Marcella follows him, killing him before he is able to perform this cowardly act. All of the Mysterious Ring are killed save the chief and the two women. The former is guillotined, the latter imprisoned the following month. His arms about his daughter, the grateful count promises Pizzoni any reward he wishes, gladly granting it when his desire is for an early marriage. A grand ball is given following the wedding of Elena and her rescuer.

DOUBLE DATE

Jack Z. Louden Short Subject File No. 11756

"SHACKLE along, Old Boy!" Dick, resplendent in complete cowboy regalia, encouraged his horse, noting with distress that the animal had sprained his ankle. Upon entering the little western town of Belle Font, decorated with gay banner announcing a rodeo in honor of the Fourth of July, Dick gave his horse the reins, whereupon the faithful animal headed at once for a livery stable. After leaving him in the care of its owner, Dick set forth on foot. He stopped for a brief conversation with a Civil War veteran, in a faded blue uniform, who recalled the days of battle and hardship now being so lightly celebrated by the happy crowd. Suddenly Dick saw his friend, Harry. After exchanging greetings, the two headed for the livery stable, walking past the owner whom they awakened from a nap and "cracking a pint" together. On the crowded street again, they were stopped hy a vivacious girl who informed Harry that she had won her bet that she could vamp her chum's boy friend at a dance the previous evening; consequently Harry must take her upon the ferris wheel. While wistfully watching them, Dick was joined by his "Shadow," a youngster of fifteen who worked on the same ranch and was constantly at his elbow, but the boy, too, soon deserted him for a pretty girl; he secretly nicknamed her the "Prairie Queen."

Wandering about alone, Dick won a blanket on a raffle which he presented to a small boy eagerly watching him. Suddenly hungry, he entered Jay's cafe where he saw the Shadow and his Prairie Queen. He joined them, but was not introduced. After a few brief remarks the two finished their meal and left just as Dick's order came. Outside again, after noticing a family which boasted six flaming haired daughters in assorted sizes. Dick spied Harry and his girl. They joined him in a glass of orangeade, then left. Determined not to he left alone during the rodeo, Dick, seeing the Shadow and the Prairie Queen again caught up with them, took them to the orangeade stand, and accompanied them, by his own invitation, to the rodeo. The performance began with cowboys ballads of the old west in which the audience, colorfully dressed and in a holiday mood, joined in. Pleased with the clear tenor voice of Dick, the Queen smiled at him, and the two were soon talking and singing gaily together. When one of the bucking steers threw its rider she involuntarily grasped his arm, and the two exchanged smiles of understanding. Harry came in second in the wild horse race; the Queen applauded when she learned that he was Dick's friend.

At the conclusion of the rodeo the Shadow and the Queen disappeared while Dick's back was turned. Seeing the same animated manner on the face of a girl who was talking to a group of her friends, Dick hastened forward, but was given a cool reception as the girl turned away with an expression of disgust. Blushing furiously, Dick concluded the snake whiskey was responsible. In his eagerness to get away he upset a child's ice cream cone and was picking it up in confusion when an officer advised him to he on his way. Suddenly he saw the Shadow and the Queen! Yet there she was across the street. Not until Dick was riding home, did the Shadow explain that the Queen had a twin sister. And Dick sang a cowboy ballad as he planned happily for the future.

THE GYPSY

Miguel Lopez Drama File No. 11944

IN SEVILLE, during the reign of the illustrious Phillip II, Arco, a gypsy lad, listens intently while mother Juana predicts great fortune for him, adding that he will be killed by the same dagger that he uses to murder another. Blanca, his lovely young sister, is worried over this prediction, but Arco laughs away her fears and journeys to a tavern. As he is sipping a glass of rare wine he overhears one servant tell another that his master, Don Pedro, is the wealthiest man in Spain. His mind full of evil plans, Arco persuades Blanca to pretends to faint as Don Pedro's carriage passes. This benevolent nobleman conducts the girl to her home, while Arco, weeping, thanks him hypocritically. Leaving gold on the table, Don Pedro, known as "the town's father" for his many acts of charity, promises to call again .On a subsequent visit he informs Blanca that he wishes to give her his estate at Alcala, so charmed is he with her beauty, and requests that she come to his home the following evening. Gratefully, the girl complies, but as Don Pedro removes the oil painting which guards his safe and opens it, Arco enters through a window and stabs the nobleman to death. Seizing his unhappy sister, who knew nothing of his plans, and taking the gold, Arco forces Blanca to don a man's costume and escape with him to Cadiz. Jose, Don Pedro's valet, who loves his master as a father, vows revenge when he discovers the crime. Police learn that the gardener admitted Arco, hut are unable to find the criminal as the entire city mourns the loss of this benefactor.

Two years later, Arco, Blanca and Rose, his adopted daughter, are living under the name of Don Louis de Mendoza in Marseilles' most luxurious hotel. Arco, later, purposely drops his glove, thus introducing himself when de Bucci returns it. The count is presented to Blanca and a short time later proposes to her as they are seated in the garden. When Arco grants his permission, the two are secretly wed. At twenty two, Blanca's husband dies; the beautiful countess becomes the toast of Spain, as many sue for her hand. Even Phillip II is enchanted when she is presented at court. Dominated still by Arco, Blanca wills him two million dollars and makes Rose, whom she dearly loves, heiress. A beautiful girl herself, Rose wins the love of Don Alvarez de la Cruz, and Blanca consents to this wedding, eager for the happiness of her adopted daughter. As Blanca, Arco and Rose are leaving a hrilliant hall given at the house of Duquez, Jose recognizes the while watching outside. Through the influence of Don Benito de Pusman, formerly Arco's lawyer, he obtains a position as assistant valet to the gypsy. Informing police that he has found Don Pedro's murderer, Jose seizes revenge, but when the justice obtains an audience with the King, who denies the possihility of this claim, Jose is advised to forget it. As Arco sends Jose on an errand he almost recognizes him. That night, with the dagger which killed his master in hand. Blanca, in the garand stabs him over the heart. Blanca, in the garden with Rose who has dreamt of the murder, notifies police. In reading Arco's memoirs Blanca learns that she was stolen by his parents; her true identity is unknown. As she hopes someday to find her people, Blanca sees Rose wed at a brilliant ceremony, and rejoices in the girl's happiness.

WHO IS MY FRIEND?

Mrs. George Peterson Drama File No. 11307

RELUCTANTLY, Bernard Benton drops the letter in the post office box. It is a message to his sister, Lauraline, summoning her home from college until finances improve. He is hoping that the money from this season's steers will cover the mortgage of the Bar T Ranch. At the thought of this his face grows sullen and intent. At that moment, Vance Bright rides up. Between Lauraline and Vance exists a love which goes back to childhood. They plan to marry when she completes her college work. Bernard tells Vance his decision and asks him to meet the girl on the incoming Friday train. "Any more cattle scares?" asks Vance. "Not the last few days but I'm sure someone is still prowling around. 'T' aint no ghost either," Bernard answers. The brother admits he does not feel safe about having Lauraline home but has no other place to send her. He decides that she must not leave the house unaccompanied. Although a bit disappointed at leaving in the middle of her third semester, Lauraline is elated at seeing the two men she cares most for so soon. The ride back to the ranch with Vance is all too short. A quick glance at Bernard's face convinces his sister that something more than money is troubling him. Under the mellow influence of her cooking, Bernard and Vance find it easier to tell of the inexplicable stampedes of the cattle which they are sure are the result of some human agency. When things move smoothly the next two weeks, the men relax vigilance a bit. In the early morning hours a woman's scream rings through the house followed by a pistol shot. The men with Bernard rush to Lauraline's room where the shivering girl, holding the pistol Vanve gives her for protection, is staring at the window. She tells them she awoke to see a strange face at the window, and still half-asleep shot as the man was trying to climb in. A thorough search reveals tracks freshly made about the house which prove that the girl is not having a nightmare. At breakfast, old Dad Briggs declares it reminds him of the old days of Selle Stong's cut-throats who have been chased out to Mexico years before. Quiet once more returns through the rest of the summer. In the fall, the cattle are rounded up in the lower pasture ready to be taken to the railroad the following morning. Ben and Ridge stand watch while the other cowboys turn in early, preparing for the arduous day ahead. The stillness is broken by a galloping horse, its rider swaying from side to side. Bernard rushes down and finds Ridge wounded. Before losing consciousness he tells them Ben is dead. The men find the steers scattered and a note pinned on Ben's body ordering them to clear out. The note is signed "The Black Man." Similar orders are received by Tommy Reaves, friend of the Bentons, who offers his service in tracing the murderer. He starts a systematic search of possible hiding places in the nearby hills. Lauraline is ordered to remain close at home. Vance drives over at noon to find her missing. Her horse is in the barn. The other men return and find a note warning them to leave if they wish to save Lauraline. Reaves is excellent at following trails. All night the men follow his directions. They finally stumble on the girl and her abductor who is resting, sure that he is many miles ahead of the searching party. Under the abrupt menace of a revolver, he reveals that he belongs to the Stong gang which is planning to resume rustling. The Benton ranch stands in the direct route of cattle shipment over the Mexican border. Lauraline is oeaf to the confession, secure in her lover's embrace.

ALMOST MARRIED

A. V. Vlik Drama File No. 11247

AGAINST the romantic background of woodland on a summer night in Maine, Henrietta Anderson talened pianist, experiences the ecstasy of love in the arms of William Kohl, government forester. In that moment's beauty, the plantive song of the nightingale overhead is a brooding omen for the future. After a silence of happy relaxation, the girl stirs restlessly. "I can't bear this to be our last evening together for months to come; why can't we be married at once, right now. I've plenty of money," she exclaims. Patiently, Kohl once more explains that until he completes his term of service, he is under contract not to marry. They part with fervent pledges. In the city, Henrietta waits daily for the letters that never come, never suspecting that Mrs. Anderson, ambitious for a brilliant marriage for her daughter, has the servants withhold Kohl's mail. Meanwhile, Kohl, convinced that she has forgotten, seeks forgetfulness. At a public dance, he drinks himself into a stupor, and wakes up the next morning in a hotel room with a girl he vaguely recalls from the night before. But he has no memory of marrying Rose, though she shows a marriage certificate bearing his name. He sends in his resignation immediately, and returns to his old lodgings to gather his things. Among his mail is a letter from Henrietta, humbling her pride; reiterating her love and begging him to break his silence. When Henrietta learns that her letter is too late, she goes through weeks of suffering until a change of scene is advised. Accompanied by her mother, Henrietta goes to Vienna where she continues her music studies. Through her mother's connivances, the girl meets Leonard Raelt, eligible young bachelor and manager of an American banking branch. Henrietta hasn't forgiven her mother for robbing her of her lover, and refuses to enter into her plans. At the dinner table, she studiedly ignores Leonard; and later tries to avoid him for a dancing partner. Accustomed to women's favors, Henrietta's obvious distastes intrigues him; so he successfully manoeuvers a few moments with her in the garden. Under his abrupt challenge, the girl confesses that her dislike is not a personal one and the gay banter of words which follows finds her feeling more like the carefree girl that found life good before Kohl came. At home her old lover is facing new difficulties. Embarked on a loveless marriage, he tries to conceal his repugnance though Rose quickly discerns this. Going through his personal things one night, Rose discovers Henrietta's letter and with jealous resentment towards the unknown girl taunts Kohl with the memory of his old love. To complicate matters, Rose learns she is to have a child whose coming she bitterly resents. Although Henrietta, whose friendship with Leonard is growing rapidly, warns her suitor that a past experience has emptied her of the capacity to love again, she yields to his pleas; in giving him happiness she may lose her own emptiness. They return home where a large dinner is planned to announce the engagement. At the height of the festivities, Henrietta is called aside; a man who insists on seeing her is waiting on the side-porch. It is Kohl, unaware of her engagement. Rose has just killed herself, leaving a note which throws suspicion on him. A warrant is out for his arrest, but first he must see Henrietta, starving for a glimpse of his beloved. Into this scene breaks Leonard, and forgetting the anguish she is inflicting upon him, Henrietta begs him to help Kohl escape. While the accused murderer is aboard a Europe-bound ship, Leonard supervises an investigation which clears Kohl of criminal charges. Six months later, the lovers are united in Paris, drinking in the symbolic sunlight of a new day.

THE GOLD DREDGE

H. Stephan Comedy Drama File No. 12090

CHARLEY SHMIDT and Paul Beker, two city slickers, see a sand dredge for sale as they are driving along the waterfront. They decide to sell fake mining stock to farmers and, with this in mind, secure the dredge from Mr. Sherwood, the owner, offering him a partnership as payment. His office boy, who has been told to chase the two out in five minutes, finds his employer carried away with enthusiasm over the deal. Mrs. Sherwood is delighted, since this will finance a sensational Paris divorce for her. The two are invited to dinner; Frances, their accomplice, is presented as Charley's wife, and Alice Sherwood, the daughter of the house expresses admiration for her gown which she has stolen from a woman who meant to present it to a museum. As Paul and Alice dance together they become fast friends. While the group are dining in a fashionable restaurant, several farmers break in, demanding the privilege of purchasing stocks. Mr. Sherwood is taken by surprise, but he writes receipts while the boys take in the money, piling it on a tableoloth. Paul dispatches Charley to purchase gold dust for the mining area, secretly. The women accompany the men on their mission, settling in a cabin near the "claim." A group of miners discovers Paul buying gold dust; two of them, Mike and Alex, surmise that the project is a fake, but say nothing. In the cabin all drink to the project, naming the mine "Success." Mr. Sherwood refuses to accept one thousand dollars rent for the dredge, or the sale at fifty thousand dollars, content with his share in the mine. Canvassing the territory, Charley and Paul secure thousands of clients for the mine.

Eager for publicity, Mrs. Sherwood proposes to attempt a marriage between her daughter and a visiting count, with subsequent divorce and alimony; but Alice calmly announces that she has married Charley. Angry at this turn of affairs, Frances sells stocks, keeping the money herself. Mrs. Sherwood faints, but is soon revived; then she upbraids both young people bitterly. In order to secure the good will of the farmers, Charley and Paul serve free beer, assisted by Frances. The group burst into song and tell comical stories while Frances gaily dances on the table for their benefit. Secretly Mike reports that a little gold dust has been taken from the boards, while Paul nods, and bribes him to keep silent . In love with his wife, Charley plans to tell her the truth, but cannot bring himself to do it. Together they enjoy the festivities aboard the dredge. Mr. Sherwood urges that all money be placed in a savings bank and this duty is turned over to Frances who, instead calmly hides the roll of bills in her own room. When the farmers demand payment, the boys promise them early returns, attempting to turn their minds from the subject with a group of humorous and ribald stories which send them off in gales of laughter. Alone, the two decide they must leave the country soon. Charley confesses that he wishes to tell his wife the truth, but Paul reminds him of his promise to see the deal through. Meanwhile, Frances, placing the money in her purse, slips away, catching a night train for the city. In the morning the boys discover this fact. Suspicious farmers report matters to the sheriff who comes to arrest the boys leading a group of stockholders. When Mrs. Sherwood learns of this, she attempts to shoot Charley and Paul, but fails. When she drops the gun it explodes, and the frightened woman leaps in the air, screaming hysterically. At that moment, Mike appears with several bags of gold dust and the boys discover they have, after all, located a rich claim! As the farmers cheer, Mrs. Sherwood embraces Charley and Paul, assuring them that she believed in them all along. Frances returns with what is left of the money. A clergyman is summoned, who marries her to Paul on the dredge, while Mrs. Sherwood stares in amazement, silenced from complaint by her husband. Both the wedding and the discovery of gold are celebrated by hilarious singing and dancing on the dredge; Mrs. Sherwood joins in this gaiety freely, as beer is served to all.

DONE WITH MARRIAGE

Eula R. Zemo Drama File No. 11554

TWO disasterous marriages which crash when Diana Phelps learns that the men are more interested in her fortune than her own considerable charms, convince Diana that she is through with wedding bells. Back from her last Reno divorce, she throws herself eagerly into the mad social whirl of her old social set. However, all her life Diana has wanted a child, and now regrets bitterly that even this solace has been denied. While visiting friends with young children, Diana decides that she is modern and wealthy enough to have a baby without tying herself to a husband also. The father of her child must be intelligent and come from good healthy stock. When she goes to Florida, it is with this quest in mind despite the fact that there are several attentive males among her present acquaintanceship. Sauntering aimlessly along the beach, Diana mischievously kicks at an extended heap of sand. Diana is startled when a blond head angrily emerges from the sandbed and glares at her. Before she can recover sufficiently to apologize; Jerry has appreciatively absorbed her beauty. Only, if she agrees to sit with him a while, will Jerry absolve her. And Diana soon decides that it the nicest penance she ever knew. For two weeks, Jerry and Diana motor, swim, play tennis, and dance together in a glorious world of fun all their own. Diana holds her breath in moments fearful that the happiness must someday end. The first night that Jerry casually kisses her and then with an increasing intensity, Diana knows that this is becoming something deeper than a summer romance for Jerry. As for herself, Diana is aware that no man will ever succeed in enthralling her thoughts and emotions as Jerry does. She tries to visualize Jerry as a small boy and her hands reach out hungrily. Diana must have a son—Jerry's son, but she cannot face marriage which she associates with inevitable illusionment. One morning Jerry rushes over to a private corner of the beach where Diana awaits him, and playfully tumbles her about the sand. Suddenly the childish spell is broken. Jerry groans and then embraces her roughly to him before murmuring, "Diana, my dear, I can't live without you. You must marry me." With stumbling difficulty, Diana attempts to explain her fear of wedlock and yet her deep desire to bear Jerry's child. Bewildered and perplexed, Jerry first regards it as a whim but as the days go on and she still persists, his love for her rises above conventional bounds. They spend their "honeymoon" at Jerry's secluded mountain lodge. Two months later, Diana joyfully announces that her dearest wish is granted. One day Jerry receives an unexpected visit from his mother. He introduces Diana as his wife and for Jerry's sake, the young woman consents to the deception. Delighted, Mrs. Henderson persuades them to stay at her home until the child is born. During the period of waiting, Diana is amazed at her own adaptation to the role of matron. She and Jerry might be even married, passion tempered to a sweet continuing sense of love. Yet once or twice when Jerry broaches the subject, Diana balks vigorously. Then Diana is rushed to the hospital but things are not so simple as the specialists had planned. Complications develop. Diana is deep in a coma when her son is born—dead. Jerry is at her bedside while a physician carefully watches her pulse. Diana opens her eyes but there is no need for questions. She knows her child has slipped away. For a moment, Jerry fears she will follow. But looking at his strained, worried face, Diana first understands that their love is greater than any wedding rings. . . .

THE FIRST JOURNEY

J. P. Saulter Drama File No. 11842

GREGORY, faithful tenant, farmer and servant of Lord Radcliffe, asks permission of his master to wed Julia, another subject. Smiling his approval, the kindly owner of the estate says that he will give a wedding feast for these two subjects, whom he has known since childhood and whose parents have long been his devoted followers. After a gala evening of song and dance in celebration of the nuptials Lord Radcliffe tells the young couple that he will place them in charge of his beautiful estate in Ireland; as long as they do not break certain rules or enter his private hunting lodge they may make their home there but if he finds they cannot keep these commandments they will be sent on a long journey. Delighted at this piece of good fortune the young couple thank their master profusely and set forth on the the journey to the estate. Overcome with appreciation at the beauty of their new home, Gregory and Julia are ideally happy at first. They go for long walks, decorating the house with flowers which they gather in the fields. Taking a pride in the home, Julia sees that everything is kept in perfect condition while Gregory fulfills his bargain in caring for the grounds and livestock. One day while Julia is singing in the garden she is surprised to see a stranger watching her from the road.

The young wife draws back, but the stranger enters and introduces himself as August, her neighbor. Overcoming Julia's shyness with his worldy charm, August wins her friendship; when she tells him the story of her landlord's kindness he assures her that if she will only take the opportunity she can secure a fortune which will enable her and her husband to purchase an estate of their own. Explaining himself, the neighbor says that a fortune is concealed in the hunting ground and urges the young woman to search for it. At first Julia refuses indignantly but the subtle poison of the suggestion gradually breaks down her will power. She confides in Gregory who is horrified that she should even consider such a plan. But at last Julia agrees to accompany August to the forbidden territory; she leaves a note for her husband explaining her purpose. At once he starts out after the two and eventually finds them breaking into his master's lodge. Driven both by an overpowering curiosity and a desire to protect Julia, Gregory assists them when they will not leave. They find nothing and return, attempting to leave the place as they found it.

Lord Radcliffe visits the estate; Gregory and Julia assure him that they have kept his commandments, but they cannot look at him as they speak. He replies by telling them the story of Adam and Eve, driven from their home for disobedience, then, revealing that August is also his servant, sends the three into exile in the wilds of northern Ireland, on a difficult mission. When Gregory and Julia performed this mission and confess their sin Lord Radcliffe says that he will give their children a chance to live on the estate, as Adam and Eve's descendants will be given another chance through the resurrection of the dead. The following year twins are born to Gregory and Julia. From the depths of their own experience, they teach them to resist temptation and to pay back kindness with loyalty, until one day, Lord Radcliffe gives them all permission to return to his estate.

WINGS OF LOVE

Daisy Smith Drama File No. 11848

WALKING up the steps of the factory building where they are both employed, Nola Watt advises her friend, Madge Fane, not to encourage Guy Ryan, the boss, since his reputation with women is infamous. She adds that Ray Windle, a fellow worker, loves Madge and his affection is sincere and honest. With the heedlessness of youth and inexperience, Madge retorts that there is no harm in accepting Guy's attentions, which may prove valuable to her. When Ray, stopping to tell Madge that he has repaired her machine, also warns her she becomes angry; Guy, entering, informs Ray that he has overheard this charge against him. Courageously Ray replies that he will protect Madge at all costs, but the girl accepts a luncheon invitation from her employer. When Ray saves Madge from two runaway horses and the wheels of a carriage Guy takes the girl away in his car, driving her to a restaurant. Conducting her to the private dining room he orders Nan, the proprietress, to bring "tea." After she drinks it, Madge feels her senses reeling. She refuses to marry Guy, whereupon he drives her to his grandmother's house in the country, after Nan admisters ether. With a red hot poker, Madge burns her way to freedom, and hastens down the road. Overhearing two men say that they plan to rob the owner of a house, she warns the occupants, Jack Hall and his sister, Mrs. Stone, noticing, as she enters their home, that the house from which she has escaped is on fire. The burglars are apprehended and Madge accepts Mrs. Stone's invitation to remain as her companion.

Meanwhile Ray, advised of Madge's plan to lunch with Guy, searches everywhere for her. Seeing Guy leaving a cab, Ray attempts to force him to reveal Madge's whereabouts but he strikes the factory worker with his revolver butt. A reporter turns in the news that he is dead, which Madge reads and believes, but police take him to the emergency hospital where he recovers in a month's time. Going to Tom Ryan, Guy's father, Ray reveals the story but this kindly man replies that his worthless son has gone somewhere in the West, as he gives Ray money to continue the search. A year later, Madge, although telling Jack she can never really love anyone but Ray, agrees to marry her kind friend. Ray, now employed as bookkeeper for a mercantile house, wanders out to the house where Guy kidnapped Madge. In passing the village church he sees the girl as she leaves after the wedding ceremony with Jack. With bitter words, he turns swiftly away; sorrowfully, Madge boards a train with her husband, en route to a steamer bound for America. While on his way home, Ray encounters an elderly woman, on the point of death. He takes her to a hospital where she dies, requesting him to deliver papers to Tom Ryan. Madge's train is wrecked in passing over an open drawbridge and Jack instantly killed. Jim Lee takes the girl to the home of his Aunt Sally, planning to hold her for ransom, but she cuts away the shutters with a dinner knife and escapes by a rope made of twisted sheets. Mrs. Reed finds the girl outside her mansion and offers her home, after hearing her story and discovering that Mrs. Stone is dead.

When Ray delivers the letters to Tom Ryan they reveal that he is Tom's son, exchanged by Cora Jones, the nurse, for her daughter's child. Photgraphs and letters establish this, but his mother says she has always known it as she clasps the boy to her heart. Visiting Tom's sister, Mrs. Reed, they hear Madge's story, and Tom hastens to her, in the garden receiving her forgiveness. In Australia, Guy reads of Ray's good fortune and hastens to them, asking forgiveness and adding that he has known the truth since he was eighteen and bribed his grandmother to keep silent. In their great happiness all forgive and join in a song of thanks to God.

BOOM SHELL

Lessie Parrish Drama File No. 11630

FORCED out of their home because of inability to keep up their payments, the Wynnes, Grace and George, parentless twins, and their eccentric old grandfather, take shelter in a cave which they fix up decoratively. Grace inherits her grandfather's musical talent, and the old man takes pleasure in teaching her to play the violin. George, stretched out before their fire, adores listening to his sister play "Liebestraume." One day in a terrific storm, a young man, Peter Dale, takes shelter with them. He reveals he is an engineer, unemployed at present. The old grandfather, who devotes his life to a search for gold, invites Peter to remain on with them and Peter, captivated by Grace, agrees. In the days that follow Grace, Peter, and George become fast friends. One day the grandfather comes home elated over the discovery of a rich vein of gold. Peter induces him to remain at home that evening, because of the old man's hacking cough. However, the next morning, the distracted grandfather is unable to find any trace of his marker over the gold vein. Beside himself with grief and disappointment, he accuses Peter of having defrauded him. Peter leaves and when Grace returns from a shopping trip to the nearest town, she is appalled to learn that Peter, in disgrace, has left without a forwarding address. Years pass. George marches off to the Great War. During a bombardment he is struck by an exploding shell, captured by the enemy, and reported dead. He recovers, having, however, lost his memory. At last he returns to the states but unable to recall his past, he takes the name of Stanley Walsh and finds employment in the store of Henry Travell. He soon falls in love with his employer's daughter, Jane Travell, but withholds his feelings because he does not know who he is.

Meanwhile, through the years, the grandfather has continued his vain search for the hidden gold. Grace, now a splendid violinist gets an audition and plays over the radio. Her song, "Liebestraume" is heard by two people whose lives it influences. George, hearing the strains of the violin poignantly stroking out the song of love, feels the veils of darkness tearing from his memory. Suddenly he recalls the song, his sister, his grandfather, the cave, his entire life. Rejoicing he proceeds home establishes his identity and embracing Grace and his grandfather elatedly tells them about Jane. After a joyous period, he returns to bring Jane back as his bride. Grace, wandering alone in the forest suddenly stumbles and creates a small landslide. Meanwhile Peter, who has heard her song and her name announced has come back for her. The grandfather indicates that Grace is outside, and Peter, searching for her, rescues her from the landslide. However, as he is helping her out, he starts at sight of the gold, the grandfather's lost claim uncovered at last by Grace's slide. Once more there is happiness and the lost sign is found buried under a fallen tree. Cleared at last even in the grandfather's eyes, Peter asks for Grace's hand in marriage, and George finds happiness with Jane.

THE JEWEL OF FORTUNE

Mendel Pianko Drama File No. 11862

UPON the only son, David, the Dorfsman home in Poland rests its hopes. Meanwhile until he graduates, his father Simon makes trips to the towns in search of tailoring work, receiving his wage partly in goods. On such a journey, Simon is called on the road by a young half-drunken peasant, Petrushka. A rouble—but an entire one—insists Petrushka will buy his offering. Tolerantly, Simon resolves to see the prize first. Pulling from his pocket a peculiarly shaped, glassy, glittering stone, Petrushka pushes it to the Jew. A glance is enough to disclose the beauty of the stone. Gambling with fate, Simon completes the purchase. In the seclusion of the house, Simon anxiously shows the "glass" to his wife, Rechuma, and David. "This will make us rich or our horse will live on hay this week," declares Simon as the light beams are caught in the many facets. David suggests that a visit to Lazarus, an honest jeweler, will give the answer. A few moments later, the jeweler announces that the stone is the famous Koh-I-Noor, beyond the price of any purse. However, since legally all treasure belongs to the Czar there is a way of obtaining handsome recompense.

Following directions, the next Saturday finds David in St. Petersburg where the Czar and Czarina walk each week on the Nevsky Prospect where trinkets to catch the royal fancy are displayed. For those finding favor, liberal pay is assured. To attract attention, David set out only a small table draped with a fancy scarf. The Czar pauses in wondering curiosity at David's empty table. Presenting the jewel, David obediently bows to him. Overshadowing each gem in his collection, the appreciative Czar gives David a notice which orders the bearer to receive one hundred thousand roubles without questioning. "Present this to the Governor of the Imperial Bank!" The sign of the imperial seal immediately ushers David into the private sanotum of Governor Trepoff. With him is his daughter, Olga, a rebel against her father's aristocratic, prejudiced principles. In the few moments before Olga is ordered out, the world is transfigured for the two young people. Wordlessly, they have fallen in love. Shielded behind a heavy curtain, Olga is curious as to the nature of David's transaction. Governor Trepoff insists on knowing what David has given the Czar to receive so much. When David points out that the order does not permit him to answer, Trepoff reveals his dislike of Jews and calls this one "Nihilist." As David hotly demands his rights, his arrest is ordered. Together with many others, he is herded to Siberia—exiled into living death. Meanwhile Olga reproaches her father, declaring that his bigotry is an affront to God and that he and not the Davids are the real anarchists. She will not rest until she finds the cause of the Czar's order and intends to marry David. Sending a forged letter pretending that she is Trepoff, Olga inquires the nature of the crime from Seminoff, the warden. Suspecting romance, Seminoff learns David's story. Subsequently, the girl disguises herself as her lover and duplicates the original scene where the Czar purchased the jewel. Thinking "he" has another precious stone, the royal couple come to Olga who discloses David's fate and her love. Their sympathies aroused, the couple arrange a trip to Siberia with Olga and her father in their train. Inspecting the prisoners, the Czar orders David to appear and sends Olga to greet him. When Trepoff remonstrates, the Czar roundly scolds him, ordering him to permit the marriage or take David's place in chains. Swallowing his pride, Trepoff begs forgiveness which David grants. The palace resounds to the music of their wedding upon return.

DIVIDED BLAME

Mable Osbourn Drama File No. 11027

UNTIL the day she and Jack quarrel, Enid regards him as a brother. But when she sees him at school, and pride prevents her from speaking to him, she realizes that she loves Jack very dearly. At last he comes, pleading forgiveness, and in the sweetness of their first kiss, they confess their love for each other. Jack spends his savings to get Enid a ring, but her parents object because they are both too young, and only when the two youngsters promise not to get married for two years, do their elders permit them to see each other. With the promise of a brilliant career ahead of him, Jack wins a scholarship to an out-of-town colge, and at last leaves. The last night together, Jack and Enid walk together down the lane. A harvest moon hangs low and in each others arms they pledge eternal devotion.

The first weeks after Jack's departure are filled with loneliness and when Enid realizes she is going to have a child she writes to him. However, Jack's roommate, jealous of his winning a coveted honor, in a pique destroys the letter and then dares not confess what he has done. Unsuspecting, Jack writes Enid that his scholarship has been extended and that he is staying on at school. Enid believing this is Jack's only response to her plea, becomes embittered and too proud too write again, induces her people to let her visit Mrs. Grey, a friend of the family, lest those who love her suspect her condition. While at Mrs. Grey's Enid meets her son Ted, who falls deeply in love with her. Enid tries to avoid him as much as possible but finally he induces her to come to a country dance. On their return home, he stops the car and kisses her. Enid breaks away and when Ted questions her anxiously, she averts her face and tells him the whole story. To her surprise, he lifts her face and tells her it dosn't matter he loves her and wants to marry her. Enid shivers as he calls Jack a cad and a coward, but at length, yielding to Ted's importunities, Enid agrees to marry him and go West with him to live. The long tran ride makes her deathly sick, and Ted finds work on a ranch. Enid lives in constant terror of the screaming wind and the coyotes, but somehow the days drag by and at last her child is born. When at last she opens her eyes, she sees Ted's tortured face over her, and holding her close he tells her baby was born dead. Then one night Ted is lost in a great blizzard. Enid herself leads the searching party that finds him, but he lives only a few hours, thanking her for the happiness of having, for a while, been married to her, and urging her to find Jack, whom he knows she has always loved.

Widowed now, Enid returns to the East. One day she again meets Jack, and learns that, discovering she had married someone else, he had given up his studies, and settled down to be a farmer. Jack avoids Enid, but at last she tells him of the baby and of how good Ted had been to her, and Jack folds her in his arms. They are quietly married and the next day leave for the West. Two years later, a son is born to them, and thus they find, at last, peace and contentment.

Hildo Dejardin Drama File No. 12141

EDITH'S fingers spun lovingly over the globe that spelled adventure and the sea. All her life the sea has meant adventure and the heroes throughout the ages who have mastered the waves. Particularly was Argonaut who set sail for the golden fleece in old Grecian times her favorite. Her parents had their own ambitions for her future but Edith was determined to become a sailor even though she was a girl. These thoughts were still rushing through her mind when she wandered down the beach. Hearing panicky screams for help, Edith glimpsed a young Negro boy drowning at a point far from the safety line. No life guards were near the spot and the mother in an effort to save him had flung herself into the whirlpool. Young Edith, alone, risked her life to bring the two to safety. She refused the monetary reward from the admiring crowd but the papers throughout the nation praised her bravery and she was given a medal as the country's heroine of the year. Considering her a box office attraction, Charles Soloman, noted theater mogul, invited her to his home and offered her a substantial contract. His son, Alfred, 15, admired her greatly; later learning to love her, but Edith, a few months younger, said that they must wait to speak seriously until he had embarked on the legal career he planned and she followed the dreams she would not reveal. She saved enough from her tour to apply at a Naval Acadamy only to learn that men alone were accepted. So Edith decided to masquerade as a man and in that role met a youth in a speakeasy who, while drunk, revealed that he was entering a Naval Acadamy which he loathed. The girl bribed him to change identification papers and henceforth at the college was to be known as Robert. In a fit of despondency the real Robert killed himself so she had no fear of detection. Shrewdness helped her to evade discovery and during the years Robert was happy. The dreams seemed nearer to fulfillment. His close chum Daniel invited him to spend a vacation at his home. There Daniel's sister fell in love with the handsome cadet. In order to repulse her without revealing her secret, Robert insulted Daniel by assuming the role of a heavy, amorous drunkard while alone with the girl. Thenceforth, Daniel was Robert's bitter enemy. During these years, Alfred had not forgotten his young sweetheart and was determined to search the world until Edith is again his. At last Edith paced the deck, a naval officer on a merchant marine ship, Three Antillies, where he rose rapidly to second in command while Daniel rose to captaincy of the maiden ship, The Globe. On the first trip carrying a list of noted passengers including Soloman and his family, the ship ran into a furious storm; the calls for help being received by Robert's ship. Robert is forced to take command when his captain is injured and for a time he debates the problem of risking his own ship for the sake of others; but the memory of the little negro saved years before comes to mind. Taking command, Robert keeps the Globe afloat until the storm was abated but Captain Daniel who became reconciled begged him to continue command, while the ship turned back to New York for repairs. Wishing to reward Robert, Soloman offered him one of his theatrical houses and hoped he would marry his daughter, Emma. Then Robert in the presence of Alfred revealed the secret and became once more a woman, daughter of the sea, content to return to her lover's waiting arms.

THE TRUMPETS CALL

Minnie K. Lopez Short Subject File No. 11571

AN invalid, Leone Winthrop ignored the pity of her neighbor, Mrs. Linton, who thought the days must drag heavily for her. For alone, rich in imagination, she saw worlds of beauty closed to most. Mrs. Linton stole quietly out thinking that Leone was asleep when her eyes closed. Instead she had just finished an article on the disasterous fires which had claimed so many victims in tenement fires in the slums. Now Leone's thoughts drifted. She saw the wasted, unoccupied lands in cities, bleakly desolated. Then the Savior passed over and the earth which felt His presence became cultivated; the poor were given comfortable homes; dried up river beds opened and water flowed again. Tombstones that mark the graves of soldiers change into a field of blooming lillies and then transform again to little children clustered about the Savior who says softly, "Suffer little Children to come unto me—" Again shifts the scene. Leone saw the Savior reposing on a large chair, white doves flying overhead. A voice said, "Glory to God on high; peace on earth to men of good will." Slowly the picture dissolved while the choir could be faintly heard singing, "We're marching onward to Zion, the beautiful city of God." In bed early the next morning, Leone fell into a dream. She saw the life size painting of a saint and for a time was puzzled whether it was the Savior or St. Joseph. The picture appeared to move until she saw that it was the Savior sitting on a donkey. A voice declared, "He comes to redeem the world." Wondering, Leone thought He had redeemed it when crucified, but the voice answered, "He comes to redeem the world of much suffering." The alarm clock announced a new day and it was late afternoon when Leone was left to her dreams again. This time, Leone was on the sea shore with water and land level. In the center was a fountain spray and the playing water looked like snow flakes. Nearby stood the Savior with his robe over the water, trailing like a woman's dress. Came a voice calling, "Sea of Galalee."

Following her custom, Leone retreated one day into her usual morning silence. Not asleep, she sat facing the window. Through a cluster of clouds, the bust of a woman formed. One hand was raised toward heaven; in the other she held a speaking trumpet which she placed to her mouth, holding it downward to the earth. From the trumpet fell a glowing stream of light that touched the side of Leone's chair. The Savior appeared, nearing Leone, with the light passing through the center of his body while he stood half-way between the woman of the clouds and Leone. Later there was another dream. Leone was standing in a wooded park near an old fashioned boxed up well. Opposite stood the Savior and strains of music came from afar. Looking up, Leone saw a beautiful woman leaning from the sky, playing a harp. On the ground in direct line from the sky vision was a small naked child filling the world with glowing harmony from the violin.

So when Mrs. Linton called again and audibly wondered how Leone could bear the monotony of days, Leone only smiled as one cherishing a secret —recalling the wonders she had seen.

PURSUED

W. F. McSparran Drama File No. 11353

UNTIL Dick takes a "flyer" on the market and sells out more wisely than several million of his contemporaries, his life is free of feminine companionship and all their attendant problems. He returns to his mother's farm and works as hard as any hired man. Gossip quickly spreads of his added income and very soon the neighbors have it placed at an exorbitant figure. Laura is an old friend of the family. She becomes imbued with newly invigorated interest in Mrs. Hopwell's visitor. Invited to dinner one day, she demurs at returning home in the dark. His unsuspecting mother suggests Dick take her home. Remarking on the beauty of the night, Laura suggests they walk. Moonlight has an intoxicating effect on the senses so the wary bachelor pleads an errand which necessitates driving full speed to the village. The next day he is out repairing the fence in a particularly choice spot of nature. Someone approaches. Looking up he sees Lydia, a still-young interesting widow. She apologizes prettily for trespassing on his land. In the midst of a poetic outburst on nature, Laura slips down the mossy bank, offering an excellent view of her undeniably pretty knees and legs. Even the careful Dick feels a wild impulse to kiss her which he manages to restrain. He decides it is safer to keep out of her way. The following week he attends a Grange meeting. Lydia is seated in an opposite corner with the other women. She looks far more attractive and has an air of knowing it also. Nearby is Laura who bee-lines for him when the meeting is over. Less obtrusively and yet with almost equal quickness, Lydia follows. Both are counting upon Dick to see them home. An equally interested audience is awaiting his choice. Dick has already provided for this contingency. He says, "Joe Trout and I will see you home together if you'll allow us the pleasure. The walk is a silent, abruptly terminated one. For some days the horizon is clear of women and Dick is contentedly working in the garden. A car with a chauffeur drives up and a smartly dressed woman, Edith Drake, asks if this is the Hopwell farm. She wants to buy some fancy bred chickens. Against her charms, even Lydia appears faded. When Edith decides to return on Thursday to complete the deal, his customary peaceful evenings are disturbed by pipe smoke which insists on curling into a hazy image of her face. The afternoon drags. He almost gives up hope of her coming. Dick's face glows when he hears the purring motor around the bend. Gawky as a schoolboy he murmurs, "I'd like to sometimes," when she invites him to her home. Disgusted with himself he returns to the corn field. A moment later, Dick is furious at the sight of an awkwardly descending plane making a forced landing on a thriving corn patch. His angry words are checked when the emerging youth turns out to be a girl. Mrs. Hopwell invites her to dinner which the girl's conversational flow makes merry. Irene lives nearby and she insists that he meet her father when he escorts her home. Soon Dick is aghast when he meets her aunt and discovers she is Edith. In his confusion he pretends not to know her. Irene gives him a "goodnight" kiss for his mother, leaving him anxious for more. The next day Irene returns with the mechanic. "Why didn't you tell me you know Aunt Edith?" she taxes. Shamefacedly, he relates his feminine woes. Just then he catches sight of Lydia and Laura approaching. "Quick, will you marry me?" asks Dick. As the two near, Irene is already tightly in her fiance's embrace.

MATCH GIRL

Mrs. R. Lang Drama File No. 11622

SCRUB—scrub—the brush of the small girl who in her kneeling position seemed even tinier cleansed an ever larging circle of Mrs. Bloom's kitchen floor. "Won't your mother be worried?" questioned Mrs. Bloom anxiously, again. "No, mam," lied the girl intent on her work, knowing how much the extra money would mean. The brush never slacking, disjointed pictures flashed through her mind —the years before her father's illness when they lived on the farm and she had been the mischievous ring leader of the large family. She chuckled when she thought of the time she had marshalled a 'wedding party" with the aid of the house curtains and using the chicken coop for a "church." And only a little while later, they were suddenly transported to Chicago. When she found her mother crying one evening, it was Elsie's first step out of childhood. She decided to find a useful household article to sell. Day after day she trudged the stairs of apartment houses with her boxes of matches. Today there was not enough income so she stayed out of school and persuaded a housewife to hire her. Her mother was almost frantic when Elsie returned but the girl persisted in working. Several years later found Elsie holding a good position as cook. Romance was a thing of story books until at a dance sponsored by the church, she met Dmitri, a young Russian, who had been here only a few years. With glowing promises he wooed her only to bring Elsie, now his wife, into a home that was more a shack. The intimacy of marriage soon disillusioned her as she realized that she had married a man suffering from a chronic illness who in accordance with European peasant notions expected his wife to support him. Once more, hiding it from her family, Elsie returned to washing for others, finding comfort in the coming of her child. Only her religion kept her from deserting her husband when he took the money she had so carefully saved for the child. Death was near her the night her daughter was born. Determined that her child should not suffer Elsie resumed work but determined to increase her income. Discovering that she had a flair for cutting dress patterns she found a small market for them. One day while washing her clothes, she was suddenly struck with the conception of inventing a steamless wash boiler. While her husband scoffed, she spent her evenings working on this. A client became interested and told her of Tom Darrow, a patent attorney. The sincerity and sweetness of the woman who was still scarcely more than a girl impressed the man who from his own pocket financed the patent process. Knowing that Dmitri was going with other women, Darrow tried to persuade her to divorce him. One night she returned to find him gone and she was bearing his second child. A large company became interested in Elsie's invention. Darrow and the representative had an appointment at Elsie's home. While a check was being presented to her, Dmitri entered, saying nothing but watching the proceedings. After the men left, Dmitri tried to wrest the check from her. When Elsie resisted, he knocked her down. Darrow, who had feared this, waiting outside, entered and forced him out of the house before racing her to the hospital in his car. Hours later when he was admitted, Elsie suddenly realized that through Darrow new roads to happiness were opened.

WILD CAT ISLAND

Alice Irwin Drama File No. 11685

THE snake infested, swampy island on which Irene is born early takes toll of her mother's life and gives her father a tuberculosis from which he dies before she is eight. With a fortune of twenty-six hundred dollars in trust for her when she reaches her majority, little Irene remains utterly lonely and bewildered. She is given shelter in the home of her uncle Luke, her father's brother, but from the moment that Uncle Lew takes as his housekeeper the coarse, sensual Fay Foster, Irene's life becomes a nightmare. Sensitive, impressionable, Irene's nights are made horrible by the stealthy whispering of Fay and Uncle Lew, and the pattering of bare feet across the halls. It is Fay who teaches Uncle Lew to drink, and in his drunken rages, Irene is brutally beaten. Then comes the only bit of happiness in Irene's life. She meets Jack, like herself a serious, intelligent lad. Woefully ignorant of life, these two children cling together finding in each other's company release from the ugliness of the life about them. However, Jack's family moves from the vicinity, and clinging to each other, the youngsters kiss each other goodbye. That first kiss stirs Irene as nothing else in her life has done. Thereafter life at home is more unbearable than ever. Fay has a child but it dies within two days. The neighbors sneer and gossip and in a drunken fit, Lew defiantly hails Fay down to the minister and marries her. Whereas heretofore Fay has been guarded in her resentment of the young girl, now she takes every possible opportunity to make Lew hate her. Fay complains constantly that Irene who works hard in the fields all day, shirks and Lew, believing, belabors Irene inhumanly until her shoulders are marked with his blows. It is then, when her life is a nightmare, that Irene meets Jasper. Instinctively she shrinks from his eager caresses, but at length, when he asks her to marry him, her eyes fill with tears at the thought that at last she can belong to somebody who will love her. Utterly innocent of life, she consents to the marriage. On the way home from the ceremony, Jasper pauses in the road to cast a stone at a bird nest. Choking with horror, Irene sees him kill a mother bird and her little ones. When Jasper lays brutal hands on her, Irene struggles desperately. Their wedding night is a travesty and Jasper, after a short attempt to be kindly to her, takes to drink and curses her because her fortune, for which he married her, is tied up until she comes of age. Five times they separate, but each time Irene, regarding marriage as something holy and imperishable, consents to put up with the brutalities of her husband. Then one night, drunk, he seizes his shot gun and chases her from the house. Tripping and stumbling, Irene crawls through the swamp, arriving exhausted at her nearest neighbors. She is given shelter for the night. The next day she leaves for the city. There she finally finds work with a kindly old couple. For the first time she sees what civilized living can be. Jasper divorces her for desertion, but Irene is happy, for she has found once again Jack, whom she has loved as a child, and with him, at last, Irene is to find happiness beyond the dreams of her youth.

SHATTERED LOVE

Nettie I. Hunt Drama File No. 11153

UNTIL the death of his father, young Lord Harrington leads the normal carefree life of a member of the Britsh upper-class. When he takes over the estates, he finds them heavily indebted but his sentimental attachment for his family home will not permit the land to be sold. Helen Ralston, a newly rich American widow, comes to London seeking a husband with a title. At a house party she meets Harrington and by discreet inquiry learns that he is unmarried and in financial difficulty. Knowing that Harrington is not the typical fortune hunter, she sets out first to attract him, and later hold him permanently through her purse strings. Harrington, unsophisticated, is taken in by the older woman, but when friends assume that he is solely attracted by her money determines to leave her. Helen begs him to spend one last evening with her, dining at her apartment. There, she grows hysterical in the middle of a conversation and confesses her love for him. Harrington feels himself a brutal coward and asks her to marry him. At a weekend party at his estate, they plan to formally announce the engagement during the height of the evenings gaety. While strolling alone in the garden, Harrington meets Mary Ellen, who is attending the affair with Harrington's old school friend. During their few minutes together, he learns that she is in modest circumstances, is charming in moonlight, and has a gay laugh. Reluctantly he returns to the house where Helen chides him for his absence, raising her eyebrows questioningly as he presents her to Mary Ellen. Somehow, he feels reluctant when Helen rings for silence and calls on Lord Harrington to break the tidings. As soon as possible, Harrington breaks away to find Mary Ellen who has fled to her room. "It is mad to feel so attracted when I've seen her only once," he soliloquizes. But afraid of further outbursts, he persuades the gratified Helen to push the marriage forward. Though he protests, Helen spends money on the estate with a lavish hand; each new improvement binding him that much tighter to her. Not until six months pass and Harrington is a three-months-bridegroom, does he meet Mary Ellen again, in a little tea shop which she has opened in a fashionable shopping district. Harrington feels ashamed of himself when he thinks that without his wife's money he would be worthless, and determines to find some kind of work. He begins to make a habit of dropping into the comforting, restful tea room. Helen learns of this and her jealousy is aroused; angrily she forbids him to go there. Harrington informs her that though she may have claim on his estates, her money has not bought his body. Afraid that she is driving him too far, Helen apologizes and they make an effort to act as if the words were never said. But when Harrington starts work on an invention and is not free to be with his wife several evenings of the week, Helen grows suspicious, convinced that he is spending his time with Mary. One afternoon she trails Harrington to the tearoom; and violently assails the girl. Almost mad with rage and not quite sane, she pulls out a pistol and before Harrington can intervene shoots Mary and flees. Certain that Mary is dead, Helen packs her trunks and takes the first departing American boat. Fortunately, it is only a scalp wound; a year later Harrington obtains a divorce. On his next visit to the teashop, he tells Mary Ellen of the love he has been too honorable to voice before now.

HOMETOWN

Arthur Henshaw, Jr. Drama File No. 11834

ASSISTING his fiancee, Ann Grey, as she alights from the train, Daniel Lindsay surveys the sleepy southern hamlet where he was born, so paradoxically named Swift Creek. He awakens a negro who directs him to the home of Jennie Wayne, and as Ann delightedly observes this part of the country, so different from the East, memory carries Dan back to his boyhood days.

He recalls the summer morning when he saw Jennie Wayne washing her uncle's grimy overalls in the little stream that divided the town socially. She lived in the poor white section; her dresses were handed down from her Aunt Marthy, ragged and patched, but they could not conceal the perfection of her youthful figure. When she ducked under water for a piece of soap the boy could not help laughing, but seeing her confusion he quickly apologized and rescued the lost article, at last persuading the girl to meet him again since her relatives would not permit him to call. There followed several poignantly sweet hours together. Dan lived on the socially acceptable side of the creek but his miserably parents and detestable Uncle Jacob deprived him of the youthful pleasures that were his right. Only with Jennie did he find real happiness and, overworked and unwanted at her home, the girl, too, found ecstacy in his arms. When Dan persuaded Jennie to attend a high school play with him, taking his mother's wedding dress for her to wear, the girl was in seventh heaven, but Uncle Jacob, who had witnessed the innocent theft, reported to Dan's parents. They waited outside the schoolhouse, and when Dan's mother viciously struck Jennie, he slapped her lightly and followed the weeping girl into the woods. Dan painted a picture of their meeting place which Jennie persuaded him to send to a contest; a short time later he delightedly informed her that he had won five hundred dollars and a New York scholarship. That evening Dan saw his home burning and rushed into it, but was too late to save his parents. Dr. Kennedy nursed him back to health. When he accused his uncle of murdering his parents to collect their insurance the older man, admitting that it was true, attempted to kill him with a poker, but Dr. Kennedy, who had come to arrest Jacob for the rape and murder of a negro girl, stopped him at the point of his pistol. Sending Jennie a tender letter of farewell, Dan, now cynical and hardened, left for New York. There followed years of hard study during which he wrote and sent money to Jennie but did not hear from her.

Ann Grey and her father, a wealthy financier, called at the young artist's studio, commissioning him to paint the girl's picture. Her down payment of twenty dollars enabled him to take her to lunch; she confessed that her real reason for calling was that she wanted to meet Dan. Soon she persuaded him to call at her home. Weeks passed, and Dan, telling her his life story, confessed that he loved her; she replied that she had cared from the first. With Mr. Grey's help, Dan sailed for Vienna, to study art, accompanied by father and daughter who eventually left him there. Returning, a famous artist, Dan received a message from Jennie; "Come at once." Outside her home he hear negroes chanting and hastened to where she lay, dying.

He learned that Jennie had a child, named Danny Boy, after him. Forced to work in the fields while her relatives kept Dan's money, Jennie sent for him only for his son's sake. As Jennie dies in Dan's arms, Ann promises to be a mother to the little fellow. Before he leaves Dan settles with Uncle Hiram while Ann cheers. Years later, London art critics admire the painting of "Jennie" by Daniel Lindsay, regretting that it cannot be purchased at any price.

TO THE GALLANT!

Anna Gates Drama File No. 9293

IF Fred Hill resented Ann's choice of Jim, one of the sales managers, for a bridegroom rather than her employer, he didn't show it at the party he made for the newlyweds in the office. And when Ann informed him that she was giving up her position, Fred accepted her resignation, pressed a thousand dollar check upon her despite her protests, and told her that the position would always be open to her if she ever wanted to return. Jim objected to the check. It was too large. But Ann, although herself upset about it, advised him to let the matter rest without further discussion. After all they had both been his employees.

Several years passed. Fred's affluence constantly increased while Jim, working long hours found his salary scarcely adequate to provide for the little fellow. However, when he came up the drive and kissed Ann and pulled Jimmy on his knee, everything else was forgotten. Once Jimmy asked his father to sing to him, and from the moment Jim first sang, "Little Boy of Mine," which he had just written, Jimmy was insatiable in his demands for more, and Ann, smiling upon the two, exclaimed their happiness seemed too perfect to last. Then, one night, when Jim was driving up to Fred's place in answer to a call, he was stopped on the road by two prohibition agents. Despite his plea of innocence, the officer testified that the liquor had been found in the car and that they had seen the same suspicious car driven by frequently. Fred, on the witness stand testified for Jim in such a way as to make the jury feel he was shielding knowledge about his employee and Jim was sentenced to six months in jail. Ann wept a little and tried to assure him six months wasn't terribly long, but as Jim sang for the last time Jimmy's song, his voice broke.

Everyone seemed convinced of Jim's innocence and very kind to him, but Jim couldn't bear the thought of Ann working again. When she came to see him deep rings under her eyes broke his heart, and then the next time she was supposed to come Jimmy was sick and she couldn't get away. Then men from the office visited and each of them seemed troubled by the fact that Ann was working overtime every night. Ann explained that Fred was a perfect gentleman, but seeds of doubt had been planted and when Fred kept Ann so that she was a few minutes late when Jim was freed from jail, Jim believing the story the bookkeeper, fearful of losing his job, told, went away alone and wrote Ann that he hoped she'd be very happy without him. Jim managed to get his chance on a radio broadcast, and when he learned that Jimmy had been run over following a man he thought was his daddy, Jim sent money to the doctors under a pledge of secrecy. Ann, inconsolable, suspected the money might have come from Jim, but Fred told her he had been paying her bills and asked her to marry him. It was Jim's voice over the radio that saved Ann, and Jim's voice that made the paralysed Jimmy talk. Ann phoned the broadcasting studio and begged the tenor to repeat the number, in the hope that her little boy might as miraculously recover the use of his legs, but Jim, coming in person, held out his arms to the little fellow who rushed into them and on Christmas Day, all misunderstandings were cleared up, as the bookkeeper, frenzied by his employer's incessant, soul-destroying demands, killed Fred in self-defense, revealing that Fred had bribed the cops. Jim's name was cleared and happiness again came to the little family.

DELIVERANCE

M. G. Fuller Drama File No. 11301

"THIS," Joan's father was saying, "is your new stepmother." Looking into the beautiful eyes of the girl, only a few years older than herself, Joan shivered involuntarily. From the first Grace was to prove harsh and resentful of Joan at every step. Joan's heart ached when she realized that Grace was seeing other men and lying to her father, but fearful of Grace's threats and realizing that her father wouldn't believe her anyhow, Joan said nothing. Then one day Grace ran off with another man. In a hotel some miles from town, she registered with Bill as man and wife. However, the house detective broke in on them. Through bribery Grace was able to escape without giving her proper name, and returning home to her husband, Grace lied that she had been on a shopping trip and her sister's car had broken down. However, Jerry, a former admirer of Grace's learned of the escapade, and on the threat of exposing all to William, her husband, extorted small sums of money from Grace regularly. Grace began to grow desperate. Then one day Jerry saw Grace with her stepdaughter Joan. From that instant on Jerry determined that he must have the girl. When he enlisted Graee's aid, she turned from him as though he were insane, but when he promised to go away and never bother her again, Grace reconsidered. Accordingly when she learned that Joan was all excited about the expected return to town of Carl, Joan's schoolday sweetheart, Grace informed her stepdaughter that Jerry was giving a birthday party in Joan's honor. Distrusting Jerry, Joan explained briefly that she couldn't accept, but Grace persuaded her that Jerry had already invited Carl as well as Sybil and Earl, Joan's closest friends. At last, in the clothes that Grace had insisted on getting for her, Joan came up the steps of Jerry's home, eager to meet Carl. At first she believed she was the first to arrive. Then Jerry took her in a vise-like grip. An hour later, bruised and filled with horror, Joan managed to escape. Feeling soiled and unable to face anybody, Joan ran toward the station, only to see the train pull out. Sobbing, Joan stood forlornly looking after it. Suddenly a tall young man asked if he could help. Beside herself with disappointment, Joan told him she had missed the train, and when he learned that she was going only fifty miles away, he offered to drive her there in his car. Joan was to find that he was Allen Townsley and that he knew her grandparents well. At her grandmother's home, Joan was received with open arms, and her story told, her grandparents refused indignantly to let her return to Grace and her father, whose infatuation to his young wife blinded him to everything else.

Again and again Allen was to come to see Joan and as the days passed they were to fall deeply in love with each other. The shadow of the night at Jerry's apartment, however, was to mar Joan's happiness even as she realized she had never loved Carl as she did Allen. Then one night Allen asked her to marry him. Straining away from him, Joan poured out her story. Allen stopped her words and told her he knew. Joan's grandmother had told him and he had gone after Jerry himself and beaten him up severely. William was to discover Grace's duplicity at last, and Joan to find happiness beyond words with Allen.

UNGUARDED MOMENTS

M. Ayala Drama File No. 11847

WHEN Mr. Wagner sees his son, Robert, assisting a cripple across the street and giving him money he reprimands the boy for wasting time on people whom he considers beneath him. Robert's mother and older sister, Anne, interested only in climbing the social ladder, agree with this superficial viewpoint but Amanda, the youngest, congratulates her brother. Harassed by his father because he will not marry a wealthy widow, Robert drinks heavily, until Mr. Wagner orders him to leave home, offering him money which he refuses. Embracing Amanda tenderly he bids farewell to her. After wandering along the sea shore, happy in his new freedom, he goes to a village. While on his way to the Armstrong mines he repairs a car for Rosalie, daughter of the mine owner, and prevents bandits from taking her jewels. As a reward, her father gives Robert a position as his secretary. Amanda, weeping when she sees her brother's empty chair, leaves home in search of him. When she drops her handkerchief, Victor, a young lawyer, picks it up, introducing himself. Eventually she tells him her story. He persuades her to remain at his parents' home where she is warmly welcomed, until she hears definitely from her brother.

Robert, driving by a mountain stream, frightens Christine, a pretty girl drawing water. Apologizing, he fills her pail for her, and carries it to her simple cottage where she presents him to Isabel, her mother. In time Isabel, realizing that Robert is a true friend, tells him her story. When Mr. Armstrong gave her father a position in the mine as superintendent she was forced to leave college. Shortly after that her mother died and a few months later her father was killed in an explosion. While alone in the house, Mr. Armstrong entered and, under the influence of liquor, attacked her. Her daughter, Christine, was born; for the girl's sake the mother was forced to remain silent at Mr. Armstrong's warning. Deeply touched, Robert gives Isabel a sum of money, promising to help her if he can. When he questions Rosalie she replies that she knows nothing of the story. And when she, in turn, questions her father he orders Robert to have Isahel and Christine move from his property. With his own money, Robert rents a nice home for them a short distance away, telling them nothing of Mr. Armstrong's command. Impulsively Robert takes Rosalie in his arms, kissing her. They become engaged until Rosalie learns that he is supporting Isabel and Christine. Then he tells her the story of her father's wrong.

Meanwhile Amanda becomes the wife of Victor Pittman. Her parents lose their fortune in the market; when Victor, not realizing their identity, calls to force payment of a debt from Mr. Wagner he lends him money, touched by his plight. Eventually Victor appoints Mr. Wagner manager of the Paradise Inn, a pleasure resort, which he has recently purchased. When Mr. Armstrong asks for a new maid Robert sends Christine to fulfill this mission, giving her the name of Dorothy. Rosalie embracing the girl when they are alone, promises to be a real sister to her. Shortly after this, Victor calls at Robert's office to arrange for the sale of property which Mr. Armstrong has purchased through the lawyer. Seeing a picture which resembles Amanda in Victor's cigarette case, Robert calls at his home with Rosalie, but his sister has just left, to search for him. They overtake her at the railroad station, celebrating the reunion with a trip to the Paradise Club where they are introduced to the manager—Mr. Wagner. Joyfully, the rest of the family are summoned, all differences forgotten as they embrace. Mr. Armstrong requests Robert to persuade Dorothy's mother to give ner consent to his marriage with the girl which he agrees to do provided he may wed Rosalie. A double ceremony is planned; Rosalie and Robert are wedded, but Mr. Armstrong discovers his bride is to be Isabel. A changed man, he is glad to right his wrong to this splendid woman and welcome Christine as a daughter rather than a wife. Guests celebrate the event wth dancing and song.

CASTLES IN THE AIR

Eva Brunk Drama File No. 11349

A MUCH begrimed child, happily playing in a muddy puddle of water, Kathy Martens does not notice the automobile that draws up barely an inch away with sharp scraping brakes. Rushing out, Mrs. Martens snatches Kathy and angrily scolds the child to relieve her sudden fright. Meanwhile Mrs. Chester steps from the car. As the women begin their apologies simultaneously they recognize each other as former neighbors. It is quite evident that the past few years have dealt more generously with Mrs. Chester. The other woman reveals that since her husband's desertion, she turns to every menial work to support herself and the child. Inside the car, her face eagerly pressed to the window, is Margaret Chester, a slightly older girl, and to Kathy's fascinated gaze, the loveliest princess of any fairy tale. Noting the eager exchanges, Mrs. Chester arranges to have Kathy attend Margaret's Sunday school class. The mother hurries back to finish her ironing order and Kathy contentedly returns to the steps. Her mind is a riot of remembered bits of fairy tales. She visualizes herself as a beggar maid to whom someday the prince must come by all the laws of storybook land. With Mrs. Chester's assistance, the next few years are easier. The two children become fast friends. Kathy is acquiring wisdom, she no longer waits each day expectantly for Prince Charming. On rainy afternoons, indoors the girls spin aloud their castles in the air. When Mrs. Martens dies, Margaret begs her mother to take Kathy into their own home. Kathy prepares for teaching and becomes the preceptor in a small community school. Walking with the smaller children at recess, Kathy is startled when she hears a man's voice. Dick Curtis is evidently troubled with a balky car. Hearing the children he looks up and at the amused glance of Kathy, stammers a blushing apology. She sends some boys to the schoolhouse for water, and as they wait Dick, intrigued at finding such unexpected brunette loveliness teaching here, tells her so. The confused girl is glad when the bell rings. Only afterwards does she realize she has forgotten to ask his name though he promised to return. The Chesters are holding a Charity Ball and Kathy is asked to sing. Entering the hallroom, she sees Dick with Margaret who introduces him as an intimate friend at college. Dick remembers Kathy and on a garden bench later they resume the terminated conversation of their first meeting. When he leaves, he asks permission to take her riding someday. That night Kathy is troubled. Her childish fancies are coming true, she finds the man she loves, but she is sure that Margaret cares for him also. And no man could resist Margaret's fairness. Days pass and she hears nothing from him directly, except from her friend's letters telling of dances Dick has escorted her to. So when Dick drives up to the school yard one day, Kathy at first fears something has happened to the Chesters. They drive to a country inn for dinner that night and it is two o'clock before they head homewards. His kiss as they leave seals her love. Unable to face him again, she pleads illness at school and goes off to the Chester home to decide in solitude what her future steps must be. The doorbell rings. A moment later she is in Dick's arms. Trembling she asks of Margaret, only to learn that she really cares for a fraternity brother. Just before he kisses her again, Kathy murmurs, "And they lived happily ever after."

PIRATE GOLD

F. Scott Cushman Drama File No. 11829

SHE was Black Beard's greatest prize and the one woman who repeatedly rejected the noted pirate's advances. Lolito, a lovely Spanish girl engaged to Seville, her childhood playmate, had been captured while on board a craft with friends bound for a visit to the rich wilderness of Georgia of two centuries ago. Disregarding the pleas of her shipmates, the pirate sped them on and turned to feast his eyes on the woman of his dreams—the one most worthy of the elaborate stateroom he had prepared in anticipation. Unable to believe that her rejections could long withstand his manly charms, the pirate was content to wait. Meanwhile, Portu, a Portugal gentleman, who captured by Black Beard months before resigned himself to the fates and joined the robber-band, resolved to help her escape. And Nubby, the peg-leg pirate, agreed to protect her also. A little island was the pirate headquarters while the ship and equipment were overhauled. Daily Black Beard's passion grew until he was almost beside himself when again she resisted him. Only the pride which would not permit him to force a woman into his arms held him from forcibly taking Lolita. Desperate, one day he took her to his quarters and spread before her the treasures his pirate life had gleaned. When she still remained unimpressed, he confided there was a secret spot where this treasure was to be hidden.

Lolita later stumbled upon the pirate and his most trusted men in the act of hiding the wealth; not realizing that Black Beard glimpsed her, sealing her doom, because her knowledge made her dangerous. She was placed under guard while the pirates went to fight the Spaniards led by Seville determined to rescue Lolita. Again Black Beard triumphed! Returned to the island, he set a night for Lolita's murder. Portu and Nubby hid near the scene of the proposed crime. Unconscious of prying eyes, Lolita cast off her garments and broke into a self-created dance of marvelous grace and rhythm, singing meanwhile a ballad which was to haunt the master-pirate thereafter. No! He could not have this beautiful body destroyed; Black Beard signalled the assassin to desist. The services of her friends were no longer necessary. The unsuspecting girl charmed the approaching assassin and the waiting chief with the melody and dance she had originated. Even Black Beard put aside the thought of destroying Lolita and once again determined to make her his wife. The camp location was changed when malaria made it unhealthful. When Black Beard left to investigate the presence of two strange ships so close to his own waters, Portu and Nubby succeeded in remaining behind. Under the cover of darkness they escaped with Lolita. The chief was a man insane when he learned their escape and began relentless pursuit. Friendly Indians at last helped the trio reach safety barring the path to Black Beard. At beautiful Lewis Creek they camped, Lolita, now joined by two bear cubs she made into pets. A pirate battle nearby warned them that they must continue until at last they came to a spot where Lolita, sunning in the tree house built for her, was to be known as the Cypress Queen. Nubby who had confessed his love only to be gently refused resumed his old role of friendship. Portu's gift with the guitar and Lolita's graceful dances made fast friends of the neighboring Indian tribe which so successfully drove away Black Beard who had once again traced them that he disappeared at last. Rescue was to come finally in the person of Felton, wealthy young English sportsman who had ordered his yacht to nearby waters for hunting. Madly, he also succumbed to her charms; while Nubby consoled himself with Etta, the maid of Felton's aunt, Rowena, who had joined the trip for her health. And Portu was to slowly lose his heart to her. The time at last came when Lolita was reunited with Seville and Felton consoled himself, as she had secretly hoped, with her sister. The church bells rang to the sound of many weddings; while Lolita rejoiced also that part of the pirate's gold which they had taken with them was to be used to restore the fortunes of the families who had suffered losses in their valiant effort to save Lolita from Black Beard who was now only an ugly shadow of the past.

WHILE WOMEN WAIT

Peggie Lee True Story File No. 11901

DENIED many of the pleasures of girlhood by her strict father, Peg dreams of romance as she rides through the fields surrounding her parent's farm. As she stops to give her horse a drink in the cool waters of a spring, George Martin, a recent settler in the community, rides to her and introduces himself. Attracted by this young man's pleasing appearance, the lonely girl eagerly talks to him. That evening at the dinner table she timidly tells her father that a young man wishes to call on her, but he sternly forbids this. Clandestinely, the two meet for long rides and hikes in the country. When Peg's father is away on a business trip she allows George to visit her; returning unexpectedly, her irate parent orders George away from the house and reprimands Peg. The next day, when she meets George at their appointed spot in the fields he takes her in his arms, kissing her. When he begs her to become his wife, the girl consents. The following week they elope together, selecting a tiny cottage. At the conclusion of his day's work with the railroad company, George helps Peg dry the dishes. Happily she learns the fine points of housekeeping, making dainty curtains and cushions for the little home. The next year Jean, their little daughter is born, and Peg finds new happiness in caring for the baby. Two years after this the couple are blessed with a son, Don. Eager to give her children the pleasures she was denied, Peg plans parties for them as they grow older, and assists them with their studies in the evening. Determined that they shall have the best education possible, Peg unselfishly saves every cent toward the day when the children will be of college age. She is heartbroken when Jean runs away, at eighteen, to become the wife of a local boy, but remembering her own youthful marriage, gives the couple her blessing. While attending college, Don becomes interested in Gloria, daughter of a manufacturer. Ignoring all his mother's dreams for him, for which she has made many sacrifices, the boy marries this daughter of society at the end of his sophomore year, wiring the news to Peg. When she receives the telegram, the devoted mother cannot hold back bitter tears of disappointment that both her children are gone from her and have so completely failed to carry out her high hopes for them. Alone once more with George, she attempts to conceal her loneliness for his sake, living for the days when her boy and girl visit her, or she briefly spends time with them. Spoiled and snobbish, Don's wife is unkind to his mother, and prejudices the boy against her. Years of hard work and little money have left their mark; Peg is unused to spending her days in playing bridge and is unhappy at Gloria's criticisms, although she tries to win her love and will not oriticize her to Don.

Transferred and given a better position, George takes Peg to another city. Here she misses her friends and neighbors, but unselfishly tries to make the best of things. The depression deprives George of his position. Unable to stay with Peg and see her suffer for want of money he leaves, to try to make his fortune elsewhere. Peg, in despair, gives up all hope, but when Jean asks her to come as she is ill, the unselfish mother forgets her own troubles as she takes charge of the household. Don, too, writes, saying he wants his mother to visit, and realizing that she is still needed, Peg finds the courage to await George's return for the sake of her children.

THE BACHELOR BAKER

Lee Marley Drama File No. 11656

UNTIL the days of the depression, Walter Sherman had held a position as a baker. Although his earnings had never been very great, he had held on to his job, fearing to give up the security of his present steady income while his ailing mother required constant medical attention. However, during his spare time he read everything he could get hold of on advertising, a field which fascinated him. With the hard times of 1929, however, Walter suffered a salary cut. Unwilling to deprive his mother of her growing need for expensive medicines and delicacies, Walter shivered through the winter without a heavy coat. At length he came down with disease. Weeks of wracking coughing and fever, and at last, thin, pinched of face, Walter returned to his position only to find another man in his place. "I'm sorry, but you know how times are," he was told.

Months of pavement pounding began. Everywhere the answer was the same. "We're not taking men on these days." Despair clutched at his heart, and at home his mother suffered pitifully. In vain Walter offered himself for any kind of work, any remuneration. Now his cough was worse, his clothes shabby, and the outlook for getting a job was bleak. At last, he gave in to his mother's cry that he let her call the welfare society. When the investigator came, Walter locked himself in his room, unable to face her. Time passed, however, and with the realization that the fire had probably gone out, Walter entered the room to rekindle the hearth fire. As he looked into the lovely, sympathetic face of Jean Taylor, a feeling of shame overcame him. She promised to report favorably on their case, but as she reached the bottom step, Jean's ankle twisted, and crying out sharply in pain, the girl sank to the walls. Instantly Walter was at her side, expertly bandaging the swelling ankle, and offering to drive her home. On the way, she sounded him on his ability, his ambitions. Thoughtfully she heard him explain about his advertising studies, and explained that her father might be able to give him work. It was a new Walter who, a week later, started at a pittance in a new job. With a prodigious energy, the young man worked at his copy, long hours into the night. Within a short time his work was attracting notice. He was given an opportunity to write one of the smaller ads for the firm. Not only the sponsors but the public responded enthusiastically. Encouraged, Walter tackled the job of advertising a new bread. Drawing on his own experience, he turned out a copy that soon placed the product among the foremost in the nation. The sponsors supplied more capital for advertising, and Walter was promoted to an executive position. Meanwhile Jean was watching his progress. Once she invited him to a dance at her home. Walter struggled against the desire to tell her of his love, before, but now with his future assured, his mother comfortably provided for, and his love for Jean stronger than ever, he cast his fears aside, and a new man, born of success, asked the adoring Jean to be his wife.

AHAB—KING OF ISRAEL

Mrs. Kate Paslay Religious Drama File No. 11952

AFTER the evil reign of Omri, which ended in the year 910 B. C. Ahab, his son is made King of Israel. The coronation takes place with much pomp and ceremony in the ancient city of Samaria, capitol of Israel. Among those present at the festivities is Obadiah, a devout worshipper of Jehovah, who serves Ahab. The king Ahab commits a grave sin by taking a wife from among the heathens namely Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, king of Zidonians, thereby introducing idoltry into the kingdom and provoking the wrath of the Lord God Jehovah. She is very beautiful and clever, and soon wins the confidence of the king, and becomes his favorite wife. He now becomes a puppet in her hands. She persuades him to build an altar to her god, Baal, a god of licentiousness, and soon this becomes the general religion of the tribes of the kingdom of Israel. Elijah appears, a prophet of God, prophesying a three year draught inflioted upon the people by God. This is to be their punishment for turning to idoltry. His hair falls thickly down his back, he is clothed with a girdle about his loins which he tightens when he is about to move quickly. A mantle sometimes hangs from his shoulders. To save Elijah from Ahab's wrath, Jehovah tells him to hide by the brook Cherith; the ravens will feed him there. The brook goes dry. Jehovah tells him that he shall go to Zarepath in Zidon and dwell there, and that a widow woman will sustain him. This he does and he is miraculously fed. Her son dies and she asks him if it is because she has sinned. Elijah offers up prayers to Jehovah and returns her son to her alive—healed. In the third year of the draught, the Lord comes to him and tells him to go to Ahab and he will end the draught by sending rain. Obadiah, sent in search of water and pasture meets Elijah, and Elijah tells him that he shall tell his master that Elijah, the prophet, has come. Ahab asks him why this scourge has been brought and learns that because he has forsaken his old faith, to follow the religion of Baal—God is punishing his people. The people are called to Mount Carmel where he chastises them and proves to them by a miracle, who is the real God. They then accept Jehovah and very soon the rain falls again. Jezebel threatens the prophet and he flees for his life, Jehovah directs him to the Mount, from there he receives word from God to go to the fields and there he is told he will find Elisha whom he shall anoint to be prophet and shall become his follower. Now living in Samaria is an humble Jewish family, a father, mother and daughter, Ruth, who have never abandoned the God of their fathers. She is in love with an excellent youth called Samuel. War is declared between Syria and Israel and Samuel joins the ranks. Israel is victorious, but it is not long before Benhadad, King of Syria, plans another and loses. Then it is that Israel's king attacks Benhadad; because of his disobedience he loses the battle, also his life, making true the prophecy foretold: "That in peace where dogs licked the blood of Nabath (whom his wife had cruelly slain) shall dogs lick thy blood, ever thine.

Ruth is taken captive by two ruffians who bring her to Syria and to the home of Naaman where she is to serve his wife. Samuel hears of his sweetheart's capture and offers prayers for her safe return. Now Naaman is afflicted with leprosy, and his wife grieves. Ruth tells them to go to Israel and that there Elisha, the prophet, can cure him. He abides by her advice and is cured and returning home bestows gifts in abundance upon the girl.

He then, to show his gratitude, proposes to his wife that they should arrange with their king to restore her to her native land, and Naaman returns her personally to her parents. There is much rejoicing at her homecoming and Samuel is certain that his trust in the Lord is responsible for his sweetheart's return. A wedding takes place shortly and Samuel and Ruth are united. Samuel takes his bride to his mother's home where Ruth casts off the luxurious gifts of Naaman which had been her reward and appears before Samuel clothed in her garments of natural simplicity which she had worn in the good old days, and which Samuel finds far more beautiful.

NIGHT DUTY

Nora Moss Drama File No. 12052

EAGERLY Mary Lou applies at St. Mary's School of Nursing, and is given her entrance examination. Receiving word that she has passed, the happy girl is assigned to hall duty under Alice White, her senior nurse. Patiently, Alice initiates the younger girl into the routine of hospital life, and they soon become fast friends. In their spare moments, the two discuss school days and sweethearts. Alice confides that she is engaged to John, whom she met last summer while attending St. Mary's Infirmary. The handsome young interne asked her to become his wife as they were strolling over hospital grounds one evening, and she accepted. While the girls are resting after night duty, Mary confides that she too loves a man by the name of John, who plans to be a physician. She met him at a fraternity dance during her last years at college. Then followed happy hours when the two of them shared social pleasures of the campus. Just before the close of school they became engaged. Then they separated to visit their respective parents. John's letters at first came every day; then they grew fewer and fewer until at last they dropped off all together. With tears in her eyes, Mary confesses that she fears she has lost John forever, but Alice, one arm about her shoulders, tells the girl that someday he will come back. Smiling bravely, Mary suggests that they go out for a coco-cola.

Ranny Gordon, a young surgeon, becomes attracted to Mary when she assists him with an operation. During their leisure moments he oftens escorts the girl to cafes and the theatre, at last urging her to marry him, but she refuses, telling him of her engagement to John. Fascinated with the thrill of hospital life, Mary forgets much of her unhappiness in studying the cases of the various patients and making their troubles hers. Each one she regards as an engrossing problem. Mary assists at many operations. She is detailed to the maternity ward, where she longs for her own children, in the future, as she sees the happiness of the various mothers. Ranny saves the life of a young girl, injured in an automobile accident, by his consummate skill. Again, a famous singer's voice is restored through a delicate operation performed on his throat by the young surgeon. Graduation approaches, and Alice tells Mary that her John is to attend. A few days later he calls at the hospital and a happy senior nurse greets him in the superintendent's office, telling him about Mary. Exercises are held on a flower bedecked platform and diplomas awarded. Afterward, Mary hastens to Alice to congratulate her. When she is presented to John, she recognizes him as her former fiance, but, with an effort, conceals the fact as she acknowleges the introduction. At Alice's request, Mary serves as bridesmaid at the wedding a short time later.

While Alice and John are away on their honeymoon, Mary contracts pneumonia. They return as she is on the point of death, and she pledges John never to reveal their secret to Alice, her dear friend. "Silence is golden," he cryptically replies. But the medical skill of Ranny Gordon saves Mary, when all hope had been abandoned. As he visits her during convalescense, Mary feels that perhaps she will be able to forget John, after all, smiling at Ranny.

JEWEL OF THE NORTH

Ernest T. Frisk Melodrama File No. 12018

IT was winter at the Elsburg trading post, owned and operated by a powerfully built Frenchman, Vincent Blair whose reputation for ruthlessness and unscrupulousness made him feared by the inhabitants of the whole settlement. Donna Hepfelt was the object of his affection which although not reciprocated, she accepts because of fear. On this day Blair presents her with a camera . Having never seen one before the whole settlement including Donna is interested in watching her take pictures. Blair is rich and uses his money to gain power and to achieve all his ends. He owns valuable fox farms and even possesses a pen of wild timber wolves that he has captured from time to time. These farms are located about a mile and a half from the post and cared for by Alphonse a French Canadian fellow. There is but one man in the community who Blair cannot intimidate and he is Hepfelt, Donna's father. Blair in the past has weakened his morale by feeding him hard liquor. It is only under the influence of this alcoholic beverage that Hepfelt can be managed by Bair and because of this he has promised Donna that he will not indulge this weakness as she needs his protection. Blair has made it known that Donna is "his girl" and this has been sufficient to intimidate all the other young men and therefore no one else dare asks Donna to the dances held each Saturday night. Therefore she has no alternative hut to accept his invitations on these social occasions or else remain at home. Hepfelt realizes after a talk with Donna that Blair has made it difficult for Donna and he tells Blair that Donna has promised him that she will never marry until her father dies. He also arranges for her to be escorted to the dance hy another. This infuriates Blair and he follows Hepfelt home and shoots him in the hack felling him upon his sled which returns home bearing him in a serious condition. Neena, an Indian girl has been Blair's mistress and is about to have a child. She is inspired by jealousy to follow him and sees him fire the shot. He binds her to silence on the threat that he will not marry her if she divulges his secret. Donna finds her father in a serious condition and after taking him to a doctor aided by Blair who makes his bluff at friendship for her father's good, she is told that he has been paralyzed and will never walk or speak again. Everyone gathers at the post in the evenings to listen to a radio which has heen purchased hy Blair as an act of magnanimity. Blair constantly refers to Donna as "the gem."

A series of lectures is heing broadcast by a young physician whose name is Dr. Allan. He claims to have a eure for paralysis and for the sum of two thousand dollars he will go to any patient who is unable to come to him and effect a cure. Neena tells Donna that Blair has this amount at the store and she can get it for her and then send for this doctor. She also tells her that Blair shot her father but binds her to secrecy as this information is given for revenge as Blair has refused to marry her despite his promise. She gives the money to Donna who sends for the doctor, enclosing her picture and telling him that if her father were to die she will be forced to marry a beast whom she loathes. The doctor arrives and proves to be a personable young man and they are instantly attracted to each other. He is told of the existing situation and upon Mr. Hepfelt's recovery they plan to return to the states. Blair learns of this and at the point of a gun takes Allan to his farm while Alphonse is away and forces him into the wolves pen. Denied food for three days, the animals are desperately hungry. Allan manages to climb to the top of the pen and skillfully remain there until Alphonse, hearing the lusty call of the wolves returns in haste to see what the trouble may be and turning the wolves free to release Allan from the pen they dash to the woods and meeting Blair returning, they make a quick end to him. Donna and Allan then plan a happier future.

THE SECOND BROTHER

Anthony M. Planitzer Drama File No. 12031

ORPHANED when their parents are killed in a railroad accident, Henry and Fritz face the world alone at an early age. Although two years Fritz's junior, Henry tries to advise the older and more reckless boy, advising him to follow the path of duty, but Fritz pays little heed. Even as a child he gambles with the other members of his gang, risking money belonging to his brother as well as himself. Little interested in education, Fritz plays hookey from school while the more studious Henry pours over his books far into the night. The boys' uncle promises to secure each of them a job when they grow older, but Fritz, refusing, goes West, while Henry, accepting the offer, becomes cashier in a Reich bank. Adventurous as ever, Fritz wins heavy stakes and is at last to open his own gambling place and dance hall as well. A great favorite with the ladies, Fritz carries on many affairs with entertainers in his establishment. He is particularly attracted to Josie Wein, an impoverished dancer of good family, but, although she accepts his attentions, and bestows few favors on Fritz, promising only friendship. At Fritz's persuasion, Henry pays him a visit and is proudly shown the establishment. At the conclusion of her dance, Josie joins them and is presented to Henry, Instantly they become friends, and within a short time, when Henry expresses his love, they are engaged.

Angrily, Fritz tells Henry that Josie is his property, but the younger boy replies that she is the one to decide that. A short time later, Fritz marries another entertainer. Drinking heavily, he abuses his wife and quarrels constantly with Henry, until the latter decides that he must leave, taking Josie with him. She persuades him to remain until she has completed the term of her contract, in order to avoid trouble with Fritz. The establishment is raided at this time, due to police information that illegal practices are being conducted. In searching the place, bank notes missing from Henry's place of employment are discovered. In a fit of jealousy, Fritz states that Henry confided to him that he stole the money. Although Josie pleads with Henry to deny these charges he says little in his own defense to police. When he is allowed to see Fritz alone he tells him that he knows he drew the money on a worthless check; unless Fritz voluntarily confesses he will be forced to expose him. Fritz turns pale, but says nothing. The next day he disappears with his wife; police give search.

Indicted by circumstantial evidence, Henry faces a prison sentence. Loyally, Josie stands by him, visiting him daily and protesting her belief in his innocence. The girl spends her last cent in a vain endeavor to find Fritz. Although Henry clearly states the case it is to no avail and the day comes when he is to be incarcerated. With tears in her eyes, Josie kisses him farewell, when police are informed that Fritz is in the hospital, his wife dead and himself at the point of death as the result of an automohile accident while trying to escape police. Henry is rushed to him, and as Fritz fully confesses his guilt he asks forgiveness of his younger brother. It is granted. Holding Henry's hand, and smiling, Fritz dies, while Josie comforts the man she loves.

Adelna Johnson Western File No. 12056

RECEIVING a letter from her brother, Jim, that he has hroken his leg, Bonnie packs, preparing to leave at once for his home on a western ranch. Her Aunt Lucy, who has reared the girl, pleads with her not to take this rash step, but she only laughs at her timidity. Bonnie persuades Mable, her dearest friend, and also an orphan, to accompany her. The two leave the train at the little town of Billings, where Bonnie is warmly greeted by Ned Watkins, who knew her when she lived on the ranch as a child, before her parents' death. Mr. Wiley, the storekeeper, likewise extends a hearty welcome to Bonnie and her friend as they telephone Jim, asking him to send an escort for them at Judith Gap. Teasingly, the young man informs his sister that he is sending Slim, one of his cowboys and a confirmed woman hater. The two plan to surprise him. At Bonnie's instigation, Mable disguises her beauty with heavy glasses, and a mannish suit. Persuading Slim to allow her to drive, Bonnie pretends that the horses are running away as she spurs them on, while Mable hysterically throws her arms about Slim; later hoth girls confess their deception, as they laugh merrily. In a fit of temper, Slim leaves without helping them from the carriage. Bonnie throws her arms about Jim; when she presents Mable, the young man cannot conceal his disappointment as he had expected the lovely girl whose picture his sister had sent, but when Wong Lou, the Chinese cook, announces dinner, the young woman appears with her disguise removed to the delight of her host.

The next morning Bonnie persuades Slim to accompany her on Ginger, her horse, as they tour the ranch. A storm comes up and the two are forced to seek refuge in the line camp across the ereek. While Bonnie prepares an excellent meal, Slim's stiffness slowly vanishes. He apologizes, explaining that he once loved a waitress; when she threw him over to marry a wealthy cattle rancher from Denver he came to hate women and fear that he held no attraction for them. Bonnie assures him that this is not so; they play cards together until storm clouds vanish but when they ride to the creek it is so swollen that Bonnie insists they must spend the night at the camp rather than attempt to cross. Reluctantly, Slim agrees. Bonnie, chuckling inwardly with amusement, pretends to be frightened as she watches the embarrassed cowboy. The next morning she discovers Slim asleep, his head on the table where he spent the night, patiently sitting still. Alone with Jim, Mable tells him that she is an orphan, raised by an elderly governess whom her uncle hired. For five years she has taught school. Frightened by the storm, Mable seeks refuge in Jim's arms as he tells her that he loves her. When Wong Lou knocks at Mable's door, telling her that Jim is waiting for her after dinner, the confused girl pleads a headache in order that she may think over the events of the day alone. Ned Watkins calls often on Bonnie, urging her to marry him. She agrees, but Jim insists that she is too young. Determined to cure Slim of his bashfulness, Bonnie spends much time with him until Ned becomes jealous and Jim worried. Although unable to attend himself, Jim gives a barn danee for the girls; Slim, replendent in a pink silk shirt, proposes to Bonnie, who refuses him, while the Oklahoma Kid leads the other boys in betting on the outcome of this event. Disappointed because Ned is not present, Bonnie steals away, slipping as she stumbles over a ditch. Ned, on his way to leave town because of Bonnie, sees her and as he takes her in his arms, she explains her reason for devoting her attention to Slim. A few minutes later, Ned and Bonnie announce their engagement, with Jim's complete consent, while he places a ring on Mable's finger, as the party concludes at the ranch house.

RIDE 'EM, COWBOY!

Bulen Barnes Western File No. 11867

THROUGH a heavy snow storm a herd of two thousand head of cattle move swiftly down the road until George, the trail boss, holds up their progress. Young Tom, a cowpuncher, asks Frank, boss of the cattle business, what is holding up the procession. Impatiently, the older man rides up to find George drunk and hatless; placing Tom in charge, Frank fires George, although later he finds him in a pool hall, purchases a hat for him, and gives him a position as a cow puncher, while he sobers him with a long ride through the cool night air. Competently, Tom, working here during his summer vacation in order to pay his tuition at college, directs the team to the yards where they are loaded on trucks. When Mr. Whittley, elderly owner of the ranch, hears of the young man's skill in handling this difficult task he invites him to dinner, presenting Tom to Jane, his daughter. As the three are enjoying eoffee in the living room Whittley recalls the glamorous days of the old west when he founded his ranch, coming out on stage coach. They compare old fashioned hazards with modern methods of rustling, where cattle are stolen in trucks, agreeing that both present difficult problems. Pleased with Tom's spirit, Whittley gives the boy Robert's position permanently, while Jane grants him permission to call again. While Jane and Tom are riding her horse becomes frightened at the sound of a car and runs away. Tom stops the horse, saving her.

The punchers are requested to round up the horses, cutting out the strays. Tom takes one side of the ranch while his assistant, Gene, takes the other. A cloud burst occurs; Tom finishes his work, but Gene, soaked to the skin, leaves the horses in disgust. Mrs. McDonald, who, with her husband's aid, cooks for the boys, requests Gene to place a tub under the eaves of the ranch house. He complies —but places it upside down, while Tom and Jane, watching, laugh at his efforts. When several of the fat steers disappear, Jane's father advises Tom to keep a sharp lookout for thieves, as he suspects some of his men are slaughtering the animals and marketing them at night. Walking toward the ranch house one evening, Tom suddenly takes Jane in his arms, telling her that he loves her and wishes to marry her. Returning his embrace, the girl consents. They exchange rings; Tom presenting Jane with his fraternity emblem while she gives him a quaintly carved band of old gold, willed to her by her mother, which just fits Tom's little finger. Simms hires Andy and his son, Pete, to haul cotton seed cakes from the depot to the ranch by truck. With the help of some of the punchers they load the cakes from the ranch at night, selling them and sharing with their accomplices. Tom discovers this and reports. They are discharged and move into a vacant ranch house nearby.

Shortly after this one of the punchers discovers a hide from a missing steer, and lying nearby, Tom's ring which Jane had given him. The young man merely states that he lost his ring recently. Unable to obtain a confession, Whittley discharges all his men, including Tom, although Jane believes in him. Winter comes, and the cattle are being driven to warmer quarters when Frank discovers that a part of the herd is missing. Leaving one of his men in charge he searches the byways. Suddenly he hears a muffled call for help, followed by a shot and discovers the missing cattle in a tiny canyon. Three of his former cowpunchers face him, but he has the draw on them, and, after wounding two, turns the group over to his present employees who hasten to the glen at the sound of the shot. Frank finds Tom, badly wounded, on the ground. He takes him to the ranch where Tom states that be shadowed the thieves instead of returning to school. With Jane as a nurse Tom soon recovers. Whittley apologizes, proud that Tom is to be his son-in-law, and convinced that the spirit of the west will never die.

OVERTURE

Minna Ziff Drama File No. 11947

THE day was hot. Wearily wending her way with difficulty through the vineyards on an estate in southern France where she is laboring, Barine staggers to the door of her humble cottage. Wistfully, Adorabl, her little daughter, states that she wishes her mamma did not have to work in the field, as she hands her a glass of water. At the same hour, Malcolm Welles, whose poem "After Life," written in memory of his beloved mother, which won him fame and wealth is considering a change of scene, anxious to escape the wearing duties of London society. That night as he walks home after attending the opera two assassins attempt to take his life; a stranger assists Jarves, his butler, in carrying him inside, and applying first aid. Several days later the young poet, travelling incognito under the name of Mal Wellington, impulsively goes to a small village in southern France, stopping at La Peak de Paradise. Restless and eager to escape identification, he wanders to a small brook where he discovers Adorabl bathing her feet in the stream. Frightened by his approach, the child coughs violently and he helps her, winning her confidence. Before he leaves Mal promises to come again, bringing the child her first doll and narrating Alice in Wonderland. Tears of happiness stream down Adorabl's face as this promise is made good and when her "Uncle Mal" invites her and her parents on a picnic the following Sunday she is overjoyed. Andre is not at home, but Barine accompanies the ilttle girl, and Malcolm is amazed to find her a cultured, beautiful and apparently unhappy woman, when he expected a rugged peasant.

Andre and Barine struggle when the former attempts to abuse Adorabl, as he is under the influence of liquor. Startled when he throws Barine to the floor, Andre runs away while Lovette, a neighbor child, brings her mother to care for Barine. In the days that follow, Malcolm often escorts his two friends to the country, tactfully urging Barine to allow him to engage a physician for Adorabl, whose frequent cough racks her little body, but pride causes the mother to refuse. When Andre does not return and Adorabl becomes violently ill, Barine sends for Malcolm in desperation and he at once dispatches a physician who informs them that the child has consumption; there is no hope for her. Tenderly Mal watches at her bedside, telling her fairy stories by the hour. When his hand touches Barine's as both reach for her glass of water, an electric current seems to pass between them they realize that they love. Exacting a promise that Mal will always care for mother, Adorabl dies in Mal's arms. Her little coffin is lowered in its resting place on a beautiful June day; while Mal comforts her grieving mother. He returns to London, promising to come for Barine as soon as he can.

Through newspapers, Barine learns Mal's true identity. At last he calls, holding her in his arms. Bravely Barine tells her story; she is the daughter of a prominent physician. At her father's sanitarium she came to love Louis d'Ardenel, a patient, but her family prevented marriage and Louis left, at their threats. Discovering at his boarding house that he was gone, Barine ran away to Paris where her little, delicate Adorabl was born. She secured work as a mannequin but left when her own sister came to purchase a wedding gown. While an instructess at a cheap dance hall she met Andre who offered her the protection of marriage. Exept when he drank he was kind enough, although Adorabl feared and hated him. Ending her confession with a kiss, Mal takes his bride to London. His would-be assasin, John Lord, a former discharged gardener of his father's, is caught. Returning from a trip to Chicago, the train is wrecked; Barine and Malcolm discover that Andre is killed, and they return to England, free at last.

BEHOLD THIS MASK

Peter Mandell Drama File No. 12023

BITTERLY, Malcolm Steele views his disfigured face in the mirror, recalling the burning plane that imprisoned him during the World War and wishing that he had died in place of the German Ace he so heroically brought down. Again he recalls the day when, a handsome student home from Oxford on a visit, he saw the reflection of beautiful Diana Marsh on the rustic bridge of his estate and, whimsically informing her that the birds wished to know the name of so lovely a lady, became acquainted. Schoolboy dreams of romance were shattered when he eagerly gave his life to his country, only to return spiritually dead. He became a hermit dreading the sympathy of friends, the ridicule of strangers, happy only when alone with his faithful dog. With Jameson, who lost a leg in the conflict, Hardy, an arm, and the shell-shocked Lester, Malcom attempts to forget his sorrow as he drinks and sings war ballads but at a dance given by the World War Veterans League he is taunted by Sydney Kent, a slacker, and cruelly spurned by Diana, whom he meets again for the first time. Once more he resolves to remain a recluse. Malcolm dreams of a heavy black mask which only his dead mother can remove, and is awakened by Jenkins, who informs him that his attorney, Mr. Blythe is calling. In spite of Blythe's arguments, Malcolm is determined to leave the estate, but Mitzi, his sister, visits him unexpectedly with Allen Thorpe, her American husband. With a cry of horror, she sobs hysterically when she sees Malcolm's disfigurement, although in the days that follow she and Allen do much to alleviate his loneliness. Mitzi gives a farewell party before sailing for America to which she invites Diana and Kent, little realizing their emnity toward Malcolm. As Malcolm is dancing with his loyal little sister, Kent sneeringly thrusts Diana in his arms; Malcolm strikes him, while Diana sympathizies with the slacker. Blythe, entering later, hears the story from an indignant Mitzi, but, unable to bear his sister's pity, Malcolm tells her to leave and forget him.

A week later, Malcolm sails for Paris where he frequents one cafe and then another, always the object of pitying public attention. At last he finds a secluded little cafe in lower Paris; here Nascha Dashe, surrounded by her admirers, sees him night after night, and at last introduces herself, sympathizing when Malcolm tells his story, and persuading him to dance, after she tells him that she lost the man she loved in the great conflict, since then she has become a woman of the streets, attempting to forget. Almost unable to belief that she can be kind to him, Malcolm thanks God for Nascha, but when she offers herself to him he leaves, deeply grateful for this amazing generosity, but wishing to remember her as his most devoted friend.

Swiftly, Malcolm drives away from Paris; when he sees a child on the road he swerves over an embankment, regaining consciousness at the home of Dr. Cousins. Elsie, the child's mother and little Joan, thank him deeply, while Dr. Cousins, the baby's grandfather, cannot express his deep appreciation adequately. Discovering, Malcolm bitterly surveying himself in the mirror, Dr. Cousins offers to attempt to restore his disfigured face, if he is willing to risk his life. The operation is a success and a handsome Malcolm returns to London, where he becomes the city's most eligible bachelor. Kent pleads with him not to see Diana, after they meet again, on the bridge, and subsequently see one another frequently. When he tells Diana, summoning his will power to resist her beauty, that he does not love her but only seeks revenge she drowns herself and Kent shoots Malcolm, charging him with murder. Through the eloquence of Mr. Blythe, Malcolm is pronounced not guilty when his story is known. As he is sailing to Mitzi in America he encounters Nascha on shipboard, and, realizing his love for her at last, persuades her to seek a new life with him, as his wife.

TAPPED WIRES

Rhoda T. Bowman Short Subject File No. 11641

LENA'S tooth ached. She dealt summarily with the man from the Telephone Company; directing him to the downstairs phone and then hastily fled into the kitchen to saturate her tortured mouth with other drops. A few minutes later Lena interrupted her mistress, Mrs. Randall, to notify her that "the company man is ready to fix the wires upstairs." Hurrying to dress for her downtown appointment, Mrs. Randall gave permission and promptly forgot about it. While the "trouble" man was fixing the wires in the cellar, three plumbers repairing the large cellar pipe brushed past him, glancing with little interest for his uniform at once identified him. In the kitchen the cook sympathized with Lena, idly mentioning the spry fearlessness of "that telephone man who had been astride the pole outside for fifteen minutes before entering the house." There was a letter yet to be finished and Mrs. Randall hastily scrawled the address and started for her bedroom. She was interrupted by the workman who courteously inquired where the wires had their outlet. Receiving directions he went back to his instruments and apologetically mentioned that he had accidentally overheard that she planned to go out soon; he hoped that his presence would not annoy her. No sooner had the bedroom closed upon her then Slinky whose telephone work was only a "cover" for his real occupation hastily disconnected the last wire and then knelt before the keyhole which faced her dressing table. Unconscious that she was being observed, Mrs. Randall took the key of her jewel case from her powder jar. For a moment Slinky's eyes dazzled from the reflection of the flashing diamonds.

When she came out, the stones which adorned her made Slinky's fingers itch with desire. However, he merely asked for more light and Mrs. Randall helpfully went to an adjoining room to fetch a small lamp with a long extension cord. Meanwhile, Slinky had moved to the doorway completely blocking the exit, a telephone in his hand. "I'm making you a lot of trouble." he said. Unconscious of her nearness to danger, the woman blithely replied, as she handed him the lamp, "Why I love to help you." To Mrs. Randall the word "love" meant nothing more than the usual polite consideration she showed to others. To Slinky, however, fresh from a prison term and a background miles apart from the circle in which Mrs. Randall moved—the manner of addressing him had a strange effect. Somehow, he could not assault this woman who so evidently trusted him. And so Mrs. Randall left for her appointment. Lena saw her to the door and then took the large wolfhound up to the sunroom. Slinky trembled but Lena tugged back the growling animal and reassured the workman. Only after the "telephone man" had gone, did Lena think it queer that she had not heard him speak to Central. Deliberating on the matter her toothache was forgotten. Though Mrs. Randall thought her fears were nonsense, she laughingly went to the hiding place of her key. Still smiling, she unlocked the drawer to find the jewels gone! Except for what she wore and unwittingly through her kindness had dissauded the burglar from forcibly taking, nothing was left. In the excitement of calling the police and reassuring the cook that her savings hidden in the "mattress bank" were still safe, Lena remembered to do one more thing. "Bad things always come in three," she murmured superstitiously. "Here's one that's coming out anyway before another catastrophe. Where's that dentist?"

REUNION

Julia Russek Drama File No. 12025

SMILING a little shyly at one another as they sit side by side in the second grade room of a parochial school, Elsa Lane and Elaine Travers form a friendship which is to last as long as they both shall live. Each noon the little girls eat their luncheons together and side by side they walk to their respective homes in the East side of a New England city. Frances, Elaine's sister and her two brothers, John and Richard readily accept Elsa and her sister, Janice as playmates, while the parents of the two families become close friends through the children. Sister Teresa, their teacher, who is particularly fond of the two girls, helps them learn Cabbages, a comic song, which they sing together, dressed as little buds, at the school minstrel show. The audience applauds with delight and four proud parents smile happily. Elsa's father purchases a typical New England farm, but the child's pleasure at the thought of country life is marred when she realizes that she must say farewell to Elaine. With tears in their eyes, the little girls kiss each other farewell, promising that someday they will meet again. Within in a short time the Lane's are settled in their new home; the boys learns to help in the fields while the girls become familiar with various household tasks incidental to farm life. Together with Myrtle and Daniel Dayton, Olga and Ivan Dansky, children of their neighbors they drive to school in a team and wagon, or, in the winter time, glide over the snow covered roads in a sleigh, laughing merrily. Again the children bring the older people together; the men of the various families enjoy crab apple cider while they discuss events of the day, the women exchange views on child rearing and household arts, soon becoming fast friends. But Elsa never forgets Elaine, sending her letters which fully described her new home and occupations, while she, in turn, writes news of the parochial school. Elsa's teacher, Miss Hart, plans a Christmas program at which the girl recites The Night Before Christmas, with Frances. Residents of the community drive to the little white school house in a sleigh, singing Jingle Bells, and heartily applauding the girls' recitation.

The next year, Mr. Lane sells the farm and returns to the city, but Elaine has moved and Elsa cannot find her. As Elsa is coasting down State Street with her brothers she collides with another sled and discovers its occupant is Elaine! Joyfully the girls embrace, discovering that they live only a block apart. Once more they are inseparable, attending the same high school a few years later. The stock market crash makes it necessary for both girls to obtain positions in a factory continuing their education at night-school together. On Saturday nights they often form a gay foursome with their friends. Both of Elsa's brothers escort Elaine, whom they regard as another sister. And on Sunday afternoon Elsa often plays the piano while Elaine accompanies on her violin for the benefit of their friends. Together they read books, study and play, always sharing their joys and sorrows. At last both girls obtain their high school diplomas and free to become nurses, the ambition each has cherished since childhood. They are accepted by a large hospital in another city. While they are students, both become attracted to handsome Dr. William Blake. Four years pass, and both girls receive diplomas. Although she wishes more than anything else to remain at the hospital as Dr. Blake's assistant, Elsa decides to give up this opportunity when she sees that Elaine is apparently suffering from heartaches. Dr. Blake asks Elsa to marry him, as they drive home together after a visit to a patient, but she refuses. In her room, radiant Elaine tells her that she is to marry Elsa's brother John! And Elsa tells Dr. Blake that she will be his wife, while both girls plan a wedding in June—as always, together.

NOT GUILTY

George C. Kubos Melodrama File No. 12019

JOHNNY LEE leaves his hotel, hastening to meet Eloise, his fiancee. As he walks along swiftly a powerful car, driving from a side street, swerves to avoid collision with another machine and crashes into the private garage of Mr. Norris, retired broker. The sole witness to the accident, Johnny observes first two injured persons, then three, when he looks again, and concludes that the third must have been concealed by the back seat. Discovering a small, heavy package near the injured persons, Johnny impulsively picks it up, pocketing it, as he is anxious to make a good news story in order that he may obtain a position on a city paper. Then he notifies police, who send an ambulance. As the driver of the car moans for help, Johnny remains with him, attempting to staunch the flow of blood from a cut on his forehead. Police arrive; they searoh Johnny as well as the injured men, discovering the package. He is taken into custody when officers find twenty thousand dollars in gold in the tin box which Johnny discovered. In spite of his plea of innocence, the Chief of Police orders Johnny taken into custody. Anxiously he inquiries after the injured men and is told that they will live. Annoyed at this turn of affairs, and unwilling to become involved, Eloise does not visit Johnny, but Marian, who lives next door to him at the hotel, calls, offering to help in any way she can and performing little services for the prisoner.

Johnny is called to trial; when he learns that the twenty thousand dollars had been stolen from the bank by a man whom the night watchman identified as resembling him in appearance, he knows his chances are slender. Called as a witness to explain that Johnny was on his way to meet her, Eloise denies all knowledge of the young man and rather than brand her a perjurer, he accepts this testimony. Loyally, Marian defends his character in glowing tributes. As he sees her bravely facing the court, Johnny realizes for the first time how lovely she is. The City Press announces that Thomas Kall and Henry Dove, from Belleville, the occupants of the car, are recovering. Their innocence is firmly established. The third person to be rushed to the hospital is Henry, adopted son of Alois Norris, the garage owner. Still in a state of unconsciousness, he can give no testimony. Unhappily, Alois Norris admits that this youth whom he adopted at the age of fifteen has given him nothing hut trouble. He states that the boy has committed a number of petty law violations such as drinking, reokless driving and destruction of property but he cannot think him guilty of this. Circumstantial evidence convicts Johnny. With tears in her eyes, Marian seeks to comfort him, and he gratefully thanks her for her devotion. Just before sentence is to be passed, a physician at the hospital testifies that Henry Norris, in delirium, confessed to the bank robbery, and was in the act of burying the treasure when the car killed him. A few hours later the unfortunate boy dies and Johnny is rewarded, liberated and given his much desired position with the City Press. Eloise calls to ask forgiveness, which Johnny grants, as he tells her that he is to wed Marian, his arm about her, tenderly.

LADY BOY

Besse L. Braes Drama File No. 12091

EYES sparkling with the enthusiasm of youth in love for the first time, Jerry watches Joan as she dances at a small night club. Avoiding her admirers, the girl slips away to meet him at the entranoe to her dressing room, driving away in his little car. Once again, Jerry urges her to marry him, and is overcome with suprise when she accepts. Proprietor of a filling station, Jerry works harder than ever after his wedding, hurrying home each night to find his beloved waiting for him at the little cottage they share with the young man's mother. Absorbed in learning to cook under the sympathetic instruction of Jerry's mother, Joan is happy, but as the days pass she grows restless for the excitement of her oareer, urging Jerry to allow her to rcturn, but on this point he refuses firmly. When Jerry's mother becomes ill Joan begs him to allow her to manage the station "just for fun" and, anxious to remain at home, he conscnts. Sugar Seely, right hand of Ace Cardino, by whom Joan was employed at the night club, drives up and urges the young wife to return to the city with him; impulsively she consents. When Jerry discovers this he sadly sings "Someday You'll Come Back to Me," while his mother assures him that Joan must not be criticized too severely as it takes time to make adjustments. On Christmas Eve, several neighbors, forming a band with kitchen instruments, call, and Jerry partially forgets his unhappiness in this gay party, although he still longs for the evenings when he assisted his bride with the dishes.

Sugar Seely and a group of his men drive to the station, taunting Jerry with the phrase Lady Boy, which Joan endearingly applied to him because of his gentleness. A fight ensues but the gangsters escape, fatally injuring Jerry's mother with their car. He rushes her to the hospital, where she dies. Securing a radio contract, Jerry sings "Someday You'll Come Back to Me," and Joan, at a gay party in Ace's apartment, listens. Under the influence of liquor, Ace attempts to force his attentions on Joan but is shot by an unknown person and killed. Under the management of Seely, the olub continues. Searching for his wife, Jerry enters Seely's apartment; as the latter is about to reach for a gun he is killed by an unknown hand. Jerry is taken into custody but released on lack of evidence. He takes a poor woman, imprisoned because she is homeless, and adopts her as a mother. Meanwhile Joan goes to the hospital where Jerry's son is born. Again going to Seely's apartment, Jerry discovers that Red, one of his men, has planted a roll of stolen bills in his pocket, in order that he may be again arrested. As the two men struggle, Seely enters with a pistol and is about to shoot Jerry when the boy escapes through an open window. Seely follows, but police, watching, take him into custody, with Jerry as a material witness. Jerry's adopted mother becomes ill; he hastens to her while she explains that Seely is her son. Released on bail, the gang leader kills himself after his mother dies, holding his hand.

Certain now that he has lost the three women he loves most, Jerry prepares to olose up his cottage and go to Europe when he hears a knock at the door. Opening it, he discovers Joan, with his little son in her arms. As Jerry embraces them both, all misunderstandings are forgotten.

MANPOWER

H. C. Carroll Drama File No. 12024

TENDERFOOTS in the newly settled lands of Missouri, the Hope family first learn of the existence of the dreaded Brush Creek Law Abiding Organization, made up of outlaws and cattle thieves, while staying overnight at the home of Mrs. Florence. Her husband has been falsely accused of horse stealing and killed. While journeying to their destination, the farm of William Somers, their wagon is abruptly halted. Facing them are five outlaws. Disgusted with the small haul of fifty dollars which is all Hope claims to have, the holdup men take seven year old Joseph Hope as hostage till five hundred dollars is paid. The distracted parents arrive at last in Virgel City where Somers' son, Jim, informed of the tragedy, tells Mr. Hope that the outlaws are closeted with the ohild in a nearby tavern. Stopping long enough to equip himself with a pistol, Hope joined by Jim and the sheriff's men invade the place and in the shooting melee which follows all five are wiped out. While closeted with the outlaws, Joseph overhears a conversation which places the guilt on Adam Nye, one of his kidnappers, for the theft and false accusation placed against Florence. Through Joseph, Mrs. Florence olears her husband's name and wins recompense from the Nye estate. In the farm house stretched out on the prairie, the Hope family adjust themselves to the rigours and crude comforts that are a pioneer's lot. Neighbors help Mr. Hope prepare his crop for the season is late already; and Joseph and Emma Somers are constant companions. A dance is held in honour of the new neighbors at the Young home. The son, Frank, who turned outlaw after the death of his father, picks a scrap with Hope who is saved from an underhanded thrust only by the watohful warning of Joseph. The scene is broken upon Mrs. Young's warning that U. S. Secret Service men are approaching. The mother stalls them off until Frank is safely out of the way. Another entertainment breaks the monotony when two weeks later a community fishing party is held on Sunday, there being no local churches to attend. Here Mrs. Hope is to sing an original tribute to Pennsylvania, her home state, and for those whom she has left behind. Emma stays at the Hope home over night and the following morning the two children go berry picking. Joseph, wandering off by himself while Emma rests, suddenly hears frightened screams. Rushing to her side he finds a deadly reptile close to the girl. With his pail, he orushes the snake. Accompanied by Jim who has come to take his sister home, the children return to the Hope house where the mother is softly praying for their safety. Joyously, she points out that their recent experiences are answers to her prayers. In June a train of 100 wagons California-bound arrive at Locust Grove Camp where they are met by a smaller group, headed in opposite direction. From Wisconsin came a third group, making more people in the community than has been known before. A joint meeting and entertainment is held. Meanwhile, Joseph has kept hidden an experience whose full import is to be realized only later. While running an errand to the Somers home he is halted by two stranger riders who order him to nail a note on a certain door. Unable to resist, Joseph obeys, falling in his eagerness to complete the task before his people worried over his absence.

This is momentarily forgotten when the Fourth of July celebration is held. Joseph is lost in the excitement of witnessing his first uniformed baseball nine and later having his picture taken as an advertisement for other parents. The afternoon's fun is abruptly ended when, while the people are gathered around the platform enjoying the spirited band music, two hundred notorious outlaws led by David Smith surround the crowd. Somers warns Hope that any movement will mean instant death and the guns point menacingly at the throng. Smith is seeking vengence for a note whieh was left on his door ordering him out of the community in three days under penalty of hanging for disobedience. The time limit has passed but murder lies in his heart. From the throng Joseph steps forth to announce that he alone posted the note and indicates the men who forced him to. Before continuing his explanation Joseph obtains the leader's orders for no man not even his own, to move. And so once again a child is to remind adults that the power of taking life rests only with the Supreme Being. Under Joseph's inspired words, Smith is to reform and the shadow of violence lifted. A grateful community subscribes a large purse, while proud parents regard their son unconscious that he has made himself a heroic figure that historic day.

Christina Holland Drama File No. 12030

VIRGINIA THORNE discovers a note in her car, as she is leaving the Lee Country Club, threatening her that she will be kidnapped if she does not deposit $50,000 in the pocket of the roadster by tomorrow afternoon. After dinner, Virginia starts to confide this fact to her uncle and aunt, but when they upbraid her for refusing to announce her engagement to reliable, prosaic Bill Winter, vice-president of the State National Bank, concluding that she is like her irresponsible father who disappeared when she was a baby, the girl leaves the room in annoyance. The next afternoon she strolls through the park at the appointed time for the kidnapping, accompanied only by her fox terrier. When she admits her identity to a stranger, she is summarily blindfolded, gagged and driven away over a rough country road. At last she is conducted to the entry of a cellar, her blindfold removed. Sam, her abductor, sends Jake for sandwiches and coffee, which he shares with the girl removing her gag, but threatening death if she screams. Converting his coat into a pillow, Sam makes Virginia as comfortable as possible. The next morning he takes her to a cave, furnished with table, chairs and cot; Jake then leaves her in Sam's care. Alone with the girl, Sam is suprisingly tender, as he arranges her bed as comfortably as possible and treats her with courtesy and consideration. When Virginia questions him he confides that the other boys are attending to burglary, bootlegging and other pursuits, kidnapping is his only racket. Further inquiry reveals that he has been an orphan since childhood; companions at school persuaded him that crime pays. But, he adds, he has never harmed his victims.

At Virginia's insistence, he accompanies her while they watch a gorgeous sunrise. Idly drawing in the lose dirt with a stick, Virginia pictures the wide porched home in the country she has always dreamed of, and, in explaining this to Sam, is amazed to learn that he, too has always longed for such a haven. In a confidential mood, Virginia tells him about Bill Winters; his desire for the conventional routine of social life whioh she detests. She explains that her ideal home, with its leisurely life, its happy colored workers singing in the fields, will probably never be a reality, since she cannot find a man big enough to shoulder the responsibility of managing a modern southern plantation. Eagerly the young man listens; then turns away, not wishing to be influenced by Virginia's charm. Persuading Sam to accompany her to a house in the vicinity in order that they may claim an acoident has wrecked their car, and thus obtain a substantial meal, Virginia leads him to a plantation after a long walk. Henrietta, the colored maid, greets Virginia enthusiastically; then the girl confesses to Sam that this is her country home. True to her word she does not attempt to escape. As they are enjoying Henrietta's delicious cooking, Sam reveals that he knows of Virginia's estrangement with her aunt and uncle, adding that they will pay the ransom since they will not wish neighbors to believe it is impossible for them to afford such a sum. Virginia is forced to agree, but she gives Sam ten minutes to think over the proposition that they escape together. At the end of that time he agrees to be her ally, sealing the compact with a kiss. Virginia telephones her aunt, and asking her to send Steven, the chauffeur, with the car, and is informed that newspapers did not comment on her disappearance since the robbery of the State National Bank occupied the front page. As Virginia and Sam drive homeward, his arm encircling her, he confesses that his true name is Phil Houston. At a turn in the road they discover a car, crashed over an embankment. With an exclamation of horror, Phil recognizes all five of his accomplices, crushed to death. Removing a purse which contains the stolen bank money, Phil drives to the State National where he is presented to Bill Winters. After he turns the money over to the vice-president, Phil's name is cleared and he is rewarded. A few weeks later, the happy couple leave for a honeymoon in Paris; suddnly Mrs. Thorne kisses the captain, to the amazement of all present. Then she explans that he is Virginia's long lost father. With a promise to visit on his return to America, John Thorne bids his sister and her husband farewell as he turns to embrace Virginia and welcome Phil. A happy future faces the trio as they sail together, Paris bound, on the "kidnapped special."

HER OWN PEOPLE

Amelia R. Murison Drama File No. 12085

IT was difficult to convince strangers that Margaret and Marjorie, daughters of Banker George Ormsby were twins. Only the accident of possessing the same birth date seemed to bind these two sisters who in disposition and appearance were completely unlike. To George it was a constant irritation that the joy-loving Marjorie could never emulate the quiet and sedate Margaret who drew most of his affection. There were stormy scenes when Ormsby learned from a client that his own child, Marjorie, was a member of the fast Hill crowd whose pranks and parties were the subject of disapproval by the more settled residents. Two weeks passed since the last scene and outwardly Marjorie had mended her ways. Then one day she was again called into the library where Ormsby thunderingly informed her that she had several times been seen at the notorious White Owl roadhouse outside the city limits. Protesting that there was nothing immoral about attending such places, Marjorie warned him that his blood pressure couldn't stand excitement. Though he glared furiously, the warning silenced him. A week later, George and his wife, Marian, were forced to attend the funeral of a relative living some distance from the house. They were not expected back that night and though Margaret retired early, Marjorie restlessly roamed about the house until the phone rang. It was from spoiled, wealthy Fred Weeks who was very much in love with her. Despite the weatherr which was heavy with snow and bitterly cold, Fred was soon persuaded to take her to the White Owl. Tiring a few hours later of cocktails and dance music, the couple started home. The storm made driving difficult and a few miles out the car was plunged into a snow drift, stalled. It was dawn before Fred could locate a farm house and call a towing car. At the door of Marjorie's home, they were met by Ormsby to the girl's amazement. Accusing her of deliberately spending the night with Fred, Ormsby ordered Marjorie from his home. In the midst of the tirade, suddenly he collapsed. Death was instantaneous. During the trying days, Fred seemed to gain added manliness; blaming himself for Marjorie's unhappiness, he constantly begged her to marry him. She was too grief-stricken and remorseful to heed. When the will was read it was disclosed that Ormsby had left his wife a life income but that Marian alone could explain why he was leaving a bequest to Margaret solely, his only daughter. The word "only" was heavily underscored. Marian sat, only half conscious of the staring bewildered eyes of the twins, her thoughts drifting far into the past. . . . .

Strongly attracted to devil-may-care Walter, Marian had married George instead, because his safe qualities represented the security that her own mother had lacked in marriage and desired for her child. But George engrossed in business neglected his bride. Weeks later she met Walter again. A warm evening, Marian who had been lonely invited him in. When Walter confessed that he was enlisting with the Canadian army since he was unable to bear living in the same community with her, Marian first realized her love for him. Intoxicated with passion, she gave herself to him—all marriage vows forgotten. Through the years she was a dutiful wife but Marjorie was a continual reminder of that moment's surrender. . . So Ormsby had always known, murmured the woman. But out of the bitterness of confession was to come a crumb of happiness in the realization that Marjorie would become the wife of Fred who was so much like the man she would have married had she followed the call of her heart.

HUSBAND FOR A DAY

Jack Dayton Comedy Drama File No. 12095

IGNORING her daughter's statement that she hates society and titles, Mrs. Clifford Gordon informs her that she has invited Elbert Lloyde, an English Count, to dinner, in the hopes that a romance may develop between the two. Tempestuously, Billie runs out of the house, driving to the theatre where her friend, Jack Daniels, is rehearsing for his next play. Over the luncheon table, Billie confides her mother's plans, vowing that she will thwart them. The two agree that Jack is to be introduced as Billie's husband; later, she will explain this innocent deception to her mother. Thanking Jack for his willing co-operation, Billie drives home, singing happily. In amazement at this sudden change in her disposition, Mrs. Gordon watches the spirited and outspoken young woman with trepidition. Mr. Gordon is called out of town on business and leaves, telling his adored Billie that all will be well in the end. In a flutter, Mrs. Gordon instructs the servants and the caterer in great detail, anxious to have everything in perfect order. Before the morning of the eventful day has passed, everyone has been roundly reprimanded for some real or imaginary mistake. The nervous hostess rnshes from one room to the other in distraction while Billie ealmly watches in affectionate amusement. Receiving a wire that the busness deal has been postponed. Mr. Gordon announces that he will be present. At last the guest of honor arrives and is presented to Billie, who finds his affeetation even more offensive that she imagined. As the guests are seated around the table, Jack calls. Standing by him, Billie announces that he is her husband.

Mrs. Gordon, with a little scream, faints; servants hastily run for smelling salts. When her mother recovers, after the last guest has departed, Billie confesses that it was all a trick. Miriam Vincent, long envious of Billie's social position and extreme popularity, invites the count to a house party. Cleverly, she hears the story of Billie's marriage, and persuades the Englishman that if he will announce his engagement to her, Billie, her jealousy aroused, will probably divorce her impoverished actor. Confiding that it is a secret, the count tells Mrs. Gordon that he is engaged to Miriam, as the woman is planning another party for Billie. However, the count finds that newspapers carry the account of this news in each society section. Angrily, he charges Miriam with reporting this fact; although his supposition is correct, she firmly denies it. The distracted count attempts to deny the statemen, but when Miriam's parents inform him that plans for the wedding are well under way, he cannot put in a word. Miserably unhappy, he is foreed to appear at a tea in honor of the engagement. As Miriam's set congratulate her upon the suceess of her "catch" her eyes gleam triumphantly, while her unfortunate victim smiles weakly at his well wishers. Laughing inwardly, Billie, too, offers her congratulations in veiled remarks, and expressing her thanks to Miriam. In order to escape her mother's wrath Billie goes with her father to their cabin in the mountains, inviting Jack to join them. The trio spends a glorious holiday riding and hiking together.

Billie calls at Jack's apartment to discover that he is packing, in preparation for a Mediterranean cruise. Fingering trinkets on the table, he awkwardly says goodbye as he gazes out of the window. But when he hears a sob, Jack turns, and holds out his arms to Billie, who runs to him. He tells her that he has always loved her but feared the difference in their social stations isolated them. Assuring him that this matters not at all to her, Billie nods in complete agreement when Jack suggests: "Let's make that Mediterranean cruise a honeymoon!"

ALL MEN ARE DECEIVERS

Alberto Di Meo Drama File No. 12027

A CARRIAGE draws to the Church of Santa Maria in Rome in 1898 and a man and a woman emerge, richly dressed, followed by a nurse bearing an infant in her arms. Lucia and Alfredo, the godparents are to baptize the baby boy Romolo. Entering the church on the same mission, a little old man and woman, also dressed in expensive garments, and accompanied by a nurse bearing a baby girl, have the child christened Italia. The ceremony completed, the two infants are held side by side while Lucia expresses the hope that this two may someday marry at the same altar.

In 1915 war is declared and Romolo, now grown to manhood, persuades his father to allow him to enlist in the artillery, although the older man warns him of the danger and hardship of war. While visiting an aunt in Valletri, Romolo offers assistance to a young woman carrying a bundle. At first she refuses, but, assured of his friendly intentions, enters the car, requesting that he take her to the offices of the Red Cross, where she plans to offer her services. When Romolo expresses his surprise, the girl informs him that she considers it to be the duty and privilege of youth to serve the country in this noble cause. He is amazed by her beauty as she expresses these high ideals. As she leaves, the girl introduces herself as Italia, an orphan.

Bravely cheering his parents and eager to serve, Romolo boards the train. Winning sensational victories twice by his use of the machine gun, when his men are outnumbered, Romolo achieves acclaim as a soldier. While bringing down a plane with cannon fire, Romolo is wounded by a bomb dropped by another machine and taken to the hospital where Italia, directress of the infirmary, has cheered countless suffering soldiers with the assurance that they are contributing to a great eause. Her womanly charm and faith brightens their darkest moments. When Romolo engaged in conversation with the jolly Marcantio who is sweeping the stairs, sees Italia, he sends his friend for her. Amazed, she greets him, and, in the days that follow, he protests his love, sweeping away her distrust of men. Departing tor the front he gives her a rose and a picture to be kept always. Months pass, but she hears nothing from him. Fillipo, a young doctor, secures a position for Italia in a printing cstablishment at the close of the war, in Venezia. When he confesses that he loves her, and has even broken into her room to wait for her, Italia leaves him, explaining that Romolo will always live in her heart and Fillipo is forced to admire this undying devotion. Meanwhile Romolo returns home; his parents, who were mourning his death, are wild with joy, as he explains that he was held as hostage in a prison camp. After telling his mother of Italia, Romolo hastens to her home, but her guardian, Alice, admits that she has run away to avoid a loveless marriage. At the hospital, Elena, Italia's friend, states that she has left with Dr. Fillipo. In despair, Romolo returns home, but one day encounters Marcantio fishing on the banks of the Tevere, and, after a happy reunion, learns that his beloved is in Venezia.

Searching for all printing establishments in a gondola, Romolo upsets a similar caravan, throwing the occupant in the river. As he saves her, he recognizes that she is Italia! She is taken to the hospital by the gondolier, Antonio. Confiding his love to Dr. Fillipo, when Italia sends for him at her aunt's home, later Romolo is falsely told that Italia is the physician's sweetheart, and leave, disillusioned. Fillipo confesses his lie to Italia when she waits in vain for Romolo and receives a note from him, refusing to see her. Unable to join in his cousin's gaiety, Romolo despairs until, thinking of Italia's purity and truth, he is certain Fillipo must have lied. Twice he calls at her home, but Aliee, wishing to spare the grieving girl further unhappiness, sends him away. Overhearing Alice tell Italia that Romolo loves her, the young man climbs a tree entering her bedroom through the window, and discovers his beloved, pale and weeping, as she lies aeross the divan. Romolo begs forgiveness, which Italia grants. Soon after, at a gala ceremony, these two whose love overcame misunderstanding and separation, are wed in the church where they were baptized.

CHERRY BLOSSOMS

Wade J. Gessell Drama File No. 11861

FRAGRANT cheery blossoms swung in the lilting breeze of April, petals still damp with the shower preceding the rainbow that dipped through the trees. While the children's party in the play-house hummed with laughter and song, their small hostess, Helen Henry, slipped away with John Jeffries to a secluded window where they could drink in nature's beauty and hear the strutting robin's rapturous tribute to spring. . . There had been another time, a spring of many years ago; Grandfather Henry had built a mansion near the foot of the hills and Mills Jeffries became a neighbor. The two leading families in the district, their children played together until the railroad pushed its way. The Jeffries land was subdivided —the building of a city had begun. Hating the invasion of strangers close to his own soil, Grandfather Henry resentfully blamed Mills. Harsh words came and the breech widened. Once the son Tom Jeffries had faint dreams of making Lucy Henry his bride. Together they paced the garden one night; she was to sail for Europe the following day for the family had observed that she continued to see him. Tom sought words which would not come; both were still young—frightened; his fingers erushed unknowingly the cherry blossom petals drifted in his hands. Several years later they met again. Grandfather Henry was gone but Lucy was married and soon Tom was to marry her best friend. Now Helen and John, their children, were playmates, their love for nature bringing them into closer companionship. The Jeffries wealth had shrunken; they lived now only in a modest home. For a time the children parted when Helen's mother died but a rigid aunt took over the reins of the household and frowned at friendship between the families. The old grudge relived in her but fortunately the young people were unaware as yet. High School days were ending and the budding cherry trees were a green reminder that for them also new life must begin. Prom night was a delicate dream spun of music, colorful garments, and girls fresh and lovely in the charms of youth. As of old, Helen and John slipped away into the silence of the night, wandering on paths grown increasingly dear since soon they were to end. Unintentionally, their fingers touched and then they eould not part. Deep drank their lips, transporting them to a new world. It was only moments but it seemed hours before they could grow coherent once more. "We'll be together always," whispered John and Helen nodded. Yet both were very young, inexperienced, and belonged to opposite poles of wealth. The aunt, discerning that what she feared had happened, forbade the two to meet again. Like her mother Helen was sent abroad. From there she went to finishing school in Paris but during that period John was steadily forging ahead. He dreamed that she would return someday when he would be in a position to claim her. Knowing that their letters were interfered with neither wrote. Then came the day of Helen's return. With her was Lord Jamison of England and rumor quickly spread that she was to marry him. Out of town John did not hear of this until several weeks later. Happiness shattered, he strode along the comforting hills. Looking down he saw Helen and her companion, their horses held back from the rest. Later he learned that Lord Jamison was proposing then. But he saw her head shake and in a moment the other, chagrined, pull up his reins and ride away. Helen dismounted and led her horse to the stream where she disconsolately viewed the past. Softly, John called to her. . . Again a robin sang and the waters mirrored two heads together under cherry blossoms swaying overhead.

TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE

(TRADE MARK)

VOL. VI | JULY, 1934 EDITION | No. 9

TO OUR PRODUCER AND WRITER-FRIENDS THROUGHOUT UNITED STATES AND FOREIGN COUNTRIES

NEW YORK CITY negotiates by far the majority of all stories utilized in Talking Pictures today, and our new department thus enables adequate representation in this field.

We maintain a staff of experts who are second to none. Whether it be work of synopses, technical working continuity, criticism, revision or typing, you may rely upon work of integrity at all times.

The necessity for legal protection through copyright is very evident. Proof of this is demonstrated almost daily in newspapers throughout the country. The Library of Congress at Washington is maintained for that purpose. Reliance upon the common law is unwise. No honorable author or producer desires to become involved in burdensome litigation, and copyright protection is protective insurance, by registration, against that substantial expense. The producer is thus protected against any unfounded claims of authorship, as well as the author himself.

TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE reaches only the producers and our clients. It is not on public sale. No advertisements are accepted, it being our purpose to keep it a strictly professional magazine.

Our offices are available for those producers who do not depend upon staff continuity writers. Our rates for this work are reasonable and are subject to contract.

In addition to synopses herein printed, complete script is submitted to suitable producers where in our judgment such submission is advisable.

Free copy of publication is sent to each author whose story appears herein.

Producers will find it extremely useful to retain TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE in their files for a future emergency, in event that their present needs are supplied.

Cyril G. Fleck Drama File No. 12194

EARS still ringing from the words of warm gratitude of his last poor patient, Dr. Leslie Warron sinks wearily into the office chair for a moment's surcease. A telephone message begs him to come in consultation with old Dr. Hall over an unnamed sick bed. On the way, Dr. Warron is stopped by Mrs. De La Jance with her daughter Hermoine who urge him to attend the club dance that evening. Leslie politely refuses, conscious that Hermoine's mother and his own are intending to make a match between them, which will unite two fortunes and prominent names. A few minutes later, staring down at the lovely face of the patient, delirious from grief over the recent death of her father, Leslie recognizes Arline Stanton, the girl whom only a little while ago he again dreamed of. Seven years have passed since their close friendship in Warrenton High School when graduation had marked their last hours together, for Mrs. Warron alarmed at their growing relationship had insisted upon Leslie attending college many miles away. Soon Arline's letters ended but her place in the young man's heart grew increasingly strong. That this is true also of Arline he realizes when Arline, not recognizing him, continuously calls his name. As soon as she regains consciousness the Halls whom she affectionately terms, Madre and Padre, gently make Leslie's presence known. Leslie loses not a moment in assuring her of his love but Arline insists on waiting till the period of mourning is over, before their engagement is announced. Meanwhile to foster the rumor of an engagement, Mrs. De La Jance has Mrs. Warron as her guest but though compelled to attend dinner there and return the hospitality at his home, Leslie steadily refuses to be more than civil. Mrs. Warron refuses to hear of any marriage between Leslie and Arline who feels that it would be best to part, not wishing to come between mother and son. When news comes to Warron linking his name with Hermoine, he feels that something must be done. To introduce Arline to the society which she shrinks from but her father's name entitles her to, Leslie brings her to the club to dine upon returning from a visit to the cemetery. Among those struck with her beauty is Judge Horton who arouses jealously in Leslie but his subsequent proposal makes her more amenable to the suggestion that the marriage take place shortly. Haddonville is amazed at the engagement announcement but the Halls' friends, the Grandins, immediately sponsor a large dinner. It is here that Leslie first learns that Hermoine's father, a gambler, under attack by Attorney Stanton for evil practices, attempts to assassinate Stanton. Failing to provoke more than a flesh wound, De La Jance fled to Europe. Later while Norris and Leslie walk behind Edith Grandin and Arline in the garden, a shot rings out which would have killed Arline if she had not suddenly bent her head to fondle a flower. Rushing to the direction of the bullet, the men find Hermoine who in mad jealousy attempts to turn the pistol on Leslie. These facts are withheld from Arline and the public, but to Mrs Warron who still refuses to approve the marriage though her husband does, Leslie confides what manner of woman she would force him to marry. Too proud to yield though she is tempted, through the aid of Mrs. Hall, Mrs. Warron listens to the ceremony over the telephone. Suddenly a loud explosion is heard. The munitions plant on land owned by the Warrons and near their home has blown up because of labor troubles. Delivering his bride to the welcoming arms of Mrs. Warron who at last freely confesses her false standards, Leslie goes to care for the injured and Arline soon insists on following. Late that night the Halls and the Warrons greet the couple over the wedding cake which symbolizes the triumph of love.

DANCING SLIPPERS

Claire Sabbatine Drama File No. 12243

FROM the stairway, Geraldine Maldine, popularly known as Jerry looks down upon the gay crowd that throng her home for an evening of dancing. First among the men who at once crowd about is Tony who begs her for a dance. Just as she is about to slip into his arms, Gregory, her fiance asks to speak to her. Alone, Gregory pleads with Jerry not to dance with anyone else. He can never bear to see her in another's arms. Gladly, Jerry consents. A little later she is wandering into the library when voices arrest her. Hearing her name spoken by Gregory, Jerry can not help but listen. So she learns that to Gregory she meant nothing serious —only a flame of the moment. Rushing in upon Gregory and his startled companion, a stranger, Jerry flings the ring at his feet and orders him from the house. A year later Jerry still intent on revenge learns that Gregory is sailing for Paris. When Tony asks her to sail to Europe as his dance partner at the famous Cafe de Paris, Jerry consents although her guardian protests for she has no need to earn her living. Through detectives, Jerry ascertains where Gregory has his apartment and moves directly across the hall from him. Opening night at the Cafe all Paris attends. A moment's hush in the program and from the ceiling a beautiful flower covered basket descends. It halts midway and pushing off the cover, Jerry, a vision in silver, springs into Tony's awaiting arms. Her dancing skill is amazing and Gregory at a nearby table watches unbelieving. Yet only Jerry could dance like that! He returns to his apartment just as she is entering her own. Coolly she greets Gregory and a moment later closes the door after him, certain that once more his love is kindled. A letter from her guardian declares that he is sending someone to look after her affairs. She smiles knowing that what he really means is someone to look after her. The next evening she stops at Gregory's table to invite him to a party at her apartment. As she began to dress, her guardian's friend, Paul Lane, is announced. Much younger and more distinguished in appearance than she has expected, Jerry likes him at once and insists that he stay. Later dancing with Paul, Jerry is no longer concerned with the jealous Gregory; she wonders if she is falling in love again. During the succeeding weeks Jerry grows sure. Meanwhile, Gregory turns more and more to drugs as his unsatisfied passions grow. Stumbling upon information that Tony is really Alphonse Cartier, once a thief who has escaped from the police, Gregory pays Tony a suprise visit. Jerry's dancing must be stopped at all costs. Though Tony rebels the fear of prison is greater. One night Tony fails to catch her. To the world it looked like an accident. When she returns to consciousness in the hospital the physicians tell her that she might never dance again. The future looks bleak until Paul strides in to murmur the words of love that before have remained unspoken. Furious when he learned of the engagement, Gregory orders Tony to break the alliance at all costs or else—. Knowing that Paul will never marry a woman whose name is tarnished, Tony persuades her to make an appearance at a stag party under the impression that it is a charity benefit. But before her identity can be discovered, Paul rescues her having learned from Gregory, dying from an overdose of drugs, the details of the plot. Before the presence of death, Jerry can hold no bitterness so yielding to her former lover's pleas she visits him. In his last hour he implores her to dance for him. Seeing a look of consent in Paul's worshipping eyes, Jerry gives the most splendid performance of her career before collapsing at Paul's feet while Gregory's eyes close for the last time. Soon Paul is to suggest that they marry at once. And Jerry gladly agrees confident that with him happiness is safe.

THE BREAK OF THE GAME

Ted W. Luth Drama File No. 12116

THE sight of a dozen golf balls on the desk of Chief Brady of the Federal Narcotic squad, who despises golf, amuses Sond Croll, ace detective, until he learns that they have been found in the possession of Lafer's henchmen. Since Lafer left prison where Croll had put him several years earlier, crime has been on the increase. In particular the supply of drugs has grown plentiful and Brady has found no clue to its source. Having a hunch that the balls are somehow connected, Brady turns the case of trapping Lafer over to Croll. Calling on Chief of Police Walker to find if there have been any new developments, Croll learns that Anne, lovely daughter of Judge Morley has been kidnapped. Every man on the force is engaged in the hunt while Croll is sure that this is revenge on the part of Lafer whom Morley had sentenced on his last prison stretch. During the days that follow, the public and the newspapers clamour for Walker's resignation. Though no clue on Anne's whereabouts turn up, Croll engaging in fruitless search of the underworld for dope sources picks up various information on crimes which the police department are thus aided in solving. Walker still smarts from the retorts of Morley, half crazed at the continued silence. Meanwhile Anne is a captive in the headquarters of Lafer who plans to force the Judge, through her, to call the police off from resisting his criminal activities. The one desire that Lafer has is to get Croll in his clutches and "even" old scores. Croll's first clue comes when he follows a hop-head whose supply is running low and overhears the drug fiend, speaking to three of Lafer's men, mention the Goodron Sporting Firm. Staring suspiciously at the disguised officer, the gangsters drag out the addict while Croll attempts to trail them. While crossing through an alley, an attempt is made to blackjack him; two men pummel him in the darkness. Finally Croll and one of his assailants crash through a plateglass of a store but their locked bodies save him from the full effects of the jagged bits. A bullet shot through the darkness but Croll wrenches the gun from the hand and the foiled murderer escapes. Home in his apartment, Croll bandages his wounds and prepares for the next days visit to the sporting firm. Walker, already sound asleep for hours, is awakened by the sharp ring of the telephone. The voice instantly brings his sleepy senses alert as she tells him that she is Anne Morley, broken from her bonds, and alone in the locked house. "Right over," says Walker tersely, as the girl added that he bring some sandwiches. Although caution whispers that he should bring some of his men, Walker's vanity persuades him to make the rescue alone. Entering the designated house through a window, Walker is to learn that he has neatly walked into a trap, the call having come from a gangster's moll. The crooks jeer at their discomforted victim while they gulp at the food he has brought. The next day Croll learns from the Goodron firm that in every shipment which they receive from Japan a day or two after it is deposited in the warehouse, a case of golf balls is missing. Remembering the balls found in the pockets of the arrested gangsters, Croll obeys a hunch. A shipment has just arrived so he hides himself in the warehouse and arrests two figures in the act of carting off boxes, only to be tapped on the head by an unobserved third. Recognized, Croll is delivered to Lafer who is determined to torture him before turning him over to the Strangler to kill. Fettered in a locked room, Croll unravels his bindings by cutting them against the wires of the old fashioned brass bedpost whose top he unscrews. Through the opening in the scuttle hole of the ceiling he throws out notes giving his whereabouts, tucked in the bedpost tops. Not daring to descend, he forces the lock and follows a short flight of stairs leading to the storc room. Intent on investigating the mysterious packing cases, he finds only the innocent looking golf balls that had similarly reposed on Brady's desk. However, he hurriedly thrust them into his pooket and backed out, only to be suddenly knocked down and choked by the Strangler. Unticd when he comes conscious again, Croll is startled but the raised voices of the gangsters nearby indicate that his chances for escape once more were worthless. Remembering the golf balls, Croll began to drill a hole in one—several strung on a shoe cord would make a formidable wcapon. In a few moments he was amazed when a white powder began to form and the inner part seemed soft. A taste of a flick of dust on his tongue and Croll knows that the drugs are smuggled in through the harmless looking balls. Knocking the Strangler out with the weapon, Croll locates the girl whose courage and beauty instantly endears him. Freeing Walker, he arranges for the police chief to guard the girl while Croll attempts to get to Lafer unseen by the body guard. Successfully creeping past the gangsters, assembled playing cards, Croll turns a pistol on Lafer but exhausted by the struggle of the last few hours, wavers. Seizing his chance, Lafer jumps upon the detective and the two are engaged in a desperate struggle, oblivious of the shots and yells from outside. Conscious of this finally, each hopes that they are his men. Lafer's pistol warns Croll into enternity but the exhausted detective spins it from his hand. And Lafer is overcome, sprawled out, when the smashed door reveals Brady and his men. The next day in Brady's office, Croll demonstrates the evidence which marks the end of Lafer's reign. When the Judge orders him to claim his reward, the embrace of Croll and Anne informs him that he must soon prepare for a son-in-law.

LEADING MAN

Lloyd S. Fujimoto Drama File No. 12051

BING DAVIES presents a lavish extravaganza on the farewell night of his appearance at an exclusive Hawaiian hotel. The audience is wild with delight as he leads his orchestra, playing all the popular dance pieces of the season and obligingly singing their favorite numbers in his own inimitable style. The next afternoon, while a huge crowd gathers to wish him bon voyage. Bing boards the yacht of James Olgelthorpe, wealthy financier and his personal friend. No one notices a shabbily dressed girl who steals into the star's stateroom. Soon the yacht is bound for the States while Bing and Olga Olgelthorpe admire the blue of the calm water together, on deck. Olga's arm is drawn through Bing's; romantic dream in her eyes as she outlines a future for him with the assistance of her father's influence. Gently refusing, Bing tells her that he must win success by his own efforts; then, someday, they can perhaps be together. When he enters his room, Bing is amazed to find Myra Lane, the stowaway, asleep on his bed. His startled exclamation arouses the captain who enters. In order to save the girl, Bing states that she is his wife, although he reprimands her severely when they are alone. With tears in her eyes, Myra explains that she lost her position in Hawaii; penniless, she took this method of reaching her home, believing that perhaps she could pay her way since she is an experienced dancer and singer. Touched by her youth, Bing says nothing more, and sleeps in the cabin of Monroe Dunn, his pal and assistant.

In spite of himself, Bing finds that he is falling in love with Myra as they are necessarily thrown together in the days that follow. Only to Olga does he reveal that he is not married. But when Myra, whom, he discovers, has great talent, dances and sings in an entertainment on the last night of the voyage Olga, losing her temper, hysterically denounces them both, claiming that Myra is Bing's mistress. The next day Bing receives documentary evidence, stating that the woman whom he believes is his mother brands him as an illegitimate child. Completely broken and disillusioned by this unhappy news, he deserts his friends, believing that he must not ask Myra to become his wife. In order to hide bis identity, Bing changes his name, securing employment in a cheap cafe. With the help of Monroe Dunn, Myra wins prominence as a musical comedy star. Newspaper notices praise her work unanimously. Although Monroe pleads with her to become his wife, she refuses, informing him that she is still in love with Bing and believes someday he will come back to her.

Dunn prepares to produce an elaborate musical revue securing Myra's services as the leading lady. Waldo Thomas plays opposite her, and rehearsals begin. The setting is in Hawaii, with the last scene occuring on a yacht. Accidentally, Monroe encounters Bing in a cafe; the two friends enjoy a happy reunion. Anxiously Bing inquires after Myra, but forces Monroe to promise that he will not mention this chance meeting. Although Monroe pleads with him to accept the lead in his musical production, Bing refuses. On the night of the opening, Waldo enters his dressing room, intoxicated, and is summarily discharged. Monroe urges Bing to fill his place, which he agrees to do. Not until they are both on the stage do Myra and Bing realize they are to play together, but both sing and dance as never before. The woman who adopted Bing admits, the following day, that his mother was legally married; Olga bribed her to make this charge. As they read the glowing notices together, Myra and Bing realize that both success and love have come to them.

WHITE FLOWER

Harry Rinola Melodrama File No. 11953

ENTERING the narrow dark shop, Leroy's eyes blinked from the contrast of the bright daylight outside which never entered the store. Leaving him to wander among the curios, his friend Scotty hurried to Tai Sang, the shopkeeper who as always sat almost motionless behind the antique writing desk. The usual conventional greetings ot ceremony over, Scotty asked with apparent casualness, "The Ear has been busy again I hear?" No sooner were the words spoken then the shrill high notes of police whistles sounded. At a nod from Tai Sang, a clerk slipped out upon the crowded Chinese street of Shanghai. Tai Sang seemed not to heed the question but bustled over to Leroy's assistance; however, his eyes narrowed upon learning that Leroy was a private detective engaged on a holiday. Returning, the clerk and Tai Sang spoke briefly; then Tai Sang invited the two into his private quarters. Here, over the tea cups, Leroy learned that for weeks that section which was occupied by wealthy shopkeepers catering to tourists had been victimized through blackmail and robbery by a group led by a man known only as The Ear. This latest disturbance was a personal visit upon a proprietor who had refused their demands for "protection" money. Leroy's eyes were drawn to the silken hangings where suddenly appeared before him, the loveliest woman he had ever seen. Clothed in the silken flowing garments of the east, she herself belonged to the white race. As she advanced into the room, Tai Sang introduced the White Flower. Later, Leroy learned that she was an orphan, the daughter of Tai Sang's old master who despised his relations and had made Tai Sang promise to oare for her. Through the years she had been the most treasured jewel of that Chinese household. Reluctantly Leroy departed. Unable to forget her, he returned a few days later and begged leave to speak to Tai Sang alone. The old Chinese was still upset; a few moments earlier he had come upon Police-sergeant Luson, through whose veins flowed the blood of both white and yellow race, endeavoring to make love to White Flower. The girl who had looked upon him as one of the few friends she was permitted, was struggling against him, in horror. With cold fury, Tai Sang ordered Luson away; but it had served to make him realize that his home was not the best place for a marriageable white girl. With relief, he heard Leroy's confession that he wished to see more of White Flower; already he loved her and hoped that she could learn to care enough to marry him. The following days were happy ones and when Leroy had to leave on a business trip for a few days he did so reluctantly. He returned to find that upon receiving a blackmailing note ordering the payment of a large sum to The Ear, Tai Sang had openly threatened punishment, planning to trap the thieves by giving marked bills. Instead, he was robbed a few minutes later while on his way home. And it was rumored that more dreadful reprisal was to come for Tai Sang's public defiance. The old man refused Leroy's plea for a guard. Three times, strangers entered the shop but there was none to tell that they never emerged. Then came the evening tbat White Flower strangely vanished after saying goodnight to Leroy, now her accepted fiance. Tai Sang did not call the police but visited the cellar instead where the six members of The Ear gang had been trapped. Anticipating their visits, he had placed life sized puppets which in the gloom resembled him and his clerks behind the counter. A speaking trumpet connected him with the dummy and the clerks manipulated wires which gave the figures semblance of life. When the thieves sought to overpower Tai Sang, a trap was released which dumped them like helpless flies in a special thick syrup. Days of this and now they were ready to confess who their ringleader was. Early in the morning the police were notified and Leroy sent for. The old man hid him when Luson entered and revealed that he could restore White Flower if Tai Sang would consent to their marriage. A short, sharp command! The prisoners were brought forward and with Leroy as witness Luson who suddenly collapsed upon facing them was identified as The Ear. White Flower was returned unharmed, the policeman who had turned criminal disappeared—a victim of the men he had formerly plundered. And Tai Sang burned grateful incense to the gods who removed his enemies and brought a husband to White Flower.

MILLION DOLLAR LOVE

Iolene Miller Drama File No. 12123

THE whir of an alarm clock awakens Beverly Ann; with a practiced hand she shuts it off. As she is preparing breakfast, later, the girl confides to Pinky, her canary, that she wishes for a song, a smile and a million, on this, her twentieth birthday. Obligingly, the bird trills for its mistress. Smiling, Beverly gathers Pinky's cage under her arm, taking him to the home of Mrs. Hubbard, a widow, who scrubbed floors at the office building in order to put her son through college until she was injured as she slipped on the marble stairs. Eagerly, the elderly woman confides that her boy, Danny, has a fine job in Newark and will be home to visit her soon. With a cheery greeting to Jim, the elevator boy, Beverly hastens to her office. Greeting Beverly with cold formality, T. J. Markham, broker, who employs her as his secretary, informs her that his son, Richard, is to take over the business and she will continue in his service. At the luncheon table, Beverly confides to her friend, Helen Wiry, that she hopes Richard will be more congenial than his father. Helen replies that she attended high school with the boy, a brilliant student, who, since his mother's recent death, is heir to the Markham fortunes. The sympathetic Beverly concludes that much of Mr. Markham's seeming coldness is a barrier to hide his grief. Ignoring Helen's protests that she gives too much money to Mrs. Hubbard, Beverly, after winning her desired smile from a newsboy when she gives him a quarter, calls for Pinky, and is presented to the handsome and genial Danny, who thanks her for her many kindnesses to his mother.

As Beverly and Helen are going to a dinner at the home of a friend, a car almost strikes them. The driver, an attractive young man, apologizes and offers to take them to their destination but they refuse. Helen informs Beverly that this is none other that Richard Markham. The following evening the two girls stop at Mrs. Hubbard's home. When Dan is introduced to Helen she recalls that they attended high school together, although there is little resemblance to the shy boy she knew in this self-possessed, gay young man. Laughing, they recall incidents of student days for hours together. The next morning Mr. Markham introduces Beverly to his son, who persuades his secretary to have luncheon with him. As they discover mutual tastes, the two spend many happy moments at the theatre, dining and dancing in the days that follow. When Beverly confides the wish that she has told Pinky, Richard laughs at this whimsicality which matches his own nature. One evening he asks Beverly if he may call at the apartment. Receiving permission he enters and is duly presented to Pinky who trills in satisfaction. Then, tenderly drawing Beverly to him he asks her to become his wife. Although she admits that she loves him the girl refuses. After Richard leaves, she throws herself upon her little couch, sobbing. All during her vacation, Beverly restlessly longs to return to the office and her work, as she lies on the sands of the beach. As soon as she comes back, Helen announces that she is to be married to Dan. Lovely in cool green, Beverly is bridesmaid at their wedding. When they leave on their honeymoon, Beverly telephones for Richard, confiding to him that she refused him since she believed her friend, Helen, was in love with him, and knew how she longed for a home. Despondently Richard tells her that they cannot be married as his fortune has been swept away in a bank failure, but she assures him that his love is worth more than a million. As he kisses her, Richard places his mother's opal ring upon Beverly's finger, sealing their compact.

THE NEIGHBOR NEXT DOOR

Carl Parker Drama File No. 12264

THOUGH Bob Powers was a carefree son of a wealthy father, he had the good sense to fall in love with Sue Perkins who believed that every young man should work. So the night they left the Maroh dance early, she again refused to take him for a husband while he was living on his father's earnings. Powers would have been glad to take his son into the business but the youtb was determined to live his own life and make his own career if necessary. So with Sue's blessings and what was more important her kisses, Bob opened a real estate office. Since one of the conditions was not to accept any further help financially, Bob had to watch his pennies which was the reason wby his sister Nancy came to work for him. Pretty Nancy regularly visited her father at his office. One afternoon she nearly bumped into a young good-looking chap hurrying from the inner sanctum, scarcely noticing her. But Nancy unaccustomed to such treatment looked back not only once but twice and highly approved of what she saw. From her father she learned that the man was Tom Drexel, head draughtsman and one of the cleverest in the business. Unmarried, he also reassured the girl with an understanding twinkle. Nancy flushed but she returned several times during the next few weeks in the hopes of seeing Tom again. Good-naturedly tired of hearing his sister's moans, Bob suggested that she move in the same house with him. To his amazement, Nancy promptly acted upon the suggestion. Perhaps it was only spring but Tom returning home one day was conscious of loneliness. When be nearly stumbled upon a girl mounted on a ladder hanging curtains in the top floor hall window, he instantly recognized what he had been lonely for. The bright sun showed revealing curves through Nancy's slim frock as Tom stopped to apologize. Nancy introduced herself as his next-door neighbor and soon they shook hands in pledge of friendship. Whistling, Tom returned to his apartment only to be arrested by a scream. Dashing out in the hall, Tom found Nancy wedged between the window and the radiator where she had fallen from her perch. Unable to stand on her foot, Tom ignoring her protests lifted her in his arms and unconsciously held her tight. Slowly the girl relaxed and for a moment Tom buried his burning eyes into her cool hair. That night Tom cooked a steak for the two. During the weeks that followed Tom now hurried home, disconsolate on the rare occasions when he found his neighbor out. Nanoy told him nothing of herself; he did not even know her last name. But he fully knew that he was madly, passionately in love with her. And Nancy's rare kisses were far from platonic also. One evening for the first time, Tom saw a man emerge from the apartment and heard him beg to see Nancy the following night. However, Nancy told him that she had an appointment with her neighbor. Tom was too proud to ask questions but the sight of Nancy as usual wiped away all anger. At the club, Nancy was a radiant vision. Her beauty went to his head in a fashion more powerful than wine. A slow seductive waltz whispered insinuatingly in their ears as they danced under dim lights. Only reluctantly did they part that evening. But as Tom stepped from his shower, he heard a loud rapping on Nancy's apartment and saw the stranger return. When he emerged a few minutes later he heard the stranger say, "I just had to see you because now that Pendleton deal will make it possible for us to marry." Only when Tom strode into next door apartment to furiously tell Nancy that he was going away for good early in the morning, did he learn that the visitor was her brother who planned to offer a partnership to Tom. And Bob smiling knowingly left for the arms of Sue while Nancy crept into the eager ones of Tom.

HELL'S FURY

Mrs. Everett Dague Drama File No. 12124

A LARGE Chicago stock-yard owner, James Hill expects his son Jerry to join the firm. When Jerry refuses and announces his own plans to become an aviator, Hill threatens him with disinheritance and orders his son from the house. Striding out and ordering a taxi to the depot, Jerry is resolved never to return. Only when he arrives at the railroad station, does Jerry realize that he is still wearing evening clothes but he can't go home to change. A ticket to Denver takes a large slice of his funds and when he finally resolves to buy a cheap suit of clothes in the half-hour left before the train departs, Jerry finds that his wallet has been picked. Fortunately, he encounters Tom Price, a former college class-mate who is his build, and garments are soon exchanged. Borrowing a small sum from Tom Jerry leaves refusing to reveal his destination. Meanwhile Hill secretly rejoices in the strong spirit of his motherless son. As Jerry speeds westward, the body of his father is found lifeless, slumped over the writing desk while preparing a note of apology for his harshness. It is soon revealed that Hill has been killed, shot in the back from the window. The footprints except for a peculiar toe marking, correspond to those of Jerry and the evidence of the preceding night's quarrel point to him. When an alarm is sent out, Tom testifies that Jerry must be innocent, having taken the 10:50 train to an unknown destination. But the police feel that he may have left at the next station and returned to commit the crime since no other enemies are known. Not until the youth arrives in Denver and purchases a paper which cries the news of his father's death and that he is wanted for the crime, does Jerry know what has been happening. He is so upset that he does not notice the car which plunges him into oblivion. Rushed to the hospital, Jerry is found to be suffering from concussion and a broken leg. During the days when his fate is undecided, Linda Norris, the driver of the machine and daughter of one of Denver's wealthiest men knows only remorse. The best attention is given at Norris's expense. When visitors are permitted, Jerry who can recall nothing of the past, is extremely curt to Linda whose reputation for being spoiled and reckless has preceded her. This only serves to intrigue Linda who is determined to win his love. Meanwhile Jerry gives his heart to Molly O'Grady, his nurse. The happiness when he learns that Molly cares is spoiled only by the fact that he cannot recall if he is free to marry. Linda insists on taking him to their summer home to recuperate. Although extremely attentive, Jerry continues to be gracious but remote. The reason is apparent when she overhears him phone Molly. As a last attempt, Linda arranges a trip to Colorado Springs. Evening and a storm approaches as they return home. Pretending to be out of gas, Linda stops near a deserted cabin. Huddled in blankets while their clothes dry, Linda's beauty goes to Jerry's head. Soon he recovers himself when recalling Molly, a comment by Linda makes him aware that this is a trap. The journey is resumed but before leaving the cabin Linda has found an old paper which identifies Jerry as a wanted murderer. Waiting for him in the library the next day when Jerry comes to say farewell to her father, Linda accuses Jerry of being a fugitive; and calls the police and also Molly. In a panic while Jerry nears her, Linda wounds him. Hearing the shot over the wire, Molly rushes down. Arrest is forestalled while he is removed unconscious again to the hospital. There he is to recover his memory and fall in love again with Molly. Returned to face trial, Jerry is saved when the real murderer is dragged into the courtoom. He is his fathe's old partner, years ago in love with Jerry's mother; now he has returned demented, killing Hill in insane jealousy. Jenks, the faithful butler, identified him through the shoe marks. So the shadow is lifted and life begins anew in Denver with Molly in Jerry's arms.

BANDIT ROMEO

Andrew Jackson Sliger Drama File No. 12028

ESCAPING from jail with a murder charge over his head, Clary Raymond goes west where five years later he joins the rustling outfit of Bill Lawlan. The morning before his duties start he rescues Zannie Bluelan of Lazy W Ranch whose horse is running away, frightened when Lawlan's men attempt to kidnap her. Later Clary learns that her step-father, Bluelan, is in the plot, planning to give her to Lawlan in return for posscssion of her ranch. Riding to town that evening Clary proves his gunmanship by beating Ringer, a bully, to the draw. Lawlan, not knowing that Clary is falling in love with Zannie and is determined to rescue her arranges that Clary, posing as Bluclan's nephew join the Lazy W outfit where he can entice the girl to the rustler's hideout. In a drunken fit, Bluelan reveals to Zannie that he intends to give her to Lawlan. So long as she stays on the ranch where the hands would give their lives for her, she is safe. Clary, to whom she turns for protection, confesses his true identity but promises that Zannie will be unharmed. He also admits his love but resolves that she should never marry a man like himself, with a price over his head. Meanwhile, Clary rescues Kaney Jarvis, member of Lawlan's desperadoes, who had been caught by the Double D Ranchmen in the act of stealing. A noose is already about the youth's throat when Clary snaps the rope with a bullet and rides Kaney off to safety. In gratitude the boy resolves to quit the rustling life with Clary and help his rescuer defeat Lawlan's desire for the girl. Zannie realizes the full horror of her step-father's nature when she first encounters Bluelan's son, killed by his father for the price of a few score cattle. The dying rustler informs her of Bluelan's arrangement to dispose of her. From Bluelan, Clary learns that the kidnapping will be staged after the bank is robbed. Lawlan is waiting for several large deposits and then will break up the gang; heading for the Mexican border with the girl. When Clary again rescues Kaney who is recognized by one of the ranchmen who tried to hang him, Kaney resolves—knowing that Lawlan is lightning on the draw—to destroy the bandit leader who has no idea that the youth can handle a gun. While riding with Zannie on a visit to the Paynes who own the adjoining Double D land, Clary stops to aid some cowboys sort out mis-branded cattle. Continuing the visit without him, Zannie tells Millie of her love but keeps secret the fears and dangers besetting. She returns to find that Clary's ankle is wrenched out of place. The next day, Zannie drives into town with Bluelan and two of the cowhands. The preceding night, Lawlan has decided that the time is ripe for the bank robbery. Ordering Kaney to notify Clary to bring the girl to their shaok, Lawlan rides out with his assistants. The robbery is successful until emerging from the bank they are recognized by two rangers who kill one of Lawlan's men before they themselves are killed. Hitting out on the trail, Lawlan encounters Bluelan who turns Zannie over to him together with one thousand dollars. When her cowboys resist they are fatally shot.

Learning from Bluelan what has happened, Clary after giving the older man time to defend himself, kills him. Hurrying to the rustlers' headquarters he meets Payne who turns out to be the man who helped him escape from prison, and learns that his innocence has been proven. Meanwhile, Kaney promises Zannie he will defend her. Clary bursts in upon Lawlan; reaches for his gun only to discover that during the wild ride it has fallen out. But before Lawlan can shoot, the gun of Kaney blazes, and the bandit leader's oareer is ended. The lovers see Kaney off, determined to make a new start where his reputation is unknown. Back at the ranch, Clary's happiness is completed when he discovers that Payne is married to his sister, Zannie's best friend.

A WAY OUT

Beatrice Foss Drama File No. 11974

WHILE the little group waited at the station to greet Rose Grey, returning from college, her father and Molly Chase, wife of a famous judge and his next door neighbor, stood apart remembering. Years before Molly had been Jim's secretary and they had fallen deeply in love. Divorce was contemplated by the young attorney until he learned that Grace, his wife, was to bear a child. When he broke the news to Molly, it was with horror that he learned that his sweetheart was with child also. When Grace's little daughter died a few hours after it first saw the light of day, Jim arranged to have Molly's baby girl substituted. Later Molly married Judge Chase and moved next door to the Greys where she could be near the child of her flesh whom she could never acknowledge. Always faithful to her husband, Molly found comfort in the affection which Rose held for her and the judge; while Jim would always be dear to her. In a few moments Rose was with them, radiant as she introduced Ted Palmer, the man she loved. Soon after her happiness was shattered as Mrs. Palmer objected to Rose, bitter with jealousy; and announced that their wealth was gone. Ted would have to take a small paying government job building a bridge across the Nevada Canyon. In the garden, Molly overheard Rose beg him to take her but he refused. In a bitter mood she sought out the judge who told her that the reason why Mrs. Palmer resented her friendship with the Chases was because Mrs. Palmer had stolen Ted's father from his first wife, Chase's sister. For Rose's sake he agreed to save the Palmer mansion from the auctioneer. However, that evening disclosed through the unexpected visit of Nurse Thompkins that Rose is really the daughter of the Judge and his first wife, Fawn, whom he had divorced when he learned that she possessed Indian blood. Unknown to Chase, a twin girl and boy were born; the boy was sent to the grandparents. Through the carelessness of the nurse Molly's child had also died and she had persuaded Fawn to substitute her daughter and thus ensure a good home. Molly died that night from shock; and Rose who overheard the conversation as the nurse insisted that Rose be taken to Fawn who was desperately ill and crying for her daughter, ran wildly down the street, ashamed of her Indian blood and sure that Ted would no longer marry her. Hit by Earl Price's car, Rose secured refuge at his home. After days of futile search, heartbroken Ted left. On the train he met Harold, Price's friend, who revealed where Rose was. But the house was empty when the judge and Grey arrived. Unaware that the plane which flew overhead held her lover, Rose allowed Earl to paint her portrait which he threw away when he discovered her talking with Hunter, who unknown to her was part Indian. Hunter offered her a refuge with his grandmother and learning that their birthdays fell together they started to celebrate. Finding the portrait, Ted went in search and seeing the two swimming together knocked the Indian unconsoious and escaped with Rose who fainted. Hunter had his tribe trail the girl and when she was left alone while Ted and Elbert, his friend, went shopping for clothes and a license, the girl was kidnapped. Only Hunter and Rose were to learn that they were brother and sister, Judge Chase having returned with Fawn whom he remarried. Meanwhile Ted fell ill, having discovered that the house was burned and sure that Rose had perished. A wire notifying the Greys was lost, so Ted arrived on a stretcher at his old home. The day dawned when Rose came to him a very much alive ghost and Hunter and Ted who had quarreled over the bridge site were reconciled. Remorseful, blaming herself for her son's unhappiness, Mrs. Chase killed herself so that the insurance money would enable him to marry. Ted was held for trial however, and only the discovery of the mother's letter by Rose saved her lover. So the girl was to learn that her mixed blood would not stand between happiness.

THE wheels of the train sang a happy refrain to Bonnie Davis, lovely Southern girl, traveling to New York in search of a stage career. A gifted dancer, she has just finished college and feels the need of stretching her creative wings. Bent over a magazine, Bonnie is aroused from her musing by the voice of a stranger who begs to share her seat temporarily. His own pullman section has been disconnected through mechanical difficulties. And so Bonnie first sees the man who is to live in her heart through the years of stardom and heartache that stretch ahead—Monte Gilbert. Smiling, she returns to the magazine only to have the face of the stranger staring back on a page as the famous Hollywood director who is opening a stage production in New York. It is not long before the girl reveals her dreams to him; and Monte looking down at Bonnie, garbed in the lovely grey ensemble that the loving stitches of her mother made, knows that he is dangerously near the borderline of love. At the station, Monte is introduced to her aunt and uncle, Mr. and Mrs. Stevens. Promising to call within a few days, Monte reluctantly departs. While her relations insist that she first take time to see the city, Bonnie plunges into the rounds of visiting the theatrcal agencies whose names Monte provided. Then came the morning when the eager voice of the director is on the wire and a dinner engagement is made for the Mayfair. Dressed in the latest and most daringly sophisticated gown of the period, Bonnie is the cynosure of all eyes. On the dance floor they make an outstanding couple but they are oblivious of everyone about them. Unconsciously Monte sings the words to the latest orchestra number and the other dancers retire to their seats to watch the couple. The loud boom of the flashlight from a watchful photographer brings the two to earth. Hastily, they leave and the next morning's papers feature the famous director, known hitherto to be heartproof against the wiles of some of the loveliest women in the world gathered in Hollywood; in dance embrace with the unknown Southern girl. The publicity brings her a small part in a new musical production and she throws herself completely into the work, seeing little of Monte who is tied up with business. The leading lady resents the special attentions which Jenkins, the producer, pays to Bonnie; and in a dramatic scene offers to resign. Convinced that Bonnie "has the goods" and will create a sensation on blase Broadway, Jenkins coolly calls the bluff and accepts her resignation. Bonnie's happiness at the overwhelmingly successful first night is spoiled when Monte alone is missing among the well-wishers who crowd about her when the curtain drops. Refusing all invitations, Bonnie goes home with her relatives. Despite the hour, she cannot resist calling Monte's rooms. Happy at hearing her voice, Monte at last confesses that rumor had coupled Jenkins name with hers and in jealousy he had stayed away. The next few weeks the shadow of past unhappiness was completely forgotten. Yet having tasted success, Bonnie is determined to achieve a name which will equal that of her lover. Receiving an offer from Hollywood too large to resist, Bonnie leaves with Monte's promise to join her soon. Unexpectedly, she is hastily thrust into the leading role of a play written by Monte which calls for the famous Spanish Love Dance which is known to a rare few, a closely guarded secret for it is the dance of the Spaniards used solely in the presence of their loved one. From Anita, her roommate at college, Bonnie has been initiated. The Spanish players on the lot watching Bonnie stare with admiration at the only girl in the country who knows the sacred pantomime of their native land. And Arte Rodiga, her leading man, falls hopelessly in love. Bonnie looks upon him more as a brother, however; in the small unpretentious cottage which she chooses for her home many are entertained. The new star becomes known to the public as one who will not have wild parties. The months pass quickly except that the girl still longs for Monte who corresponds faithfully. She has reached the point where contract or no, she will return to New York and her lover. None in Hollywood know that these two are intimate and even while Bonnie waits to notify the producer, she overhears a telephone conversation disclosing that Monte is returning. Alarmed when Arte begs her to see him at once, Bonnie admits him late at night. While Arte again presses his suit, the bell rings. Radiant with disbelief she stares at Monte. But when a few moments later Monte glimpses Arte in the drawing room, he refuses to listen to explanations. Thrusting a magazine in her hand and muttering, "So its true," he strides from the room. Later through her tears, Bonnie sees that the magazine contains a false announcement of her impending engagement to Arte. To Prince du Ronde of Spain, Bonnie discloses her grief the next day. Interested in her dance, the prince has come to her earlier, desirous of seeing the woman who knows the dance and amazed to learn that his daughter, Anita, was her teacher. Acting on his advice, Bonnie attends the party given in Monte's honour. Begged to dance, trembling, Bonnie tells the tradition of the dance she is to give. Arte and Gilbert stand tense until with swift movements the girl stands before Monte. Through her dance she speaks to him; makes him realize his insane suspicions. Still he says nothing and abruptly Bonnie breaks through the crowd to the safety of her home. The servants are away when the bell rings and wearily, Bonnie answers, once more to see her lover. This time there is to be no parting; the papers are to announce their marriage in the famous oity of Yuma the next morning. Among the first to congratulate them is the Prince but Monte's slumbering jealousy is aroused for the last time when Bonnie discloses that the Prince is his uncle who has been seeking him through the years that Monte's mother abandoned home and fortune for the sake of love.

A RADIO ROMANCE

Jean Andresen Drama File No. 12278

FROM the loudspeaker in one of the wards of the New York Sanitarium is broadcast the announcement that Ruth Harris, the singer, is beginning her regular program. Jack in his bed stirs restlessly and to his pal Dick, a visitor, confesses that he waits each day to hear her on the Soldiers' Hour. Holding up a warning finger for silence, Jack closes his eyes while the beautiful voice fills the room. For Jack, Ruth is his Radio Girl but Dick warns him that she is probably a staid married woman. In the studio, Ruth turns to her fan mail which includes a letter from Jack signed simply "Buddy" and is a tribute to her made up from the song title hits of the day. Gertrude, studio pianist, reminds her that she must practice the song, "Farewell, My Love," for her audition with Forth, the big theatre producer, who is looking for someone "different." Tears are in her eyes when she closes and Ruth confesses that it reminds her of her soldier sweetheart who was killed in the war. At the program next day, remembering the unknown Buddy, Ruth sends a message of appreciation over the airwaves. That evening Forth hears Ruth and immediately contracts for her; since there are weeks of intensive rehearsing ahead Ruth is forced to leave the radio. Her farewell is said over the waves and when Dick makes his regular call on Jack, he finds him considerably upset as a result. Dick seeks to cheer him by telling Jack that now he will see more publicity on her in the papers. Opening night for the first time Forth begs her to slip off alone with him following the show. Her appealing voice and charm "stops" the program and her parents are among the first to congratulate her afterwards. Since Mack, the radio announcer, and Gertrude beg to make a party of it, not until the next evening are Ruth and Forth alone. To Ruth's amazement, he confesses his love for her. Ruth hesitates for she knows that he has an unusually fine character and that her shrewd parents also approve of him, still her heart has been buried long ago. In justice to Forth she tells him that the play reminds her very much of her own love story which was why she sang always with such feeling. Very young, she had gone to the heart of the fighting in France to sing to the soldiers. Here she met the boy who won her heart and was soon killed in action. Forth feels only pity, secure that he has no flesh and blood rival. He plans to win her from her dreams of the past. Now she must live for the future. Here is offered a haven of peace and security. The next day Ruth gives her answer. Yes. When Jack reads the announcement he has a violent attack which the physicians regard gravely since for years they have been trying to bring back his memory, lost through shell shock. Despite this, he insists on attending a special performance given for the veterans just before the show takes to the road at the end of a successful New York run. Nervously, Ruth steps out on the stage fixed up as a war-time billet and sings the old-time songs in which the soldiers suddenly join in. Suddenly, escaping his nurse, Jack leaps to the stage and in the middle of her song, Ruth stops unbelievingly; then runs to greet him. Seeing her recalls his memory. So Forth learns that this is her old sweetheart and since for professional purposes she had changed her name, it had recalled nothing of the past to Jack earlier. Generously, Forth releases her and when Jack makes a rapid recovery, the lovers are forever united at the Little Church Around the Corner.

HEROES OF THE SKY

Wesley W. Dillion Drama File No. 12199

WITH a nervous apprehensive glance at the door marked "President" private secretary Mildred Lesser turned the knob at last and entered. Clark Winthrop snarled in anger as he pointed out several mistakes in the outgoing mail. In silence the girl took them and fled. The telephone rang. "Yes, I got the government contract," responded Clark wearily to the unseen friend. It was on his desk now representing a very neat profit and yet Clark was far from happy. He was weary with everything even the business which he had built up to one of the largest in its field. On sudden impulse, Clark strode down to his car and drove to the library. From the librarian he asked a short story which would make him forget. "You mean make you remember," was the answer. For the first time he looked directly at the girl and was amazed at her severe beauty. Though he tried to protest her words, finally Clark confessed their truth. A book was brought to him and for a few minutes Clark sat alone reading it. At last he found a message which first made him think—the need to consider others. An hour later back in his office, Clark called Mildred. After she had taken a few letters and brought him the code of the Business and Professional Club she might take the day off to recuperate from his surly disposition. Audibly Mildred gasped and fled. Once Clark, noted for his ruthless tactics, turned from the organization because it was too idealistic. Today the words which pointed out that business men had a duty to society first held new signifiance. Several times Clark returned to the library until Lorraine permitted him to take her driving. Though she laughed away gently his protestations of love, Clark returned to the office one afternoon more hopeful than he had been for some time. There he was amazed to see his secretary in tears. Dumbly she pointed to headlines which announced that Victor Brady an aviator from their city had been killed while fighting six enemy planes. It is a moment before Clark realized that Victor and Mildred were engaged. The thought of this man not so many years younger than he who has sacrificed his life while Clark's own bankroll mounts, profiting from the war, shamed him. At the Brady home, Clark offered to make every effort to bring back their son's body. A few days later, Clark's growing awareness that he and the other men of the town are poor patriots was emphasized when, while dining at the club with Lorraine, America's anthems were played. Even the waiters stood at attention and from the one at their table, Clark learned of the sacrifice he has made. But among the diners how many sacrificed their kin? When King his bitterest competitor came the next day with a contract proposal which will net huge profits, Clark at last convinced him that all of them had been acting criminally. He proposed a new order of business dealings with only moderate profit from the government. Then through the instigation of Lorraine, Clark instituted weekly dances and socials for his amazed employees. After Victor's body arrived, standing at the grave Clark came to a decision. Calling together the leading business men, he urged them to sacrifice their sons and comforts even as the great majority were compelled to. He himself was going to enlist at once in the aviation forces. That night Lorraine learned his decision but she insisted that she participate in the sacrifioe and send another hero of the sky to France as her husband.

THE LION OF SCOTLAND

M. Elizabeth Waldie Drama File No. 12127

WHILE rescuing the Earl of Mar from a band of English soldiers, Sir William Wallace kills Arthur Heselrigge, nephew of the tyrant English governor, Heselrigge. Hastening on to his castle in the glen of Ellerslie, Wallace barely arrives before the place is stormed by a troop seeking vengeance, led by the governor. Escaping to the remote glen of Corie Lynn, Wallace vows to set Scotland free when he learns that the ruler has looted his property. Through mountains and glens, clans arise in response to Wallace's call for battle. Lady Mar, considering Wallace an outlaw, begs her step-daughter Helen to dissuade the Earl from participating. But Helen is inspired by the thought of Wallace whom she has never seen and craves to join the impending fray. Warning her step-daughter that she will regret her refusal, Lady Mar sends a letter to her traitorous kinsman, Earl Buchan, warning him of the plan to send armed men to the aid of Wallace. She suggests that to avert suspicion, Lord Soulis, who is deeply and unrequitedly in love with Helen, be sent in command of a large armed force to seize the rebel Scots. In return for the pledge of safety, she promises that Helen shall become Lord Soulis' bride. As a result, the possessions of the Earl of Mar are seized in a surprise attack with no opportunity to resist. Helen is forcibly seized by Soulis' soldiers and mounted on the horse of one of the men who is soon joined by his Lord. Realizing her danger the girl unsuccessfully struggles on the journey; to renew her fight when they stop on the mountain for the night. Hearing shrieks for help, Wallace rides to her rescue, first wounding Soulis. He places her under the protection of the Sage of Ercildown; and goes to lead his people to victory. On the field of Stirling in the presence of the great clans an enthusiastic populace hail him as king. Stout Wallace refuses the crown so long as Bruce the rightful heir still lives but finally consents to be considered Protector until Bruce returns. At Stirling Castle, Wallace is introduced to Lady Mar who meeting him for the first time becomes desperately infatuated. Left alone with him, Lady Mar drops her head upon his shoulder. When, in astonishment, he repulses her, Lady Mar pleas with him to have pity on a woman who is married to a man much too old for her. Though Wallace refuses to dishonor his friend she believes that if she were only free Wallace could love her, not realizing that he has already given his heart to Helen. While encamped at Berwick preparing for battle, Lady Mar comes to be near Wallace, disguised as the Knight of the Green Plume. In this battle her husband is killed but victory goes to Wallace's forces. Creeping to his tent that night, Lady Mar reveals her true identify. Spurning her love and treasures, Wallace refuses to heed her prayers. Swearing that Helen shall never have him then, Lady Mar attempts to stab him. Failing in this, she has him falsely accused of plotting with Philip of France aganst Scotland, presenting forged documents through the chieftains who resent Wallace's success. When the nobleman is condemned to death, Helen bribes admittance to him in the Tower of London. In the few hours remaining before death shall part them, Wallace desires to make her his bride. So in a dim cell the marriage service is held; then come the rites for the dying. As Wallace marches out to the scaffold, Helen determines to follow. While the executioner nears carrying a rope, Helen throws herself upon her husband. In an access of emotional strength, Wallace bursts his bonds and while he clasps her tightly, his heart fails. Wallace falls to death carrying Helen with him. And before the hushed crowd the Sage of Ercildown predicts that the noble Bruce will carry on the victorious work of Wallace; someday England and Scotland shall be honorably united.

THE LOVE DANCE

Jean Wolford Mystery Drama File No. 12259

"BRAVO," cried Lee from his table in the Desert Edge Cafe at the close of the Egyptian dancer's program. Ignoring the meaning glances of the others, Lee caught her in his arms and proudly strode out to the waiting car. Driving through the darkness to the week-end cottage, Lee gazed fondly at Moya cuddled against his shoulder. Lee knew what the English colony were voicing—a white man with a black girl and yet she was not dark but a magnificent bronze painting of flesh and blood that seeped into his heart. "Love me?" asked the girl as he lifted her from the car while the resplendent desert moon stared down. Lips pressed tightly against hers in anwer. For him alone after dinner that night, Moya danced the beautiful movements of the dance of love. Lee woke the next morning with the determination to make Moya his bride regardless of race. To his amazement he found her gone. That night when he went to the cafe, thinking she had played a trick, another girl appeared on the program. A note was slipped to him. Moya had thought it best to leave for though she cared she realized what he would suffer if he married her. Suddenly, Lee pondered if words of warning which came from an Arab boy, telling him to "leave her alone; go back to England," whom he had bumped into that afternoon while searching, had any connection. Agonized, Lee sought refuge at the house only to find with amazement that the place had been ransacked. Then blackness came and Lee knew nothing more. . . The family greeted Lee exuberantly when he returned to England. Connie his kid sister could hardly wait to have him meet her fiance. Upstairs in her room that night while Lord and Lady Banks went to a bridge engagement, Connie dragged out her album while she gave the history of her romance. Glancing idly over them, Lee was shocked to find the photograph of Moya staring at him. At his sudden cry, Connie was startled. To his eager questions she replied however that John had obtained the photograph; she had danced in that city only recently. After a troubled night, Lee prepared to go riding with the engaged couple. A fresh shock awaited him when he met John Elsworth who bore a strong resemblance to Moya. Surely it must be only imagination still when he went to the stable there was the Arab boy of the desert who this time slipped a note in his pocket. At the first opportunity, Lee read it—"You have taken my woman. For that, I kill you."

He reported the warning to his people that night but the boy had vanished. A few days later, Lee escorted his sister and John to Lady Carson's dance reception but excused himself before entering; and met him according to a previous appointment and swiftly drove back to the house. Here the maid mentioned that Tom the butler had gotten wind of their affair and warned her. They laughed as Lee went down to the safe. A shot rang out; a dead body was found. At the station the butler and the Arab boy were being third-degreed for Lee's death when Lee, a very much alive ghost, appeared to his family. Then it was learned that Lee had been impersonated by a double for purposes of robbery. He, himself, had been made a prisoner in Egypt and only recently escaped. That night Connie announced a surprise. In the darkened room came the music of the love dance. In imagination, Lee saw his lost dear one again. But now the clashing bangles were real. "Moyna," he cried striding over to the whirling girl before him. So Lee was to learn that she was John's sister and the bar between marriage had fallen.

THE SILENT AVENGER

Merwin H. Bartlett Western File No. 12088

SILENTLY, Jim Lawson rides into the little western town of Kent, recalling the day he left, ten years ago, following a quarrel with his father because he asked him to discharge Art Rider, his foreman, and the older man refused. Seated at a table in a cafe, Jim notices an elderly rancher with his pretty daughter. A man swaggers to the table, striking the rancher and advising the girl that she had best accept his attentions. Instantly, Jack reprimands him severely, throwing him unceremoniously into the street. Introducing himself as John Taylor and presenting his daughter, Helen, the rancher thanks Jim warmly, but warns him that he has won the emnity of Art Rider, leader of a notorious band of outlaws. At the Eagle Saloon, Jim encounters Lem Martin, his old friend, who informs him that either Art Rider or Red Jack, his gun man, killed Jim's father and took papers of ownership from the ranch safe. Under the pseusodonym of Silent Smith, Jim becomes acquainted with members of Art's gang in the saloon, discovering their plans to raid the Taylor ranch from one of the men who is intoxicated. He rides swiftly, leaving a warning for the occupants of the ranch, who arm their boys. Then he pins a note by throwing a knife to the door of headquarters for Art's gang, threatening their destruction. In terror, Jack advises Art to leave the country but he is determined to see the affair thru, and threatens to kill Jack if he deserts.

Discovering one of his men killed, with a cross marked on his forehead, Jack announces that their enemy is the dreaded Silent Avenger, who has restored law and order throughout the valley by deed of sensational bravery. The ranchers organized a vigilante committee, encouraged by the knowledge that they have a mysterious leader. Fearing to attack openly, but desirous of securing cattle and money from the Taylor ranch, Art dispatches one of his Mexicans to kidnap Helen as she rides the range. Overpowering her, the Mexican carries her away but Jim sees them in the distance. Leaping over perilous embankments and ascending steep inclines, he follows a short cut until he is able to overtake the pair. As he rescues Helen, Jim forces the Mexican to reveal that Art's men are organizing for an attack in a nearby canyon. Summoning his vigilantes after he returns Helen to her father, Jim leads them to the canyon. A fierce battle ensues; led by Jim, the vigilantes, although outnumbered, traps Art's notorious gang. The sheriff from a neighboring county arrives with his men, arresting the outlaws and the sheriff at Kent, who has been allied with them. As they are taken into custody, Art escapes, dashing through the chapparal on his horse. The following day Jim discovers him in the saloon, and, giving him an opportunity to draw his gun, exchanges shots with him. Jim is wounded, Art fatally injured. As he dies Art confesses to the murder of Jim Lawson's father and reveals the hiding place of the deed to the ranch. Taken to the Taylor ranch, Jim regains consciousness through Helen's skillful nursing. He tells her that he loves her, but can only offer her a broken down ranch as a home. As she smiles at him, Helen tells Jim that she would be happy to build the ranch up once more with him.

BLIND ROMANCE

Cordelia W. Goggins Drama File No. 12304

WHEN Jim ran up the stairs, Lucy watched with a pang of pain. He looked so tired and worn. Too many late nights, ever since he met Rose. Ever since Jim had come to board at Aunt Bessie's house Lucy had looked upon him as a brother, only perhaps dearer than any brother could be. Lucy resented that unknown girl because her demands seemed to be many. She could only go to the expensive places so the nights, Jim was not seeing her he spent doing overtime work to increase his income. A few minutes later, Jim reappeared all slicked up for the evening. For a moment he stopped to chat with the girl. As if in amazement he commented on her attractiveness and then said with a sigh that there didn't seem to be girls these days who liked to stay home. The next girl he fell in love with, he continued jokingly, would have to be a fire-house mouse. Timidly, Lucy suggested that he stay home anyway and rest. But Jim was afraid that someone else might cut him out. Before he left, Jim kissed her lightly. She was still lost in astonishment when the door closed. Never before had that happened. It could not have been more than an hour or two when an excited Jim returned and called Lucy and Aunt Bessie from their rooms. With him was Rose, a girl of cold beauty who seemed disdainful of her present surroundings. Rose had just promised to marry Jim and to please him she had consented to stop at his house on the way downtown. She had a way of looking at Lucy which disturbed her. That night Lucy's pillow was stained with tears. It was only a few nights later that Jim, dashing out to meet Rose, was hit by a car and brought back to the house in a stretcher. At first it was thought that Jim was going to be blind; then kindly Dr. Smith decided there was a fighting chance within the next few weeks if his spirits were kept up. When Jim regained consciousness the first thing he asked was that Lucy notify Rose. If the fiance had any concern it was apparent to Lucy that it was only on the manner in which it affected their relationship. After a moment, Rose said that she would be unable to come since her mother had been taken ill. With this Jim had to content himself, but as the days passed as no letter came, Aunt Bessie and Lucy—recalling the doctor's words—watched Jim with concern. One morning Aunt Bessie came in when Lucy was reading a letter from Rose. After the girl left the room Aunt Bessie came to her puzzled. She was sure that no letter had come; so Lucy confessed to the deception which she felt warranted under the circumstances. She began to bring fruit and flowers, supposedly from Rose. After the doctor reassured them that soon his sight would be regained, hour after hour Lucy had to sit and listen to praises of Rose. Then came a telegram for Aunt Bessie that her sister was ill. It was late in the afternoon and no one could be obtained for a chaperone. Reassuring her, after she had gone, Lucy pretended that Aunt Bessie had retired early and sat awhile talking with Jim. The whole house was still; Lucy had just gotten into bed when the bell rang. Restless Jim insisted on going down. There was Rose standing with a strange man. Immediately Rose seeing Lucy and Jim in night clothes leaped to the conclusion that she had "interrupted." In springing to her defense, Jim was to learn that the letters had never been written and Rose had finally come only because the doctor was taking the bandages off tomorrow. Jim, himself ripped off the bandages and ordered her from the house. Now he was to look upon Lucy with new eyes and recognize his own love for her that in those past weeks had grown.

CUPID FLIES

John Smoke Drama File No. 12120

AFTER the last guest departs from the Boorshead Inn, Hans Simmonson, the proprietor, and his two old cronies, Thomas Bohnet and William Strauss, gather around the fire place for discussion. The trio resolve to relate their first experiences in love. Strauss, smiling in recollection, confides that when a farm hand, eigbteen years old, he fell in love with a widow, almost twice his age, but this armour was forgotten the following summer as he met and married the bired girl. Pretty Anna, with ber blue eyes and flaxen hair, first won Strauss' heart when he saw ber at the county fair and, as his devoted wife, has held it ever since, he states. When it becomes Bohnet's turn to entertain the group he promises to write his story and send it to them that they may read it the following week. The next morning, Bohnet is found dead, the result of a heart attack, and is laid to rest by the side of his beloved wife, Marian. That evening bis friends solemnly read the manuscript which he entrusted to them, the years turning back as the story unfolds.

A boy of sixteen, Bohnet was brought to the country in order that his mother's health might be improved. Full of the idealism of youth, the lad chafed at the restrictions of country life, although Marian, whose farm bordered bis, became his devoted friend, exploring the country side with him and listening sympathetically to his ambitions of becoming a great surgeon. One afternoon as he was walking alone, Thomas saw the most beautiful girl in the world, to his eyes, through the window of a cottage. He learned from his father that this was probably Josephine of the widow Hanson's two daughters. Unable to call herself because of poor health, Thomas' mother send the boy on a mission. He ran almost all the way and, after a gracious reception by Mrs. Hanson was presented to the girl of his dreams. As the two gathered bundles of wool together, Thomas was swept away with his emotion, in love for the first time. Returning to the house, he was presented to Mr. Williams, a soldier, whom be hated for his military bearing and suavity, sensing that he was a dangerous rival. Invited to all the parties at the Hanson home, all the youths of the countryside paid homage to her charm. During a game, Thomas drew x on a slip of paper, entitling him to ask any question. Thomas watched his idol in mute adoration while impulsively, he asked his beloved whom she loved most in all the world, and she pointed toward the aquaduct, answering "He is there." The next morning, Dr. Abrama, the Pastor, gently warned Thomas that Josephine, because of her beauty, might be indiscreet and not one upon whom he should set his heart. Refusing to bear a word against ber, he turned away, but that night he saw two embracing by the aquaduct and, with a frozen heart, discovered Josephine and his father! Agreeing to keep this secret for his mother's sake, the boy returned, all faith and hope forever gone. It was Marian who helped dispel his sorrow, encouraged him to turn once more to his studies. Years later he married her and came to realize that no man could have a finer wife in the great happiness they shared. Accidentally Thomas encountered Dr. Abrams and learned that Josephine, his first love, had just died after a dissolute life.

As the friends conclude this reading, they agree it was for the best, thinking of Marian and Thomas, now together once more.

Harold K. Johnson Drama File No. 12256

WITH a sigh of relief, Dick Stevens waits on his last customer at the soda fountain before closing time. To Harold he announces that tomorrow he leaves the small town for the city. His uncle, Bob Harvey, is a police captain there and with his help Dick hopes to enter the force. Meanwhile there is a job waiting for him. Bidding his family an affectionate farewell the next morning, Dick eagerly boards the train, bound for the place he has always dreamed of; confident that there fame and fortune awaits. His uncle is busy on a case so he sends a taxi to bring bis nephew bome. Dick is amazed when lovely Helen Baker opens the door and tells him that she is the maid expecting him. Dick's eyes are constantly upon her as she goes in and out the rooms. From his uncle that evening Dick learns that she is the daughter of an old friend; an orphan now whom Bob has taken into his home as housekeeper. She bas a brother, Harold, who years ago ran away from home. For the present he begs Dick to keep an eye on the girl for Joe, a member of Spamoni's gang has been pestering her with his unwelcome attentions. Late that evening, Helen receives a call to come down to Spamoni's Casino at once; ber brother is in trouble. She is warned not to tell anyone of ber errand. As she slips from the house she is seen by Bob who says nothing. At her destination, Joe warns that her brother is wanted for robbery and will be given up unless she keeps away from Dick, whose arrival has been watched by Joe who senses a rival. Too, Bob better quit watching the Casino which runs a crooked gambling outfit secretly. The next day Bob mentions that the police intend to raid the place shortly. Frigbtened, Helen begs him to stop it but gives no reason. Sensing that Joe may be in back of this, Bob tells bis nepbew to watch the girl. When another phone call comes, Dick follows her, through the back entrance and listens in to the conversation which informs him of the hold that Joe has upon her. Suddenly a gun is prodded into his ribs by one of the gang members who slips up on him and Dick is shoved into the room. Surprised, Helen calls him by name and Joe is determined to bold him as prisoner, forcing Bob to make peace terms therefore. But Dick rushes to the phone and shouts "Police" just before a blackjack knocks him unconscious. The captain is informed by the telephone department which traces the call. Instantly, Bob phones his home and finding none there orders the riot squad to the Casino. While several policemen line up the patrons, Bob forces his way into the office and rescues the young couple. Joe and several of the men are placed under arrest. Since bis next conviction means a life term under the new state law, Joe bribes a guard into helping him escape the following nigbt. The police first learn of this a few hours later when Mr. Brown reports that a convict forced him out of his machine and drove off having changed clothes with him at a deserted spot. When the car breaks down eigbty miles out, Joe rents a room in a small town. Determined to skip the country, Joe attempts to return by plane to Spamoni where he can borrow money. When a passenger recognizes him, the gangster, an experienced pilot, forces the plane down and orders everyone out. He continues the flight alone and reaches Spamoni but the real pilot reaches a farmhouse and sends warning. Through Helen entrance is gained to the gangsters' rooms and in the melee which follows Joe is fatally injured. Before death he confesses that the brother is innocent but he "framed" him. Spamoni while trying to escape wounds Helen. At the hospital, Dick who captures Spamoni single-banded, exhibits the reward and suggests that be and Helen use it to furnish a bome of their own. With a kiss Helen seals the bargain.

THE HELLMASTER

Robert Henderson Melodrama File No. 9899

ALTHOUGH his congregation begs bim to remain, the Reverend Barsney, a young London minister, informed that he has inherited a fortune from an uncle in America, decides to relinquish his post to someone who might need it for financial reasons. With his beloved six-year old daughter Elsa, the minister visits his mother at the hospital where she is recovering from an operation. She tells him happily that she will be able to return home in another day and the minister and his daughter leave. As they are walking along the road and Barsney is planning to spend his money upon Elsa, a car comes speeding by, knocks the minister down and drags the child to her death. Appalled by the realization that the accident has proven fatal, the car speeds on while the minister raises himself and discovers to his despair that his beloved child is beyond earthly care. A passing car stops and takes on the two but the minister shouts that if there were a Hell, the murderer would be there now. The driver shakes his head at such a speech from a minister but Barsney is now a different man and the look of insane grief upon his face frightens the cleaning woman at his home.

Whereas before the Reverend Barsney has been well known for his mission work in the underworld, now he finds the most unregenerate of the criminals and assembling them in an underworld den tells them he is going to construct a hell and execute one person for each broken commandment and two for the seventh. Even the most hardened of the criminals refuses, but on the promise of a huge sum of money, they accept. A freshly made grave in a cemetary serves as an alley to an underground chamber of horrors and groups are assigned to capture the victims in the act of their crimes. Disguised as detectives, the gangsters cover their assignments. A drunken man makes a scene in front of a boarding house on a Sunday. As detectives, two gangsters lead him to an alley. But in place of the patrol wagon, the blackjacked victim is placed in the hearse prepared for the purpose, and carried in a casket before the Reverend Barsney who reads the service and send him to a horrible death, lowered by a pendulum into a pit of fire. A working man steals jewelry. His poor wife begs him to put it back and he knocks her unconscious. The child soreams and the father is captured by the false detectives and led to the hearse and his death in the improvised Hell, for breaking the eighth commandment. The third victim is the minister's mother who has been overheard saying, "For God's sake don't say my son is insane." Despite her screams, the mad minister metes out her punishment in the special chamber. So all the victims are found except two and a pair taken in adultery. The gangsters seize two young lovers who have been shyly speaking their thoughts in the park and bring them before the Hellmaster, who thinks to punish them more devilishly by letting them watch the agonies of him who broke the ninth commandment. At sight of the hellish spectacle, the boy realizes what is going on and pleads with the reverend to believe that they are innocent of adultery. Shocked Barsney confesses defeat. He will not kill the innocent, but if he lets them escape the police will get him. Whereupon, he determines that he himself will pay the penalty for breaking the commandment, "Thou shalt not kill," and he places himself in linked rings which drawn by pulleys, break his body at the waist. The fainting lovers are rescued by the police summoned by the suspicious caretaker, and the human Hell is destroyed.

WINNING WINNIE

Mrs. Lillian Shumway Comedy File No. 12114

JIM SPEELS, demonstrating the prowess of his vacuum cleaner to Mrs. Glynn, falls instantly in love with Winnie, the pretty daughter of the house who is reading poetry, completely ignoring his presence. As he sweeps up various materials which he has sprinkled on the floor, Jim accidentally catches the cat in the sweeper. Winnie helps to extract the animal, catching her own dress in the machine. Her mother cuts her skirt, placing an apron on the girl, who angrily leaves the room. Assisting her father as he unharnesses the team, Winnie is scolded for her short dress; she mounts her horse and rides away, the apron exposing her short skirt as it flaps in the breeze. After selling the machine, Jim runs into Mrs. Glynn, upsetting the pie she is carrying, so great is his desire to overtake Winnie. On a subsequent visit, Jim demonstrates washing machines. Winnie catches her hand in the wringer. All sympathy, Jim awkwardly tries to bandage it, but he becomes so confused that he wraps the entire roll of gauze around the injury. Expertly, Winnie drives his car to the doctor. Once more at home, Winnie languishes on a couch while Jim apologizes repeatedly. The girl hurls a pillow at him, causing him to lose his balance and fall against Mrs. Glynn, upsetting a plate of hot potatoes she is carrying. Returning to the city, Jim secures positions with first one sales company, then another, quitting each job as soon as he has contacted the Glynn home.

Returning with an aluminum apple cooker, Jim almost wins Winnie's admiraton as he expertly prepares the fruit until apple juice squirts over her dress. In a fit of temper she throws the sugar bowl at the young salesman. Still undaunted, he returns with a sewing machine and makes three shirts before Mrs. Glynn's admiring eyes. Seeing him again, Winnie sets the dog on Jim; he upsets Mrs. Glynn, spilling the pie she is carrying over both of them. Mr. Glynn, entering at that moment, orders the young man from the house; but his wife points out the machine and the shirts. Then he invites Jim to remain for dinner. Unable to eat because he is so absorbed in Winnie, Jim does not notice while the dog steals the meat from his plate.

He calls late at night leading a cow which he has secured on a rope with great difficulty, but Mr. Glynn informs him that the animal does not belong to him. At last he finds the rightful owner, who laughs heartily at Jim's mistake, refusing to clear the road in order that he may drive away. On another visit, Jim brings dress materials which Winnie, hidden behind the door, admires. As he is leaving at the conclusion of the sale Jim is hit by a dish mop. Turning, he goes to Winnie and begs her to explain why she does not like him. The girl replies that if he will allow her to pick out his wearing apparel and improve his general appearance she may become interested. He readily agrees and eats an apple while Winnie dresses for the street. As she enters the kitchen she finds him pantomiming the wedding march with her mother and pretends to misunderstand.

After taking him to the barber and choosing a conservative suit for him Winnie conducts him to the jewelers to look at rings. Understanding at last, Jim selects an engagement ring for Winnie but discovers his purse is gone and accuses the clerks, who deny the charge. At last Winnie produces the purse.

Acclaimed the most versatile salesman in town, Jim wins an award and the wedding date is set. Mr. and Mrs. Glynn offer congratulations, calling the dog over to make friends with their future son-in-law, while the cat climbs into his lap. Dressed in their Sunday best and tying ribbons on the dog's legs and tail, the family are set for the wedding, while Jim holds Winnie tightly, still afraid she may escape. The Dominie pronounces them man and wife; Mr. and Mrs. Glynn drive them to the station in a ribbon bedecked car, while friends shower them with rice. As they speed away, Winnie's parents gaily unite the ribbons from the car, with a sigh of relief that the battle is finally over.

NIRVANA

Michael T. Cawley Adventure File No. 12054

INHABITANTS of Starcrest, Wyoming, gaze in amazement at what appears to be a gigantic umbrella descending from the skies as they are congregated outside the general store one Sunday afternoon. Only the "handle" lands, as the top is detached while still several feet in the air. Harry Fields, a veteran of the World War, warns them that this may be an explosive which will destroy them but Bill Dawes, a farmer, timidly approaches and sees two inert forms through a thick panel of glass on one side of the cylinder. With the aid of several others, the two men are taken carefully out of the compartment and first aid is applied. Regaining consciousness, Ronald Elliot and Leslie Winton, the occupants of the cylinder, are informed of the time and learn that it is approximately the same as when they embarked on their voyage. Leaving their "pet" under guard, they return to the Elliot estate in Massachusetts. Here Ronnie's mother tells newspaper reporters that on the day of her daughter, Grace's, birthday party, a maid was sent to summon the boys but reported that they were gone. A few minutes later, Ronnie telephoned from Wyoming where he had just landed in his rocket plane. Her party proved an unparalled success in spite of the absence of Ronnie and Lester, Grace's fiance, because of the enthusiasm among her guests over their achievement. Ronnie explains that the intuitive belief that he would discover a another great World led him to make this trip, and certain discoveries he has made give him the urge to attempt a second venture.

Interested in physics and aero-dynamics, Ronnie constructed his "pet" with Lester's aid in the old stable and garage, converted into an airdrome for the monoplane in which the young men fly to their university classes. The boys explain the mechanism of their rocket plane to Grace when it is sent on from Wyoming. A cylinder, extending from ground to the hinged roof which opens like the top of a huge trunk, encases the plane, a smaller cylinder. A mysterious sheet of metal lines the smaller cylinder, inside of which another lining honeycombed with tiny vacuums has been placed and the whole lined with a heavy steel inner cylinder. At the base, thirty five rockets have been placed. Above these, in a cabin-like arrangement, various scientific instruments are closeted and, on top of all, a collapsible aluminum umbrella on which another rocket has been superimposed. Tubes of compressed air connect to the base of the machine from the basement of the workshop. Instruments for measurement of altitude, wind velocity, air pressure and release of rockets are within easy reach of occupants of the cabin.

Although understanding their enthusiasm and Ronnie's great desire for further exploration, Grace is unwilling for the boys to attempt a second flight as her wedding to Lester is only a few days away. As he visits his sweetheart each evening, Lester is torn between love, and, devotion to an ideal, while Ronnie's mother pleads with him not to risk his life, but when he assures her that he will have power of visual communication, and may discover a wonderful race of people, she consents. Grace is delighted when the boys invite her to accompany them. After her wedding, dressed as an aviatrix and equipped with twelve chicken sandwiches, a powder puff and a handkerchief as a trousseau, she embarks on her strange honeymoon. A release of compressed air sends the machine through the opened roof, and with subsequent, timed, releases of rockets the trio are soon out of sight. Mrs. Elliot becomes ill with worry until several days later, she sees her son in the mirror of the dressing room door, assuring her of his safety, a daily occurence thereafter at sundown. A piece of rare stone which Ronnie secured from the curator of a museum turns ruby colored as the three enter the stratosphere, and, through their ear phones the boys hear a voice saying; "Eighty five degrees south, eighty five degrees west." Their cigarette smoke now blows in one direction only, and the stone increases in brilliance. Releasing the last rocket, Ronnie sends the ship downward while the three see one another, surrounded by an aura of light and apparently floating alone, as the plane is invisible. The stone loses its luminosity; the trio see that they are approaching the icy wastes of Antarctica! Releasing the umbrella, Ronnie watches the cylinder glide into an icy crater and come to rest at the base of a long tunnel lawn. Stepping from the ship, the trio are greeted shaped incline at the edge of a beautiful, velevety by a handsome guide who leads them to the Council of Chiefs in a large grassy amphitheatre in which a huge gathering is assembled. With a gasp of amazement they see beautiful people costumed in delicate, sheen like robes. The leader of a group of twelve, seated on a natural dais in the center of the amphitheatre bids them welcome to Nirvana; "Home of all Noble Men and Pure Women who departed the earth to this land where TIME as they knew it, does not exist." And, eager for more knowledge, their dream realized at last, Ronnie, Lester and Grace willingly accept his invitation to place themselves with confidence in the hands of their new friends and to spend their future in the Blissful Domain of Nirvana.

THE DEATH SENTENCE

Launey C. Whibby Mystery File No. 12122

IMPETOUSLY, Samuel Brennon strikes Jack Lawson when the latter accuses him of cheating at cards following a game at their club house. Jack seizes a vase and is about to hurl it when Samuel draws his gun. As the two struggle, friends separate them; Samuel departs for his home. The next morning his enraged father demands that he leave as a result of this most recent disgrace. While his mother and sister, Rose, weep, the young man packs, accepting a check from his father and promising to follow his wishes in going to California to start at the bottom in an uncle's factory. Shortly after Samuel left Jack, Italian Joe entered the deserted club room and, seeing Jack, head bowed over the card table, shot him. Stopping to apologize, Samuel discovers that Jack is dead as he enters the room early the next morning. Realizing that he will be convicted on circumstantial evidence, Samuel hastens to the train. As he leaves through an open window he drops his bill fold. The houseman discovers Jack's body and summons police. A few minutes later the offices of the Evening World hum with activity as reporters are sent by an excited city editor on the trail of the murderer. Harold, recently promoted to the staff, secures permission to assist in uncovering this crime. At once he searches the club room, discovering a bill fold underneath the window with Samuel's initials and a hlack mask, bearing a strange insignia on the lawn outsde.

The houseman is released from jail on insufficient evidence. Testimony of those who witnessed the quarrel and the discovery of the hillfold indicts Samuel. When his mother reads this, she faints; Rose, at the piano, rushes to her, summoning a doctor. The anxious family are told that she is suffering from severe nervous shock and must have absolute quiet. Arrived safely in California, Brennon is seated at a table in the Panama Cafe when he sees one of the patrons insult Lucille Carson, an attractive girl, seated with another lady. Instantly he comes to her aid, forcing the stranger to apologize, then introduces himself as she thanks him. Women at the next table identify Samuel as the murderer of Jack Lawson. Later, at the bar, a group of men accuse him of the same thing, and he is thrown out on the street, receiving a severe blow on the head. Lucille discovers him here, and gives him her card, writing her address, when he refuses her help. Police later take him to a clinic where the doctor pronounces him a victim of amnesia. Wandering about with no knowledge of his identity, Samuel rests on a park bench; two kindly tramps discover Lucille's card and, boarding a freight train, take him to her, in her garden. At first the young woman almost screams in fright, but recognizing Samuel, thanks the tramps and pays them well. Her father invites Samuel to remain with them until his memory returns, while Lucille pins a rose in his button hole as a tribute of friendship. When her father discovers that Samuel is wanted for murder he notifies authorities, although Lucille swears to stand behind the young man. Employing a detective, she learns that the mask discovered by Harold is the emblem of an Italian gang. The two men go to their neighborhood and discover Joe, mortally wounded in a street brawl. As he confesses his guilt, they hasten to the penitentiary, with a priest, where Samuel is bidding his parents farewell, sentenced to death. Their car overturns, but Lucille, driving past, sees them and helps them climb into her machine. Two minutes before the death sentence is to be invoked, the Warden rushes in with a reprieve and Samuel, memory restored by the shock, holds Lucille in his arms.

AMES! PLEASE

Madyne Emo Comedy File No. 12131

AT the railroad station, Mrs. Ames embraces her two daughters, Katherine and Evelyn, recently graduated from an eastern university. The girls present Nils Clarke and Bill Naldi, their house guests, to their mother. That capable lady welcomes them, then directs the crew to her car. In no uncertain tones, she commands the chauffeur to collect the bags and drive home, pushing her way through the crowd with authority. Thurston Harley, dressed in evening clothes although it is early afternoon, becomes separated from members of his party which was first organized the previous evening. In a daze, he is pushed about, until, with a bewildered expression, someone thrusts him into the Ames car just as the owner and her family have entered from the other side. In confusion, he finds himself on Mrs. Ames' lap. The woman utters a terrified shriek when she discover this and recognizes Thurston, for whom she has little respect. Frightened by her outcry, he leaps up, his head going through the ceiling of the car when the chauffeur starts the machine. In dismay he sits quietly at the side of Mrs. Ames, while she jabs him severely with her elbow. "Mrs. Ames! Please." he remarks, tentatively. Receiving an unusually sharp jab he leaps up in confusion, stepping on Mrs. Ames' lap and repeating his apology. As the car arrives in front of the Ames' home, the family and their guests alight, while the confused Thurston attempts to climb out through the ceiling. Not noticing him, the chauffeur starts the car, and Thurston is thrown into a mud puddle.

Following the others into the house, in order that he may repair his clothing before returning to his home, Thurston slips upstairs to Mrs. Ames' room, and dons one of her evening gowns, instructing the valet to sponge and press his suit. In attempting to slip downstairs for a cocktail, Thurston trips and rolls to the bottom. Entering the living room in this abrupt fashion, he discovers Catherine talking to Bill, Nils with his arm about Evelyn. Excusng himself hurriedly, while the four laugh, Thurston upsets a servant entering with drinks. As the glasses shatter on the floor, Thurston runs from the room, the tray balanced on his head. Hearing the noise, Mrs. Ames' enters the room in time to see Thurston's unceremonious departure. At once, she chases him. The two run in circles around the garden until Thurston, attempting to leap across the pool, lands in the center of it, with an expression of surprise on his face. He dodges behind poplar trees but is soon discovered again. Attempting to pose behind a statue in the garden, Thurston evades his pursuer for a few moments, until he relaxes from his strained posture and one arm becomes visible. Mrs. Ames throws a flower pot, barely missing him. Rushing wildly about, Thurston seeks refuge in the dog kennel but is frightened away by Mrs. Ames' toy poodle. Once more he enters the house while the four young people, who have watched the chase, laugh merrily. Again, the butler enters, bearing a tray full of drinks. Thurston removes one from the tray and sips it. As he leaves he trips over Mrs. Ames' gown, upsetting the servant and the drinks. While he lies, prostrate Mrs. Ames overtakes him. And as she glares down at him, in her ruined gown, he weakly protests: "Mrs. Ames! Please."

MY SON

Abraham Waxler Drama File No. 12113

ATTRACTED to one another by their mutual bohemian tastes, Anna a dancer, and Max, an artist, fall in love. Together they share their happy, bohemian life until the day that a remorseful Anna tells Max they are to have a child. Cursing this piece of misfortune, Max goes away, promising to send for Anna later. Her baby son, Karl, is born in a charity hospital, but no maternal love awakens in her breast as a nurse gives her this tiny, unwanted piece of humanity. His head bowed dejectedly over a table in a cheap cabaret, Max confesses his sin to George, his loyal friend, who advises him that he must face the situation somehow. It is George who helps Anna with her luggage at the station. As he is driving her home, he tells her that Max has refused to care for the baby, but he has a plan. At his instigation, Anna leaves the baby under a tree in the woods. George drives her home, then returns, looking until a night watchman finds the child and carries him to his cottage. Then, requesting a glass of water, George gains admission to the house. When the couple tell him of the discovery of the baby, adding that they plan to turn the child over to the orphanage, he persuades them to wait until the following day when he can find a home for the little stranger. Then he tells the elderly couple who manage Max's boarding house that he has found a child for them to adopt, having often heard them express such a desire. Eagerly, they send Max for the baby, and at last little Karl has found a home.

During the next five years, Max roams the country, following his chosen career. He finds that his freedom does not bring him happiness, as he continually thinks of his abandoned child. Anna's beauty bring her many admirers, among them Count Russo, who presents her with gifts of jewelry, although she will not accept his attentions except in a casual manner. Successful as a dancer, she, too, thinks only of her child and resolves to find him. George refuses to reveal the boy's foster parents, believing Anna will not care for him. He tells Max that Anna wants her boy. This awakens the father to a sense of responsibility, and, paying the elderly couple liberally, Max takes Karl away with him. Afraid of this man whom he cannot remember, unhappy and shy in strange surroundings, Karl can scarcely hold back the tears although Max tries to win the boy's love. When Karl asks continually for his mother, Max promises that someday they will find her. Father and son wander about the country together, remaining only a short time in each locality. Deprived of a mother's care and normal, boyish pleasures, Karl grows into an extremely nervous youth, subject to frequent illness. In spite of his anxiety about the boy, Max is so happy in his companionship that his work improves greatly, and at last he is acclaimed as an artist. When he takes Karl for a visit to the couple who once cared for him, two playful dogs spring at the boy, causing him to faint. The doctor says that he must have fresh air and careful nursing. The remorseful father accompanied by George, takes Karl for a picnic in the woods. Anna, grief stricken because she cannot find her boy, contemplates suicide at a mountain stream, but George, gathering wood, sees her and brings her to the others. Sobbing with happiness, Anna clasps her boy in her arms, while Max looks on, eyes downcast. With a little push, George sends him to Anna's arms, and the three agree to try again, for the sake of their child. As the group picnic together, Anna and Max, holding one another's hand, see a completely changed and joyfully Karl playing with George. Merrily they join the two, when their son, eyes shining gleefully, urges them to play.

TRIP TO MARS

Francis Joseph Coughlin Comedy File No. 12097

REJECTED by Kitty, the girl he loves, since she states that he will never be anything but a bum, Jack walks despondently homeward. Emptying his pockets, he discovers he hasn't a cent of money as he looks longingly in restaurant windows. Desperately he stops two or three passers-by, requesting a dime, but is curtly refused. When he enters his boarding house he discovers the door to his room locked; the landlady has pinned a note on the door demanding the rent. Two bill collectors enter searching for him. Hastily Jack jumps out of the back window and runs toward the railroad yard, intending to catch a freight train, but police, watching him, thwart this plan. At last he decides to end it all; climbing to the top of a building he leaps off but catches the wing of a United Air Express Plane with a sigh of relief. Soon he finds that he has boarded an express to Mars. As the plane ascends it enters a path of vapor balls, causing it to bounce violently. Jack calls to a passenger on another plane, asking why the machine seems to have locomotor ataxia and is told that that is always the condition in the locality. At last, feeling like an animated jumping jack, the young man bounces into Mars. He discovers all the inhabitants bouncing to work, bouncing to play, bouncing for no reason at all. They form a bouncing committee, taking Jack to the rock castle of their Queen, the only solid piece of architecture in the realm. Dressed in chicken feathers, her highness surveys the newcomer criticially, while the court bounce in attendance.

To win her favor, Jack produces his collapsible saxophone from his vest pocket and plays several jazz numbers, introducing rythms to the bouncers. They clap with pleasure. Soon the Queen joins Jack in a spirited dance. Under his instructions a jazz orchestra is soon assembled at the court; each night the bouncers celebrate. Jack, too, presents his favorite recipes for mixing cocktails and composes songs, all of which win him royal favor. Throwing her arms around him, the Queen announces that he is to be the royal consort. Disturbed at this unexpected outcome of events, Jack asks for time which is granted. That night the engagement is followed with a lavish stage presentation and grand bouncing ball. Jack, as master of ceremonies, attempts to assume a nonchalant expression, thanking those who offer congratulations, but inwardly trying desperately to think of a means of escape. Kept virtually a prisoner in the palace, Jack sees the wedding day approaching with foreboding. His valet helps him don the fancy velvet costume he is to wear on the occassion, and he approaches the altar. Suddenly, making a wild dash, Jack bounces over the heads of guests and guards catching onto the rope ladder of a plane bound for the earth. Seeing him, the pilot and mechanic draw him into the cabin, offering their heartiest congratulations when they learn that he has escaped marriage with the unattractive queen. The plane lands in Hollywood. While crowds gather, Jack alights recounting his strange experiences to gentlemen of the press and showing them the strange shoes, equipped with compressed air soles, used for bouncing. He is offered a film contract the next day, which he signs. A short time later Kitty hastens to his outstretched arms, and Jack, holding her close, bounces high in the air with joy.

HEART'S DESIRE

Mrs. Fannie Campbell Drama File No. 12212

JOSEPH LEIDER can scarcely hide his disappointment when the doctor tells him that Mary, his wife, has given birth to a daughter. When little Mary is still a baby, Joseph follows a dog into a barn where he discovers a man has hanged himself. Greatly disturbed, Joseph attacks the tree stumps, imagining them to be men, in his upset mental condition. This incident he relates to his wife; boarders in the next room hear, and he becomes the laughing stock of the town. His Pennsylvania Dutch pride deeply wounded, Joseph sells his home and takes his family out West, where he becomes successful as a blacksmith, but drinks heavily. Years pass, and the couple celebrate their thirtieth wedding anniversary with a party to which all the settlers for miles around are invited. Little Mary is very happy as she dances with local swains, but her mother becomes ill and is forced to go home, leaving the girl in the care of her younger brother, who disappears. Her drunken father forces alcoholic beverage down Mary's lips; to escape him she allows the Batch, a man of unfavorable reputation to take her home. His horse accidentally kicks her and she loses consciousness, awakening at her home. Two months later, Mary realizes that as a result of that unhappy evening she is to have a child. Her father approaches the Batch with a gun but he escapes.

When Mary's child, Esther, is born, Joseph, moving to a new community, attempts to make up for his neglect of his daughter in caring for the granddaughter. She grows into a golden haired, fairy like child, with an unusual talent for music and a lovely voice. Many of her happiest moments are spent singing at the little log church. Mary, her mother, marries again, and her grandmother dies. The minister, his wife and son who come to keep house for Joseph force Esther to work. Shortly after this, the child's stepfather secures custody of her, and Mary's life becomes one of unceasing toil. One stormy night her stepfather threatens suicide and the next day Esther runs away to her grandfather, who promises to help as soon as he can, holding the girl in his arms. Forced to pick potatoes in the fields, Esther's hands touches that of Merton, an assistant, and as she looks into his clear eyes, love awakens. In her little tree top bower, Esther composes a beautiful melody, "Everlasting Love," which she sings in the fields. Merton is enchanted; he calls when her stepfather is away and Esther plays the song at the organ for him. Entering unexpectedly, her stepfather tears up the song and orders Merton out of the house. He goes to Toronto, writing of his love to Esther, but her stepfather destroys the letters, and the girl, believing that Merton has discovered the conditions of her birth, and no longer cares, tries to forget him. When her stepfather tries to attack her as they are husking corn, and her mother doubts her, Esther leaves for the home of an uncle.

Years pass, and Esther, in Quebec, spends her last thirty five cents on an advertisement, securing work as a housekeeper. While attending church, she sees Merton! When he tells her he has always loved her, she gives him a diary, which reveals that she married Willie and had a baby, Dixie Lee, who lived only a short time. Willie, who drank excessively, was thrown from his horse, dying instantly. Taking her in his arms, Merton assures her that this does not matter. Joseph's farm, willed to Esther, contains oil, but the proceeds from this Esther gives to establish breadlines, while, with Merton, she sings "Everlasting Love." Her own father, in one of these lines, resolves to lead a better life, recalling that "As Ye sow so shall Ye reap."

Mabel Pickard Drama File No. 12086

BRIMMING over with youthful vitality, Martha leads her sister Edith and brother David in all sports as they play together on the farm. Jack, employed by the girl's father to assist with tasks about the farm, is attracted by Martha's hoydenish charm, although she believes he is interested in her extremely feminine sister. Martha and Jack attend to the milking together, becoming fast friends. Deeply religious, Martha's mother, with her entire family and Jack, attend services at the country church every Sunday. As Martha and Jack walk home together after the service, he suddenly takes the girl in his arms, confessing his love for her, and urging her to marry him. As she returns his embrace, Martha feels herself carried away by the powerful emotion of first love. After the hour of singing which the family holds each Sunday night, Jack, his voice trembling slightly with emotion, tells Martha's parents of his desire to wed their daughter. Angrily, the girl's father points out that Jack can offer Martha nothing. Sobbing in her room, Martha hopes that someday she may reconcile her father. After that, she and Jack meet clandestinely in country lanes, enjoying brief moments of stolen ecstasy. Jack urges Martha to elope with him. She is on the point of consenting when her father overhears the two discuss this plan and summarily dismisses Jack. A few days later he writes to Martha from the neighboring town of Delmar, where he has secured employment. Tenderly the girl cherishes this, her first love letter.

Martha's friend, Carrie, invites the girl to accompany her and her father to Delmar; then, as Martha is seated in the carriage, Carrie, returning from the general store where she has telephoned Jack, gently tells Martha that he has married. As the girl sobs out the story to her mother, that evening, she becomes ill. After several weeks, Martha recovers from nervous shock, and is sent to the home of her Aunt Laura in hopes that she will forget her grief. Here she enters business college, later securing a position in her uncle's bank. At one of the many delightful parties which Aunt Laura gives for her, Martha is presented to Edward Rollins. In the days that follow he is a constant visitor at her aunt's home. Together they attend concerts and picnics until, one evening as they are driving home, the young man asks Martha to become his wife and she consents, although telling him of her love for Jack. In her new home, Martha finds a real and lasting happiness, while Edward surrounds her with every kindness. A baby daughter, Irene, is born to the young couple, completing their happiness. As she is shopping one day, Martha encounters Jack, who persuades her to lunch with him. He tells her that his wife tricked him into marriage, which has been most unhappy. That evening Martha relates this meeting to Edward, who understands and does not condemn her. But, drawn by rekindled passion, Jack and Martha at last plan to run away. Leaving Irene in her aunt's care, Martha meets Jack on the train; together they go to a New York hotel. Their finances dwindling, Martha seeks work and at last writes to her aunt for money. Instead, two detectives call, taking the couple into custody. Martha's parents, stricken with grief, await her at her aunt's home. When Jack's wife calls, Martha sees that she is really in love with him and as he agrees to return to her and his children, she realizes that marriage vows should not be broken lightly. When Edward drops the case, Martha goes to bid him and her child farewell, but she discovers that he has the house in readiness for her return and as he silences her self denunciation with a kiss, Martha faces the future with the man she really loves—her husband.

WILDERNESS

Donald M. Grant Adventure File No. 12117

JAMES MERTON is greeted at the station by his father's friend, Steven Kenderson, whom he is to visit during the summer and Laura, lovely young daughter of the house. The trio drive to the cabin in the wilderness where Kenderson has brought his family in order to serve the community as the only physician in many miles. Little Frank, Laura's brother, and her mother cordially welcome the guest. Although the boy can scarcely hide his scorn when he discovers that James can neither ride or shoot with any degree of proficiency. The youngster undertakes to teach him; James is amazed as he sees the skill displayed by this fearless child. With Laura, he explores the surrounding territory, marvelling at its beauty as they climb mountain trails together, discovering patches of glorious wild flowers. Watching Laura as she assists her mother with difficult household and farm tasks, James one day tells her that a girl as beautiful as herself should be living an easier life, surrounded by the luxury which can only be found in large cities. Proudly she tells him that she is happy to help her father spread civilization in a wilderness, carry-her share of the burden. When James tells her that he loves her and wishes to take her back East with him as his wife when he takes up the practice of medicine there, she replies that she cannot leave this rugged country, these people who need her, although she loves him. Kenderson tells the boy of the many adventures he shared with his father, hoping that he, too, will find his place in the wilderness, but James cannot agree.

Visiting a neighbor boy some miles away Frank is entranced when his friend's father relates stories of Indians who attacked the first settlers. Vividly he relates stories of scalpings and massacres while the boys listen, eyes round with wonder and a little fear which they refuse to admit. So absorbed is Frank in these accounts of covered wagon days that he scarcely notices the time. When he leaves it is pitch dark but, refusing to cause his mother worry, the boy starts home. Suddenly his horse comes to a dead stop, hurling Frank over its head. With presence of mind he holds onto the reins and remounts. Tales of Indians pass through his head and he sits there, chilled with fear. Turning the horse about, Frank rides away, then again approaches the spot, but no amount of spurring or coaxing will make the frightened animal move forward. The third time, Frank sees a huge brown bear directly in front of his horse. Recalling his father's advice, the boy attempts to whistle but can make no sound. Then he draws a newspaper from his pocket, rolls it and lights it. With this taper and a whistle which he finally manages, Frank sends the bear scurrying into the woods. His frightened horse breaks into a gallop, throwing the boy, unconscious, on the ground, some distance later. Worried by his absence, James and Kenderson organize a searching party; James notes with amazement the willingness of the neighbors to risk their lives in order to find the boy. At last he is discovered by James in a crevice. Perilously the young man climbs to the boy, and takes him home. The next day James leads a group of men in a hunt to kill bears who have been destroying Kenderson's sheep. When he returns, James tells Laura that he, too, wishes to spend his life among these brave pioneers if she will help him cause the wilderness to bloom.

BOSTON BOUND

Charles L. Russell Drama File No. 12125

JIM DAVIS joins his comrades from Ohio to attend the American Legion Convention in Boston, singing songs of the trenches, the men depart, as they recall the exciting days when they sailed for France, ready to give their lives in the service of their country. Far in the night, the men exchange stories of war heroism they had personally witnessed. As the train passed through the state of Massachusetts, Jim told Steve, his buddy, that he had never seen so beautiful a piece of country as this, glorious in its early autumn coloring. As each scene recalls a significant historical event in the revolutionary days of America, the legionnaires seem to see again these early patriots who, like themselves, placed the honor of their country first. Deeply impressed with the old farm houses and cities, little changed since the day they were first erected, Jim writes to his younger brother, a youngster in high school, promising to take him to this fascinating state on his next vacation that he may see for himself the places described in his history text. Confiding in Steve, Jim tells him that he fell in love with a war nurse while in a French hospital, but lost her address during a bombardment. As her name was Rose Peterson and she was a Boston girl perhaps he might see her again. Once arrived in the famous city, the men are welcomed with New England hospitality that echoes sincerity. They purchase a pot of the famous Boston beans, sold in paper containers of various colors, but Jim remarks that, though delicious, they seem little different from other beans.

Eager to see as much of the famous city as possible Jim makes a tour of the art galleries, museums, stores and historical spots. Time flies as he is absorbed in this fascinating pastime. Interested in hospital work, he inspects one of the leading institutions. A nurse is detailed to show him about the building; turning to her he recognizes, with a glad cry, that she is Rose! Together they recall those days at the French hospital when they came to love one another. Rose tells him that when no word came from him she believed him dead. She expresses her disappointment that he is a member of the legion, since she has heard stories of their misconduct in other cities. Jim points out that while there are a few hoodlums in any organization, one must not judge the majority by their misconduct. This, he states, is the result of the habit of mass thinking brought on by America's mass production. Those who expect well of people will usually be rewarded with a high type of behaviour. Although admitting the truth of these remarks, Rose asks Jim to give up his membership in the Legion. This he steadfastly refuses to do, as he describes their many beneficial activities to widows and orphans of soldiers, their willingness to serve their country at all times. Together, Rose and Jim continue the exploration of Boston, discovering many unexpected and charming spots. The difference in the Boston accent as compared with what he is accustomed to amuses Jim as well as his listeners. However, all become friends. Rose, promises to marry Jim, returning with him to Ohio but that night five members of the Legion uproot flowers on the hospital ground. Angrily, Rose breaks her engagement, unless, once more, Jim will resign. The Legion parade, twenty eight miles long, thrill two million Bostonians, and Jim reflects that this, at least, is one good that has come out of the war. As he is packing to leave, Jim is informed that Rose wishes to see him. He asks her to come up; apologizing, she tells him that the few disorderly members who harmed her hospital have been discharged, thanks to the Legion's sense of fairness. Together, Jim and Rose board the train, resolving only to look on the bright side of life, as the legionnaires cheer them on their way.

FLIRTING WITH DANGER

Marion L. Brown Drama File No. 12130

PARADISE Night Club was the most notorious spot in town. Preached against in the city churches, the publicity only brought more attention. Jenny Wright, the proprietor, looked approvingly at the "suckers" whose presence added to her bankroll. At a nod from the bar-tender, she excused herself from the table of Henry Doaks and went to the side entrance where a policeman waited. She pulled out an envelope of money but the law officer only shook his head, motioning toward the private office. There he informed her that narcotics had been traced to her establishment. Only a payment of several thousand dollars would hush the scandal and impending arrest. But recently, Jenny had gambled on the market resulting in severe losses. Hastily glancing at the figure in her bankbook, she saw there was not enough. Calling a number that the policeman gave, Jenny received three days grace. Returning to Henry's table, she hastily downed a glass filled with strong spirits. An idea gradually turned about in her mind; she remembered that Henry had once mentioned that his brother John was a banker. Through careful questioning she now ascertained that John had never been at her club; though he had a weakness for pretty girls his wife kept watch too carefully. Before Henry left that evening, he had promised to bring John to the club the following night. When the last patron had gone, Jenny joined her friends, Nancy and Dolly, two little gold-diggers, to whom she confided her need for money. Somehow, John must be blackmailed out of the necessary money. It was Nancy who first suggested that Molly Dee, a cute nurse, be used to frame him. Meanwhile, Molly was dancing in a quiet little restaurant with Billy Dix. During the few weeks that she had known him, Molly had grown ashamed of her past. She knew nothing of Billy beyond the fact that he was attending college. All that was important was the fact that they were both in love with each other. When Billy left her at her apartment, she found a message to call Jenny at once. Learning that they planned to use her for illegal purposes, Molly at first indignantly refused. Yet when Jenny pointed out that it would mean prison for her, the nurse was too tender hearted to resist. The gayest of the gay that evening was Banker Doaks. Instantly, his fancy seized upon Molly and he refused to be shaken from her side. The other girls watched closely with approval until Doaks attempted to kiss Molly. Suddenly she thought of Billy and forgetting the role she was playing, slapped him hard. Jenny immediately leaped to him while Molly disappeared. The next day, Doaks was unable to drive her from his mind, and telephoned Jenny to see him after banking hours. Jenny apologized for Molly and assured him that she would arrange to have Molly and Doaks left alone in a private sitting room. As if in after-thought, she told him that Molly had been rude before since she was worried over money troubles. Doaks promised to give the girl a large check. Part of this conversation was overheard by a stenographer who related it to Doakes' jealous wife who had come to meet him in time to see Jenny depart. Mrs. Doakes kept her suspicions silent. That night, however, she followed Doakes. When she tried to burst into the room, Jenny blocked her way. In the struggle Mrs. Doakes killed the proprietress. The door was flung open in time for the horrified banker to see his wife turn the gun upon herself. Among the first to arrive on the scene was Molly's lover. To the girl's amazement she saw him clasp Mrs. Doakes and call her "Mother." Determined to make amends, Doakes weeks later persuaded his son that Molly was innocent. Yet reconciled with her lover, Molly still shuddered when she thought of the tragedy that flirtation bred.

THE KID

B. M. Scurry Drama File No. 12128

WORK among the construction gang was almost over for the day when the blonde boy approached and asked Captain Lemmons for a job. His hard muscles belied his soft appearance. Lemmons addressed him "Kid" and Kid he was from that day on. Pete Rankin who had a boy about the Kid's age was drawn to him. That evening Pete and Ames, a soft spoken religiously inclined man, took the Kid to a store where clothes more suitable for laboring work were acquired. When they returned, Charlie Gruber, gang bully sneered at the boy's white hands but the Kid, warned by his friends, ignored the remarks. During the days that followed little was learned of the kid's past. Questions were never asked or answered among such men; but the Kid who proved an unusual worker became a favorite. Several times Charlie sought a quarrel; once he poured water on the Kid's bunk; another time he loosened the spike which held the hanging bed. But when the Kid threatened to take on the man who had caused this, Charlie remained silent. Sunday, Ames invited the men to attend church service but only Pete and the Kid went. The beauty of the youth's voice as the hymns opened attracted favorable attention and against their will all three were dragged to the front where with a choir member they made an unusual quartet. Pete noticed the lovely girl, Alice, seated in a front pew, eyes riveted on the Kid. Soon he noticed that the Kid was blushing, aware of her. When the minister invited the three to dinner, the Kid hesitated until he learned that Alice was his daughter. In the afternoon Alice and the Kid slipped away from the others. Returning to the shanty in the evening, Pete taunted his fellows with the excellent time they had missed. A moment later he regretted this when he saw Charlie prick up his ears. Although their station was moved down the line, the Kid prepared to attend services the following Sunday. Halfway through service, Charlie clumped down the aisle. Although Alice had no eyes for him, she was forced to be polite when Charlie joined the dinner table. Only the Kid seemed to boil inwardly. That night Pete prepared his pistol. He knew that a fight was brewing and intended to see that the Kid got fair play from the bully. During the next weeks excitement mounted as the camp grew aware of the rivalry for Alice. To add to Pete's worries, a stranger joined the camp but did little work; he seemed to watch the Kid continually. To verify his suspicions, Pete pretending to be ill, stayed behind one morning and ransacked the stranger's belongings, finding several photographs of the Kid. Grieving, Pete was sure that the law was after the boy. The next morning the stranger checked out and Pete awaited a moment to warn the Kid. The fight between Charlie and the Kid opened when the former smarting because Alice had rejected him taunted the Kid with her name while loading poles. After the first blow, the knock and tumble fight was completely in the Kid's favor. While Pete held his pistol, Charlie reached for a knife but the Kid thrust it from his hand. That night the bully sneaked off. When Pete tipped Kid that he was wanted, he looked worried but laughed it off.

While waiting for the special to take home the crew which had been called out on emergency work, the Kid who was wrestling with a representative of a rival group, was recognized by Chief Dispatcher Scott. Soon Pete was to learn that the Kid was his son who had run away to camp to harden for the college football season. Later the men were to be the Kid's guest in a game which he leads to victory; and the engagement of the Kid and Alice was toasted at dinner.

THE MIRAGE

Katherine M. Peirce Mystery File No. 12049

NOTICING that Elinor, his wife, is tired as a result of a strenuous social season, Jack Peyton persuades her to accompany him on a trip to the Golden Arrow, a mine in the heart of the Rocky Mountains, of which he is owner and manager. Enchanted with the beauty of the country, Elinor views Lake Cristobal while Mr. Calvert, the superintendent, and his wife explain that mirages may often be seen from this point. Relating traditions of the country, Calvert states that miners are extremely superstitious. An old Cornish legend to the effect that a group of unearthly beings known as the Tommy Knockers warn miners of approaching disaster by tapping on the walls has recently thrown his men into panic. When a skeleton of a man was discovered in an old mine shaft they were further convinced of impending disaster. Elinor confides a premonition of evil to Jack that night, but he laughs at her fears. When Pat O'Brien, a Peyton miner who has been drinking heavily, approaches the office, demanding wages equal to those of Tim Callahan, Jack sends Elinor to her room. He attempts to reason with this man, usually so genial, but Pat is too greatly under the influence of liquor and threatens death, drawing a gun. With a little cry, Elinor unbolts her door and pleads with Pat not to shoot her husband. Bowing gallantly, Pat apologizes and leaves, astonished at Elinor's beauty. Peyton reprimands Elinor for taking this risk, but holds her close to him, afterward, in appreciation of her fearless devotion.

At dinner the next day the miners are in a high state of excitement; the rappings of the Tommy Knockers have been heard in ryhmical sequences at frequent intervals. Calvert expects trouble, and Peyton advises Elinor to remain in her room. Dissatisfied with the cooking, Pat hurls a hot and stony biscuit at the cook. The other men follow suit, adding cherry pies to the ammunition. The peace loving Russians and Welsh, alone, do not join in the fray, remaining docilely in the corner. This emotional outburst leads to a fight between the various nationalities, since racial hatred is strong. Peyton having heard the riot from the office rushes in and discharges all the men. At that moment Elinor enters, and so great is their respect for this woman who values her husband's safety above her own that the miners instantly quiet down. When she sees that all is well, Elinor attempts to return to her home before Jack discovers that she has again disobeyed. Delighted at sharing this joke with her, the miners form an arch through which she passes, unseen by Jack; he discovers her later in her room, apparently asleep. The ambulance carries away the wounded men while the others silently pack and board a train. The great vein of ore was completely blasted out by the last round of shots, further investigation reveals that no more deposits can be found.

Convinced now that her premonition of evil is no mental mirage, Elinor pleads with Jack not to carry out plans to form a syndicate of six and further work the mine, but he is firm in his resolve. Plans completed, Jack starts out on a tour of inspection, leaving Elinor in the care of Mrs. Calvert. In order to make another business arrangement, Jack boards the train for Salida. It crashes with a freight train, and Jack, the sole passenger to survive is pinned under an upper berth. Drenched with blood, and his spine injured he is rescued and is rushed to a Denver hospital. Disturbed at his disappearance, Elinor, alone, searches the mine for him. She loses her way, and at last falls asleep, exhausted. Here Pat, who has returned to the mine in search of employment, finds her. Again heavily intoxicated, and carried away by her beauty, he starts to take her in his arms when he hears the rapping of the Tommy Knockers. At once he guides Elinor to the Calvert home, where a telegram awaits urging her to come to her husband. All the members of the syndicate except Peyton, meet violent death in seeming fulfillment of the tradition. But the mine is a hodoo that puts a curse upon all holding ownership of it. As Elinor kneels at her husband's bedside at the hospital, she extracts a promise from him never again to visit the Golden Arrow, while he thanks Pat and Tommy Knockers that his wife was spared for him. In years to come, they tell the story with mixed wonder and respect for the Cornish Legend.

LOVERS REUNITED

Michael F. Donaghue Drama File No. 12129

DAN CASEY, owner of a dairy farm in the valley of the River Loune, selects young Thomas Falvey from a group of servants gathered to be hired out. When he introduces his to Catherine, his wife, she tells the boy that her maiden name is the same as his; comparing ancestry, they discover that they are distantly related. Mary, Dan's only child, smiles with favor on this attractive youth while his employer is pleased with his industry and skill in caring for the farm animals and attending to work in the fields. Every Saturday the young people of the district gather to compete at sports. John soon establishes himself as a champion at these events. At the same time his modesty and kindliness win him great popularity among both sexes, but he has eyes only for the lovely Mary, now blossoming into womanhood. An accomplished dancer, and violin player, John escorts Mary, her mother, and the hired girl to the "patterns." As she watches Mary and Tom dance gracefully together, Catherine is well pleased, for she has discovered rare qualities of character in this young man more valuable than gold. She often expresses the wish that the two will marry, while Mary blushes. John Burke, son of a cattle trader, interested in the fortune Mary will inherit as well as her beauty, arranges many helpful sales for Dan when he wishes to dispose of livestock. Grateful for these favors, Dan informs John that he will make an ideal husband for Mary when she is a little older. Aware that Dan's word is law, John devotes his time to winning his favor, while Mary and Tom are constantly together.

Pleased with Tom, Dan gives him a gold sovereign as well as his wages when his year is up and prevails upon him to return after he visits his people. During the course of the second year of Tom's service, John suddenly becomes attentive to Mary, inviting her to dance with him at the patterns. Coldly, she refuses, realizing his mercenary plans, and turns to Tom. Infuriated, John invites Dan to a tavern after another sale of cattle. When both are slightly intoxicated, John relates Mary's treatment of him, adding that the whole village is gossipping of his daughter and Tom. In a rage, Dan upbraids his daughter and summarily dismisses Tom. Sympathetic with the young lovers, Catherine advises them to elope, sending a dear friend with Mary, while Tom's pal accompanies him. The clergyman refuses to perform the ceremony until afternoon as he recognizes the couple. Hastily he sends word to Dan who stops the ceremony and orders Tom's arrest for abducting his daughter. Although Mary testifies in behalf of her beloved, the jury, composed in those days of landlords, convict Tom to seven years "beyond the seas." Promising, in poetry, to return, Tom is taken to New Zealand Mary is the victim of a nervous breakdown. When at last, she recovers, her old gaiety is gone and she refuses to wed anyone but Tom. In desperation, her father promises that if he returns, she may marry him, providing that she will become John's wife otherwise, to which she agrees.

Paroled for good behaviour at the end of five years, Tom is allowed to seek his fortune anywhere in New Zealand and, with a friend, discovers a gold mine. At the end of two years he is wealthy. Liquidating his claims, he sails for Ireland, but Mary, who has received a fraudulent letter arranged for by John, stating that Tom is dead, prepares for her wedding, having waited seven months and seven days beyond the seven years. Tom returns and hearing of this at a neighboring cottage, he rushes to Mary's home where he is received cordially as no one recognizes him and all strangers are welcome at an Irish wedding. The merry making is interrupted when the priest as is his custom, announces that the time has come for the wedding. Tom asks first if he may sing. He concludes one of Moore's ballads with the lines he spoke as he was taken to prison. With a cry of joy, Mary recognizes Tom and flings herself in his arms, while the guests look on in amazement. When Tom proves his financial standing to Dan, the wedding continues, and these two are joined together while John hurriedly leaves the scene. Tom's first gift to Mary is a little gold nugget taken from his mine.

TEXAS DUDE

Clinton W. Palmer Western File No. 12033

"YOUR brother George murdered. Marcia kidnapped. Cattle stolen. Your father absent. For God's sake, come at once. Horses to meet you at Las Cruces. Marcia Montez." Receiving this telegram at his fraternity house, handsome, popular "Dude" Jack Parker, football star, prepares to leave at once for his father's ranch, the Santa Inez, in Texas. Two vaqueros, who meet him at the appointed place tell him that George was cruelly shot down by rustlers when he attacked them on the estate with his customary disregard of caution. At the ranch house, Jack consoles Maria Terisa, widow of the dashing Mexican general Montez, who relates that she discovered Dolores, her daughter's maid, bound and gagged, the girl herself taken from the room, during her absence. As Jack's father, recovering from a severe wound, states that when one of his vaqueros informed him that Grizzly, his foreman, had been attacked, while driving cattle to the shipping yards, he followed and was shot by men hidden in the chapparal, all agree that this is the work of the powerful General Concha, long an admirer of Marcia and an enemy of her late father. Jack, adding that Big Jim Tucker, the sheriff and Ike Bennet, the chief deputy, are allied with the Mexican general, foresees a grim battle as he swears to save Marcia, restore the stolen cattle and avenge George's death. The next day Jack is wounded, his horse shot from under him. Hiding in the bushes he fires back, and, hastening to his wounded assailant, discovers that he is Diego, brother of Estaban Concha. By withholding water, Jack forces him to reveal that the sheriff was paid to murder George and that Marcia is a prisoner at the hacienda Las Higiua. Forcing Grizzly to remain on the ranch to protect his father's interests, Jack rides to the home of Highball, friend of his loyal foreman, who with his aide, Raoul the Devil, dashing young Spaniard, and a group of fearless followers, promise to aid the young man. Juanita Orias, an entertainer at the saloon, whom Jack has befriended, warns him of danger, as her brother has heard Concha and the sheriff plan to kill him, but Jack, thanking her, refuses to turn back. Securing papers for the sale of the cattle from his father, Jack and his men approach Concha's hacienda. Raoul, accepted as one of Concha's band because of his nationality, is told that the corridor of the house is heavily guarded. Jack breaks into the general's house; both he and Raoul are wounded and apply first aid to one another. Dividing their men, they enter the patio from each side, scaling the wall, and concealing themselves, partially, with the aid of shadows from the trees. Forcing Concha's men to surrender, Jack's group break through the wall, battering them down. Wounded, Jack recovers to find Marcia bathing his head. She tells him that Concha, now wounded, forced her to marry him; Jack's victorious men are even now looting the church, she adds. Jack smiles although he is grieved to know that Highball's friend, Rattler Jack, was killed in the fray. Threatening torture, Jack forces Concha to confess that his father's papers are in a safe in Agua Vede. Marcia, the priest and Raoul return with Jack, met en route by Senora Montez and Dolores, who has received word from her daughter. At the ranch, Sheriff Tucker attempts to arrest Jack and his father for murder charges, but Dr. Salmon and Captain Boles of the Rangers prevent this. Sending the women to St. Louis and paying the men with ransom obtained from the sale of the cattle and Concha's bail, Jack, in disguise forces Deputy Cockeye Thomas to release his father's papers. With the aid of his school friend, Tom Holcolm, his uncle, and Don Carlos, attorney on land grants, Jack establishes proof that all of Concha's property belongs to Senora Montez. On his way home, Jack joins Colonel Prado's troops, revolting against the government, and kills Concha and Tucker in the fray. The next spring, the reunited and restored family view the wedding of Senora Mentez to Captain Boles, Marcia to Tom Holcolm.

FROM THE BEGINNING

Victor B. Ericson Drama File No. 12118

AS the nurse lays the tiny baby in his mother's arms, both parents pray that this eighth child may be the last son, and accordingly name him Benjamin. Three other children are born, but all of them are girls. Believing that God has answered her prayer, Benjamin's mother begins to train the child in His ways at an early age. While still a baby he learns to say his prayers at her knee. When a little older, Benjamin contracts malaria due to sucking sugar from cane stalks, but again the prayers of his devout parents seem to save him when his life hangs in the balance. A few years later the boy enters a bicycle race, competing against a carriage, and contracts a severe cold which develops into erysipelas as a result. Once more family prayers help to restore him to health. At school, Benjamin meets Hazel, daughter of a neighbor. Brought up in the same atmosphere of faith and charity as himself, the girl is an ideal comrade, inspiring Benjamin to high ideals. Injured in the eye when he shoots a small shell into the ground, against his parents' orders, Benjamin is taken to a specialist. An operation is performed, and during convalescence, Benjamin becomes interested in his attractive nurse, later writing to tell Hazel that he has found someone else. When he returns to his home he discovers that Hazel and her family have moved.

On his twenty first birthday, Benjamin's father presents the boy with an interest in one third of the revenue received from crops and a team. He drives a horse attached to his brother's buggy. Feeling that he is now quite a man, Benjamin drives about the country, the envy of less fortunate youths as various village girls are proud to be escorted in the old carriage. Ambitious to achieve, the young man attends an agricultural college in Manhattan, Kansas, borrowing money for tuition from the bank. Eagerly Benjamin returns to his home, assisting his brother in the erection of a new farmhouse. While the work is in progress, his father is taken with a paralytic stroke and dies. In summoning another brother, Benjamin is absent at the moment when his father dies. Stricken with grief, he completes the work, but crops fail, and, after his father dies, Benjamin is forced to sell his equipment and go to Colorado. He was examined for the army three times and rejected on account of physical condition. He buys 80 acres of irrigated land and hires the man who lives on the place for a year to teach how to irrigate and help farm. It is his hired man who finally persuades him to take a Civil Service Examination. At last he wins an appointment as Rural Carrier. Here he is noticed by Virginia Mikkelsen. She soon fascinates him with her refinement and charm, while her religious training and experience in Kansas City, and Denver interest him. Finding her better than any other he has ever known he urges her to become his wife. This she agrees to do as soon as he pays $6000.00 of his debts. He goes home and sells his land in Kansas to his brother and pays that part of his debts. Returning he tells his lover and they are married. Two boys are born to the couple who agree that when their prayers for a little girl are answered, happiness will be complete.

CLIPPED WINGS

Thomas Raymond Drama File No. 12096

WHEN Robert sees his parents worrying over bills as he studies at night, the boy firmly resolves to leave high school in order that he may help them, and ignores their protests.

His teachers regret this as he is a brilliant student, but he replies that his part time jobs are not sufficient to aid his family. Lillian, daughter of a banker, whom Robert has called hs best friend since childhood days, advises him not to sacrifice himself but the hoy is adamant. He secures a position with an automobile manufacturing corporation, attending night school and engaging private tutuors in order to continue his education. Impressed by the brilliance and initiative of this young man, heads of the company gladly accept his suggestions for improving the designing and mechanism of their cars. He is sent on business trips to distant parts of the country in order to close deals, study new methods, engage assistants. Petulant because his work forces him to neglect social life, Lillian refuses to marry Robert, but when she sees that he is rapidly mounting the ladder to fame, she apologizes, telling him that she has loved him all the time but her parents objected to the marriage. Mary, a pretty little stenographer who has become interested in Robert, reads of his marriage to Lillian with tears in her eyes, although she bravely wishes him happiness.

The corporation heads sell out their interest to a banker's combine. Realizing Robert's ahility, the banker owners resolve not to dispense with his valuable services, but place many of their incompetent relatives and friends in executive positions over him. They take the credit for his suggestions; sadly, he realizes that his years of loyal service count for nothing. Under their management the cash surplus which the old company had built up soon went into the pockets of the favored few, additional stock was issued, exorbitant salaries were paid the relatives and friends while reduced salaries and degrading wages were paid all others, the standard of production was reduced and every available means of dishonesty was used to help the bankers cheat the minority stockholders and general public. At the height of the depression Robert is discharged. Vainly he seeks another connection. Lillian, whom he has showered with every luxury, protecting her hrother from arrest when he misappropriated funds hy paying the deficit himself, complains because they must eliminate parties and theatre trips from the budget. When a wealthy admirer offers her marriage, Lillian leaves Robert, soon securing a divorce. Completely broken, the young man is on the verge of a nervous collapse when Mary discovers him in a restaurant. She takes him to Dr. Wheeler, the kindly physician who employs her as his secretary. Persuading the young man to come bome with him, Dr. Wheeler gradually rebuilds his health, while Mary and her invalid mother restore his morale by their faith in him.

Designing a suspended railway car which travels through the air instead of on the surface or through expensive subways as at present, Robert at last wins recognition. His new transportation idea is the salvation of our railroads, the solution of our congested city streets, the elimination of thousands of deaths by collision, the end of all noise, vibration, dust and discomfort of travel; it opened new transportation of freight and passengers to remote corners of the world and the expense of construction and operation was far below anything now in use. With the aid of Dr. Wheeler and bis friends, he forms a corporation, patenting and marketing bis product.

President Roosevelt's high ideals and principles have so impressed Robert that he insists they be strictly followed and a real New Deal given everyone connected with his organization. His workmen receive good living wages for a tbirty-hour week, his help share in the profits. His rule is to give more and more men employment instead of using too much automatic machinery, and last of all he refuses to let greedy bankers buy his business even though they repeatedly offer him millions of dollars for the same.

Robert and Mary, now his wife, live a life of complete happiness, and one of their greatest joys is the defeating of the bankers and the starting of a real new Deal for all.

MARRIAGE VOW

Mrs. V. E. Landow Drama File No. 12092

ABSORBED in her work, Elsie, a country school teacher, has little time to enjoy social pleasures, as she devotes every minute to further study or for the benefit of her little charges. When the school house becomes the center of community gatherings, Elsie is prevailed upon to play the organ while the happy group sing together. One night handsome Bill Rogers enters the room, and as he smiles at the pretty organist, thoughts of a career are forgotten. Accepting his invitation to accompany her to her home. Elsie feels herself falling in love as she walks beside this attractive youth. The next summer they are married at the little country church. Proudly, Bill carries his hride across the threshold of her new home at his ranch. Interested in her work, Elsie persuades her husband to allow her to continue with it for a short time. Fred Ross, the storekeeper, calls on the couple with Ethel, his wife and their ten year old son, Bert. Soon the two couples become fast friends, enjoying almost every Sunday in each other's company and discovering many mutual tastes. Elsie notices tbat her husband is attracted to Ethel, but trusting them both, she dismisses jealousy from her mind. When Fred is called out of town, and Ethel suggests that Bill help her at the store, bis wife urges him to accept.

Returning unexpectedly, Fred discovers his wife in Bill's arms. The next morning, Bill penitently explains this to his wife, stating that Ethel tantalized him with her wiles until, unable to resist, he kissed her. Understanding the situation, Elsie readily forgives Bill. Nestled in his arms, she confides that she is to become a mother in a few months' time. Although she continues her work because another teacher cannot be found, Elsie is unable to accompany Bill to dances because of her condition. Anxious for his happiness, she urges him to go with Ethel and Fred. As the three are attending a dance at the community hall, Fred is called to the store to attend to purchasing supplies from a travelling salesman. Elsie discovers a letter in her husband's pocket from Ethel, urging bim to meet her at an appointed place, and pouring out her marital unhappiness. The next morning at the breakfast table she gently confesses to Bill that she has read the letter. Holding her close, he tells her that be has seen much of Ethel, and has a confession to make, but as it is school time, it must wait.

While she is teaching, Elsie hears a shot in the distance, but dismisses it from her mind, until Fred, calling at the school house, takes her home. Distractedly he tells her that Ethel and Bill spent the previous night together; he heard them drive home at four in the morning. In desperation, he shot Bill from the cultivator as he was at work in the corn fiield. Elsie loses consciousness; when she awakens she finds herself surrounded by her family and demands that her father and brother take ber to Bill. As he dies, she forgives him, bolding his hand. That same night her child is born and lives only a few hours. Elsie seeks solace in her work, particularly devoting her attention to Ralph, a motherless little pupil. When his father calls to thank her for this, Elsie feels that perhaps she may find her lost happiness with a man who can be faithful, although eternally wondering whether Bill or Ethel told the truth.

BEYOND JUSTICE

Mrs. Virginia Burchfield

Melodrama File No. 12012

AFTER supper, while his father relaxes and his mother smokes her corn cob pipe, Len hurries down the mountian path away from his tiny cabin in the Kentucky mountains to the home of Jane Jarvis, his first sweetheart. Madly in love, the boy is heartbroken when Jane informs him that she no longer wishes to see him, since Jack, whom he has always regarded as a friend, has told her that he is unworthy. Bitterly pouring out his grief to bis father, the boy is told tbat he must leave home, since he is worthless as a belper on tbe rocky farm as a result of his continual day dreaming over Jane. Armed with a rifle, Len stops Jack as the latter is progressing toward his home, and forces him to tell Jane the truth, also carrying a message that she is to meet him at the post office. Without friends, home, or money, seventeen year old Len begs his lovely Jane to marry him and she recklessly consents. After the casual manner of the hill people they are married, without procuring a license. Len secures a position on a farm but, unable to provide for his wife, he leaves her after a few months for more lucrative employment in a neighboring county. When he returns for Jane she is gone. Months later, Len forms another alliance, marrying according to the same casual rules. In time he purchases his own farm and becomes the father of two children. Discovering that a ham has been stolen from his barn, Len trails the thief by following salt which has spilled on the ground. His brother accompanies him; at the door of the Hans cabin Mrs. Hans shoots them with her rusty rifle when they demand the stolen goods. In self defense they are forced to shoot, accidentally killing her.

Bidding his mother a hasty farewell and tying bis dog so that he will not follow, Len, accompanied by Joe, leaves the hill country. Tbe two secure employment on a farm, but as most of the workers are Mexicans, trouble ensues. One of them draws a knife during an argument, and the hoys are subsequently discharged. Hungry and penniless, they hold up a traveller, but take only twenty dollars from his well supplied wallet. In Kansas City, Len and Joe work in a factory, later, starting a small business of their own. On an impulse, Len attends church where he introduces himself to an attractive German girl. Due to her influence, be comes again and again, the entire outlook of his life changing. When she forgives him his past indiscretions he marries her and, in the years that follow, becomes the father of many splendid children. Loyal and understanding, Gertrude, his wife, brings out the best qualities in Len, but he still dreams of golden haired Jane, his first love. When one of tbe workers quarrels with Joe over salary conditions and attempts to shoot him, Len comes to the rescue, killing his brother's attacker. Once again he leaves home and family, a fugitive. Gertrude, who nursed Len through illness and financed him in business, waits for his return, but he goes, again, to the hill of Kentucky, reliving boyhood days as he visits the familiar spots of his childbood. When he encounters an elderly and faded woman he turns in astonishment, recognizing in her his once beautiful Jane. Accidentally he encounters Jack, and the two talk together, forgettng their boyish quarrel. Gertrude dies, but a friend of Gretcben, bis daugbter, traces Len through a photograph, and tells bim that the girl wishes to provide a home for him. However, Len is content to remain in the country wbere he was born, realizing that Jane's memory is only an illusion. In his little cabin, the aged Len finds peace while he waits for the day wben tbe Higher Justice will forgive his sins, committed in the name of love.

MEN DECEIVE

IT was a fine position as private secretary to the local bank president that Elaine gave up to marry Harold. But love is no reckoner of costs, and when, one night, parked near the lake, Harold asked her to marry him, Elaine felt ber happiness complete. To all Harold's theories about the wife's place being in the home, Elaine ascribed, and when they moved to New York where Harold was offered a position with a big company, Elaine gladly gave up all her life long associations.

There was joy in abundance for tbe young pair in the little apartment that Elaine kept spotless. Then, financial reverses made Harold's firm retrencb and when he came home dejectedly to tell Elaine that his position was gone, she got his slippers and his pipe as always and assured him a man of his ability would soon find other work. Weeks of stringent economies followed and when one of Elaine's friends told her of an opening for a secretary, Elaine excitedly informed Harold that she could help, when his own spirits were dejected over the amassed bills. Under the stimulus of Elaine's confidence in him, Harold got another position, but always he was aware that his own salary was lower than Elaine's and that her money more than his was keeping their household running. Only Elaine, in the exuberance of her love, did not suspect Harold's unrest, and when he staying away from home evenings, Elaine believed his explanations of customers he had to see after hours. Often Elaine lying awake for bours waiting for Harold, would pretend to be asleep lest he be upset knowing sbe was worried. Then Elaine's mother took sick and when Elaine decided to return home for a short visit, she was astounded by Harold's obvious relief she loved Harold and always would, despite his transto arise. The last day at the office, her head ached so that she returned early and when a girl called asking for Harold and Harold came running in breathlessly a few moments later, Elaine packed with a determination that frigbtened her busband. He tried to induce her to remain, but Elaine had to get away to think her prohlems out. At bome she found her mother already convalescing, and when her pallor was questioned she broke down and confessed her domestic difficulties. It was ber mother's shrewd analysis that made Elaine realize she loved Harold and always would, despite his transgressions, and humhly she returned home. For bours she waited for Harold's return and wben dawn came up Elaine was still seated at the window. Work was impossible, and as she mechanically straightened the house, Harold came. Hoarsely be greeted her, incredulous that she had returned, and as Elaine set dinner before him he confessed tbat for a long time he had been tempted by the amusements of his friends and the night Elaine left him, he had gotten drunk with a party of tbem. His car crashed into a fence, and the girl be had been with was gravely injured. Elaine, seeing tbe cheap little face of Louise, contracted with pain and hearing her shrill accusations against Harold, left the hospital room and informed her husband his duty was toward the other woman. Deaf to Harold's explanations, Elaine arranged about a divorce until a telephone call from Louise informed ber sbe was leaving Harold who was just a good-for-notbing. Fear clutching at her heart, Elaine raced to Harold and found him stuffing tbe doors and windows before turning on the gas. With a cry of relief, Elaine folded Harold to her heart, and eacb knew that only bappiness stretcbed before tbem for tbey had each otber.

INSPECTION

P. W. Damon Drama File No. 10503

VICTOR JUEGO, a young scientist employed by the Massachusetts State Board of Health reports that the bacteria count in tbe city's milk is reaching six and a half per cent, while it is illegal for it to exceed five per cent. Following the instructions of his superiors, Victor inspects all the state diaries, but the deficiency cannot be traced. The governor then states that tbe milk must be coming in from Vermont, and detectives report that they believe the little town of Barton is the center. Victor is commissioned to make a trip to Vermont, and attempt to find tbe dairy guilty of this illegal practice. Joyfully, be tells Rosemary, his sweetheart, that if he succeeds in this task it mean promotion, and, with a kiss, she wishes him luck, as both know that they can be married as soon as his salary is increased. Driving to the Vermont town, Victor engages a room, and asks the bell boy to bring him a bottle of milk from every dairy in town, and when these amazing orders have been carried out, to the suprise of the hotel servants, the young scientist tests eacb for its bacteria count. At last, he finds a sample wbich has over five per cent, and as it is exactly the same count as the Massachusetts milk, Victor hastens to the dairy, to confirm his suspicions. He is greeted by the genial owner, whose rustic wit and friendless seem hardly in keeping with the role of a smuggler, but he continues with his work, asking for, and readily receiving, samples of the milk. While he is in the barn, Victor feels someone placing hands across his eyes, and guesses, correctly, "Rosemary." She replies that this dairy is owned by her uncle, and she made the trip as a surprise; his arm about the girl. Victor's host extends his hand, and invites the inspector to dinner, saying that he hopes soon to welcome him as a member of the family.

After many thorough tests, Victor cannot doubt that Rosemary's uncle is supplying his state with the contraband milk, and regretfully informs him that he must place him under arrest. The dairyman protests that he knows nothing of the sale of his milk in Massachusetts; it has passed the tests of Vermont, and he has never authorized its delivery elsewhere. Although almost convinced by his frankness, evidence indicates that this is not the case, and Victor insists on the arrest. Rosemary pleads with him to release her uncle, and when he refuses, breaks their engagement. As he is preparing to leave with his suspect, Victors hears a truck starting up at the edge of the farm. With flashlights, he and Rosemary's uncle inspect the cause of this disturbance, and, pulling out a gun, Victor stops Lue Murglue and Joe Marfaroun, two gangsters, as they are about to drive away with a truck load of milk from the farm. In spite of their warnings of vengeance, he brings them to trial, and it is discovered that they have been guilty of smuggling milk, unknown to Rosemary's uncle, from his farm, receiving payment from a Massachusetts dairyman for this service, and making up the deficiency caused by it in Vermont by watering the milk, in order that the same amount will cover both purposes. Rosemary's uncle is freed, and the two indicted; following this, a member of the same gang shoots Victor, and as he lies in the hospital, Rosemary tells him of her love, once more, and all is forgiven. Through his identification, the entire gang is apprehended, and Victor substantially rewarded.

WINNER TAKE ALL

Victor Joseph Hangauer Comedy File No. 11969

CONSTANTLY boasting of his wrestling prowess, Stump Jones, a small, homely but well built young man of Cherrytown, Iowa, sat on a bench in the town park beside the girl of his dreams, discussing once again the chances which some day may be his to become state wrestling champion. Now Emma, for that was her name although lacking pulchritude, and towering above Stumpy, had ambition and this was all directed towards her sweetheart and so when this gentlemen proposed marriage to her she told him that only if he gained the decision in the state wrestling match would she decide in. bis favor. Tuffy McCoy was the reigning champ at the time and on tbis very afternoon a tall athletic gentleman registered at the one hotel of that town and inquired from the clerk at the desk if he could direct him to a gymnasium where be could limber up. He was informed that the only gym in town was one owned and run by Stumpy Jones. Stumpy and Emma meandered leisurely down Main Street to the gym and were greeted by this tall newcomer who asked to use the gym and disconcerted Stumpy by announcing that his name was Tuffy McCoy the champion, Emma was more than pleased and before Stumpy could answer, suggested that Mr. McCoy use Stumpy as his sparring partner much to the latter's chagrin, who now wished beartily that he had not been so boastful. Tbey entered the ring and during the first round Stumpy's legs became very much entangled with the champion's and in his zealousness to win the bout and the praises of Emma he disregarded all fair play and bit what he thought was the leg belonging to his opponent but in reality it was his own leg. Emma, rushed to his aid and insisted that it was the champion who had wounded her sweetheart whereupon she challenged him to a bout in the town park on Stubby's behalf. McCoy jumping at the opportunity to make some easy money agreed. The whole town turned out for this event and the big day had come when Stubby's dream was to come true but poor Stubby was not so glad as he felt very shaky and not at all confident. Talking on a park bench about your strength and then coming face to face with the champion was vastly different. The bell struck and Stubby walked unsteadily into the center of the ring. McCoy however was so over anxious to make a quick end of his opponent that he leaped into the air to make a flying tackle. Stubby managed to escape him and the audience held their breadth while watching the state champion whizz through the ropes and hit the cement walk. There he lay lifeless. The referee counted ten and the new state wrestling champion was Stubby Jones. None were more surprised than Mr. Jones. Emma then was willing to set the day for their wedding. The leg which had pained him so much that morning had long since been forgotten in the throes of Emma's endearments and eulogies. They returned to the park bench that night to discuss other plans no longer in the far distant future but very emminently in the present. Emma really didn't care if Stubby ever wrestled again. He had achieved her ambition.

THE SLEEP WALKER

S. E. Hickman Melodrama File No. 12093

WHILE returning from an exclusive school for the holidays, Laura meets Julian, a poor student, also visiting his parents in the same city. Stealing away from her chaperone, the girl enjoys a happy afternoon in his company as the train is stationed at a city for several hours. While the two dance together, they are carried away by the magic of first love and agree that they must meet again. Laura is severely scolded when she returns to the train, as her chaperone spent anxious hours in searching for her, but she only smiles happily. In her mother's room, the girl confides all this to her parents, pleading with them to invite Julian to their home, for her sake. This they forbid, as they inform the girl that she is a daughter of nobility and must not marry beneath her station. With tears in her eyes, she leaves the room, throwing herself upon her own bed where she sobs herself to sleep. In an endeavor to help her forget this unfortunate attachment. Laura's mother gives a brilliant party for her daughter, inviting many of the socially prominent young men of the city. Although all pay homage to her beauty, accentuated by a blue velvet gown which matches her eyes and contrasts with her dark, wavy hair, the girl is miserably unhappy. Alone, she steals into the garden where she discovers Julian, who has been wistfully watching from afar. With a glad cry she rushes to his arms. They arrange to meet secretly, after this.

When Laura's parents are away, the girl signals for her beloved to enter the house. One afternoon she pleads with him to take her away, but this he refuses to do, saying that they must wait until he can afford to provide her with a comfortable home, as he loves her too much to expose ber to hardship. Every night, the boy works for bours over a novel which he hopes will express the spirit of youth and its problems. Going to Laura's parents, he confesses that he has been visiting their daughter clandestinely, and begs permission to call, since he is of noble blood, though impoverished. This they deny him. A short time after this, Laura's mother discovers that the ancestral silver has been stolen from its glass cabinet. She orders the arrest of Julian. Firmly he protests his innocence, but since he has neither money nor influence, none will believe him save Laura. When her parents firmly forbid her visiting the youth in jail she sends him notes, protesting her love, which her maid secretly carres. Dr. Karl Blake, a noted psychiatrist, becomes interested in the case, and wins permission to remain in the home of Laura's parents for further investigation. In a high state of excitement, the girl's father reports that he has seen a white clad figure walking toward the summer house. With Dr. Blake, he follows, breaking down the door, and discovers his wife, holding an expensive pieee of silver in her hands. The doctor realizes that she is walking in her sleep and gently wakens her. Further search reveals that all the missing silver has been hidden in the summer house. Dr. Blake's treatments cure Laura's mother of this affliction, brought on by nervous shock, and Julian is released from jail. When his book brings him fame and fortune he claims Laura as his bride, with the permission of her parents, who welcome bim.

ONE MORE CHANCE

Betty Jones Drama File No. 12211

IT WAS the evening before their wedding. Marie in the arms of her lover, Jimmie, sighed contentedly. Then came the low voice of the man, troubled; as he began to tell the news which he had kept hidden during the weeks of courtship. He had been out of employment but unable to face the thought of being sent away, lied to her. Now the truth must be faced, and he trembled for her answer. Marie threw herself upon the couch, face downward. After an interval of silence, Marie acknowledged that she cared too much to postpone the wedding now. And Jimmie was radiant with belief that something would soon turn up. So they were married in the City Clerk's office with only Marge, her best friend, witness. For several months Marie hopefully worked at her old office position until she knew that she was going to have a child. It was Marge who came to her one day and confided that Jimmie had not been making the slightest attempt to find work, preferring to hang about the corner pool-room. That night when Jimmie came home, Marie sternly told him that she would work no longer. Only by making him conscious of his responsibilities would Jimmie change his happy-go-lucky existence, she thought. Promptly, Jimmie found a position and for a month or two she was radiantly happy but then the husband developed a fondness for drink. When be came home one day to tell her that he was fired, Marie herself went to his employer and pleaded for the sake of the unborn child that Jimmie be re-hired. For four years, Jimmie kept on the "water wagon" until young Mr. Retler moved next-door. It began innocently enough with the two couples playing bridge together evenings. And Marie suspected nothing until the night when Jimmie claimed he had to go downtown for business. Young Junior was stricken ill and worried, Marie decided to run next door to telephone the doctor. The door was open and she slipped through only to see her husband and the other woman in fast embraee. Dully, Marie phoned the physician and early dawn found her still awake watching the sleeping child — her eyes hurt and stricken. At last she had seen Jimmie as he was instead of the handsome young hero that every girl portrays her husband. The next morning, Jimmie was still in the house and in a surly temper, ignoring last night's happenings, announced that he was fired again and didn't eare if he never got another job. With only a few cents in the house, Marie realized that she alone must be the bread winner for her children; but she would not work also for Jimmie. As soon as she could, Marie planned to set up her household elsewhere. For months she had neglected Marge in loyalty to the husband whom she knew her friend despised. Now she went to her and learned with new hope that a position was open. Mrs. Mason, a kindly neighbor, volunteered to keep an eye on the children but one morning left them alone seeing that Jimmie was with them. Marie returned that night to find her children gone and no trace of her husband. Meanwhile, in spite, Jimmie had taken them to a convent where he persuaded the Mother Superior to shelter them, claiming the mother was an evil woman. Prostrate for days, Marie remained at the home of her friend until word came that Jimmie had fallen from a telegraph pole which he was repairing while not sober. Dying, he begged for Marie and her forgiveness, revealing the children's new home. Months later in the restaurant which employed her, Marie first became conscious of the admiration of John Stanly. Time was to draw these two together and Marie was given one more chance for happiness —rich in the love of her children and the right man at last.

FLESH OF MY FLESH

Franklin D. Dickerson Drama File No. 12207

IN THE home of his adopted mother, Dick Davy sits with his wife waiting for the mother he has seen but once before—Carrie Miller—Mrs. Davy's sister. He is here only after much persuasion for he finds it hard to forgive his mother. Years before Mrs. Miller was the common-law wife of a wealthy man whom she grew to hate. When Dick was born she transferred some of that hatred to him and in spite gave the baby away to her sister refusing to tell the father where his child was. It is his wife Hazel who convinces his that they should forgive the past and try to be friends with her. Mrs. Miller greets him rapturously; only when his back is turned does she glance at him with hatred for he is more like his father than ever. During the couple's stay, Dick grows so attached that Hazel agrees to break up housekeeping and go to Lansing where the Millers are. Soon they are comfortably installed in a modern house. Meanwhile Mrs. Miller confides to the Meningers, her friends that she would like to get Dick out of the state; she doesn't want people to know she has a son that age. At Mrs. Miller's request, Dick calls one night and finds the Meningers there. They beg Mrs. Miller to accompany them to a dance and suggest that since her husband works evenings, Dick should escort her. Dick demurs at first because his wife and children expect him. The other man taunts him with being old fashioned and their combined teasing makes him yield.

The first time that he has gone alone in years, Dick enjoys himself so much that he readily agrees to escort his mother on future evenings but at Mrs. Miller's behest does not tell his wife. An evening comes when she rebels and having already threatened to leave unless he stays home evenings, makes good her threats. Returning in the early morning hours, Dick knows bitter remorse. After moving in with his mother, she reveals herself in her true colors. One evening he finds her in a compromising position with Meninger and leaves, going to a boarding house run by old friends the Barkers where there is a pretty daughter, Ruth. Desiring to cause a divorce between the two and wishing to get Hazel back to New York State where Dick will probably follow—Mrs. Miller finds Hazel and lies about his relations with Ruth. As a result, Dick is arrested on the charge of non-support. This is dismissed since he proves he did not know where his family had been; alone with her Dick begs his wife to return and start marriage afresh. Still believing him unfaithful, Hazel refuses and accepts the shelter of her mother in-law's home. Soon Dick receives a call at the shop; Hazel and the children have been ordered out by Mrs. Miller. Although he is still resentful, Dick responds to her call of need. That evening he insists that Hazel should return to New York State at once and stay with Mrs. Davy; he would follow shortly. Convinced it was a ruse to get her away, Hazel refused but when he attempted to take her to the train by force she told him she was getting a divorce. The unhappy husband went to room with the Collins and Jane unhappy because her husband runs around every night falls in love with Dick who lonely responds. They agree to marry when their decrees are granted and for the meantime, Dick returns to the Barkers. While at a dance with Ruth one night, he meet his mother who casts aspersions at Ruth. Indignant, Dick reminds her of the compromising situation she was once in. Arrested for slander, Jane comes to tell him that she and her husband have agreed to start over again for Mrs. Miller was the woman he has been "playing with" not knowing her background. Feelingly curiously relieved, Dick pleads guilty and is sentenced to leave the state. As he turns he finds Hazel whom Jane secretly wired by his side. And Mrs. Miller's victory is ashes for she sees that her son's happiness is beyond her power to harm.

THE DEADLY TWINS

Rosa Lee Brevard Short Subject File No. 12308

LITTLE Tommie was one of those winsome little girls whom everybody loves. Her pretty blonde curls danced in the wind and eyes sparkled. She was too young to realize the change of circumstances when her father died. With her mother she moved to a little damp attic room in which the sun never peeped. She never possessed much appetite so she did not realize that the food on the table grew less. Once her mother came with a bottle of grade A milk; the income that week had been a few pennies more. However, Tommie pushed it away. Worried her mother brushed the moist curls from the child's forehead. Something had been happening to Tommie lately. Her disposition was no longer so sunny; she grew fretful. The pretty roses in her cheeks had faded pale and the glint in her hair was vanishing. That night in bed, Tommie first began to cough. Alarmed because Tommie had fever, the doctor was called. To her mother the doctor spoke very gravely and told her that he feared Tommy had tuberculosis. Further tests would have to be made later. Meanwhile Tommie fell asleep and two of the germs that had been causing the trouble began a conversation—twins that despite their tiny size were quite active. Said Twin One; "I do think this is the nicest place any little germ could ask for. No milk, no sunshine and Tommy never seems to want to nap." Twin two shivered when sunshine was mentioned and said coarsely, "Why do you have to bring that up? You know I just hate the thought of those things!" A few weeks later, Tommie was an outdoor patient at the Fresh Air Hospital. Slowly she walked over to the big oak tree and began to cough for the twins were playing ring around the roses and jump rope in her lungs and their feet tickled her throat. She stretched on the grass and fell asleep while the hot sun beat down upon her. The first twin began to complain; it was much too hot and he was sure Tommie was on fire. Carelessly, Twin Two said that it was a sun bath and wanted to keep playing but the other pointed out that he could never move in such warmth. The nurse came over and gave Tommie a glass of water. The twins sobbed, convinced that they were going to be washed out. Before Tommie settled down again she took several deep breaths of fresh air. Again the twins grumbled; there was too much fresh air in the apartment and they sighed for the warm foul air of the attic. The relaxing child irritated them; here she was resting all the time when they thrived so much better when she made herself completely fatigued. This time the nurse appeared with lunch and watched her as she drank her milk and ate the graham cracker but rejected the raw vegetables and the beef broth. When she was politely asked to finished her meal, Tommie refused; the rest wasn't to her liking. A few yards away fenced off was the railroad track and suddenly the 2.45 engine rolled up; stopped and glared. "Won't do what?" it roared. Frightened Tommie explained she was talking about her meal but the angry engine ordered her to, saying, "Don't you know that the six best doctors anywhere—and I dare anyone to deny it—are Doctors Sunshine, Water, Air, Rest, Exercise and Diet?" And when Tommie promised eagerly to hereafter make good use of them, the twins sneaked away for they knew this was no place where they could thrive any longer.

HIS OWN PEOPLE

Rosa May Green Drama File No. 12324

WEALTHY Chris Canton looked with fond eyes upon his only daughter, Beth, who had stopped in the library for a moment that he might see her in her new finery. Canton watched her leave with handsome Ralston, uttering aloud a half murmured wish that Beth and Ralston decide to make a match of it. Overhearing this his wife timidly pointed out that she was sure Beth only cared for him as a friend. The mention of love brought a disgusted look upon the face of Canton who placed blood and position first. Oblivious of this Beth rode on happily to the dance. It was her first season "out" and the whirl of gaiety and attentions which any pretty girl whose father has wealth commands, went to her head like strong wine. Beth had never given much thought to marriage though she realized dimly that Ralston was beginning to care for her. After greeting Mrs. Kentwood, her mother's closest friend and their next-door neighbor, Beth soon stepped off to the dance floor where it was not long before her program was covered with names. In the midst of the throng that surrounded, Beth saw her hostess, Mailene, pushing her way through the throng with a strange young man whom she introduced as her cousin, William. Teasingly, noticing the strange way in which the two held each other's eyes, Mailene declared that she had dragged William here on the promise that he could meet Beth whose photograph in the Sunday paper had strongly attracted him. Now Beth simply must dance with him. William at first too shy to speak joined her pleas, so Beth agreed to switch partners at the next dance number with Mailene and Ralston whose dance it was, hiding his disappointment consented. It was not many days after this that Canton called Beth into his study and in a disapproving voice asked what she knew of William of whom she had been seeing so much lately. Beth confessed that he was holding a minor position on an editorial staff and dependent on his salary for his needs. Immediately, Canton was convinced that he was a fortune hunter and ordered her to tell William that she could not see him again. Though her mother sought to comfort her, Beth met William that night with a heavy heart. They had dinner in a quiet little restaurant and there Beth at last made clear her father's demands. Overwhelmed by the fear of not seeing her again, William poured out his love. That evening late a telegram came to the Canton home—Beth was married. Canton swore that he would never forgive her and forbade his wife to see Beth even when more than a year later their grandchild, Elizabeth was born. Through the next seven years Beth and William were extremely happy, except for the time when Mrs. Canton died. For her sake, William called personally to beg that the daughter be allowed to attend and was refused. Months after William's own death, Mrs. Kentwood found the widow and child living in a dingy room while Beth did sewing to eke out an existence. She refused to appeal to Canton for help; but she did agree to spend a week doing sewing at her friend's home. There, wandering through the grounds Elizabeth came across Canton, a stranger to her. Where other children always ran from him, Elizabeth through her fearlessness won his heart. When he learned that she was leaving with her mother he called next door to offer work unable to bear being without her. Then it was that he discovered that mother and child were his own people—the past to be forgotten in the loving arms of big and little Beth.

THE STRUGGLE

Daisy Della Clark Drama File No. 12189

EVEN at four, Rita's beauty attracted attention as she sat alone in the railroad train which was bringing her to her grandfather's home. Shortly after her mother had died her stepfather had sent her on this journey glad to get her off his hands. When the conductor who had charge of her failed to find anyone to meet the child, a kindly passenger agreed to take her. So Rita began the first of her long series of travels. The home was too crowded so refuge was offered with a grand-aunt where there were several adult sons. "Children should be seen and not heard," was the adage of her childhood. Early, Rita was given the heavy tasks of the household; there was one typical night when a cousin beat the worn out child for not hustling fast enough to fetch his meal when he returned late. At school the little boys admired her but the girls were envious of her golden hair which curled over the sensitive face. At twelve hungry for a life of her own, desiring the pretty refinements that children with parents were taught, Rita was set out to make her living. One of her first positions was representative of the many which followed. Five grown men to feed, baking to do and huge washing and ironing which kept her from dawn till late at night—her mistress an ill, inconsiderate woman. Insufficient sleep and relaxation told on the child who rebelled at last. Looking mournfully at the scanty garment which was all that her work netted, Rita stole away early one morning and awlked for miles to the home of her Uncle James, recently married, and the only one that had been considerate of her in the past. For a while it was paradise; there was work but she felt equal to it and as the months passed she became more conscious of the admiring eyes of the young men as they passed in church. Parsons, the school teacher, begged her to walk home with him one Sunday. Her relatives teased but Rita's eyes clouded. This was not what she wanted; somewhere in life there must be finer ways than among the people she had already met. But into the temporary haven she had found came tragedy. Forgotten were the ties of blood; her uncle knew only that he loved this girl as a woman and not a niece. The truth dawned upon Rita when he tried to forcibly seize her once and kiss her. Again she ran away, not wishing to break her aunt's faith in her husband. Her cousin Harold and his wife opened their door to the orphan. Then came the day when Harold announced that a fellow worker of his was coming Sunday, desiring to take Rita out in his new rig. Overcome by shyness and lack of a suitable wardrobe, Rita ran out the other door to the woodshed when she saw Tom's horse approach. Tom persisted in waiting and at last Rita permitted herself to be persuaded to wear cousin Lillian's dress. Instinctively, Rita knew that she was at her loveliest when she went to greet Tom. He returned the following Sunday, begging her to marry him. For a long time Rita hesitated; she was so very young, barely fifteen, and had gone with no other man. But in the days that followed, his friendly kindliness and warmth of affection was a staff of strength to the homeless girl. At last she consented to become engaged. He begged her to make his family's home her headquarters until she was ready to marry. But Rita insisted on working, hoarding the pitiful dollar and a half that a week's back-breaking labor would bring—for the little finery that every woman desires. Then came the day when the mistress suggested that she and Tom marry; staying on the farm for their honeymoon while she made a long-desired trip. Tired of the struggle, Rita assented—for peace and contentment in a home of her own she willingly sacrificed all other dreams.

QUEER DAVE

Monita Perry Drama File No. 12242

QUEER DAVE sat quietly in the corner of the general store. None knew in that little town from where he came yet for several months he had wandered aimlessly through the streets, making his home in an abandoned shack. Folks termed him not quite right in the head but perfectly harmless. Only Gus Haskell the proprietor secretly believed that Dave was as sane as any; but there was no denying that his presence was a mystery. Though he could not have been more than forty, the man looked at least ten years older. Gus sighed deeply and Queer Dave instantly turned upon him. What was wrong? Then Gus confessed that he was thinking of his seventeen year old invalid daughter, a victim of infantile paralysis since childhood. The parents were beginning to feel their age and had been able to save little for the hour when they should be called to eternal rest. It was time to close the shop so Queer Dave waited outside while Gus finished locking the door. Through the warm summer air came the sweet notes of an old-fashioned song in a lovely voice. Queer Dave stopped short. "My daughter," said Gus with a note of pride. Accepting his invitation to visit her, Queer Dave entered the house but fixed attention immediately upon a photograph which Gus identified as Margy. Upon Queer Dave's excited questioning, he confessed that in reality she was adopted; left on their doorstep when only a babe. The only clue was a locket with the initials M. H. From his pocket, Dave drew a similar trinket. And then turning to the past, Dave unfolded the story of his friend, Morton Hays, wealthy artist. . . Twenty years ago Morton was already a successful portrait painter. Though his family were established among the social leaders, the artist refused to participate often in social functions preferring to confine himself in the studio days at a time. Obeying his mother's pleas one evening he attended a dinner party. Pretty Maude Cleavers was seated next to him and Morton smiled knowingly, realizing that Mrs. Hays' dearest wish was for her son to marry. A few more teas and dances and before Morton quite realized he found that it was taken for granted that an engagement was impending. Why not? She was as charming as any girl in that set. But eighteen months later found Morton disillusioned with marriage. One night a little girl, Helen, was born; and Maude had slipped into the shadows. Two years later, dissatisfied with the thought of having his daughter brought up by servants in his mother's home Morton told Daniel, his best friend now known as Queer Dave, that he wisbed to marry—a marriage in name only for the sake of his child. To a young priest whom he gave singing lessons to, Daniel mentioned this. As a result shy sweet Violet, convent-bred, too timid to confront life without her parents who had been killed in an accident consented to this arrangement. Daniel whose heart went out to her at once was amazed; later he was to learn that Violet had fallen in love with the picture of Morton who never seemed to look at her. He left her alone in the country for several months and while Daniel struggled to be loyal he could barely keep to himself the words of love that pressed to his lips. The time came when he felt at last there might be hope. Suddenly Morton returned; it was as if absence had enabled him to see her as she was and make her truly his wife. Daniel went on a long trip until word came that Marge, Violet's child, had been kidnapped. For her sake all these years he sought the girl but only within the past year had a clue come. A disgruntled servant not quite sane confessed to having taken the child for ransom but frightened by the sight of all the police deposited the child miles away in this rural hamlet. . . The quest is ended, sighs Queer Dave. From the doorway a wheel chair pushes in. Marge has overheard this. And while Dave stares at the girl, Gus can see him growing taller and straighter. In the girl is being born the spark of love which her real mother's heart denied.

THE CARE-TAKERS

J. S. Kaydel Drama File No. 12305

IN his Wall Street office, Alfred St. Johns approves a request that the southern estate of the MacLeods, which he inherits through the automatic foreclosing of the mortgage following the former master's death, retain the daughter and nurse as caretakers. Mentally visualizing the daughter as a helpless child, Alfred dismisses the affair temporarily from his mind. Soon in MerreWeather, Betty MacLeod assisted by faithful Jimmy from the neighboring estate and Mammy, is moving a few of her cherished possessions to the office, a small building adjoining the main house. When they pause for a rest for the twentieth time Jimmy proposes and is just as promptly rejected. Not long afterwards Alfred receives orders from his physicians to take a prolonged rest as extensive work has strained his eyes. That night at dinner he breaks the news to his mother and cousin, Anna Van Wyck, society leader and heiress—the girl whom his mother wishes him to marry. Up to now, the two have just been drifting in their relationship. It is Anna who suggests that he go to the southern place and that they join him a few weeks hence for an extended weekend party. More affectionate than she has ever been before, Alfred begins to respond when Elmer Powell enters. Secretly, Elmer has always been jealous of Alfred and needing money desires to marry Anna, himself. However, he accepts the invitation to the houseparty. Betty driving her unruly pet donkey Jack for the mail, finds a letter informing her of Alfred's impending arrival. While Mammy worries about fixing up the house, Betty squanders part of the check on gifts for the needy. Awaking early, Alfred is amazed when he looks out the window and sees the lovely girl pumping water for his tub bath. Later prevailing upon Mammy to introduce him he has Betty read regularly to him and it is not long before they become close friends; New York becomes very remote. Suspecting some feminine attraction, Anna and Mrs. St. Johns arrive unexpectedly and antagonize Mammy while they await Alfred who is sauntering through the woods with Betty, fast losing her heart to him. Later he has many uncomfortable moments with his mother and to save their friendship from being misunderstood avoids Betty. Hurt, Betty turns to her several beaux while Jimmy is always first at her side Alfred notices jealously. But he is still more aroused when he finds Elmer churning while Betty makes biscuits one morning. Knowing Elmer's reputation he grows afraid. When the entire household is out riding one morning, Betty with a pang of homesickness slips into the library of the big house. The library conveys the atmosphere of Alfred who returns to find her asleep with his glove pressed against her cheek. Close on his heels follow Elmer and Anna who is ready to misconstrue the meeting. The eve of a costume ball on a rainy night soon after, Elmer finds Betty and Mammy spying on the gaiety, and persuades Betty to join, wearing her mother's dress. As a result the men throng about and the women grow resentful. It is Alfred who leads her to the portrait of her mother for comparison when Elmer, maliciously enters with Mrs. St. Johns and Anna, the former telling her that a care-taker has no rightful place there. Seeking solitude, Betty holds her head up proudly to hide the tears from them and flees to the lodge; while Alfred stung by the contemptuous words of Johnny who witnessed the scene, reveals that he is in love with Betty and regardless of consequences will marry her. Finding Elmer gone and sure that he has followed Betty, Alfred hurries after. Nervous at the sight of Elmer just as she nears the lodge since she senses he is not to be trusted, assuming nonchalance Betty enters. As he seeks to press attentions, his interests are diverted by Alfred's approaching steps and Betty slips behind the secret panel of which only Alfred knows. Following a primitive fist fight witnessed by Mammy, Rev. Mr Taylor and Jimmy in which Elmer is thoroughly beaten; the secret panel is unlatched and Alfred takes the willing Betty in his arms. A wedding is to come and once more a MacLeod possess the estate.

THE DOUBLE-CROSS

Chick Alberts Drama File No. 12193

THEY sent Detective Herbert Donnelly back to pounding the pavements when he failed to produce the crooks who for weeks had been making fat hauls around lower New York. And Mary, his sweetheart, facing postponement of their marriage again secretly vowed to find the thieves and restore her lover's rank. Not long afterwards Mike Grant sitting alone in a restaurant eyed with meaning approval the pretty legs of the girl at the next table. For several minutes he sought to catch her eye and was at last rewarded by a beaming smile. Soon after Mike sent a note by a waiter asking if he might join her. Before the evening was over Mike felt that he had known her for weeks. One thing made him a bit afraid; there was something about her manners which stamped her as a girl from a higher class than he was accustomed to. With relief, Mike learned that her father was a printer. Amazed at himself when he left her at her door without even attempting to kiss her, Mike still retained presence of mind to suggest that she attend the Democratic district dance the following Friday evening. Many stared that night at Mike with a new girl whom no one could place. Since he made it plain that he wanted to be alone with her, few yielded to the impulse to ask Mary for a dance. However, Tony, his partner in crime who came in late lacked such scruples. With a hearty back-slap, Tony made his presence known to Mike and made himself comfortable at their table. Before many days had passed, that section of the underworld knew Mike and Tony were rivals for Mary's hand. When word came to Donnelly from her small brother Jack why she was too busy to see him often, he waited for Mary outside her office and began to make a scene. Wordlessly, Mary handed back the ring. Then came the night when Tony pleaded with her to become his girl. But she gave him to understand that she was helf-pledged to Mike—still if Mike were only out of the way there could be no doubt of her choice. The two men had a robbery scheduled at one of the United Cigar stores that night. An hour earlier, Tony entered a telephone booth and informed the clerk of the impending hold-up, giving an exact description of Mike to make sure that there was no mistake. As was their usual arrangement, Mike entered first certain that Tony was at his heels. Too late, he realized from the ugly little gun that pointed over the counter that he had been double-crossed. Tony was proud of himself during the succeeding days although Mary persisted in being "just a good friend" for a little while longer. Already he had teamed up with Debret and they planned a rich haul in Young's Cafe. Boastfully, Tony informed Mary who took care to indirectly pass the tip to Donnelly. That evening the detective sauntered over to Tony and significantly warned him to be on his best behavior that night. A little worried at how much he guessed the men decided to postpone the robbery. Tony went over to Mary's home where he met her father for the first time. Old John immediately disliked him and objected to Mary going with him. Losing his temper, Tony knocked him unconscious. After Donnelly saw Mary the next morning he went immediately to Tony and woke him from a nightmare, with the question, "Why did you kill him?" In his confusion, Tony incriminated himself and learned that he was accused of killing Mary's father and Young. Desiring to escape the chair and to convince Donnelly of honest intentions, Tony signed a confession of his past robberies. Only later did he learn that both "dead" men were perfectly well and the full extent of the trick played was revealed when he learned of the engagement of the newly promoted detective to Mary.

FARMER JONES' PESKY SWINE

Edward S. Foote Comedy File No. 12322

AN old bachelor set in his ways is farmer Jones who first shows signs of interest in feminine company when the widow Matilda moves across the road where she keeps a small garden patch and a cow. Thinking to find favor with her he comes over one night with a batch of carrots from his own fields only to find young Hellinger seated comfortably in the best chair with a bouquet of flowers on the mantelshelf which Hellinger takes pains to point out is his gift. Poor Jones feels uncomfortable in his overalls and soon wanders off sure when he hears their laughter that he is the subject of it. He decides aloud that courting is not for him and in his musing forgets to keep an eye on the unruly cow he is milking with the result that when he tugs too hard she gives a kick which sends the pail of milk all over him. The next morning when he goes out the kitchen door he finds a small basket all blanketed on the step. Nervously he opens it only to be greeted by the squeal of a small baby pig. Poor Jones isn't certain what to do with it then struck by a bright idea he tucks the pig under his arm and brings it over to the cow and proceeds to feed it. But the cow objects so strenuously that Jones finds himself abruptly on the ground and the pig several yards away. Jones starts the old ford after many balky turns and in the general store under the sneering glance of last night's rival asks for a nursing bottle. That evening the widow Matilda calls and asks to see the baby. Knowing that this is Hellinger's work, Jones finally exhibits the pig. Under her sympathetic gaze Jones attains courage to propose. Asking time to think it over, Matilda sends word that in the fall there is to be an exhibit of pigs at the fair. If he will enter his pig in competition with Hellinger, she will marry the man who wins the ribbon for she is fond of both. The very best scraps that the kitchen can produce are fed to the pig and Jones spends many weary hours scrubbing the animal which day by day grows fonder of him. So tame does his pig become that it follows him all over the fields. Then one day the pig wanders across to Matilda's garden and finds the vegetables very much to its liking. An irate widow rushes over to Jones and near to tears informs him that the pig has ruined the vegetables she planned to use for canning. It is a regular tug of war before with a rope Jones leads his pet away with the warning of Matilda that bargain or no bargain she is through with both him and the pig. While the pig now remains securely fenced it still thrives and Hellinger deliberately passes tauntingly before Jones while on his way to the widow. The day before the fair, knowing that the pig has grown wild from confinement, Hellinger lets it lose. Jones finding it gone commences to hunt. When he sees the pig it increases speed. Neighbors from all around came to lend a willing hand. Full twenty of them ran up and down hill while men, women and children left their cars in the highway and gave chase until it ran into a slaughter honse yard and aroused all the other pigs who start running through the open gate while the owner, fuming now joins the others who have fifteen pigs to run after. When all are caught, Jones can't identify his pig and only humble apologies save him from jail. He returns home with a sad vision of his beautiful pig ending in hams only to find that the pig is back in the yard of Matilda. She forgives him, blaming Hellinger, and promises to marry him regardless of the Fair results. The pig looks on contentedly as the two embrace.

SELF-MADE

Jane Gordon Drama File No. 12267

IN the model state reformatory a visitor accuses Superintendent Jack Russel with being too lenient to his charges. After dinner while the men smoke in the library, Jack tells them that because people helped him when he was a boy he is now eager to help others. Long after they leave, Jack sits before the fire dreaming of his past. . . The turning point of his life was the night that he, a ragged farmer's boy, played a Specialty part in the High School class play. His excellent singing voice drew the attention of many including the Holmans, a well-to-do family. The next day, crestfallen, Jack went to the principal's office to announce that he was leaving school because his family could no longer finance him. Begging him to wait another day, Mr. White called Mrs. Holman who generously arranged to give board and room to the boy in turn for errands. After the first morning when he indirectly set fire to the roof in his zeal to keep the furnace going, Jack was quite happy. Almost as pleased was Jane Crawford, daughter of wealth who preferred Jack's company to the wealthy boys. Resentful, Harvey Lessing taunts the boy with being only a servant. But soon after the Holman's took Jack in as a member of the family, liking him for his own sake as well as the fact that small Teddy, their son, who had always wanted a big brother fairly worshipped Jack. His first meal with the family was crude for Jack was uncertain of table manners but he was a willing and quick learner. The Holmans launched him into the social set with a large party. Always Jane and he were together, with the understanding at last that someday they would become closer than friends. It was Mrs. Holman who coached him to win the state oratorical championship. Then came the night that Jack determined to be a lawyer after attending court for a civics class. Convinced that the Holmans had done enough for him, Jack resolved to work his way through Yale. Senior Prom night was mingled with gayety and sadness for the young folks knew that an end to one period had come that life began now in earnest. Both Jack and Jane were unusually sober for the next day they were to part; Jack to spend the summer in Colorado and Jane for Europe before entering finishing school. It was also because of her that Jack desired success for he resolved not to make any formal engagement until he was able to adequately support a wife. A popular chap, work and study is well combined but steadily Jack refuses to go with any other girl. When Jane comes down to watch him win the boating regatta, his classmates admiring her attractive loveliness find this much easier to understand. Unfortunately Harvey was at Yale also and was present when Jack took her to a celebration dance. Harvey lied to her that Jack was really tied to another girl out of town at present. He proved this by asking Jack to loan his watch a moment. Inside the case was a photograph affectionately inscribed. Too proud to ask, Jane was cool the rest of the evening. Jack could not understand why she never wrote; when the day finally arrived with his coveted diploma he showed little enthusiasm even when he received an offer to enter a prominent law firm. However, he went to the station to meet the Holmans. For a moment he couldn't believe his eyes when he saw Jane. But he soon learned that while calling on the Holmans, Jane had met the girl of that photograph he carried only to learn that it was Jack's sister. . . The superintendent stirred. Yes, the years had been kind to him. Suddenly his wife stepped behind him, asking, "Dreaming again?" "Of you, dear Jane," he replied pressing her hand tenderly against his lips.

BLOOD OF OUR FATHERS

Gerald S. Burnham Drama File No. 12295

IT is Iola, the negro servant who officiates at the birth of the young master of the plantation, Martin Prescott; and Julian Ives, her sister's son; born within two hours of each other. The pampered heir tended by Iola after the death of his mother, attends the finest schools in the east. At college he falls in love with sweet Diana Wells, daughter of a noted senator. However, Diana cares for Martin only as a friend. Following graduation, Diana returns to Washington and Martin leaves for home to study the management of the plantation. He resents having Julian chief overseer and cannot understand why his father should have provided the mulatto with a high school education. When, after Martin has several disagreements over business policy, his father refuses to dismiss Julian, Martin in anger leaves for Washington. The Prescott name opens many social doors but Martin is called home upon his father's death. One of Martin's first acts is to dismiss Julian who embarks in the aviation field in which he has always been interested. His invention of an armored plane for warfare wins him many friends who are unaware of his mixed blood. A friend, Orville Hamilton, places his laboratory at Julian's disposal and attracts government officials to investigate the machine. Senator Wells who is sponsoring a naval bill providing new planes for the fleet likes Julian at first meeting and invites him to his home for a small dinner party. There Diana and Julian meet and from finding themselves intellectually in accord soon progress to an emotional sympathy. That night at home Julian faces the fact that he is falling in love with a white girl and his touch of negro blood must forever bar him from fulfillment. To save them both pain, Julian continues to refuse all invitations on the plea of work. Martin, who has finally straightened the estate, gives a week-end hunting party to which Diana and her parents are invited. More hurt at Julian's indifference than she will confess, Diana at last yields to Martin's constant proposals but stipulates that the engagement must remain secret for a time. He returns with her to Washington; there unwittingly he saves Julian from the path of an oncoming car but when Martin realizes that it is the mulatto he refuses to shake hands. Diana personally visits the lab to urge Julian to accept an invitation at her home that night. In her earnestness, she comes close to him. Drunk with her nearness, Julian takes the willing girl in his arms and all sense of time is forgotten. Upon this scene, Martin breaks in and imbued with fury denounces Julian as a quateron. Though Diana begs Julian to deny it, he walks away with bowed head. Regardless, she will always love him insists Diana as Martin takes her away at Julian's behest. The day that Diana's engagement to Martin is to be announced, Iola comes to unburden her soul of a secret which she had held over Col. Prescott. Angry when Martin throws her out, Iola reveals that Martin and Julian are really half-brothers which Col. Prescott acknowledged. But only she knows that Julian is the rightful heir whom she switched in the eradle determined to give the mulatto—the present Martin—an opportunity in life. Julian forees Martin to take a blood test or he will go to Diana. The test proves Iola's story and Martin disappears. Julian now in his rightful position takes Diana for a test flight of the plane, an unqualified success; and immediately afterwards the society eolumns announce their engagement.

NO END TO LIVING

Elizabeth Baluh Drama File No. 12261

GAY, carefree Joe Gunder sails to America, after borrowing a sum of money from his friend, Jake. Although unable to find work because there is a strike in progress at the mines, he borrows an additional sum, sending for Mary, his wife, and their baby, Elizabeth. When the two arrive, they are enthusiastically met at the dock by Joe and his loyal friend. The latter arranges a party for Mary at the boarding house, but in the course of a few days, she finds out the true status of her husband's affairs. In order to pay back the debt, Mary sews at night. Eventually the mines reopened and Joe secures work, but when several are killed during an explosion, he refuses to return to the place. Assisting her mother in every way she can, Elizabeth soon becomes invaluable to Mary, as the child learns to speak the English language which her mother never mastered. At seven, the truant officer insists upon Elizabeth's attendance at school. The child is shy, at first, because of her foreign birth and fears that her school mates will find her name peculiar, but as they aceept her she gains confidence. Forced by necessity to work long hours, and somewhat ashamed of her humble home, Elizabeth cannot bring her friends or teacher there. George Bush, ten years the child's senior, pays court to her, calling with boxes of candy and other gifts. True to the traditions of the old country, Mary urges Elizabeth to accept George when the young man proposes. The family move next door to George when it becomes necessary for Mary to manage a boarding house in order to provide for her husband and daughter.

To avoid this wedding, Elizabeth desperately runs away with Annie, a friend, securing housework. Eventually she takes another position in a rooming house; here she meets Edward Bliss, a young student. The two fall madly in love, but Mary finds Elizabeth and forces her to return home. When George purchases clothing for her, the entire town decides they are engaged and teases the girl about it. She runs away again, but receives word that her mother is desperately ill. Returning, she finds this is but a ruse, as Mary insists upon the wedding and George threatens to shoot Elizabeth if she does not acquiesce. At last the tired, frightened child agrees. There is much feasting at the wedding but before he leaves with his bride George engages in a drunken quarrel.

The years that follow are heartbreaking ones for Elizabeth. She is subjected to every cruelty and neglect by her drunken husband. When her own father, ill and feeble, refuses a sleigh ride, George throws him outdoors on a bitter night, killing all affection. Six children are born to this loveless marriage. Although devoted to them, Elizabeth cannot find time to be with them as she, too, is forced to run a boarding house. After Mary's husband dies, she makes her home with Elizabeth, purchasing a lot at Pleasantville for the family. When death takes Mary, Elizabeth feels that she has nothing to live for, as her children are all grown. But Virginia, the granddaughter, confides that she loves Edward Bliss, Jr. and eannot wed him since his mother believes her socially inferior. Elizabeth tells of her shattered romance with Edward, Sr. to the boy's grandmother, and that wise woman then consents to the wedding, remembering her husband's unhappiness. And when Elizabeth forces George to send their son to an art school as he wishes, she knows that she has a mission in life in preventing others from making her mistakes, as she bravely continues living.

A FORTUNE TELLER'S PROPHECY

Marie C. Mauriella Drama File No. 12276

PARIS—bound, the new ship Atlantic is on its maiden voyage. Included on the thrilled passenger list are Ellen and Doris Ramsdell, cousins. For the thousandth time, Ellen who is a firm believer in fortune tellers, reports every incident of her last meeting with Haig Haasem. Haig not only described Doris whom he had never before seen personally but also told her that a crime was to be committed by a woman whose first name is Mayre. Doris only laughs at her; then points to a very lonely blonde girl walking with a much older man. There is a sudden shriek from Ellen who gasps that the description fits exactly. Trembling, she orders the steward to bring a list of the passengers and through a process of elimination finally identifies the couple as Judge Louis W. Johnson and his wife, Mayre Johnson; off on a honeymoon trip. The following days, Ellen awaits each hour prepared for tragedy and is a bit crestfallen when the boat docks and nothing happens. They are preparing to freshen up at the hotel before going sight-seeing when a call comes that the French police wish to see them. So Ellen first learns that Judge Johnson has been found dead in bed fom poisoning and his wife in arrested. At Ellen's involuntary cry, to explain herself she is forced to speak of the fortune-teller. The police stare at the girls carefully and after a whispered conference ask both to return with them. They feel sorry for the dazed woman and feel that it may help if some of her countrymen are with her. At first, Mayre stares at them with hostility but then touched by their evident desire to help, turns back the pages of the past which led to this tragedy . . . . Mayre's sixteenth birthday. She felt like a full grown lady then in search of excitement. There was a band concert in a neighboring town and with her chum, Isabelle, she drove there. No sooner had they left the car when Mayre heard her name called. There was John, a friend of hers back on vacation from the university; with him was Leonard Merrill, the man with whom she was to fall madly in love. Meanwhile they paired off; Isabelle with Leonard and she with John, until the latter had to leave earlier to return to his college. Leonard called that night and insisted on taking her out. Yielding to the charm which she had been conscious of since their first meeting, Mayre went. By the time he was due back at college, Leonard had begged her several times to marry him. Feeling such a step unwise until his course at school was complete, Mayre finally consented to become engaged to him. They wrote constantly. Months later, Leonard came into town unexpectedly. His older brother, Thomas, had learned of the pledge and ordered him to break it; time enough when he could leave college. The only effect was that they saw each other more often. Sent to Europe, he became attracted to Rae Sanders who reminded him of Mayre. When his brother learned that the Sanders were wealthy, he fostered the contact when Leonard returned. The day came when Leonard's family fortune was swept away and to save his career which the other girl's wealth would make possible, Mayre sent him away. When she received a wedding invitation, she nearly broke down but instead responded to the attentions of the Judge. But on their honeymoon she loathed herself for marrying without love; to escape her husband's unwelcome attentions she administered a harmless sleeping powder. . . Footsteps were heard. Incredulous, Mayre sprang to the outstretched arms of the lover she thought lost to her. And then Ellen was to learn that her mention of the fortune teller had put the police on the track which frees Mayre. Haasem in revenge for a personal grudge had caused powders to be substituted and used Ellen to cast further suspicion on Mayre away from himself. And Leonard confesses having fled from his bride-to-be, only to learn of the marriage of Mayre. Now nothing must part them!

A WOMAN'S LIFE

Mrs. Warren J. Saunders Drama File No. 12135

THE muffled drums of martial music meant nothing to small Eunice. Only the tears of her mother aroused her to childish wonder. Later she learned that the Civil War had robbed her of her father. Came the day when her mother brought a stranger to their home and told Eunice he was her new father. Alone, Eunice grieved for her mother's husband frightened her. Her play days ended shortly when her stepfather forced her to work on the field. Later babies came and but a child herself, she was forced to tend them. With weary eyes and fatigued body, she'd rock the wailing infant to sleep. The cries of the young ones terrified her, because invariably the stepfather blamed her and and meted out curses and blows. From afar during the years of adolescence, Eunice watched other people's children blithely going off to school. Particularly did she notice the little girls in their gay dresses, and her hand would fumble over her contrasting cotton dress, one of the two which the years brought. In her was a dull hunger for life and pretty things —all that life denied her. The twenties found her still in the monotonous, hard rut of childhood. Slowly rebellion formed and when, dissatisfied with her progress on the field, the stepfather threatened to beat her—she finally left. A newspaper advertisement helped her to find her first place with Tom Reed whose wife was ill. Though work was hard, here at least she felt free from threatening blows. And then she met Will, his son; the first young man who spoke kindly even admiringly to her.

With the passion of a starved heart she fell in love with him. Only as yet she did not know what had happened to her. His presence made her joyous. It was with amazement that she learned he was married to his cousin and like herself felt defrauded of happiness. Still looking upon him only as a friend, the shy girl who had never been warned of the danger of intimacy with one tied to another—willingly accepted the suggestion when Mrs. Reed was well to go to Will's home and help his wife, Nita, who was expecting a third child. Nita's nagging scenes distressed the girl who would have left. As if he realized this though saying nothing, Will's eyes pleaded with her speaking a message which neither dared to acknowledge in words. At last Eunice faced the fact that she was in love but her starved heart would not permit her to leave. Then came the weekend when Nita insisted on going to the neighboring town to visit relations. At dinner, both were extremely self-conscious and Eunice hastily jumped up to finished the dishes. When she came from the kitchen, Will was still sitting in a living room corner staring into space. But just as she tried to slip quietly up the stairs, Will strode toward her. Soon she was in his arms, the world and convention forgotten. Later for Will's sake, Eunice continued to stay but the day came when Nita learned her maid was to have a ehild and drove the girl from the house. Friends helped Eunice with work until the child was born. Will had not been near her for months and then she learned that he had given his property to his wife and left her, eager for a divorce. The vindictive wife arrested both on the false charge that they were continuing illicit relations. Only the knowledge of innocence and the fact that Will still cared sustained her until the day of the trial when charges were dismissed. Again she was alone with her little daughter a week later when a knock at the door announced Will, free to marry her and face the future which was to spread before them the rich years of happiness childhood had denied.

THE VAMPIRE

Fanie Van Wyk Melodrama File No. 11843

CLIMBING out of their battered roadster, Tom Howard, an elderly prospector and Diek Williams, his young friend, watch the sunset over beautiful Witpoorje Falls. As they drive homeward they pick up a stranger whose car has been injured in a wreck. He introduees himself as Mr. Arnold and asks the two if he may talk to them eonfidentially when they reach town. Readily assenting, Tom and Dick conduct him to their flat where he relates his story. Several years ago he had a friend who went with him to this rugged country in search of gold. When they did not find it, the friend became quite crazed, eventually disappearing altogether. He purchased a small cattle ranch, married and settled down, never hearing from his eccentric partner again. A few days ago while driving with his only child, Joan, a girl of nineteen, he found a wallet which contained a rough map of a mine in territory which he had elaimed years before. After studying the map Joan destroyed it and the two set forth to find the property. They were stopped by an inhuman figure, much like a gorilla in appearance, but bearing some resemblance to the long lost friend. This vampire jumped on the running board, warning him to stay away from the mine, then knocked him unconscious. When he came to himself, Joan was gone and a note, signed by the vampire, warned him to stay away from the mine at peril of his daughter's life. At the conclusion of this tale, Arnold screams: "The Vampire!" and points to the window.

Tom and Dick agree to help; the next morning they set forth toward the Sterkfontein caves. A beautiful girl rushes toward them, crying: "Save me!" and reassuringly, Dick, calling her Joan, promises to rescue her, as he places his arm about her. At that moment the Vampire appears, hideously masked, his hairy body partially covered by a thick cloak. At the point of a gun he forces them into his cave, then, elapping his hands three times, summons six men who bind the prisoners while he carries Joan, struggling, into the next room. Promising the one guard who is left to watch them a heavy reward, Dick succeeds in persuading him to unbind them, then rewards the man with a blow which renders him unconscious. One by one he summons each of the guards by elapping his hands. With Tom's help he binds and gags the men, using handkerchiefs, although the last guard does not appear. The Vampire, in the next room, tells Joan that if she does not reveal the secret of her father's mine he will kill Dick, giving her ten minutes to make her decision. At once she tells him and he carries her, calling for help, to his car, that she may aid in the search.

Hastily striking the fifth guard with a elub, Dick and Tom spring into their roadster in pursuit. The Vampire drives like the wind through Mayfair and Booysens while they follow, several yards behind. Meanwhile Arnold, at the insistence of his wife, calls the police and with them locates the Vampire's cave. As the guards are taken into custody, one of them reveals where his chief has taken Joan and they hasten after them. The Vampire and Joan board an airplane, followed in another machine by Dick and Tom. When they alight and drive away, Dick and Tom rent a motor bicycle from a boy and follow them to the water front, where they engage a boat as they see the two speeding over the water ahead of them.

Dick enters the cave where Joan and the Vampire have disappeared, revolver in hand, while Tom waits outside. His cloak discarded, the hairy vampire is tying Joan to the wall when Dick enters. The two struggle; Dick trips, his revolver slipping on the ground. The Vampire seizes it, but Dick stabs him with a dagger taken from one of the guards. As he is about to shoot Tom enters, hearing the monster's screams, and fires, killing him. The sixth guard appears and prepares to shoot Dick when Tom likewise kills him. Joan, released, collapses in Dick's arms. Her father soon follows with police who promise a reward for the death of the monster whom Arnold identifies as his friend. All remain in the vicinity as night has fallen, and while Dick and Joan sail together on the river, listening to a plaintive love song, they realize that they care deeply for one another. As old Tom remarks on this fact to Arnold he smiles in agreement, while the two celebrate with a pint of whiskey.

A BELL HOP'S NIGHT

Marshall Ed Gray Comedy Drama File No. 12248

RECENTLY opened, the Majestic Hotel is filled with guests who have motored in from miles around, attracted by its home like atmosphere. With a smile of satisfaction the assistant manager greets the constant stream of arrivals, instructing his servants to show them every possible courtesy. Among the arrivals are a young man and woman who register as Mr. and Mrs. Wilson. Experienced in such matters, the clerk raises his eyebrows a trifle, as he suspects they are not married. Archie Coats, a bell boy, is summoned to the front desk, and instructed to carry their bags. Smiling at him, the blonde and attractive Mrs. Wilson tips him liberally after he has raised the windows, brought ice water and performed similar duties. She expresses her approval of the charming Colonial room. In the kitchen, Archie displays his tip to Lorna, the telephone girl, whom he loves. She frowns, her jealousy slightly aroused, but he teases her and they kiss as they part. Myra Wilson telephones for the bell boy, asking the clerk to send the same one, and soon Archie is instructed to bring cracked ice and ginger ale. Afterwards, Myra asks him to mix three drinks, one for himself, and he proves to be an expert in this art.

Leonard James, in the next room, encounters Jim Wilson, his old college pal, in the corridor. When he is presented to Myra, he recognizes her as a chorus girl who ruthlessly extracted valuable gifts from him, while she was, secretly, having an affair with another man. Enthusiastically, Jim confides that he is going to marry this girl, and Leonard tries to think how he can prove that she is unworthy. As he is puzzling over this, Archie enters the room. Realizing that he is a bright boy, Leonard at last explains the situation. "I must keep him from making this mistake. If you can help me, I'll give you a hundred dollars." he promises the bell hop. Jim invites Leonard to a party and as the two talk over old days together and recall school boy pranks, Wilson asks his friend why he has not married, chiding him when he discovers that he is cynical about women. Quietly, Myra listens, danger in her eyes. The Trevors, a bride and groom, married two months, join the party, and there is much dancing and singing as the evening progresses. Several times, Archie is called upon to mix drinks. When another bellboy relieves him, Myra is annoyed, informing the group that Archie is the only intelligent member of his group she has ever known.

The next morning, Jim and Leonard go for a walk while Myra rests. She telephones for Archie, mixing him a drink and complaining because he disappeared the previous evening. Finally she confesses that she loves him, and places her arms around his neck; Jim enters at that moment, at last seeing Myra in her true colors. A short time later, Myra returns to the city, alone, and Archie displays his hundred dollars to Lorna, as they plan an early wedding. In Leonard's room, Jim expresses his gratitude for this awakening, as both agree that some bell boys surely know their business.

THE GREATER LOVE

J. T. Bradley Short Subject File No. 12310

THROUGH the night the special train which was carrying twenty college girls sped on. The girls were in high spirits returning from the dining car since they were nearing their destination, the home of Rose Shoshone, their sorority sister, whose father hired the train to bring them for the famous Flower Festival of Pasadena. On the rear platform sat Red Myers, the brakeman. He had just completed his rounds and the young chap decided to take time out for a smoke. The voices of the girls came to him and he smiled faintly watching the rails that ever-receded into the distance. Lost in dreams, he was startled when the door closed sharply behind him; he turned to see Joe Wilson, the conductor, the man who had adopted Red from an orphanage when he was six. He and his wife had given the boy the only home he knew. For a brief while they chatted; then Joe returned to his duties. Red fell into a brief doze after making his own rounds when suddenly the train jerked and a violent crash followed. Red was thrown clear from the platform and landed on his back in the dirt. His first thought was of Joe; he called him but there was no answer. Only the screams, moans and cries for help from the frightened girls many of whom were bady injured came to him. Oblivious of his own cuts, Red ran to the sleeper. Choas was everywhere. The diner and pullman were in a confused heap. Fire spouted from the engine. With his legs he crashed several windows and pulled through those girls who were able to crawl to him. The cry of one girl calling for her mother unnerved him and the less injured who had escaped helped take the others from him. From a nearby farm house the noise was heard and an alarm sent in. Soon there were doctors and nurses there and an emergency dressing station was organized. As willing hands took his last burden, he himself was dragged off for treatment. For a short while, Red lost consciousness and when he came to, Mrs. Charis, the chaperone was nearby to thank him. Several covered bodies caught his eye; at first he thought they were the girls but instead learned that it was part of the crew. Joe, however, was caught in a mass of wreckage which meant almost certain death to anyone who attempted rescue. Learning this, Red rushed to the wreck but the workers who were burning their way through the cars for the engineer, held him back. Foiled, he begged to see the superintendent. At first he too refused to grant permission until Red told him that his friend had been a father to him. Now there was a debt that must be repaid. No man could say no in the face of this. A rope was tied to Red to enable him to signal. Faintly Joe's voice could he heard. Just before Red started into that dangerous mass of steel, Mr. Shoshone who had flown by plane rushed to thank him. He was hurt at Red's curtness until he learned the task at stake. A cheer came when five minutes later the rope tugged; Red was coming up with Joe. Near the top Red stopped for his foot was caught and others crept to relieve the burden. To the superintendent, Red quietly confessed that the piece holding the wreckage from slipping was on his foot. He couldn't move and more lives would be lost if others attempted to aid. The wreckage was to collapse with Red its only victim. Brokenly the superintendent murmured as the sobbing crowd bowed their heads —"Greater love hath no man, than that he shall lay down his life for his friend."

FAREWELL TO WAR

Joseph M. Casper Drama File No. 12309

HARTON CAMP leaves the anti-war conference sponsored hy peace lovers in a very thoughtful mood out of which Jack his friend first seeks to tease him. Over the coffee, Harton whose mind is still with the meeting abruptly declares that the destruotion of human life in war is ghastly; and nodding, Jack points out that it will be even worse in the next war for the outcome will be settled in the air. There ought to be a way whereby planes can be disabled in mid air without kliling the pilot. From this chance remark, Harton gains the inspiration which is to keep him occupied for many nights—the invention of a magnetic light wave which bulletless can pierce through the sky and bring down any aircraft without a shot. In Lucy who insists on seeing Harton's laboratory, a sympathetic listener is found. When it is completed, Harton tries to offer it to his government which refuses to even test it, convinced that the idea is worthless. But Hugo, a war office man seems interested and asks him if he will have dinner with himself and Luis Riglot, an Italian naval officer who is visiting. Though Harton is willing to expound on the significance of his new machine, he is careful not to reveal any of the secret formula by which it operates. A few days later, Harton is pleasantly surprised to find two tickets to a current hit show in his mail. It seems to be addressed properly even if there is no clue to the sender. Although he has planned to work this evening he calls Lucy to accompany him to the theater instead. Halfway through the performance, the girl complains of a headache and reluctantly the two depart. Promising to call her in the morning, Harton starts homeward but the night is still early and decides to go to the laboratory instead. Harton is startled when he first enters the room to find it in a complete state of confusion. Sensing someone behind him he quickly turns but is knocked unconscious first. It is early dawn before Harton's senses return and he staggers to a telephone and notifies the police. Fortunately, his papers were so securely hidden that they were not found. The police decide that the tickets were a plot to get him out of the way and he returned before the search was complete. As a result, however, the government becomes interested and furthers the experiments. A few months later Lucy and her brother Jack drive out with Harton to a secluded remote spot where a test is made. To the observers it seem uncanny; while Harton focuses a machine which looks like a gun a plane circles overhead than slowly is forced to earth as the power of the rays increase. Within a few weeks, the entire large powers of Europe and America also are embroiled in war. Harton's guns are rushed to be used against enemy ships and are being set along the war front. Lucy, now Harton's bride, accompanies him. While walking through the fields, a report comes to Harton that his wife has gotten through a message that she has been kidnapped and is being taken away by plane. With the gun, Harton brings down the machine and discovers Riglot is responsible. A spy, he has used this means to force Harton to reveal the secret of his invention. Through the ray, war is to end quickly for the enemies are crippled. At another anti-war conference, Harton is to hear himself hailed as the man who has made the nations say farewell to war.

THE PENALTY

Marie T. Kleine Drama File No. 12203

THE postman had just left the house. Carefully Mrs. Teasby opened the letter, an apprehensive look upon her face. Yes, another note complaining that Henry had been absent from school three times that week without excuse. Her husband was waiting for the boy that night. While Ray, the younger brother, quietly slipped into his seat at the dinner table, Mr. Teasby angrily demanded an explanation from Henry. With a shrug, the boy replied that there was no need for study since he already knew his lessons well. In spite of herself, Mrs. Teasby could not surpress a smile. Yes, he was bright but only the worried teacher knew too well that whenever there was mischief, somewhere Henry was at the bottom of this only he was too clever to prove it. Nothing further was said; only after the meal, Mr. Teasby quietly suggested that Ray accompany him on a walk. None saw the sly way in which Henry put out his foot to cause Ray to trip; or watched the angry fist he shook at their retreating backs. "Goody, Goody." he muttered in disgust for the one person he most despised was his brother. Ray could never be taunted into retaliation in underhand tricks but on the rare occasions when it came to blows, he always managed to put up a good fight. A few days later, Mr. Teasby announced that they were opening a restaurant and the boys were of an age to help. While Ray consented to help in the kitchen, Henry strutted about in his uniform, waiting on table. For the pretty girls there was always a smile but for the men there was frequently surly treatment. The last time that the boys got into a fist fight and rolled out of the swinging doors into the dining room, customers protested. Finally, Mr. Teasby decided that something must be done; Henry would have to find another place. At eighteen Henry already dreamed of becoming a big business man and so persuaded his father to allow him to attend business school. For a few weeks things ran smoothly. Then under the steadily polite service of Ray, business improved and the parents decided that he was entitled to a share. Dissatisfied with his small pocket allowance, Henry chalked this as another score against Ray to be paid some day. Then Mary Lovelow entered his stenography class and shortly Henry began to press her for dates. At last she consented to attend the coming dance but Henry began to worry about his clothes. When he appeared with a new suit that night, he refused to reveal its source at first; later claiming that it had been too small for a fellow student who gave it to him therefore. Only Ray made evident his scepticism. Yet the suit served its purpose; that and additional funds which enabled him to invite a group to a night club as his guests. During the days that followed, the Teasbys could not understand why money was missing from the safe each day and began to suspeot Brown their helper. Meanwhile Mary had visited the shop and to Henry's fury she began giving all her attentions to Ray. Early one morning Ray called his parents and through a mirror they watched Henry open the safe and remove some bills. He was ordered from the house. Two weeks later, Henry drove Ray to a lonely road on the pretext that Mary had sent for him and there brutally killed him and mutilated the body. Henry might never have been identified had he not dropped a pawn ticket. The chair was escaped only by proving that Henry was insane. But to the grieved parents some ray of hope was to come when Mary called one morning and confessed that she had been secretly married to Ray. Soon there would be a grandchild to bring new courage and incentive for life.

LIVING YOUR LIFE

Rito Di George Drama File No. 12328

IN the act of giving out a ticket for speeding, Motorcycle Officer Mahoney sees a car whiz past at a speed which makes the others seem crawling. As Mahoney follows young Tex Lawson, research student in medicine, steps on the gas until he almost runs over Gloria Nelson who falls in a faint almost under the car wheels. She revives to find herself in the arms of Tex who after much persuasion wins permission to take her home. He leaves with her consent to call the following day. Home, he finds his chum, Peter, waiting. The two are working on an experiment which will prolong life by injecting the fluid of a healthy human being into an ill one. At present they are experimenting on cats and all thought of Gloria is forgotten as Peter and Tex devote themselves to a test of their latest theory. In their little laboratory they work patiently for several hours only to once more record failure. The effort has been too much for Peter who staggers, preparing for one of those strange attacks which are a result of an accident. Tex hastily administers the medicine which will revive him. Weeks later Gloria accompanies Tex on a picnic at his cabin where he teaches her to swim. When Tex pretends to drown, Gloria becomes so worried that in her relief she confesses her love which Tex reciprocates. It is then he reveals that he and Peter are to spend a year in England completing their studies. Until they return the engagement it to be kept a secret. On the boat, Peter confesses that before the death of his widowed mother her last words were a prayer for him to become a great man. That is his one driving ambition and the experiment means everything to him as a result. Warmly greeted at the home of Peter's grandfather, the two boys enjoy themselves hugely. To the secret delight of Tex who thinks it will benefit his friend, Peter becomes attracted to the girl next door, Joan Brooke. The day that the youths are fishing and Tex saves Peter from drowning while succumbing to an attack intensifies the latter's deep feeling of gratitude. Tex throws himself into work living for the time when with Gloria they can become a foursome. The day their formal classes end the young men drink a toast to each other; afterwards Peter confesses that he cannot marry Joan until he is sure that his work is a success. Tex thinks him crazy not knowing that the real reason is that Peter has secretly visited a specialist who declares that there is no cure for his attacks and the effect of the medicine will gradually wear off. Heartbroken, Joan parts from him and the two return to the United States. Once again they resume experiments until the night when one works. The two animals are alive when Tex is notified that his father is dangerously injured. Peter does not have time to tell him that shortly after the well rabbit died while the sick one lived. Tex resolves that his father's one chance is their experimental operation. And Peter arranges that Tex perform the operation with himself as a subject. The father lives but heartbroken Tex finds his chum is gone. To add to his sorrows during the meantime he has been unable to trace Gloria whose letters had not been forwarded when she moved. Furiously, he drives toward the cabin desirous only of solitude while once more Mahoney recognizing the car follows. But again Tex is to escape only to find Gloria returned to the scene of her former happiness. In her arms Tex is to feel reborn the happiness which left him with Peter's sacrifice.

QUEEN KERRY

Edna W. Nienkamp Drama File No. 12247

IN the office of friendly old Dr. Frederick who has known the girl since childhood, Kerry first hears the dreaded words she has been fearing for months. While Kerry coughs softly, the physician protests why she did not come to him earlier when the tired feeling first began. But he knows the reasons. A school teacher, beloved in the town, Kerry has always been too busy thinking of others before herself. Unless she leaves for the west immediately and gives up all thought of work for the next year, the doctor will not answer for the consequences. Fortunately Kerry remembers that her chum Jean Sandeau, married to a Wyoming ranch owner, has been begging her for months to visit them. The next western bound train carries Kerry there. To the cowboys Kerry rapidly becomes a favorite and one by one they fall in love with her, from the foreman to "little Bill," not yet in his twenties. Naturally human and feminine, Kerry cannot help but enjoy this popularity though she tries to divide favors equally. They take turns at teaching her to ride and in mock disapproval Jean protests that none of the men are fit for work any longer. At the end of three months a letter to Dr. Frederick reports that Kerry has had six proposals —all rejected—and is ten pounds heavier. Life begins to slow a bit at the ranch and with interest Kerry learns that a new hand is expected. The day when he is due finds no trace of him. While racing along the trail with Fanchon, the foreman, Kerry asks where Jack Chandow, the newcomer is hiding. From him, Kerry learns that Jack is a transient now, a wanderer since the death of his father, a wealthy man, and the baby sister whom he loved dearly. Since that time, Jack has denied all belief in God, declaiming against Him at public meetings when the mood seizes. To the religious girl, this news comes as a shock. She pities him and with womanly curiousity would like to see his face sometime. But all she ever encounters is his retreating back; he always seems to be going when she is coming. Yet Kerry is conscious that intent eyes are watching her. Once she turned suddenly but the lone horseman rode on. Still she saw him for a moment. There was something about him which was clear cut and appealing but his eyes wore a tortured restless look. The last warm days of summer were lingering and though the hour was growing late, Kerry drifts out to the porch to enjoy the quiet beauty of night. Suddenly a low teasing voice rises from the darkness, "Isn't it about my turn to ride with the queen this evening?" Scrambling to her feet, Kerry is reassured when the voice introduces its owner as Jack who has heard of her as Queen Kerry while he, Jack assures, is her humble slave. Laughing, Kerry held out her hand to him but instead he scoops her to his arms and kisses her hungrily. For a moment she relaxes in his arms, time, space and conventions forgotten before she abruptly pulls away. Apologizing, he explains that he has fallen in love with her smee the first day but Kerry tells him she can have nothing in common with a godless man. The pounding hoofs of his horse tell her that he is gone and too late Kerry realizes she is in love with him. No longer can Jerry bear to stay there. Home on her father's farm, during the days of her grief, Kerry writes a song which expresses this—Pal Of The West. Through an interested publisher the song is made a favorite by a noted orchestra and a motion picture scout obtains permission to build a picture around it. Kerry agrees if she may write it and in the forlorn hope that Jack will see it she weaves her message of belief and love. Jack does see it and returns to the ranch seeking her address unsuccessfully. But when a few days later Kerry returns on a visit she is to find Jack is her driver. And together the lovers are to find happiness and Kerry—God.

COURAGE OF WOMEN

B. M. Scurry Short Subject File No. 12307

TWILIGHT is fast fading. Throughout the little town the lights in the houses are beginning to flicker on. In the Bett's cottage Dan opens his newspaper. With shaking fingers he reads that David Horton, an acquaintance has committed suicide. Hearing his muttered exclamation his wife, Mary, hurries to his side. She cries too in horror with him while Dan explains that the Central Bank closed that afternoon with the last of David's savings. Aloud, Dan calls the rolls of their friends who have committed suicide through the adversities of the depression. With a shudder, Mary declares that it is unfair to the living when men take their lives in desperation. When Dan hints that he might be better off to do likewise, Mary shudders. She has always claimed that she wishes to go first since without him life would have no meaning. As they begin to reminisce over the past with its calamities which Mary assures him are not his fault, Dan sees the past unfold before him. Young Earl Kensington, an important and well established member of the community now, was once his rival for Mary's hand. There had been a few months of wedded bliss; his position was a good one which promised security and even a few luxuries in the future. Then came the war and Mary, like many another courageous wife, smiling sent her husband off to France. Demobilized, Dan had to start hunting for a position all over again, another had his old position. When the depression hit he was among the first to leave for though his record was high he had been there less time than the others. Now everything was gone, home, car and job—even this rented place would not be theirs long with a dispossess notice staring at them. A ring at the door startled him from his revelry. To his surprise, Kensington entered with the explanation that he had been in the neighborhood and decided to call. Looking at his evident prosperity, Dan feels a wild pang of jealousy. Though Mary has just denied it, he wonders if poverty has not weakened her love for Dan and would choose Kensington if she could. When Mary steps out of the room, Kensington hurriedly offers Dan a loan. For a moment tempted to take it, Dan refuses consumed with jealousy; sure that his old rival has an ulterior motive. The next morning he has a twinge of repentance when he fumbles in his pockets and pulls out a slight handful of change only. It is even necessary to borrow a dime from his wife to buy food for the evening meal. But Mary declaring that it may be woman's intuition only is confident that things will brighten. While searching for a handkerchief, Dan stumbles upon a small bottle marked poison. So that is what his wife secretly has in mind! Wincing, Dan slips it into his pocket and hurries off on fruitless rounds. As he nears the house in the afternoon he meets the mailman with a letter. There is a broad smile on his face when Dan reads it but after a moment's reflection he enters as if nothing has happened. Determined to test the truth of his wife's claims, Dan pulls out a bottle and suggests that they enter a suicide pact. Bravely she drinks with him and after a moment's silence, ashamed that he has ever doubted, Dan confesses a five hundred dollar check for a short story he has just sold. The phone rings announcing that Dan is wanted back for his old firm. While Mary hurries to look up the doctor's phone number thinking of Dan first, with his arms about her he reassures that it is only harmless cough medicine.

HILLTOP HEAVEN

Besse L. Braes Drama File No. 12263

LOOKING fearfully at the clock, Bette Lou bids the minister goodbye. Just then Mr. Thorpe arrives and brusquely demands what he wants for Bette Lou alone follows a religious faith. Learning that the preacher wishes Bette Lou to participate in a church play, Thorpe orders him away and forbids his daughter who has recently returned from a visit to relations to attend further services. So Bette Lou resumes the work of getting the household in order for her beautiful sister, Janis, whom Thorpe has spent his life savings on to send to college. She is expected back now for vacation and Thorpe boasts among his co-workers that Janis can now mingle in smart society and marry wealth. The meek Bette Lou he despises and she herself kneels down at her bedside the night before and prays that she will not disappoint her sister. But as soon as greetings are over, Janis finds fault with Bette Lou and orders her to keep out of sight when friends come. A round of parties is given throughout the town for Janis although none think of inviting the other girl. It is at one of these affairs that Janis first meets Jules Whetlo, Jr., partner in the firm which employs her father. She leaves him that evening with excited dreams of a brilliant future, confident that Jules is interested in her. A few days later while Bette Lou is on an errand for her father, Jules stops his car and offers to take her to her destination. Hesitant at first, the heat makes her weary; besides she has met him before so Bette Lou enters the machine. When she returns the auto is still waiting and Jules suggests a short drive. Thinking that it will please her father she accepts. Along Hilltop road Frank Dane is exercising his horse Hell King whom he plans to enter in the coming races. He hears the frightened cries of Bette Lou, resisting the improper advances of her escort. With one punch Frank bowles Jules over and after making her drink some tea at his house, Frank insists on escorting her home. Intent on revenge, Jules seeks out Janis and tells her that Bette Lou is keeping a tryst with an unknown man on the back road. Frank leaves her a few yards from the door and begs her to see him again. She enters the house to find that she has been judged and found guilty by Janis and her father so there is no opportunity to explain. Still several times she slips away to see Frank for love for him gradually grew in her heart but one day as she reaches the path she sees Jules and a carload of her sister's friends nearing. Fearing their tongues, she turns back. Home she found visitors with a young child whom they claim belongs to Janis who refuses to acknowledge him, having already deserted little Ted. Instantly as if recognizing a protector the child comes to Bette Lou who cannot bear to see the child go in a home. To save her sister, Bette Lou claims parentage and the irate father calls the Institution for Wayward Girls. But Bette Lou escapes with Ted through the storm and finds tender refuge in the house on the hill. To their shock, Thorpe comes with the minister and forces them to marry. Frank soothes the girl, saying he has always loved her. Meanwhile lightning fatally strikes Janis, who dies confessing the truth in a note. Thereupon Thorpe comes with authorities to remove the child who runs in front of the colt. Frightened the animal kicks out against Thorpe who regains consciousness only long enough to beg forgiveness. Hell King is to win the race and the two at Easter Sunday service give thanks for their Hilltop Heaven.

TRIPLE MARRIAGE

Lee Robertson Drama File No. 12119

ADORED by her older sister, Lois, Dot confides her youthful romances and escapades to this understanding friend rather than to her mother or sister Grace, who criticize the impulsive, adventurous girl. Always Lois counsels wisely and forgives indiscretions. Ambitious for the younger girl, the entire family saerifice in order that she may attend college, although Dot has little interest in studies. During summer vacation the family take a cottage at the beach. As she is swimming, Dot beeomes acquainted with Dean Small, a lawyer, much older than herself. As he is a frequent visitor at the eottage after that, the family believe Dot is becoming interested in him, but, convinced that she will finish college, do not discourage his attentions. Shortly before time to return to the university, Dot elopes with Dean, leaving a note for her mother, who condemns the girl bitterly when she reads it. It is Lois who persuades Graee and her mother to make the best of the situation. Due to her influence they welcome Dean, somewhat reluctantly, into the family. At first Dot is very happy but one night Lois finds her sobbing, and she confesses that her marriage has been a failure. A short time later, Dean enlists and leaves with his regiment for the battlefields. The neighbors do not know of Dot's marital unhappiness, as they attempt to cheer her when her husband is called to service. Lois and her husband Don, welcome Dot to their home, caring for her when her baby daughter, Helen is born. The childless couple soon come to love little Helen as their own, while Dot finds happiness in her baby which compensates for the grief she hides from the world.

Securing a position in a department store, Dot is able to purchase luxuries for Helen. No word comes from Dean during all this time. At last the war is over, but Dot makes no attempt to find Helen's father and his name is never mentioned in the household. She tells the ehild that her father was killed in the service of his country. Worshipped by the entire family, Helen grows up in an atmosphere of loving care. Lois and Don provide music lessons for the talented girl and assist her mother in sending her to boarding school when she grows older. All find happiness in caring for Helen, whose young friends bring cheer to the household. At last the day comes when she is ready to leave for college; Lois is as unhappy as Helen's mother as she bids the adored girl a tearful farewell when the train pulls out. That night, Dot, her eyes stained with tears, confesses to Lois that Dean Small has a wife and son with whom he is living in Paris. While working at a broker's office, Dot discovered these facts in a newspaper, later checking them officially. Dean's true name, she adds, is Smally; she met him first while attending college and their second encounter at the beach was prearranged. As always, Lois understands and forgives.

Some months later, Helen wires that she has eloped with Charles Smalley! With a cry of terror, Dot tells Lois that this must be Dean's son. It is Lois who welcomes the young couple and journeys with Dot to Dean's apartment in New York, flying there. As he holds Dot in his arms he tells her he would never have left had he known of Helen's birth. Charles is his wife's son by a former marriage; now he is divorcing his faithless wife. A radiant Dot returns with Dean to their children while Lois sees happiness at last for her little sister.

LOVE WINS

Clyde Alan Crichlow Drama File No. 12053

AS children, Carlos and Isabella plighted their troth, when they played together on their adjoining estates, while their parents expressed the hope that this would indeed be so, since it would mean the union of two aristocratic families. When the two climbed trees or dashed over the country side together, it seemed as if they were brother and sister rather than sweethearts. Eager to prove herself adept at sports, Isabella tried always to equal Carlos, practicing long hours so that her stroke in the water would be as perfect as his, her equestrian skill as great. Sometimes the two children quarreled, but always these misunderstandings were forgotten. On the day when Carlos was sent away to military academy, little Isabella could scarcely keep back the tears as she bid him farewell, kissing him tenderly. A short time later the young heiress was sent to an exclusive academy. Here her boyish enthusiam for sports was somewhat curbed as she was taught to play, sing, and embroider among other feminine arts. In the years that followed, Isabella grew into a lovely young woman, versed in all the arts of her sex, yet still possessing her old spirit of adventure and fair play. Many young men paid court to her, but she declined to accept any of them. Then Carlos returned from military academy, aware of his love for Isabella as he kissed her tenderly.

During a ball held in honor of Carlos' return, the young man urged Isabella to become his wife, as they were seated in the gardens. She replied that she must have time to think, although she still loved him. Don Pedro, wealthy land owner and poet, had recently come to pay her court. With flowery phrases, this man of the world protested that he would gladly die for her, so great was his love. Her head turned by these compliments, Isabella believed, naively, that he cared more for her than the straightforward Carlos, and that she, too, loved him the more. Her family urged her to marry Carlos, but many of her romantic school mates agreed that she would be a most fortunate lady if she were to wed Don Pedro. Angered and his pride wounded at her indecision, Carlos could say nothing. Not understanding his sullen pride, Isabella interpreted it to mean that he did not really care for her. At last she gave her consent to Don Pedro, while driving with him, and he took her in his arms. In her room, Isabella looked at photographs taken of herself and Carlos during their childish escapades. Remembering his tenderness towards her, the times when he had endangered himself to fight battles for her, doubt again filled her mind. At last she confided a daring plan to Rosa, her maid. When the yachting party her father was giving had taken them to the rapids, she would dive in the water, and pretend to be drowning; whoever saved her was her true love.

True to her promise, Isabella dived into the cool waters, calling for help. While Don Pedro fumbled with a life line, Carlos leapt after her, but the tide was treacherous, and both of them were nearly carried to their grave before Isabella's father and the captain reached them with a boat. The following month, Isabella became the bride of Carlos, whose love was stronger than words, at a beautiful ceremony at the family estate.

MILLY'S EASTER

Margaret C. True Short Subject File No. 12197

CRUELLY, the strap cut through the tender quivering flesh of nine year old Milly who bit her lips to keep back the cries. Exhausted with her own efforts, Mrs. Brown flung the child in a corner near her cot and went heavily down the stairs. Only when she was gone did Milly murmur aloud, calling softly to the mother who had died two years before. Mrs. Brown who supported her worthless husband by taking in boarders had decided to retain Milly; she was useful in running errands and doing the disagreeable tasks of the household. Often the work was too heavy for the small, frail body but her awkward stumbling would only infuriate Mrs. Brown. A few of the men felt sorry for the child and tonight one, Tim, had brought a chocolate Easter bunny. Afraid of what Mrs. Brown might say, Milly at first refused but persuaded, shielding the box from sight ran up to her room. But not quickly enough for Mrs. Brown followed and demanded to see what Milly was hiding. She flung the "rabbit" petulantly across the room and resentful of the child's involuntary scream of dismay swished at her with the ever present strap which needed little provocation to be called in use. While Milly stumbled to bed, in the parlor Mrs. Brown virtuously bemoaned her troubles with the ungrateful Millie, to her sympathetic friend. None knew if Millie had any relations, she said; except for "that drunken father of hers who left just before the mother died." Early the next morning, Milly awoke resolved to carry out the plan she had formed in the night. This house she would leave forever; though she did not know where she could turn, Milly instinctively felt that somewhere in the world was happiness. For hours she wandered through the streets, admiring the pretty costumes and dressed-up look on all she met. There was no one to tell her that it was Easter Sunday but noticing many children enter a church for afternoon service, Milly decided to follow. In the dim quiet of the church, Milly sat unnoticed in a seat near the last row apart from the others. Her eyes drank in the beauty of the flower adorned altar; then she settled to listen to the Easter carols and the genial remarks from the kindly pastor. While baskets of nosegays were distributed to the others, Milly looked on wistfully. "It must be beautiful like this in heaven," she murmured. Sleep overcame her and she was unaware when the children left. In dreams Milly saw her mother again, coming toward her with outstretched hands filled with lilies and violets. Milly sprang to greet her; the vision vanished; and sleep had fled. Darkness was about and yet the sweet, tremulous tones from the unseen organ filled the church. As the strains rose to a call for triumphant courage, Milly dared to approach the unseen organist. Gazing at her in wonder, the organist was visibly startled when the child gave her name—Camille Holland. Soon the child was to learn that the organist was her father who through the church had found redemption and for weary months sought his deserted child. Out of the darkness they went, rich with the miracle of that Easter Day.

SUCH IS LIFE

Joseph Jellinek Comedy File No. 12260

WHEN at the breakfast table Mr. Blum opens his third bill for the payment of the leaking roof which refuses to stay mended, his fist bangs on the table. That settles matters, he tells his wife; he is tired of being a landlord. Against the protests of Mrs. Blum Jake orders a sign placed on the lawn, House for Sale. Meanwhile Tom Sutton dashes madly from the house with his breakfast half finished chewing hard on a piece of toast and dashes down to the station just as the train pulls out. When his employer warns him an hour later that if he fails to report on time another day he will be fired, Tom makes up his mind to buy a house which will be near his place of employment. Alice, his wife, meets him after work and together they go hunting. There is a house shortage and they walk many weary blocks before they arrive at the Blum home. Alice does not like to live on the ground floor so she insists upon looking over the rooms of the Blums. In a corner of the old fashioned kitchen are huge tubs which Mrs. Blum proudly calls "Space-saver." To justify the title she pulls out the partition between and shows how they can be turned into a bathtub. In fact two can bathe at the same time and save water, stutters Mr. Blum while the faces of the Sutters express shocked bewilderment. However, the location is excellent and the bargain is made on the condition that the Blums move downstairs. The first of the month the Sutters move in. As Alice straightens out she decides that the roll of toilet paper should be put in place. To her surprise no toilet can be found and from Mrs. Blum Alice learns that it is placed outside. Fuming, Alice descends there but she does not notice the hooks on the two doors, one of which leads outside and the other from the first floor. Unsuspecting, little Jack Blum coming home from school runs directly there and is met by shrieks when he starts to open the door. A few minutes later, Mr. Blum repeats the same mistake and Alice, fuming, goes upstairs to await her husband. Just as disgruntled as she, Tom later goes down there only to be embarrassed by Mrs. Blum who nearly faints in her husband's arms. Both families are continually uncomfortable the next days for the Suttons either forget to use the hooks or if they do forget to unlatch the one leading to the Blum apartment. Sutton, fuming, decides to have a "talk" with Blum whom he thinks deliberately deceived them but when he goes to the cellar where Blum is sawing wood, Blum hastily rushes up the stairs claiming that he is in a hurry. One afternoon at Mrs. Blum's instigation, Jake goes upstairs to clear out old clothes. Annoyed, Alice lets him through her doorway; then a few minutes later Jake makes another trip. This time all the clothes and some old shoe polish tumble out all over her neat living room and ruining the floor with the fluid. That night Tom indignantly gives them notice and Jake holds his head at his wife's words of blame. All her married life she has lived there and now must move; just because Jake is too lazy to care for a house. Since there is no other place available, the Blums rent a rooming house and between answering all the manifold demands of lodgers and his wife's complaints, Jake is very unhappy. Only Marie who is behind her rent is nice to him. One evening she asks him to stop in her room later and adjust the mattress springs. Nothing loathe, Jake enters but feels bashful when he sees her already in bed. Marie pats a pillow invitingly and begs him to sit besides her a few minutes. But Mrs. Blum, suspecting something, has followed and orders Marie from the house, going after Jake with a broom. In the midst of this confusion, the bell rings. A notice from the city that they must vacate the property which is to be torn down for a new building project. The next day Jake visits the Suttons and begs to buy back the house. When they refuse he promises to pay for a new bathroom complete from toilet to tub in each apartment if they'll accept the Blums as tenants once more. Then with the receipt for the rent, Jake makes his peace with his wife sighing, "Such is Life."

THE FORTUNES OF CAROL

Ella M. Lampe Drama File No. 12014

AS the Isle de France docks at New York Harbor, Mr. and Mrs. Helme eagerly greet Carol, their only child, returning from Europe where she has been cultivating her lovely voice. After a happy reunion, Carol sings "Love Finds a Way," demonstrating the progress she has made. A dinner dance is given in her honor; here Randolph Granby, fiance of Muriel Pamberton, Carol's friend, is so swept by the girl's loveliness that he asks her for the first dance and cannot take his eyes away from her. Before the evening is over, Carol and Ranny discover that they are deeply in love, as they embrace in the famous Helme rose bower. The next morning Ranny tells his father that he loves Carol and wishes to break his engagement to Muriel, arranged between the two families rather than the young people themselves. Angrily, Mr. Granby refuses, insisting that Ranny must marry Muriel at once, as they quarrel for the first time. Muriel sends a messenger with her engagement ring and leaves the city with her parents for parts unknown. The president of a trust company, Mr. Helme has gambled on races with money belonging to his clients; Granby is unable to help him out of his predicament before the board of trustees inspect the financial status of the company. Carol and Ranny have luncheon at a country inn, then join the girl's parents where they are entertained by dinner and a musical program consisting of a chorus in Dutch costume at the Cafe De Vere, while they celebrate their engagement.

Overcome with worry, Helme drinks heavily and is killed by a truck while in an intoxicated condition. The news of his embezzlement and death comes out in extras; Carol keeps this from her mother as long as possible. Left with little money, Carol sells her house, purchasing a cottage for her mother, and leaving her in the care of the devoted gardner and housekeeper, a couple who have served the family for years. Not wishing to burden Ranny, Carol does not reveal her hiding place, much as she needs him. She becomes a governess to Elizabeth and Gerald, children of Lady Geraldine and Sir Jasper Burne, soon winning their love, and accomplishing wonders with them. Warner Granby, who is Lady Geraldine's father, remarks that the new governess is a splendid instructor as well as a most attractive young woman, little realizing that she is the Carol whom his son loves, as they had never met previously, and the girl conceals her identity by assuming another name. One day Granby, who has become Carol's devoted friend, tells the girl of his son's love and disappearance following a quarrel, adding that he longs to have him return and realizes his mistake. For the first time, Carol realizes Granby's identity but remains silent. Little Gerald becomes dangerously ill and Carol, at his request, is in constant attendance. Reading that Muriel has married, Ranny returns to his home, hastening to the bedside of his little nephew where he encounters Carol! The little fellow recovers, and as the two lovers explain all to Mr. Granby, Sr. he joyfully welcomes Carol into the family. Ranny purchases the Helme estate where he brings his bride and her mother. As he takes over his father's duties, the elder Granby is a frequent visitor in the rose garden where he brings Gerald and Elizabeth. A few years later, Muriel visits with her husband and is presented to Marcus Warner and June Carol, as Ranny and Carol, their proud parents, share their happiness with her. As the happy group gathers around the piano, Carol sings "Love Finds a Way."

THE MISSING TROPHY

Noe Tousignant Drama File No. 12121

BOSWELL College called them the three musketeers. Jim, Bill and Herbert had been together since their freshman days. Tonight was one of the first evenings in which they could be found apart. Herbert, Jim's roommate had an examination to prepare for and reluctantly phoned Millicent that the evening date was off. Learning that her chum Ruth was going with Bill and that she had hoped to make the date a double one, Herbert persuaded Jim to go as his substitute. Jim was hesitant at first and Herbert, knowing that all three had always been willing to share dates in the past, couldn't understand. How could Jim tell him that the other girls never meant anything to him but that for a long time he had watched Millicent from a distance; never gaining sufficient courage to approach until Herbert had broken the ice and claimed her for himself. Now he felt that she was rightfully Herbert's girl and he could be to her only Herbert's roommate. The ticking of the clock reminded him that it was time to dress. Under the subdued lights of the noted collegiate road-house, Jim felt more at ease. Flushing from the intoxicating combination of music, liquor and a pretty girl, Jim was dimly aware that he had made himself the life of the party. Driving back to Boswell, Millicent snuggled up to Jim in front. Her lips come dangerously near his and for a moment Jim yielded. Millicent could not understand why he suddenly turned away gripping his hands tighter on the wheel. . .

During the tour of inspection through the trophy room to see that everything is in order for Alumni Day, Professor Aldrich and Dean Mallon discovered that the 1934 football championship trophy had been stolen or else removed for a prank. Calling together the student body, Dean Mellon announced the mysterious disappearance, declaring that none would be free from suspicion until the trophy was returned. Anyone possessing pertinent information was asked to visit the Dean's office. Several hours passed and nothing happened until Jim, with worried set face, strode from the dormitory, and entered Mellon's office. Jim explained that he believed he had unwittingly passed the thief, wearing a senior cap, that evening, stealing from the destination of the trophy room with a thickly wadded bundle. Although Jim was not sure of his ability to identify the perpetrator, Mellon called together the instructors and ordered them to have every student ready for a second meeting. While Jim stood on the platform, each student filed past but Jim was not willing to accuse any of them. Disappointed and worried at what the alumni will say, Dean Mellon returned to his office where he was met by Bill who convinced him that if he would grant a period of immunity, the thief would return the cup. Finally Mellon consented and the students were notified that the possesor of the trophy would not be expelled provided it was returned before ten that night. Soon after, Herbert entered with the missing trophy, but Jim was close on his heels, insisting on taking the blame. Then it was revealed by Bill that Herbert was a kleptomaniac, the attacks seizing him only when he was overtired. He had first suspected Herbert when Jim claimed to have seen the thief at an hour when they were dancing. The trio decide to celebrate when with elaborate casualness, Herbert suggests that Jim take Millicent while he goes with his newest flame. That night a toast is drunk to "loyalty, friendship and love."

THE MYSTERY OF CLEARWATER

Albert G. Lewis Melodrama File No. 12112

THE little town of Clearwater is experiencing a local crime wave and public indignation runs high when Dentler's general store is robbed of a large quantity of stock. The citizens view unfavorably the actions of Chief Brown whose ill success in capturing the criminals contrasts poorly with that of Hiram Perkins, his predecessor. Thoughts take a new turn, however, when Jack Cown, a ne'er-do-well, comes racing through the streets shouting for help, claiming that while he was cutting through the old cemetery grounds the Devil sprang from the ground and burned him when he sought to run. Doctor Smith's examination proves that he was burned but the citizens are sceptical about the presence of the evil one. Chief Brown organizes a hunt for the "apparation" but public sentiment decides that the stranger is beneficial; when they read in the Herald a letter placed conspicuously on the front page. It claims that Jack was attacked for attempting to molest an unnamed girl, and was signed Mephisto. Mephisto advices the police to stop looking for him and concentrate on the number of young men who are smoking the stolen cigars on the town streets. The next day the townspeople are aroused when Mephisto whom none can identify visits Casey's notorious pool-room hangout and beats two of the town's toughest residents, Red Mike and Billy Shea. A harmless stranger has entered and then suddenly seems to materialize horns and tower in strength. When the erowd came up, he has vanished. Meanwhile pretty Nellie O'Connor, the girl whom Mephisto rescued, is certain that he is very much flesh and blood and awaits the day when she can see him again. Clearwater is too small to hide unidentified strangers and the mystery brings many reporters from surrounding towns. Another notice appears from Mephisto to the effect that Dentler's stolen property can be found on a farm, listing also the names of the boys who had stolen it. When Chief Brown insists on ignoring the announcement, Dentler calls upon his friend Perkins. Meanwhile Mephisto who is really Fred Sawyer, law student and summer boarder, who has made a study of magic and detective work, holds off the thieves until the booty is safely removed. The truth of Mephisto's charges is borne out when in a neighboring county a large number of turkeys are stolen. Using a special wire apparatus which permits him to eavesdrop, Mephisto identifies the thieves and learns of their plans to return to the farm that night. Notifying the proper authorities, Mephisto assists in their capture and as a result Brown is forced out while Perkins is "drafted" to succeed him. Editor Clymer issues a public notice asking Mephisto to see him on important business. Disguised, Fred visits him and learns that a group of smugglers are making their headquarters near the town but no evidence can be found. Stopping long enough to send a code wire to his friend, Joe, a federal narcotic detective, Fred sets up a small dictaphone in an abandoned house. The next morning he meets Joe at the landing field and safe in his room where Joe came pretending to be a stranger in search of a boarding place, they listen in. On the basis of this evidence, Joe visits Chief Perkins. Ten picked men raid the house that night. Extras an hour later blaze the news that with them has been arrested Brown, their undercover man who has been seeking Mephisto, afraid that his own illegal actions would be revealed. To prove that Mephisto is still on the job, Joe notifies the public that Mephisto is responsible for his presence and success. That evening returning from work, Nellie is startled to find herself followed, only to be reassured when she sees the face of the man who had reseued her before. Assuring him that she is not afraid to dine with the devil, Nellie brings Mephisto home to dinner. Soon after, Fred's landlady is no longer amazed at the disappearance of the unseen Mephisto who was never to be heard at Clearwater again; she is too surprised at learning of Fred's engagement.

SECOND MARRIAGE

Grace Wiseman Drama File No. 12246

CRITICALLY, Shella Repert's mother watches her daughter as she skips toward home through the moonlit path, aware that the girl has just left Frank Harview, her impoverished sweetheart. "The neighbors are talking about you," Maggie Repert warns the girl, but Shella, eyes shining ecstactically, replies that Frank has asked her to become his wife and she has given her consent. Maggie informs the girl that she wishes her to marry Paul Brown, a wealthy business man, who has recently returned to the city, but Shella refuses, and Wesley, her father, takes the girl's part. Alone in her room, Shella throws herself upon the bed. weeping. The next morning she is forced to greet Paul in the library. In vain, Frank telephones; Maggie informs him that he must not call again. When he stops at the house to explain his purposes to Mr. Repert, Maggie answers the door and orders him away. All his letters to Shella are intercepted by the clever Maggie, who burns them in the furnace, while her daughter waits anxiously, fearing that the man she loves has forgotten her. At her mother's insistence, Shella drives through the country with Paul in his open car, admiring the consummate skill with which he handles the machine. Although the country, with its budding blossoms and little rabbits running about is delightful, Shella's heart is heavy. When Paul takes Shella in his arms, kissing her, she tells him of her love for Frank. Paul tells her that he can give her everything, advising her to forget Frank as they drive home. That night, Shella sees Frank outside her home, wistfully looking at her window, and she longs to be in his arms.

Several days later, Maggie hands Shella a letter signed with Frank's name, informing the girl that it was all a mistake. He is going away, as he does not wish to accept the responsibility of marriage and she must forget. Eager to save his beloved daughter from unhappiness, Wesley remarks that he means to investigate Paul's past life. In the next room, Paul overhears this remark. At last, Shella acquiesces to her mother's wish, promising to marry Paul. Entering her bedroom, Maggie expresses her happiness. The next day, with Paul, mother and daughter shop for an exquisite trousseau. In her room, that night, Shella prays that Frank will somehow return to her before it is too late. Preparations for an eventful wedding are made and invitations to a host of people sent out. Shortly before the day arrives, Wesley is kidnapped by two men in a car, who apply chloroform as they seize him. Maggie receives a telephone message, ostensibly from some one in her husband's office, notifying her that Wesley has been called away for a period of several weeks. Eager to see her daughter married to the wealthy Paul, Maggie resolves to hold the wedding without Wesley, instructing her brother to give the bride away. Frank resolves to ascertain whether or not his sweetheart's father has been kidnapped, hiring detectives to this end. Looking like a beautiful angel in her white bridal gown, Shella prepares for the wedding, her heart still yearning for Frank. As she kneels before the minister, Paul at her side, a car drives up with Wesley and Frank. Officers place Paul under arrest as Marion Awalda, his true wife, appears with her two children. Wesley explains that Frank, following a clue from his detectives, risked his life to rescue him from the hideout where Paul's men had taken him. Maggie faints, but when she recovers, Wesley, assuming authority, tells the guests that they shall still see his daughter married. Proudly he gives her away to Frank, after Maggie confesses that the letter to Shella was a forgery. Amid a shower of rice and best wishes from all, the happy couple drive away on their honeymoon.

PURE GOLD

Kathleen Mauverine Drama File No. 10378

KNEELING before a little altar in their cottage in the mountains, Peter and Joan, an elderly Scotch couple, ask God to help them with their problems and thank Him for the happincss that they have known, together. A terrific storm breaks in the mountains, and, as is their custom, they pray before the home altar, calm and unafraid because of their faith. A knock is heard at the door, and a young woman with a small, golden-haired child is admitted. She collapses, and as soon as the storm abates, Peter goes to the village returning with the doctor for her, but in spite of his efforts, the mother dies, begging Peter and Joan to care for her baby, which they promise to do, and clasping a locket around the child's neck. Knowing no other name for the child, the couple call her Golden Glo, because of her pile of sunny curls. As she grows older she learns to love the beautiful country where she lives, becoming familiar with the names of every flower and animal. Peter teaches her to imitate the songs of the birds, and Joan makes her a proficient housewife. Guided by the example of this pious couple, Golden Glo shares their faith and kneels before the home altar in thanksgiving. She becomes a beautiful young girl with a disposition as sunny as her golden hair. Wishing to help provide for her foster parents, Golden Glo secures their permission to seek employment in the city when she is eighteen.

Golden Glo obtains a position as a model in a fashionable shop, and, as "Number Seven" of the group, soon is the most in demand because of her beauty, but tries to remain in the baekground so that the other models will have equal chance of advancement. In her spare moments the girl studies designing. Rose, another model, finds a place for Golden Glo at her boarding house; as the girl is unpacking, a young man enters her room. When she asks him to leave he attempts to kiss her, hut she quickly repulses him. Turning searlet, he apologizes and leaves. The next morning she encounters him as she is leaving for work; again, he tells her how sorry he is for his mistake, and, introducing himself as Jack Carter, asks if she will be his friend, to which she agrees. Jack tells the girl that her present residence is not the best place for her, and helps her select a more suitable room in a club for working girls, where he frequently calls to see her. He tells Golden Glo that he has wasted his opportunities in gambling and drinking, but now that he has met her, his life will he different. Securing a position in a bank, the young man works diligently, and Golden Glo promises to become his wife. Many wealthy buyers are attracted to the beautiful model, and offer her valuable gifts, but she firmly refuses them all.

Successful in her studies in designing, Golden Glo enters a competition for evening gowns fashioned by American women. Combining many of the heautiful shades that she remembers from the work of nature in her hillside home, the girl is awarded the first prize of $100 in gold for her striking entry, but that night a thief breaks into her room and attempts to take the money. Awakening, the girl pleads with him to restore it. He notices a locket on her dresser, and opening it, exclaims in amazement, and tells her that the picture inside is that of his wife. Establishing the fact that he is her father by showing her a similar picture in his pocket, he receives her pardon, and Golden Glo helps him to find work, which he so desperately needs, on a farm near her old home. He tells her that he has been in prison for many years, hut is now redeemed through the pure gold of her heart. In the spring, Golden Glo and Jack are married at Peter's cottage, amid a happy celebration of the mountain people.

CROSS ROADS

Lois Stewart Drama File No. 12249

STANDING in the library confronting his father, Arthur Denis defies the decree whieh commands him to marry Marguerite, daughter of the Duchess of Alden. By the terms of the will left by his mother whom Denis adores in memory he must marry before his twenty-fifth hirthday a girl of aristocratic birth. The time is nearing and when Arthur rebels at marrying without love, his father reminds him that his several million dollars inheritance depends upon this. Besides although the mother did not name anyone it was her dearest wish that Marguerite be her son's bride. At the mention of her name, Arthur softens glancing up at the oil portrait of her that occupies the center wall. Although his son does not yield, Mr. Denis realizes that while money may not move the young heir the thought of his mother may. Still in a turmoil emotionally Arthur leaves on a hunting trip with Dick, his closest friend. While traveling through the Adirondacks, the car injures a shepard dog. Both boys go to the aid of the suffering animal whose yelps of pain bring his master, Andrew Gates, a farmer. Together they hring him to the house where the daughter Ruby rushes for bandages and warm water. As they had first neared the house, Arthur had heard a lovely voice lifted in song and he instantly identified the girl with it even before she spoke. Long after the dog was cared for Arthur insisted on remaining to talk with her. When he reluctantly departs it is with Ruby's permission to call again. Arthur ealls not once hut several times until the day when he finally confesses that he is being urged to marry a girl whom he does not love. The unsophisticated girl's lips tremble. She would have run away had not Arthur suddenly brought her close to his heart and confessed his love. That night he drove home, uncertain as to what course to take and yet convinced that he loved Ruby. Mr. Denis hroke rudely into his dreams with the announcement that the Duchess felt the engagement should he made known shortly. With this in mind, he plans a dinner at the house in a week and advises his son to take a rest meanwhile at the Blue Inn. After a wretehed sleepless night, Arthur starts off but halfway on the journey turns back to Ruby's home. Learning that Ruby is expected to visit her cousins for a few days, Arthur persuades the girl to marry him immediately in secret, bribing the marriage bureau clerk to withhold their names. Not until the evening of the dinner does Arthur return. Although he insists upon seeing his father, the latter forcseeing a scene claims that he is too busy. In despair Arthur drinks himself into a stupor and the impending union between himself and Marguerite is announced. Ruby seeing the notice in the paper is heart-broken and mystified. Although Arthur soon returns and seeks to explain, she tells him that he can leave. A few moments later she is penitent but he has gone beyond recall and she cannot reveal her secret. The unhappy youth sails weeks later to England. Marguerite is very much in love with him but her beauty leaves him cold; he can see only Ruby. Determined to make her happy, however, Arthur takes the marriage vows with Marguerite, already delayed when he sustains severe injuries in a motor accident while driving to see Ruby. It is his last attempt before sailing. After a honeymoon in Europe, the newly weds take a ship to America. On the voyage an iceberg is struck. In the last life boat is Dick, Arthur and Marguerite. The waves capsize this and though the men are saved, Marguerite succumbs to the sea. For weeks Arthur is confined to his room at home suffering from shock while doctors fear for his sanity. All that he can think of is Ruby. Then comes the day wheu his father silently presses a letter upon him which for months he withheld. Expecting death, Ruby begs him to take their child. Immediate investigation shows that Ruby has survived and this time with Mr. Denis' blessing and regret for the sorrow his interference caused—the lovers are at last forever united.

SONS OF THE RITZ

Henry Rietschel Drama File No. 10869

IN the McNulty home the maid, May, serves breakfast successively to the wealthy contractor, John; his flighty wife, Edith; and their only son, Junior, May informs Junior that his father left word that he is to report for work to-day without fail, but Mrs. McNulty interferes and insists that Junior take Irene Foster, an attractive debutante, to a matinee instead. The moment Mrs. McNulty sweeps out of the room, Junior takes May into his arms and kisses away her objections. That night there is a party at the McNulty home and after the guests have left and May is washing dishes, Junior comes to her in the kitchen and holding her tightly to him makes her repeat for the thousandth time that she loves him. The following day May is off and John meets her in the city and together they drive to the "Eden," a roadhouse.

At breakfast one morning, Mr. McNulty remarks that he wishes Junior would take as keen an interest in aviation as the chauffeur Henry. Mrs. McNulty asserts her son doesn't have to, but when her husband gives Junior Henry's book, Junior notices there is a picture of May in it. Henry becomes embarrassed when Junior comments upon it. Meanwhile Junior has been seeing much of Irene, his mother's choice for him, and he even takes her to the "Eden" and compares her sleek sophistication to May's sweetness. A month later, May is waiting for John on her day off. He sits silently at the wheel letting her get in without help. As they drive off into the country, May sits very close to him and at last tells him they must elope soon. At the sudden hardness in his eyes, she draws back in pain but when he tells her that he might have known she would pull such a line, she tries to run out of the car. He drives her back without speaking and in the city allows her to get out. Slowly she walks away and disappears in the crowd. The McNulties are unable to account for her disappearance but when some time later Junior sails for Europe with his bride, Irene, a still little figure watches them from the pier. As the boat pulls out, she faints and falls into the water. Instantly several men dive in after her, but it is Henry, the chauffeur, who brings her up. To Mr. McNulty Henry confides that he thinks the girl was May and the next day they go to the hospital and confirm their suspicions. Mr. McNulty learns about May's condition and at length elicits from her the admission that Junior is her betrayer.

Meanwhile, business is bad, and Mr. McNulty is forced to refuse Junior's cabled demands for money. At the realization that her husband has reached a financial crisis, Edith leaves McNulty, who thus sees her for what she is, before his Engineers call up to tell him his investment is a success. McNulty goes to see May frequently and encourages Henry's flying lessons. However, the first time Henry takes McNulty up, he goes into a nose dive and only McNulty's pulling on the stick saves Henry from killing his employer whom he assumed to be the father of May's recently born child. With explanations made, Henry marries May, and Junior, deserted by Irene, returns as a spectator, shabby and unshaven, at their wedding. Years later, Marguerite, only daughter of Henry and May, is to be rescued from a too ardent admirer, by a hobo, who, learning who she is, is to refuse to come into the house with her, but is to ask her to tell her parents that J-Junior brought her home, and to slowly disappear down the road.

MARRIAGE—DEFERRED

Louis Matscher Drama File No. 11620

WHILE the snow fell softly outside, Tom Kearn placed the finishing touches on his Christmas tree. Then, filling his pipe, he sat before the fire of his lonely bachelor apartment. His eyes wandered to his old army rifle, and sighing deeply, his mind revertcd to the past.

1914! Wringing the hand of his inscparable companion, Joe Hansbury, young Tom explains that he was leaving to join his father fighting for Germany. Before Tom left he was, for the first time, to reveal his love for Joe's sister Ann, and with her promise to wait for him no matter what happened, Tom left for the distant front. Three and a half years of fighting. The United States had entered the battle. In a lonely dugout Tom waited with his grumbling buddies. Suddenly a call for Tom to headquarters came. The commanding officer explained that Tom was reputed to be the best marksman in the ranks. A risky job was waiting. A man was needed to go in advance of the army and report the approach of the Americans. At first sight Tom was to fire three shots as a signal. It was a mission that meant probable death, but unless it was undertaken it meant defeat. Tom's only salvation lay in picking off the advance scouts before his own position was discovercd. For two days, with snow blinding his eyes, Tom waited crouched in the branches of a tree. That the Americans were near he had no doubt. Suddenly, galvanized into action he raised his gun at the approaching figure and shot. He heard a scream that froze his blood. Through a red haze he realized that he had shot Joe Hansbury, his best friend.

New York, bright lights. If he could only forget! At last he returned to the home of Joe Hansbury. Joe's mother greeted him fondly, explaining how her son had been shot by a German sharpshooter. The color drained from Tom's face. Suddenly Ann came in, dropping her bundles at sight of him. But as she came to him, he held her at arms length, whispered hoarsely that he was the one who had shot her brother, then fled into the night.

Back in his room, Tom was aroused from his memories by the insistent pealing of the bell. At the door was a little fellow who reported that his brother, Billie, had been kidnapped. Having long agitated against the wholesale kidnappings in the country, Tom arose now and swiftly donning his coat and buckling his gun belt, Tom set out for the hangout of the most daring bandits in the vicinity. There, single-handed, Tom was to disarm the desperadoes, rescue little Billie, one of his numerous young friends for whom there was always candy at his apartment, and returning the child to his anxious parents, was to face a barrage of newspapermen. It was this publicity which brought him a strange visitor. "Joe!" he was to cry at sight of the tall officer in the gray state uniform. And he was to learn that Joe had recovered from his wounds. Ann had been crying her eyes out ever since Tom left. "Then she still loves me," Tom cried incredulously. "Loves you," the answer came, "Why, I've had to search almost every state in the union for you."

Again it was Christmas eve. Tom drew a chair up to the fireside. It wasn't his rocker though, because that was taken by the future Mrs. Tom Kearn.

IGNITION

Joseph Cama Drama File No. 11140

IN the stifling hot garage, Tommy, Jim and Spike were at work greasing cars while beads of perspiration formed on their brows. Dirty overalls, grease spattered faces, and back breaking work under the cars were the lot of the three mechanics, and worst of all the sharp voice of Jack Malone, the garage owner, spurring them to work harder and faster. Then came an emergency call for a smashed car on the road. Giving the boys no time to rest, Malone snapped out orders to pick up the wrecked car. On their way back, the boys noticed a girl tinkering under the hood of a roadster. Tommy urged that they return immediately to the garage but as he too saw the lovely auburn curls of the girl he agreed they couldn't just drive off and leave her on the lonely road. Accordingly in a few moments they had fixed the defect in her engine and turning to thank them she told them her name was Sally Malone. All the way back, while Jim dazedly thought of Sally as the one girl he wanted as his wife, Tommy raved, saying she had "real class." The boss was beside himself with fury when he learned his men had dared to stop on the road, but the trio took their scoldings philosophically and continued with their grimy work of rehabilitating the smashed car. To Jim who had fallen deeply in love with Sally, the ravings of Tommy were disturbing. Then when Sally drove her roadster into their garage they learned she was Jack Malone's ward. Sally, seeing Jim smiled brightly and came over to thank him, but Tommy, entering the room dashed up to her and before the frowning gaze of Jack Malone, Tommy told her how glad he was to see her again, and how he had worried that he'd never be able to find out who she was and where she lived. Gruffly Malone called Sally, who with a nod to Jim and Tommy drove away. Thereafter Malone seemed to go out of his way to be nasty to Tommy and one day while Tommy was guiding Malone who was driving his car on the brake tester, Malone stepped on the gas. The car shot forward, ramming poor Tommy against the wall. Instantly Jim and Spike rushed to their stricken friend, hustled his limp body into a car, and drove toward the nearest hospital. Enroute Tommy died.

An ugly trial followed, in which Malone agreed to pay a large sum of money to Tommy's widowed mother, and was finally freed. Forced to sell his garage to cover expenses, Malone decided to travel abroad for a while to forget. Jim and Spike opened a garage of their own, and in the interim, Jim and Sally saw more than a little of each other. One fine Spring day, Jim, walking through the park with Sally, stopped to look deeply into her eyes. On the distant greens children were playing, but Jim was oblivious of them for he was asking Sally a question that was to change both their futures.

THE MEANEST MAN

Mrs. Mate Holcomb Drama File No. 12325

STILL young and attractive though she is a widow with a small son, Mary Holland succumbs to the pleas of Roy Watson, a boarder in her mother's home and marries him. Disillusionment comes for her when Roy learns that the income he planned to receive from her first husband's estate does not exist. In his resentment that night he strikes her child Bob. From excitement she faints and Roy temporarily frightened sends for the doctor. Mary is revived to learn that she is to become a mother; baby Sue and Bob are to be her sole comfort in the years to come. Roy quarrels with her mother who is shocked while visiting them to find the evil conditions in which they live. She begs Mary to leave but the young woman believes firmly that for the children's sake the home should be kept together. For their sake she is willing to sacrifice everything and when Roy demands a divorce she refuses. He is embarked upon the many heart affair which are to take him away from his home. At present it is Elsa, a night club girl, upon whom all his funds are spent; and he abuses Mary roundly for staying in the path of his freedom. He is brought home ill with typhoid and during the days of unselfish nursing from Mary, Roy promises to turn over a new leaf. Ronald, her husband's partner, comes to the house to consult him and Mary and the children look upon him as their dearest and only friend. No sooner is Roy up and about when he resumes his old habits. In the early morning hours, Mary wakes to find the house in flames. After removing the children to safety she remembers that her husband may be sleeping in the little back room he used for sleeping quarters when he returned the worse for liquor. Despite the restraining hands about her, Mary dashed through the fire and rescued him. When he recuperates, Ronald scolds him roundly for ignoring his family but Roy is not concerned. Lucy Watson, a hostess, has now attracted him. In her ears he spins the tale of every married man who wishes to justify his philandering—the old story of a misunderstood husband. Willingly, she gives him sympathy until Roy is at last convinced that he has found his soul-mate. That night he again requests for a divorce sneeringly reminding her that she would have been wiser if she let him die in the fire. Yet still Mary clings to the old fashioned conviction that children have a right to a father. Ronald, too pleads but in half-hearted fashion, knowing that he has an ulterior interest in the matter for though he respects Mary too much to speak he cares deeply. It is Lucy who first suggests that they defy convention and live together, certain Mary will then be forced to give the divorce. Soon after, Mary overhears her children speaking of their father and learns that they are not "blind" despite her efforts to protect them from knowing of his affairs. Precocious Sue hotly declares that she would be far happier if Mother divorced him instead of waiting for his return. That night Mary carefully considers the fact that a broken home may be better than this. Later Roy is to beg for a reconciliation but Mary continues divorce proceedings. Elsa is to force him to marry her and the time comes when Ronald successfully presses his suit. With him Mary is to renew her faith in men and wedlock.

LOVE MURDER

Minnie Dawson Melodrama File No. 12306

ALTHOUGH Dave Weston has no intention to deprive himself of the company of other girls he objects violently whenever he sees Ann Martin talking to another man. As his custom was he strode over to Jack Elson whom he has never before seen. Ann who usually silenced when she saw Dave approaching was laughing merrily with her companions and it was several moments before she saw him. Hurriedly, she introduced him to her companion but Dave ignored this. "I want to see you," he said curtly. Out in the garden, Ann told him that she could no longer stand his treatment. Though for years she has known him it is not until recently that she realized what a violent jealous disposition he has. Besides if he will drag her to parties that she is not interested in and then give most of his attention to someone like Laura Hunt, what does Dave expect Ann to do? Dave was silent for there was truth in the fact that the only time he seemed to really remember Ann was when he saw some other man with her. Yet he is sure that he is in love with Ann; he can imagine marrying no other girl. With an impulsive gesture he brought her hand to his lips and swiftly apologized for his ill temper. However, when they return to the party, Dave soon forgets his excellent resolutions of before and responds at once to Laura's invitation to join her on the inviting sofa. With tears in her eyes, Ann rushes out followed by Jack who insists on driving her home. She yields to his pleas to see her again. Several weeks pass and Ann rarely sees Dave deeply engrossed in an affair with Laura; until one evening a fricnd mentions that there are rumours of an engagement between Jack and Ann. Thereupon, Dave drinks himself into an ugly mood and calls at the house only to learn that Ann and Jack have just gone out. He makes the haunts of the night clubs until he finds the couple. Regardless of the crowd which throngs the dance floor, Dave pushes his way through to them. What right has Jack to take his girl? In the resultant quarrel while Ann futilely protests Dave is evicted. The scene has tired and upset Ann who while fond of Jack still cares for Dave. Considerately, Jack brings her home at an early hour. The telephone rings madly. It is Dave on the wire insisting that he must see her. Ann suggests that they wait until the next day but Dave declares that he is going away the next morning and cannot leave the house since he is packing. Not until the door closes on her does Ann realize that this is a ruse on Dave's part. When he insists that she stay the night, the girl struggles with him. Scarcely conscious of her actions she picks up a small revolver lying on the dresser and shoots. Death is instantaneous. Slipping out the back way, Ann wakes Jack from a sound sleep and begs him to come. When she tells what has happened, Jack refuses to allow her to confess and takes the blame. The body is found by Dave's friend, Joe, who saw the scene the previous evening. Called to the stand as a witness at Jack's trial, Ann realizes that she loves Jack and cannot allow him to go on with the sacrifice and confesses. Acquitted on the plea of self-defense, Ann is to find happiness in the arms of her true lover.

GIRL IN RED

Imogene Still Carter Drama File No. 12195

SLEEPILY, Joe sat up in bed and listened to his chum Bill rave about his latest flame, Betty. So often had he heard similar compliments on other girls that Joe refused to take him seriously now. Besides as Joe frankly confessed, he didn't care much for girls right now. He had dragged Bill with him to the family cottage in the small North Carolina mountain town to enjoy a summer of sport. Now, however, he pricked up his ears when Bill confessed that he had asked Betty to a picnic with them the next day. "Nothing doing," he said defiantly. "Go yourself." Despite Bill's pleas, he wandered off alone the next morning. For miles he tramped until all houses were left behind. Thirsty, Joe made for a stream where he was startled to see a pretty girl in red busily working on canvas. Stealing close to her, Joe murmured critically that it didn't seem much of anything to him. Aroused at the comment of the stranger, the girl answered, "I don't suppose they teach you anything about art in Yale do they, Mr. Joe Waites?" Now it was his turn to be startled. How did she know his name; Joe was certain that he had never before seen the girl and staring at her confessed his wonder. The girl flushed; abruptly picked up her things; waved away his offered assistance and began to make a dignified retreat. A moment later, Joe could have kicked himself for he wanted very much to see her again. Now he didn't even know her name. A week later, Joe was still searching ashamed to question anyone. Though Bill was wildly happy with Betty, this bored attitude on Joe's part —his refusal to go anywhere—disturbed him. Betty suggested that he might be in love but Bill laughed off the thought. Acting on a hunch one morning, Joe packed a double lunch and wandered off to the stream where he had first met the girl in red. Sure enough she was there. Though she saw him, she continued painting; Joe propped himself against a tree and watched in silence. The sun was high when she went for the lunch basket only to find Joe solemnly reaching for his. Their simultaneous laughter broke the ice and soon they were chatting like old friends. Yet while he persisted the girl in red insisted on keeping her identity a secret. Reluctantly, Joe faced the moment when they were to part and asked when they should see each other again. "Tomorrow at the tennis matches," she promised. Impatiently, Joe waited through the preliminary sets, scanning the crowd. At last THE GIRL appear on the tennis courts. Her game was beautiful, winning her the championship of the season. So Becky Ravenelle, was her name said Joe aloud; turning to Betty he asked where she had been hiding all those years for his family and Becky's were good friends. Joe was to learn that she had been studying in Paris. Rumor had her engaged to a foreign count. His heart sank until Betty added that Becky had always sworn to marry one of her own countrymen. Though he watched for her at the dance that night, Joe did not find Becky. He had no way of knowing that she had slipped over late and seen him in the garden kissing Betty. Only later did she learn that Joe had been congratulating Betty on her engagement to Bill; and that Joe was planning to leave town after the hike to the haunted house. Early, Becky started after them when near their destination she slipped and sprained her ankle. In the spooky house the boys heard cries but ignored them. A little further down the mountain they stopped to make lunch. While Bill went to fetch wood for a fire, Joe suddenly felt the tug of a large dog. Following him he was amazed to see his girl in red unconscious. He held her in his arms whispering endearments until she opened her eyes, smiling. "Go on, I like it," she said. And so a double wedding was foreshadowed.

UNDERTOW

Mrs. Rance Halladay Drama File No. 12206

AS Darrel climbed out of the car, his eyes met that of an old friend, Pat Wilder, and with relief decided that perhaps Pat could aid him. In a few moments, he had shown Pat a photograph to identify. Pat's face whitened with obvious recognition but he refused to speak until he knew why Darrel wanted the information. Finally he confessed that she lived near there with her husband Bob Henderson. Furthermore, he had been in love with Coral before her sudden marriage; when she refused him he had married Dora Cross, a new comer. Then Coral had returned and Pat soon found that love burned even more strongly while Coral at last confessed that she too cared. When Darrel insisted upon seeing Coral, Pat begging him not to misjudge Coral who remained faithful to Bob, explained that she would be present at a reunion dance that evening. Upon meeting the hardened Dora who proved to nag her husband for his failure to find work, Darrel found it less easy to blame Pat for his illicit love For a little while at the dance, Darrel lost sight of his friend, himself surrounded by former acquaintances, to whom he briefly explained his presence as a short vacation. The room was close so Darrel stepped outside for a breath of fresh air. Wandering down the path, he stopped short. The japanese lantern light reflected on the face of Coral; he was sure that the man with her was Pat. He heard the man's despairing cry that he could no longer bear it. Begging him to take a small gift, the girl threw her arms about him comfortingly. Suddenly her body sagged. Pat screamed aloud, "She's dead." However, Darrel who stepped quickly to the scene felt the faint pulse beat and sent Pat off for brandy. Coral returned to consciousness and Darrel confessed listening as Pat's best friend. Coral confesses that perhaps it is wrong to love him yet she is powerless to destroy that affection. "And your husband?" Wryly, she answered, "He understands." Aloud, Darrel decided that it can't be wrong to care as deeply as these two. When Pat returned, Coral insisted on dancing the next number with him. At Darrel's warning she replied, "I'd dance with him if I were dying." Darrel followed, with the dropped packet in his pocket. The next day he asked Mrs. Wilder, Pat's mother, whether Pat had any funds, but she retorted that he had to borrow just a few cents from her only the day before. With a worried expression, Darrel sought out Pat and accused him of having received the money from Coral. Truthfully, Pat declared that he hadn't seen what she had given in the darkness. Then Darrel explained that the bills were numbered and were ones which had been given to a woman to kill the notorious gangster, Rutkins. Hotly, Pat told him that if he was accusing Coral he was insane. Not waiting, Darrel jumped into the machine and drove to the Henderson home. There Bob instantly recognized him as a detective while Darrel seemed little surprised to recognized him as a former member of Rutkins gang. To save Coral, Bob confessed he was her brother who had killed Rutkins when he learned that he married his sister while tied to another woman. To save the reputation of Coral who was expecting a child he posed as her husband. The story was not over, however, for in Bob and Pat's presence a few moments later, Dora was identified as the gangster's wife who had really killed him and pretended to Bob that he was responsible. 'You're both free," said Darrel to Pat meaningly. Later Darrel found the lovers, in happy embrace dazed by the fulfillment which was theirs at last.

THE LOVE TRAP

R. J. Mooney Drama File No. 12348

SLOWLY the organ plays the wedding march. Looking at the pretty bridesmaid, Grace Inglestone, the best man standing besides her, James Castle, murmurs aloud the hope that someday the two of them will be answering "I do" to the solemn words of the minister reading the service. Shrugging her shoulders, Grace tells him to be silent. Just before they leave on the honeymoon as tradition calls for, the bride tosses her wedding bouquet to the eager throngs of girls. Laughing, Grace catches it as her friends cry that this means another wedding within the year. Alone with her, James declares that he looks forward to the prophecy coming true and is eager to be the groom. Although she will always look upon him as a friend, she can never think of him as a husband Grace explains. Eager to dance, Grace is resentful when James confesses with embarrassment that he meant to learn to dance before the wedding as he promised but as always he is too clumsy. Eager for a happy time, Grace turns from him with disgust. Her face is aglow a moment later; all thought of James is forgotten for she has just met Richard Lansing a newcomer to the little city. His sophisticated air appeals to her and at first amused by her eagerness, while they danced Richard becomes strongly attracted to her. When James comes over to say goodby, Richard with sudden darkened face wonders if this is a rival but quickly Grace assures him to the contrary. Thereafter Richard is a frequent visitor at her home. Grace is still aglow with the memory of the sweet kiss of goodnight he has given her after escorting her home from the regular Saturday night dance when her mother announces that James is calling. The girl is startled when she sees him; his face is distorted with resentment and jealousy. James begs her not to see Richard again but she tells him that he has no right to dictate. Threatening vengeance James abruptly runs from the room. Frightened at the thought that Richard may be in danger, Grace sends for him. They go walking through the fields in the evening while Richard calms her fears. Sensing that she is trembling with fright, Richard tenderly puts his arms about her and then overwhelmed by her beauty draws her close and kisses her with growing intensity. . . . A few weeks later the lovers are together again and Grace at last finds courage to reveal her secret. With worried face, Richard confesses that by the terms of his mother's will he cannot marry before his twenty-fifth birthday without forfeiting the estate. This is only a few months away but he cannot bear to have their child come into the world with a stigma. The two then visit a minister who marries them secretly and Richard brings Grace back to her home. Later, afraid that her parents may suspect Grace obtains permission to make an extended visit to a friend some miles away. There as her time nears, Richard visits. One Sunday expecting him, she is surprised when James comes instead with a message that Richard is delayed. Unsuspecting, she dresses in a hoop skirt for the masquerade dance in the village which she has promised to attend and leaves word for Richard to meet her there. James, her escort, on the way stops at the abandoned coal shaft and when she refuses his protests of love pushes her in and runs off like a wild man. Her hoop skirt is to save her and hours later a frantic Richard who knew nothing of the plot rescues her. With her baby son and her acknowledged husband, Grace in her happiness is to forgive the remorseful James.

THE SOCIAL CLIMBER

Minetta Hinson Short Subject File No. 12358

WITH pious faces, the Ardenes listen to the family lawyer read the will which leaves them them the entire estate of Mrs. Ardene's mother. For years her parents scrimped and saved and now in possession of their hard earned money, Mrs. Ardene is concerned only with means of spending it. Always she has wanted to enter into society and the first step in their new scale of living is to hire a maid. Unaccustomed to luxuries, Mrs. Ardene wishes to impress the servants. Lena, the first maid, quickly leaves when Mrs. Ardene shows her throughout the ten room house into which they move and demands that it be thoroughly cleaned daily. Not trusting her, Mrs. Ardene proceeded to watch every move and in anger the girl left. The next day Mrs. Ardene returned to the employment agency and gave a tirade on the inconsiderateness of servant girls. Still from that day on there was a constant procession of maids; behind her back her acquaintances talked about her. All know that the Ardenes who take on the aspect of snobs are unaccustomed to their fine surroundings. Oblivious of this Mrs. Ardene goes on complaining. When the maid asked for a night off, Mrs. Ardene although she does not need her, refuses. As a result when they awake the next morning the kitchen is strangely silent. Meanwhile in New York City lovely Patricia Cummens is notified that the bank which has been handling her father's estate crashed. Having an aptitude for housework and unwilling to sponge upon her friends, Patricia suddenly vanishes and wealthy John Cummings who is very much in love with her remains desperately worried. A prominent young author, John is seeking a quiet place to work on his book. Hearing of this when she meets him, Mrs. Ardene eagerly invites him to her home which he finally accepts. Although she has been hiring a girl by the day lately unable to find anyone she she thinks trustworthy, Mrs. Ardene advertises for a girl. Patricia applies and is hired although for a moment Mrs. Ardene is struck by the fact that the girl may be too pretty. However, she refuses to consider that a maid can be regarded as anything but an inferior. Her last few dollars are spent on a uniform and Patricia quickly adapts herself to her new duties. The first day she nearly collapses from overstrain but although tempted to leave is determined to remain until the end of the month when she will be in funds again. Often, Patricia in the following days is conscious while she runs the vacuum cleaner that Mrs. Ardene has been sneaking from behind watching her. The evening that Mrs. Ardene expects John she plans a dinner party of the city's most prominent who come only because they are anxious to meet John. Annoyed at this, he finally assents and it is not until at the dinner table that he suddenly looks at the maid when forgetting manners, Mrs. Ardene publicly sharply reproves her. With one bound he has his arms about Patricia, oblivious of staring eyes. Furious, Mrs. Ardene orders the maid back in the kitchen only to learn that she has been ill treating the girl who belongs in a social circle whose doors have always been closed to her. With one accord, the guests accept John's invitation to attend a night club and celebrate his and Patricia's engagement; while helplessly Mrs. Ardene looks on conscious that her social climbing efforts have failed.

THE PLANT OF DEATH

Wanda Berczykowska Mystery File No. 12352

WITH a shrug of her pretty shoulders, Rose listens to the words of love from her cousin Horace. Again she tells him that she can never love him. Hotly, Horace declares that she has permitted the attentions of his rival, Joseph Webster, to go to her head. It is with relief that Rose hears her brother Dick approaching. Swiftly she changes the subject, pointing to the weeping palm tree standing near their country home. Always it is a favorite of the brother and sister who have watched it grow since childhood. When Horace excuses himself the two return to their parents sitting out on the lawn. Mrs. Brandon interrupts and separates Dick and Rose who are quarrelling. Dick is teasing her and in a burst of fury the girl wishes he were dead. A strange silence descends as involuntarily, the parents shudder. His train of thought interrupted, Dick says queerly that all day he has had a queer sensation that he has not long to live. Just moods the others retort and Mrs. Brandon suggests that they be in better humour for the party that night. Even when Joseph comes among the first of the guests that evening Rose feels restless. Though the party is pleasant she craves excitement. It is Larkson who at midnight suggests that they play a forfeit game which Rose at first pronounces childish but Horace promises that it will prove interesting. Each drops an article in a hat and to redeem it the owner must obey the commands of Horace. Consequently Dick and Rose find themselves ordered to walk three times about the willow tree. Laugbingly, Dick mourns the fates which send him out in the moonlight with a mere sister. Josepb offers to go instead but Horace declares it will break the rules. As the minutes pass and the two fail to return, Joseph suggests going after their co-hosts. Horace is first to run to the scene where the bright moon discloses two youthful bodies outstretched. A moment later Webster is at his side and in wild grief realizes that Dick and Rose are dead. Although police and physicians arrive at the scene nothing can be done. Webster, a scientist, aids them but the cause of death cannot be found. While newspapers are filled with the double tragedy the next day, police arrest Horace now the sole beir of tbe Brandon fortune, although he maintains that he is innocent. The next night after a secret conference witb Webster, Inspector Gordon and an assistant go over the scene of the mysterious death. It is Gordon who sees a shining object in the branches and reaches for it only to collapse. Dumfounded, his assistant instinctively reaches only to fall beside Gordon. Through the shadows a sombre figure creeps toward them, and again the plant of deatb has claimed its victims. Defying warnings, Webster returns with Richard, Gordon's brother. Previously he has found a tiny mark on the bodies and claims that tbe poisoning comes from the pressure of a ring. Obeying instructions when tbe shiny object appears again, Richard stretcbes for it and then drops on the ground with Webster. When the watching man returns to his amazement they arise and overpower him. Now it is their turn to be amazed for it is Horace and Horace is still in jail, supposedly. They are to learn that the prisoner is really Horace's twin wbom years ago was alleged to have died. Horace has kept him a victim of his black arts. It is he who reveals that when Rose refused to marry Horace desperate for money, he rigged a ring through the trees with electricity. Attracted by it, as he planned Dick and Rose reached for it and fell unconscious. A prick of poison assured eternal sleep. Even while the twin spoke, Horace was to escape justice by applying his potent drug to himself.

THE LAUGHING TERROR

Mimi Joseph Drama File No. 11629

WITH impassioned, silent fury, Lady Mona Dorraine, clad in mourning garments for her father, heard the decree which reverted her inheritance to the kingdom of Routova, read to her by the soldiers of her majesty, Queen Claudenia. Even as they spoke, she felt their greedy eyes drinking in her beauty. As if by prearranged signal, one stepped forward and attempted to caress her. Her sharp withdrawal infuriated the soldiers and they circled about her. Among these aroused men, Cheltham, her fourteen year old brother, thrust himself with sword in hand. She strove to protect him but angered by a thrust, a soldier ruthlessly threw him to the ground and mercilessly killed him. Only the unexpectedly arrival of Ian, her childhood friend, saved her as the men proceeded to carry her off. With him she fled into the protection of the mountains, swearing vengeance on Queen Claudenia for her soldiers' act. A few months later, the Queen and court were startled when masked bandits slipped through the guards and deposited the body of one of her trusted advisers "With the compliments of the Laughing Terror." Though this was the first time they had heard of this strange bandit figure, in the years that followed the countryside was to shudder at the name. A band of the most hardened criminals Routova had ever experienced, no public function was safe from their sudden invasion, led by a young woman with figure as graceful as a boy, her face hidden by a red mask. Even while Mona sat in the railroad carriage, she could hear the warning conversation among the departing, "Beware of the Laughing Terror," but she was more concerned with awaiting anxiously the delayed appearance of Captain Galloway, her fiance. Shoving through the crowd, there was time enough for him only to wish her ill friend a speedy recovery under Mona's tender nursing and to kiss her a lingering farewell. That night Mona and Ian were seated in the sitting room of an imposing castle, sixty miles away. Mona had resumed the silken doublets of the Laughing Terror, but the unmasked face showed a sweet, sad beauty that ill fit her cruel reputation. "Ian," she said softly, "I promised you that if the time should come. . . Now I know I can never be yours. I have given my pledge to Captain Galloway." Hiding the anguish in his heart with poor success, Ian asked how she could marry the man who had sworn to capture the Laughing Terror. Nor would her men be content to see her sever all connections with them. Pleading weariness, Mona excused herself to spend a sleepless night. Since that fatal day of ber brother's death, she had felt neither mercy nor pity until Captain Galloway reawakened her to womanhood. . . At the height of the Queen Claudenia Ball, the Laughing Terror struck. Leading her men into the huge ballroom, half her men held the dancers at bay while the rest disrobed their jewels. Captain Galloway stared at her with bitter hate. First to recover himself when they departed, he ran for his horse. A few yards off, his eye was attracted by a gleaming sword. Springing upon Ian who had been placed on guard, Galloway forced him to change garments and tied Ian securely to the tree. Accompanying the unsuspicious bandits, he saw with relief that they retained their masks during the evening's festivities which celebrated till nearly dawn their sensational coupe. Meanwhile Ian managed to free himself and departed at full haste for the castle. Seizing the masquerader he revealed the deception. Mona suppressed her inward agitation and sparring for time insisted that the usual custom in which the enemy engaged in a duel with her, if victorious securing freedom, be carried out. Under the observant eye of her men, Mona could not parry her thrusts and after a hard fought battle spun the sword from Galloway's hand. The men insisted on instant death but the Laughing Terror commanded that he be placed in her room for a few hours. Motioning to Ian, she left the throng after her orders were followed and in a secluded corner revealed that Ian's assailant was her lover. For her sake, Ian agreed to help him to safety. Entering Mona's room in full sight of the unsuspecting guards, Ian had Galloway again exchange garments and told him the password wbicb would ensure freedom. Mona was walking through the courtyard gloom when Galloway glimpsed the masked figure and swiftly dismounting from his horse long enough to throw a cloak about her for disguise, he flung the struggling girl over the saddle. Dawn was breaking as he neared his home and they had encountered none on the lonely road. Her slight body, and silent submissive attitude filled him with pity. Meanwhile, Mona was terrified thinking of the horrible denoucment that awaited Galloway. Alone, she looked so harmless that Galloway decided it would not be too risky to bring her to his home for a few hours rest before continuing the journey.

While Galloway continued his vigil over the masked sleeper, Ian was released from the room by the men who were readily convinced that Galloway had tricked him. They sought for the Laughing Terror to notify her of the prisoner's escape, and when none remembered seeing her for hours, Ian sprang to his horse. "To the castle," he shouted, "Galloway has her." In the courtroom, Queen Claudenia was complimenting Galloway to whom she gave the privilege of lifting the prisoner's mask. Galloway reeled in horror when his eyes met the uncovered face of his beloved. Cringing from his pained look, the girl begged permission to explain what had driven her to the role of Laughing Terror. No sooner had she finished, when the band led by Ian entered, attempting to rescue her. The Queen's soldiers were out on full guard and a fierce battle opened. Just as one of the soldiers was preparing to strike Mona, Galloway's sister, Lilyan, flung herself in front, receiving the fatal blow. Ordering ber men to halt, Mona remorsefully told the court that she was prepared for her sentence. Though the Queen expressed her regret for Galloway's sake, she condemned Mona to death. Hearing this, Ian who lingered when the others fled, stepped forward. He offered his life in her stead and against the pleas of these two who loved Mona so greatly, the Queen could no longer refuse. "The Laughing Terror shall be dead," she repeated, "But Mona Galloway will live!"

THE TURNING POINT

Mrs. S. F. Branton Comedy Drama File No. 12257

HASTILY, Mary Lindsay prepares biscuits and corn bread for her husband's noon meal, lines of anxiety and unhappiness on ber tense, young face. When Mrs. Claughton, wife of the depot agent, calls to purchase eggs sbe remarks that Mary should have more time to rest and care for her baby, Glen, but the young wife replies that her first duty is to her husband. Trained in old fashioned ideals of obedience and service to ber lord and master, Mary rushes to place fresh hickory wood under the smoked hams and to prepare custard pie, the one dish her husband eats without complaint. Wiley returns from the fields, silently sitting down to the delicious meal of corn bread, beaten biscuits and other southern dishes. As usual, he abuses his wife, finally remarking that he certainly got a sorry deal when he married. Although accustomed to these cutting remarks, Mary bursts into tears after he leaves. A knock on the door interrupts this; wiping her eyes, Mary greets a fashionably dressed young couple who explain that their car broke down. They telephone for a mechanic and as they wait at Mary's invitation, the man obligingly brings his wife's suitcase in for her, apologizing for the inconvenience the breakdown has caused her. Mary marvels at the many little services the woman demands graciously, and, equally graciously, receives.

When the mechanic comes the two women are left alone. Impulsively, Mary confides her unhappiness, adding that if she had more time to rest before her child was born he might not be so delicate. "Your first duty is to your child," her new friend assures her. "All men are selfisb, if you allow them to be." And she points out that Glen will never have a chance in tbe world if his mother continues to be a doormat, neglecting him at her husband's command. Thanking ber, Mary turns over these remarks in her mind as the couple drive away, smiling a farewell. But she cannot bring herself to neglect the word "obey" in her marriage vows. That night she dreams of her boy growing up a weakling, unable to attend school, discharged from his position and shunned by the girl he loves. She seems to see him turning to her witb reproach in his eyes, while she is busily engaged in making row after row of custard pies. These her husband Wiley eats almost all at once, curtly commanding her to make more. With a little cry, Mary awakens, hastening to ber baby's cradle, but sbe finds him sleeping quietly.

The next morning as Mary is patiently squeezing oranges and preparing her son's special diet while the pie crust in the oven is turning golden brown, she hears the baby cry and discovers him violently ill. Throwing the pie, crust and all, to the chickens, Mary takes her son to the doctor, although Wiley has forbidden this. That night she silences his protests by replying that she will not neglect her children. The years go by and Glen, a handsome lad, just graduated from high school, persuades his father to install a water system and ligbting plant, since this will make things easier for his mother. Tom, his brother and Frances, his sister, agree that all owe Mary a debt of undying gratitude. That night, Wiley asks Glen, who is very popular with the high school girls, what he can do to please Mary and atone for past mistakes. "Why don't you buy her a box of candy?" Glen suggests. And when Wiley awkwardly presents his wife with a huge box of chocolates, there are tears in her eyes. That night, for the first time in many years, Wiley discovers an enormous custard pie on the table, as Mary's hand slips into his.

WORKING GIRLS

Mrs. Thomas L. Doland Drama File No. 12210

IT was nearly closing hour in the Employment Agency, but Jo Anne still waited hopefully. Through the half open door, Henry Stanley, man about town by choice and an importer by profession, glimpsed the waiting girl. So well did he like what he saw that he hurried to the nearest phone booth. Meanwhile Mrs. James called in Jo Anne to notify her that there was an eighteen dollar a week position with young Attorney Bob Drake. The telephone rang and after a moment, Mrs. James announced that she has just the person for him. "Here is one at thirty," she said, "At least one of these should materialize." Life had not looked so bright for weeks to Jo Anne whose happy face reflected this as she rushed up the rooming house steps. The genial landlady, Mrs. Kelly, who had been patiently waiting several weeks for her rent, invited her for tea. The hungry girl accepted gratefully. Over the tea cups, Jo Anne asked the landlady's advice—which one should she see first. Practical Mrs. Kelly advised the one who paid most. A glance at her references the next morning, another searching glance of her person, and Stanley pronounced her eminently satisfactory. A few weeks later, Jo Anne was preparing to leave when Stanley called her into the private office. He was sorry but there were some important papers which must be drawn up immediately. A half hour later, Jo Anne was finished but her employer insisted on inviting her to dinner to make up for the one she would miss at her boarding establishment. Though at first she refused, Stanley persuaded her that her ideas were ridiculously old fashioned. On an average of once a week thereafter, Stanley managed to detain her. Privately Jo Anne worried yet she could not afford to leave her position. Then came the morning when there was a piece of important work to be done and Stanley telephoned that he had sprained his ankle. She was to come up with the papers at once. The sight of the housekeeper puttering about, reassured Jo Anne who quickly reminded Stanley that there was much business to be done, when he began to pay numerous compliments. Soon after lunch just as she was ready to leave, Stanley begged her to prepare some tea since the housekeeper had stepped out for the marketing. Jo Anne did not see him slip a powder into her tea but later when she went for her coat, the world grew black and she dropped into unconsciousness. When she woke, Jo Anne found herself in bed wearing pajamas. Frightened, she groped for her garments; they were gone. In answer to her calls, Stanley, all lameness forgotten, confronted her and announced his intention to keep her as his mistress. He laughed when Jo Ann threatened to throw herself from the window and came toward her. Her body leaped into space. A moment later came the shrill sounds of the ambulance and police whistles. Visualizing the disgrace, Stanley pulled the trigger of a revolver close to his temple. Weeks later, Jo Anne, fully recovered but no longer as joyous returned to the agency. By an amazing twist of fate Mr. Drake's position was open again and she received it. During the months that followed, Jo Anne slowly fell in love with Drake and bitterly regretted not having come to his place first. Then Drake announced that she must leave; he could no longer pay even his office rent. Jo Anne boldly pressed her small savings upon him. In his refusal, Drake hesitantly admitted he could not take money from the woman he loved. Even when Jo Anne confessed the past for which she was blameless, Drake declared nothing mattered. That afternoon she rescued an old man knocked down by a truck, Judge Master. In gratitude and approving of her young man, Master sent many legal cases to her lover. The day came when Jo Anne left for a new position—the noble one of wifehood.

BLUE RIVER MAID

G. F. Little Comedy Drama File No. 12330

BRUSHING the last bit of rice from their clothes, thrown by their few friends who attended the simple ceremony, Tilda and Rogers, newly married, set sail on the house boat which in the years to come was to be their home permanently. A simple cabin was kitchen, bed room and living room. Their wants were plain enough to fit their tiny income and for Roger's health the outdoor life on the water was judged best. From the shore could be seen the horses and buggies of a world of thirty years ago. On the shore when they go to fetch supplies one day, Tilda noticed large signs advertising an old fashioned river boat which was giving a play that night. The wistful tones in which she spoke first made Rogers realize that life might not be as constantly gay for her. With a determined voice he announced that they would go to the program that night. Feeling somewhat daring, Tilda made elaborate preparations before hand desiring to look her best for many of the fashionable in society would attend since entertainments were scarce. On deck, Tilda was awed by their finery and kept close to Rogers. The good-natured enthusiasm which the actors displayed was appreciated by the audience who hilariously greeted their simple efforts. So interested did Tilda become as the curtain neared the close that it was several moments before she realized that Rogers had slipped away. Suddenly afraid she hurried through the groups, ignoring the admiring comments until on the deck one man a little the worse for wear tried to put an arm about her. At her screams for help, Rogers rushed over and a fight ensued. In the excitement Rogers was badly hurt. Black Mammy came to their assistance and insisted on helping her nurse Rogers later. So Black Mammy was added to the family. Drifting down the waters on lovely afternoon, Black Mammy almost gulped her burning Huff brew, a special tea she claimed would cure all ailments—for there on the smooth surface drifted a helpless infant and nearby a large fish strange to those parts. While Tilda reached for the bundle Black Mammy helped Rogers wield a sturdy oar which demolished the monster. So Blue River Maid or Elsa as they called her for short became the center of the little houseboat universe. As the years developed the shores reflected the progress—rows of parked cars, road houses that peered at prohibition at the river's edge. Elsa was a lovely child who became an equally lovely maiden but her life was that of a tomboy until she met Edgar Rald, young lawyer who swiftly fell in love with her. He helped her when Tilda and Rogers stricken with the same illness were brought to a hospital. Faced by the urgent need of money, Elsa refused help from Edgar. Then one day when they found that Black Mammy was offering to sell tea to strangers who wandered near the boat tied now near a tree, Edgar decided that they might open a tea room. This proved a success from the first until a Mr. Milkin came and offered a large sum for the brew which Black Mammy refused. Then one day he sought to kidnap Elsa who had wandered off alone but she was an excellent shot. Edgar ran to her aid but it was unnecessary. The day came when the recipe was sold for a large sum which Black Mammy insisted on sharing with her "folks." The foster-parents were surprised with a new boat when they left the hospital while the Blue River Maid planned to keep the other for herself and Edgar whom she finally agreed to marry.

THE PATTERN REPEATS

Lucie F. Dillard Drama File No. 12277

A QUEER family those Blantons, so everyone in the neighborhood said. The brothers, Jerry and Mack, had never married themselves and they refused to permit their sisters to. Lovely Rosalie escaped only through tragedy. Seventeen years earlier her body had been found floating on the river and Callie, her sister, had sought to ease her pain by adopting a child as the family's niece. As for Callie, it was common knowledge that she and Harvey Johnson for years met secretly; the brothers hated him and the two had never found sufficient courage to run away. But to Celeste, the aunt posed as a woman of complete virtue. Today, Miss Sikes is waiting impatiently in the schoolroom for her charge while Celeste is struggling with the unruly tooth paste cap in her last minute dressing. To Miss Sikes Celeste still seems a child and she attempts to punish her with a ruler but Scrappy. Celeste's pet dog, takes a nip at her ankle. In the excitement, study is postponed for the day. Joyful of the holiday, Celeste slips away to the favorite river spot of Edward Houston, whom she has been secretly in love with for several months. Their meeting is similar to that of lovers the world over. After the first moments, Celeste broodingly tells him that Sir Julian Carston, middle-aged Englishman is coming over that night and Callie insists that she be nice to him. Later the aunt is to come to her with the news that Carston wishes to marry her and the horrified girl rebels. She confesses that she cares for Edward and will have no other man. Callie is indignant and orders her to stay in her room. A day later, Miss Sikes pretends to have an infection from the bite and escapes on a holiday, presumably for treatment. Orders are given to have Scrappy killed; to save the heart-broken girl Edward calls personally and explains that his friend the doctor says there is nothing at all wrong. Ordering him to mind his own business, Callie declares that her niece is engaged to Edward. In a fit of rebellion, Celeste runs off to Mammy Cindy, the old colored servant who has been with the family through three generations. Here she first learns the story of her strange birth. . . Rosalie is her mother. She, too, fell in love with a man, Martin; and Callie had aided in opposing the match. Often had Rosalie come to the little cabin to meet her lover there and the negroes protected her from her relatives' wrath. Then came one day when she waited for Martin who returned not that day nor the next. All that summer she hid her secret within the folds of an enormous blue cape. In this humble room under the most primitive conditions, Celeste was born and her mother died. Old Mammy carried her to the water's edge and gently allowed the stream to carry her away so no scandal should be attached. Then Mammy hurried to the big house and showed them the strange child left with her by an unknown person. A few days later the body was recovered. Here was the identical blue cape which had been dropped on the journey and the pet dog had found. . . Celeste vowed that they should never hamper her life and its natural instincts. Shortly after, she sent for Edward and they were hastily married. Then he went on his western trip and failed to return as soon as he promised. Now it was the daughter's turn to wear the cape and the old Mammy tended her when her hour came. Only death passed by. Callie rushed in, suspecting something, and accused her niece of disgracing her. But upon this scene returned Edward to proudly claim his wife and babe. The happiness denied to Rosalie was to come to her daughter.

THE DEATH TRAP

Edna Lane McNamara Melodrama File No. 12204

WITH leering satisfaction, Joe Carlson, powerful underworld gangster, surveys the installation of a mechanism of sharp knives which he has installed for protection in the meeting room. The "death trap" is to be operated by the Slinker, a foreign half-wit. Peter, the doorman, announces the presence of Frank Bender, a European crook who has decided that America is safer; then Peter leaves to trundle Old John, the nearly blind man, to his begging post. Just before leaving, Carlson warns Peter that unless Old John collects more money, the river will be his end. Close on Bender's heels comes young Jack Knowlton whom Carlson for reasons of his own has determined to attach to his gang. Carlson plans to enlist them on a secret undertaking shortly to which they agree; and meanwhile learns with pleasure that Jack's mother has a vacant room which Bender is welcome to. Since the sudden disappearance of her husband when Jack and his sister, Marian, were small children, Mrs. Knowlton has struggled to keep the home together. There are wealthy relations but their objections to the original marriage made it impossible to turn to them for help. Both she and Marian are instantly attracted to Bender. A few evenings later while Mrs. Knowlton watches Jack leave the house, with worried eyes, fearful that he is beginning to keep poor company, Marian accepts Bender's invitation to attend a night club. There they accidentally meet Charlotte, Marian's close friend, and Ben who has been unsuccessfully in love with Marian for years. He has invited Charlotte in the futile hope of arousing her jealousy. From the beginning Marian rejects the attentions of Carlson who turns to Charlotte instead and thinking that it may enhance her in Ben's eyes the girl responds. Meanwhile Mrs. Knowlton is upset by a strange letter which notifies her that a fortune has been left to the husband she believes dead and will revert elsewhere if he is not found. Bender steals the letter and Mrs. Knowlton is unable to remember the name of the law firm. The Death Trap is almost ready and the night arrives when Carlson threatens to use it on Old John unless the quota is met. The beggar does not comprehend the threats but Peter, fond of his charge, in desperation trundles him to the police where Old John is moved to a hospital for safety. Still vainly pressing his suit, Ben begs Marian to marry him only to learn that she is engaged to Bender. Heartbroken, Ben wanders to the river, passing Carlson whom he greets gruffly. Convinced that Ben is jealous because of Charlotte, Carlson calls for the girl and brings her to his apartment. When she rejects his sudden advances there, locking herself in the kitchen, Carlson taunts that her lover is at the water front waiting to jump. Charlotte rushes there via the fire escape, in time to prevent Ben from plunging in. For the first time he realizes how much her love is worth. Disgruntled, Carlson returned to his headquarters where he drank too much with Bender and discloses that Old John whom he plans to demonstrate his trap on is Jack's father whom he once attempted to kill for valuable papers. Now Old John is dangerously showing signs of returning memory. Realizing he has spoken too freely, Carlson springs upon Bender and orders the knives turned but is caught in his own trap while Bender drags himself to safety and faints in the arms of his sweetheart. Having learned from Jack, brought to his senses by the engagement of his sister to a thief, that he is going to kill Bender, she has rushed to headquarters. Mrs. Knowlton is reunited with her husband and the family learn that Bender is really a private detective hired by relations to ferret out the mystery of Knowlton's disappearance years before in company with the man time identified as Carlson.

TESTAMENT OF LIFE

Thomas J. Bures Drama File No. 12329

SO lost is Edward McPherson in his despondent thoughts that a car nearly runs over him, pushed aside in time by his cousin Joe. The two go to McPherson's home where once more Edward must report that the day's search for work is a failure. As his wife reminds him, they should be thankful that at least they own their home but looking at his two children, Ann and Donald, Edward wonders aloud what will become of them if their savings continues to dwindle. Joe too is disconsolate, an orphan he has been thrust from one relation to another until he is old enough to work. Now in love with Elsie Smith he is anxious to build a future for himself. With her small savings he has at last agreed to marry her and go west where they will buy farming land. Turning the pages of the evening newspaper Edward reads that a new boom has opened in Alaska where a gold rush similar to the earlier ones has begun. Feeling that here lies opportunity that night he persuades his wife to allow him to mortgage the house and take the gamble of securing a fortune. He chooses a cheap passage on a boat crowded with others going for the same purpose. Braving the hardships of poor food and uncomfortable surroundings he at last disembarks at Skagway. Here is a typical boom town filled with gold crazed people. It is also the home of Soapy Smith the town's toughest character. In a wide open saloon Edward first encounters the man who treats him to a drink and then suggests that he deposit his funds for safety with the Skagway Traveling Agency. Herb Moore approaches him on his way there and warns Edward that Soapy Smith is the man behind the agency which never returns a dollar that comes within its grasp. Overwhelmed by the high rates for food, Edward gladly teams up with Herb who takes him to the deserted claims. On the way they stumble across a dead man while two horsemen are fast galloping in the distance. When Edward suggests calling the sheriff, he is informed that Soapy Smith will have him plugged. Weeks of hard labor pass until at last the jubilant day arrives when Edward finds bits of gold sticking to his pan. They have stumbled on what promises to be a rich claim. The two ride into town to replenish their supplies and despite Herb's disapproval Edward goes on alone into the saloon to celebrate. Here are women of every kind and race whose business it is to make the customers spend freely. Suspecting from his manner that Edward has struck wealth, Smith arranges to have Nona, one of his employees, get him drunk and learn the location of the claim. Soapy Smith then tries to register the claim first but taking no chances Herb attends to it himself. Continuing to follow directions, Nona tempts Edward unaccustomed to such freedom to see her frequently. In the drunken states to which she reduces him despite his partner's pleas, he gives her money lavishly. One night Herb insists upon bursting in and brings Edward to his senses with a wire that his children are dead from pneumonia. Pushing Nona out of the way, Edward sells out to Herb and takes the first boat back, completing the trip by plane. Wealth seems futile to him when he arrives only to find his wife seriously ill. When she slips away to join the children and his relatives greedy for money fawn upon him, Edward ill from heartbreak and physically broken is ordered to the west. There he visits Joe and pretends that he is poor. In the hearty welcome he receives there and the ideal home life, Edward is to learn that happiness does not depend solely on money and through them life is to become hopeful again.

THE RHINEBECK PHILOSOPHER

Elias J. Beach Drama File No. 12262

INSEPARABLE companions since childhood, David and Bill discuss plans for founding a factory together at the outskirts of Rhinebeck, their native town, as they are seated in their room at the university dormitory. Graduations follows, both students, who have attained high honors for scholarship, deliver speeches in which they outline plans to carry their ideals of honesty and fairness to all into the field of business. Eagerly, the two young men purchase the land for their factory with money which their respective fathers have willed them. Construction begins, and soon the small plant is operating. Marion, a girl whom both boys have known for years, is invited to christen their enterprise at a little ceremony. Afterwards, David asks her to become his wife but she gently tells him that she has already given her promise to Bill, and the faithful friend can only offer his congratulations. In order to forget his loneliness as much as he can, David plunges into work at the factory. When he discovers how much money can be made, his high ideals of fair conditions to his workers and the finest quality to the consumer desert him. Against Bill's knowledge, while the former is away, David reduces wages, works his employees overtime, and turns out on inferior product. When Bill learns how David has betrayed his trust, the friendship is broken. Offered a position as manager in another community, Bill accepts.

Too late, David realizes that he has lost more than money can buy. In the years that follow, he tries to atone for his mistake in helping others. Many an erring husband returns to his wife and children after David talks to him, advising him that he will always regret his error if he sacrifices his most precious possession. Frank Crane, the town's drunkard, is considered a bad man, but David's trust in him brings out the best in his character. When David secures a position for Frank, whom no one else would dare to employ because of his reputation, the grateful man resolves to do his best in order to justify this faith, and becomes a useful citizen. Impulsive, sixteen year old Gwen Beatty plans to elope with a travelling salesman. It is David who hires detectives, discovering that the salesman is married. Gently, he tells this to Gwen, advising her that her best friend is her mother, and the grateful girl promises to remember this, as she weeps on David's shoulder. Winning the title of the Rhinebeck Philosopher, David reveals a sound sense of values as he discusses his views for ending possibility of war and strife among the working classes by destroying capitalistic greed.

Marion returns to Rhinebeck with Joyce, her daughter, for a visit. Presented to young Howard Atwood at a church social, Joyce falls in love with this idealistic youth, but her mother objects to the wedding, since she fears that the boy cannot provide for her daughter. Disconsolately, Howard confides this to the Rhinebeck philosopher, explaining that he has refused a position with a prominent firm because of their unethical methods. David, with Howard. reopens his old factory, and applying remembered principles of fairness, wins trade from their dishonest competitors. At the wedding of Joyce and Howard, Bill and David shake hands, friendship restored, never to be broken again.

THE MOOR LAND NYMPH

Mary Clouse Melodrama File No. 12375

THE corner of that little world seemed very still the night that Mona Grey was born; it was as if that serenity had become a part of her. Quiet and sensitive, a ray of sunshine for all who came in contact, Mona was known as the moor land nymph. To the blase man of the world, Harold Sponderl, who heard her sing one night Mona was a lovely flower to add to his collection of women. Mona felt his admiration and flushed at the rich bouquet of flowers he sent to her. Though friends at the inn pleaded with the girl to sing once more, she ran out in the cool grateful darkness. The next day she was to meet him again and in her simple heart, Mona accepted him as the man she loved. Harold refused to consider marrying any girl much less one not of his world but as the days passed he grew mad with desire. Hoping to win her completely, Harold tempted her to drink but she had been too well trained to care for spirits. At last Harold came to her people and confessed that he wished to marry her. The ceremony was to be plain and secret because family reasons forbade any public knowledge of his marriage, Harold claimed. The following day shortly after the two had visited Mona's secret shrine which reflected the purity of her spirit—Harold and Mona set out on a wedding tour through the countryside in a gypsy caravan. A few weeks later Harold left for home promising to return soon to claim her. Trusting him, Mona did not confess that she was expecting to bear his child that fall. Weeks went on and nothing was heard from him directly; only a monthly check sent through a friend. A year later, Mona finding his address among her old possessions went to London. There she faced his irate mother who ordered her off with the information that Harold had quietly divorced her and was on his honeymoon. Wandering blindly through the park, Mona would have fallen had not the strong arm of Tom Blaine, Sea Captain, upheld her. With the passing of time, Mona was to marry Tom though the searing first love would never be forgotten. For Tom it was also a second marriage and his child Jack and Harold's son Linton were to become sturdy friends. Years later at the naval academy Jack fell in love with Clare Sponderl and from her description, Mona realized that this was the child of her former husband. To be near Clare when they set on a cruise, Jack obtained a position on their boat. One night Harold found the two looking over the water, locked in tight embrace. Finding that Clare was determined to marry him, Harold framed the youth who found himself implicated in a ship accident. As a result his sea papers were taken from him and unable to face the disgrace, Jack killed himself. Pretending sorrow Harold went to meet the grieving parents and was startled to find himself facing Mona. Realizing afresh all the love which he selfishly passed by and remorseful at the tragedy he caused, Harold falls victim to a fatal heart attack. It was Mona who with her old sweetness offered Clare a home for the girl turned naturally to her for sympathy and Linton her half-brother also sought to comfort her. When the estate was settled a letter was found confessing that Clare was not Harold's child but an adopted one. Linton's face shown with relief for he had learned to care for Clare with unbrotherly passion. Soon in his arms, Clare was to know happiness again; while Mona found consolation in the knowledge that through the years Harold had kept his love alight.

WHEN DREAMS COME TRUE

Mary Durgin Drama File No. 12136

THE little secretary looked out upon the dreary November world, ignoring the papers strewn upon her desk. Inside from the large living room came the light tinkling strains of a piano made by someone whose fingers were straying idly over the keys. There was silence. Against her will Maria Cornwall listened to the soft laughter of a feminine voice and the deeper tones of a man. Reba Fleur, again, she thought miserably. The telephone rang. It was her closest friend, Norma Stanley, wonderingly if she could go to the philosophy lecture that night. The door opened and Maria hastily put down the receiver. Reba nodded condescendingly as they passed, her fingers restingly lightly on Grant's arm. Alone once more, Maria clenched her small fists and said to the empty room, "You idiot, can't you see that it isn't the music she wants but you?" It was queer; Maria could see herself again, like a little ghost standing in the room months earlier waiting to see Grant. Although young he had already made a name for himself; yet insisted on returning six months of the year to his old birth place and live the life of an ordinary teacher. While he took only a few pupils these were fortunate because Grant applied rigid standards. Knowing this, Maria who had dreamed all her life of composing music which would interpret the beauty and pain of the world to others, had been bullied by Norma into seeing him. Yet how was she to know that Grant had been expecting applicants for the secretarial post he advertised, and had taken for granted that was why she had come? In a daze Maria had answered his questions and found herself hired into a job she didn't want. Norma urged her to leave but Maria pleaded that later she might find courage to reveal her purpose. But to herself Maria acknowledged that rapidly she was losing her heart to the man. Yet though Grant was polite he never seemed to see her as a person though he had eyes readily enough for Reba, rich, spoiled and talented who for the first time was taking music seriously in hopes of winning Grant's love. At the lecture that night, Maria's pleasure was spoiled upon seeing Grant with Reba who had attended school with her. As the two girls were slipping out, Reba impulsively called. "I'm having a few friends over to listen to some new concert records. Care to come?" Grant looked surprised as he ramarked half-aloud to his secretary that he hadn't realized she was interested in music. A protective instinct warned Reba that Grant's attention had temporarily strayed so she hastily suggested that they leave. Conscious that it would only mean further unhappiness, yet unable to resist the temptation, Maria accepted the invitation. Reba's brother, Ronald, greeted Maria with ill-concealed pleasure. Remorseful at her neglect of him lately, Maria strove to be friendly but it was a miserable failure. Then as the group were breaking up, Ronald attempted to kiss her in the hallway. Angrily, she wrenched away and fled down the path only to feel the restraining arm of Grant. Silently, they walked on together. Her heart still heavy the next morning, Maria stole into the room where the grand piano stood and ran her fingers over the keys. The first time in days that she had played, unconsciously she began to improve. Music came that held all the pent-up grief in her heart. So lost did she become that she was startled to hear Grant beside her, command in wonder that she play that piece again. Shyly, Maria admitted that it was her own and that Reba was due for a lesson. "Never mind," he answered roughly as he started to write the notes on paper. Later, Maria was to sell this piece for a large sum. But even greater happiness resulted in the knowledge that no longer was she merely a secretary—the dream of love was fast coming true.

MADAME TISDALE'S SECRET

Charles A. Felder Mystery Drama File No. 12266

AS the young couple neared the lovely estate of the Tisdales, Lucille instinctively clung tighter to her escort, Wainwrite. From afar can be heard the threatening barks of the bulldogs that guard the estate day and night. Always the gates are closed; and few people have ever seen Mrs. Tisdale. In strong contrast to her said Wainwrite reminiscently, Mr. Tisdale was the social baron of the town. A wealthy established banker, he owned a controlling interest in most of the industries and financed scores of farmers. However, there was none of the grasping Shylock in him. No, there never had been any children. Wainwrite's father Lovejoy was bank cashier and since they were small tots he and his twin, Rayford, had been favored visitors in the president's inner sanctum. The two stopped as they talked, while womanlike, Lucille tried to peer through the gates. Suddenly, the gates swung open and a car loomed through the darkness at high speed. The next day, Wainwrite was to learn that the Syrian servant had been taken ill and died within twenty-four hours. Meanwhile at the bank Lovejoy and the banker had been in troubled conference. Economic conditions had hard hit the public and many notes were long over-due. For the first time in years, Tisdale found himself pinched for cash and yet he refused to call in any loans, realizing how hard it would affect his old business friends. A few days later ten minutes after Tisdale arrived at the bank, the bell from his inner office rang furiously. Lovejoy hurried in, in time to see the banker collapse. Death followed swiftly and a huge crowd collected, attempting to storm the bank, terror stricken at what this might imply for their own futures. One of Mrs. Tisdale's idiosyncrasies was a refusal to have a telephone and it was hours before a committee could reach the house to break the news. She was reported to be very calm though when she appeared in public to call at the funeral parlors, tears were seen to fall. The Lovejoy family was most grief-stricken. Though the cause of death had been given as heart disease, the twins were suspicious of foul play. After the funeral the bank still remained closed and a payless Saturday for the worried community resulted. Then when it finally opened, signs declared that there would be no more loans. The shocked community appealed to her lawyer who in an interview pleaded for clemency. Instead, Mrs. Tisdale gave orders that all overdue notes were to be collected and mortgages foreclosed if necessary. Rumor spread that the bank was ruined but Mrs. Tisdale took charge personally of all payments and withdrawals, having changed all bills and stock for gold. The defiant citizens then opened their own bank. Meanwhile Wainwrite called upon Mrs. Tisdale and begged her to have a post-mortum made of her late spouse. Angry, she ordered him out. A few days later Lucille called upon him in distress. Her father had a batch of securities in the bank vault which had disappeared. His own father was blamed. Sure that Lovejoy was innocent, Wainwrite rushed home to find that Mrs. Tisdale had dismissed him and he now faced charges of arrest. Determined to get inside the house where they hoped to find a damaging clue, the sons arrived in time to save the servant from poisoning because she had accidentally located Mrs. Tisdale's hiding place for her gold. In terror the woman confessed that Lovejoy was innocent and she had killed her husband upon learning that he had made a new will leaving a large sum to the twins and revoking all bank indebtedness. After signing a confession, she killed herself. Now for Wainwrite and Lucille marriage was once more possible as they paid tribute with flowers at the banker's grave.

CONVICT ISLAND

Robert F. Phillips Melodrama File No. 12349

WITH the words of endearment that every lover knows, Jim Harris bids Janet his fiancee good-night. Only one thing mars their present happiness. She insists that the marriage must not take place until Jim's savings account is increased to one thousand dollars since she comes from wealthier circles and realizes that more than his insuranceman's salary is needed for a reserve. Filled with new energy Jim calls at the home of Leo Kelly a prospective client. Unknown to Jim, Leo is a gangster who plans to rob the wealthy Mr. Salsburie and having learned that Jim is acquainted with the man intends to use him for his own ill purposes. Elated over the promise of a large policy, Jim readily returns that night to drive Leo and a friend to the Salsburie home since they claim to be strangers in the city. As he nears the door with them Jim is amazed when prodded with a gun and ordered to "act natural." Overwhelmed with fear, he enters with the men when Salsburie opens the door since it is the servants night off. While Harry "covers" Jim, Salsburie is ordered to open the safe. Disappointed when only a small sum is found Leo locates the key to the hidden vault. Desperate at the thought of losing a small fortune, Salsburie resists and is killed. Jim is ordered to keep quiet or he will meet with the same fate. Afraid that he will be accused, Jim drives home only to be arrested by police who receive a tip that Jim has committed the crime. Though the chief is inclined to believe Jim's innocence the overwhelming evidence of the pistol which Leo slipped in his pocket and a roll of bills convicts him. Sentenced for life, Jim is sent to Convict Island. Meanwhile Michael Sardonnie, noted criminal who always escapes the law, has bribed Daniel Leonard, governor of Convict Island, to permit him to use the prison as a landing place for a huge cargo of dope. Since half of his men have recently been sentenced to serve terms there, Sardonnie plans to take them away when he later removes the dope on an innocent appearing fishing schooner. The guards are overpowered and all means of communication shut off; Michael's own men acting as guards. When Jim arrives the first part of the plot has gone through and Jerry Hall, his cellmate, with whom he soon makes friends, confides in him the true situation. Together they plan to escape on the schooner and warn the authorities thus winning a lighter sentence but even more important—saving the country from the evils of widespread drugs. Having timed the appearance of the guards, the two make their escape through the windows, the bars of which are loosened, and hide in the life boat. When they reach shore they are stopped by Mike's henchman who observe their striped uniforms. They slug him into silence but not before he wounds Jerry. Others come running at the sound and Jim is forced to abandon Jerry, dying from the effects of the bullet. Running along the lonely road with bullets whizzing past, he is fortunate to clamber on the back of a solitary machine. A policeman is found on the outskirts of the city. The alarm is at once given and before the night is ended the men implicated are arrested and Jim is to learn that Leo facing electrocution for the murder of a policeman has confessed that Jim is innocent. With the reward from a grateful government, Jim is to take Janet for his bride.

SNATCH RACKET

Lan Cook Comedy Drama File No. 12326

STINGY old Silas Jones is known to be wealthy so two youths, Roy Bates and Sam Ure, in search of easy money decide to kidnap him. The city papers are filled with stories of similar happenings and there is no reason why they should not be equally successful. Meanwhile, oblivious of this Silas is quarreling with his wife who wants to visit the nearby city and see her sons. Silas who refuses to buy even a new milk pail rants that this is sheer extravagance. None of his hard earned money is going to be spent on their two sons, Seth an architect and Bob a lawyer, when they belong on the farm in his opinion. Half crying, Sarah retorts that he never even took her on the wedding tour he promised and even when wealth came he continud his old habits. The boys have to shift for themselves; the old house is furnished the same way as in his mother's time; nor does he ever contribute anything to the church. That night Silas is forced to sleep on the uncomfortable couch in the guest room. Nor is his wife's ill humor abated that morning. When he shows the pail the bottom of which the cow has kicked out, she rams it down his head. Silas decides that the fields are the best place for him until Sarah gets over her spell. As he trudges along the road a truck slows down and Roy and Sam cajole him into taking an hour or two off for fishing. Instead they drive to an old deserted shack deep in the woods and thrust the bewildered Silas in with the request that he sign a note asking for twenty-five thousand dollars ransom. When Silas refuses they lock him in securely and plan to return the following day when he has had time to think it over. Silas resigns himself to wait sure that someone will find him while Sarah forgets to care for the stock as night falls and her husband is still absent. In the morning convinced that he may have committed suicide as a result of her harshness, Sarah hastily notifies Bob. Hungry and thirsty, Silas waits for the boys to return. Meanwhile they begin to repent their actions for the father of Roy has forbidden them to use the truck again that week since they received a flat tire yesterday. How are they going to get there? It's too far to walk. Unable to go himself, Bob sends Seth who notifies the sheriff, arranges to have the stock cared for and brings Sarah back with him. When the next day results in no clue also, a reward of ten thousand dollars is offered. Bob and Seth themselves lead a search party and the following night finds them resting only a few yards from the cabin where Silas worn out is dozing on the hard floor. When it begins to rain the two contemplate shelter in the cabin but finding it padlocked continue on. Roy afraid that Silas may die has secretly borrowed a car and they slip over to unbolt the door an hour later. Just as the padlock is released they hear voices and rush for cover. During these long hours, Silas has had time to consider how futile money will be when he is dead. He repents his stinginess to his family and church and expresses this in a prayer just before he drops into unconsciousness, in which state he is found by two hunters who frightened off, unknowingly, the kidnappers. Soon an anxious family wait at the hospital for the news that assures them Silas will live. Convinced that Silas is dead the boys steal another car and seek to put as many miles behind as possible though Sam suggests that they return to take their medicine. When the rapidly recuperating Silas assured the police that his rescuers had not originally brought him to his plight, an alarm is sent out and the youths apprehended by a farmer who offers them a few days work, when they seek to sell the stolen machine. Sam freely confesses but in spite of this, Silas begs that all charges be dropped, feeling they are responsible for his realization of his false values. When the police are unable to carry out his request he persuades Bob to successfully defend them. The public confession of "miser Silas" that he is turning over a new leaf stirs the listeners and the boys are sent to an Industrial School instead of prison. Secretly leaving orders for the building of a new home and a church supervised by Seth, Silas takes Sarah who protests he is spending too much on the long deferred wedding trip. Nobly, he suppresses all thoughts of homesickness and assured that his mother's chair which has sentimental value will be placed in the new house Silas spends lavishly placing Sarah's comfort first. At last a letter comes that the house is ready and Sarah confesses that she would like to start back. She has had enough of honeymoons for the present while Silas promises another any time she chooses. With Bob, the couple visit an automobile salesroom where Silas demands a car just big enough for two. The salesman shows him a coupe which Silas insists on terming a chicken coop but nevertheless finds satisfactory. Again Sarah timidly suggests that it must be beyond their purse but Silas only chuckles and carelessly tosses the wallet over to Bob to settle. The other son Seth enters and Silas has him drive them to the farm in the new car. As they approach the new house a crowd of neighbors are seen waiting to welcome them while one shouts. "Here comes our honeymooners." Bewildered, Sarah declares that this is not their house but Silas assures her and points to the valley where the new church steeple is visible. While she goes to inspect the house, Silas visits his livestock. The dinner bell rings and the Jones family surrounded by their neighbors crowd around the table. Silas bows his head and gives grateful thanks for his new-found blessings.

SECOND APRIL

Richard Plume Drama File No. 12192

HALL'S troubled eyes followed the retreating figure of Mildred Lancer, a student in his Junior literature class. Yes, she was waiting for Stanley—lucky chap. And again Hall wondered why at 44 he should be tormented with the pangs of emotion for a girl twenty-five years his junior. "She'll never know," he murmured as his head sank lower against the restful coolness of the desk. Back deep into the past drifted his thoughts while his entire life passed in review. . . His had been a normal childhood, luckier than most perhaps. From the beautiful plantations of Mississippi his family had moved to Texas. Farm life and a country school. Most vividly he recalled Theresa who sat in front of him, long flaxen braids that his fingers itched to dip into the nearby inkwell. Yet in his thoughts he had admired her, dared to consider her his girl. Braving the laughter of others one day, he had offered his lunch to share. A happy boy, Hall came whistling home only to find they were moving again to Oklahoma in new territory. Entering adolescence he had gone through the crisis of religious fervour common to so many sensitive youths; then again there was THE GIRL. Both were soon forgotten, however, when a college story made Hall determined to enter the state university. It was Rex his roommate who persuaded him to accept his first blind date. Waiting for the girl, he was conscious that he was only a gawky country boy washing dishes and tending furnaces to pay his way. And then Rita came to him, eyes laughing, humming the latest popular song despite the fact that several years older than himself, she was an instructor of classical music. Spring, a pretty girl, music and a stroll through the garden afterwards—never again would Hall believe that he could be as happy as that night. But then came Rose and he had drifted into an engagement with her. Caring only for the present, Hall was content but his practical fiancee made him consider the disadvantages of marriage while their education was incomplete. When they left the theater one night, Hall became conscious of dissatisfaction. He didn't want to tie his life; he wanted glamour, freedom to soar. In a little town school-teaching, Hall succeeded in forgetting her. There was another girl to console him and just when he comes dangerously near to pledging himself once more, America entered the war. To his colleague, Harton, Hall spoke of his conflict between patriotism and convictions against war. The first won and his rejection because of a minor hand injury only strengthened his determination. So Hall set off for France, an officer at last. His fellow soldiers had liked him, he remembered gratefully. Leaves were pleasant—admiring girls and places which he had never hoped to visit for years. Only the shooting, the destroying of lives, placed terrific strain on his nerves; never quite could he become an automaton. The wounds which nearly shattered him physically were almost a relief. The years at college, traveling from one to another for graduate work, were quiet happy ones that passed in swift review. Several times he had been in love again but jealousy he guarded his freedom. . . With a groan Hal straightened. Never had he cared for anyone in this fashion. Fortunately, Mildred would never know; thinking of him only as an old friend of Rita, her mother. Helen Sawyer, his assistant, entered at this point. Suddenly Hall flushed. Last night he had become engaged to her in sudden panic and now in a haze he listened to the words which told him that Mildred and Stanley were pledged. Suddenly, he felt relief. A second April can never return and with his contemporary there could be happiness, security from the stormy years that are youths'.

THE CHILD WIFE

Inez M. Gaylord Drama File No. 12347

WITH worried eyes Mrs. Lamb watched her daughter Elsie approach. For months she had seen her daughter see-saw between her choice of husbands for there were two who offered themselves to her. Determined that Elsie should live her own life, Mrs. Lamb said nothing. Tonight Elsie had promised to decide for both men would be at the dance. It was still too dark to determine whether it was Dick or Herbert. Then the light flashed onto the features of the youth who hung behind Elsie as they neared, a little shyly. Mrs. Lamb threw her arms first about Elsie and then with overwhelming relief over Dick. While they had coffee, Dick with twinkling eyes reminded her that probably his father would be pleased. It was no secret that once Frank had been in love with Elsie's mother. Wouldn't she tell them the story now? Far, far into the past travelled Mrs. Lamb's memories. . . Tragedy came when she was fourteen. With the death of her mother all responsibility for the household was thrown upon her shoulders. Father was a plodder who worked hard in the mill but never succeeded in advancing. Chet one of the older brothers inherited his violent temper. There was the Saturday when he nearly choked the frail girl who in the rush of work failed to have dinner quite ready. Brother Bill rushed out and called for help and neighbors who rescued her threatened dire punishment if the scene should repeat itself. That night as the hurt child crept away by herself Frank the neighbor boy joined her and from that day on appointed himself her protector. The first rift came when a new organization took over the mill and Ed, the manager's step-son, saw Elizabeth on her way to the post-office. He made every effort to meet her and at last succeeded. Elizabeth who knew nothing of love and very little of tenderness soon succumbed to his flattering attentions. Although Frank, two years older, begged her not to take Ed seriously, she insisted on going with him. Disliking him Chet in a temper left the household for good. When Ed took her to see his mother she too objected for she had her heart set upon a wealthy match. Still, she refused to take it seriously for after all Elizabeth was extremely young. Infatuated, one night Elizabeth allowed herself to be persuaded to rush off to the next town and be married. At first they made their home with her father but Mr. Lamb senior objected and the young couple moved in a home of their own. Before the bewildered bride could realize she found her house constantly filled with her mother-in-law's friends. She felt nothing more than a maid. One night she met Frank again—Frank whom she looked upon as a dear brother—and to comfort her loneliness he stopped by often. To her amazement Ed rushed home early one day and in a fury of jealousy accused them falsely. Only her pleas stopped Frank from knocking him down. After that, Elizabeth rebelled at being little more than a general housekeeper. When little Elsie was born it was to be the last in years that she saw him for stopping by, to say farewell he found her in childbed with no help and forced Ed to obtain some. Since then the child wife made her daughter her life; her husband too intent on his labors to intervene after she successfully wrestled her daughter's upbringing from the interfering older woman. . . : Now in Elsie and Dick the fulfillment denied Elizabeth and Frank would be theirs.

ROBERTA was busy giving the last finishing touches to the new apartment. Since her mother's death she was housekeeper and was well content to stay at home when her high school days were over. "Little mother," Mr. Kent fondly called her when he came home weary at the end of the day to be comforted by her. Mr. Whitcomb, their neighbor knocked at the door. They had arranged to share their electric meter together but suddenly the current had been shut off. To Roberta's inquiries, Mr. Whitcomb complained that he had expected to be paid at once before time. The girl blushed in anger at the insinuation that they might try to cheat anyone and with all the dignity she could muster reached for the purse. This did not spare her a day later from overhearing Whitcomb discuss the girl with a stranger to her. She heard her father's name and then the word, "Cheap!" Hot with indignation, Roberta opened wide the door and confronted the startled men. In furious outburst, she called Whitcomb to terms but half way through while the other was too surprised to retort, Roberta burst into tears of mortification. The younger man leaped to her side and attempted to apologize but Roberta pushed past him and loudly slammed the door. That evening while she was bustling about preparing dinner, Roberta was startled by the ringing of the doorbell. Their friends were very few for the Kents had chosen a new city after the tragic loss of the wife, and Roberta wondered. Opening the door, however, Roberta was startled when a messenger boy delivered a large box of flowers. Although she protested that it must be a mistake, the boy had already vanished. In the box was a card of apology from the young man of before, signed Dennis King. Aloud Roberta repeated the name; she liked it. Amazed, she heard herself mimiced. Looking about for strangely the voice seemed to come from the apartment, Roberta suddenly saw the owner of that name nonchalantly sitting on the fire-escape outside the dining room window. Before Roberta could quite take in the situation, Dennis entered the room and bowed deeply. Roberta was unable to restrain her laughter and the voices of the two young people pealed merrily. With satisfaction, Dennis asked, "Friends?" What could you do with someone like that Roberta inquired of an unanswering world. So when Mr. Kent came home he found Dennis also at the dinner table. Resisting further invitations, Roberta sent him away early. The one thing that disturbed her was the fact that he was a nephew of the Whitcombs. After that time, Dennis was a regular visitor. Together they attended concerts and the theater, finding that their tastes were delightfully harmonious. Came one lovely Sunday when the two went strolling through the park zoo, fingers carelessly entwined. Overhearing someone comment on the charming pair of lovers, Roberta blushed but Dennis said in low tones, "We are; aren't we?" But Dennis failed to keep the next appointment or write any explanation. Three weeks passed and Roberta cried herself to sleep each night. One evening she woke to find the apartment in flames. After sounding the alarm she later dared the blaze to save the Whitcombs' child. Just before she dropped into unconsciousness, she said wildly, "Cheap, are we?" Not until morning was it known that she would live. Then from the penitent Whitcomb, Roberta learned that Dennis had asked his Uncle to deliver a message that he was called away on business. Suddenly the door opened. In a moment she was safe in her lover's arms.

LEAP YEAR

Bertha F. Morris Drama File No. 12251

SWINGING his shoes over his shoulders, Jack wades across a swamp. Hearing shouts of laughter, he sees a gay group of picnickers. A dog chases him, and as he runs, he upsets the lunch taking two pies and a plate of sandwiches. After a cooling swim, Jack repents this theft, although he reflects that it is nothing compared to the robbery he plans to commit. With a shade of bitterness, Jack recalls that upon his graduation, his father had promised him one thousand dollars; two weeks before this event, this erratic parent, whom the boy had always regarded as his closest pal since his mother's death, married again. His young step mother disapproved of this graduation gift, and Jack had taken to the open road. In a "flop house" he had met Pete, who persuaded him to assist in a robbery at Hills Station. Carrying the sandwiches, Jack steals aboard a freight train and falls into a fitful slumber. He is awakened by a youth dressed in shabby overalls and an oversized rough neck sweater. Timidly the stranger confides that he feared Jack's appearance and stayed outside until the cars almost collided. When Bobby, his companion's name, asks for part of the lunch, Jack gladly shares it with this attractive youth of eighteen. As they ride together, Bobby confides that his step mother forced him from home. For a time he begged, then stole milk until the cops caught him, and he was forced to escape from them on a train.

In turn, Jack reveals his plans, adding that the two of them will handle the robbery without Pete. Arriving in town two hours ahead of the appointed time, Jack and Bobby walk to the Mahon Mercantile Corporation, entering through an unlocked window as they arranged to do. Bobby is stationed outside. In dismay, Jack finds that the robbery has already been committed and returns with only a package of cigarettes for his pains. As the two are leaving the spot they encounter three men, also headed for the railroad tracks. Becoming frightened, the men run, throwing a satchel on the ground, which Jack picks up. Hastily he and Bobbie board a freight train; as they are crossing the tracks, Bobbie falls, sustaining a painful knee injury, but gamely saying nothing. Exhausted, Bobbie falls into a deep slumber as the train pulls out. Eagerly Jack inspects the satchel and discovers that it contains the money from the mercantile corporation! He turns to Bobbie, whom he discovers sleeping soundly. As he is hiding the money in Bobbie's knapsack, Jack finds a pair of women's oxfords and unmistakably feminine lingerie. Shaking Bobbie, Jack demands an explanation as he reads the name Roberta Talmadge in a notebook. Sleepily, Bobbie sits up; the cap falling off reveals long, golden curls.

"Now that I find you're a girl I'll have to return this money in order that they won't arrest you," Jack says in annoyance. Secretly he is relieved to find this excuse. When he turns the money over to police, Jack finds that his father, who has been searching for him, is ready to give him the thousand dollars. In addition, he and Bobbie receive a reward for the return of the booty. "What shall we do now?" Jack demands. "Let's get married," Bobbie suggests, impishly. "This is Leap Year, you know." And as the girl nestles in his arms, Jack finds her suggestion a very good one.

SO WONDERFUL

Thelma Mastebrook Drama File No. 12359

HUMMING a little tune as she turned on the radio in her tiny apartment, Gloria was glad that today was Sunday. The masquerade dance at the home of Mr. Drew, her employer, had not broken up until the early morning hours. Her cheeks flushed with memory for a moment as she hoped that Mr. Drew would forget the incident between them. There had been many dressed in similar costume with the devil robe a favorite. She had danced with one of them several times before she was snached away by an eager horde of young men. Before they swept her away, Gloria promised that if he could identify her at unmasking time, Gloria would permit him to escort her to dinner. In the garden she unmasked only to find that her companion had been Mr. Drew. Much the worse for liquor, Drew tried to kiss her and Gloria hastily withdrew. However, Mrs. Drew saw them and bitterly assailed the girl who fled from the scene. Still, that was in the past said Gloria to herself as she reached for the Sunday paper outside her door. Headlines shrieked the news that Drew the wealthy operator had been kidnapped and a large sum of ransom demanded. That afternoon police called at Gloria's apartment but she was unable to contribute any information. In a daze, Gloria came to the office the next morning, busy answering the inquiries of solicitous inquirers. Afternoon found Gloria under arrest as an accomplice. After the demanded sum was paid, Mr. Drew was delivered—dead. An accompanying note showed that the demand was written on Gloria's machine. Mrs. Drew charged her with choosing this method when she failed to compromise her husband. Mrs. Hepburn, Gloria's mother, and her younger sister, Betty knew nothing of the tragedy until reporters flooded the house with questions before a telegram arrived. The two took the first train and a sympathetic police captain—after their interview with Gloria—recommended young Jim Cartright, son of a police chief in a neighboring town, for a lawyer. During the next few weeks, Jim who had fallen in love with his client, trailed every olue, convinced that Gloria was innocent. The day the trial opened he was secretly discouraged for no new evidence had been found. On the stand, Mrs. Drew insinuated that her husband and Gloria had been conducting an affair; he had never given a party for his employees until Guoria came. Leaping to his client's defense, Jim brought out the reluctant confession that she herself had become engaged while working in Drew's office. In detail, Mrs. Drew related the scene in the garden while Gloria was unable to produce anyone who saw her go home at the hour claimed. Meanwhile, Chief Cartright was summoned to the cell of Duke Wellington, dope peddler. Hungry for the drug which had been denied him, Duke promised to talk on the Drew case. The next day, Jim announced a surprise witness. Seeing him, Mrs. Drew sought to escape but police held her while Duke testified that Drew's wife hired him to kidnap her husband since he denied her money upon learning she was a drug addict. When Drew resisted he was accidentally killed and the wife resolved to cast suspicion on Gloria. Freed, the happy trio went home with Gloria for a rest. Soon Jim paid a surprise visit and confessed his love while in the other room his father who had accompanied him suggested to widow Hepburn that they follow young love's example.

PAID

Marie Zick Drama File No. 12138

WHILE his fiancee softly protested, Max insisted upon collecting all the checks of the friends gathered around the table of the ice-cream parlor. It was late Saturday night when the last movie house had closed but the young couples sought to postpone the hour of parting. Grace had known Max for several years and only his constant open handedness had prevented their marriage from taking place earlier. Before he left her that night, Grace sighed and Max quickly understanding what was passing through her mind reminded her that only a few weeks more and they would be husband and wife. Her small savings had been added to her mother's wedding gift and they made first payments on a house. For months Grace was delighted in her new role until the day that she dreaded arrived. Hours passed before Max came stumbling home in a well advanced stage of intoxication. And Grace waiting to tell him the precious secret of the child stirring within, wept softly. For so long she had been afraid of this yet Max promised. The next day they were reconciled; but three years later found Max out of work and despondent—turning more and more to drink. There were two children to tend and when Max went to work in a speakeasy owned by Mary Leroy, Grace was silent. Yet her heart was near to breaking when oleaning out his pockets one night she found evidence that Mary was more than an employer to Max. He was like a stranger in the house returning only to sleep, until one evening he returned in a wild rage. Mary discharged him for drinking too much. Finally, Grace whose love still remained assented to place a mortgage on the little home and with this Max opened a speakeasy. For a while he prospered but then their income dwindled. With his old weakness, Max could not say "no" to a friend, trusting many of them with long accounts and loaning money to others. Shortly before he was to sign a new lease with Lawyer Morse, the representative of Mrs. Arnst. the owner of the building who also held the mortgage to the home, Max was raided. A padlock was placed on the door and Max assigned for trial. Returning to his senses at last, Max rushed about in a vain hopeful attempt to collect enough on his debts to secure food and lodging for his family. But the men ignored his pleas and Max went to prison, knowing that even in this he had failed. Heartbroken, Grace was to learn that Morse had tricked Max into signing a new lease and the new debt was overwhelming in a household down to its last bit of food. Yet the thought of her children strengthened her, so Grace went to the mayor of the city for help; in her handbag a dispossess notice. The mayor declared that first she would have to collect the two thousand dollars which Max's customers owed. With a note from the mayor, Grace went to Justice of Peace Baker and secured judgments. Albert, a bar tender, who had tricked Max while drunk out of seventy dollars invited her in his place while he was alone. Sending him for a drink, Grace made off with the money she felt justly hers. When Grant tried to fight payment, Grace silenced him into submission with an inoriminating letter she found. Bit by bit she found ways of collecting but only the lease remained. At a notorious roadhouse where she was selling the fixtures from Max's old establishment, she made off with the coat of Morse, whose reputation would be hurt if his presence had been made generally known. The next day the lawyer grimly destroyed the contract. When Max came home, jealous at the gossip he had heard, Grace triumphantly waved the book marked "paid in full." And when her story was finished there was new purpose and determination in Max's eyes to be everything that his wife desired.

THE RUSH OF WINGS

Elmer Augustine Waller, Jr.

Drama File No. 12137

GRUFFLY, the captain looked at the stowaway and then with dawning surprise he said, "Why, he's only a boy!" The boy defiantly straightened, protesting that he was perfectly capable and desirous of working out his passage to Australia. When asked why he chose to go there, Rush Taylor was silent. His thoughts had flown many miles away to the time when he was a small boy, seeing his first airplane at a country fair. The roar of the motor had made him scream but not with fear as his father thought, but rather with joy and desire to sail away tucked in the large wings which had begun to soar gracefully to the clouds. During the next seven years, Rush picked up everything on aviation he could find. Pioneers were still experimenting in this field and on Saturdays Rush spent his hours happily busy in a work shop carving miniature planes. With his sister, Rush had faithfully attended the services of the Catholic Church. There St. Joseph was his patron saint, he felt that he would understand the hunger to become an aviator. But as the years went on and no miracle happened to make this possible, Rush had gradually determined to run away to a far country where he could make his fortune and enter an aviation school. The impatient rap of the captain's pencil brought Rush back to the present. No, he could not reveal his dream. So Rush found himself transferred to another ship bound back to America and a reform school. The gloom of his days lightened when he made his first friend, Anita Withers, a school girl returning from Paris. One day she followed his intent eyes watching an airplane overhead and guessed the secret love hidden to everyone. Before they left, she whisperd that some day Rush's dream would come true. Rush was startled, wondering how it was possible for her to understand what none other did. In the reformatory, Rush was sullen, sulking by himself, until brought to the machine shop. There Madison his teacher told the youth that he could make anything he wanted. Viewing the array of tools, Rush stammered his amazed incredulousness at the good-fortune befallen him. Watching the clever fingers begin on the first part of his model plane, Madison rejoiced. A few days later he revealed that Anita, his niece, had written to him and told of Rush. Unknown to the boy, when the model plane was completed Madison sent it off to a large aviation corporation which was holding a contest. First prize was won by Rush which entitled him to a three year course in aviation school; and the boy's parole was readily received. Rush had no time for girls during those years; every inch of him intent upon the fulfillment of his dream. The day he took his first solo, Rush stumbled alone to a church where his patron saint smiled benignly. Graduation Day, Rush was amazed to see Madison and Anita in the audience. Although he had not planned to attend the hop that night, Rush gratefully followed Madison's suggestion and took her. The music and the girl went like wine to his head. He kissed her and for a moment she yielded before pushing him away while she dully told him that she was engaged. Soon after war was declared and Rush promptly enlisted with the Canadian forces transferring to the American air-craft later. There he became known as the ace flyer without nerves or a heart. Only St. Joseph knew that his heart was with Anita. A day came though when he cracked with three enemy planes on top. Rush felt the spin of falling wings and knew nothing more until he returned to consciousness on a hospital bed to find that Anita was his nurse. Time was to later reveal that the engagement was broken and both loves—aviation and Anita—were to be his.

FLYING MADNESS

Herbert L. Fong Drama File No. 12198

ALL New York is tense, jubilantly awaiting the docking of the ship which brings in the nation's famous fliers, home from the World War. Covered with medals from grateful foreign governments, Lt. James York eagerly paces the deck with Harry Muir, his brother-in-law. Harry is first to see Elsie and breaks through the lines at the gangplank to embrace his wife. Hastily hugging her, James looks about for his mother only to learn that she has died six months ago. "But where is Verna?" queried James, sure that his fiancee would be waiting nearby. For a few seconds Elsie was silent before haltingly disclosing that Verna is on a honeymoon trip with another. After reading the note waiting at home from Verna, James drinks himself into a stupor. For days he comes home late at night in shattered, sodden condition. At Elsie's instigation, Harry pleads with James to brace up and face life again. The tears of his beloved sister bring him to his senses and James promises to begin search for work at once. Moodily, he walks along downtown New York wondering what he is qualified for outside of aviation. Surprised by a gentle tap on his arm, James turns to meet Charlie Wong, young Chinese, who has been seeking him. In Wong's rooms, James agrees to head the small air forces of General Yuen Hong who is leading a successful rebellion in China. Two days later on board ship James meets a lovely dark haired girl whom he is amazed to learn is Chinese, Lae Mae Yung. The first evening together she repulses his kiss but the next evening, James finds her alone on the dock and apologizes for his behavior only to learn that sweet Lae is in love with him. Forgotten are all the racial barriers that lie between; Verna is only a bitter memory and Lae the girl of his dreams. When they dock at Shanghai, James promises to follow her to her home-province, Soochoue, and ask her hand in marriage. On the way there the next day, James who is fascinated by the country insists on walking a few streets. His presence saves a Chinese dignitary from fatal injury when James sights a Chinese preparing to throw a bomb at the official who is surrounded by soldiers. Throwing himself upon the assassin, James deflects his aim. Misunderstanding, soldiers attempt to arrest the lieutenant who is saved by the man he rescued, Lee S'yun, who insists on bringing him home to dine. Deciding to postpone his arrival at Lae's home for another hour or two, James is amazed to meet his host's daughter, none other than his sweetheart. Although they explain that they have met before, Lae warns James not to confess their love as yet. Always before her father has seemed determined against marriage. Called away on business, Lee begs James who must return to Shanghai the next morning to stay at his home. More madly in love than ever, James leaves for General Yuen's camp. A few nights later when Yuen's men are trapped, James first realizes that he is fighting against the forces of the man he hopes to have for a father-in-law. Desperate, Yuen orders James to bomb the dam which will destroy not only the enemies but thousands of innocent people. Instead, James destroys the canyon which blocks the rebels path to freedom. In revenge after furious combat, James is shot down but not before bringing to destruction Yuen who was seeking escape to safety by plane. James awakes to consciousness in a hospital; near him is Lae and her father. Because of his deed, the Chinese government has pardoned James and offers the position of government head of the aerial forces. After receiving consent to their marriage, James agrees. Then it is revealed that Lae is not Chinese but the daughter of a missionary whose wife entrusted her baby daughter to S'yun when death came. But to James kissing passionately his bride as the boat sails to America on their honeymoon, she will always be his fair Chinese flower, he whispers.

A WOMAN'S REVENGE

Grace Hayne Short Subject File No. 12205

PRETTY Joan Warren was toying with her grapefruit, oblivious of the admiring eyes of the two men who sat in a corner. One was good old Frank, the Greek, whose name neatly lettered on the window proclaimed him as proprietor. Propped up against the sugar bowl was a newspaper which declared in large headlines that the Terror was on the prowl again. For weeks he had been haunting the north side evading all police efforts. Even while she read the shrill clang of a police car sounded through the silent streets, announcement to many that another case of jewel theft had been reported against the Terror who concentrated all efforts upon lone women, snatching their jewels and handbags. The newspaper account went on to explain that a young woman whose name had been withheld by the police had been the latest victim. However she coolly insisted that since it was necessary for her to return late nights from evening classes at college she should be permitted to carry a pistol. The commissioner had granted consent. Here Joan patted her hand bag and a look of anger crossed her face. Suddenly she looked up to see young Bill staring down at her. Wearily, she pushed a chair to him. "At my heels again?" she asked. Shamefacedly, Bill nodded but no sooner was he seated than he again broke into earnest protests. He couldn't live without her. At least she might be nice to him. Was there anything particularly objectionable in him? Joan examined him closely and then shook her head seriously before breaking into a merry laugh. Again the man with Frank stared, eyes expressing admiration. The girl caught the glance but turned away. Finally she spoke. "You're nice Bill but you're much too young. Oh, I know that you're a few months older but a girl is different." Here Joan rose before Bill could protest though he sprang to his feet. However, she refused to permit him to accompany her. Always she liked to return at night alone fearless of the dark; strong and independent despite all her feminine charms which made her so popular. Through the swinging doors she went. To the inquiring glance of his companion Frank answered that she was the finest girl he had ever met. Daughter of a widow she had long learned to stand on her own feet. The sort of girl that would make a splendid wife some day; no matter what anyone said. "There is something about these modern girls," he said. The rest of the sentence was unfinished but the other nodded in understanding. Meanwhile Joan walked on to the next corner. Here there were only houses and dim lights which shone from upper windows. Time for all good people including herself to be asleep, she murmured. With a start she realized that stealthy footsteps were behind her. Slowly increasing her pace until she neared the street light, Joan suddenly turned. "Didn't I warn you I'd kill you if I ever saw you again?" she almost shouted in fury. The pistol found its aim in the dark. Five minutes later the door opened in the restaurant. Joan coolly announced that she had fatally shot a man and an officer had best be called. The other man took charge of the situation when Frank looked stunned and introduced himself as District Attorney Calhoun. At his offer of help, Joan declared that she was not afraid but glad of the deed. Just then an officer entered to announce that the Prowler, identified by stolen jewels in his pocket had been found dead. Driving home that night Joan almost forgot about the reward in the pleasure of having Calhoun escort her and that tomorrow she would see him again. "And I'll take you home then too," he said firmly with a meaning glance.

STUNT GIRL

Madeleine Cook Drama File No. 12372

EIGHTY—ninety—one hundred, inch by inch the speed car driven by Donald Stewart shot ahead amid the jubilant cheers of the thousands who had followed the career of the new speed king. That night Donald sneaked off early from the banquet given in his honor and went to meet Rose, the girl of his dreams. The door of her apartment was slightly ajar and thinking to surprise her Donald slipped in. Only one dim light glowed in the far corner of the room yet it was sufficient for him to realize that before him was the girl he considered his fiancee locked in a tight embrace with Paul, his best friend For a moment he swayed while the two parted quickly and looked at Donald in shivering dismay. Wordlessly, he tossed the ring which he had bought only a few hours before with the anticipation of presenting it tonight and flung it at her feet. Driving home Donald was like a man insane and it was small wonder that he should have experienced his first accident. Though it was not Donald's fault inwardly he felt himself to blame. From that evening on, Donald was not heard of on the tracks again. He completely disappeared from sight. Meanwhile in the far west, lovely Midge Farrel was making a name for herself as a daring stunt performer. She followed the auto races and competed in the races for dangerous tricks carried out on a running board of a fast moving car. Out of the many applicants for drivers she had chosen Ross. It was not long before she discovered that he had a weakness for drink yet he continued to drive her efficiently so Midge retained him although others remonstrated. She had been flirting with death so long that all sense of fear was lost. She was particularly happy the evening before the big annual race offering the largest prize of the year, confident of winning it. Dining at her home while Mammy the cook-housekeeper hovered over her, Ross rudely broke into her tranquility by attempting to make passionate love. Angrily, she thrust him away; the slap on his cheek was visible. Twenty minutes before the race Ross had not yet showed up. A check-up at the hotel revealed that Ross had gone. Midge ran to the railroad freight cars a few yards away and desperately called to the hoboes; was there anyone who could drive a car? His pulses quickened when he saw her though Donald stayed silent but her eyes had found his also. Unable to resist her pleading tones as she swiftly explained Donald changed into Ross' clothes and marvelled at the girl's courage as he drove her to victory. Midge insisted on taking him home with her and from that evening it was taken for granted that Don would be her regular driver. However, he kept his past a secret. Their tenth consecutive victory had passed and as Midge hoped Donald had proposed and was accepted. Then leaving the tracks he was accosted by Ross who jealous, framed a marriage certificate to prove Midge was his wife. Donald took the next train to Chicago and Ross gained back his job with Midge whose zest for life was gone. Learning that Midge was to perform at the World's Fair, Donald was unable to resist attending. As the program continued to be delayed, from inquiries Donald learned that Ross had just been arrested by a woman who claimed to be his abandoned wife and that his relations with Midge were purely business. Revealing his identity, Donald was readily admitted behind the scenes. There he found Midge—to vow his love again and drive the stunt girl to another triumph.

SISTERS

Bess I. DeRushia Mystery File No. 12357

BETTY is dead! Over and over Jane whispers this in the arms of her fiance Herbert, who seeks to comfort her. A little while ago they have been so happy at the family reunion. True, Betty looked more wan and thinner than she had ever been while Marian looked radiant. They had teased Bob, accusing him of mistreating her, but her dentist-husband pretended to grow angry at this charge. Suddenly Betty fainted in her mother's arms. Herbert, a physician, has the unwelcome task of breaking the tragic news. Temporarily, he makes out a certificate of heart failure. At Jane's insistence together they look once more at the corpse. Noticing with surprise that the part in Betty's soft, pretty hair is crooked, Jane insists on recombing it. Against her will she gives a sudden cry for there is a soft blue mark like the remains of a blow covered near the temple. She sees again, against her will, the half-triumphant look on Marian's face. In the living room again, Herbert insists that she unburden herself. Something is troubling her. Anxious not to hurt Marian but unable to keep her fears any longer—when Herbert promises to remain silent—Jane speaks of memories that go back to childhood. . . Until the event of Betty, Marian is the petted favorite, the baby of the household. From the first Betty was such a lovely child that everyone lost their hearts to her. Jane never realized how resentful Marian felt until one day she finds Marian slapping Betty, venting all her anger and resentment. Then and in the future, Betty, bewildered, made no effort to fight back. She would creep in a corner and silently weep over each new doll which Marian maliciously broke.

Punishment did no good and big sister Jane only hoped that Marian would outgrow it. When they returned from boarding school however it was always Marian now who wore the nicest clothes for she pocketed the largest share of their allowance. Marian was a sophomore at college when Betty was sent there. For a while their letters were happy ones for Marian had developed a striking dark beauty of her own which made her popular; she could afford to be generous. Then letters from them revealed that both were in love withe same man. Bob Crater, a dental student. It was to be Betty who became engaged to him and when he returned home with her the family accepted him as a son and brother, despite the fact that soon letters came, unsigned, blackening Bob's character. In a scene with Jane who suspected, Marian confessed. She refused to attend the wedding, claiming that she must report to the nursing school where she enterd training. When Betty became ill, notified, Marian offered her services. Despite the doctor's orders Marian secretly gave treatment which nearly resulted in Betty's death. Before Bob, Jane accused Marian and ordered her to stay away. Bob refused to believe this and when the couple left for California to continue Bob's studies, Marian accompanied. Frightened at Betty's appearance when they returned. Jane found a suspicious bottle of powder in Marian's trunk. . . To reassure Jane, Herbert examines this and finds it harmless. The report several nights later leaves Jane more light-hearted until she passes the half open door of the bathroom and sees Bob tenderly combing Marian's hair with the same crooked part she had noticed on Betty. Accusing him of murder, Bob tries to choke her but Herbert rescues her. In the excitement the police are called. Bob confesses that he killed her with a poisoned filling after she discovered he and Marian were having an affair.

ACROSS THE BORDER

Marie T. Kleine Melodrama File No. 12371

DRIVEN by Clifford, the son of the owner of the farm house, the rattling Ford discharges its latest group of summer boarders. Among them are Alfredo Manitoba and Peter Snub whose glances meet significantly when they are introduced to Beatrice, daughter of the Naughtons. Soon all the neighboring Vermont residents know that these two are rivals for the hand of the pretty girl who has always been too busy before to bother with men. In the beginning Beatrice treats them with equal favor but gradually Alfredo who boasts of his family's wealthy estates in Mexico is favored. Business forces Peter to leave earlier than he anticipated and on his last night he beseeches Beatrice to give him some hope. Sadly she shakes her head and Peter leaves with the barren comfort that Alfredo is also leaving shortly. However, Alfredo lingers on and one night under the warm romantic moon the two pledge their troth. A telegram comes for Alfredo who is called to New York. In his letter to Beatrice he declares that his people are dead and he has inherited a good share of their fortune. Meanwhile Peter glumly reads the announcement of their engagement but he is not given long to brood. A special detective, Peter is called in to break up an unknown gang of white slavers. Though the marriage takes place, Alfredo finds reasons for delaying the trip. Only Mr. Naughton does not believe the glowing tales of his new son-in-law who frequently takes extended trips to New York and on various pretexts leaves Beatrice at home. When a year later his baby son is placed in his arms, Alfredo shows little interest. Beatrice seeks solace in her child, fearing that she has lost his love. Then one day Alfredo calls her from New York, ordering her to pack and meet him at once; they are leaving for Mexico. That night the mother has a dream which makes her fearful but Beatrice only laughs. In Mexico they go to a large house and the baby is given to a servant while Alfredo laughs at her fears. She is escorted to her room and Alfredo promises to return shortly. Hours later the worried Beatrice tries the door only to find it securely fastened. Several weeks later after not hearing from her daughter, Mrs. Naughton persuades Clifford and her husband to go to the Mexican city which was Beatrice's destination. The police know of none with that name. Just as the two are turning away, worried as to their next step, they bump into Peter. Upon inquiry, they make known their purpose and Peter gently breaks the news that he has just discovered Alfredo is the head of a white slave gang which he has been trailing. Learning that they fear for the child also Peter brings them to a hospital where they find baby John who was deposited there as a foundling. He prevails upon them to return with it to Mrs. Naughton who is gravely ill from worry. He will continue the search. Still weak from shock Beatrice is notified by the proprietor what sort of a place she is in. Unless she entertains the guests her child will be killed. The door opens for her first customer; Peter, who places a warning finger of silence on her lips. He helps her to escape and returns to conduct a raid in which Alfredo, resisting, is killed. It is Peter, too, who brings her home and witnesses the joyous reunion. The scene holds promise that someday soon Peter will help her to forget the unhappy past.

ONE IN A THOUSAND

E. H. Middleton Short Subject File No. 12373

STURDY Milly Brubaker laughs at the concerned tones of her friend over the telephone. Only one man in a thousand will ever hurt anyone and at this late age Milly isn't going to turn away hungry men because of fear. For years she has been living on the farm and nothing has ever happened. The phone goes dead suddenly. The cold must have affected the wires and shivering in anticipation, Milly bundles herself to go out and collect the eggs. The farmhouse kitchen is cheerful and comfortable. On the way, Milly picks up the Sunday papers once more and sadly shakes her head at the leering photograph of Holmes, wanted for kidnapping. Tossing it on the papers piled near the stove, Milly goes to the hen house. Starting back she first sees the two men waiting on her porch. With the depression there have been many traveling on the road stopping for hand outs, so Milly readily consents to give them a meal. She soon has fresh bacon and steaming eggs on the table. In the pantry cutting the pie, the man who calls himself Ed startles her with the question whether the phone is working. His sigh of relief at her answer puzzles her. Milly struggles to remember why Ed's face should seem so familiar yet he has claimed that the territory is new to him. Like a flash the picture in the paper recalls itself and the knife drops to the floor with a loud clatter. That Ed is Holmes, Milly is confident but she realizes that should they guess her suspicions they are ruthless enough to kill her. Pretending that she has cut her finger, Milly excuses herself long enough to think out a plan. Bringing in a big dish of homemade doughnuts, Milly filled their coffee cups again. Very nonchalantly she asked them to tend the house for a few minutes while she went down the road to deliver the milk for Mrs. Harrie' baby. The men nod indifferently but while she is gone, Holmes grows suspicious. Larry quiets him with the reminder that the farm is too isolated to keep up with the world; besides she'd never dare let them stay if she suspected. Meanwhile in the Harris' home, Milly has burst in without ceremony and orders Harris to call the sheriff when she learns that service has been restored on part of the lines. Hearing who her unwelcome guests are, Harris suggests accompanying her home but Milly refuses, afraid of awaking suspicions. For a moment she forgets her fears as she looks upon the white hairs of her friend and relates the ruse by which she stole away. The men are smoking in the kitchen when she returns and Milly suggests that they stay overnight. Upstairs she prepares a room for them, hoping that the sheriff isn't delayed. Noticing the time automatically, Milly turns on the radio to hear Amos and Andy, while she clears up. There is a break in the program and a sudden announcement that Holmes and a companion have been reported traveling along the farm district. Holmes jumps up when Milly's look of fright reveals that she knows them. In his anger Holmes is ready to choke her. Shouting to them to keep back, Milly throws the hot grease from the pan in their faces. While they scream in temporary blinded agony, the door swings open and the sheriff with his deputies take charge. The phone rings all evening with congratulations and Milly is heard explaining that indeed she'll still feed tramps. Only one in a thousand and she got two "bad apples" so there's nothing more to worry over. The law of averages holds.

THE BLOOD OF KINGS

J. Walter McKoy Drama File No. 12360

THE wrecked ship which cast Doctor Kane on the coast of South Africa is to open the train of destiny for Remi Haasan. In despair because his father, his last relative, went down with the ship, Doctor Kane seeks forgetfulness in living among the natives engaged in the bartering trade. While visiting a neighboring island Kane is attracted to a small light skinned youth whose attractive straight features are in strong contrast to the others. Questioning reveals that he has been found in a field and adopted by the tribe. Kane's offer to purchase the boy for a servant is accepted. Through his companionship. Kane gradually finds a new interest in life. With ready quickness the youth picks up the English language and it is not long before Kane thinks of him more as a son than servant. Remi's knowledge of the native language is immensely helpful and in a few years they are wealthy. On Remi's fifteenth birthday, Kane at last faces the problem that his adopted son's life must be made useful. His heart quickens with buried dreams of his own profession. When he sees Remi tenderly administer to a wild animal, hurt while being captured, Kane finds his answer. Remi shall become the great surgeon that Kane once hoped to be. Delighted with the prospect but saddened by th thought of leaving Kane, Remi sails for England to enter preparatory school. Easily adaptable he becomes a ready favourite with his classmates and goes to Oxford with a brilliant scholastic record. Through his roommate, Alfred St. John, Remi is dragged to his first dance. He has practiced the steps in his rooms secretly for days and is nearly terrified at the thought of attempting to dance with any of the pretty girls who hover about. St. John brings him first to his lovely cousin, Lady Margot, who sensing his shyness takes him under her wing. The evening is almost unreal to Remi who spends most of his time with her and begs timidly to see her again. Under the stimulus of his growing love for Lady Margot, Remi's work gains added brilliance. At the spring concert one evening, Remi can no longer keep silent and voices his emotions. To his joy Lady Margot responds but thinking of her family hesitates when he asks for a formal engagement. Home, Lady Margot broaches the subject only to learn that Dick Carthy, a jealous suitor, has reached her family first and prejudiced them against a marriage of members of two widely different races. Unable to bear the thought of hurting him and yet trained to obey her people, Lady Margot holds Remi off by pleading that he should devote all his time to his work. Instead he drops steadily in his classes until his advisor worried at the changed and thinking it may be latent homesickness has him meet Henri Barclay, noted educator, who is widely familiar with that country. Alfred has already admitted the true state of affairs to Remi who greets Henri in a despondent mood. Because Remi bears a startling resemblance to his ancestors, Henri is to identify him as a prince and the sole heir to the ancient Ethiopian kingdom of Loadecia. The news is widely publicized and among the batches of letters and telegrams is an invitation from Lady Margot's parents who seal their approval on the engagement. Kane pays a surprise visit to the happy couple with the news that Remi has been granted a year's leave of absence to complete his studies—then he and his bride are to take up the heritage of those who have the blood of kings.

THE SHINING GOAL

Viola Lytle Drama File No. 12258

WHEN young Charles Prent graduated from college professionally equipped to be a petroleum geologist, he had only one ambition—to reach the heights of professional success. Not long afterwards he met Lucy Devan, charming young widow, at a tea. Everything about her was pleasing, from her deep blue eyes to the way she held her tea cup. Lucy allowed him finally to escort her home. The two children, young Bob and Constance, were waiting and not long out of childhood himself, Charles soon made fast friends with them. That night he walked home though it was several miles, whistling in sheer delight. The world looked very good. Already he had started on the emotional road which was to end in marriage despite the fact that Lucy was ten years his senior. With his father a mill owner, Charles bided his time at practicing his own profession until the panic of 1907 ruined the business. Saddled with responsibilities, Charles worries were relieved when a newspaper advertisement announced that another oil field was opened in new western land. When Charles suggested that they go west, Lucy demurred at first but his exuberance and that of the children persuaded her. Through a friend, Charles obtained leases on large tracts of land owned by the Navajo Indians. Every cent that he could borrow or scrimp from any source he sank into the drilling of the land, confident that his instincts would not lead him astray. Meanwhile Lucy sought companionship with wealthy Tony Berges whose camp was nearby. The day that oil struck, Charles rushed home to proclaim that their fortunes were made. Instead he found only a note. Lucy could no longer bear her surroundings; she had left with Tony. The children had been brought to her Aunts. He might care for them if he choses. Out of the black days which followed came a ray of hope; both children begged to stay with him. It was at last decided wisest to allow Constance to stay with the relative and Bob with him until time to send him to Military School. Five years later found Charles wealthy beyond dreams. His petroleum plant and inventions kept thousands employed in the business which continued to grow faster than its competitors. Then came the summer when his girl was expected home and Charles prepared a stunning house. Finishing school and Europe had helped develop her into a beautiful girl yet with relief he found that there was nothing spoiled. Soon the house overran with young men and Charles was forced to laugh grimly at himself. Did other men, REAL fathers resent their daughter's beaus. Particularly did he object to young Tim who reminded him so oppresively of the youth he once enjoyed. Chiding her one day, he asked who his son-in-law would be and with a strange note Constance entered that she wanted nothing else but to stay with him always. For a wild moment he dared hope; yet it was nonsense; youth had a right to youth though he was only fourteen years older. Abruptly Constance left. Came the day when Charles found he had over-expanded and the bankers caught him in their cluthes. He sat alone, not a ruined man by any means but shorn of power by those who held more stock. Then it was that Constance was to return to him and make known the love she had held for him for years—not the love one has for a relation but for one's mate. Even when the people showed their belief and respect by electing him for Congress a few months later, Charles in the embrace of his fiancee knew that here alone was the shining goal to happiness.

LIFE BEGINS ANEW

Marry E. Middaugh Drama File No. 12244

HE was a newspaper reporter, cynical and tired of the nightly grind. Lonely in this strange city which had given him no opportunity to make friends, Tim had one drink too many before stepping off the curb. A woman pulled him back barely in time to save Tim from the wheels of the fast car which skidded around the corner and was soon lost to sight. The reporter nearly collapsed in Mae's arms as she dragged him to a nearby room, her own. After a does of black coffee Tim was able to look about him. The girl was young but the city had left the traces of a woman who belongs to the Oldest Profession. Abruptly, Tim asked her to talk to him. Defiantly, Mae hesitated but there was warm friendliness in his eyes. So she told him the story of her life. . . .

The family had been largc; desperately poor. Her earliest memories were caring for the younger children when she was scarcely a tot. Once the dishes had been too heavy to carry and with a loud crash they had crashed on the floor. That night her father took the strap to her in one of his drunken rages. Sobbing she had crept away to the comfort of her mother's weary arms—the mother who came from a good family and ran away to a disasterous marriage. She could recall another day when her father ordered everyone from the house. While the mother walked down the yard, he had gone after her with a knife. In the struggle which followed, he himself was accidentally hurt. Not yet in her teens she went to work in a boarding house, a kitchen maid. Mrs. Holyman, wife of a doctor, who was staying there for the summer befriended her. When it was time for the woman to leave she begged to adopt the girl but her mother refused. However, she did consent to permit her to take Mae and give her an education. Wildly happy the girl left, only to experience homesickness. On a visit home, word came that Mrs. Holyman had died and so another chapter ended. She was nineteen when she went to work as a domestic. Harry their son was the first boy she had really known. At his instigation, evenings they slipped away to the nearby picture house or on warm evenings just drove about the town. Too much in love; too trustful; nature played a sorry trick upon her. Harry refused to listen when she advised him that she was to have a child. The parents ignored her claims and Mae was forced to seek refuge with Hilda, a friend in another city. Here she first learned the primrose path of easy virtue. Mae hated it and yet it was necessary for her to provide for herself. When she fell ill she was taken to a hospital where her child was born dead. Well again, Mae determined to return to respectability and at last found work in a store. An acquaintance there took her on a blind date where she met Bill, a railroad man. To the simple girl he seemed her ideal and when he asked her to marry him a few weeks later she rapturously consented. But soon Bill changed; he was cruel to her, jealous of all other interests. The night he struck her for being polite to a clerk, Mae knew that everything was ended. Then a soldier came into her life. Again Mae dreamed until when he had won her love he confessed that he was already married though separated. But unless she came with him, Dick threatened to kill her and himself. Sparring for time, Mae told him she would give her answer that night. But instead a telegram came her mother was desperately ill. For days Mae went without sleep selfishly happy at the opportunity to nurse the on emost dear to her. After the funeral Mae sought new scenes and found a position as ticket agent with a railroad. But a bill was passed throwing women out of work to provided jobs for returning soldiers. Down to her last penny, Mae was forced to go back to a life she hated. . . The reporter's eyes were upon her as she finished her story. Suddenly he thought of his father's ranch out west where life might begin anew. When her eyes kindled as he told her, Tim made a sudden resolution. "Let's both start fresh—man and wife," he said.

SKY LOVERS

Jarmila Nosek Drama File No. 12368

IDOL of the younger aviators, Pop McGann has a weakness for the bottle. Knowing that J. P. Moran, owner of the Flying Aces Field, has strict rules against his men drinking, Jack Donovan sends out an emergency call for the other fliers when he finds McGann's plane damaged. A loyal crew, the boys respond and an hour later the ship is in shape for inspection. However, Moran finds a pint of liquor in the machine and asks who took the plane out. Jack steps forward to assume responsibility when Pop enters and confesses. Another chance is granted him. Two weeks later, the heartbroken young men are forced to break the news to Ginny, his motherless daughter, that Pop has fatally crashed. The boys wish to provide for her support but Moran who has raised his orphan nephew Al suggests adopting her himself. Ginny who has always held a silent crush for Al consents and the fliers pledge themselves to protect her. Four years later Ginny returns from finishing school determined to continue with aviation. She receives an uproarious welcome from the gang. All attend the theater that night where Al, forsaking aviation for music, is an outstanding hit as band leader and master of ceremonies. Flanked by the boys who hide her for a surprise, Ginny goes to his dressing room where a pleased Al greets his old friends. With delight he hugs Ginny to him while the socially prominent Lenore Druce looks jealously upon them. Sensing complications, Al introduces Ginny as his cousin. Though they go on several parties the gang does not care for Lenore and finally refuse to go with Al again since the parties serve liquor freely and this is forbidden them. Al promises his uncle not to go out on a plane again until he has stopped drinking. When Moran decides to go to Europe for a rest, Ginny insists on remaining behind, moving to the boys' boarding house, Likahome, tended by Mother Mack, wife of the night watchman. A week after Moran's departure, Al is notified that Ginny has been in a crackup and is calling for him. Notice comes just as Lenore and he are planning a pleasant weekend and the girl resents Ginny, particularly when he confesses there is no relationship. Jack prevents Al from wiring his uncle, reassuring him that nothing is wrong. In agony at Lenore's cold treatment, Al begs her to marry him. After several drinks she accepts him and Lenore's friends suggest that he fly a plane to celebrate. Hurt at their taunts when he refuses, Al goes to the airport and overcomes the efforts of Ricky, who is taking the place of Mack, home with a cold,—to prevent him from taking a machine. Back in Likeahome recuperating, Ginny hears the siren which is a warning of danger and insists on accompanying Jack and the others to the airport. She takes up a machine, joining the search party which locates the crashed plane. Al's eyesight is lost as a result of poor liquor and when Lenore breaks the engagement, only Moran who hastily returns restores him to some interest in life. To convince him that his public still cares so he will permit an operation, Ginny arranges a successful concert. During his recuperation, Al and Ginny become engaged. Jack who has always loved her resigns. Hearing this, Ginny realizes that she really cares for Al only as a brother and understanding, Al breaks the engagement. When Jack feels himself too poor to marry her, Ginny deliberately crashes. In the hospital all pride is swept aside and while Moran turns the airport over to Jack, Ginny and Jack blissfully plan their future.

THE LOST INHERITANCE

Mary Hilton Smith Short Subject File No. 12351

WHEN old John Davis leaves the courtroom where he has finished testifying to the sanity of a friend whose will the children are trying to break, he is determined that such a thing will not happen within his own family. That night he visits the home of Mrs. Grubbs, a friend of long standing, and tells her that he plans to divide the two farms he owns, opposite each other, between his two sons. Mrs. Grubbs tries to dissuade him but he only laughs and ignores her warnings. The next afternoon there is much rejoicing when the wives of Will and Edward learn that they have come into property. Only one stipulation is made. John wishes to make his home with each in turn and one of the finest bedrooms in each house is placed at his disposal. A few weeks later, Will's wife, Sarah, feels that they are now in a position to renovate the house. She is no longer satisfied with its present condition. When approached on the subject, John agrees to move to the attice until the painting and papering is completed. Often in the following days, John seeks refuge in the comfortable house of Mrs. Grubb and waits patiently for the time when he can move to his accustomed quarters. Soon Edward has his own troubles for his helpmate, Julia, feels that if the brother can afford to make changes so can they. Just as John hears with relief the notice that the carpenters and painters are through Sarah announces that her mother is coming to visit them. Surely John won't object to living in the attic a little longer or he might move over to Julia since it is almost time. Complaisantly, John approaches Julia only to learn that the painters are coming directly to her house. All she has at her father-in-law's disposal is the old shed. To add to his troubles it is not long before Sarah has John take his meals alone in the kitchen with the children and her own mother is given the best in the place. One evening when he calls upon Mrs. Grubbs he finds Judge Towne there and to him he tells his troubles. The trio put their heads together, and the next day the judge and John visit the bank. On the mother's birthday that weekend, easy going Will is aroused when he learns that no chair has been provided for his father at the celebration dinner and insists on sending his son Joe upstairs for him. Hearing footsteps, John opens the door and Joe glimpses him counting a large sum of money before he hastily puts it away as Joe enters. Pretending not to notice anything, Joe tells his mother and then confides in his cousin who in turn informs his parents. That night Mrs. Will Davis openly speeds her mother's departure. Two weeks later finds John a welcome guest in each house thought they remonstrate against his frequent visits to the widow, afraid that John may marry her. After John's sudden death, both families accuse each other of theft when they fail to find the money. They then blame Mrs. Grubbs who sues them for false accusation. In her defense the judge is to testify that in order to win consideration from his son's wives, John had borrowed money from him. As soon as he has evidence that the relatives know there is a chance of further inheritance, John refunded the money. A fainting Sarah and weeping Julia win no sympathy from the audience. The photograph of John seems to smile appreciatively as Mrs. Grubbs relates details of the trial to the picture which rests on her living room table.

CALL OF THE WORLD

Lily Fulmer Drama File No. 12374

LIKE a bright omen the sunlight streams through the open window of the church on a lovely summer day and touches the lovely face of Lilly Fullerton as she kneels at the altar—a bride. The face of David glows also with pride as he slips the ring upon her finger. Overhead the church bells peal. On their honeymoon David insists that they attend the hotel dance for nothing gives him greater pleasure than to see Lilly dressed in colorful garments, wearing the simple jewels that harmonize with her beauty. Together on the dance floor they make a handsome couple. With no evidence of jealousy, David permits her to dance with other men, glad that others approve the wisdom of his choice. Their little home is a center for their friends and weekends are gay ones. At late breakfast one Sunday morning, Lilly hears the church bells calling the people to worship. Neither have attended church regularly and it is only impulse which causes her to suggest that they go. At once David as always responds to her whim. When Minister Gregor invites his listeners to come before the altar, moved by strange feelings, David suggests that they follow the few who accept. In solemn voice the minister prays that his hearers seek salvation in Jesus; but to find God they must be born again. To Lilly his words mean the denial of everything which is worldly—the adornments and pleasures now hers. She would like to find salvation yet the price frightens her. Desperately she prays aloud after the others have returned to their seats. Gradually peace steals into he heart and she turns upon the congregation as one who has seen great wonders and visions closed to all others. As one in a trance she moves and the church is hushed while the minister declares that it is the Light of God shining in her eyes. David feels suddenly afraid and piteously tells Lilly that for the first time she is going through an experience which he cannot share. Lilly, pouring over the Bible which now holds new depths, cannot understand this attitude. Her bright clothes are put aside and Lilly greets him the next day in a dress of sombre hue. Wryly, David declares that she looks like a nun. He is unwilling to believe his ears when she refuses to go with him to the masquerade ball sponsored by his club. Lilly at last convinces him that she has given up these pleasures permanently. In a burst of temper new to him, David leaves the house and returns very late, stumbling from drink. A new harsh atmosphere enters the house the next weeks. David inflicts physical cruelties on Lilly and in a fit of remorse acknowledges that this is because he feels life cheated him. He has married Lilly because she was filled with life and now she is drab. Yet in religion, Lilly seeks solace though she still loves him. The climax comes one evening when Lilly is awakened by the voices of David and a strange woman. She goes downstairs in her bathrobe and finds David in amorous embrace. With her saddened eyes upon him, David is suddenly sobered and reaches for his companion's coat. Lilly spends a sleepless night in prayer. Sunday morning she is preparing for church when the thud of a body and David's moans are heard. He is unconscious with an empty bottle of poison beside him. Dr. Eron reveals that she alone can restore his will to live. Surely God will not demand so great a sacrifice, Lilly feels. David opens his eyes to see Lilly clad in the much loved dress of the past. Wordlessly Lilly promises to be once again the girl he fell in love with. Alone, however, she falls on her knees to ask forgiveness for responding again to the call of the world—fearful that this may mean the loss of all her hopes for heaven.

THE ANSWERING KISS

Jessie Cropley Drama File No. 12140

THE briskness of fall was in the air when Jimmie bade farewell to his sweetheart Molly. How fine he looked in that sailor suit, she thought and whispered delight at the impending marriage when his next trip closed. There was a stop to make in London and finding a letter requesting him to call on the Johnson Law firm, Jimmie left his companions. An hour later he crossed London Bridge unable to believe the good news that had fallen him. The words of the solicitor still rang in his ears—his uncle in Australia had left Jimmie his entire fortune. No wonder Jimmie did not hear the car which bore swiftly down upon him, brakes grinding as Jimmie's body sharply hit the ground. Dressed in street clothes there were no identifying papers on the victim. Weeks of treatment healed everything but memory. When Jimmie was well enough, the hospital gave him a position as orderly. Always cheerful, there were still many black moments when he tried hard to lift the veil from the forgotten past. Then one evening meal while carrying out a loaded tray of dishes, Jimmie slipped. He returned to consciousness hours later in his right mind; though the doctors at first doubted his sanity when he insisted on leaving at once for Ireland. But when Jimmie mentioned Molly who must be half-crazed waiting, they laughed and sped him on his way. He stopped only long enough to draw funds from the lawyers' office and buy gifts for his friends. With relief, Jimmie saw that Mrs. Murphy with whom Molly boarded was still at the familiar address. Sure enough she was in though she looked upon him as a ghost. After a hurried exclamation, he asked when Molly was expected. Mrs. Murphy was silent for a moment; she then told him that during the weeks of continued silence Molly had been heartbroken. The closet was filled with garments she had made for married life but the date set had come and gone. Jealous Nita who had always wanted Jimmie for herself told Molly that her lover was married to another but had been too ashamed to break the news himself. Grieving, Molly had entered Bealing Convent, prepared to become a nun. "She can't," cried Jimmie agonized. Upon this unhappy scene, burst in young Jean, Mrs. Murphy's daughter. Hostilely, she turned away from the greeting of Jimmie once her favorite. Recalling the many tears she had seen Molly shed, Jean attributed them to the faithless sailor. It took many moments to convince and pacify her; but through Jean Jimmie was to learn that Molly was expected to take the veil which would lock her permanently from the world, the coming Saturday. Since there was nothing that could be done now, Jimmie insisted on celebrating his wealth by taking the Murphys and their neighbors together with his old chum, Sandy, to dinner in the finest hotel the town boasted. The next day he called at the home of the convent's priest and begged him to notify Molly of his return. However, the request was refused since she was in retreat. Determined to enter the grounds, luck favored Jimmie when he found an advertisement for a cook at the convent. Persuading Sandy to help him dress in Mrs. Murphy's garments, Jimmie who took the sympathetic gardener into his secret obtained the place. Though the convent was busy, even the orphaned children helping, preparing for the event when the Church received its bride, he was unable to slip past the guarded doors. Molly was already at the altar when desperate, garments discarded, Jimmie strode up the aisle. With a glad cry, Molly sprang to him and before the others could act, Jimmie ran, half carrying her, to the waiting cab outisde the gate. . . The wedding was over; groom and bride waved to their friends as the plane prepared to take off to Australia. "Sorry?" whispered the happy Jimmie. The answering kiss of his bride left him quite content.

BACHELOR ROMEO

Coronel Verde Comedy Drama File No. 12424

MARTIN LESSING, captain of the marines stationed at Azua, Santo Domingo, is one of the most popular bachelors there. His desk is piled with invitations when two Dominicans enter. In the midst of the business conversation the telephone rings. It is Elizabeth Pascal, pouting because Martin has neglected to call her. Has he forgotten that there is a dance that night and he has promised to take her? With reassurances, Martin accompanies Elizabeth that evening, followed by the younger sister Margaret who has a secret crush on Martin. Suocumbing to the strong moonlight, Martin kisses Elizabeth while they walk alone in the garden. They are interrupted by Margaret who informs her sister that her partner for the next number is seeking her. Teasingly, Margaret reminds Martin that she has always considered him a big brother and she has always wanted to know what a brotherly kiss would be like. Martin starts to kiss her cheek but meets her lips instead. . . The next day Martin rising late is disturbed at breakfast by his friend Burt to whom he confides his troubles. Two girls in love with him at once he groans and sisters at that. How can he escape the entanglement gracefully? Both ponder on the problem when a telegram arrives transferring Martin to the capital. There Martin finds his reputation has already preceded him but he does not realize that gossip has him closely entangled in an engagement to Elizabeth.

Despite this Mrs. Richards determined to find a husband for her friend, Grace Crockin who is coming from the States on a visit, decides that Martin is the logical candidate. To prevent him from becoming intimate with any of the unmarried women in the city she arranges that Mrs. Delane should keep Martin's attentions centered on her. Easily the most attractive woman there, she has no difficulty. To Mrs. Delane it is a delightful game and when Martin displays jealousy upon finding her with Parker when he comes to tea, Mrs. Delane is flattered, and begins to reconsider her promise. Mrs. Richards brings Grace to the club to meet Martin and is indignant when he leaves them shortly to go to Mrs. Delane. In a violent scene later she accuses her friend of disloyalty. At the home of his commanding officer Haskel, Martin meets Nancy, Haskel's widowed sister who arrived on the same boat. Her dislike of social friviolity intrigues him and there is an old fashioned charm about her which lingers long after he has left the house. Mrs. Richards is encouraged the next day when he calls to take Grace out for a round of golf but when he excuses himself at lunch on the plea of another engagement she is sure that Mrs. Delane is responsible. On a pretext she calls at her house teatime and is baffled to find Mrs. Delane alone. Blissfully unconscious of this, Martin sips tea with Nancy. When the two matrons later learn where Martin is devoting his attentions—one angry and the other jealous—both call formally on Nancy and confide that Martin is engaged to Elizabeth. Nancy refuses to see Martin who learns the reason just before he returns under orders to New York. It is too late to call but he sends a note of explanation. Sailing time arrives and she fails to get in touch with him. Moodily, Martin looks at the increasing strip of water between land and sea as the ship launches on its journey. A friendly tap on his shoulder and Martin whirls about to find himself gazing at the eyes of Nancy speaking silent words of love.

MAN AMONG MEN

Myrtle Morgan Drama File No. 12391

YOUNG Sam Tracy—the butt of Bolivar Island because he insists on looking for the buried gold depicted on a map inherited from a relative—delivers a letter to the O'Laney home, to the effect that their daughter Kate is dead and giving the child Daisy in their care. Months later while Daisy is playing on the beach in Sam's charge, plans are going on in the home of minister Hampton for a birthday party for Robert, the only son. A pious woman, Mrs. Hampton refuses to invite the children of the Sunday School whose fathers drink despite the heartbroken plea of Mrs. Johansen whose children are in tears. Robert resents being a mother's boy and finally develops sufficient courage to run off and play with the other children. He is severely talked to and put to bed after Mrs. Hampton breaks the toy boat, a gift from a playmate, although Robert has always loved the sea. When Mr. Hampton remonstrates and insists that no party will be held unless all the children can attend, Mrs. Hampton leaves him temporarily and opens a boarding school so she can supervise her son's education. Christmas Mr. Hampton makes himself the boy's ally by presenting him with a set of boxing gloves among other things. Meanwhile life has changed for Daisy. She nearly drowns when she swims too far in resentment because Sam is too busy digging to go. The barks of her dog King bring Sam to her rescue. Dressed in his old suit she returns home to find Forbes her father waiting to take her away. Unable to resist stage life, Kate returned to it taking her child with her. Only recently has Forbes learned of her death. On the train they meet Hampton who baptized Daisy. The two exchange cards and when later Robert wins a trip to New York he is instructed to look up the family. Learning that Forbes is head of a big shipping company, Robert confesses that he has always dreamed of sailing but because his mother wishes it must become a minster instead. Daisy fascinates him though he is sure his mother will never approve of a girl who smokes and dresses immodestly. The following summer they renew their acquaintance on Bolivar Island. In a temper when Mrs. Hampton reminds him it is bedtime, Robert protests that he is no longer a child and goes to the O'Laney cottage where Daisy introduces him to Sam. Unable to withstand her taunts, Robert gulps his first drink followed by several more. The next day he takes her to a theater fortified by more liquor to keep up his courage at Daisy's suggestion. When a man insults her as they leave, Robert knocks him down and is saved from arrest only when Forbes bribes the policeman. He feels as if at last he is becoming an adult. After a "sermon" his mother insists on keeping him home the next day to study suspecting hut he escapes to meet Daisy. He feels a strong desire to kiss her while on the beach but lacks the courage even after he rescues her from deep water. Rumor comes to Mrs. Hampton's horrified ears and she forces her husband to talk with Daisy whom he fails to recognize at first. Faithfully he delivers his message but intimates that he will understand if his son fails to join the ministry. The next morning Sam rushes into the house. He has found the treasure and now will Daisy marry him. Hating to hurt him still Daisy refuses him and secretly leaves for New York. Stunned when he finds her gone, Robert goes to Sam's place for a few days wanting to think his problem out alone. Mrs. Hampton comes to him with a bible which he declares that she has turned into a Devil's Prayer Book, stulifying his entire life. At once Robert calls upon Daisy and the two confess their love. Forbes offers him a position in his firm and at last Robert feels himself a man among men.

MANDARIN DRUMS

Milo Melodrama File No. 12436

FROM the distant room where Lee Fang sat in state came the muffled chant of the Mandarin drums. Alone in her apartment his daughter, Min Wong, shuddered. Too well she knew what that note meant—more victims for the sinister castle. Many had entered the tall gates but none had ever emerged. Unable to bear the confinement of her rooms while the drums increased in tempo, Min Wong rushed out to the garden where Tom Saintsbury could be found pacing as she paced only a few moments before. Stealing a quick glance at the windows to make sure that none were watching, he took her to his arms as she whispered, "I can't bear it any longer." For months Tom had been a prisoner, his life spared only because Lee Fang was in need of a secretary. In time Tom had become acquainted with the gruesome secret the castle housed. Since the death of her mother, Lee Fang had changed, Min Wong told her lover. From their India plantation they had come to England where with him Lee Fang brought the deadly black widow spiders whose bites meant instant death. Keeping them alive had been a problem until Lee Fang discovered that they must be fed on human blood. Meanwhile, seated at his large desk, the head of the house reread the note from the famous scientist, Dr. Watts. He had accepted Lee Fang's invitation to examine some rare insects. In addition the learned man had asked permission to bring with him his nephew Harold and Bob, his daughter's fiance, both of whom were interested in architecture. The guests came at the appointed time and were well entertained for dinner. Meanwhile Tom was shocked to discover that Bob was an old school friend of his. He waited for a moment to warn him but as if he suspected, Lee Fang kept sharp watch. Finally as the two younger men were being shown to their rooms, Tom thrust a note of warning in Bob's hand. Lee Fang politely asked Dr. Watts to accompany him to the library. There he brought out a tightly corked bottle and exhibited the living carrier of death, explaining its significance. When with mystification, the physician asked what his host wanted with them, Lee Fang suddenly sprang from the chair. Turning the light on full force, he waited until slowly recognition came to the other. Then Lee Fang reminded him of the night years before when Watts had just begun his practice, he begged the white doctor to treat his wife who was seriously ill with the poison bite of a spider. Watts had refused on the grounds that he treated white patients only. All these years, Lee Fang had awaited revenge. Now he planned to wipe out the whole family. Dr. Watts begged him to spare the life of his daughter who had accompanied them to a nearby hotel. Screams told him that his nephew had already been sacrificed. Bob had been imprisoned to await death the following day while Watts was to be saved for even more fiendish torture later. However during the night, Tom helped Bob to escape and with the help of the Scotland Yard police a trap was laid. Through the open window, Lee Fang released a spider and hearing Ann Watts scream was satisfied. When he returned to his house a fugitive servant warned him that they were watched. In an effort to escape the law by mistake Lee Fang entered the room with the deadly spiders. After releasing Watts, with her own hands, Min Wong set fire to the castle. Then she left only to find Tom whom she believe would leave now that he was free, waiting. In his embrace, the horror of the past faded.

GYPSY MIKE

Maxine Pheney Comedy File No. 12198

GYPSY by nature and blood, old Mike disdains his son, Happy Harry, who seems to care for nothing but sleep. At present he is in his usual reclining position. "He'll never make a trader like myself," declares Gypsy Mike sadly while his wife leaped hotly to the defense of her oldest. Feeling a bit sleepy himself, Gypsy Mike determines to prove this by sending Happy Harry out to trade one of their two old almost useless horses. Meanwhile Harry has awakened and is strumming softly on his ever present guitar. At his father's abrupt command, Harry stretches himself and goes over to one of the horses but decides that Danny will do best. Almost grey headed, he murmurs looking at the horse with disgust. In sudden inspiration he returns to the wagon and emerges with shoe blacking which he applies vigorously; then came some coal oil. Even Gypsy Mike is grudgingly forced to admire the result. Squeezing himself into a coat four sizes too small, Harry starts off with the horse wearily dragging the small cart. Ever resourceful, Harry produces a small tack and tests it on himself to see if it is sharp enough, with a resultant heartfelt "ouch." Attaching it to the reins where it will fall briskly upon the horse, Harry is off again at increased speed. Around a turn, is a stalled team with a mournful colored boy on top. He dreads what his employer will say should he come late again. When Harry proposes swapping, the youth emphatically agrees and on top of that throws Harry a dollar under the impression that all the benefits are on his side. As if the nag likes his new owner, the journey is merrily begun again, while Harry plays the guitar. An abrupt jerk and the horse refuses to move. "What don't you like my music?" asks Harry in serious surprise. The horse seems to nod in mournful but emphatic answer and Harry reluctantly puts down his instrument. That is all the horse needed. Off he goes on a brisk trot; but Harry informs an unheeding world that a horse for a music critic is too much in life. It's enough that Gypsy Mike is always complaining without a horse to help. With his usual curiosity, Harry pulled up to the side of the road upon seeing a man angrily cranking a ford of an early make, without the slightest result. The gypsy boy's eyes widened. After several moments Harry suggested that they make a swap. The man's eyes widened. "You're crazy," he decided, "But I'm willing. Not going to stay here all day." An hour later found Harry dizzily driving the machine, feeling contentedly the crisp five dollar bill in his pocket. All is peaceful with the world as far as Harry is concerned; for he is still experiencing the effects of the drink which the man has offered to seal the bargain. Arriving at the nearest town where he has decided to stock up with surprise provisions, Harry feels the motor stall on the tracks. Seeing the trolley near, Harry hops from the car now quite close to the trolley wheels. Jumping out, the motorman sniffs Harry's breath and whistles for a policeman. Hurriedly returning to the machine, Harry sets it in motion while a policeman hurries after in a motorcycle. Before he catches up, Harry has applied what is left of the shoe blacking and the surprised policeman when he finally flags the car, apologizes for chasing the wrong man. And when Gypsy Mike sees his son with a car and a five dollar bill he triumphantly asserts, "I knew he was smart like his dad all the time." Happy Harry wisely is silent but reaches once more for the guitar.

Fred W. Barrette Western File No. 11574

FOOTLOOSE and fancy free, Fred rides up the dusty road. Suddenly he pauses in amazement at sight of a beautiful girl leveling a double barreled gun at a fellow she calls Roaring Dick, and warning him that if he ever steps foot on her father's ranch again, he will be arrested. Dick makes several attempts to get the girl to lower her gun and listen to him, but as she threatens to shoot he dives through the air at her, seizing her wrist. Instantly Fred interferes, disarming Dick, and forcing him to ride rapidly out of sight. Coming to the assistance of the girl, Fred learns she is Grace Stevens, daughter of one of the largest ranch owners in the vicinity. The result is that Fred applies for and gets a job on a ranch as a cowboy, deriving consolation from being near Grace, although she never mixes socially with the hired men. Soon, however, Fred distinguishes himself by various favors he does for her, and Fred and Grace become friendly. One day while Fred is in town, he sees Dick swaggering up. Recognizing him, Dick covertly digs his spurs into Fred's foot. Fred leaps up and the two men begin fighting. However, Fred and his friend Tom are outnumbered by Dick's witnesses who swear that Fred started the fight. Charges are preferred and Fred and Tom are locked up. Meanwhile, at the ranch, Grace is disturbed by the failure of Fred and Tom to return. Saddling her horse she goes in search of them, and locating them in jail, she bails them out. Shamefacedly the boys try to explain the adventure. Two days later, while Grace is out riding, she is abducted. Fred suspects Dick who had uttered threats against Grace on various occasions. Accordingly he discovers that Dick's hangout is an old roadhouse down the way. With a band consisting of Ray Stevens, the girl's agitated father, Tom, and the cowhands from the ranch, Fred proceeds to the hangout. He overhears Dick's gang deciding to hold Grace for ransom and then kill her. Fred has all he can do to keep himself from rushing in madly. Night falls before they can carry out their plans. Afraid that if they try rushing the bandits, Grace will be killed, Fred proposes to set off alone. Crawling on his hands and knees he slips up toward the house. Shots ring out. Dick comes running, yelling does the fool Ratty want to give them away. And Ratty apologetically explains he thought he heard a movement in the grass. Dick goes inside to complete his poker game. At one in the morning the crowd begins to disperse. Fred sees Dick come out with a letter he guesses is the ransom letter. Calling the others Fred slips up on Ratty and strangles him noiselessly with his larait. However, when they come to the room where Grace was lying bound and gagged they find her gone. Meanwhile Fred has been badly shot by Dick's guards, but spurred by the thought of Grace's danger they set out after the bandits. At last after a desperate battle they capture two of the bandits who have been trying to escape with Grace. However, Grace has been shot in the lung. Fred rushes her to a hospital, captures Dick and turns him over to the sheriff. After a critical operation Grace recovers. Fred is at her side constantly. He is rewarded for his capture of the bandits who have been wanted on numerous charges, and is made foreman of the Stevens ranch. Time is to pass. Fred, now married to Grace is to work himself up to fortune, and happiness is to be forever in his grasp at the side of the woman he loves.

COLUMNS OF LOVE

Mrs. Juan L. Boscio Drama File No. 12252

TO the gay strains of music, Irma is chosen queen for the carnival festivals, in the island of Porto Rico. Her beauty makes her a popular choice and to add to the girl's happiness, Luis Pennington, who claims her heart is chosen king. Coronation night, the ballroom of the leading hotel is a flower decked fairy land. As the royal couple lead the dance Luis whispers again his love. Teasingly, Irma reminds him of his reputation as a Don Juan but in solemn earnestness Luis retorts that always his heart will be hers. Fatigued at the close of the festivities, Irma retires early only to be awakened by the beautiful strains of a serenade. Recognizing Luis' voice, Irma leans over the balcony to hear the farewell words of Luis whose family is sending him immediately to college in the United States. At his eager plea, Irma promises to wait until he returns. During the weary next few months, Irma refuses all invitations faithful to the absent one. But at the co-ed college, many pretty girls tempt Luis. Unable to resist Rowena, pretty southern girl, Luis sees much of her. Rowena falls deeply in love but Luis remains more the good friend. Invited to his rooms one day, Rowena, seeing the lovely photograph of Irma on the study table realizes that here is her rival. That evening they visit a night club where both drink themselves into a state of intoxication. It is Rowena who arranges for a private room. Alone with her, Luis' passions rise and the girl gives herself to him completely. Penitent when he has sobered, Luis agrees to marry Rowena who is ashamed to return home. Yet during the next weeks, Irma is constantly in his thoughts and Luis decides to return with his wife. Graduation day at the private school which Irma attends is nearing. Aware of his marriage and impending return, Irma throws herself into a whirl of gaiety. When Luis makes several attempts unsuccessfully to see her, with a defiant gesture Irma consents to marry Frederick, an engineer, though she does not love him. Following the honeymoon, they return to the estate of Frederick's parents; nearby the husband is to supervise a bridge construction. There is joy now in Irma's heart for Luis is forgotten and all her love belongs to Frederick. His father takes her to his affections immediately but Dona Luisa, the mother, dislikes her for she had hoped to have Diana, a niece for a daughter-in-law. During the months that follow the two women resent the girl's frequent excursions. Finally Dona Luisa forbids them and Irma charges her and Diana with a desire to take away her husband's love. She rides over to see Frederick who has been working overtime and beg him to establish her in her own household. However, he is so busy trying to complete the work before the spring floods that she desists. Riding home she sees a party of Mary, her sister-in-law's friends which include Rowena and Luis. Conscious that her in-laws are watching carefully Irma resists all efforts of Luis to be alone with her, telling him she is in love with her husband. Maddened with passion, Luis follows her to her secluded out-door bathing place and snaps a compromising photograph which accidentally falls in his wife's hands. Now remorseful, Luis meets Irma at midnight to warn her only to be confronted by Dona Luisa holding her picture. She orders Irma from the house but Don Felipe befriends her, taking her to a house across the river where later her son is born. Meanwhile Frederick returns and has no choice but to believe the charges. He knows nothing of Irma's nearby presence until heavy rains come early and Frederick works madly to save the property near the river. The father drives to tell the son that Irma and the son of whom he first hears are in danger. Meanwhile as the water reaches the house Irma rushes to the road with her child and is met by her husband. So happiness begins again—a bridge supported by the columns of faith and love.

THEY SHALL BE STRONG

Maja Lisa Krohn Drama File No. 12361

INNOCENT and trustful, Martha faces her wedding morn, bright with promises which Joseph, the bridegroom is never to fulfill. The next few years bring her two children, Elsbeth, quiet and reserved as her mother and Rita who partakes of her father's wild temperament. Rita is only an infant when Joseph comes to his wife one night with the confession that he is in love with another woman. Martha must shift for herself. Too proud to keep what is rightfully hers, by force, the untrained Martha does housework for others while her mother cares for the children. Fifteen years of this drudgery pass while Martha sacrifices her strength to retain her daughters in school. Her heart is tortured at the many complaints of Rita, hungry for pretty things and gay times. The church which she patiently attends each Sunday indirectly brings new happiness to Martha, still several years from forty, when she encounters Harry Meister at a church social. A widower with a small son, Bobby, Meister pays earnest court to Martha. For her it is a second blooming of happiness and the marriage soon takes place. They settle on a stock farm which Meister manages and when Celia, Martha's niece accepts a position nearby as a school teacher, they invite her to live with them. To Martha's joy, Elsbeth becomes engaged to a young farmer, Richard. The younger sister scorns the local men and continually pleads to go to the large city where she feels her wants will be gratified. Gradually, Celia and Meister are drawn to each other but though relationships grow strained, Martha refuses to believe that anything can be wrong. She is more worried about Rita who has met Donald Newcomb, a married man, who has come to the country to rest his jangled nerves. Rita only laughs off her mother's shy warnings but a night comes when Martha overhears the two planning to run away together. Near collapse the mother watches the kitchen clock tick on long past the hour Meister is expected home; not knowing what to do. Is the weakness of her first husband to be developed in the children? A messenger comes with a note; Meister is leaving town. There is not time for her to collapse for Celia faints first and hearing her mother cry for help Rita runs in and reads the note. Celia then confesses that she is bearing Meister's child. Late that night Rita creeps to her wakeful mother and confesses that she has been on the verge of ruining her life. With gratitude Martha realizes that the present tragedy has strengthened the girl. Meister is caught and sentenced to prison. The family move away while Elsbeth is quietly married. Martha and Rita work to support the household and Celia stays home to care for Bobby and her baby John. In revenge when Rita refuses to resume relations, Donald notifies the authorities that the children are not properly cared for. Against all pleas, Celia is placed in a reformatory and the children in an asylum. She visits them and her husband regularly. Four years later finds Meister released and back with his wife but though Bobby is returned to them John has been adopted and the foster parents' identity concealed. Celia has left for a distant city and Rita is a happy young matron. Through the next ten years Martha's mother heart is to grieve for John. The final blow comes when Meister wishes to leave her and take the son. Bobby chooses his step-mother instead and soon John is to trace them and beg to stay. And Martha rejoicing in their love is to dedicate her life to making them stronger than their father.

JOHN BURR

Warren S. Rehm Educational Drama File No. 12298

IN the hotel lobby a group of the city's most prominent leaders are conversing when in a loud tone Marley declares that he would like to wring the neck of every union man. John Burr, traveling salesman, sitting nearby overhears this and when asked his opinion, declares that Marley will be punished for presenting such views. A year later, Marley's friend, Lawyer Henry, bitterly blames John for his friend's failing health which ends in death. It becomes an obsession with him and he regards with hate the man who years later is to open the Safe Harbor Clay Products and Machinery Company. Prosperity comes to the town through John's efficient management. Here he proves the ideals which motivated him earlier and organizes a union among his men. He leads in the payment of wages and arranges that outside of a controlling interest the stock is held by the employees. Although many women would welcome John as a husband or son-in-law, John seems fated to be a bachelor. Through small sweet Betty, John makes friends with her father, Donahue, the saloon keeper. When Donahue falls ill, John insists on moving both of them to his house. During Donahue's convalescence the two enjoy a long talk. Here Donahue explains that he, too, once was an idealist but the pressure of economic circumstances compelled him to find a trade at which he could earn his living and so he relinquished his fond dreams. In return, John confesses that in early youth he has not always behaved ethically but every endeavor has been put forth to place himself in a position where he can bring into being the principles which he has always believed in. For Mary's sake, John proposes that Donahue give up his present occupation and become his right-hand man. Life goes on smoothly and happily for John constantly engaged in considering new betterments for his city and workers. To get them more interested in intelligent reading, John offers a large prize for an essay contest open to everyone. During the program, there is a loud disturbance from the rear of the hall. Consumed with resentment Lawyer Henry bursts into a tirade against John while Donahue rushes over to silence him, only to stop at his employer's order. John calls to everyone to keep their seats while Henry clambers to the platform with a knife in his hand. Before he can strike home, John fells him with the Japanese system of Ju Jittsu or self defense, rendering him unconscious for several hours. At John's orders, when Henry comes to he finds himself in his office placed in an open coffin box. Only fear restrains him from returning to John but he broodingly awaits the day of vengeance. With a start one evening as Mary is arrayed for a party, John realizes that she has reached the age when most girls are selecting a husband. On that evening, Mary meets and falls in love with Herbert Henry, the son of John's enemy. Herbert says nothing to his father but becomes a frequent visitor. When the engagement is finally decided upon he breaks the news to his father who takes it like a man possessed, realizing that John is like a second father to Mary. That evening John is warned that Henry has been seen prowling about the house and several of the men including Donahue stay awake in relays to guard John. Henry emerges from the closet in Donahue's room while the latter is napping but alarmed when Donahue stirs shoots him. The men decide to take the law in their own hands and administer death by euthanasia—a humane and little known form whereby the condemned man is tied to a fast revolving wheel whose effect on the blood stream is such as to create swift and lasting unconsciousness. Upon this scene bursts Herbert who broke through the group only to find he is too late. He has John arrested for murder while Mary refuses to see her lover again. To the scene of excitement comes a famous physician who wishes to study this strange form of execution and soon the world is made aware that Henry has been revived as there was not time for it to take complete effect. Despite this John was to serve a prison term. Although pardoned soon, during that short stay John realizes the problem of the unfortunate criminals who wish to lead a righteous life when they leave prison only to find themselves branded. So he conceives of an underground city where all unfortunates may build a new life. For this he chooses the York Furnace Cafe which has a secret opening that John alone knows. Donahue and several of his faithful friends of the past help him arrange for implements and supplies. With him John takes only the middle aged former prisoners for he believes that only then are they at their ripest powers. A year later finds the place a regular underground city which stetches for miles. There is fresh water, air currents, and electricity: none can enter unknown and each man directs the tasks he is particularly fit for. There are rumours of its existence in the outside world but none can verify this. During the years Mary has given up all consideration of love and has buried the memory of Herbert. Desirous of losing herself in work she has trained for medicine and visits the subterranean city regularly to administer treatment. Meanwhile Lawyer Henry has been convicted of corrupt practices and himself is sentenced to prison. Ashamed to face the future, he hears with relief of the "city of rehabilitation." Throughout his journey there, Henry is amazed as Frankford, former noted criminal acts as his guide and host, explaining the wonders before him. The sunshine feels more intense and strength giving than above the surface; even the air is kept sweet with perfume so that all of man's senses may be fed. When Henry has rested from the journey he is taken to the main hall to meet their leader. With a gasp of amazement he recognizes his one-time enemy, John Burr who smilingly extends his hand. Abashed, Henry grasps it and begs forgiveness for the past. Learning of a plot to dispose of John Burr, planned by a few men greedy for power, Henry hastens to John Burr with the news only to learn that he already knows. That Sunday as is his custom John rises to address his men and suggests that since there seems to be dissatisfaction among them, perhaps he should resign. From all sides come vigorous protests. Reassured, John makes known the plot and before the guilty members can move turns on a switch which will cause the electrocution of any who step out on the aisles. The conspirators are seized and meted the punishment of castration. A number of eunuchs about the place regarded as most useful now have a similar background, it is explained to Lawyer Henry. During these years Herbert under another name has been following devious paths of corruption, seeking to forget. His life lands him in prison finally and since he is too broken to face the world, the underground city is recommended. On the way he collapses and is brought to the hospital. There, Mary making the rounds of her patients is to recognize him. And John Burr and Lawyer Henry are to clasp each others hands in affection as the engagement of the young couple is announced.

THE PATIENT PAYS

Elizabeth J. Trouper Drama File No. 12350

IT is a momentous day when Tony Fields succeeds his father as president of the large oil company. With concealed shyness he rings for his secretary and is amazed to find small Helen Walker, one of the prettiest girls in the plant, in her place. It is not long before the whole organization is aware that the president has more than a business interest in her. Only Robert Lee is bitter and ill-tempered for he has hopes of making Helen his bride and resents his competitor. Dazed by the attentions and wealthy gifts which Tony showers upon her, in an angry scene Helen rejects Robert and when later in the evening Tony calls—Helen consents to marry him. The very day that their engagement is announced several hundred miles away an event is taking place which has particular influence on their future lives. Rosalie Torent has received admittance for training as a nurse in one of the poorer equipped hospitals of the south. Already Rosalie has been expelled from Regent Hospital because she is far more interested in gaiety and a flapper-world than in her studies. Wisely the staff decides that she is not the material they desire but not all hospitals are as particular so Rosalie nonchalantly enrolls in another. Her former roommate, Elsie Randolph, well on the road to becoming a successful and thorough nurse shakes her head disapprovingly on hearing this. During the end of the next five years, the happy radiance of first love has fled from the Field's home. Helen resents the overwhelming love which he pours out on their small daughter Tilly and in a fit of boredom begins to see Robert again. Jealous her husband remonstrates and their quarrels become bitter. Gradually, Tony turns to drink to forget his troubles and Helen entertains herself with gigilos who encourage her to force gaiety through stimulants. After a bitter quarrel one night. Tony runs from the house returning hours later only to find them gone, the two who have meant most to him. Helen refuses to see him and forces him to grant a divorce and the custody of the child to her. In the south Tony continues his mad path missing Tilly desperately until he stumbles upon her one day with the governess Mrs. Kaulin. With her tiny arms tight about his neck, Tony swears off drinking. He meets Helen who confesses that she wishes to begin life again. Both enter a hospital for treatment. Cured first, Tony takes the child and Mrs. Kaulin to Florida where Helen is to later join him. One night, unable to bear the jeers of friends Tony falls off the "wagon." Ashamed to have Tilly see him he reaches for tablets which will leave him sober after a few hours sleep. Unfortunately, he takes an overdose and Mrs. Kaulin, finding him unconscious, summons. Dr. Blake. Nurse Randolph stays throughout the night and under her well trained administrations, the patient is better by morning. Relief is sent her and the nurse is amazed to find it is Rosalie, not quite sober from last evening's party. Unscrupulous, during the next days she is to disobey orders, supply Tony, too weak to resist, with cocktails; finally persuading Tony to order the doctor away and keep her for full duty. Feeling that the honor of her profession is at stake, and since the doctor is helpless, it is Nurse Randolph who sends for Helen. She comes just as Tony reaches collapse and Rosalie is beginning to realize what she has caused. Although later she is removed that is little consolation for Helen and her child robbed of father and husband because of a girl unfitted for nursing.

AMBITIOUS MOTHERS

Odessa P. Matthews Drama File No. 12398

GRACEFUL, young Elaine is dancing in the park to the accompanying plaudits of her friends when she sees a car slowly approaching and her classmate Philip Terry waves to her. While the children tease, Elaine's eyes follow the auto until it is out of sight. Meanwhile in the machine Mrs. Terry scolds her son for paying attention to those "common children." Despite this Philip hunts up Elaine the next day to tell her how much he enjoyed her talented steps. From then on they are close friends until Elaine is forced to leave school to help the family and Philip is sent to an exclusive private school. Several years later finds Elaine dancing in a night club. Despite her surroundings she refuses all invitations from the many patrons who admire her unspoiled, unhardened beauty. Murray Land, assistant to the owner, has already tried a number of times to obtain a date with her after the program but always the answer is a shy "no." He enters her good graces, however, when a drunken customer, lurches out on the floor and attempts to kiss her. Murray drags him away and realizing that Elaine is upset insists on driving her home. Hungry to possess her, Murray realizes that he can win her only through marriage. Elaine, not wishing to hurt him, begs him to wait for her answer. That night she insists on returning home alone. While crossing the curb she twists her ankle and a stranger comes to her assistance. With gladness they recognize each other as the schoolday friends of long ago. Terry drives her home and despite the hour insists on coming in to bandage her ankle. He dislikes the thought of her working in the night club and welcomes the week of convalescence, visiting her daily. Once Murray and he meet at her bedside and take an immediate dislike to one another, realizing they are rivals. Gossip comes to the ears of Mrs. Terry who makes a secret visit to Elaine. She begs her not to marry her son; it will ruin his career. Sick at heart, Elaine refuses Philip who succumbs to black despondency. Alarmed when Philip tries to commit suicide, Mrs. Terry withdraws objections. Though the two are married, Mrs. Terry still hopes to part them. Meeting Murray there one day as he calls on Elaine before leaving for a trip, Mrs. Terry is inspired to send a series of poison pen letters charging Elaine with infidelity. Though Elaine denies it, Philip's jealousy is aroused and the vague suspicions color their happiness. Meanwhile, Richard, Elaine's brother who has been absent for several years returns on a surprise visit to Elaine. Mrs. Terry is passing in the car when she sees a man who at a distance resembles Murray calling at the Terry residence. She makes an anonymous call to Philip who rushes home. One glimpse of the two in each others arms and not waiting for explanations Philip rushes from the house. As days pass and nothing is heard Mrs. Terry broken-heartedly confesses and begs Elaine's forgiveness. Worry makes Elaine, who is carrying Philip's child, violently ill while Philip leads a dissolute life in far cities until he is seriously injured by a machine. A letter identifies him and his father rushes to the bedside of Philip with explanations. He returns in time to win a smile from Elaine before she is carried to the operating table. The Shadow of Death closes upon her then with miraculous suddenness lifts. And Mrs. Terry seeing her son happy with Elaine and the baby realizes at last that no ambitious mother can wish for more than this.

HUNTERS ALL

John Millter Short Subject File No. 12370

"SWELL hunting weather," comments Herb appreciatively as the door bell rings. Hurriedly straightening the bow tie he is wearing for that evening's party, Herb swings open the door to his friends, Ben and Ken, all excited because the hunting season is opening the next day. What time does Herb want to start, they demand. Herb hesitates but Virginia hurries down to remind him that his hunting can wait till Monday; he's promised to take her riding the next day. No woman ever can understand says Ben in mock disgust while Dick, the black and white Springer, who will experience his first hunting season seems to prick up his ears with intelligent approval. It's going to be a test for Dick's training and his master disparages the teasing of the others who claim that Dick probably won't prove much of an advantage. However, Monday morning dawn has scarcely broken when the bell rings long before the alarm clock. Outside is the patter of rain but Herb with true sportsman's instinct sees it only as a grand day. Dick jumps in the car with the others who are secretly excited at the prospect of hunting with a dog for the first time. They are outside the city limits now, heading for Farmer Well's place where steaming cups of hot coffee start them off in peaceful happy tune with the world. Dick with panther like grace stalks through the far end of the orchard, having picked up a pheasant's trail. True to character while breathlessly the men followed, Dick's tail begins to twitch as he circles through the weeds seeking the faintest scent. At the outmost clump, Dick stops letting out an excited yip before jumping. Herb shoots just as the giant bird soars skyward. A second shot and the bird descends but as Ben, excited, starts after it, Dick growls. There is a glow of pride on Herb's face as Dick fetches the bird to him; now he is convinced that his friends realize what a superb dog is Dick is. Off they go for more game. Between the orchard and the swamp, Dick sniffs out several more trails but drops them because they are too old. Usually an ideal place, today there is too much water in the swamp for the pheasants and part of the time Dick is swimming in obvious enjoyment. The men however make for solid ground, Herb leading. He turns at the crack of Kenny's twenty gage and his disappointed cry as he misses, but Ben picks off the bird. Disconsolate Ken trails after until Dick suddenly doubles back on his tracks and fetches a bird for Ken who in gratitude in mock solemnity pioks up the pup and kisses its wiggling black nose. Dick's all business, however, and snaps to be put down. Ken's bird is alive in his hand long enough to make a jagged cut but over lunch this is forgotten. The afternoon fails to materialize anything because of the weather and when they stop at Wells he suggests a likely patch nearby, so his wife can watch Dick in action. The running dog arouses a flock of them and Ken bags another. So does Herb but his bird starts running and Herb races after but the bird and the dog are both faster. Weak with laughter the others cheer the trio on. The newly bagged catch is presented to the farmer who drags out a special bottle of liquor. A toast to Dick he suggests and another for yourselves—hunters all! Dick barks agreement.

THE CHAIN OF DESTINY

J. F. Waters Melodrama File No. 12388

IN the refuge of remote south Africa, Neil Burns seeks to forget his love for a fellow medical student, Dorothy Reynolds, sister of Jim, his best friend. It is added bitterness for him to realize that his rival Assistant District Attorney Arthur Herrington is the only man who has touched the heart of this girl thoroughly engrossed in her chosen profession. There Neil finds the rare white plant known by the natives as "laughing plant" and sends it to Jim, a botanist. Later he watches a native being slowly immersed in water while a native medicine man explains that this is the one cure for the drug habit acquired from a habit forming secretion in the laughing plant. In his misery Neil becomes addicted to this. Meanwhile Arthur begs Dorothy to forget her career and marry him while her father approvingly agrees. Determined to prove that women do not always belong in the home, Dorothy rejects him and joins the staff of the private hospital operated by Dr. Aintree for nervous disorders. Jim goes to the boat to meet the returning Neil accompanied by Arthur and a detective friend, Norton, who are endeavoring to secure evidence on a drug ring. Norton's suspicions are aroused by Neil's strange behavior. In his half-crazed state, blaming Dorothy for his downfall, Neil is on his way to kill the girl when Norton arrests him. Called to the prison, Dorothy is shocked to find Neil her patient but finds that she has the hypnotic power to win his obedience. When Harrington refuses ot consider her plea that Neil is innocent of any crime, Dorothy testifies at the trial and Neil is given in her custody for three months to cure. Under her treatment, Neil steadily improves until a bouquet comes from Jim, consisting of the laughing plant. Believing that he is being supplied by an outside source, Dorothy persuades Dr. Aintree to allow her to remove the patient to his secluded country residence. For added precaution the address is kept a secret. During Jim's absence Norton discovers that the flowers in the Reynold conservatory contain this rare drug. Harrington is forced to issue a warrant but suddenly remembers seeing these flowers in Neil's room. Realizing that Dorothy must be ignorant of this fact, the two hurry to the hospital. Meanwhile Neil, surreptitiously searching for a means to assuage his longing, locks Dorothy in an unused basement refrigerator. Unsuccessful in his search, Neil returns to vent his wrath on Dorothy. The door automatically latches behind him and both are trapped as flood waters, caused by heavy rains, seep through the walls. Frantic for Dorothy's safety when they learn where she is and that the telephone wires are down—Arthur and Norton drive through the washed out roads. When the machine goes through a weakened bridge near the house, Norton drags the apparently lifeless form to the house where they are met by Jim, seeking refuge from his hunting interrupted by the weather. In the interim with death near Dorothy recognizes her love for Arthur which she has peviously refused to face and writes a note. The water is beneficial to Neil whose despairing taps are heard and the two are rescued. Near collapse, Dorothy rushes to Arthur's still body and is rewarded with faint signs of life. Through her skill he is to be restored to health and Neil completely recovered wins his freedom from the courts. With her brother's innocence proved, Dorothy is content to make a new career as Arthur's wife.

FIT THE CROWN

M. M. Potter Short Subject File No. 12279

HEALTHY maidens, all fifty of them; for they are brought up in a boarding school which keeps a strict regime of work and play and no pampering of health. The week of graduation is at hand and the students are to illustrate to a group of distinguished visitors the features of their program. A sunny afternoon, Miss Ridles orders the girls out to games. Some are playing basketball others run for the tennis courts while another group surrounds the dancing teachers. Their bodies possess the beauty of youth and grace combined but old Professor Blodgett grows a little nervous when he sees how scanty their clothes are for despite the sun a brisk wind has sprung up. Young Sir Haywood is a very much bored young Englishman present to represent his father, but he shows the first signs of animation upon seeing them. One healthy lass misthrows the ball in his direction and though it taps only lightly, poor Haywood half rolls down the hill before Margaret rushes over to brush him off. He winces with each resounding pat for the girl though slight in appearance has arms of solid muscle. To add to his humiliation, he overhears the girl as she strolls back to her play-fellows, laughingly term him a "poor stick." That night the girls are congregated in Margaret's room when Maizy who has graduated from there only the past year returns. All crowd about her excitedly wondering how she has found and used her freedom after the comparatively cloistered life of now. So it is Maizy who first makes them realize that the world seems filled with weaklings like Haywood. Being normal girls they have dreams of homes and families of their own, but certainly they have no intention of choosing such men as husbands. It is Margaret who suggests that they make a national search, using the money in their class treasury as a prize for the man who was perfectly fit physically and mentally. Like the shoe of Cinderella they would provide themselves with a crown and find somebody to fit it. At graduation exercises in a pouring rain which left the students undaunted and the visitors dripping, the girls announced their plan. Scientist Baily offered to assist the girls and Margaret as their spokesman accepted the offer. As soon as the newspapers ran the item the committee was flooded with applicants who expected to qualify. The famous Hotchkiss Laboratory sent a plane for three of the girls to inspect their examples of rejuvenated humans. One had the glands of a Billy Goat and showed a tendency to ba-a-a-a when his chin waggled; another was a ram speciman but the girls laughing at the timid, sheepish individual before them were afraid he might butt—so they said. Finally the girls decide to organize a parade of women throughout the country, inspecting every village and hamlet for a man fit to wear the crown. They come in fords, on bicycles, kiddy-cars—the ration is over-run with them. Zippo, the world's strongest man, knocks everyone out of the head of their path to prove it. The girls chant scornfully, "We want a man like the Solomon Clan!" During the march recreation is suggested; in an outdoor bowl the picture of Tarzan, the adventuresome Englishman who spent his childhood with the apes is shown and the actor makes a personal appearance. With one accord, the women rush there to crown him "king."

A WOMAN TO LOVE

Albert Commissiong Drama File No. 12255

ALWAYS Louise and Charles could be found together. Friends no longer thought of asking one without the other. At a dance one evening, friends teasingly presented the couple with a doll bride and bridegroom. While Louise flushed, Charles slipped them into his pocket. Before either could reply, Louise was whirled away to dance with James Setler who had just returned from a several years absence in the big city. Watching them, Charles frowned. "Jealous?" asked a companion noticing his face. Charles merely laughed and yet he was troubled particularly when he overhead a conversation which intimated that James had been pretty much the lady's man who left a trail of broken hearts. Certainly the two did make a handsome pair. Other people noticed this also, Charles discovered when Mary, who for months had been in love with Charles who showed no signs of reciprocation, slipped her arm in his and commented on the two. That night, Charles was in a surly mood when he took Louise home for he had overheard the girl make an appointment with James for the following night. Savagely, Charles reminded Louise that she had promised to attend the theatre with him; but Louise nonchalantly pointed out that another evening would do just as well. Not once, but several times during the succeeding weeks, Charles found himself disappointed. At last he waited for Louise outside her office and demanded an explanation. Did she care more for James than himself. Avoiding the question, Louise angrily demanded what right he had to question her. Savagely, Charles invited Mary to the dance which he knew Louise and James were planning to attend. All evening Charles ignored the speculative glances of mutual friends and the hurt look on Louise's face when she thought none was observant. Later, James accused her of jealousy. Unable to bear that taunt, Louise threw herself into the merry making spirit of the gathering. Later, she accepted James' invitation to slip away for a drive. When James parked the car and sought to kiss her she grew angry and attempted to leave the car. The next morning James apologized but Louise refused to go out with him. Too proud to call Charles, she was glad when friends reported to Charles that Louise was no longer seeing his rival. That night he called and they made up the previous quarrel. But when Louise asked him to take her to a lecture the following evening, Charles admitted that he had promised to go someplace with Mary. No he could not call it off at this late date. Resentful, Louise acoused him of caring for Mary. He had to make his choice between the girls. Louise would not heed his protests that it was she alone whom he cared for. They parted miserably and Louise flung herself on the sofa to weep alone. It was then that James called her and Louise consented to visit a new Harlem dance hall with him. With apprehension, she noted that James had taken a private room but the drinks which he insisted on plying upon her soon had their effect. When James suggested visiting his apartment she made no resistance. There he persuaded her to take a few drinks more. Louise, in a stupor did not return home that night. The next day, Louise back in her right mind and horrified at herself refused to see James again. Soon after when she learned she was to have a child, Louise fled the city secretly but posted a note of explanation to Charles from the next town. From one city to another, Charles went in search; although first he found James and gave him a thorough beating. At last through Louise's aunt, he found a clue. It was hours before Charles finally convinced her that he loved Louise enough to marry her, even now. The child, they would pretend was his, he declared. And so for the first time Louise realized the full extent of the love she had almost thrown away. Lips spoke a pledge of eternial devotion.

CROSSED PATHS

Wade J. Gessell Comedy Drama File No. 12296

THE college grounds were crowded with visitors. Pretty girls raced among the lawns rejoicing that the close of four years of schooling was near. Only Clare and Julia, cousins and bosom friends, stayed apart and in their rooms discussed the impending separation. Clare refused to be reconciled to Julia's plans for New York and a stage career. She herself had visions of becoming a social leader and had old fashioned prejudices against nice girls entering the theater for a profession. They parted with fearful farewells soon after but Clare knew that she would be too ashamed to ever write or see her cousin in the future. Home, Andrew McGregor, young and wealthy manufacturer, impatiently awaited Clare's arrival; so it was not long before she settled down as a housewife. The M'Carthys and the O'Connors were neighbors to them and these three families soon became the social arbitrators. Meanwhile, Julia found a room in the village and began a weary job hunt. In the free and easy fashion of that section of New York, she soon met Larry O'Toole, an artist and next door neighbor, who begged her to pose for him. It was not long before he offered a new position as his wife and was promptly accepted by Julia who threw thoughts of a career in the discard. In the course of time, the O'Tooles had twins, Larry and Sybil. The two neighbor families of the McGregors also had twins not far apart; Ann and Sue O'Connor and Tom and Dan M'Carthy, respectively. Since the McGregors during the next years had no children they gave the freedom of their roomy grounds to those of their neighbors and grew very much attached. At a beach during the summer, the three sets of twins and their parents were to meet and whenever they came to New York were firm friends. When Mrs. McGregor saw the paintings they had purchased from O'Toole she sniffed contemptuously. In many ways, Clare felt herself closer to the children then their mothers and she and her husband had fond dreams of a union between the M'Carthys and the O'Connors through twin-marriage. All three boys attended the same college and were jubilant to find the three girls installed in the dormitory of the neighboring girls' school. At each place they are called the three twins because they are about the same age and in many ways are physical and mental equals. Only one thing threatens their friendship at first. Sybil O'Toole is very much interested in Dan and is afraid that he is drawn to Sue. When she slipped away from a party which they have attended as a crowd one night she found her brother sitting alone and evry much depressed also. Inquiries revealed that his heart had gone to Sue and he was sure that she had her heart set upon Tom. Only when for a lark they went for a ride in a hay wagon which overturned and each sought the person their hearts were most concerned with did the twin-confusion unscramble. Soon notices were out announcing the engagements of Dan and Sybil; Tom and Ann; and Larry and Sue. The only one displeased was Clare who had other ambitions and threatened to take Dan and Sue out of her will. Her husband had her meet the O'Tooles through a ruse. And to the amazement of everyone who expected a hair pulling match as the two women rushed to each other's arms, they learn that Clare and Julia were cousins. Old scores were forgotten and Clare vowed she'd increase her bequests for wedding presents.

A NEW DAY COMING

Mattie H. Javins Comedy File No. 10983

LYING in the hay, fifteen year old Coba and his pal Snooks deplore the hard life they lead. Coba yawns and chews on a piece of straw as he speculates what he'd do if he had a million dollars. First off, Coba dreams, he would have a sailboat to sail on the nearby pond. Snooks scratches his chin and repeats, "A sailboat, Gee whiz!" in admiration for his chum's imaginative gifts. Suddenly Coba sees Johnny, his younger brother, with Joey, Snooks' kid brother. The youngsters are playing Cowboys and Indians, but Coba interrupts their game to ask Johnny to fetch him a glass of spring water. Johnny hesitates, but as Coba's voice snaps out a command, Johnny runs to comply.

That night Coba's uncle Herbert, a politician who is visiting for a few days, sits before the fire and explains the N.R.A. He talks of the New Day that is going to bring people everything they want. Running outside, Coba throws a pebble at Snooks window and informs him the New Day is here, and every wish is going to be fulfilled now. Joey listens wide eyed and the next day he tells Johnny from now on they don't have to run errands for anybody. The first thing Coba and Snooks do is to play hookey from school. However, when they get a severe caning, they begin to lose their faith somewhat in the New Day. Believing they've been rushing things too much, perhaps not helped sufficiently the coming of the New Day, Coba and Snooks decide to concentrate on the sailboats and do all they can to help get them. Accordingly, with the bland expressions of little angels, Coba and Snooks go to their respective fathers and offer to do all the chores about the farm in return for a little extra money toward the purchase of a sailboat. Their fathers are duly amazed at the sudden ambition of the lads but promise to give each a dollar if they take care of the cows. With remarkable energy, buoyed up by the thought of the sailboats, Coba and Snooks begin working, only to sink back in the hayloft, their ambition utterly vanished. As they dream about their sailboats, Joey and Johnny come up and ask eagerly if they can have a chance some time to play with the sailboat. Coba screws his face up thoughtfully, and shakes his head negatively. The youngsters are on the point of tears, but suddenly Coba suggests that if his kid brother will help to get the boat maybe for five minutes a day he can play with the sailboat. Poor Johnny, it isn't very much of a hope, but with Joey helping him, the two boys perform all the chores their elders were going to do. That evening Coba and Snooks smugly accept praise for their good work, while Johnny and Joey are so tired they go straight to bed. The next day the same thing happens, and the next. With the older boys accepting money and praise and the youngsters doing the work. But the New Day comes at last. Their parents come out on the field and see the youngsters perspiring over the chores while Snooks and Coba idle on the side talking of the sailboat they are going to get. Accordingly the next day on the pond there are two beautiful shiny sailboats for Johnny and Joey, presents from their fathers. Thereafter it is Snooks and Coba who do all the work, so that they can sail their little brothers' boats for five minutes or maybe, generously, a little while longer.

SHOULD A DOCTOR TELL?

Madeline O'Malley Drama File No. 10438

TEACHER in a mountain school, Clara's life had been placid and uneventful until Fred Simpson, adventurer, had passed through the town. From their first meeting, Clara had been attracted by his handsome face, his worldly knowledge, and despite the admonitions of her family and the gossip of her friends, Clara had decided impulsively to accept Fred Simpson's proposal of marriage, and accompany him to the city. As the train pulled out of the station Clara heard one of her neighbors say Clar'd be back soon enough, when her fine city fellow deserted her, and as she placed her hand confidently in Fred's Clara vowed to herself that the folks back home would never be able to laugh at her mistake.

However, with the birth of her children, Fred's natural indolence began to exhibit itself. Although for the first few years under the spur of Clara's indomitable faith he had gotten a job and held on to it, now, weighed down by responsibilities, Fred began to hang out with his old friends and one day, returning home, he told her curtly he had lost his job and he was tired of having to support her and the children—he was through. Aghast, Clara tried to reason with him, assure him he'd soon get another job, but Fred shouted that when he said he was through, he was through, and slamming the door, he went out of her life. She was still dazedly rocking her youngest child when the mailman arrived with a letter from home, telling her if her marriage turned out to be a mistake she could come home and teach again, but realizing how they'd laugh, how they'd say, "I told you so" if they knew she had been deserted. Clara set her teeth and wrote back a cheerful letter saying how happy she was.

Then began a search for work. Boarding her babies in a nursery, Clara took whatever work she could find, and nights would find her appalled as she looked in the mirror to see how lined her face was getting.

Meanwhile in the city, near the railroad, Doctor Lawson went about his work in the hospital. As he entered his office, he saw the waiting room crowded with well dressed women who spent their husband's money consulting handsome young doctors about their "nervous troubles." He groaned as woman after woman simpered at him and complained artfully about how misunderstood and malajusted she was. It was a relief for him to go to the charity wards where at least there was no pretense. Then as they brought in the mangled body of a man, he put aside his speculations and went about his work. Finding a card of identification he sent for the man's wife.

Hours later, Clara returning home found an officer waiting to tell her husband had been in an accident and she was wanted. As Clara waited, Dr. Lawson came forward, and attracted to this mature, splendid woman, Dr. Lawson dreaded telling her. Evasively he answered her questions and at last revealed that her husband was dead. To his astonishment she looked almost relieved, and from her overburdened heart she confided that now she could return to the mountains and no one need ever know about her desertion. As she spoke, Dr. Lawson looked at her with growing interest and taking her hand he asked, "Do you suppose there might be a place in your mountains for a doctor?" Meeting his glance squarely she answered, "There might."

LEAN HARVEST

Ruby Verdell Carson Drama File No. 11910

CHARACTER is emphasized to such an extent in Patricia's home that the girl's parents deny her all the normal pleasures of youth, so fearful are they of dire consequences. Her only joy is in visiting Marion, her cousin. When the two girls are sent to a neighboring town to attend high school, Patricia resolves to enjoy a taste of forbidden freedom while she may. Eager to make good, she is delighted when the Reverend Willis, a minister who lives across the street asks Patricia to assist him with the preparation of his sermons. One afternoon, when his wife is attending a club meeting, he suddenly kisses Patricia passionately, as she stretches her arms in relaxation. Angrily she draws away, yet, starved for affection and in love with this fascinating man, she glows inwardly. In her own room, Patricia gives way to hot tears as she confesses her love to Marion, who comforts her. The next year handsome, popular James Allen, star football player, invites Patricia to the senior banquet. As she dances with him, the Reverend Willis is temporarily forgotten while the girl enjoys her first taste of young love, and during his visits to her home in La France in the summer time the two plan a happy future. Then James' work takes him to Boston and the Reverend Willis again engages Patricia as his assistant. Alone in the house with him, she yields to his embrace, swept away by her great passion. When Patricia tells the Reverend that she is to bear his child he is all tenderness, but at last both agree that this nameless baby must not be brought into the world, as the minister cannot desert his delicate wife. Patricia goes to another city, returning two weeks later with the feeling that she has sinned deeply, added to her other worries.

Again she assists the minister, whose wife asks her to spend the summer with them. Somewhat reluctantly, the girl consents. While the Reverend Willis' wife is away at a sanitarium, he comes to her room in the house. In spite of their efforts the tide of their great passion, once more, cannot be stemmed. Patricia yields to his embraces. The next morning, feeling that she has betrayed Mrs. Willis who regards her as a friend, Patricia hurriedly packs her things and leaves without a word. Going to a distant city she enters training as a nurse. In devoting her life to the service of others, Patricia feels that she is, in a measure, atoning for her sin. But as she sees happy mothers with their babies, remorse steals over her. Tireless in her endeavor to serve others, Patricia wins promotion and the love of her patients. As she is reading, seated beneath a shady tree on the hospital lawn, Patricia hears her name. Looking up she sees the Reverend Willis. As she gives him her hand, Patricia knows that her love for him is as enduring as ever. She promises to become his wife but receives word that night that her mother is ill. Leaving a note which explains that she cannot seek happiness until she has paid for her sins, the young woman hurries to her home. Here she devotes her life to caring for her family, knowing that someday she will have earned the right to happiness with the man she loves. Until that day both wait, their love growing stronger under this test.

YEARS TO PAY

James S. Comett True Story File No. 12441

OVERJOYED to see his grandfather, Duncan who has few childhood playmates, romps happily with him in the yard until inadvertently Duncan injures him. Angry, the grandfather goes for a switch but before he can strike, the six year old in panic throws a rock which bruises his relative's forehead. Impressively, the latter declares that the boy will go to the penitentiary or the electric chair for killing someone before he is eighteen years old. Frightened at the words whose meaning he does not wholly understand, Duncan runs into the house. Years later finds Duncan standing near a theatre with his uncle discussing the latest developments of the war overseas. Suddenly he stops short as he sees his friend Earl with Pauline Phelan and her sister Bertha whom Earl had promised to introduce him to. Tonight is the first time he has seen her and her beauty immediately captivates him. Joyfully, he accepts Earl's invitation to join them and Bertha and he later slip away, bored with the picture. In the ice cream parlor, Duncan's happiness is clouded when Bertha mentions the fact that she has an understanding with Jack, a soldier, to marry him upon his return. Home he finds Earl and Pauline waiting and though Duncan is loath to leave Earl insists. He promises to meet Bertha at the theatre the following night but is detained. Tired of waiting, Bertha is walking home with a girl friend when Duncan hurries to her. There are no reproaches but as she nears the house and the two are alone once more, she seems to grow uneasy. While they are sitting in the porch swing the house door opens and though it is early her father angily orders him to leave. They meet secretly to attend a show and Bertha admits that her father is opposed to the girls going anywhere with anyone. On the way back they meet Delores Jones, Bertha's next door neighbor whose husband is away for the week-end. Though the hour is late she wants excitement and teases them into taking her to a popular roadhouse. They become firm friends and Delores arranges that her house may be the meeting place for the two lovers. The trio go out together frequently but Duncan is unaware of Joe's jealousy for he thinks Duncan is interested in his wife. Meanwhile Delores firmly promises not to write to Jack in the future. Alarmed one night, Bertha confesses that Joe swore he would kill Duncan if he came there again and only for Bertha's sake can Duncan be restrained from confronting him. Secretly the lovers are married and Duncan brings her to his family's house to live. When in the spring, Bertha whispers that she is to have a child Duncan is wildly happy. She plans to work a little while longer. From a co-worker, Mattie, a girl whom he had once eared for, Duncan learns that Bertha is still receiving letters from Jack at the shop. Miserable, he confronts her with it but she denies the charge. Unable to believe her Duncan goes to Delores' home in the hope she may convince him. While Delores seeks to comfort him, Joe enters. Blind with rage, he picks up a hammer and to refend himself Duncan shoots. In a panic he flees—a hunted man who knows that the law is on his trail, escaping to another state. After wandering from one job to another, he finally joins the Navy but the war ends before he is sent over. Although more than a year has passed he is afraid to write his family but does finally, homesick for his wife and unseen child. Traced, Duncan is arrested and tried. Twenty-five years imprisonment is the sentence for Delores testifies against him. Leaving his daughter with Duncan's mother, Bertha has divorced him and married Jack. Eight years later after an earlier petition for pardon has been rejected. Delores confesses the crime was in self-defense. Free at last, Duncan returns to find in his child hopes of happiness for the future.

THE CONSTANT HEART

Salvina Sylvaria Drama File No. 12396

FACING his empty apartment, Lanthelme realizes that his wife has made good her threats to leave him and his millions as a result of his infatuation for a show girl. Meanwhile Mrs. Lanthelme leaves California for New York where she becomes a nurse and later the head of a private hospital. Gloria becomes a modiste and is called one day to the home of the wealthy Gordons to model for their ward Dorothy. The son Kenneth meets her as he is leaving for a spin and instantly attracted returns to the house where the family butler tells him who she is and the reason for her call. Viewing Dorothy as a sister though she is secretly in love with him, Kenneth enters her boudoir and wins permission to watch the "show." Emerging in a gown that shows off her beauty fully, Gloria and Dorothy are both conscious of his admiration as introductions are made. Kenneth persuades Gloria to allow him to drive her back and obtains consent to visit her home the following evening. His wealth troubles Gloria who knows nothing of her background and the faet that Kenneth's father and hers are old friends. In the garden of the Gorden residence, Hughy Dalton, a friend since childhood once again proposes to Dorothy and is refused without any reason given though he suspects the cause. Mrs. Lanthelme approves of Kenneth who becomes a constant visitor. He is overseen with her at a night-club by his father who recognizes the girl as a model. Objecting strongly to his attention to a girl of another class as he considers it, Gordon sends for his son the following morning and orders him to stop seeing Gloria. Kenneth protests that he loves her and intends to marry her despite his fathers threats to disinherit him. Unknowingly, Mrs. Gordon who is blind hears the servants gossip about the situation and has Dorothy write a note to Gloria, asking her to come that evening. Too honest to lie, Dorothy admits that Gloria is a lovely person. Though in her heart she sympathizes the mother dreading a breach between father and son begs Gloria to give him up. Unable to resist the pitiful plea of the blind woman, Gloria agrees. When Kenneth proposes her refusal stuns him. Again and again he begs her to reconsider or else give him a reason. surely she must care! Dismayed he leaves on a trip in his yacht in an effort to forget. Lanthelme comes to New York and is made at home at the Gordon residence. Taken ill suddenly he is rushed to the hospital. Because of his wealth the supervisor comes personally to see that all his wants are attended. With unbelieving eyes Lanthelme stares at her and to the amazement of the doctors the two are in each other's arms—husband and wife reunited. Gloria is sent for at once and with shining eyes is introduced to her father. The next day Gordon and Dorothy call to see Lanthelme's condition and are amazed when he introduces them to his wife and daughter. Gordon is troubled, ashamed to speak for he knows nothing of the reason which caused Gloria to refuse his son. The ever-present Hughy is taken into Dorothy's confidence and at once wires to Kenneth to return. Frightened that something may have happened, the younger Gordon rushes back and is met by Dorothy and Hughy who take him to the hospital. There he is to be reunited with Gloria and receive the older people's blessings. Dorothy is to learn that she cares more than she realized for Hughy and the Lanthelmes face an old age filled with happiness.

THREADS OF DESTINY

Belle Sharp Drama File No. 12245

AFFECTIONATELY, husband and wife embrace as John Rivers returns home from the Wilcox Refinery. Sitting as the dinner table John comments to Julia that everything is running to full capacity and with the increased staff a shortage of housing had resulted. Paul Taylor, a new man to whom he had taken an instant liking, is unhappy in his boarding place so Julia at once suggests that they rent him their room. The Bonds, also new friends of the Rivers, approve of Paul also and both couples are pleased when Paul decides to return to Pennsylvania and bring back his wife. She is to stay with the Rivers until a house can be found. A week later when Mrs. Taylor arrives, strong man though he is, John nearly collapses. Unbelievingly he looks at the woman before him, abruptly acknowledges his introduction to Alice and flees to his room. Alice too seems sadly discomposed but Julia attributes it to weariness from the journey. That night is a sleepless one for John as his thoughts travel far into the past. They had been boy and girl together, youth and maiden—John and Alice—who together find love. Then comes the evening when Alice discloses that she is carrying his child beneath her heart. John stays motionless fixed with horror as Alice voices his thoughts. "Your mother, will she consent?" Dubiously, John answers yes but when Mrs. Rivers hears that her son contemplates marriage, she protests that regardless, nothing must interfere with his college studies. When John remains firm, she resorts to an old device—a stimulated heart attack which she gradually works into a real one. The family physician tells John her life depends upon his obedience to her wishes. Turning coward, John flees from the scene though on the train he has a wild impulse to turn back. Months later he learns Alice has died in a sanatorium with no scandal attached to her name. Deep in his heart, John buries his grief and years later marries Julia. . . . Now love for Alice is reawakened yet for Julia's sake he must remain silent. Later he is to learn that the report of of Alice's death was a false one spread by her mother to conceal the disgrace. In the days that follow it is torture for both condemned to share the same roof as strangers till another house is found. A letter comes at the breakfast table from Alice's mother. Two photographs drop from it and John reaches for them while Alice says, "This is my son Henry. You may have one." And John looks down upon the face of his child whose fate he has never dared ask. Worried because during the weeks that pass, John looks ill Julia arranges a trip for the three couples but he returns looking worse. Julia begs Mrs. Bond, a metaphysician to treat him and to please her John goes. Concentrating on his life Mrs. Bond says, quoting from the scripture, Matt. 10-26, "There is nothing covered that shall not be revealed." Like a blow the truth strikes to him and he confesses it to his wife. Julia is in torture for she cares deeply for both. Feeling Alice has a greater claim, Julia visits her sister. There she commits suicide as the one way to bring freedom. Now aware of the situation, Paul perceiving how the threads of destiny have entrapped him, applies for a divorce while Alice opens a hat shop in a little village. Haunted by the memory of Julia before starting on a trip to relatives, John stops to say goodby to Alice. He will see her when he returns but as the train pulls out, Alice follows Julia's example and for John there is left no purpose in living. Successfully, he too finds escape. Thus he reaps what long ago he had unwittingly sown.

FEED YOUR MAN

Grace Brown Short Subject File No. 12439

ANDRE, after successfully squeezing a number six foot into a size three shoe, limps with fatigue over to the department counter to have them wrapped, whispering to another sympathetic clerk that he will be glad when the day is over and he can go home to Fedora, his wife of a year's standing. At home, Fedora bobs happily about the kitchen putting the roast in the oven. Hearing the door of her next door neighbor, Mrs. Hoyt slam, she runs in for a moment to exchange gossip. Time passes swifter than she realizes and suddenly recalling the dinner she hurries back to her kitchen, filled with smoke. While she mournfully gazes at the charred meat, Andre enters, bursting into a tirade to the effect that here is another meal fit for the Jones' pig. Disregarding Fedora's suggestion that they go out to dinner he puts on his hat again and prepares to leave for the evening. Fedora warns him that she will go back to her mother but Andre only claims it a good idea. She may learn to cook there. A few hours later with tear stains faintly visible Fedora rings the bell of her family's house. From her French mother Fedora has inherited her large dark eyes while the Irish in her father has contributed to her disposition. Ethelynd her sister greets the news of the separation humorously because always before, the next day has found Andre trailing after her but when Fedora breaks into tears her mother comforts her. Mr. Haines takes it philosophically but two months pass with no sign from Andre who though he misses Fedora, fears that running after her will only place him under her thumb in the future. Desperately lonely he accepts the advances of pert Sadee, a waitress in the neighborhood restaurant where he occasionally takes his meals, and agrees to have a foursome at his home the following Saturday night. Tired of housekeeping and enjoying a small raise, Andre advertises for a housekeeper over forty and a good cook. After rejecting six applicants Friday evening another prospect comes who gives her name as Marie St. John. Scrupulously neat and reassuringly grey haired, Andre decides to give her a trial despite the fact she speaks mostly French. She serves a hot steaming breakfast the next morning and agrees to prepare and serve an eleven o'clock buffet lunch for his guests. Sadee arrives that night with her friends Thelma and Harvey and Andre heartily wishes, noting their disreputable air, that they had never come. It is Harvey who suggests playing cards though Andre refuses to play for money. The former also pulls out a large bottle of liquor. Bit by bit Andre is persuaded to drink; later they send out for more and by the time the appetizing supper is served none are fit to appreciate it. Andre attempts to get up and help Marie with the heavy tray but Sadee stays firmly on his lap. Going past her with the coffee later, Marie spills the contents of a steaming cup on Sadee's lap. Sadee drags Andre to the bedroom to give her a negligee that his wife had left while her dress dries. No sooner is she in her slip, calling Andre who is waiting outside the room then Marie walks into the room first, slamming the door. Sleepy, Andre drifts into the other room and is unconscious to the world. Meanwhile Marie orders Sadee and the others out, pulling off her disguise and revealing she is Andre's wife. As she is shooing them out, Andre sleepwalks into his own room and soon Fedora creeps beside him. She wakes with Andre's kisses on her lips the next morning but when he tries to confess last night's party and how the maid had saved him from being compromised, Fedora smiles wisely but says nothing.

THE KILLER

Richard Reynolds Melodrama File No. 12393

THE indignant tones of Mr. Harris can be heard from the library as he orders John Britton, a drug clerk, to keep away from his daughter Pearl whom he aspires to marry. Hurriedly, Pearl seeks to comfort her lover when Tom Darley is announced by Stevens, the butler. Tom who is favored as a suitor by the banker is a gangster posing as an automobile agency owner; Stevens is in his employ and learns with gratification of the recent events. The greetings between the rivals are cool. As soon as he leaves Tom proposes to Pearl and is refused. In revenge, determined to get rid of John, Tom instructs Stevens to kill and rob Harris, throwing suspicion on John. The next morning John is amazed to discover a telephone message telling him to say nothing about it to Pearl but to call on Harris that evening. Pearl attends a dance given in Tom's home that night. When Stevens hears John ring the bell he enters the living room and shoots his employer fatally. Hearing the shot, John forces his way in and in stunned amazement picks up the revolver only to be confronted by the butler and maid who vouch him guilty. While awaiting trial for murder, John finally persuades Pearl that he is innocent and confides that Stevens seems unusually friendly with Tom. Pearl, promising to help, returns home to find that both Tom and Stevens have disappeared for the police have been too hot on the trail of their activities. Convicted for the crime, John uses his savings to bribe the notorious criminal Braxton to help free him while the police transfer John to another prison. In the battle which follows, John escapes though Braxton is killed. Fear of the mails being traced prevents John from writing to Pearl during the years which follow. Fate brings both John and Tom to Arizona where the former becomes leader of a band of outlaws and the latter opens a large gambling resort. Meanwhile, Pearl has lost her money and turns to the stage where she eventually becomes manager of a large troup which tours throughout the country. While driving through the countryside, John is amazed to see posters identifying the girl he still loves as scheduled to give a performance at the Shelton Mansion. Driving over there, he recognizes Tom as his old rival and is determined that she shall not marry him. With his outlaws he invades the place that Saturday night and while his men rob the guests of their spoils, John, masked, seeks out Pearl. When Pearl screams he rips off the mask and in a moment, Pearl is in John's arms. However, the sheriff and his men arrive, and Pearl urges him to flee with her to safety. John refuses to so long as there is a price on his head. He escapes though telling her where he can be found. For John's sake, Pearl pretends friendliness with Tom and overhears Stevens threaten to tell Pearl the truth unless Tom "splits" the winnings fairly. Pearl hurries to John with this information and after wiring the New York police to arrange for Tom's extradition. John returns with his men to the Mansion. While the two gangs fight it out, John corners Tom and forces him to confess. While this is transpiring Stevens tries to kidnap Pearl but her screams bring John to the rescue. While the guilty men are turned over to the authorities, John rejoices in the right to claim Pearl as his wife.

THE FIRST ROSE

Betty Marino Drama File No. 12392

SHYLY, Marguerite walked to the piano. In a moment the entire room was hushed as her lovely voice filled the air with a tender, plaintive melody. Enchanted, Donald watched her from a corner of the room and as the others clapped when the program was over hastily begged his host to introduce him. Better not fall too hard he was warned, Harold Quincy has been in love with her for years and he guards her against all comers. He was detained tonight on business and couldn't come. Donald, laughing his acknowledgement and indifference to the warning strode over to her, his host following in his wake. Once with her, Donald fell silent as his eyes sought to express all the admiration that his lips would not utter. It was Marguerite who understanding and also aware of the strong attraction that existed between them suggested that they walk in the lovely garden filled with early summer blooms. Many were those who commented as they left for Donald's fairness was in excellent contrast to Marguerite's dark beauty. Gradually Donald's tongue loosened and he talked much about himself even revealing the fact that he had always dreamed of an ideal woman he wished to wed and now—Coquetishly, Marguerite prompted him to complete his sentence when footsteps were heard. Harold stood before them with eyes glowering, insisting on taking Margurite home. Before she could reply, Donald said boldly that she had already promised that he might escort her. And though Harold looked incredulous Marguerite agreed. Constantly, Donald visited her during the next weeks only to drop in for tea unexpectedly one day just as Harold was leaving. They had their first lovers quarrel then which ended when Donald unable to bear her unhappy look begged him to marry her. The next day the happy couple planted a small rose bush; the day the first rose bloomed would be their wedding day. Unable to believe that Marguerite was lost to him, Harold fruitlessly begged her to see him. Finally, he came uninvited to bid her goodby. For the sake of old friendship, Marguerite consented to kiss him bon voyage only to have Donald come upon them. Refusing to hear any explanations the jealous fiance left. He lost all control of himself; drowning his senses in liquor. Vowing never again to see the faithless Marguerite he gladly accepted his uncle's offer to take him into business several hundred miles from the site of his former happiness and present misery. . . . Years passed yet always Marguerite remained unmarried, making the garden an altar to their love. In place of the rose that was to mark their wedding day and had long since bloomed and died were hundreds of roses—the showplace of the neighborhood. Harold returned again to beg her to marry him and though she refused the past was recalled so painfully that she moved to a little cottage a few streets away. Meanwhile Donald thought he had succeeded in forgetting her. He planned to make a sensible marriage; love was only for the very young. He went for dinner one night to the apartment of Elspeth Vanderson, planning to propose to her. The table was set for two; in the center a slim vase containing one rose. Seeing it brought back vividly the memory of "the first rose" and suddenly Donald realized that he could not marry her. He must return to his first love. In the perfumed garden, Donald heavily faced the fact that Marguerite was gone. Suddenly as he walked away he heard that well known voice singing in a cottage. So with all misunderstanding fled the flowers that had bloomed unheeded so many seasons were to find a wedding in their midst at last.

THE PATTERN OF YEARS

Mrs. F. P. Dailey Drama File No. 12395

CLOSEST of friends always, Lizbeth and Bettie resemble each other so closely that they are frequently taken for sisters. Love comes to both of them simultaneously and a shadow on their happiness first appears for Lizbeth becomes attached to happy-go-lucky Bryant of whom the family highly disapproves. Bettie grieves over this because her own happiness with Jack who is studying for the ministry is so complete. They plan to be married on the day he is ordained before sailing to foreign lands for mission work. One evening as Bettie leaves her fiance, she finds Lizbeth waiting for her in her room, head pressed against a pillow in tears. Then Lizbeth reveals that she is to have a child and Bryant has fled, joining the navy. To hide the disgrace from her family. Bettie arranges with Lizbeth to visit her old nurse Jane where Emmitt is born in the shadow of the mountains of a secluded community. A few days later, Lizbeth suffers a relapse and before her death forces Bettie to promise that she will care for the baby and never reveal the secret of its birth. Weekends, Bettie slips away to visit Emmitt but it grows increasingly difficult as Jack grows suspicious of her absences. One day he follows her and begs her to reveal whose child it is; beyond stating that it is not hers, Bettie refuses to admit more. Following the ordainment, Jack comes to her and begs Bettie to tell the truth. At her continued silence, Jack flings wild accusations to the effect that the baby is Bettie's. The engagement is broken but to protect her parents they merely state that the marriage has been postponed. A year later Bettie is an orphan and to forget her grief makes her home with nurse Jane. Emmitt proves to be a difficult and unfriendly child, spoiled by the two women. He continues to have his own way upon Jane's death for Bettie continually recalls his mother. To still her longing for Jack, she establishes a small church at the foot of the mountain for there is none around that locality and does lay preaching. Her good deeds make her known and loved by many who term her a Sister of Mercy. Nineteen dreary years pass with Emmitt rarely at home. Feeling burdened as middle age nears, at last Bettie timidly suggests that Emmitt take over the management of the little ranch. Emmitt retorts that he owes her nothing; despite the fact that she has only told him she was his mother's friend he first discloses that he believes her to be his mother. The stigma of illegitimacy weighs heavily upon him. Burdened with sorrow, Bettie returns to her refuge, the little church, where she plays the lovely hymns of her girlhood. She is aroused from her revery by a strange man who comes to her with outstretched arms, declaring that he is Bryant. Where is his child? Close on his heels comes Emmitt who before anyone can stop him shoots his father fatally. He then notifies the sheriff throwing the blame on Bettie. At the trial, fighting for her life, Bettie has a vision of Lizbeth returning to release her from her pledge. The true story frees her and in remorse, Emmitt kills himself asking forgiveness. Meanwhile home on leave, Jack has read of the case and unknown to Bettie attends the trial. In the church he begs forgiveness and the deferred happiness of the past is culminated with wedding bells.

LAW OF THE WEST

Philip Macey Drama File No. 12111

TWO GUN TOM, swaggering bully, jeered at the stranger who entered Crystal Inn. Ignoring him, Syd Thompson the Lone Rider, ordered a drink at the bar and stood treat to the others. Resentful at being left out and convinced that he was being made a laughing stock in Spencer town, Tom informed him that he is the toughest man there and orders Syd away. When Syd evinced no fear, Tom rudely put his hand on Syd's sleeve and tore it. A fight opened and ended in a few seconds with Tom cold on the floor. A crowd gathered quickly and roars of approval heard Syd order out of town the man that Sheriff Hopkins for months had been unable to remove. Despite the pleas of proprietor Fred Allen and his pretty daughter, Lillie, Syd soon left, determined to push further west though he had no definite goal in mind. On the trail, Syd stopped at a farm house for a drink where a tough gang led by Jack Collins invited him to join them. Telling them that he might consider it later, Syd traveled on a few miles to Hartsdon to stay at the inn for the night. There were several other strangers, wanderers like himself, and Syd became rapidly acquainted. Upon this peaceful scene strode the town bullies, Lamson's men, who sought to intimidate Hawk, the proprietor, into giving free drinks. Hawk revealed that he knew they were responsible for the deaths of the former sheriff and deputy. Realizing that Hawk's death may follow from knowing too much, the strangers led by Syd volunteered to guard him, particularly since Syd had knocked down Lanson when he sought to take away their drinks. A trap was arranged whereby after several nights of watchful waiting, Lanson and his men forced entrance thinking that Hawk was alone. Syd from his hiding place fired the warning shots which brought his friends and the law representatives and lined up the gang which went off to face stiff prison sentences. Although this deed brings fresh tributes to Syd, he was worried about the future as his money was slowly melting. Preparing to leave the tavern, Syd glanced at a paper which conveyed the news that Two Gun Tom had returned to Spencer, this time with a gang which was terrorizing the community. Syd's new friends volunteered to return to Spencer and help him clear out the gang. No sooner had they arrived and were comfortably established at the friendly hostler's hotel, then Syd learned that the Sheriff planned to resign and give Syd his position. The Lone Rider consented on the condition that he could select his own deputies. While the new sheriff was in the Crystal Inn one night he saw several of Tom's men which indicated a raid, so Syd sent for his men to prepare themselves. Soon Tom entered and sought to pick a quarrel with the proprietor when Syd came to his defense. There was death in Tom's eyes but Syd was quicker on the draw. He held them at bay until his men could relieve them. A short space of quiet followed when these men were safely imprisoned; then Syd learned that they had been members of Collin's gang who came himself with a fresh brood. Make them come after him, thought Syd so one night he arranged for a friendly entertainment night at the inn at his expense. It was not long before Collins and his men entered; while Collins lunged at Syd who was saved from a foul blow by the proprietor. The deputies burst in and in the melee which followed, Fred received the bullet meant for Syd. The sheriff himself revenged the murder of his friend. . . Peace returned at last to Spencer and Syd was to find happiness running an entertainment and recreation hall with Fred's daughter for his wife.

MOTHER LOVE

Mrs. Merle Mundy Drama File No. 11690

LITTLE remained of the gaiety and vitality Alice had before she married John. John, never a good provider, had forced her to tie her life to a washboard and Alice had forgotten what it was to have a new dress. Even the child Margaret was spoiled through John's erratic habits. Often Alice starved herself so the child wouldn't have to go hungry. Then, when John received his pay, instead of giving it to Alice to buy food, he would buy the largest doll in town for Margaret. Margaret had so long been accustomed to seeing her mother drudging in the kitchen, that she ordered her around and forgot that the patient, sacrificing Alice was human.

At last things became so bad that John insisted on taking in boarders. Alice protested. She remembered how long she had looked forward to having a home of their own, and now John was turning it into a boarding house. John, his new tie flaming red, looked at his wife contemptuously and asked if she was afraid of a little work. So they had put up a sign, "rooms for rent" and in response to it had come Lewis Manning, a widower, and his children. From the first Alice adored the motherless little Manning children and lavished upon them the love she had kept pent up all these years. Margaret, too busy to come home for anything but meals and money, commented jealously on Alice's devotion to the strangers, and John snapped about Alice wasting the cookies on the boarders. But Alice continued to find time to take care of the little ones. Often she would spin stories for them. "And then what happened?" the little ones would ask, eyes wide with wonder. And Alice would tell them. Once Lewis Manning came up, amazed at the story Alice was relating. "That's beautiful," he commented, "who wrote it?" Alice blushed scarlet, but at last she confessed that she made them up as she went along. Manning who had written some stories of his own, marvelled. "They're much too good to be lost," he said, and at last persuaded Alice to dictate them to him and send them off to a publisher. After an indifferent response, the stories attracted attention in the editorial offices and as the genuine pathos and whimsy of the writing was discovered, Alice received a large sum for her work. Elated, she waited for the return of John and Margaret. But before she could speak, John informed her coldly that Margaret was getting married, and John, well John had found someone more up-to-date and was arranging to divorce Alice. Stunned, Alice buried her face in her hands and wept. Then Lewis came up. Gently he patted her shoulder, and as she looked up into the kindly face of the man who understood, she dried her tears. "You see," Lewis was saying softly, "the children all love you and," he continued with difficulty, "I love you too." So at last Alice was to find happiness and, through her writings, fame and success.

THE MONEY DUPLICATING MACHINE

Gaetano Rao Greco Comedy File No. 12208

LEAVING the rival clothing shops of Harold and Caesar, their respective employees, separately, Basil and Felix meet at Grove Street, Chicago, and lunch together. While Harold and Caesar, each decorating their shop with flags, glare at one another, a customer approaches. Smiling at him, Harold persuaded him to enter his store, but he leaves, unsatisfied with the merchandise, for Caesar's establishment, taking the latter's watch. A fight follows, in which each proprietor is assisted by his clerk, tearing the customer's suit. A policeman, stopping the fight, orders Harold to provide a jacket for the man, Caesar a pair of trousers. Secretly, Harold invites Maria, pretty cashier at Stephen's Restaurant to accompany him to Havana. She accepts, also accepting Caesar's invitation to go to Europe. When Maria informs him that she has changed her mind, Harold decides to sail for Europe, too. Vainly, both men wait for the girl, at last departing without her, and each leaving Stephen in charge of his store, after giving their clerks full instructions. Dreaming of Maria, Harold stumbles into his stateroom and soon finds himself in bed with Caesar! The two engage in another fight until a sailor separates them, giving them different quarters. Overjoyed at the departure of their masters, Basil and Felix celebrate, giving suits to their friends and juggling the sales books to cover the losses. Joe, a customer who buys a suit from Felix, demonstrates a money duplicating machine, showing how bank notes can be changed to a higher denomination after they have been chemically washed and reprinted. Introducing Basil as his cousin, Felix persuades Joe to make his friend a partner in this illegal but profitable enterprise. Accompanied by Joe's accomplice, Frank, Felix draws his money from the bank, Basil guarding the door, and also contributing fifty per cent of his wealth to the enterprise. The two comrades celebrate this partnership at a cabaret, drinking and dancing with abandon. However, the next day they find that the money, which should have been changed by the process, has been taken. In its place, only a roll of blank paper has been left, and disconsolately, the clerks realize that they have been taken in. In despair over the heavy losses at the stores, Stephen cables Harold and Caesar, who resolve to forget their personal difficulties and band together in order to declare war on their clerks. Leaving the Bremen, the two take the next steamer to the United States.

While Mrs. Laura, their landlady, demands rent, Felix and Basil search for employment. Reading of a radio school they enroll and are told that if they apply themselves, after completion of the course, they may become as famous as Marconi and other immortal benefactor of humanity. While studying the first lesson, the two fall asleep, dreaming that they are in a vast storehouse. Here Felix is occupied with an electric wave sender apparatus when Basil, with wings attached to his shoulders and an electric case, controlling them, on his chest, appears, announcing that it is time to depart. Placing a like apparatus upon himself, Felix flies out of the window, over the streets of New York at sunset. In amazement, people below stare at them, while the clerks congratulate one another on this triumph over their employers. By means of the electrical transmitting sets upon their chests, the two advise the president of their invention, and are invited to demonstrate. They sink a steamer with this electrical power and are notified that they shall be duly honored. With wreaths about their heads, the two fly over the White House, while thousands cheer. But they are rudely awakened by policemen who take them into custody while Harold and Caesar glare at their disobedient clerks.

NINA

Gaetano Rao Greco Melodrama File No. 12208

IN the shadow of Mount Etna, Pietro Spina herds his sheep, returning home in the evening where Rosa, his wife, Pippo, his son, and the two daughters of the household, Lucia and Grazia await him. Nina, daughter of Pietro's neighbors, Alfio and Maria Rosana, sings as she gathers flowers in the garden; Pippo, riding past, dismounts and takes the beautiful Sicillian girl in his arms, as she informs him that their betrothal is to be formally celebrated on the morrow. At this gala affair, Pietro sings folk songs to the accompanyment of his hand organ, while the young people dance. Rosa, wishing to reduce her son's dower to fifty sheep and three oxen, quarrels with Maria, leaving in a fit of temper. That evening, Pippo lightly throws a stone at his beloved, assuring her that they will find some way to reconcile their mothers, as he takes Nina in his arms. While Alfiio is gathering his sheep, a tempest arises. The same night, George Nelson and William Milton, two English travellers, seek refuge at Alfio's home; Nina notices the glittering diamond on William's finger as she conducts the men to their room. Deciding to remain in the beautiful country for a period, the travellers rent a small green cottage from Alfio. The following day, Nina brings the two a pitcher of fresh milk.

In appreciation of her beauty, William presents the lovely girl with his watch, but this she refuses. When she relates this incident to Pippo, he is almost overcome with jealousy. Encountering Nina as she is herding sheep during her father's illness, William kisses her. Indignantly, the girl slaps him, but when he assures her of his love and ties the watch upon her wrist, she is pacified. Witnessing this scene from a distance, Pippo approaches striking William. The latter slaps him and Nina is angry at this absuive treatment. Confiding his passion for the Sicillian girl to George, William asks him to assist in kidnapping her, but this his friend refuses to do, although at last he consents to having a car at a certain spot to faciltate this crime. Entering Nina's bedroom, William wraps a sheet about the girl and blindfolds her. When he carries her to the car he finds George waiting for them. Sitting in front with George, he releases Nina, and, finding that his friend has provided a trunk filled with exquisite dresses and jewels, William instructs his captive to dress herself. Delighted with the beautiful costume, Nina is carried away with the adventure of the evening and enchanted with William's daring. Readily, she yields to his embraces, fascinated by the young Englishman.

William presents Nina as a Sicillian noblewomen to his guests at a reception in fashionable West End, London. In love with William, Lily Dean is jealous of the Sicillian beauty, who cannot speak English. Feeling strange and shy in the midst of this gathering, Nina persuades William to take her to his isolated country home in Rose Mountain. Here the passionate Tatiana Tourgenhief, who loves William, calls, assuming the name of Mrs. Dorris. Discovering them together, and learning that William has lied to her, Nina quarrels with her lover. Mr. Reo, William's friend, and an attorney, tries to persuade the girl to forgive this indiscretion, but Nina refuses. She shoots William. At the trial, Reo proves that the bullet found in William did not come from Nina's gun. At last, Tatiana confesses that William abandoned her when she was carrying his child because he had seen her embracing her brother, and believed she had another lover; for this, she shot him. Both women are acquitted and Reo urges Nina to become his wife, but she refuses, returning to her native land. Attiring herself in her peasant costume, Nina finds Pippo wandering about his garden, idly singing, his mind distracted by the loss of his beloved. As she rushed to him he recovers instantly, and these two children of Etna find their happiness at last.

LOVE MAKES 'EM NOBLE

Kenneth D. Berdan Short Subject File No. 12444

TWO small boys out for a stroll and whatever a summer afternoon affords—Jimmy christened to his shame, James Archibald, and Benny who blushes when called Benjamin Percival Jones. Temptation is too much when they see Miss Osborn's cat and they "sic" the Watkins pup on while she scrambles on the woodshed. Five minutes later two panting boys arrive in front of the house, ring the bell and suggested rescuing the animal. Miss Osborn calls them into the house to reward them with a dime apiece but most of their attention goes to her niece Rosemary whose name exactly fits in Benny's estimation. Blushing furiously they promise to return the next day and play with her. On the way to the theater, Benny confesses that this must be the love at first sight sister Eve is always talking about though he disapproves of her present beau, Henry Adams. To his disgust Jimmy appears to be a rival, and launches into an enthusiastic description which Benny cuts short by dragging him in to see the wild west show. Coming out, the much impressed Jimmy declares he wants to grow up and be a hero, a modern Knight of the west, but the unfeeling Benny suggests that at his present increasing rate of size he'll need a truck not a horse. Jimmy, using the full name Benny abhors, hotly retorts that with his bow-legs he'd fall off a horse. Their voices grow louder and fight threatens when genial Policeman McGinnis intervenes though he refuses their pleas for just another story. Differences patched, they decide to walk over to Rosemary and cement friendship but they begin arguing again when Benny wants to give her a pup and Jimmy is convinced she'd prefer one of his kittens. Benny feels he speaks with authority on girls' tastes but unnoticing they near the Osborn home and are interrupted by Rosemary who wants to know what the trouble is. She settles it by telling them she likes both and at her request they resignedly shake hands and go home for supper. Harry is already there in the living room and passing by, Benny makes a face that only Eve can see. He ducks into the bathroom but can hear her voice demanding why something isn't done with that young imp. The dinner bell sounds and Benny is seated between his father and Eve while his sister kicks him under the table each time he starts to speak. He races through his meal while Harry again tries to sell stock to his father and then rushes out to play while Eve promises that she will see he goes to bed at nine and his parents plan to go visiting. Jimmy rushes around the corner at Benny's whistel. He has just seen a garage fire which inspires them to pretend the Jones' garage is in flames. Gathering up the neighborhood boys including Herby who acts as policeman since he has a whistle, Benny drags the hose up to the roof. Herby whistles incessantly and the din brings out Harry. Benny can't resist turning the hose on him and the force of water makes Harry lose balance. He trips over the hose jerking Benny down with it. Luckily for Benny, he falls on Harry and the children keep playing the hose to protect him from Harry's grasp. Aroused by the noise police arrive and McGinnis recognizes Harry as a crook for whom a reward is out. Benny is put to bed with a sprained ankle. The next morning Rosemary calls with the newspapers which have his picture and call him a hero. Nobly, Benny remembers the last line of the movie and says huskily, "I did it all for you."

DANGEROUS ROADS

Vito Maniscalco Drama File No. 11956

THOMPSON STREET was always seething with excitement and Abie's empty lot was always the scene for much pugilistic combat between the Italian and Jewish gangs. Both these groups had founded clubs which were to influence the motives and lives of all these boys in later life. Luige Marino, was a powerful influence for lawlessness in the neighborhood. He presided over the meetings as leader of the Italian Dagoes Hell by which name this organization was known. They were implicated in almost every racket known to the police. Samuel Goldberg was the president of the Jewish club known as The Jews of Good Faith and he goaded his members on to many fine and unselfish accomplishments such as aiding the needy families of the street and caring for the indigent and sick. Luige's pretty sister Maria was not at all in sympathy with her brother's views and heartily approved of Sammy's many good deeds. She wished Luige would stop ridiculing this fine wholesome lad. Sammy although disapproving vehemently of Luige's daring activities was very much in love with Maria and they were fast friends. It was only a difference in their religious beliefs which kept them from admitting their affection for each other. Years passed and Sammy had won a scholarship which helped him to continue his schooling and he had graduated college, studied law and had achieved fame as a prominent lawyer. He was appointed to the bench from where he continued to direct the poor unfortunates toward the right road and so continue to carry on his efforts for the betterment of mankind. On one occasion a man was brought before him, accused of having been implicated in a holdup which had resulted in the slaying of an innocent bystander. Sammy stared hard at the prisoner, years had aged him but had not removed the hard unpleasant expression which he had always observed in the old days on Thompson Street as belonging to Luige Marino. All this brought back memories. He thought of how far their roads had diverged. It was difficult to be unbiased in his decision as he still thought of the leader of the Italian gang of Thompson Street, as a childhood friend who had unfortunately taken the wrong road. The lawyer for the defense entered his plea and now it was for the jury to state the fate of this man. Sammy saw a look of recognition pass over the face of the prisoner. At that moment the jury retired and the judge asked for the prisoner to be brought to his chambers.

When Luige entered the room Sammy asked him for news of Maria whom he had never quite forgotten. Luige told him that she had resented his companions and had taken a room by herself so that she could lead a respectable existence and she had since married a fine upright man and was very happy. Luige repented the life he had led and promised if the sentence was light that he would trod the straight road. The jury returned with a verdict of "Guilty." The sentence was ten years imprisonment at the end of which time Luige was certain that his plan of life would be different.

REUNION NIGHT

William C. Manes Drama File No. 12419

THE office door banged. Sambo, the colored janitor gives a knowing look at Miss Anderson the secretary and starts scrubbing the president's desk vigorously. Striding to his chair, Dick Moulton orders him away and begins sorting through his mail. His fingers pause on a card at which he stares fixedly for a moment and then murmurs aloud "Alumni of Briggs Union High School are cordially invited to attend the reunion banquet and dance at the Colonial Hotel, 7 p. m., June 30." Miss Anderson has ceased typing and looking up at her employer wonders aloud how long since he has been back. Ten years. At her instigation the floods of talk and memory are loosened. In retrospect the scene shifts back to childhood. . . . Dick lived on a ranch at the outer edge of the little town; his father is generous but busy, the mother occupied with social acivities. Grandfather Ned is his sole companion untli he begins school where he meets Patsy Bryan who lives a half mile away. Together they walk to school until Grandfather Ned buys them bicycles. Together always—at the head of each successive class; constant playmates outside of school. Patsy even then was a pretty child and in seventh grade other boys began to take notice. Eddie Dugan who sat behind her teased her always. One day he hid her arithmetic papers and angered, Dick challenged him to a fight. The entire class assembled after school to watch him fight the bigger boy while Patsy held back her tears, fearful for Dick. And when he stood triumphant though his right eye was closing fast, Patsy threw her arms about him, regardless of the staring eyes and children who cried, "Patsy's got a sweetheart. Dick's her beau." From that day on they were more than friends. Great was their childish happiness when Dick was named valedictorian and Patsy salutatorian as they graduated from grammar school. In high they joined the band and each evening practiced on their saxophones at his house. Though grandfather thought it sounded more like fog horns he proudly accompanied them to Sacramento where they won the state band contest. He triumphed on the football team proud that Patsy and grandfather were watching. When he broke his leg in one game, Patsy was with him daily. Grandfather's last request before he died was that they remain sweethearts and marry. In his final year Dick's parents died in an automobile accident and he made his home with his father's partner. All he had left was Patsy. The day after graduation the senior ball was held at the Colonial Hotel. There he asked her to marry him, standing beside the fountain in the garden. To his amazement, Patsy refused. She would not marry him until he had made a success of himself, chosen a career as she planned to, though Dick unsuccessfully sought to convince her there was plenty of money until he had determined his life work. They quarreled bitterly when he accused her of caring more for her ambitions than for him. The next day Patsy left to go in training at a hospital. All these years he had not heard yet still he cared. Perhaps she would be at the reunion. . . . Abruptly he wires his impending arrival and leaves by plane. Ten years have changed him he reflects at the banquet looking at the others who have also changed. None remind him of Patsy and Eddie the only one he recognizes, has not seen her. Because a girl reminds him of Patsy though she looks much younger he dances with her and walks out to the garden. Beside the fountain he tells her of the love he expressed in that spot ten years ago. "Dick," she cries. Patsy and he are in each other's arms as she explains that for years she has returned hoping to see him, knowing that her love for Dick was above all else. And now it is Dick's turn to reveal he too is free, having waited for her. "Let's be married tomorrow," he suggests. Shyly laughing, Patsy answers "No, tonight."

LOVE FOR TWO

Henry A. Hansmeier, Jr. Melodrama File No. 12500

WHILE the birthday party for their daughter, Ruth, was at its height, her father, Walton, wealthy manufacturer of Birdwing-Sport planes, looked approving at the male guests who represented the social cream of the city. He frowned, however, when he saw Elmer Rathcliff, photographer for a leading newspaper who had dropped in on the pretext of taking a picture. Elmer and Ruth had been together too often lately for his liking. Why didn't Dr. Brandinger come? Since his arrival in town a few months before with an apparently unlimited bankroll and social references, Brandinger had been a constant approved visitor at the Walton home. Striding into the room now, Brandinger apologized to his tardiness while Ruth greeted him warmly. Always Ruth felt uncomfortable when Elmer and Brandinger were together. Surely she could not be in love with both and yet when she was alone with either one of them she felt herself caring deeply; their presence together only confused her. Sensing this, Elmer slipped away and Ruth accompanied Brandinger to the garden. There he pressed his lips tightly against her while Ruth sought to resist; she felt dizzy and suddenly slumped in his arms. Over the hedges sprang several masked men who overpowered and tied the doctor, dragging Ruth away. It took a few moments to twist off the gag and scream for help. For two weeks police sought vainly for a clue until a note came ordering $50,000 ransom. Meanwhile Ruth was a prisoner in an apartment, seeing no one except a Chinese maid who confessed that she too had been kidnapped years before since they thought Wang Li, her fiance was wealthy. He was unable to raise the money and so Landa whose nurse's training made her valuable was kept a prisoner. The one thing she knew of the kidnapper was that he always left knotted string about. With much difficulty the Waltons raise the money aided by a loan from Brandinger and a new note is received ordering Elmer to pilot a plane which will meet another containing Ruth. The girl will be exchanged for the money in mid-air. To save her life the plane is not followed by the police until after Ruth is reported safe. A joyous reconciliation was held but Elmer left, heartbroken after Mr. Walton attempted to pay for his services and Ruth confessed that she was not sure if she cared; even if she did she would not oppose her parents. For a year Elmer wandered, secking to forget while Ruth continued to postpone her engagement to Brandinger. In Shanghai Elmer found himself broke and aware that distance had not cured him of love. Wang Li identifies him as an American and enters into a conversation when they discover they attended the same university. Over dinner they exchange stories while Wang told of his own sweetheart kidnapped while he was with her, hypnotized, unable to move. Since Landa vanished he secluded himself continuing his chemical research on rare diseases and body conditions. Elmer persuaded him to experiment with hopeless sufferers and their cures bring them wealth. One night at the Walton home, Brandinger confessed an old habit, knotting string. Ruth confided to her parents that she felt it was Brandinger who had her kidnapped. He is secretly watched and is killed, trying to kidnap her a second time. However, Ruth has fallen into a hypnotic comma and the country's most skilled men cannot waken her. Elmer reads of this in Shanghai and persuades Wang Li to treat her. Part of the trip is made by plane which crashes but they are rescued by another ship while thousands await news of their flight. Ruth is to be saved and find happiness with Elmer while when Landa calls on Ruth—Wang Li is there and two more hearts are reunited.

WHEN LOVERS MEET

Peter F. Mescher Drama File No. 10604

THE day that John gets a job he rushes to Mary's home and swinging her off her feet, exclaims happily, "Now we can be married." Dazed by their good fortune, they sit down together and make plans. John is starting with a salary of fifteen dollars a week. "Of course," he explains, "That isn't much for a start, but there's no telling how much I'll be making in a few months." Fondly Mary lets him talk on, but ever more practical, she finally stops him and urges that they wait a few months until they have some money saved, and then they can be married. John at last agrees, and as he kisses her warmly, he groans, "It's going to seem like a terribly long wait."

Each day John comes home to tell Mary about his experiences. Minimizing the discomforts of the office, neglecting entirely to tell her how they treat him like an office boy, John tries to find encouraging things to talk about, and Mary who addresses envelopes at home to earn a few dollars a week, never knows how much of an effort it is for John to sound happy over his job. At last, failing of anything else to talk about, John speaks of Molly, the bookkeeper who is always kind to him. After a while Mary gets tired of hearing, "Molly did this," and "Molly said that" and one night she loses her patience. Hurt, John suggests they go for a walk, but on the way an over-painted girl stops them and addressing John familiarly, is obviously cool to Mary. Intuitively Mary recognizes Molly for a cheap girl who is out to place her John among her conquests. John, however, thinks that Mary is unfair, and this time they quarrel.

The next morning John appears at work gloomily and a hundred times is on his way to ask for forgiveness. Then Molly turns her ankle as she passes John's desk at five thirty. As she winces with pain, John is forced to offer to help her home. Molly claims she cannot maneuver the steps, and John helps her to her room. . . . .

Remorse overwhelms John as he realizes he has betrayed Mary but when at last he comes to her shamefaced, she pats his head gently and tells him it was as much her fault as his. John leaves his job and finds another, and they are married. About a year later, Mary is appalled to discover that Molly has traced them to their new home and exhibiting a baby she claims is John's Molly demands money for the baby's support. John, who has been rejoicing over the success of their budget, loses all hope and burying his face in his hands gives up in despair. However, Mary hiding her distaste, promises they'll allot a part of their income each month toward Molly's child. The months roll by. Despite all their efforts at cheeriness, Mary and John are filled with dread as they realize that it is impossible to save any money because of Molly. Then one day one of John's friends worriedly confides that he has gotten in trouble with a woman. Stirred by the similarity of the circumstances, John makes further inquiries and learns that Molly has been victimizing several men simultaneously with the same trick. She is offered an alternative of leaving town or being arrested, and freed of the disheartening burden, John and Mary take a new lease on happiness.

PIONEER

Stella Tripp Bickford Drama File No. 12440

GOD fearing and home loving people, wagons of pioneers come into new territory to build their homes and raise their families. Martha Holbrook is a small child clinging timidly to her mother's skirts while the Randal family welcomes them, taking them into the hospitality of their home until the men of the community can help them build a house. Playing with Jim, two years older than she, Martha is reluctant to go to bed her first evening. When they move on their own farm the children see little of each other until Martha is old enough to attend the small community school. When Jim's much older sister, Prudence, is to be married the entire population from tots to old men and women turn out for the "raising" held when the frame of the house for which all the men would join in cutting logs each time a wedding neared, was ready. Savory beans and mounds of brown bread filled the guests at Prudence's home. They divide into groups, the children shrilly playing together; the older women giving housewifely advice to the younger ones who only half hear as their eyes exchange bashful glances with shy swains. When Holbrook approaches the children. Martha begs for her favorite story. Tightly she holds Jim's hand as the father tells of the cold winter night when he heard for the first and last time the cry of a mountain lion known as the Indian Devil. Indians claim that when great peril threatens, the Indian Devil comes soaring on the wings of the wind, spreading the message of death. Years later Martha is being courted by Jim and Lincoln Hansoomh while families with kindly interest wonder which one she will choose. There is to be a "raising" for Martha's friend, Hannah. There Lincoln proposes to Martha who admits that she can look upon him only as a friend. At the supper table, Jim reminds her of the first "raising" they attended together. In silent consent they slip away and Jim wonders if the next community affair may not be in honor of their own approaching nuptials. Knowing that her people regard him highly, Martha shyly gives him permission to ask her parents for her hand. So they become engaged and the frame work of their house goes up. War comes upon their happiness like a thunderbolt. Martha joins her tears with the other women as she bades her Jim goodby; waving to him as he marches away in his glittering new uniform. Lincoln, too, comes to see her before he leaves; for him Martha will always be a tender memory he promises. All that winter those at home feed their spirits on letters. When her father comes down with a cold, Martha goes to the barn to milk the cows, leaving the lantern to pick up on the return journey. It is then she hears the cry of the Indian Devil forced by cold and hunger to forsake his remote haunts. The mountain lion is only a few yards away when she finds safety in the house. A few days later word comes that Lincoln has been killed and the memory of the superstitution returns. During the months that pass all are accounted for but Jim. Finally a letter arrives that he is coming home shortly. Sleepless, Martha hears again the Indian Devil. She thinks it harbors harm for Jim. Desperate, she slips out with a gun and with a lucky shot destroys him, only to fall unconscious. Weeks later she recovers giving Jim up for lost. Returning from the graveyard, she looks up to see Jim before her. Near death the night of her feat, he was made a prisoner and won his freedom through exchange. Holding him fast in her arms, Martha whispers that no Indian Devil can ever again frighten her.

FORTUNE HUNTER

Helen Mullen Drama File No. 12420

STARING at the rancid coffee and stale buns which represent his only meal for the day Roger Bowman carefully counts the last few cents in his pocket. Something must be done and soon unless he wants to starve to death. Once again he hopelessly looks over the want ads in the newspaper but there is nothing open even though despite his legal training, Roger is willing to take any kind of labor. Like thousands of others he has graduated from college in the middle of depression and found his inheritance swept away when the banks failed. A picture of a pretty girl attracts his attention and he reads that she is willing to marry any man who can give two thousand dollars to help her family. Abruptly Roger leaves the table and goes to the newspaper office. There under the questioning gaze of the clerk, he inserts a notice that he will work anywhere for a year in return for board and lodging. Crossing a busy intersection on the way back to his rooming house he pulls a girl back from the oncoming wheels of a speeding car. Long after she thanks him Roger keeps in his memory the picture of her lovely face. To the grim awaiting landlady, Roger pleads for one more day of grace though his rent is due. With her words of warning—pay up or get out—still ringing in his ears he awakes the next morning to hear himself being called to the telephone. An hour later he is in the study of Johnaton Cleeve who agrees to hire him as his private secretary under the terms of his advertisement with a bonus of one thousand dollars if he proves satisfactory. As they are parting Lucy enters and is introduced to him as Cleeve's ward. The young people stare in silence as Lucy recognizes him as her rescuer of the day before. Cleeve frowns at this and when Roger reports for duty, having moved his things to the house, warns him that he expects Roger to keep away from Lucy. The secretary flushes but is silent. Despite this when they meet in the hall later, they go for a walk together. Roger gives his personal history and in exchange she tells him that she has been Cleeve's ward for ten years. Her estate is to be turned over to her when she reaches her majority in a few months. Harvey Nelson, the suitor who is favored by Cleeve meets them when they return and angrily ignores the introduction, sensing a rival. Since he needs to keep his position, and realizing that he has no right to court an heiress, Roger avoids the girl during the following months. Not understanding, Lucy makes several approaches to him unsuccessfully until one evening he finds her crying in the library. Roger begs her to tell him what has happened and she then confesses that her guardian is determined she shall marry Harvey whom she detests. Unable to restrain his satisfaction at the news that she does not care for Harvey who calls daily, Roger declares his love. Lucy acknowledges that she also cares and the two plan for the day when Roger's term is up and with his promised bonus they can marry and leave for the west where his uncle has a ranch. Cleeve finds them together and refuses to listen to their protests of love, ordering Roger to leave the house without any money, the next morning. Roger feeling that he is entitled to something for his work goes to Cleeve's office. There he overhears a conversation between Cleeve and Harvey which reveals that Cleeve has swindled part of Lucy's fortune and hopes to conceal it through marrying his ward to Harvey. Threatening to send him to prison, Roger forces Cleeve to relinquish the remainder of the estate and consent to their marriage.

THE DRIFTER

Juanita Duncan Western File No. 12422

INFATUATED with Tom Yates, Betty ignores the warnings of her foster father, Bill Reed, who with disgust hears her invite him to stay for supper. Over the meal, Tom again renews his repeated suggestions that Reed sell his rich ranch to him. As always Reed refuses. On this land he was born and here he intends to remain. There is a loud knock on the door and Jim Bradley, his nephew strides in. Always Bill has cherished the hope that Jim and Betty will marry and until Tom came to the district there was hope. Jim's face brightens at his uncle's welcome but clouds as Betty greets him briefly for she has cooled noticeably in the past weeks. Jim tells them that a protection committee is being organized in the town among the sheep herders. For months animals have been found with their throats slit and desperate at their mounting losses and inability to catch the perpetrator have sold their land cheaply to Tom who now owns a considerable part of the valley. Reed readily agrees to go but while Tom hesitates, Betty begs him to stay and keep her company. The bunk house where the hired men are is some distance away and their talk tonight makes her afraid to be alone. Riding to their destination, Reed confesses that he is suspicious of Tom though he can find no definite reason. Trailing along behind them is Billy, Jim's faithful dog who always accompanies his master. The ranch owners elect Jim in charge of the newly formed organization and Jim at once appoints men to take turns at guarding the sheep for they fear that someone of the hired men may be responsible and resolve to trust no one, keeping tonight's business secret. As they leave, Reed again begs Jim to go into partnership with him but Jim explains that he is too much the drifter to settle down in one spot. Warned by a strange instinct, Jim looks behind him as the sun is setting the following evening and sees a rider silhouetted against the sky. Hiding behind a buff he waits until the rider passes, recognizing him as Tom. Impulsively, he follows him to the town saloon and watches Tom enter, from an obscure window. Tom stops at Reed's table and though he is unable to hear, Jim notices that Tom suddenly flushes and leaves suddenly. Later he sees him in conference with three of the town's noted bad men who slip into a private room. He makes his way there and tries to listen but only overhears the words—Reed tonight. The waiter is approaching so Jim strides over to his uncle only to hear that he has lost several more sheep the night before. To Reed's relief, Jim declares that he will sleep over at his house that night. When everyone is asleep, Jim with his dog slips out and stations himself at the feed barn which affords a good view. Before he can move, he sees a figure slip through the gate and empty white powder which recognizes as deadly glass into the sheep's feed. Excited Billy barks and before Jim can move the stranger is on his horse. Running, Jim shoots at the fast disappearing figure whose horse falls. Dismounting the other shoots back and Jim slumps to the ground. Billy in wild fury leaps for the man's throat and kills him. Half-dressed, Reed and Betty rush out flashing lanterns. Jim has already dragged himself down to the body to make his suspicions certain. The body is revealed to be that of Yates. And as Betty anxiously runs to Jim afraid that he is hurt Reed looks at him significantly while he helps Jim to the house. "You won't be a drifter any more," says Reed while blushing Betty kisses Jim's wounded arm.

LOVE FOR SALE

Drama File No. 12327

IN the romantic air of Paris, Martha Fair experiences her second youth again. With her son Jack as escort she insists on exploring all the odds and ends of Paris while the more sedate daughter, Isabel, is more interested in her studies. Amused, however, she sees her mother off to the latest night club whose opening is to bring everyone of any importance in Paris. Here Jack jubilantly greets a party of friends, among them Molly with whom friendship is ripening into love. Among the gathering is Duke Paul Romanoff, exiled from Russia. Martha feels a bit lonely as she sees the two young people smoothly gliding onto the dance floor and accepts with eager appreciation the attentions of Paul. It is not long before Paul ascertains that the family has money and gradually in the days that follow he becomes an intimate of the family. Secretly, Isabel falls in love with him and is overjoyed when he decides to join the group in Dauville where they leave to spend the hot season. Isabel retires early for she is unable to bear the polite attentions which is all that Paul offers and Jack has wandered off with Molly now his fiancee. Together, Martha and Paul ride for hours through the night. The moon glows invitingly upon them as for the first time Paul takes Martha in his arms and murmurs his love. That night Martha becomes Paul's mistress. Gradually, Paul borrows inoreasing sums from Martha and no longer mentions returning it. At Monte Carlo which they visit for a few days, his losses are so heavy that Martha, alarmed at last, refuses on the plea that she has no money left. Knowing that this is false, Paul breaks into her room after dinner, where, Martha, returning finds him. When she threatens to call police, Paul laughs at her for she will have to explain how he happens to have her key. Footsteps announce that the children are approaching and when Paul threatens to open the door and reveal himself unless—she consents. Next morning Paul apologizes and in her infatuation, Martha gladly accepts him on the old terms. Then a letter comes that he has only a few days before a large note falls due. Knowing that it is impossible to obtain this from Martha, Paul at last decides to seek Isabel's hand in marriage. To avert suspicion, Paul claims to Martha that gossip will cease if he is seen more often with her daughter. Not until one night when she overhears them does Martha realize that Isabel has promised to marry her lover. When she tries to bribe Paul to leave, he only laughs. Only when Isabel, too, refuses to listen does Martha face the realization that she will have to confess her relationship. With much pain she does this, only to learn that Isabel knows this and despises her but she refuses to give up Paul. She leaves with him after declaring that she never wants to see her mother again. The father places a large settlement on them but three years show Paul in his true colors. Although Dick Whitney who has loved her for months pleads with her to leave him for the sake of her child, Isabel stays. Then she discovers that Paul has been secretly blackmailing her mother, anxious to keep the past a secret from her husband. In the struggle, Paul accidentally shoots himself. It is Dick who hushes up the tragedy and reconciles mother and daughter who suffered through the same man. Later when Isabel consents to marry him, Dick feels well repaid.

MEANEST MAN MADE

Edward Girard Short Subject File No. 12486

CITY Editor Harlan and his assistant Rex are gossiping in the newspaper office during a lull when the telephone rings. Harlan orders the message repeated and then calls to a reporter, Jerry Lunt, just returning from a meeting. Gar Guff who has a leading finger in every important activity of the town has just died—president of the bank, Midland Utilities and the biggest department store. Here is the biggest story of the week. Rex expresses the other's sentiments when with a shrug of his shoulders he asks, "Who cares." Both laugh; then Harlan points out that the day Guff is buried no one will shed a tear. Everybody hates him; privately he has won the title, "Meanest mean man made." Rex comes back from the newspaper morgue with clippings which have followed the career of the wealthy man. Picking up each one, Harlan relates the real story behind it. That article on Guff closing his loan office; here is where he obtained the foundation of his present fortune charging as high as two hundred and three hundred percent interest until the courts interfered. When the war came he sold a million woolen blankets to the army which turned out to be made of cotton. The war over, Guff bought up property on the north side and in the panic of 1920 and 1921 when people couldn't pay their rents, Guff ordered them evicted. Already he had obtained political influence and judges listened to his orders. Hatred of Guff really came to a head though when he bought the municipal water works and electric plant. Rates were immediately increased on the grounds that he had spent a great deal for improvements. He drove an aspiring district attorney who fought his policies out of the state and swore at that time, "I'll go to my grave revenged on all my enemies." "And did he?" asked Rex. So Harlan tells the story of Guff's personal life. His one weakness was his daughter Ruth. He denied her nothing though when she began to see much of Jerry Lunt, Guff protested. Only Ruth could tease him into good humor; she promised that she and Jerry would take no serious step without winning his consent first. Then Guff always eager for more power and prestige brought Leland Brandel, who had wealth and social prominence to the house and encouraged Leland to propose to Ruth. Instead she rejected him and declared she wanted to marry Jerry. Angry, Guff ordered Jerry never to see Ruth again; and Ruth because she loved her father agreed. One thing though, she would never marry another man and five years have passed since then, two lovers still faithful though they never spoke. Soon after Guff planned to have his department store cover the entire block. All sold out except Jerry's brother, Hal Lunt, who owned the funeral parlors. Hal kept laughing while Guff desperate raised his offer until it reached a staggaring total. There was nothing else to do; the shop was in the middle of the block and Guff swore that he would be revenged but the opportunity never arrived. Death has come instead. Slowly the office door opens; it is Jerry returning but his slow step makes them immediately suspect something has happened. Jerry tells them Hal was called to embalm the body; the scalpel slipped and Hal contracts sceptic poisoning. Beyond the grave the meanest man has fulfilled his pledge. Again the door opens but this time it is Ruth, released from bondage, come to comfort Jerry. Not even Guff can imprison love forever.

BROODING SPIRITS

Lilly Hirt Short Subject File No. 12434

IN a sceptical mood, David Larson goes to the home of Elisa Randolph, a spirit medium. Her frail beauty reflected by a faint light as the members attending the seance gather about the table, intrigues him. He himself examines the couch on which she reposes to make sure that there are no trick attachments. His fingers barely brush her tender skin and David shivers. Lights go out; an air of brooding quiet in the room with the stuffed owls gazing mournfully and lifelike from their corner perch. Out of the silence comes a voice from the distance then comes closer with the words, "Our Father—" until in unison the company recites it. David listens unbelievingly as overhead come the sound of voices lifted in sweet religious tunes. Balls of lights and trumpets dance with no visible support, circling about their heads. A banjo plays with no hands near it; there are laughter, shrieks, crashing sounds. A childish apparition stands before them holding a smaller figure. Timidly someone asks from where she comes and a young voice answers, "Why taking this Esquimo baby back to its heavenly home. . . . I've come all the way from distant lands to show it to you." A sudden shout in the darkness as David's neighbor recognizes the mother he had long mourned dead, singing the songs dear to him in childhood. David feels himself stifling while to and fro an Indian walks to collect their questions. David wonders if he dreams for he alone sees Elisa rise from the couch, eyes moist with tears. On she walks and into space he follows, deep into a cavern back of the house—in reality a square hole in the ground. He tries to follow her through but in a moment a ghostly form returns and yet he knows that it is still Elisa. The others leave yet David lingers to speak with her. Elisa tells him of a ponderous cook who stands by her side often as she plays. She describes him as an enormous man of gigantic strength dressed in white cap and apron, who grows larger each time he appears, pointing to a spot in the sunken garden. Each day when she returns home the spirit is waiting for her. At last she tells him that she will visit the direction at which he points thinking to dispose of him thus but when she arrives there is nothing but the dug up earth of the gardener's spade. All else is desolation. David asks if she did not feel reassured then but Elisa declares that the cook now spoke and urged her to return. Suddenly silence returns and bending over, David sees that she is asleep, or fainted. A spell is fallen about the house; David hears a tapping on the window pane. Staring out he sees the figure of the cook beckoning. Into the garden David follows; he sees the gardener and cries to him to dig deeper while the cook piles up boards from the earth. In the depression looms a cave and with timid steps drawn by inexplicable force David enters, eyes straining into the dark until they grow accustomed. What seems to be an old mouldy brush at first gradually takes the sbape of a bed; nearby is a rickety table. Afraid he turns to flee when a sliver of light falls upon a stone at his foot strikes, loosening it and revealing a jar of precious stones. Bearing jewels that typify wisdom, patience, tenderness and contentment he returns to Elisa. Together they see another picture of a husky pioneer, the man who once occupied the house and hear him mutter "Buenos Dias," this spirit which could not rest until the jewels were found. Clasped in each other's arms they know the brooding spirits are now at rest.

TROPICAL LOVE

Cornelia Browne Drama File No. 12418

EXCITED over the party in her honor that evening, pretty sixteen year old Celia Lenihan takes a reassuring peek in the mirror before going down to greet the guests to whom Ada and Maurice, her sister-in-law and brother, introduce her. Of the younger men there it is Johnie Welbourn, cashier in the Railway Paymaster's office, who wins her fancy. He continually cuts in on dances and young Celia before the festivity is over agrees to go to the theater with him the following evening. Just before she retires in the early morning hours, Ada stops in for a chat. She warns Celia not to grow too friendly with Johnie since he has a reputation for going around with a wild group of men older than he. Celia declares there is nothing to worry about and continues to see Johnie daily. Returning from a dance one night, Johnie tensely holds her to him and claims that life is not worth living unless she agrees to marry him. Swept off her feet, Celia accepts but the young couple realize that her relatives will strongly oppose the match. Ada is waiting for Celia to tell her that unless she stops seeing Johnie they will send her home. The two meet secretly and plan to elope. Friday night, Celia tells Ada that she is spending the night with Helen Coleman. When Maurice says that he is going over to play cards with Coleman whose wife and sister are away for the weekend, Ada realizes she has been deceived. Maurice is preparing to search for her, when Wolfe another cashier reports that he saw Celia taking a bus. Her relatives trace the couple on the way to a minister and convince them that they should wait until Johnie is earning more. Meanwhile they can continue to see each other. Nifty Bolton and his gang suggest to Johnie that he help them rob the company that coming pay day. Johnie refuses but reconsiders when while waiting for a trolley with Celia after a date at the movies she comments on the well dressed women who pass in luxurious cars and wishes that she could be like them. In the holdup which Johnie aids by opening the cage door when the gang enter, Maurice is killed. Members who are caught implicate Johnie who has disappeared. Heartbroken Celia returns home. Several years later she meets Lieutenant Anderson and realizes that her feeling for him is really love while the other was infatuation. Anderson is transferred to a post in the Phillipines and she accompanies him as his bride. Entering into the ordinary social routine she meets many foreigners, among them the ruler of a neighboring group of islands, a half caste Oriental renegade, El Lobo, whose striking European dress and oriental turban make him a conspicuous figure. Celia's fair blondness attracts him and he sets out to win her. Although she vaguely distrusts him, out of pique because Anderson is jealous, Celia allows him to visit her but when he declares his feelings El Lobo is severely repulsed. She refuses to see him. Learning she frequents a little cove alone, El Lobo has her kidnapped. She is brought to his luxurious apartments. When El Lobo enters he seeks to kiss her but she bites his hand. Angered, he threatens dire punishment and orders one of his servants to guard her, a beachcomber he has recently hired. Although she fails to recognize him at first, the guard snaps on a light and is revealed as Johnie. He secretly sends word of her whereabouts to her husband. While they await help, El Lobo returns. Johnie refuses to admit him and in the struggle is critically wounded as Anderson arrives with a band of soldiers. While Celia rests his injured head on her lap, she eagerly reassures him that with this act of bravery he need not fear meeting Maurice in afterlife.

CUPID NEVER MISSES

Herman Uhlig Drama File No. 12423

THE wealthiest family in town, the McDonalds, are seated at the breakfast table. Esther as usual is late, having beein out late at a party the night before and now is eagerly relating details. Sarah, the eldest daughter, is in strong contrast to her reckless sister, preferring to live quietly. While Sarah goes into the garden refusing Esther's invitation to drive to the amusement park ten miles away Esther drives off in the old roaster ignoring as usual the chauffeur, Sam, whom Sarah always has drive her. Nearing the park entrance brakes grind sharply but not swift enough. A policeman helps her carry small Tom Brenner who had run under the car into the machine. The hospital reports that he is suffering from a broken leg and the policeman, since it is not her fault, permits her to go. Home, the family are discussing the arrival of Mr. Robert, an old friend of Mr. McDonald, with his son Dick, whom they hope will be attracted to Sarah. Afraid to go home and upset, Esther wanders in the park. When she trips nearly spraining her ankle, Jack, a laborer springs to her assistance. Learning that it is his brother she ran over she is too ashamed to reveal her true identity. As they talk she learns that he is a college man forced to resort to this when he failed to find other work. Returning home, she confesses the accident and her father assumes all the bill. Daily, Esther visits the hospital and then the park. Dick who has arrived takes a liking to her at once but Esther knowing ber family's secret hopes refuses all his invitations so he takes Sarah instead. As she is ready to drive off one morning, Dick begs Esther to permit him to accompany her. Armed with toys they visit the hospital where Dick and Tom hit it off instantly together. She yields to Dick's pleas to have lunch with him but refuses to allow him to go with her to the park. There Jack jubilantly tells her that Tom doesn't know it yet but he is taking him home the next day. He makes her promise to come there. Esther drives him back to the crude little house so she may find the address easily the next visit when with Jack's permission she is to bring Esther and Dick. Tom promises that he will not disclose who she is but when introductions are being made Tom grows excited as he waves his crutches on the staircase and starts to call her by name. Jack turns to Esther accusingly and orders her from the house refusing explanations. Sarah sends the two on ahead and apologizes. Seeing that Esther is upset. Sarah returns to the park the following day and though Jack will not consent to see her sister he finds himself much more attracted to Sarah who feels drawn to him also. Meanwhile Esther and Dick go horseback riding a truck frightens Dick's horse as it cuts across the animal's path. Dick is thrown, his leg broken, and the horse has to be shot. During the following days Esther is with him constantly but the invalid is afraid to tell his love for fear that she cares for Jack and Jack who cares for Sarah is afraid to speak remembering Dick. Leaning that there is an opening in her father's office, Sarah makes an appointment with him at her home. Not until he arrives does he realize the importance and wealth of the McDonalds and that it is her father he is speaking to. Mr. McDonald likes him at once and offers him an excellent position. Ignoring him in his excitement, Jack asks Sarah if she will marry him. After her shy "yes" they run out to Esther in the garden to break the news. Dick is with her and seeing with relief that Estber was really pleased finally confesses his love. That evening the family drinks to a double wedding.

LOVE'S TEACHER

Laura M. Edwards Drama File No. 12440

FOR years the only home Joy Hampton knows is the grim orphan asylum. While caring for the younger children as she nears her eighteenth birthday, Joy receives a letter from the matron. It is an invitation from her sole relative whom she has never met, Aunt Carrie Davies, to make her home with them in New York since the orphanage can no longer retain her. Dressed in the simple suit paid for by her scanty earnings tending neighborhood children, Joy is met at the station by a servant and is instructed to wait in the drawing room for her relations who are out shopping. Hearing voices, Joy springs to her feet anxious to greet Aunt Carrie and her daughter Dianne. At once Dianne, a brunette, resents Joy's blond beauty, and is extremely cold to her. Although the outside world is to know her as a visiting niece in reality Joy assumes the role of maid to the petulant Dianne. Her first morning there she awakes early and runs out to the lovely garden, enchanted by the beauty of nature which she had never before had opportunity to enjoy. To her mother as she fretfully watches the gay moving figure, Dianne confesses that she hates her cousin.. After breakfast, Joy mends Dianne's garments and prepares them for the other's busy social program for the day. Mamie, the parlor maid, and Hilda, the cook, in the weeks that follow learn to care for Joy and seek to lighten her burdens—repaid by her lovely smile. In the next house lives Jack Shumway who has grown up with Dianne and the two families have always hoped that Jack and Dianne will become husband and wife. However, Dianne plays around with many men although it is well known that she will not tolerate similar actions in Jack despite the fact that they have not yet become formally engaged. From his window Jack often watches Joy and watching his opportunity visits her in the garden one morning as she is gathering flowers for the table. Joy too has watched him often playing with his dogs and though she responds shyly, she faintly blushes with his admiring eyes intent upon her. After that Jack frequnetly remains at the Davies house when Dianne leaves for an engagement. Excitedly, Joy helps decorate the house for the party which she is to attend in a remodeled gown of Dianne. Feeling lonely and self conscious because she does not know how to dance, Joy wanders into the garden where she oversees her cousin in the passionate embrace of Roger Basteil. Jack seeks out Joy and offers to be her teacher in a secluded part of the hall where she will not be conspicuous. She is getting along beautifully when Dianne surprises them and demands that Jack dance with her. As Joy is retiring for the night, Dianne enters and orders her to stay away from Jack. Unable to bear it any longer, Joy reveals that she cares for Jack while to Dianne he means nothing; she has seen her with Roger. Joy begs her not to make Jack unhappy when she knows he loves her. Furious, Dianne orders her to be silent or she will reveal to everyone that Joy is living there on charity. Unable to bear this, Joy leaves secretly going to the home of Mamie's sister, Mrs. Mason who wishes to care for her as a daughfer. Too independent thought for this, Joy insists on seeking work. Through the Masons she obtains a position in a curio and circulating library shop. Her happiness would have heen complete if only Jack were there, Joy feels. While she is dusting the books the door opens and reveals Jack. He takes the amazed girl unresisting in his arms and reveals that always he has loved her. Loyalty to Dianne kept him silent until she confessed that she was secretly married to Roger. Through Mamie Jack has traced Joy, never to part again.

GET YOUR MAN

L. H. Matteson Western File No. 12467

LEAVING Stockville with the promise of a position which brings his hopes of marriage closer to fulfillment, Hugh Gordon, homesteader and sheep tender makes his monthly visit to Madeline MarBlock, bookkeeper and mail clerk in the Bliss General store of Stockville. Today he hints that he cares for her and while she refuses to admit anything suddenly takes her into his arms—a kiss for her coming birthday. As he rides away, Madeline continues her duties in a daze for that kiss has awakened her into womanhood. Feeling the sudden desire to be with an older woman, Madeline rides over to the Gordon ranch which Hugh's younger brother, Frank, runs. Mother Gordon's firm belief in God and the goodness of the world acts as a tonic and she returns to her little cottage, stopping at the livery stable to leave Pinto, the horse she always rides. Bruce Hames, night bar-tender in the Silver Rail for Hank Barlow, takes the animal and persuades her to ride with him the following day. She is interested in him but slightly afraid and does not agree wben he declares that men have no control over their actions; Madeline claims that each should he master of his destiny. At a Stockville dance, Madeline finds her senses being stirred by Bruce, an adept at arousing the sensual but the philosophic words of Mother Gordon help her to resist. On the following visits she helps the Gordons arrange to have their three thousand dollar mortgage note extended. Meanwhile, riding to the sheep camp Hugh is shot from ambush, the bullet going through the crown of his hat. Later investigating in the direction from whence it came, Hugh picks up a fountain pen which he retains for future reference. He says nothing of this to young Bob his helper, whose hat always jumps around his head when he grows excited or when teased about young Susan Barlow. That night, Hugh kills a lynx which he skins, planning to make it into a coat for Madeline, who continues to be friendly with Bruce. After moving the sheep on to Willow Springs, Hugh's monthly day off arrives and he rides into town for his pay check. Feeling that Bruce is getting beyond control Madeline prepares to have a frank talk with him when he follows her into the house one afternoon. Seeing Hugh approach, Bruce maneuvers while the door is wide open to stand with Madeline in such a position that he appears to be kissing her. With a "pardon me" Hugh whirls out before Madeline can explain. Hurt, she orders Bruce away. Hugh does not return, however, losing all his money while half drunk. Ashamed to visit his mother without the funds he usually leaves, he sleeps in a hotel room a few hours. Penniless, he asks Hank who is bartending for a free drink before he rides back to work. Refused he holds him up with a stone, pretending it is a pistol. A posse pursues him to the guarded hills of the Jackson Hole Gang. When he plunges with his horse Lightening into the stream, Wild Bill, the leader shoots the animal of one of the men who attempts to follow him. Because they like him, the proprietor agrees not to prosecute but Hugh remains. Mother Gordon refuses to worry and fortified by her faith Madeline trusts him and eold shoulders Bruce who attempts to disparage his rival. Banker Olson shortly afterwards receives a note ordering him to place three thousand dollars at a certain spot or his life and his family's will be forfeited. Deputy Benge Gould arranges to have fake money placed there and he will trail after while Sheriff Leffingwell and deputy Andy Bush guard the trail. The tramp who leaves the note, disguised only by thick mud on his face, fatally wounds Gould when he is surprised by the deputy. Before Gould dies he describes the tramp and Hugh is suspected since the sum equals the mortgage money. Wild Bill and his three aides accept Hugh in their gang meanwhile and put him on night guard—having an intricate system of flood lights and a central amplifier from which the men can speak while in any direction without risk of being shot. Frank brings Hugh word that he is free to return and when Hugh insists on staying plans to visit him. Just prior to the murder he purchases a gun and bullets but proves to Marshall Trigwell that he has not fired any. Suspicions grows and a warrant is issued for the arrest of the Gordon boys but without knowing this Frank leaves to join his brother. Madeline moves in with Mother Gordon and later Mabel Ann Gould, niece of the murdered man, who takes over the livery barn joins her, refusing to believe that with such a mother the boys can be guilty. Wild Bill seeks to turn the men against the Gordon brothers when they finally agree to prove they are true outlaws by robbing the bank. Bob gets a leave of absence to attempt to find evidence that Hugh is not guilty of murder. Terrified at their reputation, the clerks with little resistance hand over twenty-four thousand dollars but Hugh will not collect the deposit from Madeline who cnters. Bruce is suspicious of Madeline when he catches her previously on the trail having risked riding to the outlaw hideout to leave papers. A note from Hugh to Greggory, secret service operator, reveals that he is working for him to trap the gang. An assistant is sent but Wild Bill captures him only to be rounded up with the others by the Gordons who turn them over to the sheriff. It is disclosed that Bruce is a member and when he seeks to run away Madeline overtakes him. That night Mother Gordon thankfully views Madeline coupled with Hugh while Frank's interest in Ann indicates a double wedding.

BIG BUSINESS WOMAN

Clara Sturrock Drama File No. 12443

WORRIED over finances though she tries to hide this from her husband who needs a long rest to recuperate from a severe illness, Mrs. Ephrata visits Minister Ether and his wife for suggestions. Together they arrange that she should use her baking talents and salesmanship ability which has made her famous in running church socials. A friendly grocer offers to advance materials and a large store is available near the sea front. Jennie, a sister-in-law, thinks that a wife's place is in the home but Mathew Ephrata is finally won over. David and Augustus are eager to help in the shop while Mary though nine keeps an eye on the house. kindly friends of her husband loan counters and other necessities. Three weeks later on a Saturday the shop is opened and the brothers proudly help wait on the customers. Before afternoon is half over the shop is cleaned out and Mrs. Ephrata is near collapse unable to see how she will be able to continue adequate baking in the small stove—there is too much business for her resources, an unusual complaint. While Mrs. Ether comforts her another customer enters and places an order for cakes for the Elk's Ball. That opens up the possibility of taking advance orders mainly and baking a little for general sales on the side. A check from Mr. Ephrata's sister enlarges her capital and orders come fast. Against her advice, Mr. Ephrata comes to assist her. With a special oven, a gift received from the freight office with much difficulty—borrowing money to pay the charges—Mrs. Ephrata makes a large baking on Sunday only to have it all vanish within an hour though liberally paid by passengers preparing to sail to Alaska. Afraid that it will worry her husband she says nothing but oversleeps the next day, rushing to the shop to find Ephrata convinced there is a robbery. They start baking again only to have Mrs. Ephrata become ill. The doctor says that the location is bad for her health. Finally they locate a large house and store which they can combine for business and living purposes. Lowry who lives upstairs gives false reports to the absent owners who refuse to rent until Mrs. Ephrata investigating determines the cause. Now they can remain open at night and have added notions to the shop. A Federal Agent attempts to arrest her for unwittingly selling face cream without revenue stamps but her unshakable honesty convinces him. A thief edges near the register when she is alone but her taps for help bring in a friend who beats the crook. Schonefield rents them furniture for the rooms but she buys them with her last reserve of cash to keep out undesirable renters. Alice Lerd, a sweetfaced girl of David's age rents one. When she takes over the agency for pianos after making several sales through renting the company space, Alice is hired to give free lessons as an inducement. A few years find Mrs. Ephrata the leading saleswoman of the district and another company angles for her services. Hutchins the rival man convinces her to sell phonographs. Only one of her clients tries to cheat but she is equal to the situation. She has hopes that David and Alice will become engaged but finding David alone one Sunday evening learns that she is out with Hutchins whom Mrs. Ephrata does not completely trust in business, being extremely ethical herself and having taught Alice to be likewise. Alice and David quarrel and in stubborness she takes a position with Hutchins who opens a rival store though he does most of his business with strangers, the townspeople preferring their "big business woman" who has acquired an enviable reputation. One day passing by the store, Hutchins calls her in to proudly tell her—for outside of business they are on friendly terms—that he has achieved a sale to a woman by raising the price over one hundred dollars simply because she wanted to pay more than a neighbor and he did not have such an expensive piano handy. Alice returns to Mrs. Ephrata, confiding that she can never care for such a man and Mrs. Ephrata happily watching David and Alice reconciled, knows that her efforts to be honest with the public are repaid.

ESCORT—UNSEEN

Edith V. Bitner Short Subject File No. 12445

WHILE Nira Johnson bitterly berates the fates which condemn her—a twenty two year old primary grade school teacher—to quarantine with the mumps, her faithful beau Joe stands at a discreet distance from the window. Again he asks her to marry him and Nira disgusted at his lack of romance though she has already refused him three times, shouts, "No." Slam goes the window and Nira turns on the radio as the voice of Jack Carlisle extols the public to visit the World's Fair and make the Somerset House its stopping place. As she is about to turn to another station, Jack declares that a visit there is equal to seeing the treasures of many countries. Always as her father reminds her, Nira has dreamed of foreign travel. Didn't a fortune teller once say she would go on many trips? In response to her letter asking for a free booklet, Jack announces that in return for her enthusiastio words he will be her squire—sight unseen. That night though her confinement is ended, Nira sends Joe away while she writes to Jack that he is taking a risk, intimating that she is a homely spinster. Guyed by his friends and reporters who insist that it will be good publicity, Jack declares he is willing to take a chance. With the aid of theatrical makeup and the old attic trunk, a transformed Nira embarks on her journey. Gamely, Jack takes her dancing in the Empire room where hampered by heavy shoes and a wig, Nira's awkwardness attracts everyone. Ignoring their titters and Jack's suggestions that she retire early, Nira enjoys herself still more since Jack proves very attractive. The next morning she demurely drags him to the flea circus and admires the antics of the insect acrobats and dancers. Next is the Oriental Village where she perches on the neck of a camel concealing her fears. Blushing Jack is dragged to a perfume shop in the India section; and warily holds her as they swope down the cyclone coaster of the midway. All the available rides must be tried she insists and Jack only wins her from riding in a car driven by a lion by promising to take her to another part of the "menagerie" where the alligators are cooped. In the famous dirigible they swoop over the fair with all its beauty sprawled before them. In the little replica of Paris she sits out a dance with a rickshaw puller, a college boy, who insists on telling about his foot misery while she awaited the romantic words that belonged in such an atmosphere—until she caught sight of herself in a mirror. The midgets in their miniature village delight her; in the bit of Darkest Africa they watch the awesome ceremonies to the traditional beat of the tom-toms. In the Sinclair exhibit the couple view the life-like reproductions of pre-historic monsters. Jack snorts with disgust while she "coos" over a dog in the pet show. The Hall of Science is nearly her Waterloo when she experiments with the truth serum and machine which detects lies. Her answers bewilder Jack who cannot reconcile them with previous concepts of "old maids." Pathetically, Jack suggests that they have seen enough for one day but remorselessly, deaf to his pleas, Nira presses on until she encounters the "whirligig" in the mathematics exhibit. Recalling his description, she climbs on it, spinning by means of the railing. The attendant declares that if you throw out your hands you go slower; if you pull them close, you go fast. Unfortunately, nothing is said about what to do when you grow dizzy. Gradually her wig begins to slip; her hat flies away and her own lovely curls unhampered appear. Astounded, Jack rescues her; stares intently at her quivering face and the two burst into laughter. Oblivous of the pressing inquisitive crowd, Jack reaches for her lips. . . .

GIRL FRIEND

Frank Barkley Drama File No. 12094

IN love with glamorous Ola Nina, Fred Morgan confides his passion to Alice Jones, who lives next door to him at the boarding house, little realizing the unhappiness this causes her, as she cares deeply for him. Smiling to hide her disappointment. Alice listens sympathetically, but when Fred leaves her she runs to her room, giving way, at last, to despised tears. Spending all the money he has so carefully saved to buy Ola presents, Fred at last wins some consideration from her as she consents to accompany him to night clubs from time to time. But when Fred's uncle dies the following year, leaving a substantial fortune to the young man, Ola's attitude changes. Assuring him that she cared all along, but wished to pursue a theatrical career which she has now abandoned, Ola invites Fred to call at her apartment. Graced in all the arts oi seduction, Ola soon wins the complete adoration of the naive Fred, who believes her when she says that he is the only man she has ever really cared for. Heartbroken, Alice watches the man she loves completely taken by a designing woman, but says nothing, certain that he will misunderstand. Many men are attracted to Alice, with her old fashioned sweetness and beauty, but she refuses their love, saying that she can only give friendship. Eagerly Fred longs for the wedding day, but Ola finds various trivial reasons for postponement.

When Fred becomes increasingly impatient, Ola finds reasons for quarrels. She tells her fiance that she saw him enter the home of Mamie, his friend, but he asserts that he was there only to use her research library, as he was assisting her father in compiling a scientific paper. On another occasion, Ola petulantly upbraids him for speaking to Louise Violet on the street, although he proves that this was no more than common courtesy. Ola is forced to accept his statements, aware of their truth. At last she agrees to set the wedding date a week ahead, and preparations are made for an eventful cermony. Fred invites Ola to a dance; at first, she accepts, then, giving him no reason, breaks the engagement. In despair, Fred confides this to his friend, Porter Lee, as they are seated in a cafe . Impatiently, Porter states that he is well rid of Ola since she is unfaithful and cold; why does he not accept the love of Alice, a far more splendid girl? Coldly, Fred replies that Alice does not love him and his charges against Ola are unwarranted, but when Porter proposes a plan by which this can be determined, Fred at last consents.

Informing the press that he has placed his entire fortune on a horse which is to run in the coming sweepstakes, Fred awaits results. Both Alice and Ola plead with him not to do this reckless deed, the latter from purely unselfish motives, but he is adamant. The day arrives, in a box, Ola, beautifully gowned, watches Fred's horse go down to defeat, while Alice, lost from view in the crowd, sees the results with tears in her eyes. Before Fred returns to the box, Ola leaves, wiring him later that she has married the millionaire and middle aged Harry Carey. Timidly, Alice offers consolation to Fred, and as he gazes into her lovely, tear-stained eyes, all thoughts of Ola are forgotten. He confesses that his fortune is safe; this was merely a trick to test Ola—and tenderly he gathers Alice into his arms.

FOREST RANGER

Rose L. Palmer Bates Drama File No. 11458

TOO young to fully comprehend the tragedy, little Josephine Cavon watched with the others at the top of the mine cave-in as victim after victim was brought to the surface. But when at last the work was brought to a close, the relief workers were forced to inform Josephine's mother that they had been unable to find the body of her husband. Beyond a doubt he lay buried in one of the deepest shafts and further search would be useless. With the money raised by the sympathetic watchers, Mrs. Cavon and her small daughter withdrew to their small house in the forest and there for years managed to keep body and soul together, while Josephine rode the forests and grew to know the calls of the wood creatures.

Years passed. Josephine's mother discouraged by the unequal fight against starvation lost hope, while the girl set her teeth hard and determined that she would find some means of making a living. While galloping hrough the forests on her favorite mount one day, Josephine caught the distant warning of a forest fire—most dreaded of all calamities. With a courage remarkable in a girl, she began a backfire and single handed stopped the progress of the flames. When at last the glare of the fire was to be observed by William Braddock, a ranger, he was to sound the alarm and when he and his men were to ride up they were to find the flames halted by the work of a slip of a girl. A cheer went up for the plucky little lady, and refusing aid, Josephine mounted her horse and slowly rode back with the men to the nearest town. Braddock, learning of the plight of Josephine and her mother was to find himself filled with admiration for her, but when Josephine asked if he could help get her a position as a ranger, he stared in amazement and exclaimed, "Being a forest ranger is a man's work.' Scornfully Josephine reminded him that she had shown her capabilities and at last Braddock was to intercede in her behalf until she won an appointment. Soon Braddock realized that he was in love with her and again and again he begged her to give up the dangerous work, but Josephine persisted.

One day in town, she was to discover Russell, keeper of the trading post, receiving a mysterious looking package from a hard faced man. Josephine watched him lock it carefully in the safe and nervously return to his work. Soon after, while riding the forests, she was overtaken by a severe storm. In search of shelter she came up to a tiny half-hidden hut and through the windows discovered five men, among them the man who had delivered the package, at work counterfeiting money. Suddenly she slipped and before she could escape was captured. The men decided to put her to death but at last agreed to shoot dice for her. While she lay tied, a beared, dull-eyed old fellow, obviously wandering of mind tried to free her. A sharp blow from one of the countereiters left him outstretched on the floor, and as Josephine bent to him she gasped as a tatooed eagle on his arm revealed the old man was her father, not dead but picked up by the counterfeiters. The old man, escaping, led Braddock who was searching the forests for Josephine, to the hut. Together the three captured the counterfeiters. The old man's memory was restored to him through the blow and after many years he was reunited with his wife and daughter, while Josephine found love with Braddock.

ROLL BACK THE YEARS

Charles Finney Bates Drama File No. 11463

NO sooner had he entered the drab rooming house which was Glendale's sole hotel, than Robert Wayland sensed the resentment of the Hill-Billies who resented the invasion of "another dratted Northerner." One or two remarks were passed which Wayland pretended to ignore. Later at the uninviting dinner table, he was cheered by the unmistakable voice of another northerner, Martin Baylis, young railroad clerk. The two men felt an instant cordial liking, and Wayland spoke freely to him. When Martin learned he had come down to get a clear title on several thousand acres of land previously owned by a man who had started the boom town, he warned Wayland that many of the settlers who had been living on the property for years now regarded it as their own. They would actively resent being forced out. Wayland laughs at the warning. The next day he went to the small banker, Fred Keene, and proposed to him that the banker help him establish a clear title for all the property which was not occupied. Where people had established homes, Wayland decided that it would be only fair, besides saving litigation, to give them free deeds to the property. The banker was impressed by this and though he did not approve of northerners, invited Wayland to his home that night. There Wayland met the two daughters, Rhoda and Elizabeth, the oldest. Elizabeth did not share her father's prejudices, the pleased Wayland sono learned. A week later the town was startled to hear of Wayland's generous action but they continued to regard him with suspicion. They noted with disapproval that Wayland and Elizabeth had been together several times. Weeks passed and Wayland was contentedly working on clearing his land. Already he had asked Elizabeth to marry him but she begged him not to approach her father for another six months when she would try to soften his attitude. Tragedy came into Wayland's life when the railroad office was robbed of a valuable jewel shipment and money. Westerly, jewel store owner to whom the shipment was consigned, openly charged Baylis with the theft. To escape arrest while protesting innocence, the clerk killed himself. Wayland remembered having met Westerly sneaking through the woods late the night of the crime. Afraid that the northerner suspected him, Westerly decided to drive him out of town. Fate played in his hands when Keene revealed to him as an old family friend that his daughter, Rhoda, was bearing an illigitimate child. Westerly convinced him that Wayland was responsible. That night he called together some friends to "ride" the northerner out, but a youth Wayland befriended warned him. He gave the boy directions to take the sheriff to a certain spot to dig and to return at once. Two hours later the masked men came but the sheriff was delayed. Sparring for time, Wayland taunted the man he picked as Westerly with cowardice. A fight began and Wayland was beating him when the sheriff came and a public confession was obtained. Amid this commotion, the banker and Elizabeth entered. Keene announced that he had just learned that Rhoda had been secretly married to Wayland's dead friend, Baylis. He asked Wayland's pardon which the young man consented to give if Keene approved of him for a son-in-law. A jolly moon looked down at the familiar sight of two lovers embracing.

HER golden voice and graceful dancing winning applause, Kay Arnold concludes her number at the Slippery Sils a small cabaret in Newtown. Two New York producers, Harry Fields and Fred Richman, who have dropped into the place with their friend and financial backer, young James Stelton, are impressed with the girl's ability. Although James laughs at them, they send a waiter for Mr. Dryker, owner of the cabaret, paying him to release Kay from contract. Kay is summoned, and agrees eagerly to the proposition that she come to New York to receive instruction from the celebrated Roy White and appear in a musical revue at the night club which the trio plan to open. Taking a cab at Grand Central Station, the excited girl catches her first view of New York as she drives to Mr. White's studio. Irritated because the chorus has not assimilated his ideas, Roy White enters the office in annoyance when he is informed that Kay is waiting. He reads again the telegram regarding the girl which Richman and Fields sent, then instructs Mrs. Bixby, who conducts a boarding house for his dancers, to find Kay a room. The motherly woman makes her feel quite at home before she returns to the theatre and is briefly presented to the chorus and Gardenia, the maid, who finds a rehearsal outfit for her. Silently, Roy notices that Kay dances with exceptional skill. In the star's dressing room, June O'Day hurriedly dons an afternoon dress and soon joins her fiance, Ben. As they lunch together, he urges the girl to marry him at once, but she states that she must wait until after the club has opened.

Lil, another dancer, who rooms at Mrs. Bixby's home, becomes her devoted friend. Together they explore the city during their leisure hours. Fields and Richman are delighted at Kay's progress as White admits that she is the most talented and beautiful girl in the chorus. James Stelton, still blind to Kay's ability and believing her just an ambitious small town girl, is attracted by her charms and invites her to accompany him to dinner, but she replies that she cannot as it has been decided to open the club next Saturday. Every minute must be spent at rehearsals for the revue. Nothing daunted, James sends for a picnic supper which he shares with Kay in a corner of the building. As the two are seated together, Kay discovers James is a charming companion while he is almost convinced that he has found a show girl who is truly different. Later he attends a party with another group of chorus girls, and, watching them as they extract presents from their wealthy admirers ruthlessly, James laughs to think he could have become seriously interested in one, even for a moment. On the night of the opening, Fields receives a wire from June, bound for Europe with her husband. In despair, he asks Roy if one of the other girls can take her place. Unanimously, the girls vote for Kay, sure of her ability. James laughs at this, adding that she is probably more interested in diamonds, as she left her home town for them. With head held high, Kay turns away from James, promising to do her best.

Acclaimed as a star at the opening, Kay brings success both to herself and the club. The next day, while the producers congratulate her they offer her a contract which she signs. Soon Kay's exquisitite singing and dancing become the talk of New York, but she often cries herself to sleep. Repeatedly, James telephones to apologize, but each time Kay slams the receiver down when she recognizes his voice. A European producer offers Kay a contract at the expiration of her present engagement, which she plans to accept. The night before she is to sail, Fields asks her to appear at a party given by his friend, whose identity he does not reveal. She agrees, but when she discovers the host is James she sings her new song "You Laughed In My Face," with bitterness. As she is hastening to leave the house, James follows her, and forces her to listen to his sincere apology, begging her to become his wife. Kay consents. A wedding is held that evening, and the next day a happy Kay sails for Europe with James—on their honeymoon.

He contemplates marriage as their affair deepens. But Helen learning that he is still free, returns once more. Fred is in a dilemma. He loves both in different fashion but with Helen it is deeper rooted. To choose one means heartbreak for the other. Marriage with Helen will please his mother but send Mary back to the old life. Fred encounters Mary one night with a man of disreputable reputation. When he returns home he secretly tells his sister he is to be married tomorrow. She is sure his choice is Helen. Tomorrow afternoon's papers announce the marriage of Fred Brown to Miss Mary Block.

THE TRIUMPH OF LOVE

E. B. Griffiths Drama File No. 12253

AN expert at water sports, young Michael, a farmer's lad, hears with interest that the Century Construction Company has opened a project at the Pasquois Falls. Returning home from swimming that night, Michael insists to his family that he is going to apply there for a job for he is husky beyond his seventeen years. On the forty mile hike a sudden storm springs up and Michael is struck by a falling tree limb. Rescued by the logging men of the company he is temporarily moved to the home of Burgess, the superintendent. Michael returns to consciousness to find himself nursed by the superintendent's daughter, Denise, and aloud with typical Irish wit he marvels that such a slip of a girl can do such sturdy tasks. Yielding to the boy's insistence, Burgess hires him as a helper to Dutch Jan, the boss diver, for Michael reminds him of the baby son who would have been this youth's age had he lived. So proficient does Michael become that the jealous Jan twice attempts to dispose of him. Once he removed a stay which would release heavy logs underneath which Michael was working, but a large rock served as a diverting wedge until Denise who saw the danger called help. No suspicion was cast upon Jan until another time when he deliberately struck Michael, only to lose his balance and be saved by the youth he hated. Both landed in the hospital and Jan who is madly in love with Denise resentfully notices that Michael is favored. Soon after Michael becomes a permanent resident in the girl's home when he rescues her father who is overcome by gasoline tank fumes when fire breaks out. Burgess watches with approval their ripening love. From afar now can be heard the rumors of growing war engulfing all Europe. It is at this period when Michael faces death a third time when dynamite prematurely explodes. Jan denying the accusation that he is responsible swings at Michael with a heavy crowbar which the other wrests from his hand. In the struggle, Michael accidentally deals a tremendous blow and Jan topples to the ground. Sure that he has killed his enemy and that the only witnesses are the Dutchman's cronies who will testify falsely, Michael heeds a friendly Indian who persuades him to enlist through Canada. Soon after his transfer to Egypt, Michael received a letter from Denise that she was now an army nurse; Jan is alive and fighting somewhere with the artillery. Wounded, Michael is sent to Cairo to recuperate. While wandering among the pyramids, he overhears a voice which sounds vaguely familiar. Half hidden behind a stone, Michael realizes that Jan is giving away important army secrets to an Arab. In his eagerness, he forgets caution until the two turn upon him. Jan wishes to kill him at once but the Arab suggests slow torture. Bound Michael is placed in a tomb to die by suffocation. A slight crack affords air and unwinding the wire that binds his feet, Michael prys that with a handkerchief through the crack. Suddenly recognizing the voice of Denise among the tourists, he crudely signals in an old code game of theirs. Rescued, Michael keeps silent knowing that such grave charges need proof. In response to the pleas of a native soldier killed in battle, Michael uses his first leave to visit the soldier's wife and baby. Unknown, Jan trails him and snaps a photograph of the grateful wife throwing her arms about Michael while the child sits upon his knee. This damaging evidence is sent anonymously to Denise who cannot help but believe her fiance guilty. She refuses to see Michael who in maddened passion throws himself into the thickest fighting while Jan seeks to take Michael's place in the girl's heart. But fatally injured when caught in a trap of his own making, Jan at last confesses his duplicity. And Michael is to return a hero, covered with medals, to the eager embraces of the remorseful Denise.

ONE STEP FROM HEAVEN

M. A. Helveigh Drama File No. 11377

GRIMY Cinderella sitting in ashes and rags before the fairy godmother waved open a new, enchanting world, has a spiritual sister in small Rita Landel. Out of the slender horde of memories belonging to a seven year old, is a very faint one of a smiling, pleasant woman. She is sure this was her mother. Once she asks her aunt Matilda who roughly tells her she is dead. "Killed, most likely by your naughty ways," the relative grumbles. Hours later, uncle Ned finds the child sobbing bitterly in a dark corner of the cowbarn. Her face brightens a bit when she sees him. One wonders at this ill assorted couple. Even young Rita realizes the two stand in strong contrast. Her father's brother is as kindly as his wife is strict. Unfortunately, Ned has long succumbed to her stronger will. Just as Rita is about to heed her uncle's pleas and confide in him, his wife calls them sharply to the table. Tomorrow is the winter session of school and Rita joyously welcomes the prospect. The vacation days have been dreary. There are no near neighbors and Mrs. Landel does not encourage visitors. Absorbed in these anticipatory thoughts, the child eats slowly and reflectively until her aunt calls her to account. She looks longingly at the freshly made bread, but loses courage to ask for it. Already, she senses that though the farm at this season is particularly overflowing with succulent foods, her aunt miserly begrudges each mouthful Rita takes. On her way to school in the morning, she cautiously slips an apple in with her scanty lunch. School is a delight. Miss Martens, a new teacher, tells the children the story of Cinderella. The girl listens to the story with awe. Perhaps some day. . . . A number of older children go home the same way including Peters who is two classes higher than Rita. Still enchanted with the recently heard tale, Rita tells about it to Peters. To her surprise, the boy reveals that he has a number of exciting story books and promises to loan her the one of Cinderella. He brings it to her the next day. On the way home, the children play "dragon" and Rita forgets the time. In a violent fit of temper, her aunt snatches the book and destroys it. When Rita snatching tearfully at the scattered scraps calls her a horrible old woman, Mrs. Landel beats the child cruelly with a whip of braided willow branches. She is ashamed to go to school with these obvious bruises and decides to spend the day in the woods. Here Peter finds her during recess and sympathetically listens to her troubles. Just then they hear faint shouts for help, coming from the marshy ground. Running there, the children find Rita's aunt who slips while gathering water cress. The children drag a log over to support her until help can be reached. That night Rita is astonished to find her plate heaped with food, but her aunt is still too ashamed to put her gratitude in words. Uncle Ned and Matilda have a long talk which results in the sending off of a letter. A few days later Rita comes home to find a pleasant woman speaking with her aunt—a stranger and yet Rita feels she knows her. The woman hugs Rita and cuddles her in her lap. From this strange but delightful position Rita first learns that she has a "really-truly" mother who was forced to give Rita away for adoption when her husband died in the war. Until now, her sister-in-law had refused to let her see the child. Rita feels no resentment, only a sweet drowsy feeling that she is one step from heaven.

HEARTS' STRIFE

Mrs. Edna V. Lovell Drama File No. 11902

QUANTRILL, leader of a band of outlaws during the days of the Civil War, is hated by inhabitants of both North and South, as his men ruthlessly pillage the oppressed states, crying "Down with the American flag!" Captains Crowley and McConley are delegated to lay siege to the rebel forts at Island No and Fort Adrid. The two young Yankees rest at a plantation while on their way to Quantrill's stronghold. Here they are warmly welcomed by the lady of this southern household and her two charming daughters, Lera and Frances. After a delightful dinner, the men take their leave, promising that they will be only to happy to accept an invitation to call again. At the next visit, they gather around the organ; the girls laugh merrily as the Irish Crowley struggles to sing through his heavy brogue, but McConley enchants them with stirring Yankee ballads, delivered in his smooth tenor voice. Soon this friendship between the Yankee captains and the southern ladies ripens into love. As the four stroll through the beautiful gardens of the estate, McConley tells Frances that he loves her, Crowley that Lera has captured his heart. Civil War is forgotten as the girls seal this pledge of love with kisses. All goes well until the father of the girls returns from the battlefield on sick leave. Wrathfully he orders his adored daughters never again to see the rebels, although his anger softens as he looks upon the girls he loves so dearly and regrets the unhappiness he is causing them.

Deeply emeshed in their love, the girls disobey, meeting the captains clandestinely. A heavy forest borders the rear of the estate; when the captains light a match, the girls climb over the fence, joining them for stolen moments of happiness. One evening as they are preparing to keep this rendezvous they see a suspicious character standing near the smokehouse and hurry away. The girls' mother becomes ill; their father, summoning them, sees that they are not in their room. He calls, and discovers the two climbing over the fence. Deeply grieved, he says nothing until the next morning when he reprimands them for this deception. At that moment the two captains enter, declaring that Quanrill's men, they have overheard, plan to burn the house. The southern gentleman is amazed when the two Yankees enlists volunteers to protect his property, regardless of his cause in the war. Before nightfall, the young captains are forced to return to Fort Adrid since they cannot offer protection they help the southern family escape, bidding a sad forewell to the girls they love. After a safe journey, the southern family arrive in St. Louis. Meanwhile, Crowley and McConley lead two factions of troups against the rebel forces, surrounding them and eventually capturing six thousand of them, whom they imprison. Missouri is rid of a terror to both North and South in this lawless group.

Anxious months of waiting pass for the lovers, while they exchange letters. At last peace—and once more, a United States, stronger than ever through trial. The girls' father gladly welcomes these two gentlemen from the North who offered their lives for his daughters. A double wedding is held at the plantation, and hatred is forgotten as each southern girl turns to the arms of her nothern husband facing a new future.

REAL FOLKS

Helen Malin Drama File No. 12190

LIKE lovers the whole world over, these two spin their dreams in worlds as they walk hand in hand, eyes searching for the stars. Old Pedro sitting outside his little house said aloud to his wife, "There George and Janett go again, a handsome pair. I can remember when they were little children always together." But tonight there was a cloud of melancholiness on their love for in George's pocket was a ticket which was to carry him to America. As he boarded the train which was to bring him to the boat the next afternoon, George blinked his eyes for it was unmanly to cry and he nearly envied Janett who was free to weep aloud. "I'll never forget you," he vowed as he once again promised to send for his sweetheart as soon as he was financially secure. His much older brother, Randolph, met him at the dock and George was whirled through the streets of the large city which towered higher than all his dreams. Home George was introduced to June, his step-niece, a pretty young girl of seventeen who was discontented with the protected life she led. The first few days, George made unsuccessful attempts to find work but came home each night tired and discouraged. However, Randolph convinced him that it was useless to seek work until he knew more English and June volunteered to teach him. Although George appreciated her attentions, he did not think of June other than as a niece. But she had fallen in love with him. A rapid student the day comes when June teaches him to write the words, "I love you" but when she translated their meaning and made it plain that this applied to herself, George was furious. Finding that reasoning was of no avail, George moved from the house without telling Randolph his reasons. Luck favored him and he found a position in a small factory run by James Ward, a man who was interested in helping his employees. Meanwhile resentful, June determined that if she cannot have George no one else shall withholds a letter that comes from Janett. Through this she learned of the engagement and so wrote a letter to Janett claiming that George under false pretenses had made love to her. Now she was to hear his child. Would Janett release him from his promise so that her baby might have a name? Promptly Janett replied though there were signs of tears on each page. She did not know that this letter too never went to George and as a result all of George's letters were returned unopened. Mystified and heartbroken, George threw himself into his work. A prize was offered by Ward for the best suggestions to improve conditions for the workers and it was George who won with his plans for a cafeteria and insisted on helping to build it. Several other ideas which George turned over to Ward at last made the older man offer to make him manager. Soon George was a welcome guest at the Ward home where he was favorite with the children. George never spoke of his past but all efforts on Mrs. Ward's part to have him meet girls she felt suitable were turned down. When their niece's parents died, the Wards wrote her to come. So Janett unsuspecting that they were her lost sweetheart's employers arrived. They persuaded George to come to dinner but when he got wind of the fact that a girl would be there he refused. However, they were to meet the next day when Mr. Ward brought Janett down to look over the company houses and to meet the man who had designed them, who was unmarried he added slyly. Janett was to recall this when George rushed to her and crushed the girl close to him as if he should never let her go again. And Mr. Ward, delighted, said, "Real folks both of them!"

OUT BEYOND

Joseph Gostin Miller Drama File No. 10592

WHILE visiting at the home of Judge Ellsworth, lifelong friend of his father, John Wade, young Kentuckian, falls in love with his host's gracious and beautiful granddaughter, Mary. Learning of the Judge's distress over the mystery of the sudden deterioration of the coffee shipped from his extensive Guatamelan plantations, John undertakes to go to South America to investigate. However, when he sees the apparent love of Mary for Edwards, a fine looking neighbor, John withholds the declaration of his own feelings and leaves desperately trying to lock within his heart his awakened emotions.

Aboard the ship John strikes up an acquaintance with Victor Manget, who is bound for Peru and gains from him an insight into what to expect from the tropics. John proceeds directly to the Judge's plantation and is overcome by the spell of the luxurious country. Under the guidance of the overseer Brant, John rapidly learns the routine of raising and shipping the coffee and at the tavern one day, is fascinated by the beauty and vivacity of a light skinned native girl. Brant frowns and warns John that every man in those parts is in love with the half breed heartbreaker Zanetta, daughter of a Quiche chief. Curiously John watches the little twistings of the girl's slender body as she dances with Hernandez, descendant of an illustrious Spanish family. Unloosening a glorious red rose from her hair, Zanetta tosses it to John as she dances, but remembering the white rose that has always signified Mary to him, John slowly crushes the passion flower. Subsequently John meets Zanetta again and eyes flashing, she invites him to come for dinner with her and her father. Discouraged by his inability, despite his painstaking investigation to clear up the mystery of how the coffee, evidently of superior quality when picked, is doped before it reaches its destination, John is only stopped from giving up and returning home a failure, by the sympathetic Brant and his wife. One night, torn by thoughts of Mary whom he can never have, John visits Zanetta and after a long conversation the aged Quiche chief, now a pottery maker, leaves the two young people alone. While red roses make the night fragrant, Zanetta moves closer to John. He feels her heart beating against his own, her warm lips touch his, and the velvety night enfolds them.

The weeks drag slowly by and then comes a letter from Mary saying that her grandfather is determined to visit his plantations and she has decided to come too. John's heart leaps at sight of Mary even lovelier than memory had pictured her. That night as he takes her about the plantation and the spell of the magic night seizes them, John learns that Edward has never been anything to Mary save a childhood friend, and when John tells at last of his love, Mary promises to marry him.

Then one day John tells Mary of Zanetta, and as he assures Mary he has never seen her since that once, she places her hand on his arm and tells him she understands. Several nights later, however, as they are watching the traditional Quiche fiesta, John receives a note urging him to come secretly to Zanetta's hut that night. Troubled, he makes his excuses to the Ellsworths, and Zanetta, after a hopeless confession of her love, recovers herself and with a great effort tells John that her father has discovered a man on a nearby island, whom he believes to be Judge Ellsworth's son (Mary's father) who had disappeared during the World War. However, because the man seems to be insane, John agrees to investigate carefully before raising false hopes in the long seeking Ellsworth. Grateful to Zanetta, John turns, to go only to find his way blocked by Hernandez who, drink-inflamed makes foul accusations about Zanetta whom he has loved, and is left outstretched upon the ground by John. On his return to the plantation, however, John learns that Mary's aunt is dying and the Ellsworth's have left precipitately, Mary, believing John loves Zanetta.

Subsequently, while in a tavern, John watches the suspicious actions of two men and to his surprise sees Victor Manget join them and cause them to leave in ill concealed confusion. John learns that Manget represents coffee owners who, like Judge Ellsworth complain of their coffee being doped.

However, that night John is mobbed by a group of Quiches led by Hernandez for the murder of Zanetta and realizing they are intent on destroying him on the evidence of his knife, John escapes and is saved from summary martydom by being imprisoned. However, just as the Quiches are about to tear down the jail, Victor Manget arrives with Hernandez who drunk and babbling has, at last confessed to the murder with the knife that he had found.

Freed, John and Victor clear up the coffee mystery by catching the culprits red handed in the process of spraying the coffee with a chemical that seeps through and destroys the flavor. The cause is found to be jealousy of lowland plantation owners whose coffee had been inferior in quality and less in demand until the doping of the well known Ellsworth and other noted brands. The mystery cleared up, John takes a plane to the island where the man said to be Mary's father stays. There he finds him to be undoubtedly the man he wants, but John is touched by the amnesia and severe wracking head pains whose agony can only be obliterated in drink. While the prematurely old man is in a drunken stupor, John has him carried aboard the yacht of a cruising physician and an operation is performed which restores in full Ellsworth's memory. John and Ellsworth return home, and Mary's lashes sweep her cheeks as she learns for what reason John had gone to see Zanetta that night. And, amidst the gaiety and color of Kentucky, John and Mary come to each other in marriage.

CAREERS FOR WOMEN

S. Jay Mote Drama File No. 11701

RECENTLY married, Bill Hayward and Lulu Markham dream of a little ranch in the country where they can raise cattle and vegetables; a home for the children they hope to have. In spite of limited resources they are very happy during the first year of their marriage. A daughter, Ellen Jean, is born and Lulu finds additional joy in caring for her. Then prices drop. The cattle are practically worthless on the market. Bill develops a lingering fever which makes it impossible to carry on his work in the fields. When the country suffers from drought the crops fail and the young couple are forced to borrow heavily from the bank. Bravely uncomplaining, Lulu attempts to carry on alone, but at last they are forced to sell the farm. When Bill receives an offer to drive a truck to San Francisco Lulu persuades him to accept, although she longs to have him with her as she is expecting a second child. Mrs. Boswell, her friend, invites the young woman to stay with her during Bill's absence. Gratefully she accepts, helping her with her household tasks. Tom, Mrs. Boswell's step-son, proves himself a devoted friend as he assists Lulu in every possible way. His interest in the young wife and Ellen Jean do much to dispel their loneliness during Bill's absence. Unable to stay away longer, Bill tells Bob, Tom's brother, with whom he is staying that he must make the next train and they race through the streets in his car. Surprising his wife, Bill hastens to the house where she receives him with joy. The next night his son, Marion Wayne, is born.

Jealous by nature, Bill questions Lulu about Tom's interest in her but she assures him he is nothing more than a loyal friend. Then he confesses that while away he became interested in an attractive young woman by the name of Ola, but soon realized that this infatuation was as nothing compared to his devotion to his splendid wife. Both agree not to let jealousy mar their happiness. Lulu and Bill attend a farewell dance given for departing troops. Eager to cheer the boys, Bill drinks too heavily and Lulu, dancing with Tom who never touches alcohol. expresses the wish that her husband, too, could abstain. Under the influence of liquor, Bill's jealousy is again aroused and he enlists in a fit of anger. When Lulu hears of this she weeps as she thinks of her two babies to whom she must be both mother and father. A short time later Tom also enlists and sadly, she bids them both farewell as the troop train departs. Faced with the necessity of supporting her children, Lulu secures a position as reporter on a local newspaper. As she is reading the war reports she discovers Bill's name among the missing, following the battle of Meuse-Argonne. Mr. Jones, her kindly employer, cheers ner as best he can, assuring her that Bill may not be dead, and informing her that her story, which he submitted for her, was accepted. Returning after the war, Tom tells that he saw Bill fall during the conflict, after many heroic deeds. Offering his love, Tom urges Lulu to marry him. When she refuses he promises always to be a devoted friend and uncle to the children and she thanks him for this. Gradually, Lulu attains fame as an authoress. Her poignant, realistic novel of marriage, "The Twain," wins national prominence.

Bill, rescued by the Red Cross, and a victim of amnesia, at last regains his memory but, believing his wife happy with Tom's love, does not return to her much as he desires to do so. Purchasing her book, "Call to Arms," he is proud of her achievement, but not until he finally secures "The Twain" does he realize how much Lulu has gone through for him, and how deeply she still loves him. He sends for her, and the children agree that they want Daddy. Once more the little family is reunited on the ranch which Bill has purchased, all sorrow forgotten.

TOMMY

Vivian Slingerland Drama File No. 11313

THERE was a scratching at the door of Sam Smith's apartment. Opening, he admitted a large police dog Prince and a girl dressed in boy's clothing. "Fine work, kid," Sam said enthusiastically a she pried open Prince's mouth and took out a valuable diamond necklace. Tommy threw her newspaper sack down on the floor and flinging off her cap exclaimed, "I'm tired of this, Sam. Haven't we enough now to get mother out?" Sam's tongue explored his lips nervously. "The governor guarantees her freedom if he gets $50,000. Not a cent less." Discouraged the girl walked into her own room and locked the door. Sam stood looking after her speculatively.

Back at his speakeasy, Sam kept a sharp eye for women with expensive jewelry. Tommy's job was to follow them home and after they retired, steal the jewels, deposit them in Prince's mouth, and walk home selling her newspapers. She hated the work, but she had to free her mother from a sentence for a crime she hadn't committed, and Sam had promised to help her providing she did as she was told. A few days later, Sam waiting for Tommy to come in, looked at her closely. "You're getting to be a very beautiful young lady," he informed her shortly. The next day there were beautiful evening clothes for Tommy and directions that she was to play up to Paul Maine, a newcomer at the speakeasy, whom Sam suspected of being a copper. So well did Tommy play her part that soon she was wildly in love with Paul. Meanwhile, at intervals she and Prince went out on their marauding expeditions. It was one such night that, in her escape, Tommy broke her ankle after jumping from a balcony window. Escape was impossible. Prince, realizing his mistress was helpless, refused to leave her. A police whistle sounded. Tommy lost consciousness. When she opened her eyes again she was looking up into the hurt eyes of Paul Maine. Wearily she sank back on the pillow and refused to speak. Prince managed to find his way into the hospital. With her lipstick, Tommy wrote a note to Sam pleading for help. Paul, seeing Prince dash down the street, followed in a taxi. Sam, reading the note, packed hurriedly to make his escape. Paul entered. In desperation, Sam fired. Leaping at him, Paul disarmed him and snapping handcuffs on Sam's wrists, led him to prison. As the police closed in, Sam tried once more to escape. A shot caught him over the heart. Dying, Sam confessed that he had planned the rap for Tommy's father's murder on her mother, and had forced Tommy to do his bidding by promising to free her mother who had been his mistress. Paul secured Tommy's release after a minimum prison sentence. Her mother was released, and Tommy was to find Paul waiting for her, with love and understanding.

BRIGHTNESS AHEAD

Mildred Staufenberger Drama File No. 12297

THE last dish was put in place. Alice sighed with relief as she heard her mistress close the front door. She could change her clothes and make herself ready for the party that she had promised Elise to attend. A half hour later, it was a transformed girl who tripped down the stairs. Now she looked extremely pretty as the mirror in the hall reflected and was happily conscious of it. Alice felt a little shy when she entered Elise's home for the thought of strangers always frightened her a bit. Fortunately there were several girls there whom she knew. Someone tuned on the radio and soon she was dancing with Kirk, Elise's boy friend and a good friend of hers. The party had been underway an hour when the bell rang loudly and continuously. There were the sounds of loud welcoming in the hall and a big, happy go lucky person strode in. Elise greeted him as Frank and began to introduce him to the girls. Frank, however, had already seen Alice who had pulled away a bit from the others. With an engaging grin, he walked over to her and said to the assembled company, "Never mind. I've found the girl I want." Nor did he give her opportunity to be embarrassed long. All through the evening he was constantly by her side. When Alice felt that it was getting quite late; time to go; Frank insisted on accompanying her home. As they talked a while outside her house, Alice to her own surprise found herself talking freely about the past— the father with a weakness for women and drink and the mother who had entered marriage with dreams of happiness only to have them crushed by her husband's treatment. After her mother's death, her father had broken up the house; her sister was married and Alice found work in an office until the depression came. Now to tide her over, she had been forced to take work as a maid. But because of her parents, Alice was afraid of marriage. She too was sensitive and could not bear to think that her dreams would be shattered as her mother's were. Frank made her conscious of his warm sympathy. In the weeks to come, she was to see much of him. Bit by bit her fears of love vanished. To Frank, she gave all the trust and affection of a young girl who is hungry for warmth and tenderness. Came a lovely spring night when while they were bound to join the group of mutual friends, Frank suggested that they run away from everyone and drive far into the country. At an odd roadside inn with few patrons they had dinner. On the return home, Frank begged her to marry him and gladly the girl consented. When Frank suggested that it would be nicer to keep it a secret a while, Alice agreed for she wanted to keep the beauty of their love isolated from the world. The next day she was amazed to have Elise and Kirk call on her. The earth seemed to crash when they told her that it had just been learned Frank was married; she never again saw him. Months later she was still recuperating in her sister's home when a cousin of the husband came. His slow gentleness and his own shyness were gradually a healing medicine to the girl. He was to restore her faith yet ony when he left, did Alice realize how much he meant. But a letter came begging her to marry him and even while she wrote the answer, impatient Herbert returned. And after the shadows, Alice at last found brightness ahead.

TROPICAL NIGHTS

Mildred Decker Drama File No. 12390

BEVERLY sadly shook her lovely head as Dr. Alex stood pleadingly before her. "I'm sorry but I can't pretend something that is not true," she said wistfully. Alex nodded submissively though he had to press back hard the desire to bury his face in her lovely hair. Always he had loved her and until Tony came had fond hopes that some day Beverly would return his affection. Now there was nothing left but to place as many miles between himself and her as possible. He had already accepted an excellent position as a surgeon on the staff of the Honolulu hospital and had dared to dream for a little while that Beverly might go there as his bride. Now this was the end. When Tony ealled for Beverly that night he found her radiant as always. For miles they sped through the darkness and it was Tony's suggestion that instead of joining the party which was their original destination they go to a nearby inn for dinner. Although Beverly did not approve, Tony with his usual weakness for liquor took several drinks. Returning home he continued at a fast pace of driving until he noticed a motorcycle cop following. Recklessly he turned on the "gas" and the car shot into space. Another machine collided. Beverly awoke in a hospital with stabbing pains in her legs. Tony who escaped with a few bruises was permitted to visit her. It was Jane her sister who with diffieulty broke the news that an operation would be necessary if she were to walk again. At first Tony visited her frequently until the hospital staff declared that her case seemed hopeless. Then he came to her and said that business compelled him to go to Europe for a time. Jane railed bitterly, perceiving her sister's hurt face; Tony had never done a stroke of work all his life. Although Tony never wrote Beverly continued to believe in him as all women do in the men they love. Confined to a wheel chair although two years had passed in undergoing numerous operations, Beverly was too self conscious to go anywhere. Kindly Dr. Hart warned her one day that Jane was suffering from the confinement for she hated to leave her sister to the care of servants. Ashamed of her selfishness, Beverly insisted that they go to Honolulu for a few weeks change of scenery. In a secluded corner of the beach one evening, Beverly could not help but sigh, seeing the gorgeous moon overhead and the happy couples strolling nearby. A voice in the darkness startled her. Alex! Jane slipped away to leave those two together. Beverly during the next week regarded him as a comrade and dear brother. Then one evening he begged her to permit him to operate for he had been making rapid strides in discovering new scientific methods. Beverly for Jane's sake consented. She awoke to consciousness to find a huge basket of flowers with a card from Tony. Jane confessed that she had met him the previous night. Alex found Tony and Beverly together when he came to examine her; too soon to tell whether the operation was a success. There was a grimness about Alex that disturbed her; Beverly felt that Alex had become deliberately a stranger. When she voiced this to Tony he only laughed. Home again, Alex was expected to take the bandages off the following day. Then she overheard Alex reassure Tony she would be able to walk again. When after dinner Tony proposed sure of acceptance, he was amazed when Beverly told him that she had stopped being a fool. Tony had only been an infatuation. Yes, it was Alex she loved. Alex who had returned to pick up his forgotten medical bag overheard this from the reception room. As soon as Tony left, he strode into the room and took her in his arms. Never before had a tropical night been so beautiful!

THE GALLANT ADVENTURE

Miss O'Malley Drama File No. 11512

A GALLANT ship tossed. The blue-grey angry seas waiting to devour the already half flooded boat. The life boats had been swept away. Marvel and James Lander bent tenderly over their small daughter as they lashed her to a barrel and prayed that it would reach the distant shore. . . . Twenty years passed. The depression had sent thousands of boys swarming through towns and cities in search of work. Among these were two brothers, Paul and Peter. They rested along a deserted roadside one late afternoon while Peter prepared a fire over which they cooked a meal in rusty cans as the tramps had taught them. An old man stopped, and looked longingly at the meal to which the boys invited him. While he spoke in an eratic manner during the meal, the boys had never before met a deranged person but they felt somewhat uneasy. A summer storm sprang up and the boys looked around for shelter. Their companion, Gurnatti, offered to lead them to shelter but the boys were amazed to find themselves in a eemetery. Gurnatti told them that he was the caretaker and amidst these gruesome surroundings, they composed themselves for sleep in the small house were Gurnatti kept his tools. In the middle of the night, Paul waked Peter and silently pointed to the window where Gurnatti was digging. At first it appeared that he was removing a corpse, but the boys soon saw that it was a heavy burlap sack that clinked as if filled with coins. Boldly, Pete led the way to Gurnatti, who confessed that years ago he had robbed in revenge the father of the girl he loved when he refused to approve the match. His sweetheart was brutally murdered and Gurnatti was out of his mind for months. Afraid to spend the gold, a sardonic impulse drove him to hide it later near his enemy's grave. He handed over a large sum to the boys who swore never to reveal his secret since there were no relations who could benefit. The brothers travelled to New York in luxurious fashion. They had always wanted to travel, and when they learned that a tramp steamer was embarking at African ports, they signed as passengers. The first night at sea was infested with rats and insects which disturbed Pete who retired early. Not seeing Paul, he rushed on deck and found him roaring drunk with the crew. During the weeks that followed, Pete wanted to depart at the smaller ports, distrusting the sea captain. Paul, however, refused to leave and Pete would not desert him. Several weeks out, angry clouds rose and the half-drunken crew could not handle the ship against the storm. The boat began to sink rapidly almost in the precise spot of the ship of twenty years before. A fear crazed crew dashed for the life boat and cut it away before Paul and Pete could join them. Off in the distance, the boys saw land and decided to chance the waves, being excellent swimmers. They reached shore, only to lose consciousness from all the water they had swallowed and their exhausted bodies. The boys woke to find themselves in a hut, surrounded by curious blacks. When the boys weakly got out into the sunshine, they were not interfered with. Food and drink was placed at their disposal, none spoke to the brothers but kept bowing in awed reverence. The head bones mounted near each hut made them wonder if they had fallen with cannibals. There seemed no means of escape. Their alarm grew when the jungle chant of drums cut across the stillness and hundred of negroes surrounded them. When they tried to run, they were forcibly seized and taken to a large cave. In front of them was an altar—Pete resolved that he should not be killed without a struggle. But to his shocked surprise, he saw a beautiful white girl with a garland in her hand. For both, it was instant love, and as Pete kneeled the people shouted. Then, in half forgotten English the girl revealed her past. The negroes believed her a goddess and the brothers coming was regarded as a sign from the Gods. Now all three were free to return to civilization on the trading boat that stopped twice each year. "I shall always be your God—your husband," Pete declared as he swept her to him.

THE HUSBAND CHASE

Emily Lepere Short Subject File No. 12527

IN the imposing club house, Wellington, old and set in his ways, grumpily tells his cronies that he doesn't believe in banks. Since the depression he has stored all his money in the library safe concealed by a picture. While he talks, Joe Bullin hovers around them, listening eagerly to every word. Wellington orders him to bring a drink; struck by the fact that this seems to be a new face he asks where Bob the regular man is. Joe reassures him that Bob has a slight touch of indisposition. Early that evening, Joe changes to street clothes and hurries over to Bob's apartment. Meanwhile Matilda Grimm disrespectfully known to many as Old Maid Grimm is entertaining the Town Literary Club and yawns as one of the members reads an imposing paper. Hurriedly she straightens when the other is finished and as hostess rings for Nina her colored servant to bring in refreshments. Over the tea cups the ladies relax, and talk turns to their husbands and children while Matilda enviously listens. Everyone knows that for twenty years she has been seeking a husband unsuccessfully. Catty Mrs. Brown turns to Matilda and archly wonders aloud on what a quiet life a spinster must lead. Matilda slams the door after her. At Bob's house, Joe who is wanted by the police for a number of burglaries declares that he is going to make a clean-up that evening and leave the country until the fuss simmers down. While his intimates listen open mouthed, Joe explains that he is going to crack Wellington's safe first. About midnight he will go over to the Grimm's house and enter through a cellar window which will lead him to the kitchen trap door. It will be easy to locate the place where she keeps her jewels. Sitting before the fire, Matilda in whose mind that afternoon's remark still rankles picks up a book. Eyes sparkle as she reads the words "future husband," and she hurries through the paragraphs until she finds the directions, "Look through your cellar window at midnight and you will see your future husband." Without noticing that it is a book of games for Hallowe'en night, Matilda stares into the flames. She has tried so many other methods; maybe this will work. With a start she realizes it is close to midnight and resolutely creeps down the cellar. Joe is opening the safe without difficulty when Wellington surprises him and in the struggle which follows the older man is knocked unconscious. Realizing he must leave quickly, Joe hurriedly drives near the Grimm place, parks his car and slips around the backyard. Just as he is about to enter the window, Matilda stares back at him. To his amazement she orders him to go around the front way and they will talk things over. Seated in the living room, Joe is too shocked to speak. Impatient, Matilda finally asks if he isn't going to propose. Unable at first to believe his ears, Joe says no but Matilda declares if he won't propose she will. Just as she is about to fling her arms about him, Joe runs around the room, seeking for escape with Matilda hot after him. Policeman O'Neil sees their shadows on the shade as he passes. Suspicious he breaks open the front door and Joe falls into his arms. And Matilda sees her last hope for a husband walking out wearing handcuffs.

JOSEPHINE'S PEARLS

Mary Wylie Drama File No. 11206

ILL-HEALTH drives Samuel Arnold from his banking position in the city to the west where he purchases the ranch that Curtis has always intended to buy when the price reaches his stipulation. Although the residents name it Arnold's folly when they learn he is running the land on scientific methods, to their amazement it prospers. When his son Jim enters the local school Bill Curtis, his classmate, upholds the grudge that Curtis retains. Jim wins his respect and friendship on the first day when he stands his ground and offers to fight him. Amid the cheers of the other pupils the two boys slam-bang each other until Bill with new respect acknowledges defeat. They have to meet on the sly for Curtis forbids their friendship. Jim is waiting for Bill on the carnival grounds opening night when he finds a strand of beads near a Chance Booth. Holding it in his hands, Jim is puzzled what to do about them when Bill and his friends surround him. First to spy the beads is Bill's younger sister, Jean, who with flattery beyond her years takes the strand admiringly from his hands and clasps it around her neck. Too ashamed to confess that he found them while Jean admires him for winning it, Jim gruffly tells her they are her's permanently. The years pass gaily until when Jim is fourteen his father dies and Jim undertakes to run the land, leaving little time for friends. Unable to live without her husband, Mrs. Arnold soon follows and Jim sells the land at Banker Elder's advance. Elder sees him to the train where he leaves for Denver to continue his education and reminds him that there will always be a position for Jim at the bank. After graduating college, Jim returns as cashier. His first customer is a pretty girl who calls him by name though Jim blushes, unable to remember her. It is Jean she tells him! even while they speak Curtis comes out and gruffly calls his daughter. Jean returns often though enjoying Jim's shy flushes, receiving perverse enjoyment from their meetings. Entering when Jim is ready to leave for lunch, Jean hints that she is hungry and Jim immediately asks her to dine with him. Timidly, Jim over the table wonders what her father will say but Jean declares that what he does not know will never hurt him. Soon Jim buys a car and Jean persuades him to teach her to drive. To prolong their meetings she is much more awkward than in reality, once backing into another car and fumbling for a handkerchief. Jim thinks himself to blame and reassures her thato the lessons will soon be over. Jean has other plans, however, and invites him to a picnic on their last driving lesson day. The delightful time is over all too soon but as they are packing, their hands accidentally cling—and linger. Jim returns with her to face Curtis' wrath when they confess they wish to marry. Despite his opposition with Bill's help, they elope. The first evening they entertain guests in their new home, Jean wears the beads he gave her. Later Jim confesses how he obtained them. A few years later, Jim is working in a New York bank with Beth and Jim, Jr. to grace their happy household. Receiving promotion over the heads of many older men, Jim in happy anticipation turns down the street of his home—in time to save Beth from oncoming car wheels. But Jim can never walk again without an operation beyond their means. While in his wheelchair, Jim manages the household and Jean works in a laundry. Later Junior sells papers and finally buys a stand. Christmas Beth and he want to give their parents inexpensive gifts so they decide to have Jean's cherished beads restrung. A jeweler to Junior's amazement offers twenty thousand dollars and at Jim's secret advice, Junior brings them to Brown, a former client at Tiffany's. While the entire family are gathered together, Brown calls with an offer of eighty thousand dollars. After the bewildered Jean accepts this, Brown shows them a clipping which explains why the French government offers $100,000 for their return. On each stone in microscopic letters are the words, "From Napoleon to Josephine." So Jim is to have his operation and the financial clouds of the family disappear.

HIT THE TRAIL

Edith Moke Western File No. 12526

OLD Pete clumsily spills some liquor as he serves Stanley, foreman of the Bar Square Ranch, who is with his assistant Grauch in the Durkin Saloon. Losing his temper, Stanley strikes out at Pete only to have his arm wrenched in mid air by a stranger who unnoticed is watching them. Furious, Stanley turns upon him and reaches for his gun but Jim's pistols confront him first while Stanley stares aghast at the first man he has ever met who can beat him to the draw. Discomforted, Stanley swaggers out and Jim walks nonchalantly to the bar. Pete begs to stand treat and as they talk Jim reveals that he is just roaming the country with his horse Beauty looking for a job cowpunching. Although warning him that Stanley will be his boss, Pete declares that the Browns who own the ranch are in need of another hand. They have a pretty daughter Ruth whom gossip declares Stanley is paying marked attention to. Jim's eyes narrow as he hears this and after receiving directions from Pete rides away. Brown likes his clean-cut appearance and places him on the payroll immediately. He brings him to the bunk house to introduce to the boys and Stanley grows furious upon seeing him. He wants Brown to fire him but Brown refuses to without good cause. Jim goes quietly about his duties the following days though the men avoid him as Stanley spreads rumors that Jim is an outlaw escaping justice. While riding with Beauty, Jim encounters Ruth having trouble with her horse who has injured his hoof on a stone. After tending to the animal, Jim persuades the girl to return riding astride Beauty. Resentful when he encounters them together, Stanley tries to poison Ruth against him. Though she is attracted to Stanley, Ruth cannot help but like the stranger and is bewildered as to what to believe. Resentful because Stanley tries to order her about. Ruth accepts Jim's invitation to attend a barn dance. Several times Stanley tries to cut in on Jim's dances but sulks when the couple ignore him. Believing himself made a laughing stock, Stanley goes to Brown and asks him to order Ruth to keep away from Jim. Brown declares that Stanley has no right to interfere. Naive and trustful, feeling sorry for Stanley Ruth consents to see him that evening. He wins her consent to ask the Browns if they will consent to an engagement. However, Brown declares that she is too young and he does not care for Stanley as a son-in-law. "You'll have me or else—," declares Stanley enraged. Furious that Stanley should threaten him, Brown orders him to leave but Stanley says the final decision must be with Ruth. She refuses to go against her parents' wishes. While she is picking flowers in the garden, Stanley kidnaps her. Worried over her absence, the Browns turn to Jim who finds evidence that a scuffle has taken place. He calls the men together and they ride off on a man hunt. Grauch slips away while they camp during the night and warns Stanley who is making for a deserted cabin. Suspicious at Grauch's efforts to divert them on another path, Jim ordering the men to follow rides on ahead. He breaks into the cabin only to have Stanley waiting behind the door with a gun while Ruth is tied to a chair. Yelling to the others, Jim fearlessly throws himself upon Stanley and the men guard Grauch who tries to come to Stanley's aid. In the rough and tumble fight which follows, Stanley unsuccessfully tries to use a knife but is knocked unconscious .Ruth realizes that she really cares for Jim and in reward the Browns accept him as a son-in-law.

BULLDOG SAM

Margaret Copren Drama File No. 12209

THE way Sam babied his young brother Zeb you might think he was still wearing knee pants. But Junction Hamlet knew that it had always been that way. Everyone looked up to Sam, even Shorty whose skill at spewing tobacco in a straight line made him the champion of the county. A quiet little spot the town woke up into activity one day when across from the general store painters and carpenters began work on a building that had been empty for some years. The Weekly News for which Shorty was a faithful reporter announced that Jess Wilcox was opening there. Big Jess was known as and after a while even the others began to congregate until the watchers from across the street saw them bring in pool tables. A gambling place in Junction Hamlet. The Church Social that following evening was a bee hive; the women disapproved heartily but none knew just what could be done. Shorty asked Zeb what Sam thought but the young brother didn't know. Sam always was close mouthed said Shorty as he accurately hit the round pot bellied stove that generated heat at the store, general loafing place and meeting center. After a while excitement died; the rougher element were the first to attend and after a while even the others bgan to congregate there. Pool shooting was a good indoor sport even if they didn't think much of Big Jess. Soon Shorty had another piece of news to occupy him. Elizabeth Range, the new school teacher had arrived. Pretty as a picture decided everyone at the church dance which sponsored a social event once a month. Sam had said and done nothing at first; merely waited until the younger men had first rush at the newcomer. Then he strode over, flashing that famous genial smile of his, courteously introduced himself. Shorty was first to turn toward the door and notice Big Jess swagger in. Like a bee after honey, he made straight for Elizabeth. Ignoring Sam who had just finished the last number, he asked for a dance. Hardly waiting for a reply when the music struck up he whirled her away, with a triumphant look in the direction of Sam who said nothing. His champions, Zeb and Shorty watched disappointed. Before there had been rumors that Big Jess tried to lord it over Sam when they met but few would believe it. Soon everyone knew that both young men had asked to take her home. For a moment she had stood there doubtfully and then settled the question by returning in the company of her landlady and her husband. Not long afterwards it was known that Sam and Jess were rivals for the school teacher's favors. When Zeb failed to keep an oppointment with Shorty one day he called at the house only to learn that Zeb had a case of pneumonia which grew steadily worse. The one practical nurse the town boasted was unable to attend, being away on another case. Then Elizabeth offered her services. Sam refused at first in embarrassment but she insisted upon relieving him. Jess was furious. A few weeks later when Zeb was permitted out of the house he met Jess who cast a slurring remark. Despite his weakened condition, Zeb struck when the other refused to apologize. At Shorty's call, Sam strode over in time to pick up the beaten brother but said nothing to Jess. At the store that night, loyally Shorty claimed that it wasn't fear that kept Sam from fighting. Even if he was short, he had legs like a bulldog and everyone knew a bulldog never let go. Sam was playing in the poolroom when Shorty entered and stared unblinkingly at Jess's huge diamond that adorned his shirt front. When Jess scoffed at his markmanship in spatting tobacco, Shorty whose one pride was this accomplishment aimed accurately at the diamond. Jess strode after him, fist extended but Sam got there first. They still talk about the fight in which the triumphant Sam ordered Jess to leave on the next train. He did and Shorty had the added satisfaction of publishing the bully's abrupt departure as well as the announcement of Elizabeth and Bulldog's engagement.

THE SUPER-RACE

Mrs. Lenore Lizotte Short Subject File No. 12467

TIRED out from a heavy day's calls upon his skill, Doctor Boulard retires early. Deep in slumber he hears the telephone near his pillow ring. It is Dr. Rogers, his young assistant, who calls him in as consultant. The case is a maternity one and cannot be moved to the hospital. Carefully noting the address, Boulard clambers into his clothes and drives to his destination. The house seems set far off in the distance surrounded by high gates which open softly as he approaches. Without a word the watchman silently motions the physician to the first row of small cottages. Boulard finally recognizes the estate as belonging to wealthy Vikinburg, well known sportsman who startled the world several years ago by returning with sixteen ape families which he intended to civilize. The door opens and Boulard feels reassured when he sees Rogers. He is incredulous when Rogers informs him that they have been called in to attend an ape. It is a joke! He is a physician for people not animals. Rogers tells him that they are more civilized than most people and can speak in both French and English. Vikinburg will pay a large fee for their services. Consenting, Boulard enters an elaborately furnished room but is unable to restrain a start of surprise when he sees the ape mother in bed. Hours later the two physicians emerge with blanched faces; the ape-mother's baby is a human child. Ape Herreux who is introduced as the father greets the child with joy but when he realizes that nature has advanced his baby one step beyond her footsteps he begs Boulard to wait while the child ancestors declares, there will be trouble. Hearing is given to the nurse. The house is soon crowded with fellow apes come to congratulate the new father. Continually Boulard blinks his eyes unable to believe that these well dressed conversationalists are from the animal kingdom. When the last have gone Herreux bribes Boulard to accompany the family to Africa to civilize his savage people. They leave on a special plane but flying over the jungle they have engine trouble and are forced to land. While they are looking about for shelter a huge savage ape appears in the distance. Herreux hides the others and then in the language of the apes converses with the beast who wishes only to fight. In the fierce battle the clothes of the civilized ape are torn off but Herreux kills the other with a sharp knife concealed in his belt. Herreux than swings wife and child above the tree branches while the alarmed Boulard wonders if he is forgotten. In reassuring English the ape calls down that Tarzan is coming through the trees; they shall be safe. Convinced that the she ape has been faithful to her mate, Tarzan calls his herd of elephants as more apes near to avenge their fallen brother. The elephants frighten them away and then Tarzan and the doctor leave the ape family, mounted on elephants and begin to cross a stream. He feels his mount sinking. . . . Boulard opens his eyes to find his wife shaking him out of a deep sleep.

THE NEW SKY ACE

Guido Nizzi Drama File No. 12185

FRIENDS throng the ship to bid farewell to Jack Scott, millionaire aviator, and May Dawson, daughter of a great financier, who leave together on a hunting trip in Africa. With them are two planes which will take them into the interior of land where few white men have ever before stepped foot. During the voyage, Jack again renews his proposals of marriage, but May only laughs and insists that they should remain the good friends they have always been. When they reach their destination accompanied by natives, May feels too worn the first few days to accompany Jack who uses the plane on his exploring expeditions. One afternoon, earlier than May had expected Jack to return there was the whirl of a plane's motors. Looking up, May soon saw that it was a strange ship making a forced landing. However, the pilot made it safely a few yards from the camp, and running to the plane May assisted him in getting out. When he had pulled off his helmet, the flyer introduced himself as Col. Francesco Forghieri. It will take only a few hours to fix the machine but Jack who arrives shortly, urges him to stay, glad to have company, for at least the weekend. Later Jack regrets the invitation when he notices on what good terms May and Francesco are. The next day when they go hunting, Mary chooses to ride in the plane of the guest. When the two land before the others, May walks on a few yards ahead only to be confronted by a deadly snake. When she screams for help too frightened to move, Francesco quickly demolishes the reptile while May slips to the ground in a faint. Francesco hugs her to him and May opens her eyes to see the look of adoration in his face. Shyly, she confesses her love in return while Jack overhead, through his telescope sees them. However, Jack keeps silent and later May informs him that Francesco desires to break the long distance flight around the world; she has promised that Jack and she will be sponsors. Jack's first impulse is to protest and then in his crafty brain an idea is formed. Against May's wishes her lover refuses to permit the engagement to be announced until after the flight is completed when he will be in a position to ask her hand without the stigma of being termed fortune hunter. The proposed flight wins much attention since he is testing a number of inventions. When word comes from Rome that Francesco has successfully passed over the city where he was welcomed by a storm of airships, Jack is already waiting in a remote European section which is Francesco's next destination. In the role of manager, he pretends that the plane will not arrive for hours. So only Jack and hired cut-throats are there to receive the noted aviator. Jack takes him prisoner and transfers the secret inventions to his own plane, intending to make a long distance flight of his own which will make him hero and win May's love when she is through grieving over Francesco. Later Jack leads the search party which finds pieces of Francesco's ship floating in the sea. Tony, one of Jack's men, sympathizes with Francesco but when he attempts to free him, Jack makes the attempted rescuer a prisoner also. This antagonizes the others who later free both and guide them to the spot where Jack is saying farewell to May previous to taking off. Francesco knocks Jack down while Jack's several guards attempt to overpower him until Tony backs them off with a gun. May starts the plane motor and calls to Francesco. Jack comes to his senses; calls off the men and apologizes. The new sky ace and his sweetheart soar into the clouds.

PERSECUTION

Shded Ellis Drama File No. 11378

OUT of the old country, a new, modernized Turkey is emerging, but the pages of that country some twenty-five years ago are red with the blood of internal warfare among the Drouses, a religious, fanatical set, and the small band of Christians. . . The bodies of the dead and dying were heaped on the streets of the Christian quarter while the Drouses, drunk with bloodlust, stormed among them in search of more victims. The piteous cries of young girls and children rose above the wounded. Young Kaleel, trusted leader in the army of his prince, had unexpectedly entered this onslaught which proved that the Turks had betrayed the Christians once again. Through half-shut eyelids as he sprawled out stunned by a severe knife wound, Kaleel saw Hamad, his former school comrade and now one of the worst "butchers" approaching. Pretending that he was dead, he felt him pull off the leggings Helen had made for him. Remembering Helen he groaned. Only two days before he had secretly married her for she was bearing his child. When dusk fell and most of the soldiers had left, Kaleel sought to creep away only to be threatened again with death by the returning Hamad. His rescue was effected by Kanj, an old man who though a Drouse owed Kaleel's house a debt of gratitude for saving him from the death penalty years before. Months passed before his wounds healed sufficiently for him to resume search. Later he found Helen near his old home only to be confronted also by his brother who confessed himself her lover. Helen made no effort to deny this and several years were to pass before Kaleel was to learn that Hajda had threatened to kill her child whom he had kidnapped, unless she kept silent. Drawing his sword, Kaleel battled with him. Convinced that he had mortally wounded Hajda, Kaleel returned to the city where he obtained freedom for Kanj who had been arrested by the government, stirred to action against the Drouses by the vigorous protests of the European nations. Until his death several months later, Kanj treated him as a son and bequeathed him all his property. For two years he avoided the town which had been the scene of his unhappiness. Then a letter came from his wife. At last she had succeeded in finding her daughter and under the protection of Dr. Shmail who had nursed her to health, felt secure enough to write and give a true explanation of the charges she had once failed to deny. His subsequent happiness was marred when the shock of seeing him again slightly deranged her. A priest tricked him into forgiving and restoring the estates to his brother who was alive, but he still feared him. Returning from a business trip in a distant city, Kaleel found his wife and child were gone. Though the Governor ordered a thorough investigation no trace was found of his brother. Hearing rumors that he had risen high in the Drouses ranks, Kaleel determined to join the government army which started relentless warfare. Taken prisoner and kept in a solitary cell awaiting death, Kaleel experienced renewed torture when his brother confronted him and jeeringly confessed that Helen was once more his. After he had gone, Kaleel tricked the guard into his reach where with frenzied strength he struck him unconscious and escaped with his servant, imprisoned in an adjoining cell. Before morning, Kaleel traced his loved ones to the next town. Although tempted to kill Hadja who had been wounded in a series of battles which foretold the end of the Drouses, Kaleel remembered the precepts of his faith. Returned to the happy surroundings where their love had first bloomed, the old Helen was restored to him and the intervening years were a weird, unreal dream. . . .

ALL MY LOVE—STOP

Rosa Skinner Comedy Drama File No. 12394

THROUGH Jimmie Lang, relief operator of the Posthaste Telegraph Office, Dorothy Newting—who wants to know life so she can write a book—obtains his place when he is transferred to a newspaper office twenty miles away. Since she comes from a once wealthy family and has been brought up strictly, the town professes to be shocked; but the word soon passes around the travelling salesmen that a pretty girl is there and business increases. So do the number of men who for one pretext or another hang about but Dorothy decides that it is perfectly alright so long as she doesn't accompany them alone outside the office. Mrs. Hughes, her next door neighbor, disapproves; for she has always planned to have her son Benjamin marry Dot and live on the profits of her great American novel. Dorothy is much more interested in hearing about Jimmie's invention. She refuses to learn telegraphy and uses the telegraph phone instead because Jimmie promised that the job is hers so long as she wants it. He is furious though when he finds a salesman, D'Arcey D'Orsay, in the office when he comes to see her, but outstays the rival. Already, Dot has collected a number of proposals but when Jimmie tells her that he loves her she's too naive to realize that he means marriage and keeps waiting for the day when he will name a preacher. Her first meeting with Red Hopper occurs when he bawls her out for not sending a telegram only to discover that the message was in his coat all the time. Mothers and gossips complain that the office is turning into a matrimonial bureau because nearly all the eligible girls visit there in hopes of making dates, but Dot makes them her chaperone whenever she goes riding with Windy who is just another man. Meanwhile, Jay Jay, a patron comes with a wedding license and is all set to marry her. He threatens a breech of promise suit and Dot calls on all the lawyers in town. She takes AWOL for several days to go to court against bootleggers who have been sending code wires through her office, and this, coupled with Jay Jay, makes her double her insurance. For safety sake she also keeps a shot gun under the counter. Not knowing the real reason for her court summons and convinced she was arrested, Mrs. Hughes snubs her until Dot tells the truth and once again Benji is parked on her doorstep. To dispose of them she allows Jimmie to come to dinner where Benji gets "spiffed" and Mrs. Hughes blames it on Dot's "degeneration." Windy and Ali Beben, a Hindu mind-reader, who make frequent trips to Dot's office, anger Jimmie who decides there is no hope for him. Every other person seems to have a relative they want in Dot's place and are eager to marry her off; most insistent is Miss Dowd who annoys Dot because the public always confuses the two names. Busy painting screens for friends, and collecting bits for her novel, Dot can't be bothered with learning the system of bookkeping which the company persistently sends auditors to teach her. Troubles break afresh when Red's wife divorces him and rumor declares Dot is the unnamed correspondent. Newest of the hanger-ons is Bob Crenshaw "who plots scenarios ever since he won a prize in a correspondence school," tells Dot to her dairy. Then Dot receives notice that she is "fired" though business has tripled, since she came there. She sends out SOS to all the influential men she has met to come to her rescue.

Rand, wealthy business man who recommended her for the position, proposes over the counter but when he tries to kiss her forcibly, Dot fires the gun harmlessly into the air. As a result Rand has a stroke and Dot is under suspicion for arrest. Jimmie is wired immediately. Subsequently it develops through the resultng investigation that Rand runs a bootlegging ring and wanted an unsuspicious girl in the office. After the court affair, he is afraid Dot is in league with the government and tries to "frame" her through Red. Because of her letters of protest the Superintendent calls personally and finds that the rumors that Dot is "peculiar" were falsely spread. Windy proves an insurance agent sent to protect her because of her large policies; D'Arcy and Ali Beben is the same person running a confidence racket but she persuades him to reform. Jimmie reveals that he thought he was asking her to marry him all the time. And Miss Dowd on her escapades gave Dot's name, explaining Dot's tarnished fascination for visitors. When Jimmie kisses her for the first time, Dot tells him to "stop" but he reminds her that in telegrams it usually means only a pause. . . .

DAUGHTER OF THE SOUTH

P. Penandink Drama File No. 12530

IN Papuan Island, land of the head-hunters and Black Magic, King Dago, according to custom, has decreed that the man who has fifteen heads to show as evidence of the number he has killed will be given the hand of his daughter, Princess Kima. In the garden Pati appears before the Princess whom he loves, displaying his twelfth head. He is the leader so far because the number is greater than any before demanded as befits a King's daughter. Spoiled and selfish, Kima will not be displeased if Pati wins; then she meets Trader Strong and loses her heart to him. Armed with gifts, Strong penetrates to the village and makes friends with the King. Feeling all her advances ignored, Kima visits a witch-doctor who promises that his charmed water, either drunk or stepped over by the white man will cause him to love Kima. Though she sprinkles it on her threshold, Strong resists all invitations to enter. Love turns to hate and she promises that if Pati will obtain Strong's head, she will marry him, forfeiting the remainder. Gossip informs Strong of this and he prepares a straw figure on his bed. Braving his fears of Strong's gun, Pati slips into the tent only to find himself tricked. When Strong calls at the King's house to complain after Pati escapes, he finds that Dago is ill, beyond the help of the witch-doctors. Strong treats him for malaria fever and in gratitude Dago holds a feast in Strong's honor, proclaiming death to any who may harm him. All the native ceremonies are given in Strong's honor —prayer chanting, war-dances, songs by the warriors and a dance by the girls which excites the men to wild frenzy. As a result Strong's business increases but the witch-doctors realize that they are out of favor with the King who feels the white man's magic is greater. Kima has told Pati that because of her father's friendship he must no longer seek Strong's head. Jealous, Pati enlists the willing aid of the witch-doctors to dispose of their common enemy. For this purpose they release a snake of deadly bite in Strong's tent but his guards capture it. A price is placed on Pati's head and desperate he waylays Kima with her maid returning from the morning bath at the river. With his comrade-band of outlaws, Pati takes the princess to a hut built on a flat tableland of high cliffs, impenetrable from attack below. A messenger brings word that Pati demands the King's consent to marry his daughter. Beside himself with rage, Dago orders the man killed and with Strong leads an expedition of swordsmen and archers. They are unable to climb the hill and when Strong uses his gun, Pati takes the girl for a shield. After whispered conference with Strong, Dago consents to the marriage though Kima protests bitterly. Strong leaves the village but returns the day before the ceremony. All the natives soon know that Strong has returned to ask Kima's hand in marriage. Pati forces his way in upon the conference of Strong and Doga and insists that Dago keep his promise. But Strong reminds the King that he has once declared he will do anything for Strong who saved his life. Dago begs him to ask for something else yet Strong holds firm. As the two young men quarrel, the King commands that they fight it out, the winner to have the girl. A huge crowd watches the match which is fought with fists only. Though Pati fights with all his might, nearly knocking Strong out, the latter scientifically employs boxing and wrestling tricks. When Pati is knocked senseless, the King declares the white man winner. More prestige results for Strong and now the natives too ignore the witch-doctors when sick or troubled by domestic problems using the trader as their court of appeal. The medicine men complain that they will soon be ousted from their business, power and rank. Again joining forces with Pati they hit upon a plan to bring about the overthrow of the King and the downfall of Strong. Secretly they spread word that the white man is planning to rob their country through his marriage with the Princess; soon more white men will come to make the whole tribe slaves. The villagers are fast stirred to revolt for "where there is smoke, there is always fire." After all they fundamentally trust their doctors and Pati inciting them to further wrath leads an angry mob to the palace. There the leader demands that the trader be sent away immediately from the country or they will do it by force. Strong rushes to the King's rescue while the King stands unfalteringly before the crowd with gleaming swords and poison arrows ready to strike. Reminding them of the rules of hospitality Dago declares that Strong's friends will destroy the village if harm befalls him. During the ensuing argument while Pati wins back the faltering men who start toward the King, Strong frightens them into submission by firing in the air. The leaders are taken prisoners and at Strong's suggestion they, including Pati, are sent to the coast to work under the white men. Strong retains Pati to work under guard on his own land. Then Dago confesses that—while the contemplated marriage was meant only to trick Pati—his daughter really expects it. To preserve Dago's friendship, Strong stipulates that she be sent to white friends of his and trained. When she becomes fit to be a white man's wife he will marry her. Blind with infatuation, Kima consents only to rebel in a few months at the conventions and learning to which she must submit. At her request, Strong sends the princess home. Pati, however, has thrived under discipline and Strong sends word that while ill-health forces him to leave the country, he is recommending a husband. The stranger garbed in civilized clothes proves to be a reformed Pati whose love is unquenched. Kima's love for him is reawakened and at a jubilant festival, she at last becomes his mate.

THE DOOR TO PARADISE

William Conway Holland Drama File No. 12555

TO Joan, the girl he so dearly loves, Kenneth Don first comes to break the news of his promotion over the heads of many officials his senior in the large steel firm. Their words are those sacred to all lovers as they plan their wedding day. In the midst of their happiness, Joan suddenly asks if he has broken the news to his parents, and with a worried frown Kenneth evades the question. How can he tell her that his family still consider him in many ways the child he was; that the thought of his breaking away from the family roof would hurt them? Home, Kenneth finds that the joyous news has preceded him and a large dinner is prepared in his honor. His parents and younger sister and brother crowd about with their congratulations and there is only one thing missing to complete Kenneth's happiness, the presence of Joan. The dinner is a merry one as Mr. Don facetiously protests the bold costumes and stockingless fads of the younger generation. Drinking a toast to Kenneth, Mr. Don declares that this is the happiest evening of his life. Kenneth asks to see him alone in the library later; there he breaks the news that he plans to be married. His father is terror stricken. He declares that marriage will interfere with the progress of his career. When Kenneth reveals that it is Joan Grant whom he wishes to marry; his father grows violent with rage. Joan is on the stage, he claims; he is sure that she cannot be respectable. White with fury, forgetting everything except that Mr. Don is speaking of the girl he plans to make his wife, Kenneth begs him to be silent. Still his father continues heaping incriminations upon her and losing all control of himself, Kenneth strikes. The family and the servants come running and part the two. Their shocked faces stare at him and with Kenneth's passionate anger cooled, he begs forgiveness; bewildered, they do not know what to say. Sure that they too are against him, Kenneth insists upon leaving the house at once, despite all efforts to restrain him. He hurries to the theater where Joan is performing. Her loveliness seems to reach out across the stage and sooth him as she sings the refrain, "Are You in Love?" She is surprised and delighted to find Kenneth waiting at the close of the performance, but instantly senses that something is wrong. In a little secluded restaurant, Kenneth pours out the scene which he has just left. Joan is silent, realizing how much his family and particularly his father, has always meant to Kenneth. At first she urges him to go back; she does not want to come between them or in time Kenneth's love will turn to hate. But Kenneth looks at her incredulously. That could never be; always he has dreamed of her; Joan represents the door to Paradise. No, he will marry her tomorrow. Joan forces him to consent to wait a few days. As for tomorrow she has promised Silver, the hotel manager where she lives, that they will attend the hotel picnic. Oblivious of the crowd gathered on the picnic grounds, the lovers wander happily together. With longing eyes Silver who secretly loves her, watches them as Joan receives her first riding lesson. Silver calls the crowd together to announce that the best target shot will win a prize donated by Joan, a scarf. Apprehensively, Joan notices that Jack Murley who has been attempting to thrust unwelcome attentions upon her is entering the competition. An excellent shot, Jack is sure to win, and sure enough his bullet is close to the bulls-eye. For her sake, Joan begs Kenneth to win. Kenneth shoots, closing his eyes, not daring to see how far he has missed the mark; only to learn from Joan's clasp that he is the winner. They return to the hotel to freshen up and have tea in her suite. As they are about to step over the threshold, Kenneth attempts to kiss her but she eludes him, declaring he will have to catch her first. Breathless, they finally call a truce on the sofa, only to have their lips meet in long embrace. Kenneth finally leaves with her promise to marry him the next day. Meanwhile, Jack crazy with thwarted longing slips into her room and forces Joan into his arms as Kenneth returns with the license. Refusing any explanation, the heart-broken Kenneth returns home. Weeks of misery pass, accentuated by the realization that his father has suddenly become an old man as a result of their past quarrel. But Silver who cannot bear to see Joan unhappy calls on Kenneth and displays a written confession from Jack. After his forgiveness is assured Kennth insits on immediate marriage; happiness has been postponed long enough. Husband and wife of only a few moments they start back to the hotel when their cab is crashed into by another machine. Reassured that Joan is only slightly shaken, the two leave the car while Jack scolds the driver. Carelessly Joan wanders out on the road and is struck by another car. She dies in Kenneth's arms, with words of eternal love exchanged. Unable to bear the thought of life without her, Kenneth persuades the famous pathologist Dr. Anderson, to perform an operation which will transfer his own secretions of youth to his father, whose premature age he blames himself for. Mr. Don is unaware of the sacrifice; the operation is a success but Kenneth wakes, physically old and a world of pain and longing for Joan in his eyes. He dies content that the door to paradise will open again; somewhere Joan and Kenneth shall be happy together always.

A BACHELOR FOR SALE

Alvin Whitney Drama File No. 12438

DESPITE the fact that he and John Marshall are confirmed old bachelors, Col. Broton, decides its high time that his good looking nephew Jimmie be married though following the example of his elders, both of whom he considers uncles—Jimmie has always avoided the fair sex. Col. Broton decides that the way to make a man married is to bring him before the public eye, as a result Jimmie is elected to the Bachelor Club which Broton long since established and soon after is made president, replacing his uncle. News of the youngest member of the organization's promotion brings wide publicity and numerous fan mail from pretty girls. Ignoring this, Jimmie concentrates on bringing the affairs of the club into shape and then approaches the committee with the idea that the club sponsor similar organizations in other cities. The best way to accomplish this is by making the society known so Jimmie is persuaded to go on the air each night with a song program which he insists must not contain the word "love." Embarrassed when he first meets the secretary of the broadcasting station, Sally Bradley, Jimmie soon quarrels with her when she teases him about the Bachelor Club. Ready to make amends after his first broadcast Jimmie reenters Sally's office only to meet Max Clert, owner of the Golden Pheasant nightclub whose orchestra broadcasts there. He feels unreasonable jealousy whenever Sally smiles at Clert but Sally and he make up their differences the night word comes that her brother Detective Steve has been found murdered while on the trail of narcotics. Clert is really the ringleader and had him murdered on a tip from Steve's assistant who is in his employ. In his broadcasts and suggestions for picnic places he is really giving tips for unprotected landing places to his men arriving with illegal cargo picked up from the ships on the high seas. Unable to stand it any longer when women, not satisfied with letters, begin trailing him through the streets Jimmie leaves for their secluded Spring Lake Lodge. The uncles refuse to go on the forlorn hope that he will stay. While bathing he is overseen by two girls; one Maizy a gold-digger and blackmailer. Identifying the possessions in the pockets she walks off with the clothes and returns to his cottage that night. Realizing she intends to compromise him the confirmed bachelor slips out to the train two miles away. Meanwhile his uncles arrive and thinking, he is near the vicinity try to set fire to the cottage in the hope of making him return. A forest ranger jails them since they can't identify themselves. Lonely upon finding no one home, Jimmie wanders to the studio where a frightened Sally confides that Clert dropped his notebook containing the note which proved him guilty of her brother's death. Clert returns with his men before police can be called and knocks Jimmie out. Awaking on the high seas, both securely tied in the hold, Jimmie first realizes how much he cares for Sally. With his teeth he unties Sally who in turn releases him. He knocks the man sent to kill him unconscious and taking the other six by surprise imprisons them. Soon they are picked up by a passing ship and Clert and the others formally arrested. Released from jail the uncles come home to find Jimmie with an extremely pretty girl saying with a broad grin, "Meet the wife!"

THE INVADER

Gladys C. Reese Drama File No. 10963

IN the office a tired force is getting ready to quit for the night. As she puts on her hat and coat, Margaret Harrington is asked what she is going to do with her vacation. She smiles ruefully as she explains she hasn't decided what she can do with the least amount of money. The others smile at her savings and speculate about what they would do if they had money. Stopping at the corner for groceries, Margaret climbs the flight of stairs to her own room, and is welcomed with loud barking by her dog Pat. Finishing her lonely supper, she turns the newspaper to the resort section, and as she notes that the daughters of Society go to Miami, she suddenly determines to take out her savings and spend it all on one big splurge. Accordingly, she goes on a shopping spree, and entrusting Pat to her sympathetic landlady, she starts off South. On the train she sits near Kieth Gordon, who, bored with society and girls who want him for his money, has informed his mother that he is going to travel to Miami, leaving his money behind, in the hope that somewhere he can find a girl who isn't money mad. After hours of travel, Margaret get a cinder in her eyes and struggles with the window to pull it down. Kieth helps her, but she discourages his attempts to open a conversation. They arrive at the same hotel, but as Kieth looks over her shoulder to see her name on the register, Margaret mischievously signs, "Mrs. Ned Martin." Disappointedly, Kieth turns away. That night in the dining room, Margaret eats alone at a small table, while laughing people exchange witticisms all about her. Craig Lamont, playboy watches her with interest, and later, when he sees her alone in the lobby, he induces his sister Julia to invite the lovely newcomer to join them. Julia introduces Margaret to the crowd and later through them she meets formally, Kieth Gordon. Craig suggests a stroll on the beach, but Margaret declines, having a previous arrangement to dance with Kieth. Craig watches them jealously and as they finish the dance, Craig rudely infers that Kieth's presence is undesirable. However, Margaret insists on Kieth's coming with them, and the three walk toward the beach together, Craig glaring at the amused Kieth. The following morning Kieth invites Margaret to come riding with him, and she realizes she is in love with him. That night Craig tells Margaret he wants her, and when she refuses, he seizes her in his arms and tries to force his kisses on her. She struggles and the arrival of Kieth saves her further humiliation. Kieth takes her back to the hotel. Baskets of roses come from Craig in apology, and Craig asks her to marry him. She compares the luxuries she would enjoy as Craig's wife to the life to which she is returning, but she refuses him. Craig becomes nasty, and Margaret decides to go, feeling an intruder among these wealthy people. Kieth, seeing her leave, comes up to tell her what a fortunate man her husband is. "Husband?" Margaret asks, and as comprehensive comes to her she explains that the name was part of her masquerade. With a glad cry, Kieth takes her in his arms, and together they wire to his mother that he has found the girl and is coming home with his bride.

ANOTHER'S CHILD

Mrs. May Quirin Drama File No. 11855

MISS ELTON, a successful executive, keenly observes the wistful, attractive woman of about thirty who is ushered into her office to apply for a position. With surprise she studies the record of the applicant, Patricia Owen, noting that she has held a number of responsible and highly paid positions. A student of human nature, the older woman finally prevails upon the younger to reveal just why she is seeking an eighteen dollar a week position with her ability and record.

At fifteen, Patricia fell in love with an older man. He was unjustly accused of having had an affair with a married woman; because of this scandal and her extreme youth, Patricia's parents forbid the girl to marry when he was called away on his work to distant oil fields. Returning to school, the girl eagerly waited to hear from him, dreaming of the day when her dearest wish would be realized and she would become a wife and a mother. After months of silence she at last heard that her sweetheart was confined in a sanitarium, suffering from tuberculosis. Shortly after this, she received a letter from him telling her that on her eighteenth birthday he would be well enough to marry her, but the day came and passed with no word from her loved one. As her letters were returned unopened, she at last concluded that he was dead.

Through her chum, she met Howard at a dance. After a brief period of courtship, believing that once more her dreams were to come true, Patricia married the young man. All his gallantry vanished when honeymoon days were over. Discovering that his wife had been innocently involved with a man who was once accused of a scandalous affair, Howard used this means to torture her, constantly referring to it. Denying his wife the thing she wanted most —a child—Howard subjected her to six long, dreary years of unhappiness. While at the library one day, enjoying the only relaxation she could afford, Patricia met Hugh Devon, an author. Finding that they both sought the same book, the two fell into conversation and walked part way home together. In this cultured, kindly man Patricia found the happiness she had so long sought, while he, in turn, was rewarded with her rare understanding and sympathy. He confided in her, after a period of brief meetings, that his wife had never loved him and remained with him only because of the wealth and prestige his name brought to her. His only happiness was found in little Hugh, his son, whom his wife neglected. Upon discovering that Patricia was clandestinely meeting another man Howard divorced her, although she swore that her relationship was only that of a friend. Anxious to help, Hugh secured a position for Patricia in a newspaper office. He called often to see her, bringing little Hugh many times and a strong bond of affection grew between the lonely child and Patricia. When Hugh and Patricia openly faced the fact that they were in love with one another, both were supremely happy, but a short time later Hugh was fatally injured when his car crashed into a reckless driver. As he lay dying he commended little Hugh to his sweetheart's care; only too glad to be rid of him, the boy's mother assented. Patricia won success for the boy's sake, but when her employer offered her an apartment she was forced to leave, since all that mattered was this child who had so completely filled her heart.

Miss Elton, eyes suspiciously moist, gives Patricia the position, with an increase in salary.

RIDERS OF THE WEST

Mrs. Norma Marsh Western File No. 9736

"BUT I hate ranching!" Jack Hartwell, only son of Mrs. Hartwell who lived on a small ranch with her daughter Vera, had said that to his mother when he was fifteen, and now, at twenty-five, he still felt the same way. When he wrote away for home study courses, all the ranch hands derided him openly, remarking that he could get much farther with a gun than with a book, but Vera Hartwell, bored with her monotonous existence understood too well her brother's repugnance. She herself although engaged to devoted Ted Goring, had been meeting clandestinely with Clem Randall, a man from a town across the river, who had a reputation of being a gambler. Although Jack had never seen Clem, he knew of the rendezvous, but forbore to mention it to his mother, who would have been terribly hurt. Returning from rounding up the cattle one evening, he was met with the alarming news that Vera had been kidnapped. Although the room was in disorder and the ranch hands felt she had been forcefully abducted, there was a studied carelessness about the whole situation, that implied that Vera had used this as a ruse to escape from her dull life, possibly with Randall.

Acting on this chance, Jack, hiding his suspicions from his mother, crossed the river to the gambling town, and hunted out Clem Randall, who had heard of Jack's reputation for shiftlessness and cowardice. When Jack discovered his sister was living in one of the rooms above Randall's cabaret, he begged him to let Vera leave, but the gambler, drawled out in an indolent fashion, "She's here of her own accord, isn't she?" Silenced by the truth of Randall's statement, Jack sought out Vera and attempted showing her that Randall was an utterly despicable character. But when Vera asked him for definite proof of Randall's excesses, Jack realized that, like the rest of the townspeople who had discovered that Clem Randall always managed to stay within the law, he could offer no concrete evidence. For one wild moment, Jack thought of shooting it out with Randall, but all his inherent hatred for needless bloodshed determined him to settle the problem by strategy.

Winning the affection of Mabel Harding, one of the dance hall girls, he told her of his difficulty. Mabel, who loathed Randall for she believed him the man who had robbed her father of his fortune, was only too anxious to help the man she loved, and hurt the vanity of Randall, who was too sure of Vera's infatuation. With Jack she plotted to trap Clem, and the first step in their plans was to ensnare Randall into an affair with her. Craftily, but not too obviously, she captivated Randall with her charm, and with Jack rejoiced when she saw that Vera was pretending not to notice Randall's actions. When Mabel thought she had at last caught Randall she invited him to come to her room that evening, realizing that if Vera discovered Randall's deception she would leave with her brother. Just before midnight, when she expected Randall, she induced Vera to come to her room, on the pretext of showing her a new gown, and when Jack's sister entered, she quickly put her hand over her mouth, and switched off the lights. As the two girls struggled, Randall, who had opened the door, called out, "Mabel darling, I've come." When the light went on, Randall, realizing the ruse, shrugged his shoulders, knowing he had lost his hold on Vera. Jack, who had been waiting below, knew that now his sister would return with him. And the next morning, Jack with his sister and Mabel galloped across the plains to his mother's home. Two weeks later, as he and Mabel watched his sister's wedding to Ted, only he and Vera knew of the kidnapping that was not really a kidnapping, and of the trick that proved stronger than a gun.

THE BRONX STUDIO MURDERS

Les Guion Mystery File No. 10822

THOUSANDS of dollars depending upon his completion of the film RIVAL MONEY on scheduled time. Victor Brent is almost run over as he crosses the studio lot. He becomes convinced that hostile interests are working against him and hires Nick Forbes, a detective. While the actors are dressing there is a shrill scream and breaking into the dressing room of Patty Turner, adventuress of the film, they find her dead, stabbed in the back. All the doors have been locked from the inside and it is obviously not a case of suicide. Nick orders Brent to reenact the first scene, with Chuck Hawkins, of the Homicide Squad, locking himself in Patty's room. After a silence of thirty seconds, a shriek is heard and Nick breaks down the door only to discover the body of Chuck, stabbed in the back. The windows are still locked from the inside.

At eight that night Nick searches all the rooms. When he comes out of Dave Spencer's room, Nick observes aloud that he has noticed the peculiar construction of the studio on the outside. Also the locker in each room is built in the right hand corner, set in the wall. Brent continues with his film. Nick notices that Len Parker, villain in the talkie, leaves immediately. Dave Spencer tells Nick he'll help him find the murderer. Together they search Len's room and find a threatening letter addressed to Call Middleford, an extra. Also a serpent headed dagger. In scene three Dave hurts his leg on a stool. He is confined to his room. Dave and Len fight and Dave tells of Len coming to his room.

The next day scene four is shot. Dave calls Brent to see Grant Clayton wrapping a package of candy destined for Vera Powers, the leading lady. Dave suspects that there may be something harmful in the package and induces Brent to engage Vera in conversation while he slips into the room, takes the candy and turns it over to Nick to have it analysed. Scene five is shot. Dave is found unconscious by Carl Middleford and Nick brings him to. Dave reports he was on his way to his room when Len stepped in front of him and slugged him with a blackjack. Len denies the charge but the incriminating blackjack is found in his room. Meanwhile, the candy is found to be poisoned!

Scene six finishes the picture. Nick gathers the cast together and tells them he has found the murderer. He tells them that Dave Spencer and Carl Middleford were formerly in jail for robbery. Unable to find work, they had been hired by Brent's rival to prevent the production of the talkie at any cost. They had found work as extras on the set and by chance Dave discovered that he could gain entrance to many rooms through the back part of his locker. He planted the threatening letter and dagger in Len's room and hurt his leg purposely in scene three. It was he who poisoned the candy and had Carl knock him unconscious with a blackjack to throw off suspicion. Dave had become enamored of Vera and realizing that she was in love with Len, had put the blackjack in Len's room. Dave whips out a gun and tries to escape, but hesitates for one second as he sees a policeman. Len springs on Dave and disarms him. Nick leads Dave and Carl out. Brent smiles as he points out that the policeman who caused Dave's downfall was a costumed extra, and the story ends with Vera in a clinch with Len Parker, otherwise known as the villain of the talkie.

WHEN WILMAR'S father makes a mistake in planting seed for wheat on part of his prairie land, he starts a chain of destiny which is to save the world from impending hunger and the honor of his son in later years. The patch of wheat grows sturdier and darker than the rest and when a storm ruins the crop which was depended upon to pay off the mortgage this alone stays firm. Eight year old Wilmar adores Jim, a government surveyor, who wants to experiment with this special wheat seed. When Jim is called away suddenly he leaves Wilmar the task of gathering it for seed to be planted the following year on his return. A two quart jar is filled with this wheat which subsequently is known as Two Quart wheat but Jim never returns and it remains forgotten in the attic of the new house when the family moves to town, after the mortgage is foreclosed. Wilmar grows up loving the land and determined to go back to it, specializing in agriculture while at college. At school he wins local prominence as a basketball player, transferring from the second team when a player is injured on the eve of the state tournament. His special pal is Hank; the two go on a fishing trip vacation-time and in the silence of the night exchange dreams. Hank wants to become a minister-reformer, but first intends to achieve something in the latter field feeling people will listen less readily in the first capacity. After college, Wilmar is empoyed by the state to investigate and give information to the farmers. There is great agitation among the men who claim little returns from their hard efforts and demand that the government do something. Wilmar devises a plan which wins so much attention that he is called to present it to the state legislature, to discuss his theories on grain control. He suggests that the government stabalize wheat by offering a standard price, say one dollar per bushel. When storage capacities are filled or seed is needed, sell it back to the consumer at the purchase price, plus a small charge for handling. The plants should hold from eight to fifty billions of bushels; to be sold for world consumption only when a certain minimum is stored. Safeguards would be set against radical speculation. He finally convinces them by quoting from the bible the story of the seven lean years. The idea is spread rapidly through the nation and finally becomes a law resulting in economic prosperity for several years. Meanwhile Hank visits a courtroom where he sees a young man sentenced to prison for manslaughter when his car runs into a pedestrian on a misty night. His young wife and baby are in the courtroom, innocent victims to be dependent on charity. Hank feels that the prison system is all wrong; it makes no provision to bring the released prisoner back into society rehabilitated. Innocent dependents must suffer and the economic loss is terrific. He gives lectures on Our Criminals, Our Laws, and Our Criminal Institutions, in which he advocates that government penitentiaries be made into factories to manufacture government machinery. A minimum wage was to be paid, increasing in accordance with their worth; part of it to go to pay off in terms of dollars the results of each crime and the remainder to be paid to their dependents. The term ends when their debt to society, is paid. Needing tractors, Congress decides to experiment. Penal Servitude Stations are set up under an Efficiency Board of seven. The rest of the staffs are made up of prisoners. A group of fifty is placed in each barrack with an honor system installed and a routine which is similar to the army. Each barrack eats apart served by members of their company in turn from the central kitchen. Evenings until ten o'clock is given over to recreation which includes lectures which will keep them in contact with the outside world. Equipment is the most modern.

Several years later finds the wheat bins filled but catastrophe strikes. African rust sweeps over the wheat throughout the world shortage nears. Meanwhile Wilmar has joined the Great North Western States Grain Corporation as adviser. Several officials, speculate secretly, selling short and giving Wilmar a cut under pretense that it is from a regular deal. Finally they and many others are unable to meet the demands, selling wheat which they did not possess. Though innocent, Wilmar is among those indicted. He visits home to place his affairs in order. While helping his sister Sylvia clean the attic he discovers the Two Quart Wheat and asks her to plant some in the spring. Wilmar is sentenced to a model factory at two dollars a day to begin with. The superintendent places him in the agricultural department they are first experimenting with—where the factory raises its own cattle, hogs and makes its own dairy produets. They also wish to experiment with wheat and Wilmar is given a group to help him. If Wilmar wishes to make any innovations he is instructed to communicate with him through the secretary, Roxana. When Wilmar meets her, he feels that it is an ironic trick of fate that the first woman to interest him should be met as a prisoner. Since it is winter, they can do little but prepare things for spring. While repairing the electrical fixtures at the old Spring house, Wilmar encounters Roxana who assures him that she believes him innocent and wishes to be friends. She too loves the land and the old plantation house on the grounds where she stays with her sister and brother-in-law once belonged to them. When Sylvia visits him the two girls meet and become excellent friends. A piece of land is set aside to plant some new Russian wheat which it is hoped will combat the rust but Wilmar wants to experiment with the Two Quart Wheat. He takes Roxana into his confidence and they decide to say nothing to the authorities. Instead she visits Sylvia and smuggles it into the factory in a trunk. Wilmar plants some of his own seed and that of the Russian. The superintendent suspecting nothing, reads with interest the reports from all over that the Russian wheat has proved blighted also; only his special patch is untouched. But Wilmar knows that in reality the Russian wheat has succumbed too. A government delegation comes to inspect the field and though the Two Quart Wheat seems darker are unsuspicious and elated, taking samples with them. The superintendent is amazed when reports come that this is not the Russian product but an entirely new specimen. More government authorities come to investigate and at Roxana's suggestion, Wilmar is called in. They prove that it is the Two Quart Wheat and that Wilmar cannot be punished because he planted the other also. The success of the seed at Sylvia's proves its worth but she refuses to sell unless the money is credited to Wilmar's debt so he can be free. The government denies this wish and things are at a standstill until Hank now a minister comes to inspect the factory and preach. There he holds a joyous reunion with Wilmar and remembers that there is a provision that prisoners may receive special credit for new contributions to progress. Hank immediately contacts influential officials and Christmas Day finds Wilmar free. To add to his joy the government which purchases his wheat for seed offers to employ him in charge of the prison farm. He consents if Roxana will marry him and live in the old mansion. Her answer is "yes" and free to live—Wilmar fulfills his boyhood dreams.

HER MECHANICAL BEAU

Isabelle Halperin Comedy Drama File No. 12539

CECILE, at 37, has never had a beau and her younger brothers and sisters now married, have grown accustomed to calling on their "old maid sister" for help in their domestic problems, since she has mothered them since early childhood. Only Aunt Irma rebels at the family attitude and insists that Cecile take a long deferred vacation trip despite the fact that sister Alice wants Cecile to tend her household while she herself goes on a journey. The conducted tour is a failure for Cecile, too shy to make acquaintances, and made conscious of her manless state by the many couples who seem to abound, particularly after nightfall. She returns home in a despondent state, convinced that she has selfishly deprived Alice and gaining no pleasure herself. Even her father, Rawley, who has always before been too engrossed in his passion for creating realistic, mechanical toys notices something is amiss. Snappishly, Aunt Irma makes him conscious that it is his duty to bring new interests and contacts in Cecile's life. Rawley considers various means includng the introduction of his own limited acquaintances but Aunt Irma vetoes them. When Rawley confesses that he left medical practice because he was always considering how to duplicate mechanically a human ailing part, Aunt Irma declares, "Since you're such a creator, why don't you make a man for her?" A few months later, Cecile enters the studio to find her aunt dancing with a strange man, convulsed with laughter. So she is introduced to Robert M. Nical and with difficulty convinced that he is a mechanical robot, so cleverly contrived that with the exception of speech all the illusion of a real man is created by controlling hidden springs. A new life opens for Cecile who while she has never really minded being alone has always felt conspicuous attending the theater or attraetive dining places, beaches, etc., alone. Bob as she promptly renames him has one arm removed and is introduced to the outside world as a friend who lost his speech and arm, in the World War which explains his shyness and lack of grace. He can nod, walk, turn to a speaker, smoke, seat himself, fox trot or two-step. Her first evening with Bob on a roof-garden is a success even though once he continues to dance after the music stops until she can find the switch. Other men invite themselves to dance. Soon Aunt Irma with satisfaction notes Cecile is buying new clothes. Each evening she and Bob go out with only a few mishaps in the beginning—the time he fox-trots to a waltz; when a switch wrongly controlled makes him turn familiarly to the wrong woman; when he sat on the floor when the chair was incorrectly placed. Under this new stimulis Cecile reawakens intellectually. She joins a college class in writing and to her amazement wins acclaim from students and instructors. Professor James Harvey, a widower with three children, is particularly interested in her as a writer and a woman but Cecile feels that marriage is not for her. Two years later finds her with a successful book of poems on the market; many interests and friends while Bob has been relegated to the attic. Tired, she decides on a vacation from everyone, taking Bob with her as protection to Hartford. There in a hotel she registers as man and wife only to be seen entering her room with him by a gossipy acquaintance. To save her reputation, she wires home her marriage to Bob. Complications are averted when a man accidentally sends Bob headlong down the subway stairs. Cecile has him rushed to the hotel and sends for her father. Since repairs will take a long time and cost a great deal. they decide to announce his demise. As a widow, Cecile is even more acceptable to society. While with Harvey old habits with Bob remain and at the theater one night, Cecile reaches for Harvey's hand to push the control that makes him rise, forgetting she is not with Bob. Sure that it is a sign she really cares, Harvey takes her to his home. The sight of the oldest child "mothering" the others reminds Cecile of her own burdened childhood. She feels the past has returned to be fashioned into a kindlier pattern. So Cecile consents to take a "second husband."

THE HOMECOMING

Eugene M. Hudson Drama File No. 12013

ON Sunday evenings the Wilson family congregate in the living room for an hour of song and discussion. Attentively the parents listen to the questions of their children, Edward, Lucy and the younger Ralph and Peggy, advising them in their various problems. "Alway stand together. Remember that a united family can help one another," the father counsels. Sharing all joys and sorrows, the children become inseparable as they grow up united in bonds of love. At last the boys graduate from college and the time comes for them to seek their fortune. Hardly able to hold back tears, they bid the others farewell and leave their Alabama home. The two secure work on farms and with construction gangs, learning all they can from these occupations. Remembering their father's guidance, Edward and Ralph save a portion of their small earnings, and write home frequently. By degrees, they make their way to Canada. Here Edward applies for a position as reporter and advertising assistant on the City Daily. Mr. Caldwell, familiarly known as the Tup, gives him a three year contract after reading his stirring valedictory address. In the evenings, Eddie plays the guitar, a beautiful Mexican instrument, inlaid with mother of pearl, which his landlady lends him. Ralph secures employment as assistant foreman with a construction gang, and at last the happy day arrives when they can send for their sisters. Joyfully, the little family is reunited; Lucy secures employment as a secretary in the Transcontinental Bus Line and Peggy becomes assistant timekeeper for a knitting factory, also playing the piano at a local theater when Edward inserts an advertisement concerning her musical talent in the paper.

Two scotch lassies, Polly and Julia Crawford, join that happy group in their evenings of songs and dancing, but when the girls' father is killed by a boiler explosion on a steamer, they leave for Quebec. Grace, Mr. Caldwell's daughter, invites Edward to a dance at her home; after that they are seen frequently together until the young man prints an editorial, expressing his views on the right of the negro to equality. Since she does not agree with these socially significant ideals, which contradict her own intolerance, they quarrel and Grace refuses to marry Edward. Dane Parker, a young lawyer, is a frequent caller at Lucy's home, urging her to become his wife, but her family ties are so strong that she is not, as yet, willing to forsake them While the phonograph is playing, and the four are enjoying a happy breakfast a wire comes informing them of their mother's death. Grief strieken, they prepare to drive at once to their home in Alabama. They had prepared for a visit from their mother, and tears come to their eyes as they realize this can never be. Through the flooded Tennessee Valley, Edward guides the car, ignoring the warning not to pass Evergreen. The road is strewn with wrecks, yet the four bravely keep on, ignoring danger. They see that the Escambia Bridge is about to fall, but, encouraged by four who have followed them, they continue, at last reaching their Uncle's home, where the relatives receive them with open arms. As they view their mother for the last time, sleeping peacefully, they think of her noble life, in complete accord with the minister who says: "Her children shall rise up and call her blessed." Taking the family back to Canada with them, they visit relatives en route. Frantically worried over Edward's safety, and touched at this beautiful tribute to a mother's love, Grace informs him that she wishes to marry him, while Lucy tells Dan it is her hope to establish a home such as her mother created—with him, aware that the other children too, will someday follow her beautiful example.

MISTAKES OF YOUTH

Clara Ebsch Drama File No. 12421

MARIE was to grow up hungry for the love that her mother denies her. For a year Mrs. Talmadge has been in the hospital while her husband sacrifices everything to pay the bills. Spoiled and pettish Mrs. Talmadge returns home, restless and dissatisfied. She complains of ill health and avoids housekeeping leaving most of the burdens on the young girl's shoulders while she keeps late hours with a wild crowd of friends. Father and daughter are drawn together in silent sympathy as he works far into the night to buy another home to replace the one sacrificed for the wife's illness. Marie falls asleep at night, cheeks stained with tears as she overhears her parents bitter quarrels Once Mrs. Brown who comes there to play bridge takes Marie aside and questions if Mrs. Talmadge is really her mother since her coldness and cruelty are apparent to all who come there. A typical instance of her treatment is when Marie is awakened by her mother early one morning to go downstairs and count the bags of coal delivered while Mrs. Talmadge returns to bed. At noon she asks for the number but claiming that it is too small and that Marie must have fallen asleep does not heed her denials but strikes her across the mouth. Mr. Talmadge returns in the evening to comfort his daughter and explains to his wife that the number was right but there is no apology forthcoming. Through with high school, at eighteen Marie faithfully turns over her pay check to her mother which she receives weekly from the telephone company. Suspicious when the amount seems smaller Mrs. Talmadge boxes her ears as the girl explains the discrepency is due to lack of overtime. That day Marie goes into the office near the breaking point. Hearing other girls speak she realizes that none of them give more than a part of their money at home. That night she resolves to leave and her father unwillingly agrees that she may be happier away from home. While doing night duty she puts through a call for a man with the pleasantest voice she has ever heard. Bob too is attracted and obtaining her address from the telephone company begs her to meet him. At first she refuses but her life is so lonely and barren that she agrees to. She meets him outside the church that evening as he identifies himself with the college colors on his car. He opens a new world to her of gaiety and laughter. There is to be a football game in the adjoining town one weekend and she consents to go; she to stay at a hotel and he at a fraternity brother's. Instead he accompanies her to the room and refuses to leave. Marie threatens to kill herself but Bob promises to marry her the following morning, assuring her of his love. Trusting and naive because her mother has never taught her anything and she really cares for him, Marie consents. When morning comes he begs her to defer marriage until June as it will mean expulsion from college. At her father's behest, Marie returns to the house and though the mother learns of her friendship with Bob, the first man she has ever known, she fails to warn her. After loaning Bob money when he confesses that he has flunked and must take a summer course, he disappears for a few weeks. She receives a call that he is ill, and rushes to him, only to learn it is a trick and he takes her by force. When Marie learns she is to have a child she is desperate, her faith in Bob vanishing, as he keeps setting off the wedding date. About this time through a companion at the office she meets Henry an older man who has been disillusioned but her sweetness gives him a new belief in possible happiness. A few weeks later when he asks her to marry him Marie who has at last learned what love is cannot send him away without telling the truth. Incredulous, she hears him say that he will take the unborn ehild for his own. And so Marie is to stumble into happiness wtih the resolve that she will save her children from the mistakes that her mother caused.

ON TRIUMPHANT WINGS

Augusto H. Piedad Drama File No. 12557

ORDERS are given that James Cooper, President of the Hamilton Bank, is not to be disturbed while he is in conference with his son, Norman. For the final time before he threatens to disinherit him, Cooper pleads that Norman enter the banking business, convinced that it is only laziness and stubborness which makes Norman resist. Norman, though, longs for a life of freedom; he cannot bear being chained to four office walls. Even the fact that he will be left out of the will fails to move him. Home, the mother whom he dearly loves sighs at the dissention which has sprung between her men. Only the thought of her and Margaret, the girl he loves, restrains Norman from obeying his father's angry orders and quitting the house forever. Cooper speaks to Margaret before she sees her lover that night and Margaret urges Norman to comply for her sake. Norman claims there are other ways of making a living such as piloting an air-mail plane. The very thought makes Margaret rebel and she tells him their engagement is at an end. Sick at heart, Norman leaves and goes first to a recruiting station only to find that there are no government positions open. Down to his last few dollars, Norman goes through the help wanted ads but realizes that he will be no better off than if he accepted his father's proposition. So Norman becomes a hobo. On the first freight train Norman hops, he meets Smith who gives the novice tramp sage advice. The two decide to team up and go out to Mexico. There in a rich hacienda, another rebellion is in progress. Rosita, daughter of Don Antonio, refuses to marry Don Martin Dorado, the man her father has selected. While the entire town dances, celebrating the town fiesta, the usually gay girl sits by herself. Dirty and unkempt, the two Americans join the feast. In the darkness, Norman nearly stumbles over Rosita. For the first time he looks at her and continues staring while Rosita blushes but at last agrees to dance with him. Slowly Rosita's spirits rise until she is her old self while Dorado not knowing the cause, takes on new hope and rejoices. . . Two days later with the help of Smith the lovers elope to a small village near the border where they plan to be married. While resting at a hotel, Norman finds an old American newspaper announcing that his father had died leaving the estate to Norman; sick at his silence the mother's life is despaired. Entrusting Rosita to Smith's protection, Norman hurries to his home where he is first mistaken for a hobo. Recognized at last, the son is admitted and Mrs. Cooper takes an immediate turn for the better. Margaret is there and seeks to place their relationship on its old footing. Tempted to forget Rosita, Norman cannot decide which girl to be faithful to when Smith comes with the news that Rosita has been taken from him. At once, Norman takes a plane to Mexico while Margaret follows. Even as Don Antonio declares Norman will never return, his plane lands on the field. Dorado is angry when he sees his official fiancee in another's arms. When another plane descends and Margaret steps out, Dorado inspired with jealousy whispers to Don Antonio that she is Margaret's wife. He tries his knife to avenge her honor when Rosita flings herself in front of him, catching the descending weapon in her shoulder. During the hour that the doctor is with her, Margaret grows remorseful realizing that here is a love far greater than her own. She explains the true relationship while Norman in the sickroom comforts Rosita. Margaret sends in a note wishing them happiness and even as they read can be heard the roar of a plane as Margaret's plane fades away in the distance.

STAGE DOOR JOHNNIE

Auborn Green Drama File No. 12558

RAY GRAHAM, newly made millionaire, has always cherished dreams of going on the stage. It is his first evening in New York and he knows no one. Wandering along Broadway, Ray is attracted to posters advertising a newly opened musical comedy. The curtain is already up in the half-empty house; soon Ray realizes that while the cast is attractive, the show lacks punch. He is beginning to grow sleepy and bored when a pretty blond girl steps in front of the chorus. Ray feels himself strongly attracted and is determined to know her. Though he lingers after the show in faint hopes of meeting Joan Parker; it is only to catch a glimpse of her walking with Mike Spaldoni, ex-bootlegger who is backing the show. Before noon the next day, Ray resolves to get a part in the show at any cost. The doorman blocks the stage door entrance and insists that Ray cannot be admitted. A five dollar bill makes the man change his mind. Unnoticed, Ray stands in the rear and watches the rehearsal. Joe the manager is wailing because their singer is missing; a note informs him that the actor has left the cast. Wearily, Joe calls time out while Ray eagerly watches for Joan only to see her once more with Mike. When Joe sees Ray, he orders him to leave but Ray explains that he is looking for a job. Yes, he can sing; while the manager plays, Ray proves this with the song, "Yesterday." While the manager congratulates him, faint handclappings come from the wings where Sue has been listening. Grateful for her help as Ray goes through a special rehearsal for the evening's performance, Ray invites Sue to lunch. While they chat, Ray learns to his delight that she rooms with Joan. Though he does not disclose his wealth, Ray reveals his attraction. Through the sympathetic Sue, Ray is at last introduced to her. Mike lordly invites Ray to take Sue out to dinner with them. It is not long though before Mike grows resentful when he sees how well matched Joan and Ray are on the dance floor. During the days that follow, Ray is often at the girls' apartment but Joan refuses to listen to his protests of love. From Sue, he learns that Mike opened the show in the hopes that Joan would become more to him than a friend. During the program one night, as Joan is doing a solo number, she suddenly collapses. The curtain is rung down hastily and Joe and Ray are first to pick her up. The diagnosis is acute appendicitis and Joan is rushed to the hospital for an emergency operation. Joe and Ray call upon her before the show the next night only to learn that she is not permitted visitors. Outside her door, Mike is insistent upon entering and Ray threatens him if he does not leave. In the morning, Ray sees his photograph in the newspaper identifying him as a millionaire in a flop show. He hurries to the hospital where Mike is already with Joan, who asks him for a loan to pay her hospital expenses. Mike declares he will give her money only on condition that she marry him. Joan refuses and orders him to leave but Mike will not budge until Ray enters. Mike taunts him with the lie that Joan has been Mike's mistress, only to be knocked down. While Joan is thanking him, Sue identifies him with the newspaper clipping. Ray is to buy out the show; and announce their engagement to the cast at a big party. The revised show is a hit on opening night as "Stage Door Johnnie" with his dreams fulfilled, embraces Joan in the wings.

THE SECRET

Maggie Vernon Drama File No. 12570

LOVELY Arlin Winston is a student at college when she first meets Donald Yorker, an insurance agent, who falls madly in love with her. On the eve of graduation he begs to marry her and Arlin agrees. They are forced to keep the ceremony secret since Arlin's wealthy father is determined that she must marry Malcome Grey. The girl finally persuades her father that he must give her one more year of freedom. The months pass happily for the young couple with the only shadow on their happiness arising during the weeks when business compels Yorker to travel. The year is nearly over when their little daughter is born. Thrilled with joy, Arlin is sure that her father will forgive them when he learns of his grandchild. An insistent letter comes from Winston urging Arlin to return. While Yorker is on a business trip, Arlin leaves the child with a nurse and goes to her father. Malcome meets her at the station and exclaims that she is lovelier than ever. Dinner is uncomfortable for Arlin, aware constantly of admiring glances. That evening Winston proposes announcing their engagement at a large dinner. He will stand for no more nonsense. Arlin requests to speak with him alone. Determined to face the issue at last, she confesses that she has been a wife for a year and that baby Arlin is waiting at home. Furious, Winston orders her to divorce him and give away the child. Both sleep restlessly that night and are silent at the breakfast table where Arlin finds a letter from her husband who is returning on the Denton train. Casually glancing at the newspaper beside her plate, Arlin shrieks in horror when she reads that the train has wrecked and Yorker is among those killed. In a state of collapse she is put to bed and too weak to go alone is unable to flee to the scene of the wreck. Winston declares that none must ever know of her past. Fearful that he will have her child given away, Arlin writes to a former college chum, Mrs. Yarber, and begs her to adopt the little one. The nurse turns over her charge to Mrs. Yarber who, childless, welcomes the girl, christening her anew—Adline Yarber. The nervous strain proves too much for Arlin whose heart fails. Over the body of his daughter, Winston feels sharp remorse and tries to trace his grandchild but it is too late. Adline is to near her twentieth birthday happy with her foster mother and unaware of her true background. Mrs. Yarber, now a widow, falls critically ill. Realizing her hours are numbered, she calls Adline to her side and gives the girl the key to a trunk which has always remained tightly locked. Before she can give further explanation, her eyes are closed for the last time. Kindly neighbors soothe the heartbroken girl. Auntie Lou, Mrs. Underwood, who lives twenty miles away comes at once to take charge. After the funeral, Adline examines the trunk and with amazement finds her baby clothes and a locket with jeweled initials, together with a letter of explanation from Mrs. Yarber and the note the real mother wrote. In the locket are the photographs of the father and mother she has never known. Mrs. Underwood who has never known of this, so well did her sister guard the secret, takes Adline to her own home. For years she has known the Winston family and is struck with the resemblance of Adline to them. Winston is out of town at present and Mrs. Underwood sends an invitation to tea when he returns. With him, Winston takes the liberty of bringing a business acquaintance visiting the city for the first time. Upon hearing the name of Yorker, Mrs. Underwood shows the locket. So Adline is to learn that her father was critically injured in the wreck, recovering only to learn that everything he held dear had vanished. Grandfather willingly forgets the past and in his daughter, Yorker finds vivid memories of the wife he loved.

R. L. Wellington Drama File No. 10812

AT the age of four, little Mayra sees her father, who has been away since her babyhood, for the first time. Eagerly, the child runs to him, but when she sees the stern, forbidding countenance, cloaked in a heavy white beard, she screams in terror, and her mother pleads with him to leave the room. A strict disciplinarian, he forces his children to arise at four in the morning to perform various tasks among the livestock of the farm before attending early services at the church, punishing those who to not do his bidding with a severe whipping. Popular among his neighbors because he entertains the poor with a lavish feast each year, Mayra's father is hated by his own children, who suffer from his injustice and cruelty. This feeling is transferred to all men. At seventeen, Mayra develops a spiteful attitude toward even those of the oppostie sex who are kindly and generous toward her, although her mother pleads with her to welcome their friendship. When Mary, a cousin living at Green Island, invites Mayra to visit her and her husband, Mayra learns for the first time that happiness can exist between a man and a woman. As she sees Mary's husband gently helping his wife in and out of the car, and surrounding her with affection and courtesy, she contrasts this kindly, chivalrous man with her own father. As they are walking together, he points out the birds, mating in the spring, and tells her that her hatred for men is unnatural and can only bring her sorrow.

Attending a dance with Mary, Mayra is introduced to Phillip Lawson. Reputed to be a woman hater, he loses his heart to Mayra, and, after a brief courtship, succeeds in winning her love, as she awakens to the truth of her cousin's advice. Phillip is called to Mexico; plans for the wedding are made as soon as conditions permit him to send for Mayra, and, with tears in her eyes, she bids him goodbye. Weeks pass, and Mayra receives no word from Phillip. Her old bitterness returning, the girl feels that her faith in men has again been shattered, but Mary and her husband counsel her to forget her own troubles in helping those who are less fortunate than herself. Following their advice, Mayra turns to the work of the church. Here she meets John Douglas, a teacher among the poor. One day he urges her to confide in him, since he wishes to help her; at first, she refuses, but when the two are driving together in the country she pours out the entire story to this kind friend. At the conclusion, he tells the brave young woman that he loves her and wishes to make her his wife. Although informing him that she still cares for Phillip, Mayra at last consents, and the young couple make their home in the neighboring town of Clarendon. Loved by his neighbors, John's home becomes a haven for all who are troubled, and Mayra assists him in his work. While a group of friends are visiting, the young wife sees a face peering in the window, and faints in terror. Later, she learns that this is a poor, demented man, who has lost his wife and child. When he calls her his queen, sympathy overcomes her fear, and she listens to his tales of his Promised Land.

Phillip returns, saying that he is now sure of his love for Mayra, and she is torn by the old emotion. But when John is injured in saving a woman from a murderous attack by their demented friend, Mayra knows that her place is at his side, as she tenderly holds his hand to her cheek.

TOUGH GUY

Anthony Mulea, Jr. Melodrama File No. 12397

LIFE is a procession of women for Smitty, popularly, known as Tough Guy. While pleasure riding with his friends Joe, Smitty picks up Alice Grey who thinks herself too hardboiled to "fall" for him. When Joe leaves and Smitty tries to kiss her, Alice scratches his face. However, while he is standing outside his home the next night she comes to apologize. To prove her sincerity undercover of the dark hallway passage, she gives the kiss that she previously refused. In his embrace all time is lost and morning finds Alice his mistress. Having a good position as manager of a cooperage company, Smitty takes an apartment for her but she refuses to have him pay all her expenses. Each week they run a card game there but Alice ignores all other men—the only cloud on her happiness the fact that Smitty refuses to marry her, declaring that marriage is not for him. Although he continues to go with many girls, Smitty always takes Alice in his confidence. However, she grows jealous of Rose, a married woman constantly extending invitations to him, and the two quarrel. For reconciliation on her birthday, Smitty tells her to put on her fanciest clothes; they will make a night of it. First they visit Scarface Barione, famous gangster, who treats them royally in his new night club. Learning that she is afraid yet curious about Chinatown's secrets, Smitty takes Alice next to the den of Wu Yung who has never forgotten that the Tough Guy rescued his sister from thugs. Joe comes to his friend to confess that he has fallen in love with Alice and she, hungry for a real home and security, is willing to marry him if Smitty will not allow it to spoil their friendship. Gallantly Smitty hides his own hurt and blesses the match. When a shipload of guns is smuggled in through his concern, Smitty save a number for Scarface. In gratitude, Scarface helps wipe out four noted criminals who attack Joe's sisters. Sgt. McCarthy traces the murders to Smitty but refuses to arrest him, declaring it is a public service. A new girl enters his life. He meets Catherine through an acquaintance Lem, who pretends at first that he is engaged to her. Resentful because he has lost her to Smitty, Lem slips him knockout drops and he wakes to find himself with Gloria Rice whose relatives order him to marry her. Joe forces him o leave town until evidence is secured that she has been with other men. On his way back, Smitty learns that Scarface has been killed. He traces the murder to "Ace" Peters of a rival gang and turns him over to authorities. After losing his position, Smitty opens a stationery and book rental shop. There he strikes up acquaintance with Doree, the first girl he has ever completely loved. They plan their wedding day to be held when she returns from a visit. In the interval, Smitty in his weakness for pretty girls, succumbs to the attractions of Polly. Learning this, Doree demands that he marry her. Insane when she refuses to see him, Smitty gets drunk and insists on being tied to Polly, only to find a note that Doree has forgiven him. Realizing Polly has deceived him, Smitty refuses to live with her but Polly will not divorce him. Doree goes to Polly and Smitty follows only to find his wife dead. To protect Doree, Smitty allows himself to be held for murder. Doree appeals to Alice who visits Wu, having remembered that Patsy, a gangster, blamed his sweetheart's downfall on Polly. The girls entice Patsy to Chinatown where a confession is forced from him under threats of Oriental torture. A ship sails to Havana with Doree and Smitty, honeymooners in enraptured embrace.

RETURN TRIP

Ellen Markle Drama File No. 9769

AT TEN, Owen Morgan, one of the younger citizens of the town of Adams, was busily engaged in selling slightly tepid lemonade to the perspiring store keepers on the main street. People laughed at the boy's business-like methods, but when at twenty, Owen was still trying to sell things to the town, the neighbors pronounced him nothing but an arrogant youth, who was much too radical in his views. The only one who appreciated Owen's advanced ideas and his genuine flair for selling was Phoebe Arnold, the daughter of the owner of the general store. For business reasons Martin Arnold disliked the young upstart who was competing with him by selling products that he deemed "newfangled," and he resented the boy's attention to his daughter.

Phoebe, realizing that Owen's ability was wasted in the narrow scope of his home town, urged him to leave and go to the city, where his genius for selling and his self-confidence would help him earn his rightful niche in life. But Owens one fault was being too satisfied, and he refused to take the chance.

Through a short visit to the city, Owen heard of the interest taken in the radio, recently discovered, and when he came back to Adams, he tried to interest his friends in the project. One of the most open scoffers was Mr. Arnold, but when he found that through his sales of radios Owen was robbing him of his record business which had always been profitable, Arnold ordered Phoebe to stop seeing Owen. When Owen accepted her father's decision philosophically, taking it for granted that she would meet him clandestinely, Phoebe was furious with him, and deliberately taunted him with his lack of ambition, never dreaming of the results it would have.

When she learned the next morning that Owen had decided to leave Adams and prove his worth to the manufacturers of the radio sets, she was secretly glad for him, knowing that he was getting his deserved opportunity, but heartbroken because she felt she had lost his love. Meanwhile, Owen, arriving in New York, had confidently gone straight to the president of the concern, and convinced him that he was the one man who could handle the sales field for the organization. Amused at the boy's enormous faith in his own power, Allan Freeman gave Owen complete control of the sales end of the business.

The years proved that Owen's conviction, stated so cocksuredly to Freeman one sunny morning when he was burning with a desire to prove to Adams and to Phoebe Arnold that he could be somebody, was only too true. One of the first in the field to see the enormous strides that radio was going to make, Owen established branches all over the country, and established the first major broadcasting system. But during the long years of his upward struggle, he had been too busy to mingle socially, and when at last he felt he could take a much needed rest, he thought with longing of Adams, and the peaceful scenes of his childhood days. Anxious to return to the old familiar scene, he took an assumed name, returned to Adams, and pretended to be merely a radio mechanic. Applying for work at the radio store of Phoebe, whose father had died several years before, he was glad to see she did not recognize him, and gave him a job. And it was only when he asked her to visit the beloved haunts of his boyhood, that she knew the man to whom she had been faithful for many years, had at last returned to her.

THE NARROW DOORWAY

W. Dewey Asher Drama File No. 10085

TWO brothers, Robert and Jack, are in love with May Evans. Robert, the elder brother, is a cashier in the leading bank of a middle western city. One day as they are out walking he shows her a little house with a narrow doorway covered with vines and tells her that he has pictured this as his home if she would become his wife. But it is Jack whom May loves; he tells her of the travel and adventure they will have together. She marries him and the two of them go to New York. At first they are happy, living in a beautiful apartment and entertaining frequently. But after a few months, May discovers that Jack's only business is gambling. She pleads with him to give it up but he will not listen. He drinks and seeks the company of other women. After their son is born May writes to her mother in desperation and tells her that she must have money for the baby's sake. She will not leave Jack as she feels that he needs her, but one day he tells her that their marriage has been a mistake and she is forced to return home with Paul, their little boy.

Robert does everything in his power to help May and Paul. He takes the boy on fishing trips and helps him with his lessons. May knows that he still loves her and wishes to marry her if she will divorce Jack. She decides to do this when Jack suddenly appears, asking her to forgive him and start over again with him. Reluctantly, for Paul's sake, she agrees. That night there is a robbery at the bank in which Robert is employed. He confesses that he took the money, hoping that May would marry him if he were better able to provide for her and Paul. He is sentenced to twenty years in prison.

May returns to the city with Jack, but, although they are now well taken care of, she realizes that her husband has returned to his former habits of drinking and gambling. He is not interested in his son and the boy often asks for "Uncle Robert." Lola, a dancer, is often seen in Jack's company. One night she persuades him to drive her to a little inn in the mountains. They are caught in a storm, and blinded by the rain, crash into tree, upsetting the car. Lola is instantly killed and Jack fatally injured. At the emergency hospital May is summoned. Her husband confesses that it was he who stole the money from Robert's bank and that his brother is shielding him. Dying, he asks May to forgive him, telling her it was the only way he felt he could persuade her to come back with him.

Robert is released from prison, following Jack's confession. He returns home to his former position at the bank. May's mother sends her money so that she and Paul may come to live with her. Heartbroken, she tells her mother that she made a tragic mistake when she turned down Robert's love for Jack, years ago. Her mother then confesses that Robert had given her money which she had sent to May for the care of little Paul ever since his birth, pledging her to secrecy. May goes to Robert, thanking him for all he has done for them. He again asks her to become his wife and this time she accepts.

THE DAWN OF CIVILIZATION

Willard Lowe Allen Drama File No. 11201

THE great political machines are in operation for the Fall mayorial election in Chicago. The hungry and the unemployed cry out. The unpaid city employees strike. The city government itself is, through graft and extravagance, facing bankruptcy. In the offices of George Parrington plans for the campaign are being put in operation. Powerful of build, George grins with assurance as reports of vote blocs come to him. From a penniless lawyer to candidate for the mayoralty, Parrington has pushed his way forward through the force of his personality and ruthlessness. He has trampled over all impediments since his wife had been killed while on a rendezvous with a lover, and in all this world Parrington has love for only one thing, his son Conrad, ten. Parrington is swept into office and finishing a stirring promise to the voters, he returns to his office for drinks and winks to his supports. Already the plums of office are being given out. After an exhausting day, Parrington repairs to the apartment of Amy Clark, the dramatic actress who is currently his mistress. Sinking back in his easy chair, he allows her to bring his smoking jacket and as he boasts of what the election is going to mean to him, Amy's eyes glisten suspiciously. She turns away. When he tells her he won't be seeing her after the matinee to-morrow because he is spending the day with his son, Amy winces and asks if she couldn't join them, but Parrington hastily reminds her that she wanted some time for shopping. Parrington hurries through his work. When he is informed that action should be taken on the kidnapping outrages, he brushes the issue aside and his only statement to the press is that if the kidnappers were not paid the sums they demand the racket would soon die out. Weeks pass. With the forces of the law behind him, Parrington makes his office pay thousands in graft, seriously setting back many of the largest racketeers. Meanwhile Amos Piva, Parrington's political opponent and one of the biggest factors in the underworld, has taken a fancy to Amy Clark. However, she continues to rebuff him, and Parrington, enjoying the effect, laughs openly at the disgruntled Piva. Two days later, Parrington's son is abducted and a ransom note of half a million dollars is demanded. Parrington is beside himself with grief. For the first time he is to look on crime from the viewpoint of the oppressed. As he walks the floor haggardly he is reminded of his own words that abductors would go on so long as fabulous ransoms were paid. Amy comes to console him. She begs him to pay the money, but slowly Parrington answers that human lives are precious but liberty and freedom from crime is more precious still. His message to the gangsters is armed defiance. Tooth and nail the city is scoured and through Amy, Piva is captured, but Conrad has been killed. The kidnappers are convicted. Parrington, a broken figure is hailed, but only Amy realizes fully the cost of the sacrifice. Society grasps the significance of Parrington's action and falls in line, and out of the tragedy a new civic spirit is born, while in a small chapel, Amy and Parrington listen to the words, "To love, honor and cherish until death do us part."

THE VALLEY GIRL

Marie Crum Drama File No. 9437

THE realization that her father John Moore, looked upon her as an obstacle to his ambition of winning the love of Maria Deland, whose estate he managed, was bitter to the sensitive young Catherine. Wounded by the hard look her father turned upon her as he rode beside the wealthy widow in an inspection tour of the estate, Catherine walked alone up the mountain side. As she fondled a white rabbit she forgot her own woes until, startled, she realized that a man was standing above her. Darting to her feet, she presented so lovely a picture that Tom, scarcely believing her to be real, reached out for her and swiftly kissed her. For one instant her terrified eyes looked into his and as he drew back, ashamed of his impulsiveness she ran from him. For several moments Tom stood looking after her, then slowly turned and proceeded with the berries he had been picking to his white cabin on the hill.

When Catherine returned home, having stopped to get some wild flowers and speculate upon who the strange man was, she found her father waiting in a towering rage. Frightened, she began arranging the flowers in the vases, waiting for John to speak. At length he seized her shoulders and while she stared in horror he reviled her for her cheap intrigue in the forests. White-faced, Catherine heard him while he explain that as he and Mrs. Deland had walked their horses up the mountain, he had seen her in the arms of another man. Hastily he had drawn the widow from the scene before she should have discovered what a shameless daughter he had. Now Catherine was to go! For a moment Catherine thought her father would kill her, so terrible was his fury, and as she crept blindly from the house, she walked mechanically up the mountain side. At Tom's hut, to which Catherine had watched him return that afternoon, Catherine stopped, dazed by her own temerity and fearful of having to spend the night alone in the forest, she entered. Later Tom returned, and after the first moment of astonishment at finding her there, he went about preparing dinner for two. He knew, as he saw her sitting there trembling that soon she would tell him why she had come, but when she had finished her story and turned her lustrous eyes to him as they sat before his fire, he got up and strode the length of the room. At last he told her that he had once been very much in love with a woman. Married to her, he learned that she was unfaithful, but certain of her power over him she had set out to ruin him until, crushed by the realization that because he no longer loved her she could not hurt him, she had taken her last measure of revenge. The mental disease which had prompted her excesses made her, one night take her own life leaving behind fragments of notes supposed to have been written when Tom had threatened her life. The servants had testified to Tom's guilt and at length, unable to prove his innocence he had fled. As Tom realized Catherine's faith was still unwavering, he explained that he could not let her share the life of a fugitive, although he had realized from the first he loved her. Wrapping his coat about her slim shoulders he led her back to her father's home after her admission that often her father's fury died as quickly as it rose.

Returning, however, Catherine found Maria in her father's arms, and as she hesitated, John laughed at her embarrassment and told her that in the morning he and Maria were leaving for Europe. Catherine stood rooted to the spot and at length fled choking into the forest where Tom, worried, had waited to guard her. They were married in the valley, that morning, and now there were no problems save love.

LOVE'S MEANING

Frida Hein Drama File No. 12442

AS the younger children wept over the loss of their mother, ten year old Jean Dubois dried her own tears to comfort them. For five years she was mother and housekeeper to the little brood —protecting them from the father's occasional drunken outbursts though in between these intervals he was kind to them. On her fifteenth birthday Mr. Dubois came to her with the news that he was marrying again and it was best for her to live elsewhere. Because of the others her own education had stopped early, unqualified for anything else Jean was placed as a mother's helper. Many were the tears shed silently on her pillow at night but during the day she strove faithfully to follow orders. Mrs. Renis left for a few days leaving the household in her charge. After the children were in bed she went to the kitchen where the husband followed and sought to embrace her. Struggling, she rushed up the stairs to her room and securely bolted the door. When she was sure that he was asleep she packed her few possessions and stole out of the house. Only a few dollars remained with her and taking a cheap hotel room she made the weary rounds of the employment agencies. Sunday evening she sat forlornly on a park bench. Staring in ill concealed admiration, Tim Harvey sat near her and watched the girl closely as she fumbled for a handkerchief. Immediately, Tim was close to her, begging her to tell him what was wrong. Hearing that she had been unable to find work, Tim suggested that she might make a good dance hall hostess. Though she did not know how to dance, Tim agreed to teach her and brought her to the Keen Ballroom where she was at once hired, to report the following Monday. Tim insisted on taking her to dinner to celebrate and Jean who had known so little tenderness was fascinated. For several hours that night they diligently practiced steps in Tim's apartment. Suddenly he crushed her to him and all the vague warnings Jean had ever heard fled. Surely this was love she thought and Tim, wise in his ways with women won her completely. For nearly a year they lived together, Jean wildly happy for the work left her with a great deal of free time and more money than she had ever before seen. At times she grew sad in Tim's arms for she longed for the right to bear his name legally but always Tim grew restless if she suggested it so she had learned to be silent. But the day came when Dr. Randler announced she was to have a child. Tim said nothing when he learned this but failed to return home that evening nor the next. Completely disillusioned Jean attended to her work, sick with worry at the thought of the future. She was grateful when Harvey Reynolds an older man, quieter than the usual patrons asked her to sit out the dances. As they spoke he confessed that he was through with women; his wife had left him for another leaving the child and the housekeepers were inadequate. Jean admitted that she was through with love and confessed that she was expecting a baby. Several time Harvey returned and finally suggested that they marry for convenience's sake; she to care for his little girl in return for acquired a legal name for her baby. They stayed within this arrangement until her son was born with Harvey always unfailingly considerate. And when he tip-toed in as Jean lay in bed, nestling the little blue bundle beside her—the two realized that love's real meaning, happiness and trust, they had found together.

WINGS AND LOVE

Betty Sherfey Drama File No. 10488

WHEN he receives his diploma from the Winters Aviation Academy at their graduation exercises, Bob Randall smiles bravely to hide his sorrow, for both his parents have died recently, and there is no one in the audience to share this first step to success with him. The next day, as he is packing, the Dean summons him to his office, and gives him a letter of introduction to Captain Harsh in charge of the air mail route at Chicago. Upon the glowing recommendation of the Dean, Captain Harsh adds Bob to his crew of the Air Eagles of Chicago, and commissions him to fly the mail to New York with Doc Weber. After an exhilarating trip through the clear skies, the two young men arrive in the great city, and engage a room at a hotel. Bob is in favor of retiring early, since they mush return the next day, but Doc will not listen to this, and takes him to the Garden of Roses, a cabaret, introducing him to Grace Gaynor and Alice Wilson. Following a life long rule, Bob refuses liquor, but the other three drink and dance. Bored with the situation, Bob is about to leave when he sees a beautiful young girl enter the cabaret, go to the bar for a moment, in search of someone, and leave hastily; Doc informs him that she is Dolores Randall, and has come here, doubtless, looking for her father. He adds that there is little chance to know her, since she never joins in the life of the cabaret, but Bob, leaving the party, finds her outside, attempting to escort her father who is intoxicated, to his home. The young aviator offers his services, which she gratefully accepts, and is given permission to call on his next trip to the city.

His visits are infrequent, however, as he is sent on Cleveland and Kansas City routes with Doc, and on his vacation, makes a trip to California, which is essential for his health, while Doc goes to Florida. Winning success swiftly because of his clean life and devotion to duty, Bob is rapidly promoted, but Doc, unable to control his desire for drink, is often in danger of losing his position. While in Florida, Doc meets a motion picture actress, and marries her, surprising the entire air force; it is not long before Alice, his wife, proves unfaithful to him, and Bob is grieved to see his friend drinking more than ever, as he had hoped his marriage might reform this one fault in his lovable character. The Air Eagles of Chicago present a radio program during which Bob, who has a splendid tenor voice, is asked to sing, and Dolores, in New York, listens with happiness when he dedicates a song to her. Shortly after this, she visits an aunt in Chicago, and her romance with Bob is renewed. Since Alice is unfaithful, Doc is seen frequently in the company of other women, and Bob tells Dolores how sorry he is at the outcome of his friend's life. One day he enters Doc's apartment, finding the door open, and discovers Dolores in Doc's arms. Losing control of himself, Bob calls her many unkind names, and accuses her without justification. Later, Doc tells him that Dolores came to see Alice, hoping to influence her to become a better wife, and not finding her there, had tried to prevail upon Doc to give up his excessive drinking, but as he was intoxicated at the moment, he took her in his arms. Alice confirms this statement, showing Bob a note in which Dolores had made an appointment with her for that afternoon, and which she had broken, but Delores will not accept the aviator's apology.

Piloting the plane while under the influence fo liquor, Doc crashes, and dies, later at the hospital, while Alice, brought to him by Captain Harsh, receives his forgiveness as she sobs in repentance. Bob is taken to Dolores' home, near the airport, and, feeling that she had almost lost the man she loves, Dolores, too, forgives. When Bob recovers, they are married, and he purchases a refueling station for planes at the edge of the city, where they build their home.

LADDIE BOY

Agnes Hunt Drama File No. 12532

IGNORING the chattering girls who crowd about the platform as he leaves, Dr. MacLeod, young, attractive psychology professor leaves for his appointment with Jennie Broune whom he has finally decided to marry if she can satisfy him on certain points. Strong believer in the theory that marriage should be built on the commonsense basis of good inheritance with no nonsense in raising children, he has just finished a lecture on that subject—unaware that he is the subject of curiosity and derision from his listeners. He does not seem to know what love is declares one though it is common gossip that he has been seeing much of flirtatious Jenny. In the parlor despite her efforts to make him sit closer, MacLeod puts her through a questionnaire. Realizing his purpose, Jenny laughs in his face and declares that no girl could ever take him seriously. She doubts if he has ever kissed one. The rebuff is still rankling the following Sunday when he attends an "At Home" given by the Presbyterian Church for the students of the State Normal School. Shy Elsie slips away early, dismayed when she finds it raining. MacLeod who has been watching her demure behavior approvingly follows and offers to escort her. Having learned his lesson from one girl, he investigates her background elsewhere and finding it suitable continues to see Elsie who submits to the teasing of her classmates. To their amazement the two are married in June. Though Elsie feels she should be happy she is conscious that something is lacking; with envy she watches her next door neighbor, Mrs. Strong, formerly Jennie as she runs to kiss her husband each night, regardless of passers-by. After a slight rebuff from MacLeod one day she never dared express the affection in her heart. So it is that she lavishes her hunger for endearments on MacLeod's mother who comes to live with them. When her son is born and MacLeod treats her with awkward tenderness, she has new hopes that a closer relationship will ensue. These are soon dashed as from the first MacLeod insists on treating his child Laddie with scientific principles of bringing-up. He is disgusted when the baby ignores his complicated toys and plays with his toes. Elsie senses MacLeod's disappointment but lavishes the smiles she craves to give and receive from her husband upon her son. As Laddie grows older his father refuses to allow him to play with other children, fearing they may mentally "contaminate" him. A ban is also placed on pets and poor Laddie sheds bitter tears when the stray cats he collects are removed. Through Elsie's insistance he is permitted to play with little Ted Strong. Returning from school one day, Laddie proudly shows a collection of "prize fight" pictures. When MacLeod disposes of them, Laddie throws a fit and MacLeod advises that he be coaxed out of it. He is furious when instead, Elsie dashes a glass of cold water though it is an immediate cure. Later, MacLeod protests that the child is a liar when he hears him make-up a fairy tale. Wearily, Elsie decides her husband has never been really a child. Then Laddies returns with torn clothes and a black eye received when he fought his little friend. Ted claimed that his mother was prettier and that MacLeod thought so also for he had brought her roses. Vividly, Elsie recals that her husband was supposed to have been in love with Jennie. Is this the reason for his coolness? Knowing only that his son has been in a fight, MacLeod whips him. Fulfilling her threat, she leaves with her child. In the hours of mournful silence, MacLeod realizes his love. He seeks her out and the misunderstanding is cleared when MacLeod explains that he delivered the flowers from Strong. While MacLeod holds Laddie close to him and caresses his wife with unfamiliar tenderness, Elsie knows that her dream is realized. Love is greater than theories.

THE ETERNAL DEFENSE

Eloise Reed Drama File No. 12265

IT was in the city's gayest night club that Loretta Lee first met Malcolm Hollingdon, wealthy real estate operator. A man of the world, he well knew how to pay pretty compliments but when he danced with Loretta she intrigued him. Unlike the girls he had known in the past, Loretta remained indifferent. When he accused her of holding a pose the girl merely laughed softly. Feeling intent eyes upon them, Malcolm swung his partner around until he caught sight of young Bob a law student who was staring at them with jealous eyes. "Your escort," said Malcolm. Loretta flushed and nodded. When they left though Malcolm begged to see her again, Loretta refused to name any appointment. While they were driving back to the university, Loretta at last succeeded in making peace with Bob. "Love me as much as ever?" he asked tenderly. "More," she shyly whispered as he crushed her to him. Several months later, Loretta was called to the telephone in her rooming house. It was Bob insistent upon seeing her that night, though the girl pleaded that it was examination period and according to strict rules the girls must stay in that evening Could she deny him when he said that he wanted to celebrate? A full fledged lawyer now who would be pleased to have her for his first client, Bob told her gayly. Loretta was unable to resist him besides there was something she must tell him which for weeks she had postponed. Only recently had she recalled that though Bob spoke often of love he said nothing of marriage. No sooner had she hung up the receiver than it rang again. Wearily, she again refused an invitation from Malcolm. Pretending to be ill so she could escape the vigilant eye of the housemother, Loretta arranged to have her roommate Nell unlatch the door for her. Late that evening a huge box came for Loretta by messenger boy. Mrs. Stuart decided to bring it to Loretta herself. To her amazement there was no one in the room. Opening the closet she saw that Loretta's evening clothes were gone. Hurriedly, Mrs. Stuart unwrapped the box and found Malcolm's card. Until nearly two, angry and fuming, the housemother waited for the girl to return. Finally she started up the stairs but on impulse tried the door. It was open! Securely Mrs. Stuart bolted it shut. Meanwhile oblivious of all hours, the two danced on, several times she was on the verge of confessing her secret but the present was too bautiful too spoil. She left him at the door with the promise that she would have breakfast the next morning. Unknown to her, Malcolm had followed. With an exclamation of dismay, Loretta tried the door which would not yield. A light in Mrs. Stuart's window warned her that it would be dangerous to attempt to wake the other girls with pebbles at their windows. Frightened, Loretta began to walk down the street not certain what to do. Then Malcolm's car drove up and he offered his assistance. Upon learning her plight Malcolm suggested that they go to his apartment where a housekeeper could act as chaperone. The following morning when Bob alarmed at not finding Loretta whom Mrs. Stuart declared had been out all night, returned to his apartment, there was an anonymous message that Loretta could be found at Malcolm's. Bursting into the apartment he saw Loretta in pajamas eating breakfast and believed the worst. Without listening to explanations, he took the first train to New York. In the following weeks, Malcolm promised that he would look after Bob's unborn child as his own and in desperation Loretta consented to the announcement of their engagement. That same night, Bob encountered Nell who under the influence of liquor confided her surprise in view of the fact that Bob had gotten her into "trouble." Sure then that Loretta must be in love with Malcolm and feeling indebted to him, Bob rushed to his defense when Malcolm was arrested for illegal realty operations. In gratitude Malcolm confessed the true situation and happiness was to return to the college lovers.

DOVE CALL

Mabel Douglas Drama File No. 9744

"THOSE two children are crazy about each other," gossiped the worthy ladies of Wharton, and surely, the two young persons sipping strawberry sodas in the school drug store, were completely oblivious to the rest of the world. But Noel Remus the town bully, overhearing the remark, looked with disfavor upon the affections of Richard Blair, son of one of the town's wealthiest and sternest men, for Ines West the little queen of the town, whose father kept a smithy.

In a loud voice Noel commenced making insulting remarks concerning Ines gold digging which so infuriated Richard that he sprang to his feet and before Noel could make his get away he was caught in the grip of Richard's strong arms. Friends tore the boys apart, but not in time to save Noel a black eye.

Richard accompanied Ines home. Shielded by the shrubbery in the garden, Ines grateful to her young protector, shyly expressed her appreciation. Richard seized by the impulse of the moment kissed her, but this new happiness was not to last long, for the next morning the town was buzzing with two choice bits of news—"The Sophomore and Senior class play," (in which Ines and Richard played the leading role) scheduled for that evening, and Noel's highly exaggerated account of the fight.

Here and there over the large audience who had gathered to pay tribute to the younger generation of Wharton, could be seen groups engaged in a curious whispered conversation which aroused suspicion.

At the close of the program words of the malicious scandal, reached the ears of Richard and Ines. Richard feared the outcome should the news reach his father and the two, hurt and humiliated, impulsively ran off, only to be brought back by the irate Mr. Blair, who scorned Mr. West's suggestion that the youngsters marry, insinuating that Ines was only interested in the Blair fortune.

Refusing to hear his son's explanations, Mr. Blair disinherited Richard and the boy, too proud to plead further, wandered away and joined the Army, the promise of Ines to wait for him, cheering his loneliness.

The death of his father brought him home at the close of the war and reaching the desolate house late one night he decided to conceal his identity until he secured the information he desired concerning Ines. For several days he disguised himself as an old man, haunting the streets of Wharton. Things began to happen, at last at a restaurant table near Noel and Ted Remus, Richard learned that Ines was teaching school in a neighboring city, and that he, Noel, meant to go there and persuade her to marry him during the vacation season. Richard, returning home, made preparations to leave, and decided to pay a last visit to Ines' garden. To his surprise he saw the house lighted and heard music. Then he saw Ines in an open window. Using the call of a dove their long unused signal to each other, Richard caught her attention and came to his arms.

A few days later Mr. and Mrs. Blair opened Mr. Blair's will and received the blessings of one who learned too late the blessing of forgiveness.

THE INTRUDER

Alfred C. Purland Drama File No. 11660

ON the face of the belfry clock the big hand moves slowly toward the small hand and the chimes peal forth twelve times. Across the street a shadow advances toward the handsome residence of J. L. Gordon, Mayor-elect of the city. Skillfully he raises the window guarded from sight by the foliage of an evergreen tree, and slips into the house as the last stroke of the bell rings out.

Cautiously th intruder moves along the highly polished floor, his tiny shaft of light flashing along the walls. Suddenly he crashes up against a small table. His nerves shriek as the echo sounds loudly through the house. Mechanically he extinguishes his flashlight and drops to the floor. No sound breaks the stillness. Relieved he is about to proceed when a scratching noise startles him. "Number please." A muttered curse falls from his lips as he realizes he has upset the telephone. Uncertainly he picks up the instrument. He listens to a pleasant voice inquire, "What number do you want please?" An irresistible impulse seizes him. "The vagabond lover," he answers and replaces the receiver, chuckling to himself. Then remorse seizes him. Confound his instinct to clown. Some day that's going to get him in trouble, he thinks, as he hastily removes his fingerprints, deftly extracts the bonds from the wall safe, and slips out of the house.

In the Gordon house, there is consternation at the discovery of the robbery. Detective O'Hara is sent for. He questions the servants. All have air tight alibis. Despite a complete and through search of the robbed room, he is unable to find a single fingerprint. However, examining the foot prints on the wax floor he notices they move from the window to the safe. Only around the telephone table do they multiply. Learning that Gordon phoned from the extension in his own room and that the servants have not been in the room, O'Hara proceeds with his hypothesis. He discovers a dent on the table and a tack in the telephone wire that fits it. On the theory that the intruder knocked over the telephone, O'Hara communicates with the telephone operator. His chief grows impatient at the lack of clues and reminds O'Hara that Gordon will make it hot for them unless they clear up the case. From the night operator, O'Hara learns about the "vagabond lover" crack. For the first time he smiles. With a long list of suspects, O'Hara is forced to drop his work on the Gordon case to find a girl implicated in a gangster murder. Although it is a month since the Gordon robbery, his failure is still rankling. Selecting a secluded table in the night club, O'Hara hears "Hi there, you old flat foot, sit down here." Chink is on O'Hara's private list of suspects but he is too clever to be caught. While they are verbally fencing, a Kid comes up, inexperienced and obviously a newcomer fallen in with bad company. Self-consciously the Kid begins showing off. He offers to buy drinks, and as he flourishes a bill, his eyes is caught by a blonde chorus girl. "And get a drink for the blonde over there," he orders grandly. "Yes sir, thank you sir," the waiter replies, "but who shall I say it's from." "Oh, just say the—vagabond lover—ha, ha, how's that?" Like a flash, O'Hara rises, snapping handcuffs on the Kid's wrists. "Fine, Kid, but where's the telephone to knock over this time?" The Kid's only acknowledgement is to bite his lip. "Come along," O'Hara urges in a quiet, even tone. . . "

IS THAT SO

Dora Dean Drama File No. 11624

FOR the first time since her marriage, Marion Wissel meets Kenneth Strong, who had loved her. She is shocked to see how worried he is and learns that lately his real estate business has been ruined by an unscrupulous competitor who somehow gets in touch with all Strong's clients and informs them that the Strong firm is going bankrupt and it is unsafe to do business with it. Then, as if ashamed of having burdened her with his troubles, Strong asks how Marion's husband is. He realizes instinctively that she is not happy, but when he tries to see her again, she advises against it.

That night Marion and her husband have an appointment to go to theater together, but when she reminds him of it, he puts her aside brutally and tells her he has other things to think of. She asks him where he is going, but he stalks by her and leaves with his constant companion, the weazened, timid Lee Gaines. As they reach the street Lee reveals once more that he is afraid of breaking into the Strong place, but Wissell assures him he'll be guarding the place from the street, and Lee will be perfectly safe. Lee, trembling, slips into the darkened Strong office to steal the records. To his horror, however, he is confronted by Strong, who is working late in the office. Shaking with fright, Lee offers to confess whose employ he is in, when a shot rings out from the street and Lee falls dead into the arms of the startled Strong. Strong sends for the police and is released when his story is confirmed by the direction of the bullet entry.

Meanwhile, white faced, Wissel has returned home to demand that no matter what happens Marion is to swear he didn't leave the house all evening. She questions him, but he threatens to kill her if she double crosses him. Some days later, Marion is shopping when she meets Kenneth Strong again. She is about to go to luneh and he insists she dine with him. Marion stares in confusion at sight of her husband dining with his secretary. They are evidently arguing, and as Wissell tries in vain to quiet her, he yields and hands her a roll of bills. Unable to endure more, Marion leaves hurriedly, while Strong silently sympathizes. Wissel lies about his working so hard he didn't have time to go to lunch but when he tries to force his kisses on Marion she turns from him, revolted. "Is that so," he sneers, and seizing her, he pinions her arms behind her and kisses her fiercely.

Back at his office, Wissell has a new secretary. He is forcing himself on the struggling girl when his old secretary enters and accuses him of trying that on every girl that works for him. Wissell tries to stop her accusations, and as he struggles with her, she crashes backward through the window. Badly injured she is taken to the hospital where she reveals all. She had heard Wissell quarrelling with Lee Gaines the day he was murdered . She had heard their arrangement to break in the Strong place. Wissell had killed Gaines and now that he had ruined her, was deserting her. Wissell is tried for murder and condemned to death. Strong's business, freed of Wissell's fraudulent competition, picks up again, and Marion leaves for London, there to be met several months later, by Kenneth Strong.

THE LOST THRONE

Dr. D. V. Bhale Drama File No. 12268

ON the birthday of Rustam, King of Bagdad, his daughter Ameena wins permission to accompany him as he reviews his troops. Following the parade the princess is introduced to the commanding officers and Suleman, Commander-in-Chief, falls in love with her. That night a reception is held at the court and honors distributed. After receiving high praise for his army work, Suleman ventures to request the hand of Ameena in marriage. Amazed at such daring, the king orders his arrest. A court martial is held the following day and Suleman is sentenced to lose his head two weeks later. After making one unsuccessful attempt to escape, Suleman determines to win his freedom by making love to the Queen's maid-servant, Fatima, who brings his food. Through pretty speeches and the promise that if she aids him he will win the throne and make Fatima his bride, Suleman enlists her aid. Fatma then feigns love for the peon who carries the King's dispatch case with the royal seal. Unable to persuade the man to permit her to borrow it, Fatima places the peon in a stupor with wine and then stabs him to death. Wearing the dress of the dead man, Fatima enters the palace and removes the seal in time to falsify papers freeing Suleman just as the sentence is to be executed. Suleman raises a successful rebellion, killing the king and imprisoning the daughter while the mother flees to the forest. All of the king's favorites are punished but he shows no indication of remembering his pledge to Fatima. Fatima is murdered when she reminds Suleman of his great debt to her but she first issues the propheey that Suleman shall be killed also. Found by a harmless and loyal farmer, Nester, the Queen-mother Gulnar, sends him with word to her son, Roshan, who has been presiding over another province. Suleman's soldiers are already on the road to destroy the prince who is rescued by his friend, Dilder. Disguised the two young men come to Bagdad for Dilder is eager to aid, having fallen in love with Ameena's portrait. By a secret passage, Roshan enters the women's rooms only to find Latifa, Suleman's step-daughter. After her first fright, it is instantaneous love for both and Latifa agrees to help him. She gives a ring which will permit entrance to the princess' prison. Since it is too dangerous to go himself, Roshan consents to send Dilder instead. The two have only a few moments alone before Suleman is heard coming to renew his pleas for marriage, and Dilder agrees to return with a disguise of male clothing. But the next day Suleman finds Roshan with his daughter and takes him prisoner while the prince believes the girl has betrayed him. As a precaution, guards over Ameena are changed and orders given that he alone be admitted. Latifa contrives to see Dilder and convince him of her innocence. Although Roshan opposes this, to save her brother's life, Ameena consents to marry Suleman. Violence breaks out in the city upon hearing this. Angry, Suleman decides to slaughter Roshan who living is too dangerous to the throne and then marry Ameena. But through Latifa, Dilder gains entrance to his friend and together they successfully fulfill Fatima's propheey while the step-daughter frees Ameena. When Rustam takes the throne Amcena learns to care for Dilder. The new king remains gloomy however. Understanding the cause, Dilder convinces him that Latifa was not complicated in the plot against the heir and the king sends for the girl he had exiled. Jubilantly, the populace hears the public announcement of a double wedding.

THE CARLTON CASE

George Nayler Melodrama File No. 12399

IN his study, John Harding begs his wilfull motherless daughter, Leda, to accept Robert Carlton for her husband. When Leda confesses that she admires Robert but prefers Phil, John shows her proofs that Phil will make an untrustworthy husband. Soon after wedding bells ring out the glad announcement that Robert and Leda are groom and bride. Robert has to leave on business for several weeks and Leda is lonely. At this psychological moment Phil comes to her and insists on being treated as an old friend, reassuring Leda that there is nothing wrong. Versed in the art of attracting women, Phil has always resented his successful rival. Now he is determined to win Leda who slowly becomes infatuated. The hour is very late when they return from a wild party where both have been drinking steadily. Phil presses his lips against hers and though she weakly protests he will not permit her to go. Leda knows remorse at breakfast the next day when she finds a letter that Robert is hurrying his business to return to her. Soon after one of the Carlton servants calls at Phil's house and demands a large bribe or he will report the affair in its blackest aspect to Robert. Knowing that this will meant continued blackmail, Phil arranges passage to America and persuades Leda to accompany him. Against her knowledge he hires thugs to substitute the boy of an accident victim in Leda's clothes, to be found the next morning. Delayed when his car breaks down, Robert arrives the next morning and from spectators about his house learns that Leda has been murdered and Carlton is accused. Dreading the thought of handcuffs, Robert, disguised, works his passage to England. On the boat, Leda wigged and veiled encounters John Sinclair who resembles her husband so closely that she nearly collapses. In New York hse soon becomes disillusioned with Phil who, after his small capital is spent, becomes a partner of a notorious gambling joint. He plans to make Leda a decoy but she leaves the place instantly upon learning its true nature. Phil returns to their furnished room to find a note; Leda has left him. Too late she realizes the sterling qualities of Robert and not aware of the charges against him is ashamed to return. Instead she takes a place as typist and not long after reads with little emotion the news that Phil has been killed over a crooked play. In London Carlton encounters Sinclair and is amazed at the resemblance. That night with his hair and mustache clipped, Carlton obtains an appointment with his double and enlists Sinclair's help. He is tired of running from the police but how can they try him if both profess to be the same man? In need of money and for another reason which he will not reveal, Carlton agrees. A month later they have studied their habits so closely that they are identical. When arrest comes no one can tell the real Carlton from the other. The police are in a quandary, unable to select the right one, or determine legal procedure though both are kept in restraint. Intimates of both are equally puzzled, while Harding has succumbed to the shock of his loss. A newsreel shown in America first acquaints Leda with the case. At once she wires the police for passage money. Local detectives secretly investigate and are convinced of the truth. When told that Leda is on her way, Sinclair and Carlton fear a trick until the moment when Leda is in her husband's arms. The past is buried and over a merry meal Sinclair reveals that he is really Carlton's half-brother from an earlier marriage.

NINE BELLS

Wyman O. Kimbrell Drama File No. 12538

AT the Gobs' Dance held in the Navy Club, Chuby is disconsolately looking over the girls; the other sailors have already found themselves partners. Chuby's eyes glow as they see Vera Lang, pretty brunette; and it is not long before they are fox trotting together. It is late when they walk home together and Chuby returns to the Navy Yard in Philadelphia, with Vera's promise that he may see her again. New Year's Eve, Chuby takes Vera to a midnight show, and as the screen flashes, "Ring out the old and in the new," their lips meet for the first time. Soon sailing orders come, transferring the men to Charleston, South Carolina. Vera promises to remain true to him and Chuby promises himself that he will not look at another girl. As captain's inspection, the first day, Chuby is hauled over the coals for a minor infration. He decides to go for a walk and forget his troubles. A voice hails him, "Sailor boy, do yaul want a drink?" Fortified, by liquor, Chuby goes to a cabaret where he meets Ruth of Alabama. Since he is from Florida they decide it is a bond and spend pleasant hours together. They dance at a bootlegger's place to the music of victrola records. Dawn is breaking when they stop for breakfast with their last fifty cents. Over the coffee, Chuby reproaches himself for forgetting his promises to Vera, and he tells Ruth he is going back to the ship. Chuby promises to see her the next afternoon to tell her whether or not he will continue to be faithful. He is disappointed at not finding a letter from Vera; only to receive one the following day, accusing him of unfaithfulness and they had better end things. Remorsefully, Chuby writes to her; then arranges to meet Ruth in Birmingham. At New Orleans, Chuby has a leave of absence and takes a bus home. Sally, his sweetheart of school days, is waiting for him at the station with his parents. That evening they plan to marry when Chuby's enlistment is over the next year. In the meantime he will save for their dream bungalow. Returning to New Orleans, Chuby finds Ruth waiting for him on the bus. Chuby withdraws one hundred dollars of the bungalow money and the two play the races; broke the next day, Chuby withdraws the last three hundred and "blows" it on the night life. When Ruth learns Chuby is broke, she runs away with a newspaperman. Chuby then writes to both Vera and Sally, not sure which one he really loves. At the Panama Canal, the ship is detained two weeks while the ship undergoes needed repairs. Days pass before they receive mail and Chuby is hurt to find disgruntled letters from both girls. In Seattle, Chuby meets Ritta, a nurse, who dictates letters which reconcile Vera and Sally. Transferred to San Pedro, Ritta follows and Chuby is falling for her when he finds that she is married. Chuby refuses to see her again. While walking past a church, he joins a crowd listening to the choir. Pretty Lucille makes a place for him and he brings her home in a taxi when it starts to rain. Thereafter, Chuby calls upon her regularly. The day of the earthquake, Chuby rushes to the aid of Lucille and her aunt. He fixes up beds for them in the park and under the stars confesses his love. Chuby is granted his release by Vera but still hesitates about Sally until old Pop, the sailor, advises him to choose the one at home. Chuby buckles down to his promises to Sally. The family wishes him to re-business studies because he wishes to fulfill his enlist but Sally won't hear of it. She sends a letter breaking off the engagement, and confessing that there is another man in the offering. Jubilant and free, Chuby returns to Lucille—this time to be the "only girl" forever.

THE WESTERN GENT

Azelle Sharp Western File No. 12531

WHILE outside cowboys lift their voices in song as they rest after the noon meal, their employer, young Dan Everett, and Dick, his roommate apply the finishing touches to their dress. They are preparing to meet Dan's sister, Vivian, whom Dick has fallen in love with from her photograph. As they start the old ford, Dick playfully wrestles with Dan until he obtains Vivian's latest snapshot. With sudden shyness, Dick insists on waiting for them in the car when the train pulls in. His face falls as a few minutes later, Dan returns alone. Worried, they return to the station where there is a telegram from Vivian who has been detained a day. On the way home after stocking supplies for the ranch, they stop at the Scouts' Hangout, one of the few old-fashioned "rough and ready" saloons left in that section of the west. While Dan visits the private quarters where his fiancee, Jane Sullivan, daughter of proprietor, is preparing her trouscau, Dick listens to the gossip at the bar. The cowboys are excited because several heads of cattle are missing from the Square X ranch; rumor declares that a new gang of rustlers has entered over the Mexican border. As Dick stares at Vivian's photograph one of the dance hall girls tries to entice him over to her table but flinging her off, he wanders over to a table where a game of cards is in progrss. Clell Wheeler invites Dick to join them and scarcely an hour passes before Dick finds he has lost an entire month's pay. Though he wants to quit, Clell seeks to entice him to sign a note. As he is reaching for a pen, stung by their taunts, he looks up to see Dan besides him. When Dan warns him not to, Clell, angry, sneeringly invites Dick to play. Looking at Dan's finger ring he suggests they match cards for it, knowing that Dan prizes it as a gift from Jane. Suddenly, Dan leans over to Clell and pulls out a hidden card charging that Clell has been cheating in the game. Afraid of trouble, someone puts out the lights. A shot is heard and Dick sees Dan on the floor. He insists that Clell be searched but Clell declares that he has no gun; he left it to be fixed. To Dick is left the sad news to break to Jane; mournfully the two return to the ranch with the body. Dick cannot find the heart to reveal her loss to Vivian until they reach the ranch where he turns the task over to Jane. Walking apart from the other men who respect his sorrow, Dick is interrupted by Joe, the barkeeper, who warns him that Clell has heen seen wearing Dan's ring. After the funeral, Dick declares that he will settle the matter; he wants nothing said to the others. At Dan's funeral Vivian forces him to confide the entire story. Determined to help him get proof, Vivian takes a position as dancer at the Scouts' Hangout. Soon Clell determines to have her for his own and warns the other men to keep away. Dick alone defies him, worried that Vivian may come to grief. Claiming that she knows what she is doing, Vivian promises Clell to marry him. He "stands" drinks for everyone to celebrate and half drunk, takes Dan's ring from his pooket and puts it on. Unable to bear it any longer, Dick strides over to claim it when Clell and his three cronies hold him and the crowd off with pistols and leap for their horses. Dick follows; wounds two of them and single handed fights and knocks out Clell and the other man who seek to overpower him. With his lariat tied on one end to the saddle, Dick strings them up and drags them to the posse who follow to arrest them for cattle rustling, being led by Vivian. Her frightened horse starts to run away but Dick captures the animal together with the heart of the girl he has so constantly loved.

LESSONS IN LOVE

E. A. Ball Drama Flie No. 12537

TAKING her in his arms, Bill Harvey begs Eunice Sweet, pretty flirt, to marry him. As he attempts to kiss her, Eunice evades him with the warning, "Not without the law." Nothing loathe, Bill drives to the marriage license bureau. Home, Bill finds a telegram which sends him to New York to receive an inheritance making him a wealthy man. Bill sends a large check to Eunice for her trousseau, begging Eunice to come and be married there. Their first lunch together in New York, Eunice is attracted to a goodlooking man a few tables away. That evening Bill takes his fiancee to a dance given at the home of Mrs. Roper, an old friend of his family. There Eunice is introduced to Mrs. Roper's nephew whom she at once recognizes as Ted Car who had so attentively watched her at the restaurant. Bill notices this too with alarm and watches with jealous eyes while Ted and Eunice later walk out together in the moonlight. Ted wants to know what has brought Eunice here; realizing that if Ted learns she is engaged he will never see her again, Eunice withholds that fact . Instead she tells him of her family's estate in Europe which cannot be located. As a lawyer, Ted promises to investigate the deeds. Bill is waiting for them when they return and insists on going home at once. Eunice continues to postpone the marriage and persists on seeing Ted, despite Bill's protests. They quarrel violently one evening; soon after Ted begs to see her. He is leaving for Paris to complete investigations and suggests that Eunice go abroad; she can stay with an aunt of his. Impulsively, Eunice agrees and leaves a note for Bill, not revealing her destination. Later in Paris, Ted and Eunice see the old American newspapers which advertise a huge sum for her return. Ted begs Eunice to marry him but she cannot be sure of her heart until she sees both of them together. Meanwhile, Bill employs private detective True to investigate. Convinced that Bill is holding back information, True goes through his employer's things and finds a returned check which he had formerly given Eunice. Bill is brought to trial on a white slavery charge and is convioted when the hotel clerk identifies him as her last visitor. An appeal is granted on the grounds that their important witness, Ted, cannot be located. Ted is called back to the states when his aunt falls ill and is ordered to testify. There he hreaks his promise and confesses that Eunice left with him so Bill is freed. Eunice secretly decides to return, homesick. A body is found which is identified as Eunice and Ted is arrested for murder. The girl was another, however, and the murderer fearing that Eunice recognized him, throws her overboard. A good swimmer, Eunice makes for a small deserted island, uninhabited because it has a volcano which frequently erupts. She lives for a while on strange fruits, making fire with stones. Ted persuades Eunice's family that he is innocent and enlists Bill's help to secure bail so he can prove it, but the court refuses. Bill takes a plane to bring back his sweetheart's body. Looking down he sees Eunice, swimming near exhaustion as she tries to clude the erupting volcano. In the presence of the released Ted and Bill, Eunice makes her choice forever—the man who rescued his rival and herself—Bill.

DIXIE TO HARLEM

James A. Burke

Musical Comedy-Drama File No. 12529

WHILE Andy complains that his feet hurt as they wearily wend their way home from lodge meeting, Amos unsympathetic because Andy insists on wearing tight shoes, warns him that they must get up early the next morning. Andy is finally prodded to prepare for bed, only to suddenly dive into the closet emerging with twine and a battered cigar which he puffs at furiously. While Amos watches wonderingly, Andy climbs on a table and orders the other to toss him the string. Reaching for it, Andy flops on the bed but while they argue ties the string on a nail to the ceiling and attaches the alarm clock a foot away from their head. There is no further mishap except that Senorita Butterfly's gift of socks catch fire from the cigar and as they extinguish it, Andy is revealed wearing for pajamas a convict suit he found in the taxi because he pawned the ones given by Madam Queen. While Andy prepares to fix the cash register the following morning, he dozes to be awakened by an advance agent for a minstrel show. Andy accepts the passes, and braggingly informs the man that Andy was the best minstrel man in Georgia. A regular Black Baron Von Munchausen, Andy continues to give details. According to him HE introduced all the innovations, creating minstrel shows which were glorified vaudeville, minstrel and musical comedy all rolled into one. Andy falls asleep again. . . . Wild-eyes Cantor enters to tell Andy that his entire cast for the minstrel has been quarantined for smallpox and that Andy must put on a show to save the season's bookings. He thrusts two thousand dollars in Andy's hands for incidental expenses, placing five thousand more to his credit at the bank. All protests are silenced by the sight of this fortune together with the promise that he can lead the minstrel parade in a drum major's uniform. Andy proposes Bill Chiles would be good but he is in Georgia. Cantor suggests he hop a plane and bring back all the boys. Enthusiastic, Andy says, "Hot ziggety dog! I'll jes BRING OL' DIXIE UP TO HARLEM." While Lightnin', a staggered witness, explains to Amos, Andy, resplendant in the uniform visits Madam Queen's Beauty Shop and staggers her with a low bow of greeting; the dignity of which is upset when his baton smashes her show case. The Three Musketeers, Messrs King Fish, Ali Bendo and Henry Van Porter, trail Andy and receive his permission to book talent for the show. Subsequently, they tie Andy up to exhibit everything in New York from organ grinders to the Brooklyn Bridge. Amos finds Andy preparing to sign up Senorita Butterfly and drags him to Banker Clark who safeguards things by arranging Amos for treasurer. An associate bank in Georgia promises to have a competent man arrange talent, one with experience. Although King Fish expects to go on the plane, Amos accompanies Andy instead. Meanwhile, Col. Ashley and his son Dick are suffering from the depression and Maj. Cartwright, the banker, has been extending credit to the breaking point. Dick's experience with local amateur minstrel shows gives him a national reputation. Recommended Dick is delighted to find Amos and Andy are old acquaintances. Dick has already been working with Zeke (Al Jolson) for a local minstrel show and he adapts it for New York, inspired by the Black Baron's declaration that he is there to "Bring ol' Dixie up to Harlem." Dick is hampered by the ill-assortment of acts selected hy The Three Musketeers until he learns the contracts are not binding; holding tryouts to select the best. The final dress rehearsal includes such numbers as: Fields of Cotton, Dusky Stevedores, Cane Patches, sunflowers and all—supplemented by white choruses, negro quartets, Buck and Wing dancers, Georgia Cake Walks, spirituals, etc. Outstanding is the Dusky Stevedores number, showing stevedores haling bales of cotton on hand trucks on the pier. After the first verse, the bales open and chorines in crinolene step out and join in the chorus. The scene closes with the girls seated on the bales while the stevedores truck them off the stage. Supervising, Cantor likes Dick's voice and has him sing a solo. As they come out to take imaginary curtain calls, Andy tangles his feet in some ropes in the wings and falls—only to wake and find it a dream.

NOTE:—Although written especially for the Amos 'n Andy characters, this play is readily adaptable to any team of Black Face comedians.
